Subsequently, the Reich's Genealogical Research Office issued a "Ruling regarding the Family's Origin" dated August 30, 1939, which was included in Hermine's 1938 Census. According to the Office's verification, Hermine Maria Franciska Wittgenstein was declared a Jewish Mischling. That status was confirmed in a letter from Dr. Kurt Mayer, head of the Sippenstelle in Berlin, dated February 10, 1940. Mayer stated that Hermann Wittgenstein was deemed to be "the German blooded ancestor of all descendants," and that certifications of the family's Mischling status was provided to numerous descendants of Hermann Wittgenstein, so that there would be no further difficulties with respect to their racial classification according to the Nuremberg laws. The CRT noted that both Hermine and Helene not only survived the Second World War while residing openly in Austria, but were able to maintain the life to which they were accustomed before the Anschlüss.

In a letter dated May 30, 1940, Paul summarized the negotiations with the Reichsbank to his nephew, Felix Salzer (Helene's son), who at that time resided in New York. As the CRT noted, Paul explained that the negotiations resulted in a declaration of Aryan (i.e., Mischling) status, which allowed Hermine and Helene to remain in the Reich and to retain their assets. Paul explained that his sisters were required, like all other Aryans, to put their foreign currency at the disposition of the Reichsbank, for which they received the counter value in RM.

With regard to the 11 Swiss bank accounts held by Wistag Partnership (three custody accounts and two demand deposit accounts at Bank I; one custody account and two demand deposit accounts at Bank III; and one custody account and two demand deposit accounts at Bank IV), the CRT explained that the assets in the Swiss accounts held by Wistag Partnership were distributed in accordance with the Agreement and Side Agreements. The CRT therefore addressed the disposition of the assets in the Wistag Partnership accounts in the context of total Wistag Partnership assets presumed to have been held in Swiss banks by each Wittgenstein, and not necessarily account by account.

The CRT explained that with respect to the presumed Swiss-held SF 1,221,075.68 share of the Wistag Partnership held by Paul Wittgenstein, Paul retained SF 1.8 million from the total Wistag Partnership funds, pursuant to the Agreement. The Reichsbank agreed to pay SF 300,000 in legal fees, resulting in retention by Wistag Partnership of SF 350,000 that it had set aside to pay such fees (as confirmed by an internal Bank III memorandum). That amount still was intact after the Second World War, and reverted to Paul Wittgenstein. Of the amount of Paul's share of Wistag Partnership held in Swiss banks, he received 91.68 paid out directly to him (SF 1,119,480.00), with the remainder transferred to the Reichsbank in accordance with the Agreement and Side Agreement 2, which in turn credited the RM counter value to bank accounts held by Hermine and Helene.

The CRT noted that this finding was consistent with a statement made in a letter to the CRT from Paul Wittgenstein's son, Paul Wittgenstein, Jr. He wrote: "At the end of August 1939 all the Wistag money was liquidated in a final agreement between my father and his sisters. My father got most of his money and the sisters had to transfer their money to Austria/Germany. That is, the sisters didn't lose their money. For this reason I would ask again that nothing further be done in this matter."

With regard to Hermine's and Helene's SF 966,845.41 and SF 812,717.36 in the Wistag Partnership that were presumed to have been held in Swiss banks, these amounts were transferred to the Reichsbank, in accordance with the Agreement. The counter value in RM was deposited into the Wittgenstein bank accounts. The CRT therefore determined that the Wittgensteins received the proceeds of the assets transferred to the Reichsbank. They were able to freely dispose of those assets, given the Mischling status obtained in accordance with the Agreement.

With respect to the 12 Swiss bank accounts held by Wistag A.G., the negotiations with the Reichsbank affected only the assets of Wistag Partnership, leaving Wistag A.G. intact. Pursuant to Side Agreement 1, concluded between Paul Wittgenstein and John Stonborough, Paul conferred all his rights in the Wistag A.G. and its assets to Stonborough, who in turn transferred the equivalent of SF 500,000.00 from the Wistag A.G.'s funds to Paul. He agreed, if the need arose, to support Hermine and Helene (who wished to remain in the Reich), up to the amount available after the SF 500,000 payment to Paul. The CRT concluded that the Wittgensteins remained in control of the Wistag A.G.'s assets during the Relevant Period, and that the Wistag A.G. continued to function until it went into liquidation in 1948, and was subsequently dissolved in 1949. The CRT noted that a payment of SF 90,386.00 to the Reichsbank, specifically asserted by the Claimants to have been lost "to the German Reichsbank," was in fact paid by Stonborough in accordance with Side Agreement 1. The counter value of those funds was received in RM for the benefit of Hermine and Helene. Accordingly, an award of the accounts held by Wistag A.G. was not appropriate.

With regard to the three custody accounts at Bank I held by Paul, Hermine and Helene, the siblings had sold all of their securities between June and December 1938, and had received the RM counter value of the sale of their Swiss security holdings in accounts at their free disposition. With regard to three demand deposit accounts in U.S. Dollars held by the siblings, closed on April 20, 1938, the CRT noted that Paul actively managed a second custody account at Bank I over one month after the closure of the three demand deposit accounts. This indicated the siblings' continued dominion over their account. That second custody account contained 19 bars of gold, from which 4 gold bars were removed by Paul prior to the Anschlüss. The remaining 15 bars were transferred by Paul to the Wistag Partnership's custody account at Bank I on May 27, 1938, after which Paul closed his custody account on June 1, 1938. The CRT also noted that in accordance with the Agreement and related Side Agreements, any transfer of funds to the Reichsbank would have been returned via receipt by the siblings of the RM counter value. Moreover, as the siblings were granted Mischling status, they were absolved of any liability for atonement tax, and were freely able to manage their accounts.

The CRT noted that despite his Mischling status, Paul was liable for payment of flight tax, which applied to all persons who were citizens of the Reich as of March 31, 1931, who resided in the Reich as of January 1, 1928 and subsequently gave up their residency in the Reich. However, there was no indication in the record that any flight tax paid by Paul - if paid at all - was paid through transfer of Swiss-held funds directly to a blocked account in the Reich.

The CRT therefore did not recommend an award. The claimants, represented by counsel, submitted an appeal. The appeal was supplemented by additional documentation.

The Court resolved the appeal. The Court explained that in connection with the appeal, the claimants' legal representative had, for the first time, disclosed that two awards had been issued previously with regard to some of the claimed assets. According to the representative, one award had been issued to the Wittgenstein heirs pursuant to the Austrian Bank Settlement (date not provided), and the other award was issued in 2009 by the Austrian General Settlement Fund for Victims of National Socialism ("GSF"). The legal representative did not provide the claims and supporting materials for those proceedings, and he did not provide the actual award decisions. Accordingly, the Court ordered production of the original claims, and any and all supporting documentation, along with the original decisions issued by the Austrian Bank Settlement and GSF.

Subsequently, after reviewing all written submissions, the Court heard oral argument. Thereafter, the Court issued an order in which it observed that discussions between the claimants' representative and lead counsel for beneficiaries of the Settlement Fund had resulted in a proposed settlement of the claim for $6,063,918.88. The Court noted that while it was unclear whether the claimants would have prevailed on all of their arguments with regard to various points raised in the decision, the Court nevertheless was satisfied that there was sufficient merit to the claim that justified a settlement in the proposed range. Accordingly, the Court ordered payment of the settlement amount, termination of the appeal, and final resolution of all claims based upon assets held by Paul Wittgenstein, Hermine Wittgenstein, Helene Salzer, Wistag AG and Wistag Partnership.

iii. In re the Assets of Siegfried Budge (SF 5,566,000.00)

The CRT initially issued a Certified Award and Award Denial (the "decision") with regard to an account published in January 2005, under the name of Emma Budge. The decision pertained to the assets of Siegfried Budge, who was one of Emma Budge's named heirs, and whose assets comprised a portion of the assets originally held by Emma Budge at the Zurich branch of the Schweizerischer Kreditanstalt (the "Bank"). The decision awarded SF 1,394,979.18 to the heirs of Siegfried Budge (the "claimants"), who was the nephew of Emma Budge's husband. The claimants challenged the amount of the decision, and the appeal ultimately was settled for $4,600,000.00.

The CRT explained that Emma Budge, née Lazarus, was Jewish. In 1879 she married Henry Budge, who came from a prominent banking family in Hamburg, Germany. By the beginning of the twentieth century, Emma's husband, who, like his wife, became a citizen of the United States in 1882, had amassed an enormous fortune through his partnership in the bank Hallgarten & Co. in New York.

Emma (born Lazarus, born 17.2.1852 Hamburg, died 14.2.1937 Hamburg) & Henry Budge (banker, born 20.11.1840 Frankfurt a M., died 20.10. 1928 Hamburg). http://www.alaintruong.com/archives/2014/06/13/ 30067615.html.[167]

Henry Budge died on October 20, 1928, leaving the bulk of his wealth to his wife. Emma Budge died on February 14, 1937. In her will (the "Will"), she stipulated that her residual estate should go to the descendants of her siblings, the descendants of Henry Budge's siblings, and to the charitable foundations Henry and Emma had established.

Emma's Will left specific bequests to several individuals, with her residual estate divided among 17 heirs. Ten of the heirs (the "domestic heirs"), including three charitable foundations, resided or were located in the Reich at the time the bulk of the Estate was distributed. The other seven heirs, including one charitable organization in New York, were outside the Reich (the "foreign heirs") at the time of the Estate's distribution. Emma's Will, which included five Codicils, reflected Emma's growing concern over the dangers to the Jewish community posed by Hitler's regime. She was aware of the need to protect her estate, and the intended uses of her bequests, from the Nazis. All executors were to be Jewish, and she directed that the share of the Estate to which any deceased heir was entitled would fall to their respective heirs by representation. As the CRT explained, 53% of the Estate's residual assets were allocated to domestic heirs, and 47% were allocated to foreign heirs.

The gross value of the Estate at the time of Emma Budge's death was 6,774,927.94 Reichsmark ("RM"), with liabilities against the Estate of RM 247,360.81. The CRT explained that 59.1 percent of the gross value of the Estate - RM 4,004,813.59 - was held at the Bank in Switzerland, with the remaining 49.9 percent - RM 2,770,114.35 – was held within the Reich. The estate tax levied against the Estate, after deduction of liabilities, was RM 2,088,815.00 as of March 17, 1938, of which RM 1.2 million already had been paid as of that date. The remainder, RM 888,782.70, was to be paid by April 20, 1938 from assets located in the Reich (the funds on deposit in Switzerland were not yet available to the executors), even though the estate tax was based upon the entire value of the Estate, including assets held in Switzerland.

By late summer/fall of 1938, the Foreign Exchange Office (the "Devisenstelle") had been forced to accept that it generally could not apply the Reich's foreign exchange regulations to the foreign-held assets of an undistributed estate, especially if the estate involved foreign-held interests - as did Emma's Estate. The Devisenstelle therefore increased its pressure on the executors and domestic heirs to force distribution of the Swiss-held assets of the Estate, so that the Devisenstelle could obtain the foreign currency proceeds of the shares that fell to the domestic heirs. Accordingly, the Devisenstelle took severe measures to prevent the domestic heirs from leaving the Reich before they repatriated their shares of the Estate's Swiss-held assets. By December 1938, the residual value of the Estate, after reduction due to the loss in market value of securities in its portfolio; augmentation from the proceeds from the sales of real estate, art works, and income on financial assets; and taking account of contingencies and excluding unsold physical assets, was put at a rounded pre-tax amount of RM 4.5 million.

The Devisenstelle realized that to effect a prompt transfer of the Estate's Swiss-held assets, it would have to negotiate, as the Swiss courts would likely protect the heirs. To that end, the Devisenstelle put pressure on the four executors, one of whom resigned in fear of a threat to his own imminent emigration. That left three executors, with only two executors needed to form a majority in order to approve a distribution plan (the "Budge distribution plan") with the Devisenstelle. On March 23, 1939, the Budge distribution plan was approved by only two of the four executors (in contrast to the Will's stipulation that in the event of a disagreement, majority would rule). A reserve of US $303,000 would be set aside against U.S. estate tax liabilities and associated settlement costs. The foreign heirs would receive their full shares from the remaining Swiss-held assets, and the domestic heirs would share the then-remaining amount according to the Will.

On April 1939, as part of a negotiated settlement with the Devisenstelle, the Bank distributed the Swiss-held assets to the foreign heirs directly, and to the domestic heirs via an account at M. M. Warburg, where the assets for each heir were specifically identified. Eventually, larger distributions were made into blocked accounts belonging to the domestic heirs, much of which appeared to have been either paid in discriminatory taxes to Nazi authorities, or confiscated outright. The CRT noted that after the Second World War, the domestic heirs, or their heirs, successfully filed restitution claims for those assets.

As part of its investigation, the CRT obtained "voluntary assistance" from the Bank, which provided records from its files. Subsequently, the CRT received thousands of pages pertaining to Emma's Estate from the Hamburg State Archive and the Hessen State Archive.

The Bank's records showed that Emma Budge originally held five accounts at the Bank: 1) a demand deposit account denominated in U.S. Dollars that was opened on an unknown date and closed on November 10, 1939; 2) a demand deposit account denominated in Swiss Francs that was opened on May 28, 1934 and closed on November 20, 1939; 3) a demand deposit account denominated in British Pounds that was opened on an unknown date and closed on November 20, 1939; 4) an account denominated in Argentinian Pesos that was opened on an unknown date and closed on December 20, 1939; and 5) a custody account that was opened on May 28, 1934 and closed on November 16, 1939.

The Bank had made a full distribution of the Estate's holdings by the time the Swiss accounts at issue had been closed. A detailed deposit statement by M. M. Warburg, dated April 19, 1939, showed that Siegfried Budge's account had been credited with each security on the Bank's list, except one, plus the same amount of cash as listed by the Bank, for a total value of RM 236,740.31 as of March 20, 1939. At the time of the distribution, the Bank opened six new accounts into which assets from the Estate were transferred. Five of the new accounts belonged to foreign heirs who resided in Europe. The sixth account held the assets retained as reserves, and assets held for the Budge foundations. As no final accounting was available to the CRT, it could not be determined whether any settlement was made with respect to the individual heirs' estate tax liabilities, or whether further distributions were made that would affect the assessment of the fate of Siegfried Budge's assets that were transferred into the Reich.

The CRT determined that it was plausible that, with certain exceptions, Siegfried Budge did not have free disposition over his share of the Estate's assets that were transferred into the Reich. The CRT also determined that the distribution of the Estate's Swiss-held assets had not been in the best interest of the domestic heirs, including Siegfried Budge, and was the result of extreme pressure by the Reich's authorities, particularly on the domestic heirs and the executors. The Bank knew or should have known that the transfer of assets from Switzerland into the Reich would be made into blocked accounts under the control of the Devisenstelle, and would result in eventual confiscation by the Nazis. The CRT noted that the Bank was fully aware that at least some of the heirs resided or were located within the Reich, and were subject to Nazi persecution.

Siegfried's total share (11 percent) of the distributions made from the Swiss-held assets in 1939-1940 amounted to RM 276,468.11 (equivalent to US$ 110,897.76), of which RM 264,163.31 was transferred into the Reich. Siegfried had no disposition over the account into which the funds were transferred, as it was secured by order of the Devisenstelle. From the amount transferred into the Reich, the CRT deducted: 1) RM 2,903.97 in pre-assigned funds to a creditor, Hallgarten & Co., in New York; 2) RM 21,494.71 in releases from Siegfried's blocked account at M. M. Warburg for his personal use; 3) RM 134,306.05 for Siegfried's share of German estate tax payments attributed to the Swiss-held assets transferred into the Reich; and 4) RM 42,405.52 representing the Swiss share of restitution received for financial assets and securities in the post-War period. Accordingly, the remainder of the amount eligible for an award, after taking these deductions, was RM 63,053.06, which translated to SF 111,598.33. The CRT multiplied that amount by a factor of 12.5 to obtain the current value of the account, for an award amount of SF 1,394,979.18.

The CRT concluded that the claimants, who were heirs of Siegfried Budge, were not eligible to expand the scope of their claim to Siegfried Budge's assets to include additional claimants (i.e., the heirs of Emma Budge's other named heirs) and additional account owners (i.e., Emma Budge's other named heirs). The CRT explained that: 1) such an attempt was tantamount to submitting a late claim, which, after multiple extensions of the filing deadline, no longer was permitted by the Court; 2) many of Emma Budge's heirs other than Siegfried resided outside the Reich, and had received their assets upon distribution of the Estate; 3) many, if not all, of the other heirs had received restitution after the Second World War; and 4) the terms of the Will provided that Siegfried Budge was to receive only 11% of the Estate.

The claimants appealed, alleging that 1) the CRT did not properly calculate the value of assets that originated from the Swiss-held assets of the Estate, and which were restituted after the Second World War to the heirs of Siegfried Budge; 2) the CRT did not properly calculate the estate tax payments made by the Estate to the Nazi authorities; and 3) the CRT did not properly consider the claimants' entitlement to the assets of other heirs of Emma Budge.

The Court, on appeal, addressed and resolved the "three main arguments" that the Budge appellants had raised.[168] The first argument was that the CRT "did not properly calculate the value of assets that originated from the Swiss-held assets of the Estate of Emma Budge, and which were restituted after the War to the heirs of Siegfried Budge. The CRT decision had valued the restitution amount in Reichsmark, calculated the corresponding value in Swiss Francs, and deducted that amount from the 1945 value of the award amount. The claimants argued that the restitution deduction should have been based on the currency used and received after the War, deutschmarks, which would have resulted in less of a deduction on the basis of the restitution received."[169] After consulting with CRT Special Masters Junz and Bradfield, the Court had determined that "the claimants' argument is correct." After recalculating the restitution deduction, the claimants were entitled to an additional SF 833,354.25.[170]

Second, the Court determined that although the appellants contended that the CRT had not used the proper currency in deducting the estate tax payment from the award, the issue was not whether the currency was appropriate, but whether the deduction itself was correct. "An estate tax is the charge that a government imposes as a transaction tax allowing the transfer of assets from one generation to the next. In this case, however, the estate tax was not imposed as a transaction tax on transfer of assets from one generation to the next, but, rather, was imposed on the forced and coerced transfer of assets from one generation to the confiscating government. Under these circumstances, there is no issue as the currency to be used for calculating the deduction, as there should have been no deduction." The appellants accordingly were entitled to another adjustment of SF 2,971,372.79.[171]

With respect to the third argument, the Court recapped the bases for the CRT determination that the heirs were entitled only to the assets of Siegfried Budge, and noted that the appellants' challenge on this point was not persuasive. However, it also was "not frivolous." Therefore, the Court agreed to approve an "off-the-record discussion" between "counsel for the claimants and lead counsel for the beneficiaries of the Settlement Fund," resulting in a total additional award of $4.6 million. Since the Budge dispute was the last pending element of the CRT claims program, that settlement "conclude[d] the CRT process; free[d] significant sums for immediate distribution to other class members; and avoid[ed] unnecessary additional expense and protracted delay in distributing the remaining settlement fund assets to class members."[172] Shortly after issuing the Budge decision, thus terminating the CRT process, the Court allocated the remaining residual funds, primarily to Looted Assets Class programs benefiting the neediest survivors, with some additional funds allocated to the Victim List Project on behalf of all class members.[173]

V. CONCLUSION 133

I. INTRODUCTION

The distribution process for the Looted Assets Class provided for the neediest class members to benefit from humanitarian aid programs providing food, medicine, shelter and similar assistance. The Looted Assets Class potentially included millions of people, since all Holocaust victims and their heirs had been looted. The vast size of the class, coupled with the impossibility of determining whether specific property was transacted through a Swiss entity, rendered an individualized claims process impracticable. Instead, the Court agreed with the Special Masters' recommendation of a "cy pres" (the "next best thing") remedy targeting the neediest Holocaust survivors.

With its allocation of more than $256 million to the Looted Assets Class, the Court has helped to provide basic assistance to more than 237,400 of the neediest Nazi victims around the world. Those elderly survivors include:

- Tanya and Yakov D. of Illischevsk, Ukraine, both 74 years old when the Court authorized funding in 2001. The couple, who were Jewish, had met in the Obodovka concentration camp near Odessa and escaped together. They were hidden until the end of the war. Tanya worked as a nurse's assistant and Yakov was a shoemaker. They lived in a government-issued, third floor, one-room apartment. The apartment was rent free, but the family was required to pay for utilities, which at that time could cost over $50 a season. Their income consisted of Yakov's monthly pension (then $16), Tanya's (then $18) and an extra $6 a month they received for being ghetto survivors. Before Tanya was hospitalized for high blood pressure, diabetes, heart disease and a rare form of backbone disease, she had not left her apartment for several years. As a result of programs in the former Soviet Union supported by Court funding, a volunteer helped the couple with household tasks and grocery shopping. They also received monthly food packages. Yakov and Tanya also received prescription drugs, medical consultations, warm blankets and sweaters. They explained that before these programs provided assistance, "all of our pension was spent on medicines. Now our pension is spent on food and utilities."[1]
- Rosa, who was Jewish, was born in 1914 in Kiev. "When the Nazis approached Kiev in 1941, she escaped on foot with her husband. In a forest outside of Kiev she was caught by the Nazis and [sent to a] concentration camp. She escaped yet again and was hidden in the forest by a non-Jewish family until the end of the war. At 89, Rosa survives on a monthly pension of $28. She is bedridden and suffers from diabetes and heart disease. Rosa receives occasional food packages, medicine for some of her medical conditions, winter relief and sporadic home care …."[2]

- "Mr. S." was an 80-year-old Jewish concentration camp survivor. He had no immediate family. Although frail, Mr. S. maintained an independent life style. However, he fell in the street and injured his back. In addition to having difficulty walking, he became extremely nervous about the possibility of falling again. Without any family to assist him, he quickly became homebound, and had trouble purchasing basic grocery items and cleaning his apartment. Using funding from programs funded by the Court, the local Jewish social service hired a part-time companion who assisted him in the home and helped Mr. S. shop until he recovered sufficiently to feel comfortable to walk unaided. Thus, Mr. S. was able to maintain his independence, continuing to live at home.[3]
- Johanna, a Roma survivor living just south of Moldova in Romania, "came to pick up her [Court-funded] assistance package in the village square, more of a sloping open space and livestock cross over. She showed off the winter boots she had received from the project … which had replaced rags with which even in deep snow some Roma women still wrapped their feet." The director supervising programs for Roma and other non-Jewish victims in this region "had to insist on carrying Johanna's package for her. She said and may have been right, that she was the stronger of the two. We hiked to her cabin, a collapsing thatch roofed structure made of mud and straw lit by cooking oil received thanks to the settlement." The program director "left Johanna with her kind hospitality, her profound thanks and her gentle blessing…, feeling that" he had "just met the poorest European" he had "yet encountered" in his "21 year career of international humanitarian assistance."[4]

Tanya and Yakov, Mr. S., and Johanna are but four of the more than 237,400 elderly, needy Holocaust survivors who have received aid through the Looted Assets Class programs. This assistance has come in a variety of forms: a side of beef delivered to Roma victims in remote Eastern European villages; a hot meal trucked in to a shtetl in Ukraine; an emergency grant to a survivor in New York to pay for dental work not covered by health insurance.

An important legacy of the Swiss Banks settlement is that a court in New York has been able to touch the lives of so many impoverished survivors, often living tens of thousands of miles away from the courthouse. The programs that reached these victims were not necessarily envisioned under the Settlement Agreement, and were certainly not specified as part of the settlement of Looted Assets claims. To the contrary, the Looted Assets Class had posed particularly difficult allocation and distribution issues, and required a unique solution. As the Court has explained:

> There were several original purposes of this lawsuit. For members of the Deposited Assets Class, it was to recover property once held in Swiss banks that was either improperly transferred to the Nazis or never paid to the account holder. For members of the Refugee Class, it was to achieve some degree of restitution for being refused entry to Switzerland or otherwise harmed by Swiss immigration policies during the Nazi era. For members of the Slave Labor Classes, it was to achieve some degree of restitution for being forced to work for companies that were using Swiss financial institutions to flourish. And for members of the Looted Assets Class, it was to recover the value of assets that were looted by the Nazis and passed through Swiss banks. The original purposes of the first four classes have been roughly achieved, albeit with limited sums of money. But … trying to precisely fulfill the original purpose in connection with the Looted Assets Class was impracticable.
> I decided that distributing funds to the neediest survivors of Nazi persecution would be [the] "next best" distribution solution for the Looted Assets Class. Such a distribution is "as near as possible" to the original purpose of the Looted Assets Class as a court with limited funds can achieve. While the strategy I employed will by no means provide restitution to every member of the plaintiff class, it provides meaningful restitution to those "most in need of assistance." See In re Agent Orange Product Liability Litig., 818 F.2d 145, 158 (2d Cir. 1987).[5]

The Settlement Agreement did not call for any special consideration of Nazi victims in dire economic straits. No reference was made to the urgent need among many survivors for the most basic of services: food, medicine, heat. It was only the Court's firm insistence upon providing meaningful compensation that transformed what could have been a token distribution of perhaps a few dollars each to everyone who claimed to have been looted, into a targeted humanitarian aid program — a "cy pres" or "next best" remedy[6] — which likely sustained many lives for more than a decade.

The allocation mechanism recommended by the Special Masters and adopted by the Court represented an attempt to salvage some portion of the Settlement Fund for those who otherwise would have had no recourse against, and no recompense from, the defendant Swiss Banks. These survivors could not have proven a clear link between their personal stolen items, and Swiss financial institutions. "The settlement's 'looted assets' class, not well understood by some and exploited by others, created additional problems [beyond those associated with the banks' destruction of documents]. In theory, it would have required a mechanism to determine whether property, from among more than a million potential claimants, had been looted and whether it passed through Switzerland. Such a mechanism would have been prohibitively expensive and an administrative nightmare."[7]

[6] "Cy pres" is a "remedy for relief through a class-wide benefit program where it is difficult or impractical to provide direct monetary compensation to individual class members; also referred to as the 'next best thing.'" See Glossary: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, HOLOCAUST VICTIM ASSETS LITIG. (SWISS BANKS), at 6, http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents_New/Glossary.pdf ("Cy Pres").

> a system to benefit the neediest survivors who, in this specific instance, wouldn't have been eligible for payments under the Swiss banks settlement. The humanitarian aspects were not negotiated under the settlement; the original parties to the suit did not advocate for the interests of needy survivors. Nonetheless, the judge was within his judicial discretion when the settlement provided $205 million [now more than $256 million] to help some 231,000 [now over 237,400] needy survivors, primarily in the former Soviet Union, obtain food, medical care, winter relief and emergency grants.[8]

The determination to use some portion of the Settlement Fund to alleviate the plight of the neediest of the survivors, the majority of whom lived (and still live) in Central and Eastern Europe, derived in part from an acute awareness of the fact that so many of these victims had not previously received any form of Holocaust compensation. Thus, as Ernst Katzenstein, a German-born Jewish lawyer who fled to Palestine after Hitler's rise to power, and who "returned to West Germany as the Claims Conference's representative and laboured for decades as a draftsman, legal monitor and relentless lobbyist for German legislation to expand compensation for Nazi victims," pointed out in the early 1980s:

> "All I had suffered when the Nazis came to power was the ousting from the German Bar on May 1, 1933, whereupon I emigrated to Palestine. That was all the persecution I personally suffered, and for this I draw a BEG annuity[9] for 9 In 1953, following negotiations with the Claims Conference, the Federal Republic of Germany enacted its first Holocaust compensation statutes, collectively known as the "BEG" (Bundesentschädigungsgesetze). The program was administered by German authorities. It provided for compensation for wrongful death, disability, > damage to profession, which now amounts to DM 2,200 — per month," Katzenstein wrote after a 1983 visit with some Eastern European survivors living in Israel. They had been in concentration camps, or were driven underground, or had lived under the shadow of the threat of violent death. Each one, he wrote, "was totally excluded from any BEG benefits, needy and in poor health as result [sic] of the persecution suffered, and all he could hope for was a one-time ex gratia payment of DM 5,000."[10]

As limited as this minimal compensation from Germany was for survivors who had managed to leave Eastern Europe for Israel, the difficulties were magnified for those survivors who could not leave for Israel or other Western nations, and who for decades were ineligible for Holocaust compensation.

In addition to the funds allocated to Jewish class members, most of whom lived and continue to reside in the former Soviet Union ("FSU"), the Looted Assets Class humanitarian assistance program reached over 75,000 other victims who had long been neglected by most prior Holocaust compensation programs: over 71,000 elderly and desperately needy Roma survivors, as well as needy Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled survivors.

Professor Michael Bazyler, who has taught and written extensively on the Holocaust litigation that began in the late 1990s, has characterized these programs as "found money," and an "unexpected gift:"

> There is no legal basis for any of the Swiss banks funds to be distributed to anyone other than those in the dormant account class. The looting case cannot be proven in a court of law, and there is no practical basis by which the claims process can be set up. Nevertheless, [over $256] million has already been distributed to that class, meaning to needy survivors worldwide, with 75% going to the FSU.[11]

For other victims, as well as heirs, who were not necessarily among the neediest, but who could claim membership in the Looted Assets Class, the Court established a "Victim List Project." The program was designed to encourage and help organize the compilation and greater accessibility worldwide of the names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement was intended to benefit: Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who survived as well as those who perished.[12]

The programs providing assistance to the neediest survivors of the Holocaust were highly successful, and also faced some legal challenges. Some of the following issues arose during the distribution process:

- the cy pres remedy was claimed to be unlawful; it was stated that the Court should distribute individual pro rata payments (whatever the amount) to every Looted Assets claimant;
- assuming a cy pres remedy was lawful, it was stated that the Court was not permitted to assess need on a global scale but, rather, needed to allocate funds in proportion to the percentage of survivors living in a given region (e.g., U.S., Israel, FSU, and elsewhere);
- the definition of "survivor" was reviewed, with some saying that it had to be limited to those who were in concentration camps or ghettos (although other types of victims, such as those who fled ahead of the Nazis were looted too, even if not incarcerated); and
- it was initially believed that only a limited number of needy Roma, disabled or homosexual survivors would be located, thus leading some to state that projects for Holocaust education and memory were of particular importance.

These issues ultimately reached the District Court, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, and in one instance, the United States Supreme Court. The Looted Assets Class program was upheld by each court, and it provided many needy survivors around the world with meaningful assistance.

[12] The Victim List Project is discussed elsewhere in this Final Report.

II. THE LOOTED ASSETS CLASS PROGRAM: GOALS AND MECHANISMS

A. The Cy Pres Remedy for the Looted Assets Class

The difficulties in devising a remedy for Holocaust survivors who had been looted were many.[13] As described by the Court, the class was potentially vast.

> The Looted Assets Class is incredibly large. It consists of:
> Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets or any effort to recover Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets.
> Settlement Agreement, Section 8.2(b). As the Special Master correctly reasoned, "[t]here is scarcely a victim of the Nazis who was not looted, and on nearly an incomprehensible scale."[14]

Nothing was overlooked in the vast effort to strip Nazi victims of all they owned. "'The robbery by the Nazis of the Jewish population in Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia, and in the countries occupied by the German army during World War II, is unparalleled in history. Finally, the principle was simply to take from the Jews every scrap of material possessions and the means of subsistence; and it was executed with German thoroughness and with a macabre show of legality. Stage by stage their movable and immovable property was confiscated, and they were excluded from all professional and economic life, used as slave labour in the war till they dropped, and then done to death. When the extermination culminated in the gas chambers of Auschwitz, the last bits of clothing, the dentures, and the hair of the victims was duly collected and listed.'"[15]

Historian Martin Dean has observed that the "'removal of the Jews from economic life required the tacit cooperation of many strata of society and directly involved bank clerks, realtors, auctioneers, lawyers, and stockbrokers, as well as policemen and tax officials. German housewives and refugees, second-hand booksellers, Bulgarian or Belorussian villagers, and the numerous victims of Allied bombing all competed for their share of the spoils at the bottom of the food chain. Public auctions of former Jewish property in countries such as Norway or Belorussia, as well as the Reich, left little to the imagination concerning the origins of the items.'"[16]

Many participated, and very little was missed. "Gold and jewelry, valuables and works of art, rugs and furniture, contents of apartments and clothing, bank and safe deposits, securities and foreign currency and deeds to homes, assets and factories were all amassed in the coffers of the Third Reich through well-formulated administrative channels. Some disappeared en route into the pockets of the murderers themselves. And all of this was carried out under [SS economic administration head Oswald] Pohl's unequivocal order to transfer all Jewish property to the ownership of the Third Reich."[17]

Another reviewer of Martin Dean's work observed: "Martin Dean's study undoubtedly sets a new standard of scholarship in the search for knowledge about the Nazis' attitude toward Jewish property not only in the Reich and in Austria until 1939, but also and especially during the war and the Final Solution period. After having read his book, one can hardly believe that the academic corpus has mostly failed to look at the parallels and causalities before and after 1939, and at the economic factors behind radicalization after 1939. Basing himself on a broad archival foundation, Dean can prove that the seizure of Jewish property and the growing radicalization of the entire confiscation policy formed, among others, an important factor and precondition of the Holocaust that was everywhere and was always practically preceded and/or accompanied by Aktionen focused on Jewish property. The vision of obtaining Jewish property was a key driving force for the beneficiaries and collaborators, as well as for the perpetrators themselves to want to play an active part in the murder that made the Holocaust a Europe-wide crime. This is true not only for individuals, but also for governments that welcomed the introduction of German measures or laws (Slovakia, Romania, Hungary, France) and needed no convincing by the Germans to embrace the Nazi way of doing things." Ingo Loose, Plunder by Decree, 38 YAD VASHEM STUD., no. 2, 2010, at 221, 231-32 (reviewing MARTIN DEAN, ROBBING THE JEWS: THE CONFISCATION OF JEWISH PROPERTY IN THE HOLOCAUST, 1933-1945 (2008)).

[17] RAUL TEITELBAUM & MOSHE SANBAR, HOLOCAUST GOLD - FROM THE VICTIMS TO SWITZERLAND: TRAILS OF THE NAZI PLUNDER 38 (Amy Teibel trans., Moreshet 2001).

However, with respect to Switzerland in particular – the subject of the class action claims – it was not clear that specific items could be traced to or through that nation. It is "well accepted by historians, including those representing Switzerland, that a primary purpose of the Nazi plunder was to transform loot (especially, but not only gold) into foreign currency by marketing these items in neutral nations, including Switzerland… With only limited exceptions, however, the current historical record simply does not permit precise determinations even as to the material losses in total, much less the nature and value of the loot traceable to Switzerland or Swiss entities."[18]

Therefore, the Court agreed with the Special Masters' recommendation to presume that all Nazi victims suffered looting, with or without proof of loss or a demonstrable connection to Switzerland.

> To prevent the expenditure of incredible sums on administration, the Special Master recommended that for allocation purposes, I assume that all survivors of the Holocaust and their heirs were valid members of this class, even if they could not prove an injury directly tied to a Swiss entity. I agreed.[19]

Having accepted this proposition, the Court then confronted > two obvious and unsatisfactory possibilities for how to govern the distribution of money to this enormous class. I could have used a claims resolution facility to determine the validity and value of claims on a case-by-case basis, or I could have ordered a pro rata distribution to every member of the class. The first option, given the complete lack of adequate records, would have resulted in an "unwieldy and enormously expensive apparatus to adjudicate hundreds of thousands of claims, for losses which can barely be measured and hardly be documented, and whose connection to Switzerland, or a Swiss entity, if ever it existed, probably no longer can be proven." [Distribution Plan, Vol. I,] at 114-15. The second option …was equally problematic. [It has been stated] that there should be a pro rata distribution to the approximately 500,000 Looted Assets Class members who filled out "detailed claim forms." …. These "detailed claim forms" were non-binding questionnaires that explicitly stated that an individual could later make a claim without having filled out such a questionnaire. The class, therefore, is not > limited to these 500,000 individuals. Rather, for allocation purposes, the class includes all those who were victims of the Holocaust and their heirs.[20]

The pro rata proposal was not workable.

> A pro rata distribution would have resulted in the payment of literally pennies to each of the millions of individuals who would fall into this class. Such a distribution scheme is not uncommon in class action cases where members of the class get pennies or coupons, the cumulative total of which is used to justify awarding millions of dollars in legal fees. But such a plan is wholly unsatisfactory here because it promises almost no benefit to members of the class….[21]

However, there was "a more reasonable alternative" to establishing a claims resolution facility to review each claim on a case-by-case basis, or dividing a portion of the settlement pro rata among millions of claimants (including heirs). Instead, the Court accepted the Special Masters' recommendations, first, to exclude heirs from participation in any Looted Assets Class programs; and second, "to adopt a cy pres remedy targeting the neediest survivors in the Looted Assets Class."[22]

> [T]hese individuals "perhaps would be less in need today had their assets not been looted and their lives nearly destroyed" during the Nazi era. [Distribution Plan, Vol. I,] at 117. I agreed that using the funds to provide relief to these neediest survivors over the course of ten years would be the way to most benefit the class as a whole.[23]

[23] Id. The Distribution Plan further observed that there was "historic precedent for this recommendation. 'Bulk' settlement of Holocaust-related compensation claims, with payments from the resulting settlement funds directed primarily to the needy, dates back to the immediate post-War period, when successor organizations in the United States, British and French military zones utilized the proceeds of sales of apparently heirless or unclaimed properties to resettle and rehabilitate survivors, including the thousands remaining in 'displaced persons' camps." Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 116-17 n.344. See also Distribution Plan, Vol. I, Annex D ("Heirs") (describing "bulk settlement" with the United States arising from unclaimed property apparently belonging to Nazi victims; the resulting fund was disbursed by the Jewish Restitution Successor Organization to programs serving needy survivors); Vol. II, Annex E ("Holocaust Compensation") (discussing use of sales from unclaimed and heirless property within the former East Germany primarily to fund programs providing food, medical and winter relief to needy survivors in the former Soviet Union, Israel, North America and elsewhere).

Moreover, as early as 1945, the United States had begun to formulate a reparations policy that anticipated that the Allies would use the assets Germany had looted to assist needy survivors:

> "'Relief distributed from the fund so established should be made available primarily on the basis of need and of opportunities for rehabilitation rather than on that of size of loss. The administering

The mechanism for distributing the funds was designed "to reduce administrative costs." The assistance would be given to survivors by way of designated organizations.

> [They] were already providing relief to survivor communities and could quickly provide aid. I reserved the right to grant other cy pres remedies as worthwhile proposals [were] presented, but my principal decision was consistent with Second Circuit law. See In re Agent Orange Product Liability Litig., 818 F.2d 145, 158 (2d Cir. 1987) (explicitly authorizing a district court to "give as much help as possible to individuals who, in general, are most in need of assistance" because it is "equitable to limit payments to those with the most severe injuries"). Indeed, the Second Circuit agreed. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 14 Fed. Appx. 132 (2d Cir. 2001) [reissued as a published opinion, 413 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2005)] (finding that appellants' challenge to my decision to apply the cy pres doctrine to the Looted Assets Class "lack[ed] merit").[24]

The Second Circuit agreed with the cy pres remedy twice, first in 2001, and again in 2005.[25] The Court of Appeals took note of the very large number of individuals who theoretically could have been eligible for compensation as members of the Looted Assets Class:

> As the Special Master explained [in the Distribution Plan],
> The estimate of Jewish survivors of Nazi persecution alone ranges from 832,000 to 960,000, a number increased by the varied estimates of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled and homosexual survivors. Moreover, each of the five classes includes, among others, "heirs," a term undefined by the Settlement Agreement but governed by New York law. New York law does not limit "heirs" to children, spouses or even near relatives. Rather, the definition of "heirs" extends well beyond even great-grandchildren of grandparents - and, moreover, must be determined at the time of the decedent's death. Under this definition, the Special > agency should have broad discretion to use the fund in whatever ways it judges will most effectively promote the relief and rehabilitation of persons or groups in the eligible classes.' …. By emphasizing the criterion of 'need' rather than 'size of loss,' [the U.S.] endorsed the concept that the funds be spent on all the Jewish DPs [stateless Displaced Persons] rather than on the surviving remnants of the German Jewish communities."

> Master believes that heirs of Nazi victims, all apparently class members, easily number in the millions.[26]

The Distribution Plan instead had proposed a cy pres remedy, allocating $100 million (and ultimately more than $256 million) of the $1.25 billion settlement for the needy, all presumed to have been looted. Of that sum, 90% was designated for Jewish survivors. The "remaining 10% [was to] be distributed to needy Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled, and homosexual survivors." This "90/10 ratio was 'based upon precedent' from previous allocations of recovered assets 'dating back to 1945' and was 'warranted by current demographics … of surviving "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" as defined under the Settlement Agreement.'"[27]

The neediest victims lived in the former Soviet Union and therefore were to receive the largest portion of funds:

> The Jewish survivor community is concentrated primarily in Israel, the former Soviet Union, North America and Europe, with additional concentrations in other regions including Australia, Argentina and elsewhere. Their post-War experiences have been extraordinarily diverse. In most Western nations, Nazi victims generally have benefited from relatively strong economies and "social safety net" programs intended to assist the needy and the ill. Equally significant, Nazi victims in the United States and Israel, as in most Western nations, have been eligible for a wide range of indemnification and restitution programs intended to provide modest to sometimes significant recompense for the material losses suffered at the hands of the Nazis and their accomplices. However, notably absent from most post-Holocaust compensation programs are the victims of Nazi persecution who remain behind what was once the Iron Curtain.

[26] In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 424 F.3d at 140 n. 9 (quoting Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 9).

[27] Id. at 141 n. 12 (citing Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 118-19). The Distribution Plan (Vol I, at 118 n. 346) noted that the 90% / 10% division of assets between Jewish and non-Jewish victims, like the decision to recommend the "cy pres" remedy, similarly was based upon historical precedent. The Five Power Agreement of 1945 had allocated 90% of non-monetary ("victims") gold, and 95% of heirless assets in Germany, to direct assistance programs for Jewish survivors. The recommended division of funds also had precedent in the Swiss Humanitarian Fund (established in 1997 by Swiss banking authorities "to support persons in need who were persecuted for reasons of their race, religion or political views or for other reasons, or otherwise were victims of the Holocaust/Shoa, as well as to support their descendants in need;" see Distribution Plan, Vol. II, Annex K ("Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa"), at K-4). Although the benefits conferred by the Swiss Humanitarian Fund were not limited to the five "Victim or Target" groups of the Settlement Agreement but instead included additional non-Jewish survivors, the Fund nevertheless adopted a similar allocation formula. Eighty-eight percent of the Swiss Humanitarian Fund was allocated to Jewish victims, while twelve percent was allocated to non-Jewish victims.

> Because their situation is so dire, their number so great, and their half century of virtual exclusion from compensation programs so inequitable, … of the $90 million designated for the Jewish members of the Looted Assets Class, a substantial sum — 75% ($67.5 million) — should be earmarked for programs assisting destitute, elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution in the former Soviet Union…. The remaining 25% ($22.5 million) should be allocated to programs in Israel, North America, Europe and other parts of the world which likewise serve the neediest elderly Nazi victims.[28]

This recommendation, allocating 90% of Looted Assets Class funds to Jewish Holocaust survivors — of which 75% of such funds were designated for programs serving the neediest victims in Central and Eastern Europe — guided the humanitarian aid programs adopted as part of the distribution process.

B. The Rationale for a Cy Pres Remedy: The Scope of the Looting

Many of the victims of looting had fled for their lives in advance of the Nazis or lived under occupation. They had been ineligible for most prior compensation programs. Most of those programs had been limited to survivors who spent specified periods of time in concentration camps or ghettos officially recognized under German law, or lived in hiding for a requisite length of time. Nevertheless, as was true for Nazi victims across Europe, Jews in the former Soviet Union who lived in, owned property in, or fled from areas under Nazi occupation lost virtually all of their material possessions to the Third Reich's plunder. In Eastern Europe, this campaign was led by the notorious Einsatzgruppen, often assisted by the local population.[29]

Some of the victims in Central and Eastern Europe had served in the Red Army. In contrast to other combatants, Jewish members of the Red Army were treated not as enemy soldiers, but as Jews. As described by Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg, "the German regulations against Jewish prisoners of war from the western armies were in no way comparable to the drastic measures that were applied to the Jewish prisoners from the Red Army. The only western Jewish prisoners subject to shooting were the emigrants from the Reich, who were shot

Regardless of economic status or geographic residence, all Jewish Holocaust victims were subject to looting. Historian Jan Gross has noted that there has been an emphasis in "current legal disputes" concerning "'forced sales' (defined as transactions that would not have taken place had there been no Nazi rule)," particularly concerning the ownership of art, based upon the point that a "forced sale was a method of plunder disguised as a legitimate transaction." This principle, however, "would apply to more than the sale of art objects, or, for that matter, businesses and luxurious villas. Poor Jews selling their furniture, bedding, assorted household goods, or winter clothes to Aryan neighbors for pennies had also been plundered. If anything, their losses were more dramatic because they brought on life-threatening pauperization. Simply put, those who availed themselves of the opportunities to acquire Jewish property for less than its real worth because there was Nazi rule, no matter how (un)valuable it was to begin with, partook in the spoliation of European Jewry. This applies not just to governments, museums, galleries, and entrepreneurs, but to millions of ordinary people who fleeced their neighbors."[31]

No corner of Europe was omitted, and no Jew escaped looting. "Wartime plundering of Jews became a continent-wide affair. It took place from the Atlantic Ocean in the west to as far east as German armies reached in their campaign against the USSR, and was accompanied by opportunistic behavior of the local population (despite the locals also being subject to exploitation by Nazi conquerors)."[32]

The following photographs provide just a few examples of the vast geographic reach of this theft. From west to east, whether in France and Germany, Greece and Slovakia, or Lithuania and Ukraine, Nazis rounded up Jews for deportation, taking care to gather all of their victims' belongings and sometimes offering up this treasure for auction to the local populace, before shipping the Jews off to death or slave labor.

Those in the east were victimized and impoverished just as were those in the west. In the east, however, Nazi victims also suffered through decades of post-War deprivation in a manner generally not experienced by those in Western Europe, and the Court's cy pres programs recognized them as the neediest of the victims.

C. The Distribution Mechanism: Non-Governmental Organizations

In all areas in which needy victims lived, wherever possible, already-existing service agencies were engaged to provide material assistance.[34] "One important goal … [was] that the court maximize the resources available for service expenditures by operating projects through existing provider organizations rather than by creating a new organization…. In addition, making grants to existing service providers can help strengthen worthy projects already in place, and can prime the pump for programs that will persist and prove useful after the … Settlement Fund is exhausted."[35] Consistent with this objective, for Jewish class members, the Court accepted the Special Masters' recommendation to appoint the JDC and the Claims Conference to handle day-to-day management. Their monitoring and administration of these programs were subject to the ongoing supervision of the Special Masters and the Court.[36]

The two organizations had extensive experience in the field. Between them, they had more than > one hundred and fifty years of unmatched expertise in serving the needs of Nazi victims. The Claims Conference was created in 1951 specifically to negotiate with Germany for material recompense on behalf of Jewish Holocaust victims, and has had a singular role in post-Holocaust compensation ever since. Virtually every significant German and Austrian indemnification and restitution program is directly attributable to the Claims Conference's initiative and strenuous [36] As the Distribution Plan observed (at Vol. I, 120-21): "Tellingly, when the Allies negotiated the 1946 Paris Reparations Agreement provisions for the assistance of so-called 'non-repatriable' Nazi victims, the JDC was one of only two non-governmental organizations to which the Allies assigned responsibility for allocating and distributing the 'Jewish' portion of these funds — recognizing, as is true for this Settlement Fund, that it is 'essential that the administering agency should not create a large and expensive field organization, but should operate by allocating the funds under its control to public and private organizations which themselves have facilities for operating in the field.'" See "Background" Statement to Paris Reparations Agreement, Article 8, "Allocation of a Reparations Share to Non-Repatriable Victims of German Action," Par. G (declassified by the United States National Archives in 1996, Document A 203486) ("With a fund as small as that provided in the present Agreement, it seemed essential that the administering agency should not create a large and expensive field organization, but should operate by allocating the funds under its control to public and private organizations which themselves have facilities for operating in the field. Thus it should be expected that, as a normal matter, the Inter-Governmental Committee will carry out its responsibilities by inviting such agencies as the Friends Service Committee, the various national Red Cross organizations, and the American Joint Distribution Committee to present programs for the resettlement or rehabilitation of particular classes and numbers of persons, and by allocating funds for the support of approved programs").

negotiations on behalf of hundreds of thousands of Nazi victims. Of equal importance … the Claims Conference has utilized the proceeds of sales of restituted properties in the former East Germany to fund an ever-growing network of social welfare programs designed primarily for the benefit of needy and ill elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution. See Annex E ("Holocaust Compensation"). The JDC, in existence since 1914, is a humanitarian agency of equal international renown. In addition to resettling Holocaust victims immediately after the War, the JDC paid more than half the costs of maintaining those Jewish refugees who were admitted into Switzerland during World War II, relieving the overwhelmed Swiss Jewish community, which until then was heavily burdened with these expenses (see Bergier Refugee Report, at 196);[37] airlifted Ethiopian Jews for resettlement in Israel; and sent medical aid, food and other supplies to victims of the recent conflicts in the Balkans, Jews and non-Jews alike.[38]

The JDC also assisted victims who had been deported to the ghettos. For example, a "short time after Warsaw was occupied by the Germans, the Jewish community organized a social welfare committee known as the Zydowska Samapomoc Spolczna (Jewish Social Self-Help), or the ZSS, in order to provide social assistance to the Jewish residents. Funding for the activities came primarily from the Polish branch of the … American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee …. Because it was an American institution, the Joint was permitted to continue its activities in occupied Poland. During the first half of 1940 the organization's aid activities focused on opening public soup kitchens and distributing food to the needy, on taking in thousands of Jewish refugees and captives who were pouring into Warsaw, and establishing institutions for child care. In addition to funds, the Joint sent food packages and clothing from the USA to Jews in Warsaw, and these were distributed to the ZSS and other organizations, such as the TOZ (Health and Sanitation Organization)." See https://www.yadvashem.org/yv/en/exhibitions/warsaw_ghetto/organization.asp.

As to the former Soviet Union, a particularly difficult place to reach:

> For the past fifty years, the JDC has remained the central agency providing relief to Jewish victims of Nazi persecution in Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Recognizing the growing capabilities of local organizations, the JDC's more recent programs in those nations have been undertaken and implemented upon consultation with local communities with the aid of the Claims Conference. In Israel, North America, Western Europe, Australia, South America and other parts of the world, similar social welfare programs have been funded, and their implementation supervised by the Claims Conference, with the direct input of local survivor communities. Significantly, virtually all of the recommended programs for the needy are already functioning, and will incur no start-up costs and relatively low administrative expenses, a crucial concern in light of the Special Master's duty to minimize such deductions from the Settlement Fund.[39]

Nazi victims residing in the former Soviet Union were to be aided through "the network of social service programs known as the 'Heseds,' created by the JDC in 1992 to assist destitute, elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution still living in the former Soviet Union. Beginning in 1995, the Claims Conference began to contribute significantly to the Hesed program, in recognition that many, and often nearly all, program participants are Jewish victims of Nazi persecution."[40]

The term "Hesed" was drawn from the "Hebrew word meaning 'acts of loving kindness.'" Most of the elderly clients served by the program" had "suffered an absence of Hesed for much of their lives."[41]

> These Jews, whose lives were largely and demonstrably ruined directly by the Holocaust, have spent their entire postwar lives at the site of "their" part of the Holocaust. Even now, … every daily move is haunted by the relatives, friends and neighbors who "once walked these streets." …. Their ongoing relationship to the Holocaust is incalculably more profound — and immediate — than their counterparts who started new lives elsewhere a half-century ago. Moreover, the forces of history have cruelly conspired against Holocaust victims who still live in their homeland. After Hitler came the worst of Stalinist communism and, more recently, loss of life savings and a series of economic catastrophes that have rendered the state pension woefully inadequate to a minimally dignified old age.[42]

Yet "[j]ust as their personal needs were increasing with advancing age, many of these Nazi victims watched as their savings were consumed by the hyperinflation that followed the demise of the Soviet Union, their once adequate pensions dramatically declined in value and often arrived months late if at all, and they no longer had resources sufficient to purchase even basic foodstuffs, clothing, medicines or fuel for heat and cooking."[43]

The Hesed program attempted to "fill the vacuum by providing elderly Nazi victims with the basic necessities of life through a 'network of independent, community-based welfare centers.' Major Hesed program services include food, medical relief, home care and winter assistance. Hesed programs include the provision of services in the home, at local community sites, and at multi-service centers in larger cities where the elderly can receive medical and welfare assistance under one roof."[44] By 1999, over half of all funding for the Hesed program came from the Claims Conference, targeting services for Nazi victims. The Claims Conference funds were derived from the proceeds of sales of unclaimed property of Nazi victims located in the former East Germany.

Jewish Nazi victims in other parts of the world would be assisted through programs managed and operated by the Claims Conference, largely through pre-existing emergency assistance measures, but in some instances through programs established specifically to achieve the Court's goal of reaching the neediest victims wherever they lived. In Israel, where a substantial number of needy victims resided, the Court, through the Claims Conference, funded projects overseen by the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel, which had been created in 1993. In North America, survivors were aided through established organizations such as Selfhelp Community Services; Guardians of the Sick Alliance; Jewish Family Services; Blue Card; and other local agencies, all under the umbrella of the Claims Conference. In other parts of the world, including Europe, South America and elsewhere, pre-existing programs served the same role to the greatest extent possible.

Another non-governmental organization, the IOM, was tasked with responsibility for locating, and in many instances creating from scratch, social service programs for the benefit of needy Roma survivors. The Court ultimately was able to assist over 71,000 Roma victims, and most of these individuals never had been helped or even located before. The IOM also was charged with reaching needy Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims.[45] This [45] As the Distribution Plan noted of the IOM (at 140 n.385), the IOM had "'participated in virtually every emergency involving large-scale movement of people since it was founded in 1951. IOM offers its services to vulnerable populations in need of evacuation, resettlement or return. While such services are often urgent and vital in the initial phases of an emergency, they may become even more relevant during the critical transition from emergency humanitarian relief, through a period of rehabilitation, to longer-term reconstruction and development efforts.'" IOM Mission Statement, http://www.iom.int/iom/Mandate_and_Structure/mission_statement-eng.htm (visited July 10, 2000). "IOM has provided humanitarian assistance in a variety of arenas: during 1956-57, it resettled 180,000 Hungarian refugees; organized the 1968 emigration of 40,000 Czechoslovakian refugees; resettled refugees in Southeast Asia during the 1970s; repatriated 165,000 people from the Persian Gulf area in 1990 after Kuwait's invasion by Iraq, at the request of the United Nations; provided support and medical aid to displaced populations in Yugoslavia in 1992; and, since 1996, has coordinated aid to Bosnian refugees outside the former Yugoslavia." Id. As of 2000, "[a]mong the member states of IOM are Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Hungary, Israel, Latvia, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Switzerland (where IOM has its headquarters, in Geneva), and the United States. Among the IOM's observer states are Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Russian Federation, Ukraine, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia. A wide variety of international governmental and non-governmental organizations hold observer status with IOM, including numerous United Nations offices, HIAS Inc., Catholic Relief Services and the International Rescue Committee." Id.

More recently, the IOM has been at the forefront in assisting refugees caught up in the global migration crisis. See, e.g., Andrea Meller & Marisa Pearl, First Night in America, N.Y. TIMES, May 2, 2017, https://www.nytimes.com/2017/05/02/opinion/hotel-usa-refugee-op-doc.html ("The men and women of IOM, identified by their blue vests [at U.S. airports and other sites], guide refugees from their initial travel point, where they also conduct health assessments and cultural competency classes, all the way to their domestic flight complex assignment mirrored that given to the IOM by the contemporaneous German slave labor compensation program, the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation"), which had selected the IOM to manage a DM 24 million (then $21 million) program "for social purposes vis-à-vis the … persecuted Sinti and Roma.'"[46]

III. A SUMMARY OF THE CY PRES PROGRAMS BENEFITING NEEDY JEWISH, ROMA, JEHOVAH'S WITNESS, HOMOSEXUAL AND DISABLED VICTIMS

A. Court Programs for Needy Jewish Nazi Victims

For 15 years, Looted Assets Class funds helped to provide food, medicines, fuel, warm clothing, home health care and other critical services to the neediest Nazi victims around the world.

1. Assistance to Jewish Nazi Victims in the Former Soviet Union, 2001-2011 (JDC)

The advantages of funding a long-standing program such as the JDC's, which reached into the farthest corners of the former Soviet Union, were apparent from the outset. The following discussion describes the annual accomplishments of the program supported by the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement.

a. 2001-2002

In its first proposal following its selection as one of the Settlement Fund's administrative agents (February 28, 2001), the JDC explained that its Hesed system encompassed 145 individual Hesed centers and 3 similar systems in the Baltics, serving 220,000 elderly Jews, of whom 120,000 were Nazi victims.[47] "[E]ach year some funds will be used to augment the program by providing additional services to Nazi Victim clients, while other funds may be used to maintain the existing level of care and lengthen the existence of the program for at least the next ten years."[48]

The specific services included medical assistance (consultations with doctors and nurses); filling some 143,000 prescriptions (up from 31,000 in 1997), assisting 25% of Hesed clients; emergency grants under the "SOS Program" (80% of which were used for medical purposes such as prescriptions, operations, prostheses, emergency dental care, hospitalization costs, clothing, fuel, blankets, home appliances, household repairs, utility debts, emergency food supplies, and funerals); and other "general Hesed welfare services … provided to the … almost 120,000 Nazi victims who have currently been identified."[49]

In accordance with the Court's requirement of local consultation, first year allocation decisions were to be "conducted with the Chairs of the Hesed Boards and the umbrella organizations. In subsequent years JDC staff will discuss Settlement allocations with individual Hesed Boards as part of the annual process of preparing the Hesed budget."[50]

As to oversight and monitoring, the JDC had a "comprehensive existing audit program for all funds spent by the Heseds... These auditing procedures will also apply to any Hesed that receives funding under the Swiss Banks settlement." The JDC advised at the outset of the program that it would annually submit a "financial report which indicates utilization of allocated funds per region and remaining balance" to be "audited by external auditors," recommended to be Ernst & Young, which also audited Claims Conference grants for the Hesed program. In addition, the JDC intended to submit "an annual programmatic report which will explain and illustrate the programmatic portions of the budget utilized during the fiscal year. This report will be statistical and based on average cost per program and estimated number of clients who benefit from the program."[51]

Eighteen months later, the JDC reported on its use of the first tranche of funds.[52] It advised that it was operating 177 Hesed centers in 13 countries serving 135,000 "double victims" (up 15,000 from the 120,000 reported in February 2001), as well as other elderly Jews. Over two-thirds (67%) of the funds had been allocated to General Welfare (of which 79% was for food packages and hot meals; 16% for home care; and 5% for winter relief); 17% for medical assistance; and 16% for SOS grants.[53]

The "program of services [was] 'bare-bones.' Simply stated, Nazi victims in the FSU receive fewer welfare services than provided to their 'double victim' counterparts in Central and Eastern Europe or to Nazi victims in other parts of the world." Thus, approximately one-quarter of JDC's FSU budget in 2001 and 2002 had come from the Settlement Fund, and that aid reached approximately 30% (40,000) of needy Nazi victims in the Hesed system. A total of 43% of these funds were allocated to the Ukraine, as 42% of all Nazi victims clients lived there at that time (56,443), served by 57 Hesed centers.[54]

Some of the specific programs for needy survivors in the FSU over the first 18 months of operations included the following:

i. Food:

In the first 18 months of the program (June 2001 - December 2002), more than half of the Swiss Banks Settlement funds allocated to survivor assistance programs in the FSU were used for hunger relief: food packages and hot prepared meals in Hesed centers or meals-on-wheels. This was based on the "recognition that the relief of starvation and hunger is the core life sustaining program that Hesed programs must provide and remains the service most needed by the most Nazi victims in the FSU." The food packages were distributed monthly or quarterly and on four holidays (averaging eight 8 times per year). In the first 18 months of operations, 413,774 packages, containing staples such as flour, pasta, rice, grains, beans, sugar, oil and a protein (canned fish), were distributed to 40,352 victims. In addition, 2,241,010 hot meals were served in group centers, and, through meals-on-wheels, 5,558 victims also were reached. These meals were distributed on average once per day and four times per week. Those who received hot meals generally were ineligible for monthly food packages. The JDC noted that many of the program's 14,000 volunteers were themselves needy Nazi victims.[55]

ii. Homecare:

Services provided for needy Nazi victims included assistance with ADLs (activities of daily living) such as eating, bathing, dressing, walking, and going outside. The funds also covered assistance with IADLs (instrumental activities of daily living) such as preparing meals, managing medications, shopping, and light housework. Other assistance included minor household repairs, installation of aids such as handrails, pumping water and chopping firewood for heating. Home care funding was crucial, as "Soviet successor state social welfare services, if they provide homecare at all, do not offer ADL assistance. State-funded IADL assistance is limited to occasional home delivery of groceries and prescriptions." The "institutional care situation is even more perilous. There is virtually no proper institutional care, whether in the form of nursing homes or assisted living facilities."[56]

Even with the infusion of these funds, the number of hours that could be provided for each victim was quite low: on average, four hours per week, for 4,258 Nazi victims. Nevertheless, even these four hours meant "the difference between having a measure of dignity and being soiled, dirty, malnourished or starving, dying in isolated, bereft and forgotten circumstances." Home health care was particularly critical, since 42.5% of Jewish Nazi victims were childless and thus could not depend on family support.[57]

56 Id. at 17-19.

57 Id. at 12, 19-20.

iii. Winter Relief:

During the first period of program funding, the Swiss Banks Settlement was able to provide 3,688 winter relief kits (once per person per winter), which typically included fuel for heat and cooking, blankets, coats and boots. "There are no government subsidies for heating in any FSU successor state, and sufficient heating can cost $50 for a season — double the average monthly pension." At that time, the service was "unique among the dozens of countries where JDC provides welfare services and shows the extreme conditions and needs in the FSU."[58]

iv. Medical Services:

Swiss Banks Settlement funds supported medical programs for 19,118 Nazi victims in the FSU from June 2001 to December 2002. "[V]irtually all health indicators in the FSU show evidence of continuing decline," with "antiquated, ill equipped and inefficient" state-run hospitals where patients must bring their own supplies such as medicine, bedding and food, and pay for incidentals such as doctors' coats, as well as for major treatments such as for cataracts, Alzheimer's disease, hip fractures, surgeries and dentistry.[59]

v. SOS Grants:

"Were it not for Court funds, the [SOS/emergency grant] program," established in 1999, "would no longer exist." The Swiss Banks Settlement provided 60,359 grants for "those whose personal needs are too expensive for the regular program budget." Services covered by the grants included health essentials (drugs, hearing aids, glasses, emergency dental care, hospitalization costs, adult diapers, bedding, medical tests, transportation, laundry, prostheses, and rehabilitation equipment and treatment); food; utilities; extra winter relief; home repairs; household goods and appliances; and other aid such as "the purchase of pots and pans, sinks, and toilets; dentures; bedpans; adaptation of bathrooms for the elderly; special medical equipment; provision of water jugs to enable a Nazi victim to bring water from a well to her home and outhouse; the purchase of a cow to provide milk for a client in a remote rural area; connection of a gas pipeline to heat a home; and payment of rent to prevent eviction."[60]

The JDC provided examples of victims who had been assisted, to that date, under the Looted Assets Class program:

- Klavdia K.: "Klavdia was born in Kiev in 1928. When World War II began, she, her mother and her youngest sister were evacuated to the northern Caucasus town of Kluhori, which was subsequently occupied by the Nazis. Her mother was killed in a bombing raid and she and her sister spent six months in the ghetto. After the liberation of the town by the Soviets they returned to Kiev in 1946. Klavdia married in 1970 and supported her disabled husband by working in a paper factory and bookbinding workshop. As a pensioner, she now receives $28 per month." She did not receive reparations from Germany. The Hesed program provided monthly food packages, medications and winter relief.

A survivor of Dachau and Naustaum concentration camps, he became a career officer in the Soviet navy. However, by the time he retired in 1990, his savings were virtually wiped out by rampant inflation and he had no other financial resources besides his monthly pension of $35, of which $27 a month was spent on medications for his heart condition. JDC fieldworkers from the Hesed center in Khabarovsk, 500 miles away, went to Sakhalin and contacted Victor. He currently receives food packages, prescription drugs and fuel."[61]

By 2003, there had been "an almost 13% growth in Nazi victim clients" since 2001, attributable to several factors: more Nazi victims had come forward to request services as they aged; funds from the settlement had enabled Hesed programs to expand in several regions and draw in new clients; and clients had been "resurveyed" and additional individuals were classified as Nazi victims.[62]

62 Request for Second Period Funding for Welfare Programs in the Former Soviet Union for January 1, 2003 to December 31, 2003 at 4 (Sept. 17, 2003).

The JDC reported on the three major programs funded through Looted Assets Class programs: food relief; medical aid; and emergency grants. As to food, new information indicated that in Russia, "according to data released by the State Statistics Committee at the end of 2002, the cost of the minimum set of foodstuffs … during the third quarter of the year amounted to almost a full two-thirds of the average pension." As to medicine, the JDC had been able to "significantly increase its ability to respond to unmet needs for basic medication. It allows Hesed centers to purchase manufactured drugs, and provide clients with familiar medications. Given the prescription drug costs in the FSU, this service is highly significant."[63]

A total of 128,198 Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU were aided in 2003 through Looted Assets Class program funds. The relief included the following:

- 66,086 victims received 413,990 food packages (approximately 6 times per year), "a minimal service received by only 52% of needy Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU."
- 11,539 victims received 2,025,455 hot meals (9% of needy Jewish victims served by the Hesed program), approximately 3.4 times per person per week.
- 11,704 (9.1% of victims) received 2,533,085 hours of home care, approximately 4.2 hours per person per week.
- 14,617 (11.4% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $50 each.
- 63,052 (49% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $55 per person annually.
- 28,831 SOS grants of $62 each were made.[64]

c. 2004

In 2004, 128,067 Jewish Nazi victims were served through Looted Assets Class funds;[65]

- 93,728 victims received 911,088 food packages (approximately 9.8 times per year), "a minimal service received by 73% of needy Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU." Food packages now included "both the dry-goods packages previously reported to the Court" containing "non-perishables," as well as "Fresh Food Sets" containing dairy products, eggs, fruit, vegetables and chicken. The latter "food-to-home service was significantly expanded in 2004."

- 7,011 victims received 1,283,553 hot meals, approximately 3.5 times per person per week.
- 9,098 (7% of victims) received 2,014,806 hours of home care, approximately 4.3 hours per person per week.
- 14,195 (13% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $50 each.
- 50,802 (40% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $55 per person annually.
- 32,952 SOS grants averaging $62 each were made.[66]

d. 2005

In 2005, 122,996 Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU were served through the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund:[67]

- 83,325 victims received 809,664 food packages (approximately 9.7 times per year), "a minimal service received by 68% of needy Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU."
- 11,657 victims received 1,558,581 hot meals, approximately 2.5 times per person per week.
- 10,151 (8% of victims) received 2,174,856 hours of home care, approximately 4.1 hours per person per week.

Additionally, in 2004, in response to the Court's invitation for proposals on the use of residual funds that might remain from the sum allocated to the Deposited Assets Class, the JDC submitted a detailed analysis of the ongoing needs of Holocaust survivors living in the FSU. See Residual Funds Recommendation, Annex D ("Summaries of Proposals"), at D-5 to -12.

[67] JDC Report on 2005 Welfare Programs for Jewish Nazi Victims in the Former Soviet Union, at 2 (Sept. 8, 2006). The JDC also requested and was granted permission by the Court to make some adjustments to its administrative structure to reflect the infusion (in 2002 and 2003) of significant additional funds into the Looted Assets Class programs. "For the past five years, JDC and its funding partners have covered the administrative costs of the Hesed services provided under the Looted Assets Class. Since the inception of the program, however, the Court subsequently has approved the allocation of additional funds to the Looted Assets Class, resulting in an expansion of additional services as well as additional clients assisted. In order to appropriately distribute these increased resources for the greatest benefit of the Jewish Nazi victims served by the programs, it has become important for the Hesed programs to have additional resources for administrative and staffing costs involved in operating their program. This may include costs associated with the case management that is required to properly assess client needs or with financial or support staff that are necessary to ensure proper accountability of the program. Such Hesed administrative expenses will be taken directly from the Looted Assets Class allocation per Hesed region and not exceed 10% of the regional grant." See Letter from JDC Executive Vice President to Hon. Edward R. Korman (May 9, 2006). The Court approved this request by Order of May 10, 2006.

- 27,556 (22% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $50 each.
- 48,724 (40% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $55 per person annually.
- 15,089 SOS grants averaging $88 each were made.[68]

e. 2006

In 2006, 117,541 needy Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU were served through Court funds:[69]

- 51,146 victims received 433,794 food packages (approximately 8.5 times per year), at an average cost of $10 per package, "a minimal service received by only 44% of needy Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU."
- 3,779 victims received 943,048 hot meals, at an average cost of $2.50 per meal, approximately 4.8 times per person per week.
- 8,031 (7% of victims) received 1,831,378 hours of home care, at an average cost of $2.43 per hour, and averaging approximately 4.4 hours per person per week.
- 8,633 (7% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $28 each.
- 31,449 (27% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $85 per person annually.
- 11,440 SOS grants averaging $117 each were made.[70]

Although these services were extensive and crucial, there were some reductions in programs in 2006 due to changing survivor needs, with some portion of funding shifted from food programs to home health care services.

> JDC notes for the Court that several factors have come together and resulted in a diminution of services provided in 2006, when compared to services provided in 2005. Inflation in FSU countries, combined with the devaluation of the US Dollar, has resulted in an average overall 10-12% decrease in purchasing power. This had a major impact on homecare services, which along with food programs, is the most essential assistance provided to destitute Jewish Nazi victims, and is > Hesed leadership in the FSU determined that their top priority was to maintain the level of homecare provided to the neediest of Jewish Nazi [v]ictims who depend on this vital service. In order to maintain a comparable level of essential homecare, some funds were shifted from food programs, which remain a critical priority for Hesed clients, and winter relief to homecare. In spite of this shift of funds, in 2006 Hesed programs were still only able to provide an average client needing homecare with just 4.38 hours of assistance per week, usually the only assistance provided at home since there are no other governmental or private homecare services for poor Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU.[71]

In 2007, a total of 100,105 needy Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU were served through Court funds:[72]

- 33,763 victims received 196,951 food packages (approximately 5.8 times per year), "a minimal service received by 34% of needy Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU."
- 5,400 victims received 707,150 hot meals, approximately 2.5 times per person per week.
- 5,277 (5% of victims) received 1,267,773 hours of home care, approximately 4.6 hours per person per week.
- 6,300 (6% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $28 each.
- 30,754 (31% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $85 per person annually.
- 8,439 SOS grants averaging $147 each were made.[73]

> In 2008, in select cities in the FSU, some Jewish Nazi victim clients who previously received food packages will now instead get a "food card" or "voucher" in lieu of a food package. This debit card or voucher can be used by the client at certain supermarkets, by prior arrangement with the Hesed center, and its use is restricted to the purchase of food items only. This system provides greater dignity to a client — who becomes a consumer of products, rather than a recipient of a food package. An additional benefit is that food cards and vouchers enable clients to purchase grocery items based on their individual dietary needs instead of getting a predetermined standard food package. [74]

In 2008, 3,550 needy Nazi victims received these food cards. In total, 90,592 Jewish Nazi victims were served:[75]

- 11,182 victims received 65,147 food packages (approximately 5.8 times per year), "a minimal service received by 12.3% of needy Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU."
- 4,516 victims received 454,009 hot meals, approximately 1.9 times per person per week.
- 3,550 victims received "'food cards,' which are a debit card or voucher that can be used at certain supermarkets, by prior arrangement with the Hesed center, for the purchase of food items."
- 3,751 (4.1% of victims) received 831,824 hours of home care, approximately 4.3 hours per person per week.
- 2,880 (3.2% of victims) received winter relief kits averaging $28 each.
- 25,633 (28.3% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $97 per person annually.
- 7,376 SOS grants averaging $155 each were made.[76]

The JDC also provided a December 2007 report that updated and compared conditions among needy Holocaust victims in the FSU, as contrasted with those victims in other parts of the world. The report, which was prepared by a research team at Brandeis University, was based on available data about FSU Nazi victims, "including information from the database system maintained by the JDC to track clients of its Hesed system." The report focused upon the four

FSU countries "in which the vast majority of Jews, including Nazi victims, live" (Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Moldova).[77]

The report included the following findings:

- "Nazi victims in the FSU are clearly disadvantaged and in need of a broad range of social welfare and health services in order to survive and live in dignity," with over 114,000 Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU, with high rates of disability and limited mobility, "more likely … to live alone with no family nearby compared to other elderly," a situation worse for female victims.
- "FSU victims live in countries that are struggling to a far greater extent than the European Union, United States, and Israel to provide adequate support systems for their aging populations."
- "Age dependency ratios — a measure of how large the elderly dependent population is in relation to the working age population — rose rapidly in the last decade in FSU countries, an indicator of the increasing burden on social and economic protection systems for the elderly. The relative size of the aged and child populations has shifted toward the elderly in FSU countries, in contrast to the EU, Israel and the United States, where the relative size of the child and elderly populations has remained stable."
- "Compared to the FSU four-country average of $8,608, the per-capita GDP adjusted for purchasing power is over four times higher in the United States, slightly over three times higher in the EU and over two times higher in Israel. Of course the gap is much greater in countries such as Moldova."
- "Per capita health expenditures in 2004, the most recent year that data are available, were not as great as in 2000; nevertheless, after adjusting for purchasing power, the differences between per capita health expenditures in the United States, EU and Israel, and the four FSU countries are very large ($6,096, $2,334 and $1,972 vs. $138 to $583 in the FSU)."
- "Life expectancy is significantly lower — by more than 10 years — in each of the FSU countries (66 to 68) than in the EU (80), Israel (80), or the United States (78)."
- As to the number of Nazi victims per region, "[a]s a source of information on Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU, the Hesed database is unparalleled. No other source of systematic data on this specific target population exists, either in the FSU or in any of the other major regions in which victims reside (i.e., the United States, Israel or Europe). The database describes in its entirety the population of those victims who receive services. This information is updated regularly, so that data on the size and characteristics of the client base is current. This is, however, a database of served clients. Thus, nothing can be inferred about those who do not seek assistance through the Hesed system."

- "A majority of the victims, both male and female, are relatively 'young,' that is, in the 65-74 age group. This fact indicates a sizable population of victims who will continue to need services as they age."[78]

h. 2009

In 2009, 90,880 needy Jewish survivors in the FSU were served through Court funds:[79]

- 30,908 victims received 142,596 food packages (approximately 4.6 times per year), "a minimal service received by 34% of needy Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU."
- 2,443 victims received 232,198 hot meals ("only 2.7% of destitute Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU"), approximately 1.8 times per person per week.
- 21,328 (23.5% of victims) received food cards (accounting for the "commensurate decrease in hot meals provided").
- 3,555 (3.9% of victims) received 831,511 hours of home care, approximately 4.4 hours per person per week.
- 81 received winter relief kits.
- 22,815 (25.1% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $96 per person annually.
- 8,402 SOS grants averaging $133 each were made.[80]

i. 2010

A total of 84,568 Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU received services funded under the Looted Assets Class programs in 2010:[81]

- 25,342 victims received 98,160 food packages (approximately 3.9 times per year), "a minimal service received by 30% of needy Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU."
- 2,526 victims received 264,607 hot meals ("only 3% of destitute Jewish Nazi [v]ictims in the FSU"), approximately twice per person per week.
- 19,287 (23% of victims) received food cards.
- 1,666 (2% of victims) received 499,332 hours of home care, approximately 5.7 hours per person per week. "In 2010 additional funds, primarily from the German Government (via, and as a result of, Claims Conference negotiations) were available to be used specifically for homecare and that accounts for the decrease in clients who received their homecare from Settlement funds."
- 4,158 (5% of victims) received winter relief kits.
- 22,815 (25.1% of victims) received medical services averaging approximately $128 per person annually.
- 7,782 SOS grants averaging $144 each were made.[82]

j. Assessment of Needs in 2013

Under the original parameters of the Distribution Plan, which provided for ten years of funding beginning in 2001, the cy pres programs were to terminate in 2011. However, in 2013, the Special Masters advised the Court that it appeared that approximately $50 million in residual funds would remain. Based upon the Court's strong preference to allocate any such funds to needy survivors, the Special Masters obtained updated assessments of needs from the three administrative agencies charged with overseeing the Looted Assets Class programs.

The JDC advised that:

- "A review of homecare services to Hesed clients in the FSU over the last several years shows a steady increase in the number of clients eligible for homecare and the number of hours of homecare provided...Currently, less than 25% of Hesed clients receive homecare services, and for an average of only about 49 hours a month."
- "[T]he number of clients who are homebound, bedridden, or suffering from Alzheimer's/dementia is increasing each year;…between 2008 and 2012, this neediest group increased in size by over 25%."

[82] Id. at 3-4.

- "In 2012, JDC provided Nazi victims an average annual per capita equivalent of $256 in Russia and $552 in Ukraine for material support (food, medicine and winter relief). This level of support (ranging from $21 to $46 per month) is limited by budget constraints but clearly cannot meet the extent of the existing medical, food and winter relief needs of clients, and is not sufficient to close the gap created by a lack of government infrastructure and financial support."

- "When JDC reported to the Court in 2004 on the most desperate needs facing elderly in the FSU, food was one of the most, if not the most, critical. As the community has aged, JDC analysis has demonstrated that homecare fills the most critical need, since there is no alternative for those who require daily care. This prioritization does not negate the importance of food assistance but rather, illustrates the difficult choices resulting from budgetary constraints. As client expenses continue to grow, support in the form of cash equivalence programs continues to serve as a lifeline for Hesed clients, who are unable to purchase sufficient food."[83]

The Court authorized the residual funds to be allocated to programs serving the needy, thus extending the humanitarian assistance programs for the Looted Assets Class for several years beyond the 2011 termination date originally provided under the Distribution Plan.

k. 2013

For victims in the FSU, the funds made available in 2013 provided the following assistance:

- 221 Nazi victims received 2,155 food packages.

- 324 received 12,343 hot meals.

- 9,259 received food cards.[84]

- 843 received 5,774 fresh food sets.

- 1,474 received 49,356 hours of homecare, for an average of 33 hours per year; it was "the only homecare service they receive[d] since none is provided by the state or other private charities."

- 3,227 received winter relief.

[84] Food assistance in the FSU has shifted in recent years from food packages and hot meals to food cards.

- 4,630 received medical services.
- 2,009 emergency assistance grants were made.[85]

l. 2014

Residual funds served 66,566 "poor elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution" in the FSU in 2014. The aid included the following:

- 628 Nazi victims received 4,649 food packages.
- 587 received 29,994 hot meals.
- 9,378 received food cards or bank cards designated for food purchases.
- 1,094 received 7,340 fresh food sets.
- 6,028 received 90,617 hours of homecare.
- 469 received winter relief.
- 6,627 received medical services, averaging about $160 per person per year.
- 6,486 emergency assistance grants were made, "averaging about $185 per situation."[86]

[86] JDC Report on 2014 Welfare Programs for Jewish Nazi Victims in the Former Soviet Union, at 2-3 (February 3, 2016. As the JDC's May 20, 2014 funding request for 2014 indicated, the JDC's recommendations had been impacted by geopolitical upheaval in the region:

> In light of the recent events in Ukraine, we take special note of the situation of the approximately 25,000 Jewish Victims of Nazi Persecution now living in Ukraine who are assisted by the Hesed programs, representing more than one-third of the Jewish Nazi Victims in the FSU, many of whom are assisted by Settlement Funds. In Ukraine, the Hesed centers have worked hard to make sure that their clients continue to receive all needed services during the crisis. They are providing additional food supplements and subsidies to ensure critical necessities are met, including food cards to purchase provisions, additional food packages and fresh food sets, hot meals, and meal delivery. Additional medicine subsidies and supplements will be made available as prices have risen and some medications have become scarce.

Residual funds served 61,482 "poor elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution" in the FSU in 2015. The aid included the following:

- 603 Nazi victims received 5,537 food packages.
- 157 received 32,960 hot meals.[87]
- 10,565 received food cards or bank cards designated for food purchases.
- 1,626 received 8,352 fresh food sets.
- 3,317 received 57,557 hours of homecare.[88]
- 457 received winter relief.
- 3,793 received medical services, averaging about $91 per person per year.
- 19,901 emergency assistance grants were made, "averaging about $70 per situation."[89]

> Hesed staff and volunteers have contacted and visited clients in areas plagued by violence to deliver food, medicine and other critical supplies; they have done so on foot, and in mobile units packed with supplies. As needed, in some cases the Hesed homecare workers have stayed the night with clients…. Planning has begun to alleviate the situations of those elderly whose state pensions may be suspended due to Ukraine's disastrous financial situation.

Letter from JDC Assistant Executive Vice President to Hon. Edward R. Korman, May 20, 2014.

[87] The JDC noted that the "number of clients receiving these hot meals decreased in 2015" as compared with prior years, primarily "due to the availability of alternative food programs providing greater flexibility, such as food/bank cards, and also to the transitioning of older recipients to homecare, with their meals now being prepared by a homecare worker." The number of meals remained stable and in some cases increased in various locations, "due to an increase in the purchasing power of local FSU currencies." JDC Report on 2015 Welfare Programs for Jewish Nazi Victims in the Former Soviet Union, at 3 (April 19, 2017).

[88] The decrease in homecare assistance from 2015 was "mainly explained by additional German Government funding designated primarily for homecare that became available in 2015." Id.

[89] Id., at 2-3. "Due to changes in the regulations of the medical assistance program, as well as increased costs engendered by the economic crisis [in the FSU], many lifesaving and/or expensive medicines were classified as part of the SOS program in 2015." Id., at 4.

n. 2016 - 2017

In accordance with the 2013 residual funds order, the Court authorized additional distributions in 2016, and final distributions in 2017, for programs serving needy elderly survivors in the FSU.

2. Assistance to Jewish Nazi Victims in the United States, Israel, Europe, South America and Elsewhere, 2001-2011 (Claims Conference)

Like the JDC, the Claims Conference was able to distribute humanitarian assistance, on behalf of the Swiss Banks Settlement, through well-established programs.

a. 2001

For its initial tranche of funding, the Claims Conference proposed a six-month program in 10 nations with existing survivor assistance programs: Argentina, Australia, Canada, Hungary, Israel, the U.S., England, France, the Czech Republic and Poland.[90] Looted Assets Class funds would be used to support the Claims Conference's Emergency Assistance Program:

> Through the provision of emergency cash grants, the program assists Nazi victims with basic and essential needs. The program is implemented by central Jewish social service agencies in communities across the world. Thus, the program benefits Nazi victims not only by providing cash assistance to cope with emergency situations but also by assuring the involvements of social welfare professionals in the lives of vulnerable Nazi victims.[91]

Grants were used for rent to prevent eviction; medical care not funded by government programs; medical equipment (wheelchairs, beds, hearing aids); "heavy-duty house cleaning;" winter relief; food assistance; prescription drugs; dentures; home care; emergency utility payment (heat, hot water, electricity); and home equipment/repair.

[90] Proposal for the First Six Months of Operations, at 1(Feb. 27, 2001) ("Claims Conference February 27, 2001 Proposal"). The Court approved the proposal on April 13, 2001 and authorized funding on June 28, 2001.

[91] Id.

Grant recipients were determined following assessment by "social work professionals," who evaluated the survivor's "medical condition, housing situation, mental status, financial status, current services being received, and availability of family support." Advisory committees of Nazi victims reviewed individual requests for assistance and helped to publicize the program. Eligibility varied among countries and was based on "several factors, including the economic situation, the availability of government funded benefits, and the specific needs of Nazi victims as identified by the advisory committees."[92]

The Emergency Assistance Program adhered to the following reporting requirements for Looted Assets Class funds:

- Grants of less than $30,000: The local agency administering the grant was to submit a "year end report which includes documentation of the financial activity on the program;" a "statistical report … which includes number of clients served for each category and amount of funds disbursed for each category of service (i.e. dentures, medical equipment, rent);" and the agency "should be prepared to present documentation confirming that a recipient of funds distributed through the emergency cash grants program was a Jewish victim of Nazi persecution and meets the eligibility criteria for the program."
- Grants of $30,000 to $75,000: Allocations "must be reviewed by the Claims Conference," which will "review the financial documents associated with the emergency cash grants program and perform a random sample of test cases to confirm the recipients' eligibility for the program." A "full audit may be requested … at the discretion of the Claims Conference."
- Grants of over $75,000: Allocations "must be audited by an accredited accounting company in accordance with international standards on auditing as issued by the International Federation of Accountants. The audit must examine, on a test basis, evidence supporting the amounts and disclosures. In addition, the auditors should assess the accounting principles used and significant estimates made by management."[93]

The Court would receive an "annual financial report which details the utilization of allocated funds per country," providing an "external auditors report where appropriate," and an "annual programmatic report" describing the program by country for that year.[94]

In the years following its pilot proposal, the Claims Conference expanded the scope of these programs, adding several new countries and projects.

b. 2002

The Claims Conference recommended and the Court approved programs in 10 additional countries in 2002: Austria, Belgium, Bosnia, Bulgaria, Croatia, Germany, Romania, Slovakia, Sweden and Yugoslavia.[95]

c. 2003

In 2003, another three countries were added: Greece, Italy and the Netherlands. The Claims Conference reported that the "past year and a half has been very difficult as repeated acts of violence have plagued our nation and the world at large. We have suffered through the terrorist attacks of September 11th on the World Trade Centers and the Pentagon; continue to live through the rampant suicide bombings in Israel; and witness rising anti-Semitism in Europe. Furthermore, the war with Iraq has instilled an impending fear and sense of doom, of which none can escape. Holocaust survivors, in particular, are suffering from increased anxiety and fear during these times. Social service agencies providing assistance to Nazi victims are in need of additional financial support to increase services to this vulnerable population. Hotlines, originally established to prevent loneliness and isolation, are flooded daily with calls from survivors who are afraid to leave their homes."[96]

d. 2004

In 2004, the Emergency Assistance program was expanded to Brazil, Mexico and Uruguay. In addition, the scope of services was enlarged due to the infusion of substantial additional funds following the Court's decisions in 2002 and 2003 to supplement funding to the Looted Assets Class programs:

> Since the financial scope of the program [for needy survivors] has grown since inception [i.e., from $100 million to $145 million as of 2004, and ultimately to over $256 million in total] and given that funding for the program will be in place through 2010, it is requested that the guidelines for the program be modified to allow funding to be used for needs that are also on-going in nature. For example, on-going grants would be provided to Nazi victims for the provision of prescription drugs, food vouchers, or homecare services that would be needed throughout the year.[97]

In 2005, the Claims Conference requested and the Court granted "approval . . . of funding over a two-year period, rather than one year as the Claims Conference has requested in the past, [which] will enable agencies to more effectively plan the distribution of funds to the neediest Nazi victims and will assure them of continuity of service through 2006."[98]

In a programmatic report detailing funding and activities for the first phase of operations, 2001-2006, the Claims Conference advised that a total of $24,742,786 had been distributed and that 74,155 Emergency Assistance Program grants had been made.[99] Typically, funds had been distributed "in the form of cash grants to vendors" to "help defray expenses in seven areas: housing and related costs, dental care, food, medical care, home care, transportation and other expenses, such as needed clothing and funeral expenses, as well as program administration" not exceeding "10% of the Looted Assets Class allocation per agency." These grants "allow Jewish Nazi victims to maintain their independence for as long as possible and 'age in place' so they can remain active in their own communities." The program by then had been expanded from 10 to 26 nations.[100]

Some examples of grants included:

- Housing: Payments made directly to vendors such as landlord, utility company or repair person: payment of rent, property taxes, utility bills, home/appliance repair, telephones for the hearing-impaired.
- Dental care: X-rays (not usually covered by government funding), deductibles and co-pays, dentures.
- Food: On a case-by-case basis, provision of Meals-on-Wheels and food packages.
- Medical care: On a case-by-case basis, fees for hospitalization, medical services, medicines, equipment. "Most of the countries where Jewish Nazi victims reside have universal health care for the elderly. There are, however, cost-sharing requirements …. [and] while relatively modest, these costs can add up …."
  - "Similarly, there are many goods and services either excluded from public coverage or with high cost-sharing requirements," such as eyeglasses, hearing aids, orthotics, prosthetics, adult diapers, bed pans, wheel chairs, chairs, shoes, and safety devices.
  - Assistance with purchase of supplemental insurance (e.g., Medigap in the U.S.).
- Home care: Chore/housekeeping services including meal preparation, grocery shopping, money management, light household chores and transportation assistance; personal/nursing care including assistance with eating, continence, dressing and bathing, and short-term nursing; and respite care including adult day care services. The Claims Conference noted that "public funding" was the most important source for these services, but there were "restrictions either on the quantity (number of hours available) or quality of services, as well as cost-sharing requirements," which Looted Assets Class funding helped to defray, particularly in conjunction with case management.
- Transportation: Transportation to respite care, congregate meals, religious services, medical appointments, shopping, and errands; grants for auto repair and insurance.
- Other: Defraying of costs of clothing, shoes, bed linens and blankets, pots and pans, funeral expenses, and legal assistance (e.g., landlord-tenant disputes, public benefits hearings, immigration services).[101]

Some of the local agencies responsible for allocating individual grants to survivors and monitoring their use had not spent all of the funds approved by the Court. "[A]ll agencies have been informed that any funds remaining unspent and unreported by March 31, 2007 — from all grants to date — will be cancelled. Thus, in a subsequent proposal to the Court, the Claims Conference will recommend the reallocation of any unused funds."[102]

In 2008, several such grants, totaling $1,559,626.81, were cancelled and reallocated.[103] The Claims Conference noted that certain of the local implementing agencies had been unable to use the funds during the designated year, but would be able to do so in the near future. These grants were recommended to be moved ahead to other years, rather than cancelled. These included programs at Jewish Care-New South Wales, Australia (which resolved certain administrative difficulties); the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel (which had drawn upon sources other than Swiss Banks Settlement funds in consultation with the Claims Conference, thus shifting Court funding to subsequent years); Fonds Social Juif Unifie in France and Memoria y Tolerancia in Mexico City (each of which initially had "difficulty establishing the emergency assistance program and working out the logistics of coordinating a country-wide program"); and Jewish Family Services ("JFS") programs in New Jersey and Philadelphia (which in consultation with the Claims Conference had used government grants available only for a limited time and had shifted Court funds to subsequent years).[104]

However, certain agencies did not use the funds and had "ceased operation" of the emergency assistance programs. Some programs were shifted to more centralized agencies and others were funded from different community sources. These grants were cancelled. The cancelled programs included the UJA Federation program in Toronto (responsibility for programs was shifted to Montreal); World Jewish Relief in London (funding was shifted to the Association of Jewish Refugees in London); and the JFS of Buffalo and Erie County, New York; Rochester, New York; Salt Lake City, Utah; and Richmond, Virginia. Other programs did not

In 2007, Looted Assets Class funds assisted 19,365 Jewish Nazi victims in countries outside the FSU, including the U.S. and Israel:[106]

- 1,500 victims in 22 countries received housing assistance through EAP (Emergency Assistance Program) funds;
- 331 victims in 13 countries received dental care;
- 744 victims in 15 countries received food assistance;
- 5,687 victims in 24 countries received medical assistance;
- 12,081 victims in 11 countries received home care services;
- 652 victims in 14 countries received transportation assistance; and
- 355 victims in 9 countries received miscellaneous assistance (clothing, winter relief, furniture, funeral costs, and emergency living expenses).[107]

the completion date — a date that was later extended by the Court through infusion of residual funds, as more fully described below. The programs funded to that point were as follows:[108]

- Year 1 (July 1, 2001 - December 31, 2001): $1,071,500
- Year 2 (January 1, 2002 - December 31, 2002): $2,678,500
- Year 2 Supplement (2002/2003): $1,687,500[109]
- Year 3 (January 1, 2003 - December 31, 2003): $3,625,000
- Year 4 (January 1, 2004 - December 31, 2004): $5,416,826
- Years 5 & 6 (January 1, 2005 - December 31, 2005; January 1, 2006 - December 31, 2006): $10,263,460
- Years 7 & 8 (January 1, 2007 - December 31, 2007; January 1, 2008 - December 31, 2008): $9,978,364
- Year 9 (January 1, 2009 - December 31, 2009): $4,561,539 to be sought
- Year 10 (January 1, 2010 - December 31, 2010): $4,561,539 to be sought
- Year 11 (January 1, 2011 - June 30, 2011, when the Looted Assets Class program originally was to terminate under the ten-year program authorized under the Distribution Plan): $2,280,769 to be sought.[110]

With respect to the programs supported during the period 2008-2010, the Claims Conference reported that settlement funds provided the following services to Holocaust victims:

- Housing and Related Expenses: Rent, maintenance fees, property taxes, moving expenses, utility bills, and home and appliance repair.
- Dental care: X-rays (not usually covered by government funding), deductibles and co-pays, dentures.
- Food: Home delivery of hot kosher meals; direct payments to vendors for groceries, food packages or food vouchers.

[109] "The original Distribution Plan provided for an allocation of $9.75 million over the first 3 1/2 years…. It was increased by 45%," pursuant to the Memorandum & Order of September 25, 2002 authorizing distribution of excess interest and unanticipated tax refunds. "Starting in calendar year 2004, it was increased again by an additional $60 million that was allocated over 7 1/2 years proportionately among the same victim groups and geographic distribution as identified in the Distribution Plan." Id. at 1. In 2013, residual funds were allocated to needy class members, and an additional $11.25 million was designated for programs for needy survivors in Israel, the United States and other parts of the world outside of the FSU and Central and Eastern Europe.

- Medical care: Office visits, hospitalization, prescription drugs, durable medical equipment (such as wheelchairs), costs of eyeglasses, hearing aids, and installation of home safety devices.
- Home care: Chore/housekeeping services including housekeeping services, personal and nursing care, and respite care.
- Client Transportation: Transportation to and from programs providing respite care, congregate meals, religious services, medical appointments, shopping, and errands; grants for auto repair and insurance.
- Other: Defraying of costs of clothing, shoes, bed linens, funeral expenses, tax payments, insurance premiums, winter relief, counseling, and legal assistance (e.g., landlord-tenant disputes, public benefits hearings, immigration services).[111]

The Claims Conference advised that $15,815,526 had been provided over the three-year period — $6.2 million in 2008; $5 million in 2009; and $4.6 million in 2010 — to Nazi victims throughout the world, other than the FSU and Central and Eastern Europe, which were managed by the JDC. The largest two categories of grants were for home care (19,304 separate grants) and medical care (15,037 grants). Grants also were made for housing (5,694); food (2,012); dental care (1,637); other expenses (1,284) and transportation (635).[112]

The grants were made in 26 different countries: Argentina (through the Tzedaka Foundation); Australia (Jewish Care - Victoria; Jewish Care - New South Wales); Austria (Israelitische Kultusgemeinde Sozialabteilung); Belgium (Service Social Juif); Bosnia-Herzegovina (La Benevolencija); Brazil (União Brasileiro-Israelita [UNIBES]); Bulgaria (Shalom); Canada (Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors - Montreal; JFS - Toronto); Croatia (Jewish Community Zagreb); the Czech Republic (Terezin Initiative); France (Fonds Social Juif Unifie); Germany (ZWSt); Greece (Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece); Hungary

The Claims Conference submitted a variety of accompanying appendices including IA ("Reported Spending for Emergency Assistance Services Provided Outside of the United States to Jewish Nazi Victims from Swiss Banks Settlement Looted Assets Class Funds by Area of Service" for each of the three reporting years); Appendix IIA ("Reported Spending for Emergency Assistance Services Provided in the United States to Jewish Nazi Victims from Swiss Banks Settlement Looted Assets Class Funds by Area of Service" for each of the three reporting years); and Appendix III - Audit Reports (for agencies receiving larger grants). The Claims Conference filed 2008, 2009 and 2010 Audit Reports for the Fonds Social Juif Unifie (France); 2008, 2009 and 2010 Audit Reports for the Hungarian Jewish Social Support Foundation; 2008, 2009 and 2010 Audit Reports, as well as the 2001 - 2006 Reallocated Funds Audit Report, for the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel; and the 2008 Audit Report for FEDROM (Romania).

As to the United States, programs had been funded in more than 20 states, mainly through the network of local JFS programs as well as similar groups. The Claims Conference noted that grants for several United States agencies needed to be cancelled in all three reporting years, due to lack of use and/or appropriate reporting (almost $20,000 in 2008; approximately $54,000 in 2009; and approximately $43,000 in 2010).[114]

The specific U.S. agencies funded were as follows: Arizona (JFS - Tucson); California (JFS agencies in Long Beach, San Francisco, Berkeley, Los Angeles, Irvine, San Diego and Los Gatos [Silicon Valley]); Colorado (JFS - Denver); Connecticut (JFS - West Hartford); Florida (Ferd & Gladys Alpert JFS - West Palm Beach, JFS - Clearwater, Jewish Community Services of South Florida - North Miami, JFS - Plantation, and Ruth Rales JFS - Boca Raton); Georgia (JFS - Atlanta); Illinois (Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago); Maryland (Jewish Community Services - Baltimore, Jewish Federation of Howard County - Columbia, Jewish Social Service Agency - Rockville); Massachusetts (JFS of Greater Boston); Michigan (JFS of Metropolitan Detroit); Minnesota (JFS of Minneapolis); Nevada (Jewish Family Service Agency - Las Vegas); New Jersey (Association of Jewish Family Service Agencies - Elizabeth); New York (Bikur

In addition to reporting on the period 2008-2010, the Claims Conference also requested the Court's approval to reallocate the funds that had been cancelled during the period 2008-2012 due to the local agencies' failure to use the funds, or failure to provide the proper reporting in accordance with Claims Conference requirements. The total cancelled sums, $575,117.59, and ILS (Israeli shekels) 4,136,000.79, respectively, were reallocated "for the continuation of the emergency assistance program for needy Nazi victims to partner agencies that have implemented the [Looted Assets] program previously in order to continue the program in 2012 and 2013."[116]

h. Assessment of Needs in 2013

In 2013, the Court authorized residual funds to be allocated to programs serving the needy. The Special Masters sought and obtained the Claims Conference's recommendations for allocating such funds in regions outside the FSU: Israel, the United States and the rest of the world.

In considering the best way to allocate the funds, the Claims Conference noted that medical care comprised the largest category for all expenditures, at over 40% annually between 2007 and 2011. For those survivors who received emergency grants, 66% of those individuals received grants for medical assistance, such as prescriptions, eyeglasses and hearing aids.

The second-largest category of expenditures during the period 2007-2011 was for housing expenses, including emergency rent grants to avoid eviction, property taxes, moving fees, utility payments and home repair costs. Nearly 30% of all emergency assistance expenditures were allocated to housing, and some 26% of survivors in the program received grants of this nature.

Dental care comprised nearly 13% of emergency assistance grants. "Due to the relatively high costs of dental care, the proportion of beneficiaries [was] relatively small, approximately 6.1% of all Jewish Nazi victims served," with utilization highest in the United States. In addition, approximately 11.6% of emergency assistance recipients received grants relating to food aid during 2007-2011. The Claims Conference anticipated that future needs would be essentially similar.[117]

i. 2015 - 2017

In accordance with the 2013 residual funds order, the Court authorized additional distributions for the years 2015 - 2017 for programs serving needy elderly survivors in the United States, Israel and other regions outside the FSU and Central and Eastern Europe.[118]

B. Court Programs for Needy Roma, Jehovah's Witness, Homosexual and Disabled Nazi Victims, 2001-2006; 2013-2016 (IOM)

When the Distribution Plan was proposed and then adopted by the Court, some concerns were voiced about the feasibility of providing humanitarian aid to many of the non-Jewish class members. Although the Jehovah's Witness community was well organized and well-connected with survivors of the Nazi regime, the other three non-Jewish "victim or target groups" did not have a strong infrastructure for purposes of locating Nazi victims. The largest of the groups, the Roma community, was known to be particularly difficult to reach. Most Roma survivors continue to live in dire poverty, in rural conditions and in isolation, and even the more organized Roma groups often had fractious relations both within and outside their immediate communities. Accordingly, the Court was asked to abandon its plan to try to locate and assist needy elderly survivors, and instead was urged to direct funding toward other purposes, such as educational and memorial programs.

The Court, however, assumed that some inroads could be made with the proper support, and thus appointed the IOM to find and assist Roma survivors. The IOM also accepted the same responsibility for needy Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled survivors.

As the IOM has explained, the goal was not to "'do the impossible' of reaching every living member of each target group;" however, the IOM "did seek to locate and meaningfully assist as many as time and resources permitted, in recognition of the suffering endured by all group members." [119]

By the time the program was completed, funding from the Swiss Banks Settlement had helped over 71,000 desperately needy Roma survivors, who received some of the most basic necessities of life: food, coal, winter supplies and medicines. Others benefitted from Court-funded home health care; legal assistance enabling them to apply for ongoing social welfare benefits from which they had been long excluded; and socialization projects. Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled survivors also received significant assistance through the Looted Assets Class programs.

The IOM was able to expand its services by coordinating the Looted Assets Class program with the aid process established under the German Foundation, which had authorized DM 24 million in "humanitarian funds" to be allocated to Sinti and Roma through the IOM.

As true for Jewish class members, assistance for non-Jewish class members was directed particularly toward survivors in "Central and Eastern Europe as most former victims still lived there and were in greater need than those of group members living elsewhere." For "many survivors the assistance represented the first recognition of their suffering in nearly 60 years. It came at a time when, by their own account, life had not been worse for them since the Second World War." What was common to all Looted Assets Class members living in Central and Eastern Europe was that some victims, without the Court's aid, "might have frozen or starved to death."[120]

The IOM described the particular difficulties posed by undertaking one of the first humanitarian assistance programs ever initiated for these survivors, particularly the Roma:

> IOM had to consider a number of important variables, in particular local living conditions, victim concentrations, their most urgent needs, service provider capacities, the Organization's own capacity to monitor and, of course, available donor resources. IOM's approach to each victim group was of necessity varied, depending on the case. Specific modes of communication and beneficiary sensitivities had to be respected. Non-beneficiary group neighbours, equally poor, were likely to be envious. In deference to Roma law, for example, otherwise competent NGO partners sometimes refused to assist, or even to acknowledge, members of another clan.
> That [IOM's] efforts were effective is supported by the fact that some of IOM's initial detractors eventually became its implementing partners, that the Roma press has written favourably about [the programs] and, most importantly, that the assistance got through.[121]

The project was further complicated by the fact that the IOM was attempting to satisfy the requirements of two different donors – the Court and the German Foundation – with one program for needy Roma victims. While in most instances, combining the resources of two programs accomplished precisely what the Court had intended in selecting the IOM – economies of scale, and maximization of assistance to the greatest number of Holocaust victims – the goals of the two programs did not always mesh.

Specifically, initially, there was a divergence on the issue of food packages. The Court, cognizant of the dramatic success of the JDC's Hesed program, of which food assistance was a major component, asked the IOM to provide food aid to hungry Roma survivors. The German Foundation, however, took a different approach, initially supporting programs that it believed were more self-sustaining and which might impart a sense of self-sufficiency. As the IOM's Final Report observed, "[i]nternational donors understandably prefer sustainable assistance as less costly and more likely to leave behind something of 'lasting value.'"[122] The Court's view, however, was that needy elderly survivors were not necessarily in a position to develop such skills at that late date, after decades of deprivation and the onset of old age.

> Early on the German Foundation excluded payment for food packages from its share of HSP project resources. For 16 months the US Court paid all costs connected with this most popular form of aid to Roma survivors. The Foundation eventually agreed to fund up to EUR 3 million in food packages in countries where needs were particularly severe and more sustainable forms of assistance unavailable.[123]

In assessing the components of the program, IOM explained in its Final Report that "[f]ood packages, followed by winter assistance (predominantly home-heating fuel) and hygienic supplies (soap, disinfectants, towels) were the kind of available aid most requested by beneficiaries. All were considered essential for daily survival" and "accounted for nearly 72 percent of all HSP assistance delivered."[124]

The German Foundation eventually decided that the IOM's Court-supported food and direct assistance program was a success, and agreed to provide its own supplemental aid. As a result of the funding under the Swiss Banks Settlement and German Foundation agreement:

> The IOM was ultimately able to identify 70,000 [Roma] eligible for humanitarian relief in thirteen Central and Eastern European countries [and subsequently, through additional programs using residual funds, over 71,000].

Regrettably this decision jeopardizes synergies in respect of HSP in regards specifically to food package projects and generally to the administration and management of the combined programme. The decision seems to be based on unspecified bad experiences with German NGOs. Nevertheless, IOM continues to view food packages as a viable form of assistance, when … [i]t has been proposed by local Roma NGOs in a good position to gauge localized victim needs; [a]ssistance will be able to be delivered in a timely manner; and [a]ssistance can be properly monitored").

124 IOM Final Report, at 198.

> In organizing direct assistance, the IOM relied on collaboration with the small number of local agencies who had experience in delivering such aid. The IOM program served primarily to provide material assistance, mostly in the form of food supplies. The provision of the most basic relief goods such as food, clothing, and heating fuel often served to build confidence and pave the way for counseling and encounter projects.
> The original intent of the humanitarian aid was to contribute to a fundamental improvement of the living situation of the Sinti and Roma. In practice, however, this objective proved illusionary. In places where no social structures existed, attempting to build sustainable structures would have required so much time that the results of such efforts would likely have only benefited the descendants of the survivors, and not the survivors themselves. While globally active development aid organizations normally focus their efforts on promoting long-term skills and integration among the younger generations, the IOM concentrated on getting direct aid as quickly as possible to the most needy elderly Sinti and Roma.[125]

In meeting with local service providers, the IOM explained the "beneficiary eligibility criteria, i.e. persecution group membership, born before 9 May 1945, presence on German occupied territory and subsistence on US$ 4 or less a day. It was soon discovered that many victims were living on considerably less."[126] The IOM ultimately entered into "74 agreements with external service providers based in Belarus, the Czech Republic, Hungary, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Moldova, Poland, Romania, the Russian Federation, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovakia, Ukraine and the United States of America," while IOM itself "implemented seven HSP projects directly."[127] Local providers "operated on an individual timetable" and were "required to submit detailed reporting to IOM Geneva every two or three months, according to the agreements, on activities and expenditures."[128] IOM, in turn, "reported annually on HSP … to its donors as well as to the [IOM's] members."[129]

By the time the original program had ended, the IOM had been able to assist over 73,500 Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled Holocaust victims, and so had reached

"approximately half of the eligible survivors [of these victim groups] in Central and Eastern Europe." The "unexpectedly high number of victims identified proved that Holocaust survivors were both originally more numerous and have lived longer than was previously thought." The IOM noted that in response to the call for proposals for use of possible residual funds in 2004, it had determined that another $59 million to $214 million in assistance would enable the IOM to identify and assist additional eligible survivors, especially among the Roma and disabled communities.[130]

The IOM's programs for each of the four survivor groups it was charged with assisting are described below.

1. Roma Victims

Providing assistance to needy Roma survivors was not an easy task. The first issue was how to find those eligible for aid.

> At first, IOM had little reliable information on Roma survivor populations at its disposal. Official census figures were not always dependable. Individual Roma, whether out of fear or in a spirit of assimilation, often identify with another ethnic group or nationality. The representative of one Roma group, while seen by outsiders as an objective source of information, may neglect to recognize persons belonging to another Roma group as Roma.
> In 2001, IOM contracted a specialized research firm [A.B. Data, which also had worked on class action notice when the Swiss Banks litigation settled] to locate potential Roma beneficiaries. The firm conducted an extensive survey through Roma organizations in 17 European countries. Potential beneficiaries were identified according to criteria agreed upon by IOM and its donors [i.e. the Court and the German Foundation].
> The survey identified some 45,453 potentially eligible Roma survivors in 4,906 locations. This number was already much higher than had previously been anticipated. Though the survey process was limited by time constraints, the

Through the use of residual funds, the Settlement Fund was able to assist approximately 75,000 needy survivors, in total, through IOM programs.

> remoteness of some communities and local rivalries, the results were important in identifying large concentrations of needy victims and to help non-Roma service providers, IOM's initial partners in several countries, reach many individual victims.[131]

The IOM ultimately was able to locate and assist over 71,000 elderly needy Roma survivors — a number much larger than anticipated at the outset of the program, yet still only about half of those potentially eligible under the Settlement Agreement and the Looted Assets Class.

> Based on four years of programme implementation, IOM now estimates that its 2001 survey located just over 30 per cent of…potential beneficiaries. Ongoing research by field offices and local service providers indicates that there may be some 144,000 needy Roma Holocaust survivors in Central and Eastern Europe alone.[132]

There were some important lessons learned in working with Roma survivors in the most impoverished parts of the world. For generations, Roma "have resisted assimilation into mainstream cultures," and most Roma in Central and Eastern Europe are "confined to substandard, often illegal, rural or urban housing, far from services the state can no longer afford to provide."[133]

In addition, "Roma often make little distinction between their historical persecutors: 'Germans, Russians, Hungarians – they all treated us the same.'" Impoverished Roma in different regions rarely contacted one another, and there may have been "factions within Roma communities" that were "often in competition with each other." At the same time, throughout Europe, anti-Roma sentiments remain "high."[134]

Those attempting to assist Roma may be regarded with suspicion, and many Roma were "convinced that NGOs steal money coming from the UN, the EU and other donors instead of spending it on their community." As to international Roma associations, those were "often super-imposed constructs intended to give an outward appearance of unity," which may or may not be based in reality. "IOM has resisted various demands to work 'exclusively' with certain Roma NGOs. When IOM contracted with another Roma NGO in the same location, accusations of corruption and fraud often followed." Nevertheless, "[m]ost Roma NGOs said they appreciated IOM's close monitoring of projects," which "led to improved capacity and permitted mid-project changes" as well as "timely closure when things failed to proceed as planned."[135]

With respect to specific country programs, IOM reported as follows:

- Belarus:

  IOM worked with the Belarusian Gipsy Diaspora to distribute humanitarian assistance to 1,806 Nazi victims, only 10% of whom received a monthly pension, usually of less than $30. Projects lasted from December 2002 through June 2005. One particular problem was the failure of local representatives "to distinguish between elderly victims and others just as needy;" in response, "IOM reminded the service provider to apply strict eligibility requirements."[136]

- Czech Republic:

  In the Czech Republic, IOM's Prague office "oversaw a total of seven HSP projects," two of which were terminated "early." A total of 3,498 Roma survivors were assisted through programs beginning in June 2002 and ending in November 2004. The service providers had some initial difficulties, such as: overestimating "capacity to deliver aid" and falling behind in project reporting; reluctance among Roma survivors "to have 'strangers' in their homes" – although "homecare soon became a preferred form of aid;" and prejudice, as exemplified by the reluctance by "several wholesale suppliers . . . to allow Roma beneficiaries" and their service providers "to enter shops to select needed goods."[137]

- Hungary:

  IOM Budapest "assisted 15,220 Roma survivors of the Holocaust through five projects" lasting from August 2002 through February 2005. One difficulty IOM faced was that "[p]rominent Roma leaders criticized" one of IOM's "non-Roma-run" projects, arguing that "material assistance, in particular instead of cash, was demeaning and inappropriate. Nevertheless, … [the] beneficiaries expressed their gratitude to IOM and emphasized that it had provided essential sustenance."[138]

- Latvia and Lithuania:

  In Latvia and Lithuania, IOM "had first sought to identify external entities that could act as service providers in these countries. When these efforts proved unsuccessful, IOM offices in Riga and Vilnius worked together to deliver assistance directly. HSP helped 769 needy Roma survivors" as a result of projects lasting from April 2004 through January 2005. One of the most pressing needs was for "material assistance," including "five cubic meters of firewood" which "were delivered to all beneficiaries." In addition, each aid recipient in Latvia "could select basic clothing items from specially contracted shops." This service was "unavailable in Lithuania" and thus "was made up for with additional firewood." In both countries, survivors also received "two food and hygienic packages." Some victims also were provided with emergency financial support as well as legal assistance to help recover missing documents, obtain state social service benefits, and avoid eviction.[139]

- Macedonia:

  A total of 2,585 elderly Roma "in the areas surrounding Skopje, Prilep and Bitola, where many survivors reside," as well as Suto Orizari, "probably the largest Roma settlement in Europe" with 2,000 survivors, were assisted through projects beginning in October 2003 and lasting through August 2005. The programs were carried out by the IOM and local NGOs. The IOM noted that the "most vulnerable elderly Roma in Macedonia live in the eastern part of the country," some of whom had "fled several years before from the war in Kosovo and were living in some of the most desperate physical conditions seen in the course of [the program]." Among the most appreciated projects were the establishment of two social clubs, staffed by lawyers, doctors, nurses and social workers, as well as by younger Roma who provided homecare assistance. "Following the phase-out of HSP activities, IOM … continued to develop projects to meet the needs of broader Roma communities in Macedonia."[140]

- Moldova:

  IOM Chisinau "managed two HSP projects" which assisted 2,342 Roma during the period May 2003 through August 2005. The IOM observed that unemployment and poverty "have prompted unskilled and landless Roma" in Moldova to seek work abroad, leaving older family members behind to care for children. "Elderly Roma without formal work histories receive a state allowance of US$ 4 per month" – an amount drastically lower than the IOM's definition of "need" as living below $4 per day. "Many cannot afford to buy coal and have to gather firewood from the forest, often illegally." The IOM confronted and resolved a number of problems in Moldova, including that "[s]ome eligible Roma sought to register in more than one district." Some leaders "disagreed about beneficiary identities and accused the Salvation Army [one of the local service providers] of helping persons who were not 'pure' Roma." Other individuals were "reluctant to work with a non-Roma organization."[141]

- Poland:

From January 2003 through November 2004, the IOM's office in Warsaw oversaw a program that assisted 1,825 Roma survivors through 11 different projects. One of the projects, operated by the Polish Red Cross, "sometimes encountered opposition from majority populations, town officials and the media when having to explain that only some were eligible for IOM assistance." Officials "had to intervene with one local government to prevent HSP beneficiaries from losing state assistance on account of their inclusion in HSP." Another project, led by the Union of Polish Gypsies, "was responsible for some of HSP's more visible and enthusiastically received assistance": delivery of a side of pork to each beneficiary at Christmas, "reviving a tradition few could now afford." These two programs, along with the Association of Romani Women in Poland, worked with the IOM to assist Roma after the HSP programs were completed.[142]

- Romania:

The IOM's office in Bucharest assisted 10,245 Roma survivors through four programs operating from September 2002 through January 2006. Romania had "possibly the largest Roma population of any HSP target country." The majority of Roma survivors "lived in rural communities, many of them remote and isolated from other villages or settlements." Their houses "were made of mud bricks, shacks of tin sheeting, plywood, plastic or straw," with dirt floors and no insulation. Some Roma survivors lived in tents, in accordance with tradition. One of the IOM's service agencies, the Romanian Orthodox Church, "faced significant challenges, including resistance from Roma leaders who disagreed with HSP's strict focus on the elderly. Other Roma leaders sought to gain political capital through association with HSP." While the Church relied on contacts in the Roma community "to achieve community access and to help with deliveries," other Roma "tried to block assistance, either because they were unable to take credit for it, or ineligible neighbours [were] angry at being excluded from aid."[143]

- Russian Federation:

From June 2003 through September 2005, four HSP projects in the Russian Federation provided aid to 9,163 Roma survivors living in areas occupied by Germany during World War II. One of the projects initially began with home visits. It was found to be too time-consuming, and thus the program evolved to one in which the local organization transported beneficiaries by minibus to a clinic. "All beneficiaries were scheduled for two visits with follow-up as needed. Many had initially refused despite their obvious need, as they were unaccustomed to being welcomed at public facilities. For some medical care was a luxury and they did not believe such services would be free. Positive feedback from HSP's first patients attracted others." Some of the doctors and dentists initially approached "refused to receive Roma patients." The program also met with "hostility from some Roma communities" and had to withdraw from the Tosno region "due to the local fear of outsiders, distrust and attacks" on the staff. Another problem was posed by eligibility verification, as some survivors had not had official documentation issued since the 1950s. "Some Roma said outsiders had never helped them before. HSP had an emotional impact on elderly Holocaust survivors who had felt that no one knew or cared about them."[144]

- Serbia and Montenegro:

HSP projects began in September 2002. Through seven projects operated by local providers and the IOM Belgrade and Podgorica offices, a total of 4,746 Roma survivors were assisted. As true for many other Roma communities, some survivors "confused HSP with other compensation programmes. Staff took pains to explain the differences between programmes and that receipt of HSP assistance did not disqualify a person from receiving financial compensation for slave or forced labour. Some beneficiaries believed they had been given low-cost humanitarian assistance instead of hoped-for cash, asserting that the service provider had pocketed the difference. On occasion, younger community members threatened IOM's partners." One group especially in need was the "large number of internally displaced Roma" from Kosovo, "whose desperate living conditions required particular attention."[145]

[143] Id. at 95-106.

[145] Id. at 121-130.

- Slovakia:

  IOM Kosice managed three projects in Slovakia, particularly in the "poorer east where great numbers of Roma survivors live[d]," assisting 8,995 Roma between September 2003 and January 2006. "Although most beneficiaries expressed surprise and gratitude for assistance provided, the IOM still encountered obstacles. Some municipal offices claimed that no assistance was needed, or denied that Roma lived nearby. Others, including Roma, were again s[k]eptical of assistance. In one case, an organization had come and tricked elderly Roma into paying 50 SKK (US$ 1.53) to register for aid that never came. As elsewhere, actual assistance soon put these fears to rest."[146]

- Ukraine:

  "Ukraine was one of the first countries to offer HSP assistance." Through 15 service providers and 23 projects between June 2002 and September 2005, a total of 8,905 Roma survivors in Ukraine were aided. "Although Roma are dispersed throughout Ukraine, the highest concentration of needy survivors is in the Transcarpathia region on the western border of the country. Roma there often live in tabors, segregated settlements on the outskirts of towns ranging in size from a few families to several thousand persons. Many live on the edge of starvation. Houses, without running water and sanitation, seldom have electricity or heat. Some families squat in abandoned cabins." The Court-funded programs had a lasting impact in Ukraine, where the IOM "initially found limited assistance infrastructures." By the end of the program, the Court process had "left behind a network of credible, if still struggling, Roma NGOs. IOM reached a substantially greater number of survivors than anticipated."[147]

2. Jehovah's Witness Victims

In contrast to the Roma, "Jehovah's Witness victims" were the "most accessible and uniform beneficiary group" served by the IOM.[148] After the Court appointed the IOM as an administrative agent, the Jehovah's Witness Holocaust Era Survivors Fund ("JWHESF") advised the IOM that approximately 2,000 Jehovah's Witness survivors potentially were eligible for assistance through Looted Assets Class programs. Ultimately, 1,876 individuals were reached. This population was needy, although "generally less disadvantaged" than other victim groups.[149]

The most beneficial method of reaching victims was to "respect[] the organization and principles of the Jehovah's Witness world community," with assistance from the JWHESF. Although this "sometimes [resulted in an] uneven level of responsiveness," and "community members" who were asked to assist had "limited experience" in humanitarian aid programs, this "was compensated by the excellent access" that IOM had to survivors "still affiliated with the group." Initial project development was coordinated between IOM Geneva (the main office) and the JWHESF in New York "according to the latter's wishes," and "[a]s a result, IOM field staff found it especially challenging to monitor the project effectively due to the lack of established local relationships or regular contact with institutional counterparts at the country level."[150]

Members of the Jehovah's Witness community provided "substantial input" that was "not charged to the programme," keeping administrative expenses relatively low. "Nevertheless, the lack of administrative funds allocated by IOM's partner [JWHESF] to its country teams also contributed to making the regularity of their work, reporting and follow-up with beneficiaries problematic."[151]

A total of 1,876 Jehovah's Witness survivors in seven Central and Eastern European countries (the largest, in Ukraine) received Court-funded assistance during a program through the JWHESF network of local bethels (church centers) and volunteers. "JWHESF procedures for aid delivery and monitoring allowed the transfer of funds to beneficiaries who then purchased the needed assistance. Receipts were collected by local community leaders," and survivor records "were regularly updated by project staff and volunteers."[152]

3. Disabled Victims

As true for Roma survivors, the disabled survivor population initially was difficult to determine, prompting some calls for redirection of the Looted Assets Class funds to projects for education and memorialization. Extensive efforts were undertaken to locate potential aid recipients. The IOM spent "nearly 18 months" conducting "extensive research and subsequent outreach" to some 360 "national and international organizations for the disabled," but "very few eligible victims were located." It was only when the "IOM began its systematic investigation at the community level" that it gained "access to promising sources of information." The IOM was able to assist 1,861 needy elderly disabled Holocaust victims. Another 3,000 persons potentially were eligible for aid.[153]

For "more than 60 years, thousands of blind, deaf, mentally and physically disabled Holocaust survivors have had only limited contact with the world outside their immediate communities," living on low pensions and "often unaware if they do not receive their full social entitlements." IOM outreach efforts "were successful only after IOM began working directly and intensively with local state agencies," which had gathered extensive information about disabled individuals under the communist regimes. On the other hand, "[n]ational and international pro-disabled associations did not, at first, prove to be a useful source of information," although they provided valuable assistance later, after beneficiaries had been located.

As to the type of assistance, "[i]ndividually selected and packaged material assistance was important for beneficiaries who did not have the means to locate or purchase the clothing or special foodstuffs they needed." The program funded by the Court and the German Foundation "played a lasting role in drawing the attention of many local social service agencies to the needs of elderly disabled persons. It helped them update records and rectify deficiencies in benefits." In general, however, "[s]upport from civil society for the disabled is a new phenomenon in Central and Eastern Europe. What exists is poorly funded and concentrates on younger generations."[154]

[154] IOM Final Report at 182.

Specific Court-funded programs for disabled survivors were as follows:

- Czech Republic:

  "With information provided by a former official of the 'Swiss Fund' [Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa],[155] IOM identified five eligible mentally disabled survivors institutionalized at the Marianum convent in Opava," who already received "basic institutional care." They "still greatly appreciated IOM's regular visits, as most of them had no family and very little contact with the outside world." The survivors received personalized assistance, such as food, clothing, boots and a hearing aid. "The convent could not have provided this sort of assistance with its own, limited resources."[156]

- Moldova:

  "Despite IOM's efforts, for over two years no service provider willing to investigate, locate and serve disabled victims came forward. Only a few months before HSP was set to phase out in Moldova," a local NGO came forward and, after compiling a list of 775 potentially eligible beneficiaries, provided IOM with a list of 40 of the neediest. "The former service provider remain[ed] in regular telephone contact" with those who were assisted.[157]

- Poland:

  IOM Warsaw "contacted and requested information from hundreds of institutions at the federal, regional and municipal level," identifying 1,700 potentially eligible disabled survivors, and providing direct assistance. Although the victims were geographically scattered, with a "wide range of disabilities and disability levels, as well as access to suitable and efficient communication channels," the IOM eventually was able to assist 922 disabled survivors in Poland. They received medical care, rehabilitation equipment, home repairs and other aid.[158]

On February 26, 1997, the SBA announced the formation of the Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa (the "Swiss Humanitarian Fund" or the "Fund"). - Russian Federation:

  IOM Moscow enlisted the assistance of the Russian Red Cross, eventually establishing projects through seven branches in locations that had been occupied by the Nazis. In the region of Pskov, most "disabled survivors had been hidden by their parents to escape deportation or internment in a camp. The greatest number of eligible beneficiaries identified in Pskov were deaf-mute or had been crippled by polio before the beginning of the war." Others were assisted in the Belgorod and Orel regions. The program was hampered by the "unpaved rural roads" along which many victims lived, the difficulty in communicating with deaf and mute beneficiaries, and the refusal of several blind victims to "let staff into their homes" or to sign for assistance without being able to read the receipt form. Nevertheless, those assisted advised the IOM that medical aid "was especially meaningful," as "many survivors had not visited a doctor in over ten years."[159]

4. Homosexual Victims

The homosexual survivor population was also difficult to locate, despite intensive efforts. "IOM first sought to reach eligible homosexual victims through 67 gay support organizations and 22 specialized publications. These efforts yielded virtually no information concerning the existence or location of potential beneficiaries."[160] Homosexual survivors were few in number, "scattered and extremely hard to reach. Survivors of the Holocaust persecuted for homosexuality are generally at least ten years older than members of other groups assisted by IOM." Homosexuality was illegal under communism and survivors were reluctant to self-identify.

Still, the IOM from the beginning of the program in 2001 "sought to locate eligible homosexual survivors of the Holocaust," focusing extensive outreach efforts "towards international homosexual NGOs and the media. IOM also made substantial attempts to contact service providers with access to the homosexual survivor community," but these efforts were mostly unsuccessful.

"In August 2003, IOM contacted the Programme Coordinator for Europe of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. He provided IOM with the names, contact information and persecution accounts of four homosexual survivors living in Western European countries":

Austria, France and Germany. IOM contacted these individuals and transferred funds directly to them, which the survivors used for IOM-approved medical and homecare needs. Since all four beneficiaries lived in countries with relatively strong social safety nets, "assistance [was] more likely to have been perceived as recognition than as life-saving support. IOM found, nonetheless, that HSP addressed basic needs, such as medications and homecare, that beneficiaries could not have met" without the Court's assistance.[161]

5. 2013 Assessment of Needs: Roma, Jehovah's Witness, Disabled and Homosexual Nazi Victims

When it became clear that some residual funds would be available for needy Nazi victims, the IOM provided the Court with an update on services to non-Jewish victims. Since Roma victims were in the most difficult situation of the non-Jewish victims designated under the Settlement Agreement, Roma survivors would be targeted for the following types of assistance:

- "Food packages - contains locally purchased and pre-packed basic food items based on need assessment and local alimentary regime. Roma communities, especially elderly, have been severely affected by the ongoing economic crisis and the increased food prices. Based on our prior experience food packages are the most welcomed type of assistance among the beneficiaries."

- "Hygienic items - contains various pre-packed items necessary for personal and domestic hygiene. The provision of this type of assistance improves the sanitary conditions and contributes to the general health of the beneficiaries."

- "Winter Assistance - Winters in Central and Eastern Europe are usually very severe. This is especially true for the remote mountainous areas where many Roma settlements are located. The sub-standard housing, infrastructure and prevailing poverty further compound the problem...."

- "Medical Assistance - The overall health condition of the elderly Roma is very poor…. These health problems are further aggravated by the complete lack of or very limited health care access. Due to the lack of health care insurance many elderly Roma are not included in the national health care systems…. [T]he > beneficiaries very often have to choose between visiting … a doctor and buying food. For them, the choice is obvious."[162]

In an interim report on residual funds filed on March 11, 2016, the IOM reported that its activities had been concentrated in three nations that were considered to have the neediest populations of Roma survivors:

- Serbia, where more than 5,250 beneficiaries were located, who were assisted through programs operated by the IOM in conjunction with the Roma Community Center, the Italian Consortium for Solidarity and the Novi Sad Humanitarian Center;

- Macedonia, where 2,377 beneficiaries were located, who were assisted through programs operated by the IOM in conjunction with the local service provider Sumnal; and

- Bosnia and Herzegovina, with 1,336 beneficiaries, who were assisted through programs operated by the IOM in conjunction with the local service provider Romalen.[163]

The "initial estimate based on the IOM experience from the previous Roma Holocaust survivors programmes implemented between 2003 and 2011 was that IOM and its partners would be able to reach up to 10,000 eligible beneficiaries." Because of the "higher than average mortality rate among Roma and the advanced age of the eligible beneficiaries," somewhat fewer survivors than expected — 8,981 — had been identified, although efforts to locate additional eligible recipients would continue. The "basic needs have remained unchanged… they consist of food, non-food items (hygienic and clothes), medical and dental care, legal assistance, winter support and specifically social assistance, i.e. social clubs and activities."[164]

Some local service providers had proposed "small fund allocations for the purpose of commemorative multi-media projects which would not only document the assistance provided by the project and its impact to beneficiaries but also contribute to the understanding of the Roma genocide and suffering under the Nazi regime. The idea subsequently was discussed with the Special Masters, who advised that the Court's intention was to keep the focus on delivery of direct tangible assistance." Id.

In 2016 the IOM also sought, and received, the balance of funds remaining from the $5 million allocated under the 2013 residual funds order, a total of approximately $562,000. This was to be applied to a five-month project expected to serve 7,170 Roma survivors in Serbia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and additionally Moldova.[165]

The services were to be similar to those provided during the first phase of funding, with food assistance remaining a high priority. "Roma communities, especially the elderly, have been severely affected by the ongoing economic crisis and the increased food prices. Based on our prior experience food packages are the most welcomed type of assistance among the beneficiaries." Winter relief also remained crucial. "Winters in Central and Eastern Europe are usually very severe. This is especially true for the remote mountainous areas where many Roma settlements are located. The sub-standard housing, infrastructure and prevailing poverty further compound the problem. Without external assistance, the elderly Roma are usually forced to gather for burning various and not always healthy heating material. The packages will contain wood, wooden brickets, coal and in some cases heating equipment such as stoves." With respect to medical aid, "[d]ue to the lack of health insurance many elderly Roma are not included in the national health care systems." Many "have to choose between visiting … a doctor and buying food," and "medical centers and clinic can be located very far from the Roma communities." Other needs included home health care ("public services or social care are either non-existent or they don't have enough capacity to cover Roma communities"); socialization programs; and legal assistance ("[m]any elderly Roma still lack personal ID documents and property deeds," and "due to the prevalent illiteracy and the lack of legal advice many elderly Roma are not aware about their entitlements to state pensions or social protection").[166]

IV. LEGAL CHALLENGES TO THE CY PRES PROGRAMS

The cy pres remedy and humanitarian assistance programs for members of the Looted Assets Class gave rise to additional post-settlement litigation.

A. Legal Challenges to the Distribution Plan

When the Court approved the Distribution Plan in its entirety in November 2000, including the humanitarian assistance projects recommended in place of individual monetary payments, six appeals were filed. Four of the six appeals shortly were withdrawn, including one filed by an organization representing certain U.S. survivors.

Another appeal was filed on behalf of certain Roma class members. That submission was withdrawn before briefing and argument. It was believed that the allocation to the Deposited Assets Class was too high, and that the Looted Assets Class should have received more funds. As characterized by Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Burt Neuborne, it was also contended that "the plan favored Jews at the expense of other victims."[167] It was further stated that the IOM was not up to the task and would be unable to locate Roma Holocaust survivors; was not trusted in the Roma community; and would not be able to work with Roma groups to coordinate a humanitarian assistance program. Thus, the objectors believed that Looted Assets funds should be increased in amount, and directed toward programs supporting Roma education and Holocaust remembrance.

After the District Court denied this objection, an appeal was filed in the Second Circuit. Following extensive briefing, after a meeting during which the appellants were able to "express their concerns personally to the Court," the appeal on behalf of certain Roma class members was withdrawn on July 6, 2001.[168]

[168] Id. at 34. In 2002, and again in 2003, there was a renewed request for support of educational and memorial programs on behalf of Roma victims of the Nazis. In an August 2, 2002 letter, the Court was informed of "progress made toward establishing a Romani education fund. A July 15, 2003 letter requested an allocation of "not less than" $25 million with the "understand[ing] that final determinations of Deposited Assets claims have been made and that allocation and distribution for proposals for remaining funds can proceed."

Thus, the Second Circuit was left with one formal challenge to the Distribution Plan, filed by two survivors from Brooklyn. In a July 26, 2001 opinion affirming the District Court's order, the Second Circuit explained that appellants "object to … the application of the doctrine of cy pres to resolve the claims of the 'Looted Assets' class, rather than require — or permit — claimants to put forth documentary evidence of their actual losses."[169] The Court of Appeals concluded that the appeal "lack[ed] legal merit."[170]

B. Legal Challenges to the Increases in Funding to the Looted Assets Class

In September 2002, as a result of unexpected additional income generated by a tax exemption on interest earned by the Settlement Fund, as well as interest income, the Special Master advised the Court that there were sufficient excess funds to warrant an increase in payments to members of Slave Labor Class I, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class. The tax refund was the result of discussions among the Court, Special Masters, Settlement Fund accountant and plaintiffs' class counsel, who observed that interest on the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund was subject to taxation, and perhaps so too might be distributions to claimants. The matter was brought to the attention of members of the United States Congress, resulting in a provision of the 2001 Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act, Section 803, entitled: "No Federal Income Tax on Restitution Received by Victims of the Nazi Regime or their Heirs or Estates." The law exempted from taxation the interest earned on the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund, the fund established under the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims ("ICHEIC"), and similar Holocaust compensation funds.[171]

171 By the end of the claims process, virtually all allocations (and thus all payments) had been increased by 45%, a process first initiated in 2002 when it became clear that the Settlement Fund had benefitted from the accrual of unanticipated interest, as well as the enactment of a U.S. law in 2001 that expressly exempted taxes on the fund as well as payments made therefrom. See, e.g., Memorandum & Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2002); see also In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 270 F.Supp.2d 313, 325 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) ("After Special Master Judah Gribetz called attention to the diminution of the Settlement Fund by taxes on earned interest as well as the taxation of benefits awarded to the members of the classes," a successful effort was made "to persuade Congress to adopt legislation exempting from taxation interest earned by the Settlement Fund and payments to its beneficiaries").

In addition to refunding to the Settlement Fund the taxes that already had been paid on interest earned, Section 803 of the U.S. tax law – initiated largely by those involved with creating and overseeing the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund – resulted in overall savings to the Settlement Fund of approximately $25 million, the sum that would have been due, had the exemption not been enacted. These savings were passed along to class members as distributions from the Fund. The tax law also exempted from taxation the individual payments that were made from the Swiss Banks Settlement and other Holocaust compensation funds. This benefited many thousands of U.S. citizens by ensuring that such payments did not need to be reported as taxable income.[172]

Due to these tax savings as well as interest earned on the Settlement Fund, the Court was able to authorize an increase in the amount of individual payments under Slave Labor Class I and the Refugee Class, and also authorized another $45 million to be added to the humanitarian aid funds available to the Looted Assets Class.[173]

Thereafter, on November 17, 2003, the Court adopted the Special Masters' recommendation to allocate an additional $60 million in excess funds that had become available mainly because of interest accruing on the principal. By then, the sum allocated to the Looted Assets Class had more than doubled, from $100 million to $205 million. Additionally, the Court signaled that in the event that excess funds remained from any portion of the $1.25 billion settlement, that sum, too, would be earmarked for the Looted Assets Class.[174]

With considerably more than the $100 million originally allocated to the Looted Assets Class available for humanitarian aid programs, there was new litigation relating to the cy pres remedy. The definition of "neediness" was questioned by certain individuals. When that objection was not accepted by either the District Court or the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court was asked to consider the argument that an allocation based upon survivor needs was unlawful, and that only a claims-based process was appropriate under class action law.[175] As discussed below, these challenges did not succeed.

Upon the Court's approval in September 2002 of a 45% increase in funding to the Looted Assets Class, certain survivors in the United States believed that they should have received the same allocation as survivors in the former Soviet Union. They stated that Holocaust victims' needs were the same around the world, and that allocations should be based on the survivors' geographic distribution, not on an assessment of their relative need.

The Forward, a newspaper based in New York which emphasized issues of concern to the Jewish community, wrote of this issue:

> The long quest for justice for victims of Nazi persecution may have gotten a little bit longer last month, after [certain] Holocaust survivors decided to challenge a federal court's plan for distributing a piece of the Swiss bank restitution fund... The Brooklyn court overseeing the Swiss case wants most of [the sum designated for] humanitarian aid directed toward destitute survivors in the former Soviet Union. The challengers say that's unfair….

> . . . . They … demand more for American survivors, which means less for Russians. Some in the group … suggest that Holocaust survivors in the former Soviet Union aren't necessarily Holocaust survivors, since many avoided the Nazis by fleeing to Siberia….

> Admittedly, what the challengers want isn't inherently unreasonable. They're demanding better home health care for the increasingly aged and infirm survivor population in this country. We'd like the same thing. As this newspaper has noted before, America is the only nation in the industrialized West that doesn't recognize healthcare as a human right but leaves it to the whims of the market. Even within this country, government-funded care varies wildly by state. According to one recent study, state spending averages on home healthcare for the elderly range from a per capita high of $1,131 in New York to a low of $60 in > Florida...No wonder [those filing objections] want more. They're entitled to it. But their beef isn't with the Swiss banking fund. It's with their own legislators.[176]

The Jewish Week, another publication based in New York, noted that the objectors had cited the "latest national Jewish population study," showing that "[o]ne-fourth of Holocaust survivors in the United States are living below the poverty level, not the 7 percent previously believed," to "buttress their claim that they are being shortchanged in the distribution of the $1.25 billion Swiss bank settlement of Holocaust-era claims because the current allocation plan gives them only 4 percent of the money."[177]

C. Objections to the Proposed Use of Possible Residual Funds

1. The District Court's Decision

Additional submissions were filed, including a "Response" to the "Special Masters' Interim Recommendation" (September 27, 2002), and a "Motion for Immediate Interim Distribution of Swiss Settlement Proceeds" (September 11, 2003). An "immediate distribution" of "residual funds" was sought for members of the Looted Assets Class. This was to be drawn from the then-$670 million in funds allocated, but as yet undistributed, to the Deposited Assets Class.[178]

[176] Editorial, Justice Delayed, Peevishly, FORWARD, Sept. 13, 2002.

[177] Stewart Ain, U.S. Survivors: We're Being Shortchanged, JEWISH WEEK, Nov. 21, 2003. The article noted that Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne had observed that it was "'unclear' what proportion [of United States survivors living below the poverty line] have unmet needs 'similar to the needs of destitute survivors residing in the Former Soviet Union.'" The article quoted one of these individuals as stating that needs in the U.S. and the FSU were similar, "whether the survivor lives in Boston or Belarus.'" Id. See also William Glaberson, Holocaust Survivors in U.S. Say Settlement Slights Them, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 14, 2003, at B4.

[178] Others also communicated with the Court on this issue, including the then-Chief Financial Officer for the State of Florida. He stated in a June 12, 2003 Declaration that he had "seen data that suggest … that current allocations are based on estimates that unfairly reduce the reported proportion of Survivors or Nazi victims who live in the United States…. [T]he near unanimous opinion of Survivors today is that unclaimed funds from the restitution process should be available so that every Survivor who cannot provide for themselves can receive adequate home and health care, emergency services, and medications, food and shelter…. [T]his Court's effort in assuring that all rightful claimants receive full restitution has my full support. I further support a process that allocates 100% of unallocated funds be [sic] earmarked for adequate home and health care for needy Survivors. I would respectfully suggest that the cost of home care in the U.S. is greater than Israel and Europe which may require an offset. Additionally, a new population analysis must be completed to make sure that all Survivors receive their adequate share of a secondary distribution." Declaration of Chief Financial Officer for the State of Florida, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. June 12, 2003).

These objections were dismissed by the District Court on March 9, 2004. The Court noted that there appeared to be agreement "that funds allocated to the Looted Assets Class should be distributed through a cy pres distribution to the neediest survivors," but disagreement with the program adopted. Those objecting stated that the funds first needed to be distributed among different countries on a pro rata basis, depending on the number of survivors in that country. "Put differently, [they] argue[] that a survivor community in a given country should be allocated (for the benefit of its neediest survivors only) a percentage of the Looted Assets Class funds equal to whatever percentage of the world survivor community it represents. This proposal is tailored to benefit individuals who are a part of a small group of needy survivors within a large nationwide survivor population. Not surprisingly, needy survivors in the United States …are just such a group." The Court considered this proposal to be "inconsistent with law, morality, and most importantly, the settlement of this lawsuit."[179]

As an initial matter, although the motion was characterized as a request for an "immediate distribution" of funds, it was actually seeking the creation of a committee to assess distribution proposals. The Court was asked to set aside $50 million "'in trust to be spent in accordance with the decisions of a committee of …survivors,' representatives of other organizations, and 'the Court.' This … 'Committee,' of which [they] propose[] to make [the Court] a member, would make decisions" on the use of Looted Assets Class funds, "foreshadow[ing] a drawn-out process rife with potential for disagreement among its members."[180]

Beyond being inconsistent "with the control — not a seat on a committee — that the law requires that [the Court] exercise over the distribution process," the "time [was] simply not ripe for a larger 'immediate distribution' of residual funds to members of the Looted Assets Class." It was unclear how much, if any, residual funds would remain from the $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class. These were the only claims that would have withstood a motion to dismiss had the case not settled, and the only class legally entitled to compensation. The Court noted that the motion was based upon the contention that

"[t]here is over $670 million under the Court's control right now, sitting in the bank, helping no one other than the bankers." [The objectors] continue[], "[t]his money is, legally and morally, the Survivors' money." These statements reveal [a] basic misunderstanding of the settlement. The $800 million that was set aside for individuals with claims against the Swiss Banks for deposited assets (of which approximately $650 million now remains) belongs to those survivors or their heirs. It was not set aside for, nor does it belong to, the survivor community as [a] whole. This large sum was set aside in part because, of all the claims asserted against the Swiss Banks, only the claims of the Deposited Assets Class have any legal merit. The other claims could not have withstood a motion to dismiss. As the Second Circuit explained in affirming my decision:

> [The Deposited Assets Class] claims are based on well-established legal principles, have the ability of being proved with concrete documentation, and are readily valuated in terms of time and inflation. By contrast, the claims of the other four classes are based on novel and untested legal theories of liability, would have been very difficult to prove at trial, and will be very difficult to accurately valuate.

In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 14 Fed. Appx. 132, 134 (2d Cir. 2001) [reissued as a published opinion, 413 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2005)].

Under these circumstances, I have a legal and moral obligation to the Deposited Assets Class not to use the funds that belong to it for a cy pres distribution until I am certain that the claims to those funds will not exceed the amount set aside. The $800 million already takes into account the certainty that, due to the passage of time, the destruction of documents and the slaughter of millions, claims awarded will not equal the current value of accounts identified by the Volcker Committee [after investigating the Swiss accounts] as probably or possibly belonging to survivors. Indeed, it is a half billion dollars less than the present value of such accounts…

Nevertheless, [it is] argue[d] that "$200 million is a sum that no reasonable person would argue is too high of a minimum estimate of the amount that will remain from the $800 million set aside for Deposited Assets such that the allocation of the amount today would interfere with the payment of meritorious pending claims." I disagree. Whether $200 million will remain from the $800 million set aside for the Deposited Assets Class is not yet knowable.[181]

[181] Id. at 93-94 (citations omitted) (emphasis in original). See also Editorial, Divided Funds, And Loyalties, JEWISH WEEK, May 14, 2004, at 6 ("[T]his is not charitable money to be allocated, but a bank account settlement, converting looted assets into financial aid. And the allocations being so passionately debated are hypothetical at this point, since depositors with valid claims are still being sought, and it is their money that would be used").

At the end of the extensive CRT claims process, only $54.5 million in residual funds remained (i.e., about one-fourth of the amount the objectors considered to be available for redistribution). Over $726 million of the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class was returned to bank depositors and their heirs.

The allocation formula, which required consideration of Holocaust victims' relative needs, also was questioned. The Court noted that a "comparison of needy survivors is by definition an odious process. All individuals who survived the Holocaust bear scars, and all merit relief. Nevertheless, left with limited funds to distribute, [the Court] had to render a judgment as to whose need was the greatest."[182] As to the specific decision to allocate 75% of the funds for Jewish class members to those in the former Soviet Union, and 4% to those in the United States, it was based upon "the number of impoverished survivors in each country, their relative need, and their other available sources of support."[183]

Approximately 19-27% of all Holocaust survivors lived in the FSU and 14-19% lived in the U.S., numbers that were supported by a Brandeis University study.[184] The Court observed that the Brandeis Report "confirmed the assessment of the Special Master that the population of needy survivors is distributed quite differently than the population of survivors."[185] The primary reason for this "differential distribution" was the Cold War, which cut off survivors in the former Soviet Union from the West and resulted in "survivors behind the Iron Curtain" receiving "next to nothing" in Holocaust compensation. Those in the U.S., however, were able to take part in at least "ten major compensation efforts" after the war, including the "Federal German Indemnification Program ('BEG Pensions'), payments by the Israeli Ministry of Finance, the Hardship Fund, the Article 2 Fund, the Central and Eastern European Fund, and the German Slave Labor Fund." By 2004, approximately $53 billion in restitution had been distributed from these and other programs, of which $14.8 billion (28%) had "gone to survivors in the United States." Only $444 million (0.8%) had reached FSU survivors.[186]

As Professor Dovid Katz of the University of Vilnius had noted, the "last elderly Jews of Eastern Europe, whose lives were ruined by the Holocaust, and who choose to live out their days in the towns of their ancestors, are suffering acutely from malnutrition, poverty and lack of medicine, while the millions (or billions) from Germany, Switzerland and the great American Jewish organizations pass them by."[187]

In addition, FSU survivors "had to suffer through decades of Communism" and thus were "double victims" — a term favored by former Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Stuart Eizenstat, "who was instrumental in the efforts of the United States to bring about Holocaust restitution agreements."[188] The FSU survivors' situation worsened with the collapse of Communism.

The Brandeis researchers reached several conclusions about survivor needs worldwide. First, in the FSU, the survivor community constituted "between 32% and 40% of the total Jewish population," whereas the survivor community constituted 2.5% of the total U.S. Jewish population. This meant that in the former Soviet Union, there was "'a comparatively small Jewish community available to support victims.'" The problem was "exacerbated by the fact that while 56% of survivors in the United States are married and 96% have children, only 41% of survivors in the FSU are married and only 44% have children," so that "family and community support networks are stretched thin in the FSU." Furthermore, "[a]verage pensions now do not exceed $20 [to $30] in any of the countries of the former Soviet Union."[189]

The situation regarding medical services in the FSU was no better. "Diagnostic testing, specialties services and all but the most urgent hospital care are unavailable to those unable to pay for them, a group that includes virtually all of the Jewish elderly, and even when admitted to a hospital as an emergency[,] out of pocket payment must be made for pharmaceuticals and medical equipment used during the hospitalization!"[190] The "services most people receive are at best comparable to those available in the U.S. in the 1950s, and they are in striking contrast to the high-quality care and advanced technologies to which elderly patients in the U.S. and Israel have access on a routine basis and for which, with a few exceptions, governmental or private payment is available."[191]

The IOM, which by 2004 had been distributing Court-funded aid in the field for several years, confirmed the desperate situation in Central and Eastern Europe. The IOM noted that conditions there had "worsened considerably since the end of communism." The "elderly, and persons 'living on the edge' such as the Roma, have been hardest hit by the universal collapse of state services which once sought, however imperfectly, to meet some of their most basic material, social and medical needs."[192]

Thus, as the District Court observed, "funds from the Swiss Banks Settlement for many people have meant the difference between subsistence and hunger." Even with these Court-funded "hunger relief programs," which were "at the heart of the JDC's relief efforts and have by all accounts been a great help," these programs still "only benefitted 40% of the survivors served by the Hesed network." More than half "received no hunger relief" from the Settlement Fund, "despite desperate need."[193]

As to survivors in the U.S., their "economic plight" was "less well documented" but "also clearly less pressing." The U.S. survivors questioning the allocation to the FSU had relied upon the National Jewish Population Survey ("NJPS"), including its conclusion that approximately one-quarter of U.S. survivors were "living in households that fall below the federal poverty line" ($9,000 per individual / $12,000 per couple). However, only a small fraction of these survivors — 2% — stated during their telephone surveys that they "'can't make ends meet.'" Another 35% stated "that they were 'just managing,' and 63% responded that they were either 'comfortable,' 'very comfortable,' or 'wealthy.'"[194] The explanation was that "they have a social safety net on which to fall back:" "government entitlements" which "generally assure a minimum income provided through the Social Security Administration," as well as "an adequate level of health care provided through Medicare, a program designed to aid the elderly, and Medicaid, which supplements Medicare for needy elderly persons." The programs "are intended to ensure that the majority of elderly residents maintain a sustainable, although hardly lavish, standard of living."[195]

The Court also addressed the "Ukeles New York Report,"[196] which based its findings upon approximately 4,500 interviews with New York area residents including 412 Nazi victims. New York area survivors, like those in the rest of the United States, had "an exceptionally strong social safety net that will generally prevent the kind of destitution faced by almost all of the survivors in the FSU."

While not "mak[ing] light of the need in the United States survivor community," it was "of a different kind than that faced by survivors in the FSU."[197] The "premise that geography should be the controlling factor" led to the belief that "needy survivors in the United States should be awarded 25% of the funds because approximately 25% of survivors live in the United States." Beyond the fact that the data, including various surveys, did not bear out the 25% figure, "there is no Looted Assets Class sub-class composed of United States survivors. The relevant sub-class is the Looted Assets Class itself, and it is composed of all victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs whose assets were looted by the Nazis. It is not subdivided geographically." Allocating 25% of Looted Assets funds to U.S. survivors would be warranted only if "25% of the most pressing need among Jewish survivors globally was in the United States," and this was not the case. The proposal "would provide these relatively few needy survivors [in the U.S.] with a disproportionate benefit solely because of the overall size of the survivor community in the United States," an allocation that the Court did not consider to be reasonable.[198]

More specifically, the proposal would give 25% of the Looted Assets Class funds "to, at most, 12,000 survivors in the United States for supplemental home health services," a number based upon 4,000 individuals already identified, and an estimate that another 8,000 survivors in need of assistance potentially could be identified through outreach. The program would require an outlay of $30 million annually, of which "$10.5 million [was] needed for home care services for the already identified needy survivors; $3 million [was] needed for emergency services; $3 million [was] needed for transportation services; $3 million [was] needed for outreach; and $10.5 million [over one-third of the funds sought] [was] needed for services to those survivors who would be newly discovered as needy through the outreach." The Court found the proposal to be based upon inaccurate demographic data; it would exhaust funds allocated to the Looted Assets Class in less than two years; and it was "vague" in that some number of the 4,000 individuals identified as in need of home health care already were receiving services from other sources.[199]

The Court further noted that there appeared to be "differential views as to survivors of the Holocaust." Although comparison of survivors was "odious," the process was not made easier by the suggestion that "survivors living in the FSU (or by the same logic, former FSU survivors who have immigrated to Israel and the United States) are not 'true survivors.'"[200] The concern was raised that "[m]ost Jews currently residing in the FSU never saw a Nazi uniform…. [B]y the time the Nazis invaded Russia, they used 'Einsatzgruppen' to kill most of the unfortunate Jews they captured…. [M]ost of those that fled eastward were able to take their most precious belongings along and did not own the real-estate they left behind," and thus these individuals supposedly could not be "considered to be legitimate members of the 'Looted Assets' Class or any other class."[201]

However, historical evidence demonstrated otherwise. Many of the victims in the FSU might have had less, but what they had was stolen, as true for every region under Nazi control.[202]

In addition, the Court noted that the "overwhelming majority of the most needy survivors in the United States [were] recent immigrants from the FSU."[203]

> [T]he survivors still in the FSU are the same as the survivors [considered to be] "true survivors" once they immigrate to the United States and who, by consistently being among the neediest survivors in America, bolster [the] claim that the survivor community in the United States is in desperate need. Indeed, as the Brandeis Report concluded, in "the United States, poverty rates are especially noteworthy among recent immigrant victims from the FSU." Brandeis Report, at 44. Or in the words of the Ukeles study, "Nazi Victims in Russian-speaking households are much more likely to be poor [81% as compared to 21%] than Nazi victims in non-Russian-speaking households." Ukeles New York Study, at 6. This is not because individuals living in Russian-speaking households cannot succeed in New York; it is because 67% of those in Russian-speaking households have arrived in the United States since 1990. Id. Essentially, the fact of being a recent immigrant from the FSU is the best predictor of poverty for survivors in the United States.[204]

There were two additional issues "that warrant[ed] additional comment." First, the objection that the Distribution Plan represented a "'de facto exercise of charity using their money'" was "inconsistent with [their] own proposal." At most, under 10% of the U.S. survivor population would benefit from the health care plan that had been advanced. "It is hard to see how this proposal would survive [their] own objection" to the Distribution Plan.[205]

Second, the claim that survivors would have opted out had they known the terms of the Looted Assets Class allocation" could "apply with equal — or greater — force to [the objectors' own] proposed plan of allocation, a plan that would exclude 90% of the survivors in the United States from any share in the cy pres distribution to the Looted Assets Class." Furthermore, because survivors in the FSU received so little benefit from the Settlement Fund other than through Looted Assets Class funds — in contrast to U.S. survivors, who had received about one-third of all Settlement Funds distributed — FSU survivors arguably "would have had much more of an incentive to opt-out than survivors in the United States."[206]

2. Objections on Behalf of Certain Homosexual and Disabled Survivors

Two organizations representing, respectively, certain homosexual and disabled individuals, also filed objections. They stated that "not all unclaimed funds should be distributed to needy survivors of the Holocaust."[207]

IOM staff members, working on the Court's behalf, had engaged Roma clans and local humanitarian assistance groups, and had visited remote villages throughout Central and Eastern Europe, finding Roma Holocaust survivors throughout the region. By the end of the program, funds from the Swiss Banks Settlement had enabled the IOM to locate and deliver food, heat, medicines and other life-saving assistance to over 71,000 elderly needy Roma Nazi victims.

However, homosexual and disabled Nazi victims were more difficult to locate, despite the IOM's extensive outreach effort.[208] An organization advocating for homosexual Nazi victims contended that the residual funds recommendation did not "adequately account for homosexual victims because homosexual victims are nearly impossible to identify and thus have not often been among the needy survivors receiving settlement funds." The group requested "that in order to adequately account for homosexual victims, 1% of excess funds be allocated not to needy survivors, but to programs devoted to research and education regarding the plight of homosexuals in the Nazi era and its aftermath."[209] Another organization, "a non-profit law center founded to represent individuals with disabilities," stated that disabled Nazi victims "have been cut off from society and have thus not adequately benefitted from compensation programs."

They sought "between 2% and 3% of all residual funds" to be allocated "not to needy survivors, but to a 'short term Trust that will provide grants to disability oriented, non-profit, non-governmental organizations.' While victims of Nazi persecution who were targeted because of a disability could be among the beneficiaries of this 'trust,' so too could any other disabled individual or disability rights organization."[210]

As to the concerns relating to certain homosexual victims, the Court noted that despite extensive outreach and exhaustive inquiries, it "has simply been extremely difficult to identify survivors of Nazi persecution who were targeted for victimization because they were homosexual." The advocacy group itself had identified only seven needy victims targeted because of their homosexuality.[211]

The Court referenced the "terrible history" of Nazi persecution of homosexuals. The objectors had stated that "what makes homosexual victims of Nazi persecution different, and what makes them worthy of a distinct cy pres allocation in this case, is their post-war experience," including exclusion from post-Holocaust compensation, ongoing harassment, and even re-imprisonment. "[B]ecause of the precise form of Nazi era and post-war persecution of homosexuals, it is no surprise that the IOM has been unable to find more than a handful of needy homosexual survivors." Thus, as the Court explained, "1% of excess and common funds" was sought, which was to be "distributed for a separate cy pres remedy encouraging the remembrance of homosexual victims of Nazi persecution as a group," recommending four specific initiatives: a "modest monthly pension" to the identified needy homosexual victims; support of scholarly research focused on Nazi crimes and possibly identifying additional victims; general education about Nazi persecution of homosexuals; and support of efforts to prevent persecution of homosexuals.[212]

As to the objections raised on behalf of certain disabled survivors, it was stated that the "distributions thus far have not adequately accounted for the suffering of Nazi victims who were specifically targeted because of physical and mental disabilities." The Court noted that "[a]s with homosexual victims of the Nazis, it is undisputed that the Nazis committed unspeakable atrocities against people solely because they were disabled" and that the IOM similarly "has had difficulty identifying" such victims. The IOM had reported that it had contacted 23 non-governmental organizations throughout Europe, and relatively few victims had been located.[213] It was stated that the disabled nevertheless should be compensated on a broader basis, and the proposal was for 2-3% of residual funds to be placed into a trust to provide "'grants to disability oriented, non-profit, non-governmental organizations'" to further the rights of the disabled. Of that sum, 10% should be allocated to memorial and commemorative programs, and the remainder to "countries where needy Holocaust survivors reside, but they would in no way be limited to providing direct (or indirect) relief for survivors," but rather would be directed toward "improv[ing] the social standing of people with disabilities" where they were marginalized.[214]

The Court noted that homosexual and disabled Nazi victims were "only entitled to … distributions as individuals — not as a group. There are no sub-classes within the Looted Assets Class or any other Class." Just as there was no "United States survivors' share," there also was "no homosexual victims' share and … no disabled victims' share." The intent was to assist individual Nazi victims, regardless of why they were targeted. Given the "current level of need experienced by individual members of the Looted Assets Class," remembrance programs could not be justified.[215]

Further, there was no reason to assume that "overall, homosexuals and disabled survivors have not received a proportionate share of the total distributions in this case…. Surely some proportion of the Jewish, Romani and Jehovah's Witness Victims have been homosexual, even if not explicitly identified or targeted by the Nazis as such." In addition, "not only some, but a vast majority of survivors receiving funds from the settlement have been disabled," even if not originally targeted by the Nazis due to their disabilities. It "hardly seems debatable that when giving money to people who had assets looted by the Nazis because they were then disabled becomes impossible, the 'next best' solution is to give the money to people who had assets looted by the Nazis and are now disabled and suffer the same prejudice."[216]

Thus, although "[t]he goals of remembrance, education and advocacy are important, particularly for groups such as homosexuals and disabled victims whose place in the Holocaust is often improperly overlooked," such purposes "can only come after I am satisfied that life sustaining needs of the neediest victims of Nazi persecution are met. Because so many survivors continue to face life-threatening needs on a daily basis, I cannot now justify ordering the separate cy pres distribution;" rather, the Court must "continue to give money to needy survivors."[217]

3. The Special Masters' Recommendations for Allocation of Possible Residual Funds

The Court approved the Special Masters' recommendation to allocate "$60 million in currently available excess funds" to the Looted Assets in the same manner as the original allocation. The Court also adopted the Special Masters' recommendation to solicit proposals "for the allocation of possible unclaimed residual funds from the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund." "Any person or organization who seeks to offer a plan for providing assistance to needy Nazi victims" was asked to "file a proposal specifying at least the following information": (1) number and geographic location of Nazi victims to be served by program; (2) number and geographic location of "needy Nazi victims;" (3) assessment of survivor needs, including whether needs included medication, food, nursing care and similar assistance, "taking into account different social safety nets available by geographic location" and survivor longevity; and (4) specific distribution recommendations, including number of victims to be served, costs and types of assistance, as well as proposed distribution agencies.[218]

In response to this 2003 call for proposals, some 100 organizations and individuals filed materials with the Court. These proposals were studied to formulate recommendations about the use of possible residual funds.[219] The Special Masters presented an analysis of the proposals and recommended general principles to guide any secondary distribution, while noting that it was unclear whether, or in what amount, there would be any such distribution in light of the ongoing analysis of bank account claims.[220]

The "detailed proposals and studies submitted" confirmed that "survivor needs unfortunately remain[ed] essentially the same as when they were assessed in connection with the Distribution Plan." Of all needs, such as "medical treatments, prescription drugs, home health care, transportation and the like, the most urgent requirement often is food."[221] The Special Masters prepared a summary of proposals based upon the type of assistance requested and the number of Nazi victims expected to be served. While the proposals did not present an "exhaustive representation of all Nazi victim needs," and "may be both under-inclusive and over-inclusive," the suggestions nevertheless provided a highly "useful measure of current Nazi victim needs as perceived by those . . . who work with needy individuals every day."[222] The following trends were apparent as of 2004:

- Service providers in Israel indicated that in the calendar year 2004, approximately 17,105 Jewish Nazi victims in that nation needed food programs – canteen meals, food packages and meals-on-wheels. In the United States, service providers reported that 2,272 Jewish Nazi victims needed food programs. In the FSU, service providers reported that 121,600 Jewish Nazi victims needed food programs. In other parts of the world, including Central and Eastern Europe, approximately 2,080 Jewish Nazi victims were reported as needing food programs. In sum, service providers indicated that approximately 12% of those in need of food were in Israel, approximately 1.6% were in the U.S., 85% were in the FSU, and 1.45% were in Central and Eastern Europe and other parts of the world.

- The food assistance sought for victims in the former Soviet Union included either a monthly food package consisting of "pasta, flour, beans, canned fish, rice, sugar and oil;" or a hot meal once a day. This was often "the only hot meal [these individuals] will receive during the course of a week, and their only source of protein;" or 2.5 "fresh food sets a month" (eggs, poultry, cheese and milk).

- Winter relief (fuel and warm clothing) was another pressing need in some parts of the world. In the former Soviet Union, 10,000 Nazi victims would be aided by an allocation of unclaimed residual funds, if such funds remained. In Israel, service providers sought winter relief for 1,000 Nazi victims. In the U.S., 1,400 victims would be assisted by winter relief. No proposals were filed seeking winter relief for Jewish Nazi victims in other parts of the world. Thus, the proposals indicated that for a second "subsistence" program funded by the current "Looted Assets Class" allocation, winter relief, approximately 8% of those in need were in Israel, 11.3% were in the U.S. and 80.7% were in the FSU.

- "Emergency financial assistance," consisting of grants for those facing a sudden and unaffordable expense such as rehabilitative equipment, medical procedures, rent and utility payments, and the like, was another key element of the Looted Assets Class allocation. According to the proposals, in 2004, 21,000 individuals in Israel, 3,375 in the U.S., 10,000 in the FSU and 1,600 in other parts of the world required this type of assistance; i.e., approximately 58.4% were in Israel, 9.4% in the U.S., 27.8% in the FSU and 4.45% in Central and Eastern Europe and other parts of the world.[223]

Taking into consideration requests for food, winter relief and emergency financial assistance, the service providers indicated that approximately 20.4% of those in need were in Israel, 3.7% were in the U.S., 74% were in the FSU and 1.9% were in Central and Eastern Europe and other parts of the world. With the exception of Israel, where the original allocation of Looted Assets Class funds was approximately 12%, the information offered by the service providers indicated that the original geographic allocations of 75% of funds to the FSU and 25% to the rest of the world remained consistent with the actual distribution of pressing victim needs (75% in the FSU; 12% in Israel; and 4% in the U.S.), if need was defined as "food," "winter relief" and "emergency financial aid."[224]

The proposals made clear some of the "guarantees that living in America" provided for the elderly at that time, including Nazi victims. In Florida, for example, "[h]ome delivered meals [were] covered through the regular senior Meal program funded through Federal funds with a local Jewish community match through the Area Alliance on Aging. Most of those receiving home health care received meals. (5 meals per week are provided under this program)."[225] Thus, as the Court observed, federal funds and local philanthropy offered assistance even in "a state with one of the least extensive social safety nets in the country."[226] As another example of the U.S. safety net, the National Jewish Population Survey indicated that 71% of Nazi victims in the United States who reported the disability of someone in the household noted that "a government program such as Medicare [was] paying for the supervision or assistance, compared to 54% of non-victims. In addition, 19% of Victims [relied] on personal savings compared to just 6% of non-victims. Conversely, proportionally more non-victims (22%) report[ed] their personal insurance cover[ed] the cost of supervision or assistance for the disability than Victims [did] (5%)."[227]

The World Jewish Restitution Organization ("WJRO"), working with eight organizations, filed a request for residual funds on behalf of the State of Israel. Israeli social safety nets were fairly extensive. "Nazi victims in Israel [had] available a variety of assistance programs supported by the government and the NGO [non-governmental] sector," including "many forms of special assistance available to new immigrants (pensions, income supplement, health insurance, etc.)."[228] Although political unrest, the resulting increase in government expenditures on defense, and the deterioration in global financial conditions had worsened the situation in Israel, nevertheless, there was still a "floor of assistance that [was] by any reasonable measure far more generous than supports available to survivors in the FSU."[229]

As the submission filed by the WJRO on behalf of the State of Israel indicated, the "Ministry of Social Affairs and various NGOs assist[ed] these indigent elderly with subsidies for various services, such as payment of travel to treatments, providing necessary equipment and basic furnishings for the home, help[ed] pay for heating the house in winter in colder regions, [provided] assistance for dental treatments and purchase of needed items in accordance with indicators of neediness and eligibility."[230] While "many needs remain[ed] unmet,"[231] there were other government funded benefits including fifty percent discounts on public transportation and cultural events (the "Law of Elderly Citizens"); "pension payments for the most infirm elderly who remain in the community;" subsidized participation in Elder Care Day Centers; visiting nurse/home housework assistance (the "Nursing Insurance Law"); and "short, temporary respite-care recovery stays in healthcare-vacation facilities for the infirm elderly following hospitalization."[232]

A demographic study provided with the State of Israel/WJRO submission stated that "[n]eedy Jews who settled in countries where the socioeconomic situation is objectively better – thanks to the existence of safety nets but also better housing and other facilities – should not be penalized for their choices."[233] However, since the Court's goal was to assist the neediest

survivors, the existence of "safety nets," "better housing" and "other facilities" was relevant, and the failure to take these governmental and private services into account would penalize needy survivors who did not have them.[234]

The Special Masters noted that many of the proposals reflected the disparate needs of different survivor populations. "Every survivor need should be considered, and in a perfect world with unlimited funds, every need would be addressed. But in a world where difficult choices must be made, the specific proposals and the costs – including the relative annual costs per person – are revealing."[235] Some examples of the types of assistance sought (and their estimated costs) were as follows:

- In one Central European nation, an organization sought to build a "complex social facility" or "Old Age Home" to serve approximately 100 Nazi victims in the region. The facility was to include approximately "35 beds in predominantly single rooms, medical case space, daily center, kitchen and boarding, [and a] multifunctional hall for 80 people." The total cost would be $2.7 million to $3 million, of which 90% was sought from the Settlement Fund ($2,430,000 to $2,700,000); thus, the cost per survivor would be $24,300 to $27,000. Another organization in that country sought to assist 1,550 survivors by creating a senior center with "60 residential rooms and ... daycare center with ... counseling and medical care." The total cost was expected to be $6 million, of which approximately $2,160,000 (averaging $1,394 per person) was requested from the Settlement Fund.[236]

- In one U.S. state, 7 survivors "identified as very needy" would be provided home care services at an annual cost of $183,984. The cost therefore was over $26,000 per person, per year.[237]

- In another U.S. state, $373,200 annually was sought to assist 60 victims (approximately $6,220 per person per year): services were to include $10,000 for "home health care and medication assistance" to 3 needy victims; primarily "bathing assistance" twice weekly to 30 victims; weekly "homemaker assistance" ("assisting with chores, shopping, light cleaning and companion[ship]") to 50 victims, and "assisted living in a Jewish facility for 6 survivors" at "$2,800 per month" or "$201,600" for 12 months.[238]

- In the former Soviet Union, a program was proposed that would provide 121,600 Nazi victims with food, at a cost of $39 per person, per year. The recipient would receive either one hot meal daily, or one monthly package of dry food, or 2.5 monthly packages of fresh food. Alternatively, for $150 per person per year, each of the 121,600 victims in the program would receive a monthly fresh food package, thereby providing them with a second daily meal.[239]

- For several thousand Nazi victims living in Israel, considered under the national definition to suffer from the highest disability (150%), it was proposed that each person receive 10 hours of home care per week. This was to be in addition to the up to 24.5 hours for which that person might be eligible through other governmental and non-governmental support. For 2004, the program would assist 8,640 people and would cost $34.56 million, or $4,000 per person.[240]

- For the former Soviet Union, it was proposed that home health care hours be brought to within 80% of the then-current Israeli government-funded model, to approximately 14 hours weekly (2 hours daily), up from the then-current level in the FSU of up to 4 hours per week, at a cost of approximately $8.85 million annually and $520 per person, per year. The program would reach over 17,000 Nazi victims.

- An organization sought $12 million to $15 million to build, for the benefit of "at least 1,000 survivors [who] are tightly clustered" in a particular U.S. neighborhood, a "community center to be used for delivery of social services and socialization and to build a community for the generations of survivors that are left – and for generations and generations to come." Services would include "case management ... for those that need to access benefits, assistance with transportation services and most importantly funding tuition vouchers for their children." Assuming 1,000 survivors were benefited by the community center, including tuition vouchers, the assistance provided to each person would total $12,000 to $15,000.[241]

240 See Special Masters' Residual Funds Recommendation, at 64 (citing one of eight proposals submitted by the State of Israel/WJRO). The Special Master noted that while elderly persons who were completely disabled ("150%") needed several hours of home care daily, they already were eligible to receive between 9.75 and 15.5 hours of home care per week through governmental programs under Israel's Long-term Care Insurance Law. Those elderly who were Nazi victims received up to another 9 additional hours of home care per week through the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims. Id. at 69-70. Thus, in 2004, disabled Nazi victims in Israel were eligible for up to 24.5 hours of home care per person per week.

- An association in Europe sought approximately $42 million over 20 years to "support 105 needy Holocaust victims" by providing an additional monthly pension. The group proposed further services, with an annual cost per person of approximately $12,398.[242]

- Elsewhere in Europe, an organization sought $60,090 for programs that would serve approximately 240 Roma Nazi victims (at an annual cost of approximately $250 per person), who had been "left out from any social and health programs, living in their houses without any medical help, very poor nutrition, without running water."[243]

These examples, "as true for all the proposals, demonstrate[d] that the unmet needs of Nazi victims around the world [were] vast. They further demonstrate[d] that the needs [fell] into a wide range of categories and expenses, and that the programs offering life-sustaining assistance to the greatest number of survivors often [were] able to do so at the lowest per capita costs."[244]

As to the suggestion that possible residual funds should be held in reserve in anticipation of locating new clients, the Special Masters noted that "[e]xtensive efforts to locate Nazi victims have been under way for many years in a variety of arenas, including but certainly not limited to this lawsuit. Unfortunately, for many service providers, there is no shortage of clients right now." Therefore, "with relatively limited resources, the goal should be to reach those now known to be most in need of assistance. There is not enough information about those who are not yet known to service providers (and who may never be found) to hold funds in reserve for needs that may prove to be speculative."[245]

The proposals indicated that while these emergency-level needs were vast, they were not limitless. Depending upon the amount of the residual funds, if any, it might be possible to assist the very neediest victims with food, winter relief and emergency financial aid, while still having enough funds remaining to address other victim needs as well. Should residual funds remain, it was possible that home health care, medical assistance and other programs also could be supported.[246]

Based on the needs presented, it was recommended that any residual funds be allocated as follows:

> 1. The first priority should be the provision of food and winter relief for those in need of this sustenance. Emergency cash grants also should be made to survivors facing sudden and unexpected crises…[T]hese are essentially the same cy pres humanitarian assistance programs now in effect for the Looted Assets Class...[T]he main (although not sole) beneficiaries of this "first tranche" of residual funds, should such funds exist, are the Nazi victims living in Central and Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union. The emergency financial assistance programs will provide aid to victims in all parts of the world.
> 2. [T]he second priority should be the provision of home health care and medicines/medical equipment, where the needs are otherwise unmet by governmental or other programs. The potential beneficiaries reside all over the world: in the United States and Israel,…but also in the FSU, Central and Eastern Europe and elsewhere.
> 3. The third priority should be the provision of additional assistance such as case management services, mental health care and support groups.[247]

4. The Hearing on the Allocation of Possible Residual Funds

The Court held a hearing on the Special Masters' recommendations. A total of 63 individuals spoke at the hearing, including many survivors, who described their experiences during the Holocaust and their financial hardships as they aged.[248]

Some speakers urged that it was premature to consider allocating "residual" funds while bank account claims were still being analyzed, among them then-New York State Banking [248] Transcript of Civil Cause for Hearing Before the Honorable Edward R. Korman, United States Chief District Judge, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (Apr. 29, 2004) ("Residual Funds Hearing Transcript") (Table of Contents).

Superintendent, whose Holocaust Claims Processing Office ("HCPO") worked closely with the CRT on a number of Deposited Assets claims. The Banking Superintendent observed:

> Based on our experience, the Banking Department is aware of the difficulties encountered by those trying to research [bank] claims and that's what information has survived in the banks through often fragmentary information claimants can provide.
>
> [T]he Banking Department's Holocaust [C]laims [P]rocessing [O]ffice has been working closely with the CRT office in an effort to expedite those claims to Swiss bank accounts. While only five percent of the CRT claims originated with our department, more than ten percent of the CRT's payments to date have been made to claimants who have worked with us.
>
> I say this to illustrate that I know whereof I speak. This is hard, exhausting and exhaustive work, as you know. We are clearly faced with a Herculean task. The overwhelming majority of claims remain unresolved. This is the main reason I would respectfully submit to you, Judge Korman, that before this court determines how to allocate any so-called residual funds, the CRT be given an opportunity to complete its work on the claims it has received.
> Until this has been achieved, there is no accurate means of determining just what may be left [of] so called residual funds. Moreover, I must confess that from where I sit, as difficult as it may be for those representing so many commendable projects here today, I rather hope that there be no funds left. That is, I sincerely hope that we can identify as many rightful owners of bank accounts as possible and extend awards to their heirs as quickly as possible. That is what I have always understood our priority to be.[249]

Many participants at the hearing noted their agreement with "the legal and moral obligation initially to take every step possible to provide for the claims of the deposited assets class prior to the creation of the residual fund,"[250] but also offered specific suggestions about how to spend any residual that might remain. The comments were diverse. Several speakers

Holocaust survivors Greta Beer and Alice Fischer, both of whom had spent decades seeking their respective fathers' accounts, and who played leading roles in the late 1990s in bringing the issue of Swiss bank accounts to the public's attention, also urged the Court not to reallocate Deposited Assets Class funds until that claims process had been completed.

advocated on behalf of survivors in the U.S. Others spoke on behalf of survivors in Israel and in the former Soviet Union. Some advocated in favor of non-Jewish class members, including Roma, homosexual and Jehovah's Witness survivors; others asked that memorial and educational projects be embraced; and others urged the Court to recall and compensate the institutions that had been looted during the Nazi era.

The following examples typify the wide-ranging testimony provided at the hearing:

- On the needs of survivors in the U.S.:
    - Representative of a Jewish Charitable Organization: "[E]ven while acknowledging and supporting the great need for commemoration, remembrance and research, we are in agreement that the basic human needs of Nazi victims must be taken care of first. We agree that in the event that there are unclaimed residual funds to distribute, the provision of food, shelter and emergency aid for the desperately needy Nazi victims represents the first priority for humanitarian assistance. The Federation System of North America fully recognizes that conditions of Jewish survivors in the former Soviet Union are among the most difficult in the world. Indeed, the Federation System itself has long been committed to helping these populations through regular and special fundraising campaigns. We recognize, as well, the distressed condition of many survivors in the State of Israel and elsewhere. We also appreciate your recognition of the urgent needs of an extremely vulnerable segment of Nazi victims in the United States, especially in the home health care and medical areas. We welcome your acknowledgment that the safety net system in the US has serious flaws resulting in significant unmet needs."[251]
    - Representative of Certain U.S. survivors: "I would like to think that I speak on behalf of the dead. They, too should be factored into these proceedings. The dead cannot make monetary claims but the dead have the right to assert moral claims on all of us. The task before you, Judge Korman, is an unenviable one. It is a true [S]olomonic dilemma…Yet, as you have indicated, you intend to disproportionately favor the survivors of the Former Soviet Union in your allocation decision. They will ultimately receive a greater amount of the settlement proceeds. Regardless of their proportionate numbers, regardless of the needs of the Holocaust survivors who lived elsewhere anywhere in the world and regardless of where there is a direct connection between the origins of these looted assets and the property lost by the survivors of the former Soviet Union during the war."[252]

- Counsel for Certain U.S. Survivors: "[M]y client[s] object...about the timing issue, about the indefinite delay about letting more money be available for looted assets. And they object to the allocation formula...[T]here is something of a sort of safety net in this country and some Americans have access to it. We're not disputing that. But the New York City Federation Study and the poverty study of those survivors makes it extremely clear that a large, large number of the poor survivors in this community do not have access to many of those social safety nets...[T]he assumption that the social safety net eliminates the poverty level, we don't believe is well founded…[M]y client[s'] position is the looted assets funds should be allocated to survivors in need wherever they live. And that due to the substantial needs that exist in the US, the FSU and Israel, that the only allocation formula that satisfies [Federal] Rule [of Civil Procedure] 23 in our view and one that benefits … the class as a whole is one based upon each country's relative share of the survivors of Nazi victim population."[253]

- On Jewish and Roma survivors in the FSU and Central and Eastern Europe:

  - Representative of the JDC: "Today, in the former Soviet Union, the JDC using funds from restitution sources, including from this [C]ourt under the Swiss Bank[s] settlement, as well as the Claims Conference, is caring for over 120,000 Jewish victims of Nazi persecution. JDC also cares for a similar number of poor elderly Jews in the FSU using charitable donations … from the American Federation System. As someone who has observed poverty deprivation around the Jewish world, I can clearly state that these elderly Jews in the FSU and in particular the victims of Nazi persecution are the poorest, neediest Jews on earth. However, JDC strongly supports the notion that all Holocaust survivors in desperate need wherever they reside in the world deserve help."[254]

  - Representative of the IOM: "That Roma survivors in Eastern and Central Europe are old and increasingly infirm[], is no surprise. This comes with the passage of time. Yet two other factors set them apart, their numbers and their needs…. IOM estimate[s] that almost 145,000 very needy former victims in the region could benefit from its humanitarian assistance. That count is based on multiple sources, the foremost IOM's first hand field experience in building the current program from the ground up... Four years ago, the Court saw fit to hear their cry [Roma victims] and to respond … with a measure of modest, if still life

In addition, the Court observed that the "looted assets class is for people who lost assets[,] not for people who necessarily suffered. It's a class of people who lost assets. sustaining, recognition. Recognition to which the old Roma respond with tears and disbelief that someone might really wish to help, asking nothing in return."[255]

- On survivors in Israel:

  - Representative of the Israeli Ministry of Finance: In recent decades, "the standard of living in Israel actually deteriorated compared with the level in the U.S. And again [it] is widening over the last 30 years. This was the situation before the year 2000. In the year 2000, especially in the last quarter of the year 2000, the Israeli economy experienced two major shocks [ ]. And the first one, the most important one was the start of Palestinian terrorism which affected many segments of the economy … but gradually, over time, it also affected private consumption, investment, foreign investment and domestic investment. The other major shock which occurred at the same time was the global high tech crisis. And Israel is much more dependent [on] the global high tech market than any other country in the world, including the U.S."[256]

  - Counsel for the State of Israel: "We know that there are 19 percent [of elderly in Israel] living below the Israeli poverty line. That's 95,000 survivors... And the Israeli poverty line at today's exchange rates is $382 a month for a context. We know that there are 19 percent of the Israeli elderly who face food insecurity of some kind. That's 95,000 survivors. And we know that 17 percent of the elderly who [are] Israeli recorded that they cannot afford the cost of calling or visiting their own children."[257]

  - Representative for the State of Israel: "I think the … good intention is to enhance the survival of the Shoah survivors but I feel that the distinction between food and fuel on the one hand and basic health care not otherwise covered is one that … is difficult to follow especially when the able assistance in our case cannot ignore the need to preserve basic human dignity of those assisted. A person needs to be sufficiently healthy in order to be able to absorb food. And separation between the two things [is] artificial and hard to explain on nullity grounds."[258]

- On alternatives to the Court-approved cy pres remedy:

  - Member of Settlement Class Counsel: "[T]he legal standards to be applied here based upon [the] Agent Orange [line of class action cases concerning the cy pres remedy] is that when money cannot be distributed on a claims made basis, the Court may look to an equivalent distribution based on cy pres to the entire class.

But what the Court can't do, I submit, is to single out a subclass of the neediest and say that that satisfies the [A]gent [O]range standard. It is a question of matching the persons to be benefitted with the people in the class. There has to be congruence between the people being benefitted and the people in that subclass because your Honor has ruled and the [S]econd [C]ircuit has upheld the fact that we cannot do distribution to the looted assets sub class based on a claims made basis. I accept that. However, the Court then has to come up with a solution for a cy pres award which benefits the entire class... The next point I wish to make is that the proposal that I made on behalf of the class is the only proposal that satisfied the Second Circuit criteria for a cy pres distribution. I propose the reimbursement of medical expenses or medical insurance premiums up to $1,000 to all members of the — actually I was proposing it to the Holocaust survivor members of the looted assets subclass... [T]here is an issue between survivors and heirs, which your Honor is very familiar with and which we tried to deal with to some extent in the settlement agreement. The — dealing with healthcare [sic] satisfies a universal need… It's egalitarian. You give people freedom of choice. They don't have to be handed food packs. Some people may prefer food packs but I believe it's relatively small compared to all those who would prefer to be given legal tender or a reimbursement procedure where they decide."[259]

- On memorial, educational and institutional projects:

  - Counsel for Certain Roma Survivors: "Every Romani who died lost assets. They didn't do much with the banks. They don't have much in bank deposits in all probability although there were some rich, you know, in Romani[a] and Poland and elsewhere. They did wear gold and they kept their assets in the gold because … they could hang on to it and protect it and they lost all of that. Even in refugees and slave labor, they're vastly underrepresented because they're hard to find…Now this fund [proposed to support educational programs for Roma] [is] headed by first what I would consider the preeminent Romani leader in the world. He has spent his life on that matter, pretty much … [H]e has served a term on the … U.S. Holocaust Memorial [Museum]. The board is made up of Romani leaders and heads of Romani organizations. . ."[260]

  - Counsel for Certain Homosexual Survivors: The proposal on behalf of educational and memorial projects relating to homosexual Nazi victims "was intended to address not only the unique problems faced by gay victims in participating in the looted assets class and in cy pres distribution in connection with that class, but also with respect to participation in any of the other classes, deposited assets, slave labor[,] refugee[s], in which those victimized because of their homosexuality might be included. It's now virtually impossible to identify more than a small handful of survivors of the Nazi persecution of gay victims.

[259] Member of Settlement Class Counsel, Residual Funds Hearing Transcript, at 140-42. The Court observed at the hearing that the proposed medical insurance plan would cover survivors for a few months, at most.

[260] Counsel for Certain Roma Survivors, Residual Funds Hearing Transcript, at 294-297.

These victims are largely lost in the historic records and to meaningful inclusion in the claims process and this class action. For this reason, we've sought a cy pres allocation of a very small, modest amount of funds left over after all things are paid …. We are asking for just that very small portion of the proposal be for the coalition to distribute humanitarian financial assistance consistent with the Court's priority of using cy pres funds to help those in need, the seven needy gay survivors who have been identified world wide after all of these years, only seven men left who would qualify as needy who can even be found." [261]

- Representative of a Jewish Charitable Organization: I am here primarily to make a … moral case or perhaps a legal case on behalf of a group that to this point, at least, has been totally ignored in this settlement and also more generally in the entire restitution process. And the group that I am speaking about are those institutions of Jewish learning and of Jewish communal life that were sought to be destroyed by the Nazis and have since been recreated and rebuilt in various parts of the world, whether in the United States or in Israel or in the countries of destruction themselves in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. And while, of course, we support and believe there is an extraordinary moral claim on behalf of survivors themselves to receive substantial allocations to help make their final years on this earth more comfortable, more pleasant where the [S]pecial [M]aster has pointed out very correctly in his report in many cases, livable all together. It's not just a question of comfort but it's life itself. And it's no question that they have a very substantial moral claim on restitution assets generally and on Swiss Bank funds specifically. But there's also a moral claim on behalf of the institutions here. The settlement specifically spoke of victims who were targets of Nazi persecution as including not only individuals but also any community, congregation, group, organization or other entity which was persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish [or] various other groups. And this recognition builds directly into the settlement agreement, thus far at least, has not achieved any tangible recognition as the settlement process has moved forward…. [T]here seems to have been some definitive determination that, in fact, an entire category, an entire group that is part of the class will be excluded from any benefits under the settlement."[262]

Following the all-day public hearing, certain appeals were filed with the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, and later with the United States Supreme Court.

D. The Appeals to and Decisions of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

Three different appeals were brought in the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Each appeal related to the cy pres remedy. The Court of Appeals upheld the District Court's decisions, observing that the allocation and distribution process had been conducted in an "exemplary" manner.

1. The Appeal by Certain U.S. Survivors

Certain U.S. survivors contended that the allocation to the Looted Assets Class "inappropriately relied on geographic differences in Holocaust survivors' needs because these needs are largely a function of historical events that followed the injuries inflicted by the Nazi regime and by the Swiss bank defendants."[263] The Court of Appeals upheld the District Court's allocation. "[I]n the circumstances presented by this case, we think the equitable principles of the cy pres doctrine permit the geographic variation that the District Court adopted. As that Court pointed out, survivors residing in the FSU had been cut off by the Soviet regime from the ten prior major efforts at Holocaust reparations, and of the $53 billion that has been provided to Holocaust victims through these prior efforts, $14.8 billion or 28% has gone to survivors in the United States and only $444 million or 0.8% has gone to survivors in the FSU. This extraordinary circumstance understandably prompted the District Court to consider the variation in current financial need in making the geographic allocation."[264]

The Court of Appeals noted that "[l]ike appellants, we are unaware of any other court that has relied on this particular combination of factors in allocating settlement funds" — namely, "the history of previous compensation efforts, material deprivations associated with decades of life under a Communist regime and the effects of that regime's collapse, and access to family and community support networks." However, "unlike appellants, we believe that consideration of these factors, in the circumstances presented, was entirely appropriate and well within the wide discretion afforded to the District Court."[265]

The Court of Appeals also held that there was no particular "share" of the fund to which certain categories of survivors were entitled. "We find no legal or equitable support for [appellants'] view" that "Jewish Holocaust survivors who reside in the United States today are legally entitled to a particular share of the settlement fund based on their total number (rather than the number of needy survivors among them)."[266] "[F]rom the perspective of the worldwide population of needy Holocaust survivors — the population for the benefit of which the funds allocated to the Looted Assets Class are being distributed — there is nothing equitable about an allocation methodology that provides the 'relatively few needy survivors' in the United States 'with a disproportionate benefit solely because of the overall size of the survivor community in the United States.'"[267]

The Court of Appeals expressed regret that "[m]ore than six years after the creation of the settlement fund, the desired harmony among its beneficiaries has not been achieved. Indeed, the instant appeal is but one of a series of challenges to the District Court's allocation and distribution orders. Yet the objections raised by appellants here — and the zeal with which these objections have been pursued — have in no way undermined the thoughtful analysis and scrupulous fairness with which Chief Judge Korman has approached every step of this litigation."[268] Similarly, the Court of Appeals rejected the claim that there had been a "flawed judicial process." "To the contrary, the careful consideration that the District Court, the Special Master, and the Lead Settlement Counsel have accorded to every step in the allocation and distribution of this historic settlement has been exemplary."[269]

2. Appeals on Behalf of Certain Homosexual and Disabled Survivors

a. Appeal on Behalf of Certain Homosexual Survivors

It was stated on appeal that "under these circumstances — where extensive efforts to locate victims of Nazi persecution against homosexuals have yielded only a handful of individuals — the District Court 'lacked discretion' to allocate residual settlement funds solely for the benefit of needy Holocaust survivors."[270] The appellants "contend that so few victims of Nazi persecution against homosexuals have been located that the District Court was obligated to take the further steps of allocating funds for scholarly, educational, and outreach efforts."[271]

The Court of Appeals held that while the District Court had "discretion to adopt" this proposal, there was no obligation to do so.[272] Further, there was "no support for the proposition that a group entitlement to a particular share of the settlement fund had ever been contemplated, much less established." Although the District Court had adopted a "90/10 formula" (i.e., allocating 90% of Looted Assets funds to Jewish class members and 10% to Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members), that "formula permitted the District Court to utilize social agencies with experience in serving particular communities for the day-to-day distribution of funds to needy individual victims. This administrative process took advantage of existing community ties to facilitate the distribution of funds to individual victims, but we find no evidence that this process vested any rights in the relevant communities themselves."[273]

Finally, the Court of Appeals was not persuaded by the argument that "'[b]y not providing for any real distribution from the settlement funds to homosexual victims as such, the District Court joined the long-standing historical refusal to recognize the suffering of thousands of homosexuals who remained forgotten victims of Nazi persecution for decades after the end of the Third Reich.'" The Court of Appeals stated that "[a]lthough the District Court concluded that payments to needy Holocaust survivors take priority over the scholarly, educational and outreach programs proposed by [appellants], it never underplayed the suffering caused by Nazi persecutions against homosexuals."[274]

The Court of Appeals observed that "[f]or over six years, Judge Korman and Special Master Gribetz have pursued the monumental challenge of allocating limited funds among the victims of a limitless atrocity. Although appellants agree that the District Court's task is 'unenviable,' they nonetheless contend that the Court erroneously rejected [appellants'] request .... We now hold that the District Court acted within its discretion by rejecting [appellants'] proposal and concluding that the neediest among the identifiable survivors — be they Jewish, homosexual, Jehovah's Witnesses, disabled or Romani — must first be brought some comfort in the final years of their lives."[275]

b. Appeal on Behalf of Certain Disabled Survivors

It was contended that a percentage of the fund needed to be allocated for the benefit of disabled Holocaust victims. Although individual survivors were difficult to find, the fund would be put to use for memorial and educational projections on behalf of those victims. It was also stated that notice had been "inadequate," and that disabled class members had not been accorded due process.[276]

The Court of Appeals noted that its disposition of the issues raised on behalf of certain homosexual survivors "foreclose[d] the bulk of the claims raised by appellants here." "We fully recognize that the historical and current challenges facing Holocaust survivors who are members of the disabled community are in many respects distinct from those facing survivors who are members of the gay and lesbian community. We nonetheless hold that our rejection of the appeal [on behalf of certain homosexual survivors] compels us likewise to reject appellants' claim that the District Court exceeded its discretion by declining to adopt [its] proposal."[277]

E. The Appeal to the United States Supreme Court

Following the ruling by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, certain U.S. challengers stated, in a petition seeking leave to appeal to the United States Supreme Court, that the adoption of a cy pres remedy in the Swiss Banks Settlement was "unlawful."

In earlier court proceedings, the appellants ("petitioners" in the U.S. Supreme Court) had not made that argument. For example, the Second Circuit, in its 2005 decision, had described "the aspects of the District Court's opinion that [the] appellants are not challenging. Appellants do not dispute that the District Court may, as a general matter and in the appropriate circumstances, distribute settlement proceeds to the neediest class members, pursuant to the cy pres doctrine…. Rather, they question whether the District Court exceeded the bounds of that general principle in this case by allocating funds partly on the basis of geographic disparities in the provision of basic needs."[278] The Second Circuit also had noted that the appellants "d[id] not dispute the findings that underlie the District Court's initial decision to distribute the settlement funds in this case to the neediest class members — namely, the findings that (1) a case-by-case valuation of Looted Assets Class members' claims, 'would have resulted in an unwieldy and enormously expensive apparatus,' and (2) '[a] pro rata distribution would have resulted in the payment of literally pennies to each of the millions of individuals who would fall into' the Looted Assets Class."[279] The Second Circuit indicated in its 2005 ruling that such a submission at that stage of the proceedings probably would have been moot, as "[i]n any event, we have previously affirmed the District Court's use of a cy pres remedy in this case."

In their appeal to the Supreme Court, the petitioners questioned the legality of the "use of a cy pres remedy in this case."[280]

> To be perfectly clear, it is and has been Petitioners' position that distribution of funds based on current need, unrelated to the claims being resolved, is unlawful. Period. [Citation omitted.] Petitioners do not endorse current need as a distribution criterion, whether applied across or within national boundaries. They > proposed various solutions such as having state insurance commissioners use settlement proceeds to fund an insurance policy that would be available to all survivors, not just the needy. Petitioners' position was and remains that the funds belong equally to all Looted Assets Class members.[281]

Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne noted, in response, that prior to the certiorari petition, the petitioners had supported a distribution that was to be based upon "need." For example, the September 10, 2003 challenge to the District Court's Looted Assets allocation ruling urged the funds to be allocated to the needy, "to meet the human services needs of Class members who are currently being underserved…." Similarly, its "January 30, 2004 submission to the District Court [was] denominated as a "Plan For Providing Assistance For Needy Nazi Victims in the United States."[282]

Professor Neuborne noted that the certiorari petition did not align with other statements by the organization to which the petitioners belonged, "which has consistently urged the District Court to allocate Looted Assets funds for the relief of needy survivors, albeit pursuant to a 'national residence quota' formula that would benefit needy survivors residing in the United States."[283] Professor Neuborne further noted that challenges seeking "proportional geographic distribution" had not been accepted by the District Court and the Court of Appeals.[284]

The Forward, a New York-based newspaper focusing on matters of interest to the Jewish community, stated in an editorial that the Supreme Court appeal "could undermine the settlement and threaten the larger process of Holocaust restitution."[285] With the appeal, it was > theoretically possible that the whole structure of Holocaust restitution could collapse if the cases were forced back into court. The one major class-action suit that did go to court [in contrast to settling], a slave labor case against two German companies, was thrown out in 1999 by a federal judge in New Jersey because it had no legal merit. The judge, Dickinson Debevoise, wrote in a devastating, 90-page opinion that questions of restoring property and reconstituting a world

> The Debevoise ruling has hung over every restitution negotiation since then. European governments negotiated anyway, because they faced the moral pressure of their wartime roles, coupled with the combined political pressure of Washington, Jerusalem and world Jewry. But the major agreements were reached ages ago, in the uncharted time before 2001, the intifada and the Iraq War. It's not at all clear that the political and moral calculus operating in Europe in 1999 would look the same in 2006. On the contrary.

One of the Plaintiffs' Settlement Counsel, who had raised a question about the cy pres programs at the residual funds hearing, also sought Supreme Court review. He contended that the Court of Appeals decision "fails to apply any legal standard for cy pres distribution," and that the "distribution is also highly contentious."[286] Predicting that minimal additional distributions would be made for Deposited Assets Class claims, he stated that the "amount available for discretionary distribution by the lower court in the instant case — about $700 million — is far in excess of any amount ever distributed on a discretionary basis by any federal court…. An Article III court is not a foundation and should not take on the [mantle] of a foundation." He further claimed that the "lower court used two factors totally unrelated to the cause of action or settlement in awarding 75% of $205 million to class members: financial need, and residence in former 'iron curtain' countries. While the gesture may be admirable and the recipients worthy, the legal justification is lacking."[287]

In response, Professor Neuborne stated that this challenge was premature and did not raise "an Article III case or controversy." The attorney petitioner had made "no effort to challenge the District Court's past cy pres distribution orders, conceding that he supported the distribution of cy pres funds in the Court below, and that his concerns in this Court are purely prospective in nature."[288] Professor Neuborne explained that it was uncertain what residual funds, if any, would remain from the allocation to the Deposited Assets Class because of a proposal that recently had been filed by CRT Special Master Helen Junz. The proposal could significantly increase the Deposited Assets Class payments, and limit the availability of residual funds.

> [B]eginning in May, 2004, Special Master Junz meticulously compared the awards in the cases for which information exists concerning the actual balance in a given account with the presumed value awards, and discovered that the presumed value averages appear to understate significantly the actual value of Holocaust-victim owned accounts. Accordingly, on March 31, 2006, … Special Master Junz recommended a substantial retroactive re-valuation of the presumed value awards which, when added to the additional awards currently in process, would exhaust the $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class, leaving little or no settlement funds for residual cy pres distribution. The revaluation issue is currently under active consideration in the District Court.[289]

Professor Neuborne also questioned whether there was standing to bring the cross-petition for certiorari, in that no specific individuals had been identified as being represented in the appeal.[290]

On June 19, 2006, the Supreme Court denied certiorari.[291] The Supreme Court's decision thus left intact the decision of the United States Court of Appeals, as well as the District Court's earlier opinions, directing the greatest share of the funds allocated for humanitarian aid to the neediest victims.[292]

F. After the Supreme Court Litigation: The Legal Challenges to Special Master Junz's Presumptive Value Recommendations

For Deposited Assets Class claims, "presumptive values," or average values, were utilized to determine the amount of an award for a particular Holocaust-era Swiss bank account, where bank records containing the actual valuation data no longer existed. To fill the gap posed by incomplete bank records, which may have documented the existence of an account but contained no information about the account's value, awards were made at designated "average" amounts based on the type of account. These average amounts — or "presumptive values" — were assigned by the Volcker Committee auditors early in the claims process, and were part of the CRT Rules. The amounts varied depending on the type of the account: savings; demand deposit; custody; safe deposit box; account of unknown type; and other (accounts not falling into the above categories). The presumptive value for a savings account was calculated at a 1945 value of SF 830; for a demand deposit account, SF 2,140; for a custody account, SF 13,000; for a safe deposit box, SF 1,240; for an account of unknown type, SF 3,950; and for other accounts, SF 2,200. A multiplier ranging from 10 at the outset to 12.5 by the end of the claims process was applied to bring these amounts to current values.

In mid-2004, CRT Special Master Junz alerted the Court that she intended to submit a proposal to increase presumptive values for certain types of Swiss bank accounts, which would likely significantly increase payments to Deposited Assets Class members, and thus decrease any residual funds that might remain from the up to $800 million allocated to bank account claims. Her reassessment was based upon her analysis of bank records and other documents that had not been made available when the Deposited Assets Class program began, but were later obtained because of the ongoing insistence that the banks cooperate with the claims process. Special Master Junz's proposal, and the Court's ultimate decision to adopt her recommendations, is described in detail elsewhere in this Final Report.[293]

The State of Israel and certain U.S. survivors took issue with CRT Special Master Junz's proposal, stating that

- the reassessment of average account values was not warranted because the original values had been assigned by the auditors for the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ("ICEP," led by Chairman Paul A. Volcker);
- new information about Swiss bank accounts located by the CRT that had been unavailable at the time of the audit should not impact account values; and

- accounts in the category ICEP had reported as "closed unknown to whom" should not be taken into consideration in determining average values.

Special Master Junz's new recommendations followed the valuation principles proposed in other Holocaust compensation contexts. Her expertise was acknowledged in other areas, such as in the case of Holocaust-era insurance policies, where Special Master Junz's guidance had been sought in an effort to ensure that Holocaust victims and heirs were repaid, as closely as possible, for the value of what had been taken.[294] However, in the case of Swiss bank accounts, some of her recommendations were questioned.

1. The State of Israel's Objections to the Presumptive Value Recommendations in the Context of Programs for Israeli Survivors

a. Israel's Objections

The State of Israel did not support Special Master Junz's recommendation to increase many presumptive values (and thus increase many Deposited Assets awards, leaving less of a residual fund) because the proposal was said to be "premised on what appears to be unsound [294] As Professor Neuborne pointed out in his April 23, 2010 Declaration concerning the presumptive value issue:

> The Court is not alone in relying upon Dr. Junz' expertise. So, too, has the State of Israel, as a member of the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC). ICHEIC sought expert assistance "on the overall volume and estimated value of potential claims" and so created a "task force to report on the estimated number and value of insurance policies held by Holocaust victims." The task force "was staffed by outside experts as well as ICHEIC members." See Statement of the Honorable Lawrence S. Eagleburger and Diane Koken, Former Chairman and Vice Chairman, International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, before the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on International Operations and Organizations, Democracy, and Human Rights, Hearing on "Holocaust-Era Insurance Restitution After ICHEIC," May 6, 2008 (Statement of Eagleburger/Koken), at 5-6. One of the "outside experts" was "economist[] ... Helen Junz, a member of the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States who assisted the Volcker Committee with a project on estimating the size and structure of the wealth of the Jewish population in Nazi-affected countries before World War II ...." The task force prepared an analysis which "provided data that allowed [ICHEIC] to assess the scope and size of the European pre-Holocaust insurance market relevant to Holocaust victims and their heirs." Among other things, the report prepared by Dr. Junz and other experts on behalf of the State of Israel and its fellow members of ICHEIC "estimat[ed] the average value of life insurance policies, based on the scope of the insurance market and the size of the Jewish population in each country." Statement of Eagleburger/Koken, at 6. In other words, the State of Israel, as a member of ICHEIC, sought out Dr. Junz for her expertise in determining the average value of one type of Holocaust-era asset: insurance policies. This seems to have contrasted with its decision to question Dr. Junz' ability to analyze the average value of another Holocaust-era asset: a Swiss bank account.

methodology and analysis."[295] Special Master Junz's proposal, it was stated, would detrimentally impact "the large number of needy survivors living in Israel — especially those survivors who emigrated from the Former Soviet Union (FSU)…. If this Court approves an upward adjustment to the presumed values for the Deposited Assets Class, the funds available to the Looted Assets Class will be significantly less than expected. Needy class members in Israel will be hit harder by the decrease in available funds due to the over-weighted allocation to FSU countries in the previous allocations. Notably, these allocations did not take into … account the large migration of the neediest class members from the FSU countries to Israel."[296] Relying upon a report on neediness among Israeli Holocaust survivors, Israel stated that more FSU Holocaust victims lived in Israel (180,000) than remained in the FSU (146,000), and that "a very substantial portion of the most needy class members (118,000) are immigrants to Israel from Russia and other poverty-stricken regions of the FSU."[297]

The State of Israel stated that although it had "unequivocally supported the Court's determination to exhaust all reasonable efforts to locate and provide compensation to members of the Deposited Asset [sic] Class," it would now be "inconsistent with the Court's duties to assure fairness to all members of the class" to adopt the presumptive value recommendations, particularly since it was unclear whether the District Court's determination (also adopted by the Second Circuit) that only the Deposited Assets Class claims had legal merit, would prevail. "[A]ny forecast or projection by this Court of the strength of the Looted Asset[s] Class' claims was just that — a projection. No one can say how such claims might have fared as a matter of law in the Second Circuit or the Supreme Court," or that "such claims would have been untenable before a jury."[298]

The filing was submitted in response to the report by Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. In a subsequent filing, the State of Israel reiterated its view that the adoption of Special Master Junz's presumptive value recommendations "would negatively impact the neediest survivors by almost $200 million" and that "[m]any of these class members are unable to meet even the most basic daily needs." The State of Israel advised that "some 176,100 [survivors] … live near or below Israel's poverty line," "146,000 had insufficient heat in the winter," "107,400 had to choose between food and other basic needs," and "86,000 could not afford the cost of calling or visiting their children."[299]

b. Programs for Israeli Survivors

The Court asked the State of Israel to describe its assistance programs for Holocaust victims. In its response, the State of Israel explained that its programs for those who had been in camps and ghettos were more extensive than those for other survivors of the Nazis. The "Settlement Agreement's definition of the [Looted Assets] Class encompasses many individuals who would not meet the requirements for most other programs' support of survivors."[300] The State of Israel noted that Israel's 1957 Disabled Nazi Victim Persecution Law provided a pension to many categories of victims, including those who had fled from the Nazis, but "those who immigrated from the [FSU] in the 1970s and 1990s, are ineligible for benefits." A different survivor assistance program, the "Hashava" fund, also did not apply to those who had fled.

As part of a separate program addressed by a "November 2007 Government resolution," Israel had increased its budget for social services for the Shoah survivors," including those "who fall within the Court's definition of 'survivor' but outside [] the definitions operative in Israeli law,"[301] but not in equal amounts. Pursuant to Resolution 3940 ("The Benefits for Shoah Survivors Law"), financial assistance to survivors had been increased in accordance with the [300] Letter from Counsel for the State of Israel to Hon. Edward R. Korman, United States District Judge, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (May 7, 2010). Seventeen major worldwide Jewish organizations, including the Jewish Agency for Israel, had signed formal "Endorsements" of the Settlement Agreement, including the Settling Parties' (not the Court's) broad definition of the Looted Assets Class, covering virtually anyone in the five "victim or target" groups who was looted.

"Group" to which the individual belonged. Thus, those "who were imprisoned in a concentration camp, ghetto, or forced labor camp and do not receive monthly assistance" were eligible for an "annual 'replenishing' grant of $545", a monthly pension of $285, and an annual "'recuperation' fee of $1,938." Those "who are entitled to monthly payments from the Claims Conference Hardship Fund" (i.e., primarily individuals who had lived in the FSU and had fled) were not eligible for the monthly pension or "recuperation fee," but would receive the annual $545 grant. Survivors who had not previously received compensation would receive the annual $545 grant, another annual grant of $1,167, and "10% rent aid."[302]

The State of Israel advised that its population of "approximately 180,000 individuals who fled the Nazis or suffered at the hands of the Nazis or their collaborators but never endured a concentration camp, ghetto or forced labor camp," like "all elderly Israeli citizens," were entitled to various social services. These included an average monthly pension of $484; rent, transportation and phone bill discounts; and electricity subsidies. Even with this help, which "allow[ed] some flight victims to meet their daily needs, the poorest of them cannot stretch the benefits to cover basic necessities in a country that struggles with a notoriously high cost of living." The State of Israel noted that "neediness persists," and "[a]mong those who suffer the most are the nearly 85,000 survivors who immigrated relatively recently from the Former Soviet Union."[303]

2. Objections by Certain U.S. Survivors

Certain U.S. survivors also did not support Special Master Junz's proposal, stating that it would "radically alter the Settlement in this case, eliminating the likelihood that substantial funds would remain for reallocation to the Looted Assets Class.[304] In addition, the United States government filed a "Statement of Interest," which noted the Court's "broad supervisory powers over the administration of the class-action settlement to equitably allocate proceeds among the claiming class members." The "Statement of Interest" added that "the foreign policy interests of the United States, which favor providing crucial resources to the neediest Holocaust survivors both here and around the world, may be considered by the Court as it determines how best to allocate the remaining settlement funds."[305]

Special Master Junz's recommendations to increase presumptive values followed standards that U.S. survivors had supported in the context of other Holocaust-era property rights programs. For example, the U.S. Congress was asked to enact a law that would permit individuals to bring suit against insurance companies for unreturned Holocaust-era policies. Congress was advised that no stone should be left unturned in locating relevant records relating to their property rights. The U.S. survivors who testified stated that such efforts should be allowed to continue as long as necessary, even if their children and grandchildren eventually had to pursue these insurance claims.[306]

3. The District Court's Presumptive Value Decision

On June 16, 2010, the District Court adopted Special Master Junz's presumptive value proposal, allocating $100 million of the up to $800 million reserved for the Deposited Assets Class to adjust the account values that had been set by the Volcker Committee auditors at the outset of the bank account claims process.[307] The Court observed that "even if the objections had any merit, it would not result in an increase in the award to the Looted Assets Class that the objectors seek." The assumption that the Court "would award the residue to the Looted Assets Class," increasing "the $205 [million] allocation that I have already made to the members of this Class, of which $105 million reflects two earlier upward adjustments" was not accurate.[308]

The letter referred to the "needs of the U.S. survivor community," which it described as "pressing and well-documented," and noted that as the Court "evaluates the proper distribution of the remaining Deposited Assets Class funds, we hope it will give serious consideration to significant social welfare needs of survivors in the Looted Assets Class." Id.

The Court reiterated that the only claims with legal merit were those of the Deposited Assets Class:

> If the Swiss Banks had succeeded in destroying all records indicating the value of particular accounts, thereby making it impossible to establish actual or average values for different categories of accounts, I would have simply divided the award pro rata to those claimants who made a satisfactory showing of an entitlement to an account. Because all of those records were not destroyed, however, there was a reasonable basis on which to judge the average values for particular categories of accounts. No objection was voiced to the calculation of the average values in 2001.
> Dr. Junz, as I have already observed, has simply used data that were not available at the time of the initial audit by the Volcker Committee to recommend an upward adjustment. Nevertheless, even without the new data on which she relied, I would not have taken funds that belonged to the Deposited Assets Class and awarded them to members of the Looted Assets Class. Instead, I would have done something comparable to the intra-subclass pro rata approach described above, and the result for the members of the Looted Assets Class — who were not legally entitled to any award — would not have changed.[309]

Banks could make good on their faults, and the often long-deceased owners of their accounts could receive the dignity they deserved, only if the court made every last attempt to make sure every surviving claimant received exactly their due"). See also id. at 289 (the "'next best' use that would serve the interest of class members," in the event residual funds remained, "would be an allocation to the members of the Deposited Assets Class and not to the members of another class whose claims are unsustainable. Indeed, the case for such an intra-subclass cy pres distribution is far stronger than the case for the comparable cy pres distribution to members of the Looted Assets Class. Unlike the members of the latter class, who cannot establish any connection to specific wrongdoing by any Swiss entity that would entitle them to relief, a cy pres distribution within the Deposited Assets Class would benefit only those who have made a satisfactory showing of entitlement to assets deposited in Swiss banks during the Holocaust era").

The Court pointed out that if not for the unique approach adopted for the Looted Assets Class under the Settlement Agreement, there would have been no allocation to the needy at all:

> When it became clear that it would have been administratively inefficient to create an individualized claims process intended to determine, from among more than a million potential claimants, including victims and heirs, what property was looted and whether it was transacted through Switzerland, I adopted a cy pres remedy to benefit the neediest members of the Looted Assets Class whose assets had been presumed to have been looted. But for this program, the neediest survivors would not have been eligible for any special payments whatsoever under the Swiss Banks settlement. The humanitarian aid programs were not negotiated under the settlement by the objectors, nor by any other interested parties. Rather, these assistance programs are the result of the recommendations set forth in the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, and my agreement that the Settlement Fund should provide a measure of meaningful, not token, compensation to members of the Looted Assets Class. Because of the adoption of this intra-subclass cy pres remedy, more than 231,000 [and ultimately over 237,400] needy survivors throughout the world have received food, medical assistance, emergency grants, winter relief and similar aid through Court-funded programs.[310]

Accordingly, Special Master Junz's recommendations were adopted, increasing presumptive values for most accounts, and authorizing additional payments to many members of the Deposited Assets Class.

4. Allocation of Residual Funds and Subsequent Litigation

After the presumptive value adjustments were made and the bank account payment process neared completion, $54.5 million remained undistributed from the Settlement Fund. Following review of the recommendations of Special Master Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Reig, the Court in 2013 approved the allocation of $50 million in residual funds for programs assisting the neediest Holocaust survivors.

> As I have previously made clear, my intention is to distribute residual funds that might remain to the neediest Holocaust survivors as members of the Looted Assets Class. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F. Supp. 2d 89 (E.D.N.Y. 2004), aff'd, 424 F.3d 132 (2d Cir. 2005). Since the inception of the > distribution process, I have made three allocations of funds to the neediest survivors — $100 million, $60 million; and $45 million — for a total of $205 million. I am pleased now to be able to make a fourth allocation of an additional $50 million from the Settlement Fund, which with the previous additional allocations … now represents a 155% increase over the initial $100 million allocation. These funds will continue to make a significant difference in the lives of many of those who suffered so grievously as a result of Nazi actions and today live with tremendous needs.[311]

The Court "sought an update on current economic conditions for Nazi victims," retaining the "eminent research institution" that "previously had provided the Court with data on Holocaust victims, the Brandeis University Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies & the Steinhardt Institute for Social Research ('Brandeis')."[312]

The Brandeis researchers advised that survivor needs over the years had remained "'essentially the same.'" While there had been some recent "'tangible increases in the humanitarian assistance available to Nazi victims,'" there were also "'new challenges as a result of the global economic crisis that ha[d] exacerbated income inequality. In addition, although the victim population is smaller, it is also more elderly and in need of services. Despite these challenges, the relative deprivation and disparities among victims living in the three regions where most of the population reside — the Former Soviet Union (FSU), the United States, and Israel — remains fairly consistent with what was observed in 2004 [when Brandeis originally had reviewed the data on behalf of the Court]. Although there [were] clearly victims in need across all regions, the victims in need in the FSU struggle[d] with poor conditions of housing, low income, minimal social services, and poor access to health services. Further, they lack[ed] the well-developed and functioning social safety nets that exist[ed] in the United States and Israel.'"[313] Similarly, as to "Roma victims of the Nazis, the situation remain[ed] dire."

Therefore, since conditions were "essentially the same … as when the humanitarian assistance programs were adopted in 2000, and revisited in 2004 in connection with possible additional funding, the residual funds" were to be "allocated in accordance with the original terms of the Distribution Plan." Of the $50 million available, 90% was allocated to needy Jewish victims, of which 75% was allocated to needy victims in the FSU through programs managed by the JDC ($33,750,000 allocated over five years). Of the remaining 25% ($11,250,000 allocated over five years), 12.5% was allocated to needy victims in Israel through programs managed by the Claims Conference, and 12.5% to needy victims in the rest of the world, also through Claims Conference programs. The remaining 10% of the $50 million in residual funds was to be allocated to needy Roma victims through IOM programs ($5,000,000 allocated over 15 months).[314]

By separate order of the same date (May 13, 2013), the Court allocated the remaining $4.5 million in residual funds to the Victim List Project. This was originally a $10 million program created for the benefit of all Class members, which "encourages and helps to organize the compilation and greater accessibility worldwide of the names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement is intended to benefit — Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who perished and those who survived — for research and remembrance."[315]

Certain challenges were filed regarding the Court's appointment of the JDC and the Claims Conference as administrative agents charged with distributing residual funds. Judge Korman addressed these concerns in decisions issued respectively on May 23, 2014 (relating to the JDC) and May 30, 2014 (relating to the Claims Conference).[316] By separate order dated May

The Court noted that the increase in funding would "establish parity between the Victim List Project and the four non-Looted Assets Class programs" that previously had received 45% increases due to tax exemptions and the accrual of interest on the Settlement Fund.

[316] See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849, 2014 WL 2171144 (E.D.N.Y. May 23, 2014) and In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849, 2014 WL 2547582 (E.D.N.Y. May 30, 2014), respectively.

30, 2014, the Court also addressed an objection filed by an individual who had not previously participated or appeared in any proceedings relating to the settlement or its distribution.[317]

With respect to the JDC, that organization had been chosen to administer the funding and programs for the Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU "because the JDC was already on the ground providing assistance to elderly Jewish survivors in need, and my choice of the JDC obviated the necessity to create a new and expensive distribution process."[318] However, the Court now was being asked to "conduct 'a searching investigation and public hearing into their handling of previous allocations.'" The objectors also sought a stay. The Court observed that "[p]resumably, in the interim, these victims would be deprived of the necessities of life. This effort to halt the distribution of assistance to the victims of Nazi persecution in the FSU" would deny or diminish the assistance provided to these victims."[319]

The Court denied the motion for rehearing and for a stay on three grounds. First, there was no legal standing to raise these matters. Second, the submission was based upon facts "long known," and did not "provide the basis for a motion for rehearing. Third and finally, the motion [was] without merit."[320]

As to whether there was legal standing to raise the argument about the JDC, the Court noted that the "beneficiaries of the funds distributed by the JDC are the neediest victims in the FSU;" thus, "whether the JDC or any other entity administers the allocation in the former FSU is of no consequence" to those not living in the FSU. In addition, the process had become more difficult with certain observers "repeatedly suggesting that the survivors living in the FSU (or by the same logic, former FSU survivors who have immigrated to Israel and the United States) are not 'true survivors.'"[321] Several years earlier, the Court noted, they had "petitioned for a writ of certiorari" in which it was stated that "'it is and has been Petitioner's position that distribution of funds based on current need, unrelated to the claims being resolved, is unlawful. Period.'"[322] If this viewpoint had been accepted, it "would have deprived even the needy survivors in the United States, whom they claim to represent, from receiving any assistance based on their need."[323]

As to the second point, Judge Korman observed that the "attack on the integrity of the JDC as the administrator of the funds goes back well over a decade," and thus raised no new arguments.[324]

Finally, the JDC had "responded on the merits to the baseless allegations that have been made against it." The court rejected those arguments, quoting "several paragraphs from the preamble of a United States Senate resolution that was passed [in] December [2013] on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the JDC." In its resolution, the Senate noted the JDC's "'historic and enduring relationship'" with the United States Government. This relationship had "'evolved from cooperating in life-saving work in Europe through the American Relief Administration following World War I and the War Refugee Board during World War II to the more recent partnerships between the JDC and the Department of Agriculture, the Department of State, and the United States Agency for International Development.'" The Senate's resolution — and the Court's decision —observed that the JDC "'creates programs and solutions that benefit the neediest populations in communities around the world and confronts the most difficult challenges, such as natural disasters, extreme poverty, political instability, and genocide.'"[325]

A question also was raised as to whether the Claims Conference should serve as an administrative agent for purposes of distributing residual funds. This was based partly on the fact that there had been a criminal fraud involving a separate program administered by the Claims Conference on behalf of Germany, the Article 2 pension program.[326] The objection was denied on two grounds. First, "after reviewing the record," there was "no justification for the inquisition" being sought. "Second, because of the manner in which the Claims Conference administers the funds for the neediest victims, there is no reasonable likelihood of any impropriety, much less one that could not easily be discovered."[327]

The Court explained:

> Unlike the JDC, the Claims Conference does not directly provide assistance to needy survivors. Instead, it provides funds to agencies who serve that population. As Greg Schneider, the Executive Vice President of the Claims Conference writes in his declaration in response to [this] motion:
>
> > "We have attached a list of all Claims Conference distributions from the Swiss Banks Settlement Looted Assets Class. Each participating agency had ample opportunity, over the course of ten years, to alert the Claims Conference or complain to the Court if any of the funds in question did not reach an intended recipient. Surely, if a sum of money designated for a particular agency was not received, the agency would have made that known. There has not been one such accusation of impropriety."
> Not only [is there no] evidence of a single instance of impropriety with respect to the Claims Conference administration of funds from the Looted Assets Class, but the Claims Conference's current application [for residual funds, in accordance with the five-year program established by order of May 13, 2013] contains a list of every agency to which it intends to provide funds in 2014…. [One] can easily determine by inquiry to those agencies whether the funds designated for them have been received.[328]

[326] In November 2009, the Clams Conference discovered a fraud involving its Article 2 and CEEF programs, perpetrated by certain Claims Conference staff, claimants and third party facilitators. The fraud, which the Claims Conference reported to the FBI, was investigated both by the FBI and the then-United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, Preet Bharara (who thanked the Claims Conference for its cooperation in reporting and investigating the fraud). Several individuals were charged and convicted. The fraud was estimated at approximately $60 million. See Declaration of Greg Schneider in Support of Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany's Opposition to U.S. Survivors' Rule 59 Motion for Rehearing or to Alter or Amend May 13, 2013 Orders Allocating Remaining Settlement Funds, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. [328] Id. (citation omitted).

The Court noted that the Claims Conference had allocated "'several billion dollars'" in funding over the years for "'welfare programs which provide, among other support, homecare, emergency assistance, and medicine for the benefit of hundreds of thousands of Holocaust survivors worldwide. And no independent fraud has been found related to the social welfare funds and programs administered by the Claims Conference.'"[329]

In addition, needy survivors in the U.S. were to receive 4% of the allocation (i.e., $356,500 in 2014), and there had been no showing "sufficient to justify a stay, even for the expenditure of $356,500." As to the remaining funds allocated through the Claims Conference, "$1,102,500 [was] for needy survivors in Israel." While the State of Israel "ha[d] previously appeared in this action on behalf of those survivors," it had objected neither to the residual allocation nor to the "Claims Conference's proposed distribution for 2014." There was "no standing to object to the Claims Conference's administration of Looted Assets funds for any country other than the United States."[330]

Finally, as to the integrity of the Claims Conference, the Court called "attention to a letter of Stuart Eizenstat. Mr. Eizenstat has served in various positions in the administration of Presidents Carter and Clinton," including Deputy Secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton Administration. "Mr. Eizenstat led the team from the Claims Conference that negotiated an agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany that provide[d] for 'approximately $1 billion over the four year period, 2014-2017, for homecare for Jewish Nazi victims, with the annual amount increasing every year through 2017.'"[331] In a letter to the Claims Conference's Chairman, Ambassador Eizenstat had "express[ed] his gratitude to Greg Schneider, the Executive Vice President of the Claims Conference, for his contribution to that agreement."

The Court quoted the letter as follows: "I wanted to personally let you know of my gratitude to Greg Schneider for having the vision and drive to organize this campaign, which has culminated in this agreement. Greg has [made] it a priority to gather detailed information and data on the growing plight of aging Nazi victims and present it to the German government in an effective and compelling fashion in order to demonstrate their increasing needs to the German government. His dedication and professionalism are above and beyond what could be expected, and he made it clear throughout this process that he was absolutely committed to obtaining the funding to which the Finance Ministry ultimately agreed. Greg's passion and integrity are well appreciated by our German government interlocutors. The lives of tens of thousands of Holocaust victims will be made easier in their old age due to Greg's skill and vision."

The Court denied the motion for rehearing and a stay, observing that the "needy Holocaust survivors have benefitted from the extraordinary efforts of Mr. Schneider and the Claims Conference. They deserve praise, rather than scorn, for their work."[332]

The Court also denied a motion to intervene that had been filed by an individual who had never previously been involved with the lawsuit, settlement or distribution process until 2013. The individual cited "various grievances" concerning "the manner in which the JDC was distributing money in Poland."[333] The Court stated that the main concern "was that the JDC has not provided Beit Warszawa, a so called 'registered Jewish Progressive community in Poland,' which 'seeks a portion of the settlement fund,' with sufficient funds."[334] The motion to intervene was denied for three reasons: there was no standing; the motion was untimely, and a proper pleading had not been filed.

As to standing, the Court stated there was no showing of "an interest in the litigation as it exists today," as legally required for a valid motion to intervene. The "only remaining funds are to be distributed to 'the neediest Holocaust survivors as members of the Looted Assets Class.'" However, the objector did not allege "that he is a needy survivor or that he resides in the FSU." Rather, "the record suggest[ed] that he is an extraordinarily wealthy survivor" living in the U.S. Further, it was not alleged that Beit Warszawa "is even composed of Holocaust survivors, much less needy victims of Nazi persecution who reside in the FSU."[335]

As to the timing of the motion, the Court observed that the objector "was not involved in the case at the outset or at the time the settlement of the case was approved. He did not seek to intervene when the plan of allocation was adopted, nor when [the Court] entered orders on September 25, 2002 and November 17, 2003 allocating additional funds, nor when [the Court] entered [its] order of May 13, 2013 allocating the residual funds remaining in accordance with the plan … originally adopted." By the time the motion to intervene had been filed, "the time for reconsideration of my May 2013 order had run."[336]

Thus, the motion was untimely. Although the objector stated that he had "first learned of this litigation in June 2013, he certainly should have known about it many years ago - when notice of the settlement was disseminated to class members worldwide…. [W]hen the case was settled in 1998, and in subsequent years until the present, it … received extraordinary media coverage, and the Special Masters have created a website — www.swissbankclaims.com — containing all relevant information regarding the case…. If the only newspaper he read were the Jerusalem Post, from which he claims to have first heard about the case 17 years after it commenced, he would have come across dozens of articles, in its print and online editions, describing various aspects of the case." [337] In addition, the motion seeking to intervene was filed "after the judgment was entered," a request "not often granted," and one that would create "yet another round of time consuming litigation that is costly to the judicial process, if not the parties."[338] Third, the objector had not filed a pleading, as required to intervene.[339]

V. CONCLUSION

Most of the post-settlement litigation involving the cy pres remedy related to essentially the same issue, often raised by the same individuals. The class, by contrast, consisted of hundreds of thousands of individuals, and the vast majority did not dispute the Court's determination to channel the greatest amount of aid to the neediest people. Nor was this determination disputed by any of the courts that considered and reviewed it.

Although there was litigation over the Court's decision to direct a substantial part of the Looted Assets Class funds to the former Soviet Union, and it was suggested by some that survivors in that part of the world were receiving a disproportionate level of assistance, the reality is that the Settlement Fund was not large enough to provide meaningful aid to all needy Holocaust victims. The Court's assistance certainly did not come close to resolving the problems of the victims in the FSU. Their needs were, and remain, too vast.

Nevertheless, the Looted Assets Class distribution process provided important help to many of the most impoverished elderly survivors throughout the world, among them, Jewish and Roma victims in Central and Eastern Europe. The program "reflected … 'the recognition that the settlement fund, while insufficient to repay even a small fraction of what was looted in the Holocaust, presented an opportunity to provide meaningful assistance to the Looted Assets Class members who are in the greatest financial need.'"[340] With the distribution of over $256 million in food, home health care, medicines, medical equipment, heating supplies, clothing and other critical services to over 237,400 Nazi victims, the program accomplished the goal proposed in the Distribution Plan and embraced by the Court: to provide some relief to "the neediest elderly survivors of the Holocaust — who perhaps would be less in need today had their assets not been looted and their lives nearly destroyed."[341]

I. INTRODUCTION AND FINAL STATISTICS

The "Nazi Regime exploited the slave labor of hundreds of thousands of 'Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution' in every corner of its realm, and that slave labor not only was integral to Nazi policy goals but also critical to the Nazi war effort, particularly in its later years. Jews and other 'Victims or Targets' performed slave labor in a variety of settings: in labor details (clearing rubble, building roads and bridges), in concentration and forced labor camps (constructing and maintaining the camps, working in SSA-and privately-owned entities), and in ghettos (working in municipal workshops and private enterprises), among others. As the War progressed, the Nazis increasingly turned to concentration camp inmates to fill their labor needs in the armaments and other industries, and 'external camps' were constructed near factories themselves."[1]

By 1943, "almost every major firm in Germany was woven into the military economy," so that "it is not surprising that BMW, AEG-Telefunken, Siemens, Daimler-Benz, and IG Farben were also among the principal exploiters" of slave labor, much like the "state-owned firms — like Brabag, the Hermann Goring works, and Volkswagen," as well as munitions and arms makers such as Dynamit Nobel, Rheinmetall-Borsig, Krupp, Messerschmidt, Heinkel and Junkers.[2]

Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement process was intended to recognize this slave labor, and the intricate and profitable ties between slave labor-using entities and Swiss financial and other institutions. Under this program, the Court approved payments to over 198,000 former slaves for the Nazi regime (and, for those who had passed away after the settlement, their heirs). The Court's administrative agents, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany ("Claims Conference") and the International Organization for Migration ("IOM"), analyzed nearly 330,000 claims, resulting in total payments from the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund of over $280 million. A considerable portion of these payments were made within the first two years of the claims program, with over $200 million having been approved for distribution to more than half of the total recipients before the end of 2003.[3] After ensuring that survivors themselves were paid, the remaining payments were distributed to direct heirs of victims who would have been eligible but who had died after February 15, 1999 (the date was selected because that was when the slave labor claims program was announced).

Each of the more than 198,000 former slave laborers compensated by the Court survived an unimaginable experience. Because the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, claim forms, and related materials all promised claimants confidentiality (in recognition of the sensitivity of the information provided in support of their claims), the claimants' names are not disclosed here, but their names, and all other relevant identifying information, are known to and were filed with the Court under seal.

Some examples of their experiences are as follows:

- "Claimant was born in the city of Lodz, Poland on November 26, 1927 to a Jewish Orthodox family. After September 1939 the 12-year-old was forcibly resettled in the city's slum area called Baluty (location of the Lodz Ghetto). Claimant worked in a metal factory and a nail factory, 12 to 14 hours a day, 7 days a week. When the Ghetto was liquidated, claimant was transported to Birkenau-Auschwitz with his mother and older brother. Selections separated them. In Auschwitz he was put to work laying bricks and in a cleaning detachment. At the evacuation of Auschwitz, claimant was transferred first to Sachsenhausen (Germany), then to the work camp of Lieberose, where he cleared woods and laid tracks for narrow-gage trains. Transported to Mauthausen (Austria) in January 1945, claimant survived the "White Night" during which inmates, drenched in freezing water, were made to march naked until they collapsed and died, because the Nazis had run out of space to house them. Claimant was liberated at Gunskirchen in May 1945. His archival records were found at the German Federal Indemnification (BEG) archives of the Landesentschädigungsamt-Munchen." (Claims Conf. No. 5-5201[4])
- "Claimant was born in Adelain, Hungary on March 1, 1897. In April 1942, along with thousands of Jewish males old enough to be drafted into the army, claimant had to join a forced labor battalion. Claimant's unit served on the Eastern front and in Galicia (present day Ukraine). The claimant spent two and a half years building roads, clearing minefields and digging antitank ditches, until he escaped, went into hiding and was liberated in Hungary. Using information available in his Article 2 Fund compensation file, including caseworker interviews, the Claims Conference slave laborers throughout the world. In a remarkable achievement, $201,660,200 has been processed through the Claims Conference on behalf of the Court to 139,076 Jewish survivors. The remaining payments of $1,827,000 have been made through the IOM to 1,260 non-Jewish class members, primarily to Roma survivors").

confirmed his eligibility for slave labor compensation. The claimant is 106 years old and lives with his wife, also a survivor (see below)." (Claims Conf. No. 11-3724)

- "Claimant was born in Satu Mare (Transylvania, Romania) on March 20, 1918. In the spring of 1944, Satu Mare (by then a part of Hungary) was occupied by the Nazi forces and the claimant was interned in the city's ghetto. In May 1944, claimant was deported by cattle car to Auschwitz, and shortly afterwards to Neuengamme. The claimant was liberated in a sub-camp of the Neuengamme complex in May 1945. Her persecution history was verified by documents, originally from Yad Vashem, in her Article 2 Fund file.[5] The Claimant lives with her 106 year-old husband, also a survivor (see above)." (Claims Conf. No. 11-3725)

- "Claimant was born in Budapest, Hungary on December 3, 1917. In 1942, the fascist government of Hungary drafted all Jewish males over the age of 18 into forced labor battalions. The claimant spent two years working in Hungary in conditions resembling those of a concentration camp. He was released from forced military service in April 1944, only to be imprisoned in the Leva ghetto awaiting deportation. The claimant was sent to the copper mines in Bor, Yugoslavia, infamous among labor camps for embodying the Nazi policy of 'extermination through labor,' with conditions so brutal that the SS measured the useful lifespan of Bor laborers in weeks. The claimant was liberated in March 1945. The claimant's application to the Article 2 Fund contained a copy of his liberation certificate from Bor, which was used to validate his slave labor claim." (Claims Conf. No. 12-2962)

- "Claimant was born in Vienna, Austria on October 4, 1926. Five days after his sixteenth birthday, he was arrested by the Geheime Staatspolizei Wien (Vienna Gestapo) and deported to the Ghetto at Theresienstadt, where he remained for two years. The Claims Conference located a photocopy of the original Gestapo files on transports from Vienna to the East, including Theresienstadt, and claimant's original Dachau entry register. According to the records of the International Tracing Service of the Red Cross, the Claimant was sent to Auschwitz on October 1, 1944 by the transport labeled 'Em,' identified as a 'worker.' Ten days later, claimant (Prisoner Number 115545) was transferred westward again, to Austrian territory and Dachau's sub-camp 'Kaufering' (Kommando Kaufering)." (Claims Conf. No. 8-262)

- "Claimant was born in Koln, Germany, on April 8, 1928. In October 1940 he was deported to Camp Gurs in France, where he was forced to clean latrines, remove human excrement and assist in digging graves and in burying the dead. In April 1941, he was sent to the camp of Les Milles, where he remained for the next seven months. Although the claimant was ineligible to receive the Article 2 Fund pension under the [then-]current German government eligibility guidelines that require[d] internment for a minimum of 18 months, the Claims Conference was able to use his Article 2 Fund file, supported by further BEG research, to substantiate his slave labor claim.[6] Claimant died shortly afterwards. His widow wrote to the Claims Conference to say that her husband had died feeling vindicated at last, his suffering as a young man recognized and acknowledged." (Claims Conf. No. 8-7033)

- "Claimant was born in Boryslaw, Poland (present-day Ukraine) on March 27, 1930. She was confined with her family to the Boryslaw Ghetto from June, 1941 until its liquidation. The young girl was interned in a forced labor camp (ZAL, Zwangsarbeitlager) near Boryslaw until January 1944, when she managed to escape, living first in hiding in the woods, then with a Christian family until August 1944. The archives at Yad Vashem and the German BEG files at the Bezirksregierung Düsseldorf contain data verifying her experiences." (Claims Conf. No. 7-11430)

- "Claimant was born in Baia, Romania on January 1, 1918. The claimant could provide no information about her persecution in her application form, as she is completely incapacitated, unable to speak or to move as a result of a stroke. Nevertheless, her German BEG records were located, substantiating that she performed slave labor in Mogilev (Belarus)." (Claims Conf. No. 12-4712)

- "Claimant was born in Amsterdam, Holland on May 24, 1929. In March 1943, claimant and her family were deported to Theresienstadt. The claimant was forced to clean latrines, maintain food kettles, and split mica. She was liberated in May 1945. The Claims Conference found confirmation of claimant's internment in Theresienstadt through its research effort matching survivors' names against ghetto and camp lists at the [USHMM]." (Claims Conf. No. 11-926)

- "Claimant was born on July 16, 1929 in Beregszas, Hungary (present day Ukraine). She remembers enduring the 'selection' upon arrival in Auschwitz eight days before Shavuot in 1944. At the whim of Dr. Mengele, claimant's father was sent to the men's line; her mother and five siblings were sent directly to the gas chambers. The claimant was selected for a labor crew. The Claims Conference researchers at Yad Vashem located records confirming her internment in the Beregowo ghetto, Auschwitz, Ravensbruck and Malchow." (Claims Conf. No. 10-5266)

- "Claimant was born in Dvinsk, Latvia on December 25, 1909. From September 1941 through May 1944, he was interned in the Vilna ghetto (Lithuania). Claimant was transferred to Kovno and later, with a small group of ghetto laborers who survived the liquidation of the ghetto, he was deported to Dachau, and finally was liberated in May 1945. Claims Conference researchers matched claimant's name to the list of Dachau prisoners currently in the collection of the [USHMM]." (Claims Conf. No. 10-5097)

- "Claimant is a Romani who was born on March 12, 1931 and who currently lives in the Czech Republic. The claimant performed slave labor at Dubnica nad Vahom from November 1944 through April 1945. The claimant wrote in her personal statement that the Germans came to her family's home at 6 A.M. and took the claimant and her entire family away in wagons to Humenne. There, they waited two days in a building for railcars to be made available. At night, the Germans took young women away for the evening. The Germans infected the claimant's sister-in-law with a sexual disease and then shot her at the camp. On the way to the camp, the Nazis stabbed one of the claimant's sisters with a bayonet. At the camp Dubnica nad Vahom, her father and oldest brother were separated from the rest of the family. The claimant and some of her siblings dug pits and dug out and cleaned potatoes under the coercion of the Nazis." (IOM No. 3103127)

- "Claimant is a Romani who was born on September 15, 1920 and who currently lives in the Czech Republic. The claimant performed slave labor at Pardubice and Terezin from December 1944 through May 1945. In July 1942, the claimant was sent to Schwainic to fix rail cars. However, he refused to work for the Germans and escaped after eight months. He stayed in hiding with friends until December 1943 when he was caught by the Czech police and taken to Hradec Kralove. From there he was transferred to Pardubice, where he remained until February 1944. The claimant was released and was supposed to return to work at Schwainic but again went into hiding. He was arrested again in December 1944, at which point he was taken by the Gestapo to Hradec Kralove, and from there to Terezin. After liberation, the claimant returned home where he did not regain his health until 1947." (IOM No. 3105893)[7]

The Slave Labor I payments issued to these and nearly 200,000 other Holocaust survivors supplemented the larger awards authorized under one of two contemporaneous slave labor programs ("foundations") in Germany and Austria: in Germany, the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation") and in Austria, the "Austrian Reconciliation Fund" ("Austrian Foundation").

With respect to Jewish former slave laborers, the Court approved the claims of 173,914 such victims. Of these individuals, over 171,000 — nearly 98% — also were approved for compensation by the German or Austrian slave and forced labor programs. Specifically:

- Approximately 157,000 of the 173,914 individuals compensated under Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement also were approved for payment under the German Foundation's slave labor program. Their claims under both programs (the Swiss Banks Settlement and the German Foundation) were processed by the Claims Conference.

- 4,600 Slave Labor Class I approvals also were approved by the German Foundation under the category "forced labor without deportation."[8] Their claims under both programs were processed by the Claims Conference.

[8] As described by the Claims Conference in its November 17, 2004 Slave Labor Class I Group 19 submission to the Court (emphasis in original):

- 6,200 Slave Labor Class I approvals also were approved by the German Foundation through programs administered by the five partner organizations designated by the German Foundation as responsible for former laborers living in Central and Eastern Europe. Their Slave Labor Class I claims were processed by the Claims Conference.

- 2,700 Slave Labor Class I approvals also were approved by the Austrian Foundation. Their claims under both programs were processed by the Claims Conference.

- 720 Slave Labor Class I approvals also were determined eligible under the parameters of the German Foundation or Austrian Foundation but, as late claims, had to be submitted to the two Foundations under a separate program known as the "Additional Labor Distribution Amount" or "ALDA."[9] Their claims were processed by the Claims Conference.

There were approximately 2,900 Jewish individuals approved under Slave Labor Class I who were not compensated by the German or Austrian Foundations. Some had had their claims denied by these Foundations for technical reasons, such as not filling out the appropriate claim form. Others were barred under German Foundation rules because they had received payments from programs related to slave labor claims negotiated in the 1950s with a handful of companies. These circumstances did not affect eligibility under Slave Labor Class I. Many already were

"The German Foundation Law defines slave laborers as persons who were held in a concentration camp as defined by the German Indemnification Law or in another place of confinement or a ghetto under comparable conditions and were subjected to forced labor. In addition, the German Foundation Law defines eligible forced laborers as persons who were deported from their homelands into the territory of the German Reich, according to the borders of 1937, or to a German occupied area, subjected to forced labor or subjected to conditions resembling imprisonment or similar extremely harsh living conditions ('forced labor without deportation'). Forced laborers who were not deported from their homeland into the territory of the Third Reich did not meet the eligibility criteria of 'forced labor without deportation.' However, the German Foundation has reviewed and approved the attached cases as 'forced labor without deportation.' In the case of In re Holocaust Victim Asset Litig., under Slave Labor Class I, slave labor is defined as work for little or no remuneration actually or allegedly performed by individuals involuntarily at the insistence, direction or under the auspices of the Nazi regime and its Axis allies. There is no distinction under the Settlement Agreement between slave and forced labor, nor is there a requirement of deportation. Therefore, Holocaust survivors who were 'forced laborers without deportation' as categorized by the German Foundation are eligible for payment as slave laborers under Slave Labor Class I."

[9] The "Additional Labor Distribution Amount" was described by the Claims Conference in its March 27, 2007 Slave Labor Class I Group 28 submission as follows:

> "This fund was negotiated by the Claims Conference from the Austrian Reconciliation Fund and is being used, in part, to compensate Holocaust survivors who would otherwise have been eligible under the German Foundation but applied between the December 31, 2001 deadline of the German Foundation and May 28, 2004. Applicants were asked for their reason of request for late application which included first claim being lost, illness, death in the family during the application period, hardship during the application period, and misunderstanding of the deadline."

receiving Holocaust-related pensions from Germany. Based upon the criteria for such pensions, they were determined to be eligible under the Settlement Agreement, even if ineligible under the German or Austrian Foundation programs.[10]

As to heirs, who were eligible for payment if the survivor had passed away after February 15, 1999, of the approved claims for Jewish slave laborers, 14,690 involved payments to one or more heirs of the victim.

With respect to Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled Nazi victims, the claims of 24,109 slave laborers were approved, of whom 22,667 were Roma,[11] 1,095 were Jehovah's Witnesses, 91 were disabled, 20 were homosexual, and 236 were Jewish.[12] Of the [10] The pensions were made via either the Article 2 Fund or the Central and Eastern European Fund ("CEEF"). The Article 2 Fund was established by Article 2 of the Implementation Agreement to the German Unification Treaty of October 3, 1990. It is paid by the German government and administered by the Claims Conference to compensate survivors of the Holocaust who had previously received little or no indemnification from Germany. Eligibility is restricted to survivors who meet certain defined criteria, including income limitations and minimum incarceration periods. The CEEF was created after January 1998 negotiations between the German government and the Claims Conference. Germany agreed to provide compensation, for the first time, to Jewish victims of Nazi persecution in Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. As with Article 2 pensions, eligibility criteria are restrictive. See www.swissbankclaims.com ("Glossary").

[11] International Organization for Migration, "History, Responsibility, Acknowledgement: The Holocaust Victim Assets Programme - Swiss Banks, Final Report," submitted to the Court on May 31, 2013 ("IOM Final Report"), at 88, 145. As part of the Settlement Fund accountant's final reconciliation work, a minor discrepancy was noted in the number of approvals the IOM reported to the Court (24,054) versus the number of individuals actually approved (24,109). The IOM appears to have omitted 55 awards from the count set forth in its Final Report. This discrepancy represents less than 0.25% of amounts authorized for Slave Labor Class I claimants under the program administered by the IOM. See Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Final Distribution Statistics, December 31, 2017 ("Distribution Statistics"), available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/New%20Docs/Distribution%20Stats.pdf.

The IOM utilized the 24,054 figure in tabulating other data, such as the number of individuals paid within each of the victim groups for which IOM was responsible. Since the vast majority of Slave Labor Class I approvals under the IOM program were for Roma victims, it is assumed that the additional 55 individuals paid by IOM (but not included in IOM's Final Report) likewise were Roma. Accordingly, while the IOM reported that 22,612 Roma were paid (id.), that figure has been adjusted herein to 22,667 Roma survivors.

[12] Although the Claims Conference, not the IOM, was appointed both by the Court and the German Foundation to process claims on behalf of Jewish slave laborers, some claimants were unaware of this designation and submitted claims to the wrong entity. Where possible, the administrative agencies forwarded improperly submitted claims to the correct partner organization. IOM Final Report, at 88. As the claims process neared completion, the IOM (with the Court's approval) directly submitted to the Court any claims that had been erroneously filed with the IOM by Jewish slave laborers. The Court approved all such eligible claims, and the IOM handled the payments to these Jewish Nazi victims.

24,109 approved claims, 20,790 claims were approved for survivors and 3,319 for heirs (with the heirs' share distributed among 4,161 eligible individuals).[13]

Further, for the Claims Conference, of the 173,914 approved claims, 166,133 were approved initially and another 7,781 were approved on appeal. For the IOM, of the 24,109 approved claims, 23,934 were approved initially (on first instance) and another 175 were approved on appeal.[14]

Holocaust survivors living in 74 different nations were compensated under Slave Labor Class I. The greatest percentage of recipients lived in Israel, followed by the United States and Hungary. Approximately 93% of all recipients lived in ten countries. With respect to the United States, recipients lived in all 50 states as well as the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. The greatest number lived in New York, followed by California and Florida. The vast majority (nearly 90%) lived in one of nine states. The geographic data is set forth in the following charts:

The 55 additional approvals not reflected in the IOM Final Report have been added to the category, "approved on first instance," so that the IOM's reported number of 23,879 has been adjusted herein to 23,934, as the vast majority of claims were approved initially rather than on appeal.

Slave Labor Class I (Jewish Nazi Victims): Demographics by U.S. States

In addition to providing a measure of compensation to nearly 200,000 individuals around the world who had never previously been recognized for the labor they performed for the Nazi regime – profiting not only German but also Swiss entities – the Slave Labor Class I program was successful in a variety of other ways.

- The program represented the first significant compensation for Roma and other non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust. As the scholar Michael R. Marrus has noted, it is "often not appreciated that, for the greatest part of the restitution campaign, having to do with forced and slave laborers, the number of non-Jewish victims predominated, receiving more than three-quarters of the funds" from all programs, German, Swiss and otherwise.[17] With respect to just the Swiss Banks Settlement, over 23,000 Roma victims received Slave Labor Class I payments from the Court.
- The worldwide notification program helped bring attention to the hundreds of thousands of Nazi victims who fortunately had survived and lived all over the world, offering victims a number of opportunities to benefit from a new claims program and from others that followed.
- The Slave Labor Class I program provided a platform for important scholarly research, confirming and furthering still-incomplete knowledge about the economic aspects of the Holocaust, such as the pervasive financial ties between German slave labor-using entities and Swiss institutions; the widespread reach of Nazi labor sites; the impact of slave labor policies upon the Roma; and the little-known mistreatment of other victim groups.

II. THE SLAVE LABOR CLASS I CLAIMS PROGRAM: FORMULATION AND IMPLEMENTATION

A. The Distribution Plan: Presuming That All Proceeds of Slave Labor Were Transacted Through Swiss Entities

Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, Slave Labor Class I was comprised of Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled Nazi victims who had performed slave labor "for companies or entities that actually or allegedly deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with, or transacted such revenues or proceeds through, Releasees," i.e., through Swiss entities.[18]

In formulating a distribution proposal, the Special Masters noted that the class definitions "contain[] elements difficult to satisfy, in large part because, as many scholars agree, the economic history of the Holocaust remains incomplete." At the time the Distribution Plan was under consideration, there was "no scholarly research that ha[d] yet traced the 'revenues or proceeds' of slave labor from a specific slave labor-using entity to its ultimate destination." Many of the survivors could not "even identify the name of the corporation for which they labored; they know only what they did, where they did it, and the generally sub-human conditions in which they were forced to do so."[19] There had been little significant scholarly research about the relation between Switzerland and Nazi-era slave labor.

As Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig described in their chapter, "The Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement," in the 2009 book Reparations for Victims of Genocide, War Crimes and Crimes,[20] the review undertaken for the Court at the outset of the process indicated that slave labor was pervasive during the Holocaust era. Virtually all German entities, public and private, made use of slaves. Otto Count Lambsdorff, who represented the German government in the negotiations that led to the establishment of the German Foundation, observed that "there was hardly a German company that did not use slave and forced labor during World War II."[21]

Just as the German use of slave labor was extensive, so too were the financial relationships between these slave labor-using enterprises and Swiss financial institutions, starting with the fact that virtually all members of German industry held Swiss accounts.

> "[M]ost significant German slave labor users had Swiss bank accounts."[22] There were extensive ties among German slave labor-using companies, the Nazi government, and Swiss financial institutions, as became clear from documentation [the Court and Special Master] received after months of negotiations with the defendant banks and with the assistance of the Volcker Committee[23] and the Swiss Federal Archives. [The Special Master] obtained a copy of the 1945 "Frozen Assets List," a document relating to a freeze of German assets instituted by Swiss authorities at the behest of the Allies, finally undertaken by the Swiss when the inevitability of an Allied victory became clear. The list demonstrates that hundreds of German companies known to have used slave labor, as well as the German government itself, held Swiss bank accounts as of 1945.[24]

There also were Swiss subsidiaries of German slave-labor using entities, and they had their own financial ties to Switzerland.

> Many "German entities, including a large number of the German corporations that exploited slave labor, established Swiss subsidiaries, and it is not unfair to presume that a Swiss entity would have maintained a domestic bank account or > other asset in Switzerland." [In addition], the Nazi Regime itself also employed slave laborers, and "governmental reports analyzing movements of Nazi gold, as well as other scholarship, confirm that the Nazi Regime and Nazi-controlled entities banked in Switzerland, which served as a vital conduit for needed hard currency exchange" during the Second World War.[25]

The research therefore showed that virtually every private and governmental entity in Nazi Germany that used slave labor during the Holocaust had some sort of financial link with a Swiss entity.

In light of these facts, the Special Masters recommended, and the Court adopted, the presumption that all German slave labor enterprises had done business in, or with, Swiss institutions. As such, all survivors who performed slave labor for German entities were presumed to have some financial connection with Switzerland, in that the proceeds of their labor ended up in that country. They were therefore all part of Slave Labor Class I. This presumption was significant for the claims process. It would "'simplify the administration of Slave Labor Class I by making it unnecessary for each claimant to prove a link between the German company for which slave labor was performed and a Swiss bank.'"[26]

> Accordingly, the "elderly members of this class" were "relieved of the burden of demonstrating precisely which company enslaved them and whether and how that company channeled revenues or proceeds of their slave labor through a Swiss entity. The fortuity that the apparent Swiss banking relationships of many slave labor-using entities has been documented [w]ould not prejudice those class members who performed slave labor for enterprises whose financial ties to Swiss entities may not yet have been demonstrated with the present state of research and scholarship."[27] …. [M]any former slaves "cannot even identify the name of the corporation for which they labored; they know only what they did, where they did it, and the generally sub-human conditions in which they were forced" to work.[28]

Since the historical evidence warranted the presumption that the proceeds of Holocaust-era slave labor were transacted through Switzerland, the compensation and payment process could be somewhat streamlined. That presumption also enabled the Court to operate essentially in tandem with a larger program negotiated specifically to compensate former slave laborers: the German Foundation, established in Berlin on July 17, 2000, a few days before the Court approved the Settlement Agreement on July 26, 2000.

> Every former slave laborer would receive payment from the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund. [The Special Master was] able to recommend a Slave Labor Class I process that would essentially mirror the larger $5 billion German Foundation slave labor program, which had been finalised by German legislation shortly before the Special Master filed his distribution recommendations in the Swiss Banks case. Thus, each Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled former slave laborer who was to be compensated under the German Foundation legislation also would receive an additional payment from the Swiss Banks Settlement.[29]

The Distribution Plan provided that every payment was to be in the same amount, "regardless of the length of time spent as a slave laborer or the nature of the work performed." By contrast, "the few German companies that established limited slave labor compensation funds in the 1950s and 1960s required detailed case-by-case inquiries. From the descriptions that have been provided by Nuremberg prosecutor and Claims Conference negotiator Benjamin Ferencz in his seminal work, Less Than Slaves, the bureaucratic and emotional morass into which the survivors were forced in order to meet the settling firms' stringent requirements hardly seems worth the effort."[30]

> No one could foresee that the process of deciding the claims would take as long as it did. The questionnaires, which came from all parts of the world, were often illegible or incomplete. Addresses changed and envelopes were returned unopened. The information received had to be compared with records stored at the International Tracing Service of the Red Cross in Arolsen, where millions of concentration camp dossiers were filed. Screening committees, working after normal working hours, could handle only a limited number of cases at a session. They frequently would ask the claimant to come back with additional evidence or witnesses. . . . Legal forms had to be signed and authenticated. . . . Thousands of claims had to be turned down when the applicant was unable to prove that he had > been a concentration camp inmate employed in one of four designated Farben plants at Auschwitz."[31]

The Slave Labor Class I claims process was designed to minimize these burdens for the elderly claimants by adopting presumptions of labor no matter the duration, location, or beneficiary of the proceeds.

B. Creating a Claims Process

1. Administrative Efficiency - Incorporating the German Slave Labor Claims Program

The legislation authorizing the German Foundation program (sometimes referred to as the "German Fund") was of historic significance. That law explicitly and for the first time recognized that the Nazi regime > inflicted severe injustice on slave laborers and forced laborers, through deportation, internment, exploitation which in some cases extended to destruction through labor, and through a large number of other human rights violations, [and further recognized] that German enterprises which participated in the [Nazi] injustice bear a historic responsibility and must accept it……[32]

[31] Id. The screening committees consisted of "Kameraden (old comrades)" who would "interview persons whom no one seemed to remember, and give their opinion whether the claimant had really worked for Farben at Buna. An applicant who did not know when the typhoid epidemic had broken out or where the latrines were located was soon disqualified. Many ineligible claimants conceded that they must have been mistaken and their claims were apologetically withdrawn." Ferencz, at 52. Similar difficulties arose in connection with implementation of the German Indemnification Laws. In the words of Danish psychiatrist Henrik Hoffmeyer, who criticized the stringent eligibility requirements under the "damage to health" provisions of the BEG: "After the deportees have risked their health in conditions having no equal in history, they return to a society that attempts to calculate the material restitution they deserve with administrative pedantry. The sick are sent from doctor to doctor …. The results of these examinations are reviewed by a huge, impersonal administrative apparatus that considers itself capable of judging whether a person who has gone through such hell is an 8, 10, or 12 percent invalid …. [T]his method is what often gives the sick person the feeling that he is suspected of being a parasite on society." CHRISTIAN PROSS, PAYING FOR THE PAST: THE STRUGGLE OVER REPARATIONS FOR SURVIVING VICTIMS OF THE NAZI TERROR 96-7 (Belinda Cooper trans., Johns Hopkins Univ. Press 1998).

[32] See Gesetz zur Errichtung einer Stiftung "Erinnerung, Verantwortung und Zukunft" [Law on the Creation of a Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future"], Aug. 12, 2000, BGBl. I at Preamble, last amended by Gesetz, Sept. 9, 2008, BGBl. I. In 2013, the United States Department of State appointed Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig to serve on the Board of Trustees of the German Foundation; in August, 2016, this appointment was renewed for a four-year term.

The establishment of the German Foundation nearly simultaneously with the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund "obviated the need for the Special Master to recommend creation of a free-standing entity to determine claimants and to administer payments to members of Slave Labor Class I."[33] Instead, the Court could use many of the same claims processing agents, mechanisms, deadlines, research, and if appropriate, legal and historical analyses as the German Foundation. The "Distribution Plan also recommended that the Court use the same fundamental compensation principle: payments to all former slave laborers would be in identical amounts regardless of the length of time spent in slave labor or the nature of the work performed. At this stage of their lives, the Court agreed that it would have been unseemly to encourage survivors to engage in a competition to demonstrate who had suffered 'more.' As Judge Korman has observed, 'comparisons among survivors are odious.'"[34] In this way, too, the Swiss Banks Settlement was similar to the German Foundation program, which "anticipat[ed] … a lack of evidence," and therefore "no distinction was made between different lengths of the suffering by victims of forced labor."[35]

Thus, drawing upon the parameters of the German Foundation that were in place or anticipated, the Distribution Plan proposed and the Court adopted a number of fundamental principles to govern Slave Labor Class I claims.

First, each "Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled and homosexual former slave laborer who received a payment from the German Fund (whether as a 'slave' or 'forced' laborer)" also was to receive an additional payment from the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund. Heirs of those who died after February 15, 1999 also were eligible for payment, as true for the German Foundation. Payments originally were expected to be made in two tranches, as under the German Foundation.[36]

After the Court received information concerning the projected overall payments, in the interest of claimant convenience and administrative efficiency, the Court authorized payments to be issued in their Second, the Slave Labor Class I payment was to "augment the amount each such individual [was] to receive from the German Fund. A payment to a member of Slave Labor Class I should not be used as an offset against the amount that person [was] to receive under the terms of the German legislation."[37]

Third, the Court diverged from the German Foundation legislation in its selection of administrative agents. Under the German Foundation rules, payments were to be "carried out by seven 'partner organizations.' The partner organizations include[d] five foundations established in Central and Eastern European countries, which [were] responsible for payments to former slave and forced laborers (Jewish and non-Jewish alike) living in nations covered by the respective foundations. The five foundations [were to] make payments to persons living in Poland; Ukraine and Moldova; Russia, Latvia and Lithuania; Belarus and Estonia; and the Czech Republic. For non-Jewish individuals living in the rest of the world, the IOM [was] designated to make payments. For Jewish recipients living in the rest of the world, the Claims Conference [was] designated to make payments."[38] However, the Distribution Plan sought to streamline the German "partner organization" program by designating only two of the seven partner organizations to serve as administrative agents for the Court: the Claims Conference and the IOM. These two organizations agreed to "assume responsibility for distributing payments from [the] Settlement Fund to 'Victims or Targets' who reside[d] in the nations within the mandate of the [other] five foundations; i.e., Poland, Ukraine, Moldova, Russia, Latvia, Lithuania, Belarus, Estonia and the Czech Republic." The claims of all Jewish slave laborers would be processed by the Claims Conference, and the claims of all Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled slave laborers would be processed by the IOM.

The Claims Conference and IOM also were appointed to act on behalf of the Court to "arrange for processing and distribution of payments" to Slave Labor Class I claimants "who entirety, rather than in two stages. The German Foundation noted in its 2017 publication that the two-installment rule "had the regrettable, although unavoidable, effect of upsetting many beneficiaries when they did not receive the full amount of their compensation right away. However, a worse option would have been to pay out the full amount only after all claims were processed and decided upon, when the amount available for each eligible claimant would be clearly allocated …. [I]t was preferable to at least pay some compensation earlier." Saathoff, Gerlant, Mieth & Wühler, supra, at 105.

labored in Austria, although the German Fund provide[d] for separate procedures for such individuals." [39]

Payments would not be determined solely by whether the applicant had been found eligible by the partner organization responsible for his or her region. Rather, "[a]ny person who was denied compensation from the five Central or Eastern European foundations but believe[d] he or she nevertheless [was] entitled to compensation under this Settlement Fund [was entitled to] make a direct application to the IOM or Claims Conference."[40]

To the greatest extent possible, the Court sought to utilize (but was not bound by) the German Foundation definitions of eligibility, with one major exception: although the German Foundation distinguished between slave and forced labor, the Settlement Agreement did not. Thus, under the German Foundation:

> Slave laborers were "defined under Section 11(1)1 of the [German] legislation as 'persons who were held in a concentration camp as defined [under] the German Indemnification Law [BEG] or in another place of confinement outside the territory of what is now the Republic of Austria or a ghetto under comparable conditions and were subjected to forced labor." Such individuals were eligible for payments of up to DM 15,000 (approximately $7,500).
> Forced laborers were "defined under Section 11(1)(2) of the legislation as 'persons who were deported from their homelands into the territory of the German Reich (according to the borders of 1937) or to a German-occupied area, subjected to forced labor in a commercial enterprise or for public authorities there, and held under conditions other than those mentioned [under Section 11(1)(1], or were subjected to conditions resembling imprisonment or similar extremely harsh living conditions; this rule does not apply to persons who because their forced labor was performed primarily in the territory of what is now the Republic of Austria can receive payments from the Austrian Reconciliation Foundation." Such individuals were eligible for payments of up to DM 5,000 (approximately $2,500).[41]

[2] Persons who were deported from their native country to the territory of the German Reich within its borders of 1937 or to a region occupied by the

The Distribution Plan, however, provided that all laborers, whether "slave" or "forced," would receive the same payment. This reflected the terms of the Settlement Agreement, which did not distinguish among the five "victim or target" groups (Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled). Furthermore, the Settlement Agreement referred only to "slave labor," which it defined as "work for little or no remuneration," a term that did not distinguish between slave and forced labor, or between places of enslavement.[42]

The Court authorized a 45% increase in payments to members of Slave Labor Class I (as well as the Looted Assets Class and the Refugee Class) after receipt of unexpected additional income generated by a tax exemption on interest earned on the Settlement Fund. The Slave Labor Class I payment thus was increased in September 2002 from $1,000 to $1,450 per person.[43]

The Court adopted the German Foundation's limitation of payments almost entirely to survivors. In the event that a slave laborer died after the effective date of the law — February 15, 1999 — a designated group of heirs would be entitled to receive the slave laborer's payment in the following order: spouse, children, grandchildren, siblings, and those named in a will. "With this, the Foundation Law established a so-called 'self-contained regime' with its own definition of 'legal successors' which could, and in a number of cases did, differ from national inheritance laws. This system was not uncontested since it meant disappointing persons who were heirs according to their respective national inheritance law including those who were designated as a beneficiary in the will of the deceased person. However, given the large number of beneficiaries, the system avoided the challenge of having to establish first, which national inheritance law applied, and then who was an heir under such national inheritance law. It would have been very difficult, time consuming, and costly for the partner organizations to identify and German Reich and were subjected to forced labour in an industrial or commercial enterprise or in the public sector and were detained under conditions other than those named above or were subjected to prison-like conditions or comparable exceptionally hard living conditions. This does not apply to persons who are able to receive payments from the Austrian reconciliation fund for forced labour performed mainly in the present-day territory in the Republic of Austria…. In addition, the Act contained a catchall clause which allowed the partner organizations charged with implementation to provide assistance to other victims of National Socialist injustice, in particular to forced labourers in agriculture. Forced labour as a prisoner of war was not a cause of entitlement").

then apply different national inheritance laws, particularly for those partner organizations that covered a large number of countries, like the IOM and JCC [Claims Conference]."[44]

The rationale for limiting payments primarily to survivors (and in limited cases, to designated heirs) was even more compelling in the Swiss Banks case. The Settlement Fund was smaller than that administered by the German Foundation, and it had to be shared among several different classes.

> As noted by Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Stuart E. Eizenstat in a February 16, 2000 speech before the Bundestag, under the German Fund, heirs generally will not receive direct payments 'largely for practical considerations, as the number of such heirs would be in the millions and there would simply not be enough money available to make payments to both survivors and heirs.' That precise concern applies to this $1.25 billion Settlement Fund, which is considerably smaller than the German Fund to begin with, and will be substantially reduced even further once all Deposited Assets Class claims are repaid.[45]

The German Foundation established application deadlines of eight months for all claimants, except for those individuals for whom the IOM was responsible, in which case the application deadline was set at 12 months. Those deadlines ultimately were extended, as were the deadlines established by the Court for Slave Labor Class I.[46]

2. Organizing the Claims Program

a. Outreach

For both the Swiss Banks Slave Labor Class I program and the German Foundation slave labor program, the claims process was designed to rely, wherever possible, upon information already available from prior restitution programs. The focus was on simplifying the application process, both for the convenience of the claimants — many of whom previously had applied for and were receiving other types of Holocaust compensation, which often had required detailed applications and archival documentation — and for the benefit of the Settlement Fund and other class members.

However streamlined the program was meant to be, it was by no means simple, given the elderly survivor population the claims process sought to serve. For each of the Court's administrative agents, the slave labor program required an unprecedented global mobilization of resources. The goal was to locate potential claimants, analyze their histories, and pay claims in as short a period as possible, while supported by documentary evidence and adhering to the parameters established by the German Foundation and the Settlement Agreement, to ensure a legally and historically accurate record of the scope of slave labor throughout Nazi-occupied Europe.

i. Claims Conference

To "prepare for the large logistical undertaking of processing applications from around the world, the Claims Conference undertook a series of steps including:

- Identifying survivors most likely to be eligible;
- Mailing applications to survivors who had received previous compensation and were most likely to be eligible for slave labor compensation;
- Launching an international media and advertising campaign to announce the claims process;
- Engaging a network of 350 local survivor and Jewish organizations around the world that could provide assistance in the application process; [and]
- Contacting 500 homes for the elderly in Israel, asking them to inform residents of the program, and opening nine help centers for survivors throughout the country."[47]

[47] Gideon Taylor, Greg Schneider & Saul Kagan, The Claims Conference and the Historic Jewish Efforts for Holocaust-Related Compensation, in REPARATIONS FOR VICTIMS OF GENOCIDE, WAR CRIMES AND CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY: SYSTEMS IN PLACE AND SYSTEMS IN THE MAKING 104, 109 (Carla Ferstman, Mariana Goetz & Alan Stephens eds., Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) ("Taylor, Schneider & Kagan"). See also CLAIMS CONFERENCE, 2006 ANNUAL REPORT WITH 2007 HIGHLIGHTS 15 ("Claims Conference 2006 Annual Report").

An important component of the program was the institution and utilization of the most updated technology available. Thus, the Claims Conference "created an advanced system of computerized processing where every application form was digitally scanned. The computer system provided global linkage between regional processing offices in New York, Tel Aviv, Frankfurt, and Budapest. The database permitted unlimited information input, storage and retrieval while allowing staff to trace the progress and the status of every application in the system. Hundreds of thousands of claims were further electronically sorted and analyzed to identify and then group them for streamlined procedures."[48]

The shifting of much of the claims process to a highly computerized system did not, however, eliminate the need for careful individualized study of the claims. To take one example of the complexity of this process:

> Information given by survivors on the application form for the Program for Former Slave and Forced Laborers varied widely. Case workers [not computers] logged more than 1,600 different spelling and misspellings [provided by claimants] for the camp known as "Auschwitz-Birkenau" alone. Some examples are below:

> |---|---|---|---|

> | Aoushwitz | Osvenz | Auwvitz | Atzshvitz |
> | Asvenzim | Osviecim | Aushcviz | Aucvitz |

[48] Taylor, Schneider & Kagan, at 109.

Aushvitz Ausvich Aushwit Asschwicz

Another manual and labor-intensive task included the identification and exclusion of duplicate applications, a process by which a computer system could identify "potential matches" but which then "each ha[d] to be reviewed manually" with a "trained caseworker [determining] for each case if in fact there [was] an identity match."[50]

The claims processing programs were technologically sophisticated, and were supplemented by appropriate communication mechanisms. Thus, in consultation with the Court and the Special Masters, early in the process the Claims Conference established facilities devoted to survivor outreach. As described by the Claims Conference in a report to the Court, the programs included the following:

- Call Center: The Call Center in New York employed between 7 and 14 staff members between February 2001 and December 2003. Calls from class members were also answered by the Claims Conference offices in Israel, Frankfurt, Vienna and Budapest, and in Claims Conference liaison offices in Eastern Europe. The operators worked six days a week for approximately six months, then resumed a five-day work week. Claims Conference staff members spoke over 11 different languages and spent all day personally answering calls from survivors in English, Czech/Slovak, French, German, Hebrew, Hungarian, Italian, Romanian, Russian, Spanish and Yiddish…. [A]n off-site hotline/call center … was also utilized [which] handled all toll-free calls… [and] was staffed 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, … for almost a year…. The Program for Former Slave and Forced Laborers alone has handled 174,088 phone calls from class members and the public since February 2001."

- Services Department: The department "answer[ed] letters and emails from the public and survivor community and respond[ed] to detailed telephone questions received by the Claims Conference. The department also assisted class members with completing application forms. Since 1999 [when the start-up of the slave labor program was first anticipated], the Services Department of the Claims Conference in New York has employed between 8 and 25 staff members who are experienced in answering queries

The Department … [was] able to provide assistance in Hebrew, German, Russian, Polish, Hungarian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian and Rumanian…. It is estimated that the average number of the telephone calls handled by this department for the 18-month period between January 2001 and June 2002 was approximately 50,000 [and approximately] 11,000 emails [were answered], in addition to several thousand letters."

- Town Meetings and Open Houses: "During 1999 and the period leading up to the establishment of the German Foundation's slave labor compensation program as well as the approval of the Swiss Banks Settlement, the Claims Conference undertook a systematic information campaign across North America to reach out to large groups of Holocaust survivors and services organizations in 'town meeting' settings, which were conducive to detailed Q & A and one-on-one sessions…. In addition, to coincide with the beginning of the application process, the Claims Conference organized over 15 'Open Houses' to assist survivors in completing the application forms for the [slave labor program] and to answer any related restitution questions…."[51]

ii. IOM

The IOM created a similar outreach program. As it described in its Final Report to the Court on its Information and Outreach Campaign:

> IOM launched its Public Information and Outreach Campaign for HVAP [the IOM's "Holocaust Victim Assets Program" for Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II and the Refugee Class] with two simultaneous press conferences in Tel Aviv and New York on 17 April 2001 [at which the Claims Conference, and Special Master Bradfield on behalf of the Claims Resolution Tribunal, handling bank account claims for the Court, participated as well]. By that time, IOM had already prepared print and other materials for broad distribution. The Court had also appointed a notification company to publish notices about the Programme in print media worldwide….
> IOM coordinated with victims' associations and field offices in the development of visual identity and images as well as the production of information material in 28 languages. Information … was disseminated through more than 80 IOM field offices and with the assistance of partners in countries where IOM does not have a presence…. IOM endeavoured to cooperate closely with victims' associations, target group organizations, local governments and authorities, international organizations, minority group representatives, international and national newspapers as well as TV and radio stations.

[51] Claims Conference Declaration, Sept. 18, 2008, at 4-7.

> Simultaneously, a special programme website was developed and updated regularly….[52]

The IOM placed over 500 print advertisements in 20 languages in media located in 34 different countries, and also broadcast multilingual radio and television announcements. "A web banner providing a direct link to the IOM home page was placed on the CNN website and target group web pages."[53] The IOM "developed its own special web page describing" the Swiss Banks program and "answering Frequently Asked Questions in English, German, French and Spanish, held 46 press conferences in 30 countries, and published 15 press releases." The IOM also publicized the Court's deadlines, including extensions.[54]

The IOM took further steps as part of its "international joint GFLCP/HVAP campaign" to disseminate notice of the claims program to the specific victim groups designated under the Settlement Agreement.[55]

With respect to Roma class members, the IOM held a special press conference in Bratislava at the inception of the program. In addition, because Roma "even today … often live in isolated communities, lacking both active participation in the societies of their home countries and access to mass media, IOM contracted with AB Data, Ltd. … for targeted outreach services to Roma in Central and Eastern Europe. In addition to IOM field offices, AB Data contacted eligible Roma claimants in the following 18 countries, distributed, assisted with preparation, and collected claim forms from them: Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Czech Republic, Croatia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Moldova, Montenegro, Poland, Romania, Russian Federation, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, and Ukraine."[56]

With respect to homosexual class members, the outreach program "was one of the greatest public information challenges…. Although the estimated number of homosexual survivors was expected to be very low — historians estimated a 60 per cent death rate of homosexual concentration camp inmates — it seemed to be worthwhile to set up a special campaign to make sure that those few potential claimants were reached. Therefore, IOM together with a professional communications agency in Germany selected on the basis of its track record and access to gay and lesbian networks, implemented special outreach activities geared towards this target group. This targeted media approach was expected to have a snowball effect that would spread to the US, Canada, and Australia, where some homosexuals had sought shelter from Nazi persecution." The campaign was launched at a press conference in Berlin which was "covered live by international media, including CNN."[57]

For disabled class members, since it was "very difficult to find eligible individuals through IOM's general public information campaign" due to the "brutal mistreatment of disabled persons under the Nazi regime and the extremely low survival rates of victims," the IOM initiated a "targeted information campaign." It "appealed to the media, organizations for the disabled, and the general public to assist in locating potentially eligible victims." The IOM also "conducted a broad-based survey" to "find relevant media and organizations working with disabled persons and to create a specialized database for the dissemination of relevant information;" held press conferences in Bonn and in Washington, D.C.; and used direct mailings to relevant organizations.[58]

Together with the Jehovah's Witness Holocaust-Era Survivors Fund ("JWHESF"), the IOM launched a campaign to reach out to Jehovah's Witness class members, in recognition that "congregation life is central to the Jehovah's Witnesses and that frequent contact and interaction promote a close-knit atmosphere among members." As a result, the "outreach carried out by Jehovah's Witness congregations was very effective."[59]

b. Deadlines

A crucial component of the global notification was the dissemination of clear filing deadlines. For the program to be successful, claimants needed to apply promptly so that the expected hundreds of thousands of claims could be reviewed and paid to the elderly Nazi victims, who already had waited for too many decades. The goal was first to compensate the survivors, and only secondarily the heirs, and so time was of the essence.

Thus, the Court, again following the lead of the larger German Foundation program, established a claim filing deadline of August 31, 2001. Because of the proactive approach that had been undertaken by the Claims Conference in consultation with the Court and the German Foundation, reaching out to surviving slave laborers even before the German and Swiss slave labor programs were officially finalized and announced, those filing deadlines largely were met and hundreds of thousands of applications were received by the application date. Nevertheless, given that Nazi victims lived all over the world, including in rural communities with minimal communication facilities or infrastructure, the German Foundation and the Court both determined that it was appropriate to extend their filing deadlines. Thus, as true for the German Foundation, the Court extended the Slave Labor Class I deadline to December 31, 2001.

The Court also adopted the recommendation of the German Foundation to accept "'informal applications' (i.e., requests for applications or some form of communication — fax, email, phone call, letter — indicating that the person was interested in applying and requesting information as of December 31, 2001)," on condition that "the application form itself … be received by the partner organization within 3 months from the date that the partner organization dispatches the form."[60]

While the December 31, 2001 deadline "was not formally extended again, there were several instances where individuals provided plausible explanations for their failure to meet the 31 December 2001 deadline or otherwise demonstrated 'excusable neglect' …. Any [German Foundation] claims that had been received by victims' associations within the deadline were also generally considered as timely received by IOM even if IOM actually received them after the formal deadline." Moreover, the Court also accepted the German Foundation rules providing that "a claim form timely received by any German Federal Foundation partner organization or the ARF Austrian Reconciliation Foundation and subsequently transferred to another would be deemed to have been received on the earlier date, so some eligible [slave labor] claims were received by IOM even as late as mid-2005, automatically making their [Swiss Banks claims] timely received. This was especially true of claims transferred to IOM from the ARF, for which the programme deadline ultimately was extended" to December 31, 2004.[61]

[60] See Claims Conference Letter to Court, Jan. 18, 2002; IOM Letter to Court, Jan. 21, 2002. The Court approved both requests by Order dated Jan. 22, 2002.

In its final Slave Labor Class I submission, the Claims Conference, following consultation with the Special Masters and the Court, advised that it was winding down the program and that the final closing date had been established:

> As the [remaining] recipients are mainly resident in countries of the former Soviet Union, time is required to transmit funds. As such, we are asking the deadline for payment to be set at May 31, 2009. This time will allow the recipients to claim their funds and for the Claims Conference to resolve any outstanding payment issues on previously awarded funds. As of May 31, 2009, no further payments will be issued or re-issued.
> Further, the entire program will close as of June 30, 2009, allowing the final 30 days for any outstanding payments that may have been re-issued through May 31, 2009 to be cashed. At June 30, 2009, all outstanding payments will be closed and no further financial transactions will be allowed.[62]

c. Heirs

The filing deadlines were not open-ended, because the "top priority was to pay as many living Holocaust survivors as quickly as possible."[63] For the same reason, payments to heirs were made only later. As the Claims Conference has observed about the (now-closed) Slave Labor Program:

> In 2005, the Claims Conference began making compensation payments to eligible heirs of former slave laborers. Throughout the slave labor program, the Claims Conference's top priority was to pay as many living Holocaust survivors as > quickly as possible…. Payments were made to heirs who applied directly to the program and to heirs of survivors who had applied…. The payments were to be divided among all eligible heirs of any one survivor.[64]

As with claims filed by survivors, the criteria for heir claims were established by the German Foundation and applications from heirs were subject to the German Foundation's audit.[65]

Although heir claims were relatively few in number, paying these claims was one of the more complicated elements of the program. As observed in a final report prepared by the German Foundation:

> If an applicant died while an application was still pending, the surviving spouse or certain descendants could receive the benefits from an approved claim. The Foundation Establishment Act stipulated that the partner organizations were not to apply the inheritance laws of their respective countries, but must apply the special legal succession arrangements formulated in the Act. After all, payments were being disbursed across one hundred countries on this planet, and lawmakers wanted to avoid applying a hundred different sets of inheritance rules. This would have made the processing of applications much more complicated, particularly for the JCC [Claims Conference] and the IOM, and would have dragged out the process by many years.
> But the application of common rules on legal succession also produced unexpected difficulties. For one thing, when legislators passed the Foundation Establishment Act in 2000, they failed to stipulate the period within which legal heirs would need to file a "substitute" claim. The law was eventually amended to include a six-month filing deadline starting from the date of death of the original applicant. Secondly, the act of locating legal heirs and applying the share arrangements spelled out in the Act proved to be the greatest problem of all. A beneficiary who had lived, for example, in the Czech Republic, could very well have eligible children living in other countries. Since most payments had to be divided between the surviving spouse and the children, processing such payments became very complex and extremely time-consuming; and was the main reason the partner organizations required more time than originally foreseen to process all applications.[66]

The same concerns applied equally to the payment of heirs to Slave Labor Class I awards.

d. Appeals

Claims were to be processed by the Claims Conference and IOM, respectively, and their recommendations were to be reviewed by the Special Masters and, if appropriate, submitted to and approved by the Court. As true for all of the German Foundation partner organizations, the German law establishing the program provided for the German Foundation "to act as a supervisor of the procedure, thus performing a control function. In practice, it did so by regularly dispatching German supervisory teams to conduct on-site inspections of the partner organizations' work."[67]

Beyond this initial review, the German Foundation legislation required the partner organizations "to create appeals organs that [were] independent and subject to no outside instruction."[68] Both the Claims Conference and the IOM established such processes and received the approval of the German Foundation. The two agencies thereafter submitted their respective appellate programs to the Court for review, and upon consideration, the Court approved each as appropriate for Slave Labor Class I.

With respect to the appeals process for Jewish class members, the Court noted that the "independent appellate mechanism that has been established under the German Foundation Law for Jewish former slave and forced laborers comports with due process under the laws of the United States and also satisfies the objectives of efficiency and convenience to class members as set forth under the Distribution Plan." The Court observed that the Chairmen of the appellate authority, both of whom had been born in pre-War Europe and later resided in Israel, were highly

The process of locating and paying heirs was even more complicated for the separate Deposited Assets Class under the Swiss Banks Settlement, because the amounts of the awards were often substantial; the division of the award was more complex and depended upon the relationship of a particular heir to a particular account owner; and the heirs sometimes did not disclose the existence of other heirs or objected to the inclusion of certain heirs in the award. This is discussed more fully in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process."

qualified: Jakob Hirsch was an Israeli attorney who had served for two decades in the Office of the State Comptroller of Israel; Ze'ev Victor Sher likewise had served in the Office of the State Comptroller of Israel and also had been Economic Minister to the United States and Canada as well as Deputy Attorney General of Israel.[69]

However, the Court reserved its right to deviate from opinions of the appellate body, as well as those of the German Foundation. "To the extent that issues may arise during the appellate process that are unique to Slave Labor Class I, the Claims Conference shall so advise the Court and the Court or its designee, in its discretion, may review de novo that portion of the appellate decision relating to Slave Labor Class I, or may issue supplemental guidelines which shall govern the appellate process for appeals rising under Slave Labor Class I. In the event that a conflict may arise between the appellate body appointed pursuant to the German Foundation Legislation and the Court, the determination of the Court shall be dispositive as to Slave Labor Class I."[70]

As to appeals for Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled class members, the Court similarly approved the appellate procedures the IOM had recommended, which had been adopted by the German Foundation. The Court noted the professional qualifications of the three-member review board. The Chairman, Matti Pellonpää, was a Judge at the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg who previously had served on the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal at The Hague, the Supreme Administrative Court of Finland in Helsinki and the United Nations Compensation Commission in Geneva. Nataša Zupančič, the second member, was a counselor in the International Law Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Slovenia, and also was a member of IOM's Steering Group of Most Involved Victims' Associations. The third member, Les Kuczynski, was a United States lawyer who served as National Counsel for the Polish National Alliance, as well as National Executive Director of the Polish American Congress, and was a member of IOM's Steering Committee.

[69] The Claims Conference subsequently advised the Court that one of the chairmen of the appeals committee had resigned "for personal reasons," and recommended both to the German Foundation and to the Court that attorney Herb Kronish be appointed as the replacement Chairman of the Appeals Authority. The German Foundation approved the request by letter dated Oct. 12, 2006, and the Court likewise issued its approval by order dated Nov. 7, 2006.

[70] See Order, Feb. 11, 2003.

The Court concluded that, as true for the Claims Conference appeals structure, the IOM's appeals program satisfied due process as well as the objectives of efficiency and convenience. In the event of a conflict with the IOM appeal body, the Court's determination would be dispositive. The IOM's appellate rules also incorporated an "addendum" to govern unique aspects of Slave Labor Class I, such as the requirement that the claimant be a member of one of the five defined groups of "victims or targets of Nazi persecution," which did not apply to the German Foundation.[71]

III. ANTICIPATING THE NUMBER OF SURVIVING SLAVE LABORERS ELIGIBLE FOR PAYMENT

A. Historical Background

In formulating the recommendations in the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, and later in assessing slave labor claims, it was necessary to estimate the number of potentially eligible claimants. This was not an exact science. The scholarship concerning the economic aspects of the Holocaust, including the use of slave labor, was still in a relatively nascent stage at the time the Settlement Agreement was reached. As noted in the Distribution Plan:

> There is no definitive means to determine the actual number of Jews and other "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" who were forced to perform slave labor. Nor can it be precisely determined how many of those persons survived the War. As the Allies marched through Germany at the end of the War, they liberated prisoners not only from well-known concentration camps (like Auschwitz and Dachau), but also from hundreds of lesser-known and incompletely researched factory websites, external work detachments, "death marches," and other types of imprisonment and enslavement. Thus, assessments of the number of survivors that include only those liberated from 'official' concentration camps generally [71] See Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849, at 3 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 25, 2003). The Court ultimately authorized $250,850 in payments based upon "positive decisions by the IOM Appeals Body …. Despite this relatively small amount, the existence of an independent appellate procedure for Slave Labour Class I was an important element in IOM's efforts to establish an objective, fair and efficient claims review procedure." Lutz Niethammer, who served as the German Foundation's historical expert, offered a similar assessment of the limited knowledge available at the outset of the compensation process.

> We have partial sets of data relating to work carried out for certain companies or camps and we have estimates for ghettos. But the overall dimension, doubtless in the millions, is impossible to determine. As a result, no figures could be given prior to the payment of compensation. In 1999 experts involved estimated that former slave laborers among the Holocaust survivors, including those able to escape at an early stage of the persecution, accounted for only about 60% of the applications that were approved for payment, i.e., 158,600.[74]

Those estimates proved too low, for a variety of reasons. While the picture still remains incomplete, newer scholarship has challenged some of the traditional concepts concerning Nazi policies toward Jewish labor. Whereas historians originally shared the "widespread thesis that compulsory work was organized only by the SS and that exploitation was only an intermediate tactic on the way to mass murder or, rather, that it was only a facet in the destruction of the Jews,"[75] a somewhat more nuanced interpretation has emerged. That view holds that "deportations were modified in favor of forced labor and that the National Socialists even coordinated the genocide program with the requirements of the labor market and the economy in Germany and in Poland." This analysis "fundamentally refutes the thesis that compulsory work was only an intermezzo on the way to mass murder, or rather was only an element of the destruction of the Jews,"[76] a long-standing theory that had as one major consequence the "inexcusabl[e] underestimate[ion]" of "the duration, extent, and historical significance of forced labor."[77]

The Austrian Reconciliation Fund, in its final report on compensation programs for those who had performed slave and forced labor in Austria, observed that such labor was integral to the Nazi war effort.

> [T]he German economy had begun to suffer from a shortage of labor soon after the outbreak of war…. [O]ne is forced to agree with Ulrich Herbert, who in his article Die politische Ökonomie des Holocaust concluded that, "the deployment of forced labor in the German war economy was no side effect initiated by the regime, but was one of the major prerequisites for the six-year war conducted by Germany," as "no later than winter 1941/42 when the tide of war began to turn, the German economy was dependent on the employment of foreign forced laborers with no alternative."[78]

No scholar has yet been able to draw a line under these subjects: the scope of the Nazi use of slaves, and the number of human beings who were dragged into the German slave labor machine. What was clear was that slave labor was pervasive and integral to the Nazi war effort. Even with the field of research still developing, however, when formulating the Distribution Plan recommendations, there were reliable sources from which to draw some broad conclusions about the number of victims who might have survived the Holocaust. This information included the continuing scholarship about the vast number of camps and ghettos in the Nazi system; data from prior restitution programs; and the ongoing discovery of new lists of victims' names, some of which were the direct result of the Victim List Project, a program established by the Court to gather and recognize the names of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution — those who perished and those who survived.[79]

B. The Developing Scholarship About Slave Labor Use and Survivors

The Distribution Plan observed that "[d]espite all of the published literature on World War II and the Holocaust, significant gaps remain regarding the Nazi use of slave labor. Indeed, Richard J. Evans of the University of London" wrote in 1989 that "intensive research into the broader question of the Nazi economic exploitation of its prisoners 'has only recently begun.' Avraham Barkai echoed this observation in 1991 and noted that 'the various and sundry activities of German entrepreneurs in the occupied territories is a chapter that has been little investigated to date.' And, in his 1998 study, Peter Hayes of Northwestern University observed that it is only now 'becoming possible to write a systematic and comprehensive history of the role of German big business in the Nazi assault on European Jews.'"[80] A few years later, writing in 2004, Professor Hayes noted that while knowledge was improving, "a good deal of work remains to be done. I am not familiar with a single military history of World War II that directs readers' attention to who built the bunkers that defended Normandy, though few fail any longer to comment on who assembled the V-2's and under what conditions. Even studies that center on forced and slave labor have trouble keeping track of its most horrible sites - the IG Farben factory at Auschwitz is always mentioned, but seldom that at nearby Blechhammer where the inmate construction force was larger and the death toll also may have been, at least in 1944."[81]

[79] The Victim List Project was established "to encourage and help organize the compilation and greater accessibility worldwide of the names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement was intended to benefit: Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who survived as well as those who perished." There has been "good progress made by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM), in cooperation with Yad Vashem, towards the creation of a worldwide catalog of all known archival and testimonial sources of the names of those who perished and of survivors who suffered; the acquisition of major archival sources of names; the mass digitization of the individual names of the victims of the Nazis and their allies; and the provision of public access to this information." See Order, Apr. 24, 2012, at 1.

As to the number of slave laborers, that knowledge, too, is incomplete. The Distribution Plan noted that the Holocaust economic historian Ulrich Herbert had considered that the "number of Jews who were deployed to forced labor … cannot be estimated precisely enough," and that areas in need of further research included "the 'activities of German industry in Poland and the occupied regions of the Soviet Union, the deployment of concentration camp inmates as forced labor in the Reich (especially during the final phase of the War), as well as the Head Office for Economy and Administration … of the S.S.'"[82] A scholar of the Skarzysko-Kamienna slave labor camp and a survivor herself, Felicja Karay, similarly observed that "hundreds of anonymous slave labor camps across the face of Europe have remained a blank page in the history of the Third Reich. The lack of scholarly interest in the subject stemmed from a dearth of German documentary sources, which had either been lost or deliberately destroyed, the unappealing nature of the subject and language difficulties (the testimonies of former prisoners have been recorded in every European language imaginable and never translated into English)."[83]

Although there are gaps in the historical knowledge, efforts have been made to estimate the number of Jewish individuals who survived the Holocaust, and more specifically, the experience of slave labor. The Distribution Plan noted that although there were "'no reliable, agreed-upon, statistics on the number of Jewish Nazi victims living in the world today,'" as a starting point, estimates of the number of surviving Jewish victims ranged from 832,000 to 960,000.[84] Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg believed that "[m]ore than a million Jews who had lived under direct German control or in countries allied with Germany, and who had not fled to safety before or during the war, were still alive after May 1945. The largest cluster in this remainder consisted of Jews who had not been engulfed in the final phase of the destruction process," such as in Romania, Bulgaria, Budapest and parts of Western Europe.[85]

MARRUS, THE UNWANTED: EUROPEAN REFUGEES IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY 331 (Oxford Univ. Press 1985) ("We now know that about one million [Jews] remained in Europe outside the Soviet Union").

Data on surviving members of other "Victim or Target" groups was even more difficult to locate. The Notice Plan, adopted by the Court following its proposal by Settlement Class Counsel, reported that "the number of Roma who survived concentration and forced labor camps and those who survived by going into hiding cannot be estimated accurately."[86] The claims process revealed that the number of Roma survivors was substantial, and considerably higher than had been estimated. Likewise, while some estimates were available at the end of the War about survivors who were Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexual or disabled, no accurate information existed about the number of survivors as of 2000. In place of such estimates, the Distribution Plan took note of alternate sources of data, such as the number of Initial Questionnaires submitted by individuals who identified themselves as Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled.[87]

More recent investigations have unearthed a wealth of new data about another source of information: the sites at which slave labor likely was used. This research has been conducted on behalf of the leading Holocaust research institutions — Yad Vashem and the USHMM — as well as the Claims Conference, and the German Foundation itself.

The German Foundation compiled an extensive list of thousands of concentration camps and other places of detention in support of its efforts to analyze slave and forced labor claims. As the German Foundation explained:

> The directory of places of detention of the foundation ["Remembrance, Responsibility and Future"] (EVZ) provides information on approximately 3,800 camps and places of detention, which had been taken into consideration along the lines of the payments to former forced labourers by the foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" www.stiftung-evz.de/eng/. The directory includes information on their purpose as places of detention for forced labourers, their geographical position as well as literature and bibliography list of sources….

86 See Distribution Plan, at C-18 - C-19.

87 The Distribution Plan also took into account statistics made available by the Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa, a program to assist needy Nazi victims established by the Swiss government in 1997 after the Swiss Banks litigation commenced, but which was unrelated to that lawsuit and settlement. The Swiss Humanitarian Fund reported as of 2000 that it had compensated approximately 250,098 Jewish survivors; 14,917 Roma survivors; 69 Jehovah's Witness survivors; 32 disabled survivors; and 9 homosexual survivors. See Distribution Plan, Annex C; see also Annex K ("Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa"), at K-29.

The directory … originated from the occasion of the payout to former forced labourers. It was a tool to determine the eligibility for benefits of former forced labourers in terms of the law for the establishment of a foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" dated 2nd August 2000. The law provided that whoever had been imprisoned in a concentration camp or in any other place of detention outside of the territory of what now belongs to the Republic of Austria or in any ghetto under similar conditions subjected to forced labour could receive up to 15,000 Deutschmarks. Concentration camps are those camps, that according to § 42 section 2 of the "Bundesentschädigungsgesetz" are considered to be such. Corresponding lists were published in the Federal Law Gazette in 1977 and 1982 (BGBl. I 1977, 1786-1852 and 1982, 1571-1579). In addition to these camps, there were other places of detention where the prison conditions were in fundamental aspects similar to those of a concentration camp although they did not belong to the system of National Socialist concentration camps. Hence the Foundation Law provided the opportunity of classifying further places of detention into this group. The Foundation Law determined that the following three features were required:

> inhuman prison conditions,
>
> poor nutrition,
> lack of medical care.

The directory of places of detention of the foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" includes places of detention that match all these three features. The directory is the result of the processing of applications of the partner organisations of the foundation that are concerning this matter. Some partner organisations had already submitted existing camp directories. Corresponding directories of places of detention have been published in Poland, the Czech Republic, Belarus, Ukraine and Russia [i.e. five of the seven partner organizations]. A further basis for the existing directory was the directory of places of detention led by the "Reichsführer SS" which was established by the International Tracing Service in Bad Arolsen in 1979. Sometimes the partner organisations suggested certain camp categories from these directories regardless of whether there actually was an applicant from each individual camp, like for example the forced labour camps for Jews. Other partner organisations have only applied for those camps from where people survived. The foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" asked historians from Germany and the countries of the partner organisations for votes on the presence of the required three characteristics and based on these statements they decided upon the inclusion of the camp in the directory.

> Based on this some 3,800 camps have been recognised as places of detention and taken into consideration in the payments made to former forced labourers.[88]

By the close of the claims process, the German Foundation had determined that there were actually "about 3,900 additional places of confinement" (as opposed to the 3,800 cited above). The "verification of this information turned out to be more complex than anticipated," and the "emergence of new historically relevant information slowed down the claims processing."[89]

In addition to the research on places of detention conducted by the German Foundation, other institutions similarly have undertaken extensive new analyses of ghettos, camps and other sites where slave labor was likely to have occurred. In 2012, the USHMM announced the publication of two volumes of its Encyclopedia of Camps and Ghettos, 1933-1945.

"The database-supported Internet directory provides different search options: Search by keyword, camp, location, country." Id. In subsequent legislation enacted in 2007, the German government formally recognized that at least in certain situations, Nazi victims, including those who were Jewish, may have performed compensable labor in ghettos even if the employment was not "coerced." Under the Directive, a one-time payment was to be made to those "who had not previously received compensation under the slave/forced labor provisions of the German Foundation, and likewise had not been compensated under statutory insurance schemes," nor was the payment to be made "in respect of periods spent in a labour camp or concentration camp." Instead, to qualify, "[i]t is important that the individual worked without coercion during this time. However, there is no requirement that the work constituted employment within the meaning of the law on pensions. Instead, it suffices that the work was taken upon referral by the Jewish council or ghetto labour office and the working conditions were structured in such a way that the work could be undertaken without the direct application or threat of physical violence." See GERMAN FINANCE MINISTRY, COMPENSATION FOR NATIONAL SOCIALIST INJUSTICE 37 (June 2009).

See also Jansen, Saathoff & Hennig, at 122 ("The great number of camps recognized as 'other places of confinement' clearly shows just how widespread forced labor had become during the Third Reich. The Foundation's list of 'other places of confinement' names twenty-four different countries").

In the words of one reviewer, the "massive two-volume set edited by Martin Dean and Geoffrey Megargee … focuses specifically on the ghettos of Nazi-occupied Eastern Europe. It stands without doubt as the definitive reference guide on this topic in the world today. This is not hyperbole, but simply a recognition of the meticulous collaborative research that went into assembling such a massive collection of information."[90]

The USHMM collection leaves no doubt that the number of ghettos is considerably larger than had been previously known:

> Even after decades of in-depth Holocaust research, excruciating details are only now emerging about more than 1,100 German-run ghettos in Eastern Europe where the Nazis murdered hundreds of thousands of Jews.
>
> And there were about 200 more ghettos than previously believed, said Martin Dean, editor of the recently published "Encyclopedia of Camps and Ghettos, 1933-1945, Volume II." It's part of a long-term effort to document every site of organized Nazi persecution, beyond the well-known Warsaw ghetto and extermination camps like Auschwitz….
> It "gives us information about ghettos that would slip into historical oblivion and be forgotten forever if we didn't have this volume," Holocaust scholar Lawrence Langer said. "Who knew there were more than 1,000 ghettos?"….

> Researchers and writers scoured the world to find new witnesses, study archives opened after the fall of communism and survivors' texts and testimonies in many languages….
> Another encyclopedia of World War II ghettos was published in 2009 by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem …. The two projects are "complementary," says Dan Michman, the head of Yad Vashem's Institute for Holocaust Research who wrote the introduction to its encyclopedia. The rest of the seven-volume U.S. project is expected to be completed in the next decade, tracking more than 20,000 sites of wartime persecution of both Jews and non-Jews.
> The new volume covers ghettos from Moscow to today's German border, and St. Petersburg to Yalta, in Ukraine. The next volume will cover camps and ghettos run by states aligned with Nazi Germany like Vichy France, Romania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Slovakia, Italy and Croatia.[91]

As the leader of the USHMM project, Dr. Martin Dean, explained, source materials were becoming more readily accessible. "[S]ince 1991 the extent of our knowledge has improved. The opening of Soviet archives, increased access to postwar criminal investigations, and the collection of further testimonies and eyewitness accounts have made it possible to research the topic in further detail. In particular, considerable progress is now being made in piecing together the history of the many smaller ghettos from scattered archival collections in various languages."[92]

When the USHMM neared completion of the first phase of its work on its encyclopedia, the New York Times headlined its article: "The Holocaust Just Got More Shocking."[93] The

Dr. Dean observed that "[g]iven this considerable recent progress, it is opportune that the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies is now preparing its encyclopedia volume of all ghettos under German occupation, intended both as a guide for scholars and as a document of the sites of the Holocaust …. Ghettos under satellite control, especially those in Transnistria and Greater Hungary, will be dealt with in a subsequent volume, covering all the camps of the satellite states… Clearly, previous estimates of probably not more than 200 ghettos having existed in the occupied Soviet Union now have to be revised upward and probably will reach as many as 400 or more, similar to the number in Poland…." Id., at 39, 47.

The article noted that two of the expected seven volumes of the encyclopedia had been completed (with the final completion date expected by 2025), and that the lead editors on the project were Geoffrey Megargee and Martin Dean. "When the research began in 2000, Dr. Megargee said he expected to find perhaps 7,000 Nazi camps and ghettos, based on postwar estimates. But the numbers kept climbing — first to 11,500, then 20,000, then 30,000, and now newspaper reported that the museum had spent 13 years at the "grim task of documenting all the ghettos, slave labor sites, concentration camps and killing factories that the Nazis set up throughout Europe. What they have found so far has shocked even scholars steeped in the history of the Holocaust. The researchers have catalogued some 42,500 Nazi ghettos and camps throughout Europe, spanning German-controlled areas from France to Russia and Germany itself…. The figure is so staggering that even fellow Holocaust scholars had to make sure they had heard it correctly when the lead researchers previewed their findings at an academic forum in late January [2013] at the German Historical Institute in Washington. 'The numbers are so much higher than what we originally thought,' Hartmut Berghoff, director of the institute, said in an interview after learning of the new data.'"[94] Although "Auschwitz and a handful of other concentration camps have come to symbolize the Nazi killing machine in the public consciousness," and the Warsaw ghetto similarly has stood in for all such places of confinement, "these sites, infamous though they are, represent only a minuscule fraction of the entire German network…."[95]

In 2017, the USHMM announced that the first two volumes of its "pathbreaking" Encyclopedia were "now freely accessible in their entirety on the Museum's website as part of the Museum's commitment to increasing the visibility, impact, and productivity of the field of Holocaust studies in the United States and abroad."[96] The research "will provide the most

For example, there were camps that changed purposes over time and brothels that existed within camps. To err on the side of caution, sites … were counted only once. Researchers also refrained from counting sub-camps, of which there were tens of thousands. For researchers to conclude that a site had existed, they could not just rely on one person's testimony. It was imperative that multiple witness testimonies and official documents corroborated each other in order for a site to make the series").

The Encyclopedia has greatly expanded knowledge of the size and scope of the Holocaust and has changed our awareness of the camp universe and of Nazi Germany as a whole."[98]

In addition to the USHMM in Washington, D.C., Yad Vashem in Jerusalem also has helped to expand dramatically the knowledge about Nazi sites of incarceration. Professor Dan Michman explained, in his Introduction to Yad Vashem's Encyclopedia of the Ghettos During the Holocaust, that in the "first decades after the Holocaust (certainly among Jewish scholars), the ghetto was thought to constitute a preparatory stage for the Final Solution" and that "public awareness and historiography of the Holocaust" had given "special weight to a few large ghettos about which we have abundant and diverse extant documentation."[99] While some 750,000

Michman noted that the "accepted view of the role of ghettos in Nazi policy as an inevitable way station on the road to the Final Solution was determined during the first fifteen years of research following the Holocaust, and thereafter fixed." He cited the 1961 publication of "Raul Hilberg's influential work, The Destruction of the European Jews," as the point at which "[t]his notion became entrenched in the literature," with its description of the Holocaust "as an event that progressed — or perhaps better, regressed — in a linear fashion, from the Nazis' rise to power in 1933 to the systematic murder campaign that began in 1941." Michman noted that the "burgeoning Holocaust research since the end of the 1960s, internationally and among Israeli academics in particular, has largely conceived of the Jewish society in the ghettos as a vibrant community that endured existential challenges." *Id. are part of a much larger project that encompasses tens of thousands of camps, many of which did not play a role in the Nazi genocide of the Jews").

It is the lack of inclusion of the many work sites outside the concentration camp system that may help to explain a viewpoint held by some researchers: that relatively few Jewish victims survived slave labor. Raul Hilberg posited that as of 1999, "a figure of 120,000" surviving slave laborers "could not possibly have been reached," but he indicated that his estimation might have been based upon his consideration of only those who had survived Nazi "concentration camps" per se. He also had very specific opinions about which individuals and which locales should qualify for compensation. Thus, Professor Hilberg suggested that it was not appropriate to include camps operated by "satellite governments." He appeared to disagree with the decision of "the foundation operating under German law," i.e., the German Foundation, to "include labor services that had been formed and deployed by satellite governments for their own purposes in the shadow of an adjacent German presence." RAUL HILBERG, THE DESTRUCTION OF THE EUROPEAN JEWS 1287 (Yale Univ. Press 3d ed. 2003), at. See also David Ridgen, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Interview with Mr. Raul Hilberg, Apr. 22, 2002 (previously available at www.normanfinkelstein.com/article.php?pg+3&ar=50) ("[i]f we talk about slave labor in concentration camps or concentration camp-like conditions, then the number that survives isn't very great … [W]e run into the numbers problem, and the question of whom among those forced laborers should collect [compensation] … Should it be Romanian Jews who worked for the Romanian railways? Well obviously not…."); Mark Spoerer & Jochen Fleischhacker, Forced Laborers in Nazi Germany: Categories, Numbers and Survivors, 33 J. INTERDISC. HIST. 169, 191, 193, 202 (2002) (stating that Holocaust scholars Leonard Dinnerstein and Saul Friedlander "set the number of all surviving Jewish CC [concentration camp] inmates (including Polish and Soviet Jews) at no more than 100,000" at the "end of the War;" the authors concluded "that there were approximately 126,000 Jewish concentration camp survivors;" elsewhere, the authors stated that scholar Joseph Billig "arrive[d] at a figure of c. 450,000" while Friedlander "estimates that, at most, 475,000 inmates survived," and "[a]dding the Billig and Friedlander survivors comes close to [a] total of 1.55 million;" the authors concluded that as of mid-2000, approximately 73,000 Jews still survived who were "Former Foreign Laborers Employed in Nazi Germany"); Mark Spoerer & Jochen Fleischhacker, The compensation of Nazi Germany's forced labourers: Demographic findings and political implications, 56 POPULATION STUD. 5, 15 (2002) (concluding that there were 75,000 "[s]urviving former forced labourer in Nazi Germany").

However, when examining solely the number of Jews who survived the Holocaust — as opposed to those who survived "concentration camps" — Hilberg's calculation increased by ten-fold. His data indicated that "[m]ore than a million Jews who had lived under direct German control or in countries allied with Germany, and who had not fled to safety before or during the war, were still alive after May 1945. The largest cluster in this remainder consisted of Jews who had not been engulfed in the final phase of the destruction process," such as in Romania, Bulgaria, Budapest and parts of Western Europe. MARRUS, THE UNWANTED: EUROPEAN REFUGEES IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY 331 (Oxford Univ. Press 1985) ("We now know that about one million [Jews] remained in Europe outside the Soviet Union").

In addition to the gaps in knowledge about the Nazi camps and ghettos, there is also incomplete knowledge about the victims of the Holocaust. There is not yet a definitive list of names of all who perished in the Holocaust. Nor is there a definitive list of who survived, and how they did so. Indeed, the intent of the Victim List Project established and funded by the Court has been to assist in the development of just such a database: a reliable list of the names of

The disagreement on the number of surviving slave laborers may be based upon definitional disparities. Particularly before the recent research on the pervasive scope of Nazi slave labor policies and the ubiquity of work sites throughout Europe, efforts to tally the number of surviving slave laborers appeared to focus on one type of survivor only: those who survived the most infamous German concentration camps, such as Auschwitz and Mauthausen. For example, as Hilberg stated, he did not consider those who survived Romanian labor battalions to have been slave laborers. His definition of slave labor is not one that was shared by the German Foundation or by the Court under Slave Labor Class I, in determining which Nazi victims to compensate.

Another Holocaust historian, Yehuda Bauer, has noted that terminology varies, and that it would be misleading to conflate those who survived the infamous death camps with those who survived slave labor. Thus, in one context, he estimated that that there were "around 200,000 Jewish survivors of Nazi camps" (see Yehuda Bauer, Jewish Survivors in DP Camps and She'erith Hapletah, in THE NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMPS: STRUCTURE AND AIMS, THE IMAGE OF THE PRISONER, THE JEWS IN THE CAMPS: PROCEEDINGS OF THE FOURTH YAD VASHEM INTERNATIONAL HISTORICAL CONFERENCE, JANUARY 1980 491, 492 (Yad Vashem 1984). However, he emphasized that he was not suggesting that only 200,000 Jewish victims survived the war. With historian Yisrael Gutman, Yehuda Bauer wrote in an October 2001 letter to the Claims Conference that the "large numbers of Jewish slave laborers who were liberated before the end of the war, in Austria, Poland, Romania (Transnistria), Hungary, Czechia and Slovakia" should not be ignored, and that in terms of calculating the total number of surviving slave laborers: "We have not ourselves done such research, and we feel that serious investigation is needed if one is to arrive at a reasonably sensible figure. In fact, in our own research[] we only related to those Jews who were liberated on German soil at the end of the war."

Several years after expressing the view that the projected number of surviving slave laborers was too high, Hilberg observed that Holocaust research had progressed from what he characterized as the earliest period, just after the War, to the "middle period" when "research became organized," to "the third stage, the stage of complexity," in which researchers "now look for contexts." Raul Hilberg, The Development of Holocaust Research: A Personal Overview, 35 YAD VASHEM STUD., no. 2, 2007 at 21. These different contexts were important in terms of assessing differing Nazi goals, including the use of slave labor, at different points in time. He cited the example of his own examination of Slovakia, when the "Slovaks made an offer to the Germans before the Germans were ready" and queried, "Why did the Slovaks offer them the Jews? I had to figure out the answer by reading literature that was entirely different, completely divorced from the Holocaust. Namely, the context in these small countries like Slovakia — where (as elsewhere) there was an economic depression and a great deal of unemployment during the 1930s — was the economy. So the Germans said, 'Okay. We now have a war. You can send us 100,000 laborers.' And they started sending laborers. Until they suddenly realized that the depression was over and they did not want to send them anymore. So they offered Jews as a substitute. And the Jews went — not, to be sure, to any German industry. They went to Majdanak and to Auschwitz. But these connections take a while to establish." Id., at 30. With the changing landscape of knowledge of the Holocaust, including the Nazis' slave labor needs and policies, it is not surprising that the German Foundation's own researcher observed that when the negotiations were under way in the late 1990s and early 2000s, "no one knew yet how many former slave and forced laborers were still living in what countries and how their numbers could be accurately determined," although estimates were eventually reached. Lutz Niethammer, From Forced Labor in Nazi Germany to the Foundation 'Remembrance, Responsibility and Future' - A Tentative History, in A MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND A MORAL OBLIGATION: THE FINAL REPORT ON GERMANY'S COMPENSATION PROGRAMS FOR FORCED LABOR AND OTHER PERSONAL INJURIES 15, 59 (Michael Jansen & Günter Saathoff eds., Palgrave Macmillan 2009).

those who perished and those who survived the Holocaust. These names, many of which have been inaccessible until recently, may be reviewed through a variety of gateways, including the two museums most directly involved with the Victim List Project, Yad Vashem and the USHMM.

Other internet portals include the genealogy site "JewishGen," affiliated with the New York-based Museum of Jewish Heritage - A Living Memorial to the Holocaust.[101] The JewishGen Holocaust Database is described as a "collection of databases containing information about Holocaust victims and survivors. It contains more than 2.75 million entries, from more than 190 component datasets,"[102] including a large number of databases collecting names of victims of the Holocaust. There is presumably overlap among the various databases (i.e., repetition of individual names). In addition, some of the databases likely contain many names of those who perished, as well as names of those who survived. Nevertheless, these extensive databases give some sense of the scope of information about survivors that has become available and accessible on the internet in relatively recent years, and the variety of sources that claims administrators were able to consult in confirming whether a particular claimant performed slave labor.

Thus, some examples of the many databases that have become accessible for research are the following:

C. Number of Anticipated Payments Based Upon Prior Restitution Programs

A source of data about the victims who might be eligible for compensation under Slave Labor Class I, and an important resource in analyzing and paying slave labor claims, were the Holocaust compensation systems Germany had established prior to the Swiss Banks Settlement and the German slave labor program.

Based upon the analysis of other Holocaust compensation programs, especially those administered on behalf of Germany, the Special Masters observed in the Distribution Plan that a "conservative measure of the number of slave laborers from across Nazi Europe who survive today [i.e., the year 2000, when the Distribution Plan was proposed and adopted]" was approximately 170,000 individuals, who were receiving monthly pensions under one of four separate German-funded Holocaust compensation programs.[106] Because of the rigorous eligibility requirements under these programs, which required extensive documentary proof concerning the claimant's whereabouts during the Nazi era, it was clear that a large number of these individuals had performed slave labor.[107]

[105] This is a portion of the list that the Special Masters obtained from the Swiss Federal Archives as part of the investigation into the claims of the Refugee Class. The existence of this list indicated that it would be appropriate to undertake an individualized claims process for survivors who were admitted into Switzerland as refugees but mistreated there. See Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 36, 170 and at Annex [H] ("The Refugee Class"). This issue is discussed more fully in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Refugee Class Claims Process."

[106] Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 145.

[107] Gribetz and Reig/Reparations, at 138-139.

The Distribution Plan described the major compensation programs already in existence and the number of survivors receiving such payments:

> …. [T]here are at least four German-derived indemnification funds for which former slave laborers are currently eligible [i.e., as of 2000]: (1) the BEG, which has its origin in the 1952 Luxembourg Agreement and is administered entirely by Germany, (2) the Israeli Disabled Victims of Nazi Persecution Law, which also arose pursuant to the Luxembourg Agreement, and its provision for German reparations to Israel, (3) the Article 2 Fund, begun in 1993, which is monitored and audited by Germany and administered by the [Claims Conference], and (4) the 1998 Central and Eastern European Fund ("CEEF"), which, like Article 2, is monitored and audited by Germany and administered by the Claims Conference.[108]

In "accordance with Germany's requirements, each of the four programs has stringent eligibility criteria. A recipient must demonstrate that, for a certain specified period of time, he or she was imprisoned in a concentration camp, ghetto, work camp or lived in hiding…. Further, the BEG pensions for damage to health, and the Israeli [Ministry of Finance], Article 2 and CEEF programs, require a showing of disability as a result of Nazi persecution. Moreover, with the exception of the BEG, each of the other pension programs is applicable only to those who do not exceed certain income requirements, or who are presumed needy because of residence in Central or Eastern Europe."[109]

Some 170,565 individuals were receiving compensation under the four programs as of the period 1998-2000, approximately the period during which the Distribution Plan was being formulated: 86,138 under the BEG's "damage to health" provisions;[110] approximately 22,000 through the Israeli Ministry of Finance program; 48,948 under Article 2; and 13,479 under the CEEF. "With the exception of those who lived in hiding (the total number of whom is unknown), it may be presumed that most pension recipients — having been imprisoned in concentration camps, ghettos and/or work camps — performed slave labor. Moreover, since the Israeli, Article 2 and CEEF programs are limited to needy survivors only, and also have other threshold criteria [such as minimum periods of confinement in a camp or ghetto], it may be further presumed that there are a considerable number of surviving slave laborers who are ineligible for these pensions and so are not reflected" in the foregoing statistics.[111]

[110] The BEG also provided for other types of compensation such as for loss of life; property damage; payment of taxes; and damage to educational/vocational opportunities — categories not relevant for purpose of assessing possible slave labor claimants. See generally Distribution Plan, Annex E ("Holocaust Compensation").

The Distribution Plan concluded that based upon the large number of Holocaust victims whom Germany had recognized and decided to compensate, and who still survived as of the inception of the Slave Labor Class I program, the "estimate of the [170,000] survivors who may have performed slave labor … appears to be conservative."[112]

D. The German Foundation's Estimates

The German Foundation reached its own estimates of the number of survivors potentially eligible for compensation under the German slave and forced labor program. These figures were comparable to the estimates based on prior compensation programs. As described by the German government's historical expert, Lutz Niethammer, at the time that the slave labor cases were pending and a resolution was under negotiation, it was particularly important to determine the potential number of recipients.

> How was it going to be possible to get a realistic estimate of the number of persons who were entitled to receive compensation payments broken down by categories, eligibility criteria, countries, and/or ethnic groups? …. My initial projections seemed to the representatives of industry to be too high and to the representatives of the victims not to be high enough…. [In September 1999] I was able to present an improved set of data for the forced labor question to … [the] parties to the negotiations. The data had been compiled in a cooperative effort, checked with scientific methods, and unanimously approved.
> Broken down by partner organizations, it contained information on category A, "slave labor" in concentration camps, ghettos, and comparable places of detention (214,000 plus 67,700 from other camps), and B, "forced labor," defined as laborers subject to racial discrimination deported to the Reich to work for public and industrial employers (623,000). In addition, there were 154,000 children in slave and forced labor camps. The number of forced laborers who were subject to > racial discrimination and used in the Reich as agricultural workers was estimated at 539,500, while the number of laborers of this kind who were used in the occupied territories was estimated at 243,500. The use of forced laborers outside the farm sector was estimated at 567,000 (a rough estimate without documented evidence).

[111] Distribution Plan, at H-6.

[112] Id., at H-5-6.

> This last figure was not included in the distribution agreements because of the fact that it could not be documented. The figures established for the categories A and B and for the individual partner organizations turned out to be fairly reliable as a basis for the further negotiations on distribution, disqualifying initial skepticism and in some cases even outrage expressed by some parties on the German side with regard to the overall numbers as well as attempts made by parties on the other side to adjust the figures upward.[113]

The distinction between "slave" labor ("Category A") versus "forced" labor ("Category B"), which under the German Foundation program resulted in two tiers of payment, largely was intended to differentiate between Jewish Nazi victims, whom the Nazis intended to work to death, and non-Jewish victims, who, while severely mistreated, generally were not subject to the same brutality as were the Jewish victims. Thus, at the start of the claims process, Germany's expert concluded that over 1.8 million individuals could be eligible for compensation, including over 281,000 persons (as well as others who were children at the time of the Holocaust) who had been imprisoned in camps, ghettos and similar sites, most of whom were Jewish slave laborers.[114]

[113] Niethammer, at 59-60. See also Austrian Reconciliation Fund Final Report at 141-42 ("Major problems arose when it came to ascertaining how many former forced laborers were still alive. Finally, Professor Lutz Niethammer, a German historian …, organized a group of experts in Florence who arrived at the following 'definitive estimates.' Roughly 1.5 million former forced laborers were assumed to be still alive; 670,000 of these had been employed in industry, 590,000 in agriculture and a further 240,000 had been kept as slave laborers under concentration camp conditions").

[114] Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat played a pivotal role in the Holocaust compensation movement of the 1990s. The United States government became involved with the matter in 1994, when Ambassador Eizenstat, then serving as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, initiated an inquiry into the Holocaust-era activities of Swiss banks. Ambassador Eizenstat has served in many other governmental roles, including Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Affairs, Under Secretary of Commerce, and Special Representative of the President and Secretary of State for Holocaust-Era Issues under President Clinton. He remains actively involved with Holocaust compensation issues.

In his book describing the negotiations leading to the creation of the German Foundation, Ambassador Eizenstat observed that "[t]here were two types of involuntary laborers. Those we came to call slave laborers had been confined in concentration camps and ghettos … They were worked to death, and the Nazis saw this as simply another form of extermination. Slightly more than half the slave laborers were Jewish, the rest mostly Poles and Russians. Forced laborers, almost exclusively non-Jewish workers from Eastern Europe, worked in everything from armaments factories to German farms and even in the postal service. Their living conditions were harsh

Neithammer's early estimates have since been reassessed as having been "unrealistically low": "In summer 1999, Niethammer estimated there were a total of 2,408,700 victims of Nazi forced labour still living. Of these, only about 214,000 fell into category A and 623,000 into category B – under the German side's definition of the categories – i.e. a third in all. Hundreds of thousands of people from east central and eastern Europe who had performed forced labour in occupied countries or in agriculture and other non-industrial fields would still not be accounted for."[115] In addition, Neithammer also "had not counted prisoners of war or the hundreds of thousands of civilian workers from western Europe, and made an unrealistically low estimate of the number of those affected in south eastern Europe."[116]

After the program closed, the German Foundation revisited Niethammer's original estimates in its 2017 publication: "The German Compensation Program for Forced Labor: Practice and Experiences."[117] The data demonstrated that over 2.25 million individuals potentially had been eligible for compensation, with 1.66 million paid.

The German Foundation Law determined eligibility. There was enormous variety in individual fates, with an extremely high number of potentially eligible persons all over the world. It had been estimated that of the persons who were still alive, 280,000 had carried out forced labor in concentration camps or ghettos, 623,000 in industry and in the public sector in Germany, 567,000 persons in occupied territories, and 783,000 in agriculture and other types of forced labor in a concentration camp, a similarly bad detention camp, or in a ghetto (category A); forced but better than those of slave laborers because they were considered assets of the state." STUART E. EIZENSTAT, IMPERFECT JUSTICE: LOOTED ASSETS, SLAVE LABOR, AND THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF WORLD WAR II 206-07 (PublicAffairs 2003). Ambassador Eizenstat confirmed that the "final estimates" accepted by the parties to the German Foundation agreement "were close to Niethammer's original numbers: 1.5 million workers still alive — 242,000 slave laborers (182,000 of whom had worked for private German industry and 60,000 for Reich-controlled institutions), 670,000 forced industrial workers, and 590,000 agricultural workers." Id., at 240.

labor in industry after deportation (category B); and an opening clause allowing partner organizations to define additional situations related to forced labor (category C).[118]

The German Foundation observed that "in the case of the forced labor program, acceptance of the estimates of potentially eligible victims and other historical assessments was facilitated by the involvement of expert historians designated by each of the parties involved in the negotiations."[119]

IV. ANALYZING CLAIMS

A. Assessing Eligibility for Those Who Had Received Prior Compensation

At the time of the Settlement Agreement and enactment of the German Foundation legislation, tens of thousands of survivors eligible for slave labor payments under these two new programs were receiving or had received other forms of Holocaust compensation. The eligibility criteria for many of these programs overlapped with the criteria for slave labor compensation, such as imprisonment in a camp or ghetto. In these cases, the evidence supporting the individual's claim for prior Holocaust compensation already had been assembled, reviewed, submitted to and approved by Germany years and even decades before the new Swiss and German slave labor programs. The same evidence therefore generally was sufficient also to prove that that individual had performed slave labor for purposes of the German Foundation and for Slave Labor Class I.

In "over 75% of these cases, the documents proving the applicant's persecution were found in the files of previous compensation programs administered and/or approved, but surely funded, by the German government."[120]

[120] Claims Conference Memo, "Process for Verification of Slave Labor Class I and German Foundation Applications," 2002 ("Verification Process Memo").

Prior to the submission of the applications to the German Foundation for payment, Claims Conference researchers check the official government archives of Germany and Israel for every slave and forced labor applicant that previously applied to the following Holocaust-related compensation programs: Bundesentschädigungsgesetz ('BEG'), the West German Indemnification program instituted in 1953, administered directly by the German government, which provides compensation to Holocaust survivors worldwide; and the 1957 Israel Finance Ministry Disability Payments Program — which provides Holocaust-related compensation to survivors residing in Israel. Both archives possess the applications to these compensation programs and documentation reflecting the persecution the applicant suffered. The Claims Conference also reviews the records (applications and supporting evidence) of every slave and forced labor applicant who previously applied to certain other, more recent, Holocaust compensation programs, namely, the Article 2 Fund, the Hardship Fund, and the Central and Eastern European Fund.[121]

[121] Id. The Verification Process Memo noted that these programs are "more fully described in the Distribution Plan, Vol. II, Annex E ('Holocaust Compensation'), at E-40-56…. The three programs were adopted by Germany following negotiations with the Claims Conference to provide for compensation to Holocaust survivors, primarily from Central and Eastern Europe, who had been excluded from earlier programs because of geographic restrictions. The Hardship Fund, which began in 1980, provides for one-time payments to those who suffered damage to health; the Article 2 Fund (commencing in 1992) and the Central and Eastern European Fund (CEEF) (1998) provide for pensions to those who were incarcerated for specified time periods and who meet German income requirements. Although the Claims Conference administers all three programs, all applications are reviewed and approved by German officials prior to payment."

The Claims Conference has successfully renegotiated with Germany various provisions of the compensation programs. For example, in recent years, the Claims Conference has achieved a number of new benefits for survivors worldwide: (1) first-ever payments (under the Hardship Fund) to some 80,000 victims still living primarily in the former Soviet Union, including the following: (a) individuals who had fled ahead of the Nazis but who had never been eligible for compensation; (b) individuals who survived the Leningrad siege; and (c) individuals who were within 100 kilometers to the east of the Russian front and fled eastward in the Soviet Union ahead of advancing Nazi troops; (2) first-ever payments (under the Hardship Fund) to those whose liberty was restricted in Morocco; (3) the establishment of a new payment program – the Child Survivor Fund – for survivors who lost their youth to terror or atrocity and were, typically, separated from parents they never saw again; (4) equalization of pension amounts, regardless of the survivors' country of residence; (5) reduction of the amount of time a survivor had to spend in a concentration camp or ghetto to be eligible for a pension (under the Article 2 Fund or CEEF) to 3 months; and (6) reduction of the amount of time a survivor had to spend living under false identity or in hiding to be eligible for a pension (under the Article 2 Fund or CEEF) – originally 18 months, then reduced to 12 months, and later reduced to 6 months – to take into account historical circumstances of survivors in Greece, Italy, Hungary, France and Slovakia, who had been forced into hiding for periods of generally more than 6 but less than 12 months. See Press Release, Claims Conference, 80,000 Holocaust Victims in Former USSR to be Paid by Germany for First Time; Claims Conference Attains Historic Breakthrough in Negotiations with German Government (July 9, 2012). Those who fled or lived in hiding or under false identity, however, were not eligible for slave labor payments from the German Foundation or under Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement.

In total – through all of the compensation programs it administers – the amount of compensation the Claims Conference paid out directly to individual Holocaust victims in 2014 was over $350 million, which was over $50 million more than it distributed in 2013 (when the amount was about $298 million) and approximately $87 million more than it distributed through such programs in 2012 (when it paid out approximately $264 million).

As with the BEG and Israeli Finance Ministry Programs, final approval for each of these programs also rests with the German government as these programs likewise are entirely funded by the German government. However, criteria for these programs and the Slave Labor Program differ, and so each application file must be carefully reviewed. For example, a survivor who qualifies for a pension under Article 2 because he or she suffered persecution by spending at least 18 months in hiding, would not be eligible for a slave/forced labor payment, which does not apply to individuals who were in hiding. Conversely, a concentration camp survivor may be ineligible for the Article 2 Fund payment because his or her income exceeds that program's limit or because he or she does not meet the time limitations specified under the Article 2 program (e.g., a minimum of six months' incarceration). That person nevertheless would qualify for a slave labor payment under both the German Foundation and Slave Labor Class I programs, and his or her Article 2 file may have documents verifying the persecution history.[122]

Thus, between 2012 – 2014 alone, the Claims Conference distributed a total of about $913 million in direct compensation, in addition to extensive social welfare assistance, to victims of Nazi persecution worldwide.

[122] Verification Process Memo, at 2-3. See also Claims Conference 2006 Annual Report, at 16 ("Major criteria that the Claims Conference had to consider when evaluating applications included determining exact dates of persecution, whether a person received prior compensation from a German company, verifying the place of persecution, and checking the identity of the individual").

As contemplated by the Distribution Plan, the claims process for Slave Labor Class I adhered closely to the procedures adopted by the German Foundation, maximizing administrative efficiencies and conserving Settlement Fund expenses. Under both the Swiss Banks Settlement and German Foundation programs, the application process was designed to rely heavily upon information concerning Holocaust survivors already available from prior restitution programs, such as the Article 2 Fund and CEEF administered by the Claims Conference on behalf of the German government. Thus, approximately 40,000 individuals receiving Article 2 and CEEF pensions from Germany essentially were "pre-approved" for payment under Slave Labor Class I: these survivors received pensions from Germany because of their confinement to camps or ghettos and, under the rules of the German Foundation and Slave Labor Class I, were presumed to have performed slave labor.

In November 2009, the Clams Conference discovered a fraud involving its Article 2 and CEEF programs, perpetrated by certain Claims Conference staff, claimants and third party facilitators. The fraud, which the Claims Conference reported to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), was investigated both by the FBI and the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York and several individuals were charged and convicted. The fraud was estimated at approximately $60 million. The Claims Conference reported to the Court that certain Slave Labor I payments had been based upon fraudulent Article 2/CEEF payments: "As of June 30, 2013, the total amount of payments under [SL I] arising from prior approval under fraudulent Article 2 Fund payments has been determined to be $511,000, with an additional $378,000 having been paid to individuals who have appealed fraudulent determinations by the CC. The $511,000 represents 0.2% of the total of approximately $252 million [approved for payment] by the [Court as recommended by the] CC" to 170,000 survivors and certain heirs. The Claims Conference explained that the payments were under review "and the Court will continue to be kept apprised." See Claims Conference Declaration, Nov. 7, 2013, at 15 n.8, filed in connection with the Claims Conference's opposition to a motion by certain survivors challenging the Court's May 13, 2013 orders allocating residual funds (see In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2013 WL 2152667 (E.D.N.Y. May 13, 2013) (allocation to needy survivors); In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2013 WL 2153101 (E.D.N.Y. May 13, 2013) (allocation to the Victim List Project). Subsequently, the Claims Conference advised that efforts had been made to recoup the payments (ultimately determined to constitute 0.3% of the $252 million recommended under Slave Labor Class I), including several notifications to each

B. Determining Eligibility of Claimants Who Had Not Previously Received Holocaust Compensation

For those who had not previously received Holocaust compensation, the German Foundation legislation established criteria for assessing claimant eligibility. Under that law, eligibility was to be "demonstrated by the applicant by submission of supporting material. The partner organization shall bring in relevant evidence. If no relevant evidence is available, the claimant's eligibility can be made credible in some other way."[123] The Commentary to the German Foundation legislation noted that "[e]xtensive proofs of the fact of persecution and the use of forced labor already exist. These can and must be used. Written testimony can also be used as documentary evidence within the meaning of this provision. However, the affected persons because of their advanced age should not be burdened with unreasonable or protracted evidentiary requirements. A simple entry, for example, as a concentration camp prisoner or as a forced laborer, in the archives of the International Missing Persons Service in Arolsen is to be accepted as sufficient fulfillment of the proof requirement. In the absence of such material evidence, it is the responsibility of the applicant to make the damages claimed credible."[124]

The German Foundation's decision to accept a wide range of evidentiary proof reflected the reality that, so many decades after the Holocaust, there were limits to the surviving documentation, as well as the survivors' memories. As the Claims Conference observed:

> [D]ocumentation of claims of survivors of Auschwitz seldom came from material actually recorded at the camp. In 1944, most documentation about prisoners there was burned in one of the crematoria at Birkenau, necessitating a search for alternative documentation, which came in the form of transport lists.[125] recipient. Further review indicated that additional actions, such as formal litigation, would have been inappropriate under the circumstantces, and likely fruitless, as nearly all of the individuals who had received these payments were impoverished elderly Nazi victims, many of whom appeared to misunderstand the eligibility requirements under the Slave Labor Class I program.

As to the objections filed in 2013, the Court did not find these objections to be valid. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2014 WL 2547582 (E.D.N.Y. May 30, 2014). This is discussed in further detail in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Looted Assets Class Claims Process."

125 See "Restituting History."

In addition to the gaps in documentation, there were also lapses in recollection. Survivors did not always remember exactly where they had been enslaved. They would sometimes "remember details about a camp but not its name, describing the work they performed or the towns where they were, compelling researchers to search for sources that might provide the missing information. Other survivors could name specific dates upon which they entered a camp, enabling the Claims Conference to verify their persecution by consulting a transport list."[126]

That memories were imperfect so many years later was not unexpected. The former Nuremburg prosecutor and Holocaust compensation negotiator, Benjamin Ferencz, had confronted the same obstacle decades earlier. In the 1950s, he sought to gather evidence to support the first compensation claims against German industry — a frustrating process resulting in only minimal payments, leaving unresolved until the late 1990s the issue of compensating slave labor. As described in the Distribution Plan, and as Mr. Ferencz explained in his seminal work, Less Than Slaves, a survivor's incomplete memory by no means indicated that the claim was invalid. Rather, through a painstaking process of piecing together details from many sources and many people, the survivor's recollections could be confirmed:

> During the negotiations with the Claims Conference [in connection with the post-War attempts to establish compensation funds for individuals who had worked at companies notorious for their use of slave labor], AEG, which had acquired Telefunken, insisted that "the number of camp inmates who had been employed was insignificant" and, in response to Claims Conference lists of former AEG or Telefunken slave laborers, "demanded that the lists specify the camp in which each person was employed." Ferencz, at 114. "Complying with AEG's request was not as simple as it sounded. Over a hundred persons, for example, writing independently from different parts of the world, swore that they had worked for AEG at 'Ankers,' yet that name did not appear on any map of the region and AEG absolutely denied that it had ever had a plant at such location. The number of claimants was too large for the [Claims C]onference to dismiss the claims as fictitious, and after close interrogation of claimants, the mystery was unraveled. 'Ankers' was neither a town nor a factory but was the German name for a part of a machine — a belt or Anker — which was being manufactured by AEG in Riga.

> The workers only knew that they worked at 'Ankers,' without knowing that it was a thing, not a place."[127]

With an eye toward this history, in connection with the Slave Labor Program under the German Foundation and Swiss Banks Settlement, the "Claims Conference undertook to pro-actively research 150 Holocaust-related archives scattered in 29 countries around the world in order to find documentation that would satisfy the claim verification requirements of the German Foundation. Claims Conference researchers scoured paper and microfilmed lists — often handwritten and not alphabetised — in order to match the names of claimants to any documentation that would meet the guidelines established by the German Foundation."[128] Among the sources consulted were "concentration camp lists, ghetto registers, transport lists, labor battalion rosters, lists of slave laborers in factories and plants, lists of inmates on work gangs, lists of prisoners released or liberated from concentration camps by Allied forces or humanitarian groups, lists of recipients of packages sent by friends and relatives through the Red Cross, and testimonials of survivors produced in the immediate aftermath of the Nazi occupation."[129]

There were other potential additional sources to verify claims for those who had not previously received other types of German compensation:

> In addition to the archives relating to German compensation programs, other sources of verification of an applicant's slave or forced labor history may include the International Tracing Service of the Red Cross at Arolsen, Germany; original source material from Yad Vashem in Jerusalem; and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. Researchers at Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Museum examine the lists of "inmates" — compiled by Nazi or other authorities — in various concentration camps and ghettos housed at those archives, and compare these lists to application information.
> Further, claims asserting confinement in certain concentration camps, or which were submitted by residents of certain Western European countries, may be sent for verification to "local" archives, including the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau; Gedenkstätte Dachau; the Mauthausen Memorial Museum; KZ-

In addition, "reviews of holdings of archives in Europe were carried out by governments, museums, and Jewish organizations in Bulgaria, Belarus, Croatia, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Poland, Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Ukraine, and by the Shanghai Archives."[131]

As to survivors from the North Africa region, that research "created a particular challenge, since neither Yad Vashem nor the [USHMM] had covered these countries, and experts on the Holocaust in North Africa did not know where lists of slave and forced laborers were to be found. With the assistance of the [USHMM], the holdings of the relevant archives in France, Italy, the United Kingdom, Israel and Germany were scoured, and contact was made with the National Archives of Tunisia and Morocco and with such organizations as the World Association of Tunisian Jews. In view of the absence of Israeli or U.S. diplomatic relations with Libya, assistance was sought from the British Embassy in Tripoli, which kindly arranged for historians at the Libyan Studies Centre to review documents held in the National Archives of Libya."[132]

As the claims process progressed, at least 132 different sources of documentation had been consulted to determine whether Jewish claimants had performed slave labor and thus were entitled to compensation.[133] Examples of these sources included:

- International Tracing Service, Arolsen, Germany
- Buchenwald, Dachau, Majdanek, Stutthof, Stutowie, Neuengamme, Ravensbruck, and Sachsenhausen State Museums

130 Verification Process Memo, at 3. Another important element of verification was ensuring that claims were "made by living survivors." Thus, all applicants living outside of Israel "were required to provide a notarized signature on an application form, while applicants in Israel were required to provide their identification card, whose relevant information was logged in by postal authorities, in order to have post offices throughout the country accept their slave and forced labor claim forms. In addition, as a condition to compensation, recipients of BEG, Article 2 and [CEEF] pensions annually [were] required to submit a signed life certificate" which the Claims Conference reviewed "prior to approving the claimant's Slave Labor Program application." Id.

In the case of claimants for whom documentation could not be found, they were "invited to describe their persecution experiences and these statements could constitute part of the proof that the claimant was eligible for a payment."[135]

In its 2017 publication reviewing the forced labor program, the German Foundation noted the emphasis that had been placed upon implementing evidentiary rules that were not overly burdensome, under the circumstances of the Holocaust. "It would be meaningless to establish elaborate eligibility criteria when they are difficult to prove or at least to be made credible…. Generally, the German forced labor compensation program provided for a relaxed standard of proof because it was conscious of the fact that much time had elapsed since the historical events and that the type of injustice which the program addressed were difficult to prove. Moreover, the long time since the events also implied that the survivors had a very advanced age. Against this background, it was a matter of fairness not to rely on documentary evidence or public records only and that applicants were allowed to support eligibility with a variety of evidentiary means, including credible statements."[136]

Thus, there was wide latitude to assess the validity of the claims, which "could essentially be verified in three ways: either they contained sufficient documentary evidence, or they were verified in external archives, or they were determined to be credible. This was in line with the practice of other claims programs dealing with situations that occurred in the distant past and where the victims, because of the circumstances of the crimes, could not be expected to possess significant documentary evidence."[137]

In reflecting upon its analysis of slave labor claims as the claims process wound down, the Claims Conference noted that it had > established a sophisticated program of archival research of 150 archives in 29 countries, including Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM). The approval of slave labor applications (where the applicant did not receive prior compensation) was primarily a result of the Claims Conference's archival research efforts. The Claims Conference had an average of 30 staff working two shifts at Yad Vashem between March 2002 and December 2003, and an average of 9 employees in 2004. Research at Yad Vashem was completed by the end of 2004. In addition, the Claims Conference had between 4 to 10 full time researchers (in addition to volunteers and USHMM staff members assisting the research) working at the USHMM, from approximately June 2002 through December 2006, to locate archival evidence for persons that had not already received a compensation payment or pension…. This archival research on behalf of claimants was unprecedented. It should, however, be noted that even in cases where it could not find evidence of slave labor in any archive whatsoever, the Claims Conference asked the applicant to provide a detailed written description of his/her persecution. That narrative was evaluated by experienced staff with detailed historical knowledge at the Claims Conference, which had the authority to approve applications on the basis of such narrative testimony alone… [a process] approved by the Special Master.[138]

With the support of the Court and the German Foundation, the Claims Conference and IOM similarly were asked to make certain that confusion on the part of elderly and traumatized survivors did not disqualify otherwise valid claims, whether or not the precise details of enslavement were remembered. Thus, after exhausting all possible sources of documentary evidence, "applicants were invited to describe their persecution experiences and these statements could constitute part of the proof that the claimant was eligible for a payment."[139]

C. New Data on the Pervasiveness of Slave Labor: Examples of Work Sites Previously Unrecognized

In many cases, the German and Swiss slave labor compensation programs prompted a reassessment of history, broadening the knowledge of the Third Reich's enslavement policies — which were far more expansive than had been originally thought.

1. Jewish Slave Laborers: Work Camps in Central and Eastern Europe

The Claims Conference presented – and the German Foundation and the Court accepted – new research demonstrating that the Nazi machine had reached into parts of Europe not previously known to have supported slave or forced labor.

In some instances, the Claims Conference requested that the Court approve certain categories of slave labor claims that were then under negotiation with the German Foundation, anticipating ultimate approval by the German Foundation. German Foundation approval was not a pre-condition to the Court's acceptance of such claims, in that the definition of "Slave Labor Class I" was somewhat broader than the definitions set forth under the German Foundation legislation.

Thus, for example, the Claims Conference consulted with the Court and the Special Masters, and confirmed that the Court did not consider itself to be strictly bound by the so-called "places of incarceration" list that had been formally recognized by German authorities at the start of the program in 2001. The German Foundation had taken under advisement, and had not yet decided, the Claims Conference's application urging recognition of places of incarceration in Hungary, Bulgaria and Tunisia. The Claims Conference requested that the Court authorize payments under Slave Labor Class I regardless of the German Foundation's ultimate ruling, as the recommended claims satisfied all of the criteria under Slave Labor Class I.

> [U]nder the German Foundation Law, a person who is eligible as a slave laborer is someone who was in a concentration camp, ghetto or other place of confinement with comparable conditions. The Claims Conference has applied to the German Foundation for a decision recognizing that certain places of > confinement, not heretofore recognized, had comparable conditions, and awaits a decision from the German Foundation. These decisions are being made on an ongoing basis (for example, a decision granting Hungarian Labor battalions the status as places of slave labor was only made last week). We are still awaiting decisions on forced labor camps in Bulgaria, Tunisia, and other places in North Africa. Ultimately, if the German Foundation does not recognize such places as comparable to slave labor (and since there was no deportation of such Nazi victims from their homeland, which would make them eligible as "forced laborers," as distinguished from "slave laborers," under the German Foundation Law), such persons may be eligible for a payment from [Slave Labor Class I] but not from the German Foundation. As you will recall, in discussions with the Claims Conference, the Court and the Special Masters have made clear that the Court will authorize payment to an individual qualified under the definition of Slave Labor Class I regardless of the decision of the German Foundation on that particular application. While we anticipate that the German Foundation will resolve the status of the remaining unrecognized camps shortly, we will be in a position to make the [Slave Labor Class I] payments within the next 12 weeks under any circumstances.[140]

Based on the historical evidence and the definitions under the Settlement Agreement, the Court approved payments to these victims considerably earlier than did the German Foundation. The German Foundation eventually did, in fact, deem work sites in Hungary and Bulgaria to have been places of slave labor, warranting compensation under that program as well as under Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement.[141] As described by the Claims Conference, this "comprehensive research" resulted in a "re-evaluation of certain aspects" of the Holocaust.

The following section of this chapter on the Slave Labor Class I Claims Process – "Obtaining Recognition of Slave Labor Camps Under the German Foundation Legislation" – was prepared for the Special Masters by Karen Heilig, the Assistant Executive Vice President and General Counsel of the Claims Conference. Ms. Heilig details the efforts made to ensure that the German Foundation considered every work site at which Jewish Nazi victims performed Holocaust-era slave labor (according to the German Foundation definition of "slave labor"). As a result of this research, which expanded the category of slave labor work sites that the German Foundation formally approved, tens of thousands of additional victims were able to receive compensation from the German Foundation as "slave laborers," and thus automatic approval for compensation under Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement.

Obtaining Recognition of Slave Labor Camps Under the German Foundation Legislation

Under the Law Establishing the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" (the Law") passed in July 2000 by the Bundestag, slave laborers were defined pursuant to section 11(1)1 as:

> Persons who were held in a concentration camp as defined in section 42 paragraph 2 of the German Indemnification Law or in another place of confinement outside the territory of what is now the Republic of Austria or a ghetto under comparable conditions and were subject to forced labor. [Informal translation prepared by the US Embassy in Berlin.]

The term "another place of confinement" was referred to as "andere Hafstatte" in the original German text of the Gesetz zur Errichtung Einer Stiftung "Errinnerung, Verantwortung und Zukunft." Section 12(1) of the Law states that:

> Specific characteristics of other places of confinement referred to in section 11 paragraph 1 number 1 are inhumane prison conditions, insufficient nutrition and lack of medical care.

Following the German Foundation's November 2000 adoption of a resolution relating to the process for the approval of "andere Haftstatte,"[142] the Claims Conference worked with a variety of historians to provide relevant documentation so that the German Foundation would [142] In September 2000, two months after the German Foundation had been established by the passage of a Law in the German Bundestag, and prior to the German Foundation's adoption in November 2000 of its approval process for "*andere Haftstatt*e," the Claims Conference informed the German Foundation that it intended to seek recognition for camps in Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, Slovakia, the former Yugoslavia and North Africa. See Claims Conference Letter to German Foundation (Sept. 20, 2000). In this letter, it was noted that the Claims Conference intended to provide research demonstrating that certain camps in all of the above countries should be designated as "andere Haftstatte" for the purpose of Section 11(1) 1 of the German Foundation Law, and thus those incarcerated in such camps should receive payments as "slave laborers."

designate a number of camps where Jews were held and performed labor as "andere Haftstatte."[143]

The procedures to secure approval by the German Foundation were complex, and it took over three years for the German Foundation to issue final decisions. Each application for recognition as an "andere Haftstatte" had to be reviewed by the historians of, or engaged by, the German Foundation and its Board of Trustees. In a report to the Board of Trustees, the Directors of the German Foundation highlighted the significance and utility of the historians' work:

> …. [T]he Federal Foundation was and still is depending on the close cooperation with historians and experts around the world. Here we can point out a continuously excellent cooperation and an extremely high level of assistance. The Federal Foundation is provided with expert opinions, even with a high amount of research required, sometime[s] even free of charge; the same applies to unpublished research results. Inquiries to research institutions and archives here and abroad by the Federal Foundation referring to the examination of applications for places of confinement were usually answered within a very short time. It is also remarkable that the process of recognition of places of confinement itself turned out to be a topic for research or that historians are using results gained during the examination of applications for places of confinement.[144]

Every camp had to be approved individually by name. Often the German Foundation specified the relevant opening or closing dates of the camp, and each individual applicant's incarceration had to fall within these specified dates. Given the number of camps, this was an enormous task. As the German Foundation noted in its 2003 report, the "index of places of confinement," which was "regularly amended by new resolutions," by August 2003 had "achieved a volume of 540 pages."[145] In addition, once a camp was approved, details of the camp (including opening and closing dates) were entered into an electronic "master list" of camps and ghettos that comprised part of the Claims Conference processing system.

[143] In the Minutes of the Meeting of Board of Trustees in November 2000, the German Foundation set up a process whereby it would rely upon and if necessary engage experts to assist in their determination about camps and work sites. In addition, the partner organizations responsible for processing claims were requested to submit evidence and information for consideration.

The first application by the Claims Conference to the German Foundation sought acknowledgment of those camps already recognized by the German Ministry of Finance in the framework of the Article 2 and CEEF compensation programs, which were limited primarily to those who had been incarcerated in camps and ghettos. In the Fall of 2000, only certain camps were recognized under the Article 2 Fund. These included camps recognized by Germany's Federal Indemnification Law promulgated in the 1950s (the "BEG"), as well as camps recognized by the International Tracing Service ("ITS").[146] The only other additional types of camps for which compensation was permitted as of 2000 were those that had been officially accepted following 1999 negotiations between the Claims Conference and the German Ministry of Finance. These negotiations resulted in the recognition of camps for forced laborers on the Austro-Hungarian border ("camps that constructed the Alpenfestung or Alpine Fortifications"); camps for Hungarians on the Ukrainian front; and the copper mines at Bor.[147]

A report by the Board of Directors to the meeting of the Board of Trustees noted that as of August 28, 2003, the German Foundation at that time had already approved a total of 3,581 "andere Haftstatte." The Board of Directors report remarked that while this seemed like a very large number, the majority of places (over 2,000) were forced labor camps and labor battalions for Jews in the East, where there were only few survivors due to the Nazi extermination policy.[148]

The number of camps approved as of August 2003 as a result of these submissions – which the German Foundation noted totaled over 2,000 – did not include camps in Bulgaria, Tunisia, Morocco or Algeria. These were accepted after that date, with the total number of camps estimated to approach 2,300. The final number of camps ultimately approved as "andere Haftstatte," as a result of Claims Conference submissions and research, often represented

[146] The Article 2 Fund (like the German Foundation) included as concentration camps those camps that were accepted in accordance with section 31 ¶2 or section 42 ¶2 of the BEG. This list comprises over 1600 camps and was published in the Federal German Gazette in 1977 and 1982. The ITS register of camps was published in 1979 and included the camps under the BEG as well as additional places. The BEG and ITS lists were accepted for the Article 2/CEEF compensation programs. Subsequently, one of the first decisions of the German Foundation was to accept those camps on the ITS list as "andere Haftstatte."

ground-breaking historical analysis relating to camps located in countries throughout Europe and North Africa.

The German Foundation provided that compensation would be available for those who had been imprisoned in specified places of confinement and who had performed forced labor in those places. In certain cases, labor would be presumed. Thus, the following guidelines were in place:

- Imputation of forced labour for certain types of places of confinement, because they were labour camps (e.g. labour education camps or forced labour camps for Jews).
- Imputation of forced labour for individual places of confinement for which there was sufficient information, so that it could be assumed that these places of confinement generally required forced labour.
- Individual evidence of forced labour in places of confinement for which there was no sufficient information supporting the imputation of forced labour in this place of confinement. Therefore the applicant had to document or substantiate the forced labour individually.[149]

In seeking to present information about places of incarceration and the forced labor that was performed there, the Claims Conference provided the German Foundation with numerous submissions from historians, some employed by the Claims Conference, and others affiliated with major research institutions.[150] In addition, where relevant, Jewish communities assisted or were asked to assist in providing evidence from their local archives to supplement other information.[151]

A letter to the Centre de Documentation Juive Contemporaine from Dr. Jens Hoppe dated February 4, 2002 stated: "the material submitted to date by the Claims Conference did not convince the Foundation. We would therefore like to ask you to let us have copies of as much material as possible from the collection of the Centre de Documentation which proves that forced labour was carried out in the above camps. General regulations,

The applications submitted by the Claims Conference were diverse, both in the location of the slave labor work site, and the number of eligible applicants who could be paid, assuming the site was approved by the German Foundation.

The slave labor work sites for which the Claims Conference sought recognition as "andere Haftstatte" included camps in France, Germany, Slovakia, Croatia, islands off the Dalmatian coast in the Italian zone of Croatia, Serbia, Italy, Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Libya, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco. Applications ranged from the Jewish labor battalions in Romania, from which there were a few thousand applicants, to much smaller camps on the islands of Pag, Rab, Hvar, Korcula and Lopud, located in the Italian zone of Croatia on the Dalmatian coast, for which there were sometimes only a handful of applicants.[152]

As to Romania, the Claims Conference provided the German Foundation with information that had been submitted to the German Ministry of Finance in an ultimately successful effort to obtain approval of the Romania Labor Battalions under the Article 2 Fund.[153] The submission was based primarily upon the research of historians Prof. Radu Ionid of the USHMM and Prof. Jean Ancel of Yad Vashem. They found with respect to these labor battalions that conditions were appalling:

> Housing: In wooden barracks or partially buried huts. The workers are not sheltered from rain, cold, and so on. Most sleep on the ground.
> Food: Insufficient, since foodstuffs do not reach the kitchen in sufficient quantities in accordance with allocations.
>
> Clothing: Most of the workers are completely naked. A fragment of a sack or an old rug is used to cover their genitals, and they walk around barefoot.
> Work: Excessive, since those who can get out of work by giving money can go home, while those miserable persons who remain are forced to perform the work of the others as well as their own.

descriptions and similar would be helpful as would be individual statements. Only with such additional evidence has the Claims Conference's objection a chance of achieving compensation for many former victims."

[152] In another example, the Claims Conference continued to seek approval of the Topovske Supe camp, near Belgrade, in Serbia, even though there were only an estimated 5 applicants. See Dr. Jens Hoppe email to Claims Conference (Mar. 18, 2003).

[153] See Claims Conference Letter to German Ministry of Finance (July 25, 2001).

> Sanitary conditions: Catastrophic, given the conditions described above. Parasites proliferate. Parasite extermination cannot go forward because of lack of materials (… pesticides, but especially linen).
> Doctors: Have no authority. The sick [formally] exempted from labor are nonetheless forced to work, and even struck. Doctors' reports are met with derision.[154]

Once the German Ministry of Finance approved the Romanian Labor Battalions for the Article 2 Fund pension program, the German Foundation in October 2002 also approved 617 Romanian Labor Battalions as "andere Haftstatte."

As to the islands in the region of Croatia, conditions in these labor camps were horrific. Those who were there, even if few in number, had been abused as slave laborers. The German Foundation's decision of approval, issued in June 2002, was based upon information including a report by historians Dr. Peter Heuss and Dr. Jens Hoppe of the Claims Conference; documents from the Zagreb Jewish Community; and a report that the German Foundation had solicited from Professor Wolfgang Schieder of the University of Cologne. The German Foundation decision noted that regarding these islands:

> The conditions in the camp were not fit for humans (overcrowding, wooden barracks with no furniture, lack of water, typhus, dysentery). There was also no medical care…. [T]here is evidence that the death rate in the Rab camp was very high (4,400 deaths, mortality rate of 26.7%). There was not enough food in the camps. The daily bread ration was 120 – 130 gr., the food was bad quality and often mouldy. Undernourishment caused various diseases (oedema, phlegmasia, scurvy etc.).[155]

As late as January 2004, the German Foundation had not been satisfied of the existence of forced labor camps for Jews in a number of areas, including Bulgaria, North Africa, Southern France, camps for half Jews (Mischlinge), and camps for Jews in Hungary as of March 1944.[156]

The Claims Conference's application for recognition of labor camps in Bulgaria was originally presented in August 2001 (and had been mentioned in a fall 2001 letter to the German Foundation), and was again presented in June 2002 together with further materials. In its report in August 2003, the German Foundation noted that "it had asked Facts and Files[157] for a short expert opinion on these camps, received additional documents from the [Claims Conference] and did its own investigation work. As a result of all this research work and the presented documents it has to be assumed that the criteria of Foundation law for these camps will not [emphasis added] be met. [The Claims Conference] announced it would present further documents on these camps by October 2003. Should these new documents provide new evidence the Federal Foundation will re-examine a possible recognition of these camps…."[158]

In response to this preliminary denial, the Claims Conference sought and obtained an updated expert opinion from Steven Sage, entitled "Jewish Forced Labor Camps in Axis Bulgaria."[159] The "Sage Report" led to the German Foundation's approval of these camps.

> In Bulgaria, long thought to have protected its Jews from the Holocaust, researchers combing through newly available historical records uncovered evidence of 112 wartime labor camps for Jews. Archival documents combined with personal stories, letters and photos from survivors applying for payment led finally to Germany's recognition that Bulgarian Jews were entitled to compensation for their suffering. This discovery meant more than enabling Bulgarian Jews to receive acknowledgment and payment. It restored a long-> unknown aspect of the Holocaust to public knowledge, while some of the survivors are still alive. This compensation process enabled the real plight of Bulgarian Jews during World War II to come to light, shattering a long-standing myth that the Bulgarian government had protected its Jewish citizens from persecution, when, in fact, its officials expropriated them, forced them out of their homes, confined them, exploited their labor and expropriated their belongings.[160]

On January 29, 2004, the Board of Trustees recognized 112 forced labor camps for Jews in Bulgaria.[161]

Similarly, the Claims Conference continued to present evidence concerning labor camps in other areas and regions that were previously only sparsely researched, such as in North Africa. The Claims Conference had notified the German Foundation in the fall of 2000 that it would be asking for recognition of labor camps in North Africa. Further applications were submitted in August 2002. In early 2004, a detailed report, "Jewish Forced Labor in North Africa 1942-1943," was submitted by historian Marc Masarovsky, followed by an Addendum. The German Foundation indicated that "[f]urther research was necessary before a decision is reached, particularly on Tunisian camps."[162] In a final attempt to persuade the German Foundation, the Claims Conference sent nearly three dozen extracts from actual testimonies from former Jewish Tunisian inmates of labor camps that had been contained in applications received by the Claims Conference for the slave labor fund.[163]

The final resolution of the German Foundation Board of Trustees accepted this submission, relying upon both the Masurovsky report and the actual survivor testimonies.[164] In substantiating its approval of the Bizerte camp in Tunisia, the German Foundation quoted the testimony of one survivor who stated that > Prisoners …slept on straw which was never replaced, with no protection from wind or weather. Fleas, parasites and scabies were rife…. Since Bizerte > commanded a bridgehead it was often bombed [by the Allies] causing injury to prisoners and death.…[165]

An extract from the testimony of another survivor, enslaved in the Saouaf Camp, was presented by the Claims Conference and was also quoted in the German Foundation's decision. In the testimony, the survivor stated: "We were given shovels to clear the road of mud…our shovel turned out to be useless because it got stuck in the road we had to use our bare hands. We had to work at night…."[166]

On February 25, 2004, based on reports and individual testimonies (and supplemented by material that the German Foundation received from the Facts and Files researchers, who provided additional evidence), 36 camps in Algeria, 24 in Morocco and 27 in Tunisia were approved as sites of labor, warranting compensation.

The Claims Conference not only provided evidence as to the existence and conditions of various camps about which little had been previously known, but also the camps' duration, to ensure that once a camp was approved, the German Foundation would recognize as eligible all individuals who had been interned there. In many cases, these efforts affected a potentially large number of applicants. In August 2003, the German Foundation approved as sites of slave labor the forced labor camps for Jews in Greater Hungary, but only for the period beginning in October 1944 and thereafter. The Claims Conference then sought to demonstrate that the relevant date actually was from March 1944 and after, beginning essentially with the Nazi occupation of Hungary. This was eight months longer than the period initially established by the German Foundation, which would enable more survivors to be included as eligible applicants for slave labor payments.

As the Claims Conference argued:

> The conditions in labor camps in Hungary were similar to those in concentration camps from March 1944 because with the German occupation of greater Hungary the conditions for Jews generally and in particular for the inmates of forced labor camps, drastically worsened. Hauptfrontführer Wilhelm Neyer, representative of > the organizations Todt[167] in the Hungarian ministry of defense, now regulated the deployment of forced labor battalions in accordance with the war waged by the national socialists. This way the German occupying authorities had access to all Jewish forced laborers. The Jews were held in fenced and strongly guarded camps where [ ] death was the penalty for leaving the camp without permission. From spring 1944 they had to erect fortifications in Hungary above all and maintain the necessary military infrastructure without getting sufficient food for this physically hard labor as rations - also due to misappropriation - were quite insufficient and there was no meat or fats. At the same time and parallel to the mass deportations from Hungary the brutality of the guard troops increased: Jewish forced laborers were ill treated, were no longer allowed access to medical facilities and apart from suffering from hunger due to the bad conditions also caused diseases such as typhoid fever and tuberculosis. Deaths of forced laborers carrying out labor while railway lines or bridges were being bombed, were taken for granted. The Hungarian forced labor service for Jews did not save them from the Shoah, shown by the fact that in June 1944 a train with forced laborers from the Hatvan camp was sent to Auschwitz with a further train with inmates from Györ and Komarom who were to be deployed in the Austrian Nazi districts.[168]

The German Foundation ultimately recognized 479 forced labor camps that existed in Greater Hungary as of March 1944, thus accepting the Claims Conference's research and extending the relevant date by eight months from the original date of October 1944.[169]

Not all of the Claims Conference's efforts to demonstrate that a forced labor site was an "andere Hafstatte" met with success. Thus, in 2004, the German Foundation refused to approve the 301 forced labor battalions called "Groupements de Travailleurs Etrangers" (abbreviated to GTE)[170] in Southern France, as these camps were deemed not to have met the criteria under the German Foundation Law.[171] The German Foundation also decided not to approve the Camps of the Reich Chief Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, RSHA). The RSHA was formed in September 1939 as the central bureaucracy of the Security Police and the Security Service of the SS, and as of 1943 had its own forced laborers.[172] Likewise, the German Foundation did not adopt the Claims Conference's submission seeking approval of camps for "half Jews" ("Mischlinge")[173] located on the territory of the German Reich.[174]

However, those Jews who performed labor at locations deemed ineligible to qualify for compensation as sites of "slave" labor could receive payment of another type under the German Foundation rules. Most Jews who performed forced labor (as opposed to "slave labor") were not deported from their homelands into the territory of the German Reich, and deportation was a requirement to receive payment for forced labor under section 11(1)2 of the Law.[175] However, the Law had a provision known as the "opening clause," whereby > the Partner organizations may also award compensation from the funds provided to them pursuant to Section 9 paragraph 2 to those victims of National Socialist crimes who are not one of the groups mentioned in Sentence 1 Numbers 1 and 2, particularly forced laborers in agriculture.

In March 2004, when most of the decisions of the Board of Trustees had been finalized regarding "andere Haftstatte," the Claims Conference informed the German Foundation that it intended to use the "opening clause" to compensate the following applicants:

- persons who were in a labor camp but not deported
- persons who were forced to work while living at home

[172] From February 1943 onward, the RSHA consisted of male so-called Jewish Mischlings and members of privileged mixed marriages. In all, about 150 Jews were made to build deep bunkers in the Kurfürstenstrasse in Berlin and in other locations. This extremely difficult physical labor had to be performed 12 through 16 hours a day, including on Sundays and holidays as well. During this time the forced laborers were constantly guarded by SS personnel, who insulted them and maltreated them repeatedly. It was forbidden to leave the place of work.

[173] Persons who had one Jewish parent (known as "Mischlinge") were sometimes taken to Germany and France to perform labor. Although the Mischlinge were forced to work at Organization Todt facilities, their treatment was usually worse than that of other laborers at the same place. The Claims Conference had sought to have these camps recognized as "andere Haftstatte."

[175] Given the Nazi policy of extermination of the Jews, the Jews who were deported into the borders of the German Reich ended up performing slave labor.

- other persons who were forced to work.[176]

Applicants who fulfilled the conditions of the "opening clause" therefore were approved to receive DM 5000, even if not the DM 15,000 that was received by those who were interned in camps that the German Foundation designated formally as sites of slave labor. For purposes of the Swiss Banks Settlement, however, such distinctions did not matter. All individuals approved for payment by the German Foundation, regardless of category, received payment under Slave Labor Class I in the amount of $1,450 each.[177]

Reflecting upon the successful efforts of the Claims Conference to make certain that no victim who was forced to work for the Nazis was excluded from compensation, one scholar observed:

> The JCC's [Claims Conference's] historical research revealed situations concerning the persecution of European Jews that fell beyond the compass of the foundation as well as other compensation programmes. The Jewish victims of forced labour in Bulgaria, for example, whose fates were not officially recognized as cases of historical injustice, had not come under the provisions of the [earlier compensation programs,] the Article 2 Fund or the CEEF. Nevertheless, the German Ministry of Finance opposed applying the new historical findings to other programmes, holding to the 'prevailing doctrine' set by the previous state of research. However, it was eventually convinced of the significance of the JCC's findings over the course of lengthy discussions, and its resistance crumbled. Similarly, discoveries about the exploitation of Jewish forced labourers in North Africa lent a new dynamic to the compensation debate. The Nazi persecution of Jews in North Africa had been largely overlooked by academic Holocaust research and had only recently begun to be addressed, especially in Israel. The many applications to the foundation mentioning victims' exploitation in Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco brought the grim reality of the forced labour camps in these countries into focus. The Claims Conference was not only able to provide those affected with compensation from the forced labour fund, but also ensured that the North African camps were recognized under the Article 2 Fund. Hence the compensation scheme for forced labour proved to be one element in a dynamic process of articulating and negotiating Jewish restitution claims.[178]

[177] In some instances, Nazi victims who were not eligible for any compensation under the German Foundation rules nevertheless were eligible for, and received, compensation from the Court under Slave Labor Class I; see infra.

[178] Benno Nietzel, The Jewish Claims Conference and Compensation for Nazi Forced Labour 1951-2008, in COMPENSATION IN PRACTICE: THE FOUNDATION 'REMEMBRANCE, RESPONSIBILITY AND FUTURE' AND THE

In total, then, more than 173,000 Jewish applicants who were forced to perform slave labor for the Germans and their Axis allies were compensated as slave laborers under the two separate programs established by the German Foundation and the Swiss Banks Settlement. This number includes tens of thousands more slave laborers than were originally eligible under the German Foundation's preliminary interpretation, due to the efforts by the Claims Conference and other researchers to investigate and document every type and place of labor that was forced upon the victims of the Nazis.

2. Jewish Prisoners of War

Forced labor performed by a prisoner of war was not compensable under the German Foundation legislation.[179] However, the Claims Conference "identif[ied] and search[ed] out groups of potentially eligible claimants, such as the 350 Jewish American soldiers, transferred from a German army POW Stalag to the concentration camp of Berga in Germany. The documentary of their story ('Berga: Soldiers of Another War') was broadcast in the United States as the Program for Former Slave and Forced Laborers progressed. The Claims Conference was able to contact and to compensate the 17 surviving Jewish POWs of Berga."[180]

[180] See "Restituting History." In 2016, Yad Vashem recognized the first American service member as among the Righteous Among the Nations, a non-Jew who risked his or her life to save Jews during the Holocaust. Master Sgt. Roddie Edmonds, who with his unit of some 1,292 men was taken prisoner after the Battle of the Bulge, "stared down the barrel of his Nazi captor's pistol and refused to say which of his fellow prisoners of war were Jewish," likely saving the 200 Jewish prisoners from death or slave labor. Julie Hirschfeld Davis, Saying 'We Are All Jews,' Obama Honors Americans' Lifesaving Efforts in Holocaust, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 27, 2016. Prince, Posthumous honor for US officer who saved 200 Jewish GIs from the Nazis - and never told a soul, TIMES OF ISRAEL, Nov. 30, 2016.

For Slave Labor Class I, assuming that the claimant was or was believed to have been a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution," the fact that he or she also may have been labeled a "prisoner of war" was irrelevant: that person was entitled to payment from the Settlement Fund.

3. Roma Slave Laborers

Most Roma applicants were not previously eligible for compensation, and Holocaust-era records (and even more recent data) often were unavailable for this scattered and still-persecuted community. Moreover, much of the persecution of the Roma took place in areas that had been under communist rule, where access to archives has been limited.

As USHMM scholar Vadim Altskan observed in connection with two regions known to have been sites of Nazi terror, at the time of the claims program, "[u]nfortunately, the subject of the Nazi persecution of Roma in the Russian Federation and Belarus remains a complete terra incognita in terms of any scholarly and academic research. This fact might be attributed to the lack of historical records as well as oral testimonies of Roma survivors. The archival documentation we have at our disposal, at this moment [late 2003], is limited to the records of the Soviet State Commission to Investigate Nazi Crimes on the Territory of the Soviet Union available in the State Archives of the Russian Federation in Moscow, Russia … or the microfilmed copy of this collection in the USHMM archives…."[181]

In recognition of the dearth of individualized documentary proof, the IOM coordinated closely with the Special Masters and the Court to devise alternate methods to prove that a claim was plausible, particularly by consulting with experts at Yad Vashem and the USHMM, and by conducting claimant and witness interviews.

[181] Statement on Roma from the Russian Fed'n and Republic of Belarus, Vadim Altskan, Project Coordinator, Int'l Archival Programs Div., Ctr. for Advanced Holocaust Studies of the USHMM (Dec. 8, 2003), filed in connection with the IOM's Feb. 26, 2004 Group VIII Submission to the Court, approved by Memorandum & Order dated Mar. 31, 2004. See generally IOM Final Report, at 89-131.

Some examples of the data revealed by the IOM investigation are as follows:

a. Plavec

The IOM presented to the Court the case of the "Plavec" worksite. That geographic location did not seem to exist on a map, but a number of Roma claimants nevertheless insisted they had performed slave labor there. This was quite similar to the situation posed in the 1950s, when former slaves had described "Ankers," as discussed above and as described by Benjamin Ferencz in Less Than Slaves. "Ankers" turned out to have been the name of the object made at the site, not its physical location. As with "Ankers," "Plavec," too, appeared to describe a place of slave labor, notwithstanding that it was not immediately recognizable. As the USHMM observed:

> To date, we have not uncovered any independent historical record of a work camp at Plavec. However, Plavec, while not a large town, was the location of an important railway junction between Poland and both western Slovakia and eastern Slovakia, and leading to Hungary…. [I]t was clearly a strategic military position for the Germans. Enhancing the railroad links between Plavec and Podolinec (to the south-west) and between Presov and Strazski had been important infrastructure projects undertaken by the Slovak government during WWII…. The accounts of the claimants are strikingly consistent. They stated that they were forcibly taken to Plavec and forced to live in a large barn-like structure with straw on the floor. They were forced to dig trenches and bunkers, or chop and collect firewood, or perform other related work. Children occasionally worked with their fathers, helping to clear away the dirt that had been excavated, or carrying water.[182]

In further support of this analysis, the IOM provided a letter written by Dr. Milena Hubschmannova of Charles University, Prague, "a recognized expert in Romani culture and linguistics," who similarly opined that the claims were credible.[183] Those who performed slave labor at "Plavec" thus were compensated under the Slave Labor Class I program.

b. Slovakia and Romania

In collaboration with scholars from the USHMM, Charles University in Prague and elsewhere, the IOM identified and described the conditions of other little-known work sites, such as the Lety u Pisku concentration camp in southern Bohemia, the Hodonin u Kunstatu concentration camp in Moravia, and the Dubnica nad Vahom and Krupina camps in Slovakia.[184]

Forced-labor camp for Roma (Gypsies). Lety, Czechoslovakia, wartime. Photo courtesy of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum and Sovfoto/Eastfoto.

For some of these locations, the evidence supporting the survivors' claims was based upon archival records. Thus, in the Czech Republic, documents known as "c.255" certificates had been issued by governmental authorities demonstrating that the bearer of the certificate had been involved in World War II. These certificates were issued to, among others, Roma who had been incarcerated at Lety u Pisku and Hodonin u Kunstatu. As described by the IOM in a report to the Court, among the claims recommended for payment were those of 116 individuals in possession of the c.255 certificate, 101 of whom already had been approved for payment by the German Foundation:

> The c.255 certificate is issued by the former Czechoslovak Ministry of National Defence (and continued by the successor ministry within the Czech Republic) to distinguish several categories of individuals with regard to their involvement in WW II.… The c.255 certificate indicates the name, date and place of birth, [184] Id. The Court adopted the IOM's recommendations and authorized payment of several hundred surviving Roma slave laborers from the former Czech Republic and Slovakia. See Order dated May 27, 2003.

> category of activity and dates of activity…. [A]n individual must complete a lengthy questionnaire describing specific WW II activities…. As a matter of practice, the Ministry of National Defence has accepted archival evidence or three sworn witness statements.[185]

Other places of incarceration indicated on these certificates included Dubnica; Auschwitz; Dachau; Bergen-Belsen; and Treblinka.

The data provided by claimants — consisting not only of documentary evidence such as the c.255 certificates but also personal statements (testimonies) — proved to be a unique new source of information about Nazi use of Roma slave laborers. Holocaust scholars pored over the materials assembled by the IOM, and concluded that the information provided by Roma victims was credible and historically significant. The USHMM's Dr. Paul A. Shapiro, then-Director for Advanced Holocaust Studies, and Radu Ioanid, then-Director of Archival Programs, analyzed claims submitted to the IOM from Roma living in Romania during the Holocaust era. Based on these claims and known facts about the Holocaust in Romania, these scholars concluded that the IOM claimant base was "reasonable and consistent with the historical record;" "forced labor by Roma in Transnistria was the general rule and was systematically enforced;" and "[w]hile the list of recognized camp locations in Transnistria that is being assembled by the German Foundation is accurate in the sense that the locations listed were camp and detention sites, the list is far from complete."[186]

> [M]any Roma were moved (repartizati) for labor purposes to several locations. They may remember a district, town, locality, village, or simply a collective farm…. The distinction among these, "recognizing" some and "not recognizing" others, would be erroneous, since the Roma deported to Transnistria were held at numerous sites throughout the entire area and moved from site to site and between specific locations as the perpetrators required. Recognition of all of the locations in the highly concentrated areas where the Roma were kept, exploited and killed will reflect the historical reality of this region during the war and will ensure that > legitimate claims that may fail to mention a specific location on the current [German Foundation] list are not excluded from the settlement.[187]

The researchers noted that the slave labor performed by individual Roma at these previously little-known sites varied, according to the needs of the Nazi authorities.

> In some cases this meant work burying executed Jews at one site; followed by construction work for German authorities in a town or at a site in the countryside; then agricultural work for German authorities in a town or at a site in the countryside; then agricultural work during the summer and fall on a collective farm, either in the Volksdeutsch, Ukrainian or Romanian population zones of Transnistria. Some locations where work was required were well-known large concentration areas, but a far greater number were small villages and named collective farms (kolkhozes) where labor was performed under extreme conditions. Some of these locations are so small, as in the case of individual farms, that they often do not appear on available maps, but the testimony about them is totally convincing and frightening. In these small locations, deportees were most often penned up in pigsties and animal shelters during their non-work hours.[188]

As true for other slave laborers (such as the Jewish survivors who labored at "Ankers"), the fact that the Roma claimants did not necessarily recall the exact name of the work site had no bearing upon the trustworthiness of their statements.

> Some claims are more specific than others in naming the places deportees were taken, according to the age, memory, and ability to even read the place names. In some cases, place names are remembered incorrectly — Domanovka, for instance — might be remembered as Domovka. Golta district had dozens of locations where labor was performed, for example. Reference to Golta or to one of those more precise locations, including named collective farms, should have equal validity. Testimonies of the suffering that occurred in all of these locations, which should be added to the German Foundation list, are absolutely convincing. Many, but not all, can be found on a detailed map of Transnistria, precisely in the zones where Roma were concentrated. A claim might mention Golta district; or Vradievka commune; or Comorovka collective. All are equally valid; they are simply references to different levels of the administrative structure of the district.[189]

c. Moldova and Ukraine

New information also was revealed as a result of claims filed by Roma slave laborers from Moldova and Ukraine. As confirmed by the USHMM's Vadim Altskan, some 3,000 claimants from those regions had provided testimonies which "mention the following locations": Berezovka (Odessa); Golta, Domanevka, Varvarovka, Kovalevka, and Vradievka (Nikolaev region); and Bershad (Vinnitsa). "These localities and/or regions are the very same ones where Roma from all over Romania were deported in 1942."[190] In addition to the slave labor performed by Roma between 12 and 60, Roma survivors stated that "children aged 5 years and above also performed forced labor. Their parents usually took the younger children to the work details out of fear of leaving them unattended."[191]

Among the types of labor Roma were forced to perform were clearing rubble; restoring damaged railroads; digging trenches; loading and unloading military cargo; carrying stones; working at coal mines and factories; attending wounded German soldiers; cutting wood; and cleaning stables.

Vadim Altskan of the USHMM observed that the "overall credibility of the claims I reviewed with respect to dates, types of labor performed and geographical localities is very high. The facts, dates and overall information provided by Roma survivors clearly correlate with the general historical facts (dates of occupation, duration of occupation, locations, types of labor performed, etc.), the existing archival records and published research."[192] Large numbers of sedentary Roma living in Moldova were not deported to Transnistria, but were forced to perform slave labor of a similar sort (agricultural; mills; construction; cleaning and washing for local police).[193]

4. Disabled Slave Laborers

As the IOM explained in its June 12, 2003 report to the Court, it received a number of claims from "Spiegelgrund Kinder" - "former inmates of Am Spiegelgrund in Austria. These victims were children during the Holocaust who were persecuted because they were considered to be 'life unworthy of life.' As such, because of actual or perceived handicaps, they were institutionalized at Am Spiegelgrund for 'treatment' and/or rehabilitation." These individuals were persecuted because they were, or were believed to be, handicapped. The German historian, Prof. Dr. Wolfgang Neugebauer, advised IOM that "those who survived Am Spiegelgrund and were not selected for euthanasia, were those who were determined to be fit to work" and "it could be assumed that the children at Spiegelgrund had to perform labor."[194]

Generally, "these victims had entered Am Spiegelgrund between 1941-1942 and survived their ordeal only because they were physically able to work …. Some of these Spiegelgrund Kinder were also Jehovah's Witnesses who had refused to salute Hitler; others were illegitimate children, or children born to alcoholic or otherwise unsuitable or unworthy parents. Their disabilities were considered innate; all were stigmatized, and all were forced to work."[195] Recent research has suggested that Dr. Hans Asperger, "a pioneer in the study of autism and related disorders," appears to have "ingratiated himself with the Nazi regime and 'actively cooperated' with the Nazi eugenics program by helping to send severely disabled children to Spiegelgrund, which was known as a 'concealed killing center.'"[196]

Some of the victims had been sterilized. While the German Foundation had rejected these claims, the Court adopted the IOM's recommendation for payment in at least five instances which "appeared, on their face, to involve claimants who could be disabled" under the Swiss Banks settlement, and who performed slave labor. The claimants were "victims of sterilization who were determined to be physically or mentally 'disabled' by the Nazi Health Regime. These claimants survived because they were economically useful to the Nazi Regime in that they could perform some type of labour generally for the institutions in which they were detained."[197]

5. Jehovah's Witness Slave Laborers

For Jehovah's Witnesses, forced labor for the Nazis often was prompted by the charge of failing to perform military service.

> As a unique strategy in their ideological campaign against the Witnesses, Nazi officials routinely offered Witness prisoners the opportunity to gain release by signing a document of renunciation. The document required the signer to repudiate his religious beliefs and to denounce any Witnesses he came into contact with. Nazi captors often provided "incentives" for Witnesses to sign the document, such as beatings, torture, public executions, punishment labor, solitary confinement, reduced rations, and other extreme intimidation tactics. Refusal to sign precipitated additional abuse. Since the vast majority of Witnesses refused to sign the declaration of renunciation, they were generally condemned to perpetual detention and, presumably, eventual death within the camp or prison system. Thus, although physical extermination may not have been an explicit aim of the > regime, Nazi policy regarding Witness prisoners effectively doomed them to death.[198]

Thus, for example, the IOM described the case of 260 Jehovah's Witness claimants who had been charged with refusing to serve in the Romanian army. Their property was confiscated and they were imprisoned, tried, and sentenced to death. The sentences were commuted to terms of 25 years of forced labor. They were forced to work in forests and brick factories, agriculture, and prison laundries.[199] The Court compensated each of these survivors.

As the IOM observed in its Final Report, Jehovah's Witnesses in Central and Eastern Europe, who "found themselves subject to persecution by the Nazi Regime" once the latter had "expanded eastward," generally "fell into [several] groups." There were those who were "deported from Ukraine or other countries of the former Soviet Union to the territory of Germany or Austria to perform forced labour," where they often "worked more than twelve hours per day" and were "subjected to beatings, abuse, and torture when they refused to perform tasks connected with the German military effort;" those who were identified as Jehovah's Witnesses "either before or after deportation to Germany and sent to concentration camps" (although "unlike the practice in Germany itself, and, to some extent in Poland, it does not appear that there was any large-scale or systematic undertaking to deport Witnesses residing within the German-occupied territories of the former Soviet Union to concentration camps"); those from the "Zakarparskaya region of Ukraine, then subject to Hungarian control, who refused to serve in the Hungarian military and were then imprisoned and forced to perform labour;" those from the "Chernovsty region of Ukraine, then subject to Romanian control, who refused to serve in the Romanian military and were then imprisoned and forced to perform labour;" and those "who were not deported to Germany but forced to perform labour for German authorities in German-occupied Ukraine."[200] The Court authorized compensation for all of these Nazi victims.

6. Homosexual Slave Laborers

In its Final Report, the IOM described the slave labor compensation program for those individuals whom the Nazis had persecuted based upon actual or perceived homosexuality.

> Either from fear of being socially stigmatized after the Nazi Regime and thus hesitating to identify themselves as such, or because they died prior to 16 February 1999, homosexual survivors of the Nazi regime accounted for only 20 among IOM's 24,054 [subsequently reconciled to 24,109] successful Slave Labour Class I claims. Their individual testimonies generally aligned with the known historical facts about the persecution of homosexuals. Some were Eastern Europeans who were forcibly deported to Germany from then Czechoslovakia, and then returned to their home countries for even harsher treatment. Some, from Poland, were sent directly to concentration camps, e.g., Dachau or Auschwitz, and forced to labour there. All performed slave labour, ranging from baking to industrial labour in factories. All reported severe persecution that was not limited only to their guards, although all were also subjected to frequent beatings and other abuse from guards.[201]

Long after the Second World War ended, the infamous Paragraph 175, a Nazi-era law criminalizing homosexuality, remained in effect. Although it was rescinded after German reunification, it was only in May of 2016 that the German government moved to overturn and financially compensate those who were convicted under the statute, including more than 3,500 men convicted after the war.[202]

As to those homosexuals who had been enslaved by the Nazi regime, the IOM conducted extensive outreach supported by the Court and Special Masters, although with limited success, as few such victims could be located. However, as the Court has observed, it is likely that some

D. Slave Labor Claims Paid Despite German Foundation Denials

The Distribution Plan made clear that for administrative efficiency, the Slave Labor Class I program was to adhere as closely as possible to the German Foundation program. Nevertheless, the Court did not march in lockstep with the German Foundation. The German Foundation legislation incorporated "distinctions among 'slave' labour that was performed in a concentration camp, a ghetto, or a recognized 'other place of confinement' (Category 1), 'forced' labour performed for a company (Category 3) and 'forced' labour performed in agriculture (Category 4). Within the 'forced" labour categories, there was also a requirement for victims to have been deported from their own country into another country that was controlled by the Nazi Regime. Such category distinctions did not exist [under] Slave Labour Class I, nor did the [German Foundation] deportation to another country requirement apply. For Slave Labour Class I, it sufficed for victims to be members of groups specifically targeted for Nazi persecution … and to have performed 'slave' (involuntary) labour for the Nazi Regime."[204]

Thus, where survivors deemed ineligible under the German Foundation criteria nevertheless met the definition of "slave laborer" under the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement, those individuals were compensated from the Settlement Fund.

1. Roma in Hungary

The IOM described the claims of Hungarian Roma, all of whom stated that they were enslaved after the German occupation of Hungary in March 1944.

> While there was never a single, centralized policy of forcing Hungarian Roma to perform slave labour, it is possible all the same to discern general patterns. The first phase of slave labour occurred shortly after the March 1944 occupation, when raids on Roma settlements began, and Roma were rounded up by Hungarian gendarmes, Arrow Cross men or German soldiers and taken to perform slave labour, primarily in agriculture. Often the Roma were confined in barns or sheds on estates where they performed the slave labour…. The second phase of slave labour occurred in late October 1944, after Horthy was removed from the head of government and his successor, the fascist leader, Szalasi, was installed. After this time, the violence against Roma appears to have increased, with executions becoming common, and there were also efforts to begin mass deportations of Roma to concentration and forced labour camps in Germany. Notably, many of the Roma living in the Transdanubian region of Hungary were rounded up and confined in extremely harsh conditions in the fortress of Komarom, which was already functioning as a transit and detention camp for Jews and political prisoners.[205]

The IOM described 369 Hungarian Roma who "were confined in the Komarom camp which was initially used as a transfer point for prisoners being deported from Hungary to Germany in 1944 but was later also used as a detention camp…. under the direct control of the SS and the German Ortskommando" as of October 15, 1944. The German Foundation had not approved the site for Roma labor claims. The IOM explained that the German Foundation appeared to have taken an inconsistent approach, having accepted Komarom as a labor site for Jewish survivors.

> The German Foundation has recognized Komarom as a ghetto for Jewish detainees, thus allowing for the automatic presumption of forced labour to apply. For Roma detainees, however, the German Foundation recognized the camp only as an "other place of confinement" with the qualification that it only awarded compensation to Roma where there is a specific indication that the individual claimant performed forced labour…. However, the conditions were essentially the same for either group. Ultimately, whether Komarom is characterized as a transit camp or ghetto is not decisive. What is controlling is the atrocities that > occurred there and the suffering of all who were detained there in the horrendous conditions.[206]

Roma were forced to work at construction, painting and digging graves. Some Roma had failed to mention in their claim forms that they had specifically performed "work" while incarcerated at Komaron, and so they were rejected by the German Foundation on that basis.

The Court took a different approach with these claimants. As the IOM noted, the "severe conditions they describe at the camp are consistent with the research of two of the leading historians, Michael Zimmerman and Ctibor Necas, who have written about the Roma Holocaust in Hungary and Komarom." In addition, "Hungarian historians such as Laszlo Karsai and Szabolcs Szita have also published articles and books about the Hungarian Roma Holocaust and described the conditions at Komarom as being consistent with the statements provided by the claimants and the research of other historians."[207] Thus, all credible Roma claims relating to incarceration at Komarom were compensated under Slave Labor Class I.

2. Residents of Western Europe

The German Foundation did not pay the claims of Western Europeans. The German Foundation determined that the harm suffered by laborers in Western Europe was not of the same magnitude as that suffered by those in Central and Eastern Europe. Exceptions were made for those in camps or ghettos, who had performed slave (not forced) labor.[208] Thus, Jewish Nazi victims in Western Europe for the most part were compensated by the German Foundation. Non-Jewish victims, however, generally were not.

The IOM requested that the Court approve the claims of 83 French Roma. Their claims either had been rejected or not reviewed by the German Foundation. The IOM pointed out that regardless of the work conditions experienced by Western Europeans who were not among the "victims or targets of Nazi persecution," Roma, like Jewish Nazi victims, were uniquely singled out for persecution, and suffered severely. As the Court confirmed in approving the claims, under the definition of Slave Labor I, the geographic location of the claimant was irrelevant. For purposes of the class, all that mattered was whether the claimant was a member of a "Victim or Target" group as set forth under the Settlement Agreement.

The IOM noted that the "largest camp [to which Roma were sent] in the Occupied Zone was established at Montreuil-Bellay where nomads were interned from November 1941 to January 1945. Although fewer camps existed in the Free Zone, Roma were also interned in various locations including Argelès-sur-Mer, Rivesaltes, Saliers…, Gurs, Noè and Lanneemzan….. Aside from camp-related duties such as road building, barrack construction, firewood collection and camp maintenance, inmates of the internment camps were often required to perform labour for external enterprises. At Montreuil-Bellay, inmates, including children, were engaged in the production of camouflage nets. Others were sent to work at an airfield in Terrefort or engaged in agricultural labour. There is also a record of an attempt to send workers from Montreuil-Bellay to the Renault factory at Le Mans….. IOM notes that the dates of confinement stated by Roma [applicants] are in accord with the known dates of operation of the French internment camps. The severe conditions they describe at the camps are consistent with the research of leading historians, such as Denis Peschanski and Jacques Sigot, who have written about the Roma Holocaust in France."[209]

3. Blood Donors

In its Group XII submission, the IOM described 47 Roma who were living in Belarus and Russia and, during the Holocaust, "were adolescents who were forced to supply blood to wounded German soldiers" on "schedule." They were also forced to care for wounded soldiers. Vadim Altskan, then-Project Coordinator for the International Archival Programs Division, Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies of the USHMM, pointed out that there were also "at least several hundred cases of Roma survivors of both genders, who were teenagers during that time, stating that they were constantly forced to donate their blood for the wounded German servicemen."[210] The Court authorized payment for these claims.

4. Laborers Who Were Not Deported

The German Foundation law distinguished between "slave" and "forced" labor — terms that did not appear in the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement and were not relevant to the Court's distribution process. However, under the German Foundation program, "forced" labor was treated differently from slave labor. A laborer had to have been "deported" to be eligible for the maximum payment.

"Forced laborers who were not deported from their homeland into the territory of the Third Reich did not qualify for a payment under the German Foundation Law as a 'forced laborer without deportation.' Under the German Foundation Law, partner organizations administering claims were able to make limited payments to additional groups of persons … who were victims of Nazi wrongs under a provision known as the 'opening clause.' However, it was clearly stated in the law that this provision could only be used if there were sufficient funds to make full payments to slave laborers."[211]

Thus, "Jews who managed to survive the Shoah in Axis countries without deportation but who were put to forced labor by their fascist governments" were to receive "the maximum payments possible under an agreement reached between the Claims Conference and the German Foundation." Ultimately, some 4,500 survivors were paid through this process by the German Foundation, albeit at a lesser amount than if they had been deemed to have been "slave laborers." However, this distinction was not applicable to Slave Labor Class I, and so all such individuals were paid the same $1,450 sum available to other eligible claimants.

Claims by Roma laborers similarly were approved by the Court, even where the German Foundation had rejected them because the work sites were not officially recognized as slave labor locations under the German Foundation law. For example, as part of the February 8, 2005 Amended IOM Group XII submission, the IOM presented 768 claims that had been rejected, for reasons including that "the claimants may not have been confined in a location that was recognized by the German Foundation as a concentration camp or ghetto where there is an automatic presumption of forced labour, or that claimants were confined in a location categorized as an 'other place of confinement' where claimants must specifically assert that they performed forced labour or because claimants who were forced to perform labour were not deported from their country of origin to a German-occupied territory to perform that forced labour and deportation [as] required by the German Foundation … to be eligible for compensation."[212] The Court, reviewing the IOM's evidence, determined that the claims were plausible.[213]

The Court also concluded that it was inappropriate to reject claims on minor technical grounds. Thus, for example, the Court approved the claims of 65 Roma who had performed labor in Romania, but did not specifically state they were deported to Transnistria. As the IOM observed, it was plausible that these individuals had performed slave labor, based upon the historical evidence that the German Foundation already had accepted in other contexts.

> The German Foundation recognized the whole of Transnistria as a slave labour area where forced labour could be presumed based on the review of the claims by and report of United States Holocaust Memorial Museum historians Paul Shapiro and Dr. Radu Ioanid which was supported by the historical record and work of Romanian Holocaust historian Achim Viorel. As a result, all Roma, regardless of age, who were deported to these locations were presumed to have performed forced labour.[214]

The children of Jehovah's Witnesses presented a special case for the Court's consideration, particularly because the German Foundation had advised the IOM that their claims generally were not compensable. As the Holocaust historian Sybil Milton had observed at the inception of the program, the "fate of these children removed from their families have not been researched, in part because they have been disregarded as survivors in postwar Germany."[215] These children had been forcibly taken from their parents' homes and were "incarcerated in Nazi reeducation homes or were sentenced to 'foster care' with Nazi families. While in detention they were subject to physical and mental abuse and were made to perform hard labor as part of a strategy to punish them for their or their parents' religious views."[216] Most of the children were German and thus "were not deported across a state border," one of the requirements under the German Foundation legislation, nor were they incarcerated in a location "recognized by the Foundation as 'concentration camp-like,'" and thus were ineligible under the German Foundation criteria.[217]

Because Slave Labor Class I did not impose such requirements (i.e., there was no requirement of deportation across national borders, or incarceration in a specifically designated site), the Court, in contrast to the German Foundation, determined that the claims were compensable. The president of the JWHESF wrote to the Court after this decision, noting that "it is the official acknowledgment of injustice that matters most to them. The amount of the monetary reward is secondary. While rejection of their claims by the German Foundation may be difficult to accept, the claimants will greatly appreciate recognition of their suffering as represented by an HVAP award."[218]

5. Italian Military Internees

The German Foundation determined in an August 9, 2001 decision that "Italian Military Internees ('IMIs') were not eligible for compensation under the German Foundation Act because of their status as Prisoners of War ('POWs'). If, however, they had been removed from POW camps and thereafter detained in Nazi concentration camps, their POW status became irrelevant and they would be considered as eligible" under the German Foundation program.[219]

By contrast, IMIs could be eligible for compensation under Slave Labor Class I "even if they were held uniquely in POW camps, so long as they were members of at least one of the defined 'victim or target' groups described in the Distribution Plan."[220] As the Special Masters advised the IOM and representatives of the IMIs, however, those individuals also had to satisfy the "slave labor" requirement under the Settlement Agreement, and therefore needed to plausibly show that they had performed such work while interned. Accordingly, IMI claimants were compensated if they otherwise satisfied the criteria of Slave Labor Class I.

E. Denials of Slave Labor Claims

As true for all other components of the Swiss Banks Settlement, the Court encouraged the claims administrators to assist claimants in assembling the data needed to support their claims; to conduct additional research; and to incorporate evidentiary presumptions in favor of the claimants, so as not to penalize them for the lack of documentation and the 60-year gap between their slave labor and their compensation.

Even so, thousands of claims had to be denied for a variety of reasons, including the death of the former slave laborer prior to the February 15, 1999 effective date of the compensation program; the affirmative indication that the claimant was not Jewish, Roma, [220] Id. More than a million Italian soldiers were disarmed by Germany on September 8, 1943. Of these, some 750,000 were sent to prison camps. Conditions in the camps were harsh, and inmates were subject to forced labor. Prisoners (whom the Nazis preferred to call "Italian Military Internees") were offered the opportunity to return to Italy if they agreed to support Hitler and Mussolini and rejoin their armed forces. A large majority of the prisoners refused, and remained in forced labor in the camps. Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled as required under the Settlement Agreement; or the claimant's inability to demonstrate that he or she had performed labor during the Holocaust.

As described by the IOM in its Final Report to the Court:

> The large number of rejections concerned mainly claimants who either did not plausibly demonstrate that they belonged to one of the Slave Labour Class I target groups of Nazi persecution (Roma, Jewish, Jehovah's Witnesses, Homosexuals, or Disabled individuals) or that they performed slave/forced labour under the Nazi Regime. In many instances, appellants had obviously misunderstood the concept of target group and complained about the fact that they were not considered eligible under Slave Labour Class I, especially if the appellant already had received an award under [the German Foundation program].[221]

In its June 29, 2004 Group VII submission, for example, the IOM recommended that the Court reject the claims of 76 Roma:

> While all of the claimants are target group members, they either did not allege that they worked for the Nazi Regime, provided no evidence that they worked for the Nazi Regime, were too young to have performed work, described work performed by persons other than themselves, such as parents or siblings, or described hiding in the woods, or alleged beatings and atrocities performed upon women….. [and] the historical record did not plausibly support that slave labour was performed ….[222]

Similarly, the IOM recommended and the Court agreed that claims submitted by those who were very young children had to be denied, where the claimants affirmatively had stated that they had not performed labor:

> Children between the ages of 2 and 6 at the time their respective countries were occupied by the Axis Forces and clearly indicated that they accompanied their parents to various camps or worksites where their parents were forced to work but did not indicate that they themselves were forced to perform any labour.[223]

Of the 38,875 claims processed by the IOM, 14,766 — 38% — were denied[224] (and, as noted previously, 24,109 claims were approved).

As to the Claims Conference, of the 321,755 claims the organization processed on behalf of the Court, 147,349 — almost 46% — were denied (and, as noted, 173,914 claims were approved).[225] Of the 115,852 claims rejected, 34,142 – over 29% – were duplicates, that is, applications submitted by or on behalf of claimants who had already submitted a claim. For the remaining approximately 81,000 denials, the principal reasons such claims were rejected were the following: the application was filed after the deadline; the application should have been submitted to the IOM, or another of the partner organizations (although in these circumstances the Claims Conference and IOM did forward such applications to the appropriate organization); the claimant had died prior to the effective date of February 16, 1999; and/or the claimant had provided a place of persecution that could not be deemed a valid site under the historical and factual evidence and the rules of the slave labor program.

V. CONCLUSION

No survivor has received adequate compensation, if such a term ever can be applied to the Holocaust, for his or her losses. Setting aside their incalculable psychological and physical trauma, those who were enslaved by the Nazi Regime and its business and political associates have never been, and never will be, made whole even on a monetary basis. Those who were paid

As part of the Settlement Fund accountant's final reconciliation work, a minor discrepancy was noted in the number of approvals the Claims Conference reported to the Court (173,926) versus the number of individuals actually approved (173,914). under the Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement as well as under the German Foundation received, at most, several thousand dollars. While these amounts certainly were meaningful for many survivors, especially in Central and Eastern Europe, for others, the payments were symbolic. The compensation provided some recognition, decades after the Holocaust, that many business entities profited from the back-breaking free labor that Hitler's victims were forced to endure.

For the members of Slave Labor Class I, though, it is doubtful that any survivor could have demonstrated a sufficient link between his or her slave labor and the Swiss entity that might have benefited from it. However morally strong the claim, it was not necessarily legally sustainable. As Judge Korman has said of the German slave labor lawsuits, which were dismissed by other courts: "I take no position regarding whether these [lawsuits] were correctly decided, or whether they would even apply here. Instead, I cite them as a reality check for those objectors who believe that strong moral claims are easily converted into successful legal causes of action."[226]

The payments from the Settlement Fund were intended to offer the greatest number of Holocaust victims, through a massively complex global process, a straightforward and sure means of compensation in a relatively short period of time. By that measure, a program that in just a few years was able to reach and pay more than 198,000 individuals around the world, the vast majority of whom were the elderly survivors of camps, ghettos, and labor battalions, met those goals.

IV. CONCLUSION 39

I. SWISS ENTITIES AND SLAVE LABOR

When the lawsuits against Swiss financial institutions and other Swiss entities were filed in the United States courts in the late 1990s, none of the complaints included claims based upon slave labor performed for Swiss companies. The fact that Swiss industry used slave labor during World War II was not widely known. It was the companies themselves that expressed concern about their possible liability for Holocaust-era slave labor, and therefore "Slave Labor Class II" was added to the Settlement Agreement at the behest of the defendants.

The Slave Labor Class II program, which was established because of the defendants' insistence upon an "all-Switzerland" release as a condition to the settlement, was expected to be — and was — complex and labor-intensive. Unlike the other four settlement classes, the class was not limited to "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" (those who were, or were targeted as, Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and/or disabled). Rather, it was open to any victim of the Nazis who labored in a camp owned by a Swiss entity. Who those persons were; where they worked; and whether those companies knew the type of labor they were employing — or even kept records of their Holocaust-era activities — was the challenge faced by the Court and its administrative agents.

Largely due to the litigation and claims process, a little-known but important aspect of Switzerland's history was revealed. In the view of Switzerland's commission of historical experts, the Bergier Commission,[1] the Swiss belief in its wartime neutrality rested on some questionable premises, as indicated by, for example, Switzerland's handling of Nazi gold and its treatment of refugees. In addition, in the case of Swiss companies operating in Germany, many used slave labor. Although they "maintain[ed] their autonomy and their private sector character," at the same time, "through their manufacturing activities and the employment of a vast number of workers, [Switzerland] contributed to the rallying and expansion of the German economy, thus supporting the Nazi system."[2]

II. ANTICIPATING A CLAIMS PROCESS

It was anticipated by the Court and Special Masters that Slave Labor Class II would pose unique administrative challenges due to the (i) minimal availability of historical analysis about Swiss-owned companies using slave labor; (ii) failure of the Settlement Agreement to sufficiently narrow and define the scope of the class (i.e., which companies and subsidiaries were included; ownership changes pre/post War); and (iii) defendants' insistence that the class be open to all Nazi victims, not just the five victim groups included in the definition of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution. As a result, any individual who performed slave labor[3] for a Swiss entity — and it was not clear how many Swiss entities were at issue — potentially was a member of the class.

The Settlement Agreement defined Slave Labor Class II as those "individuals who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor at any facility or work site, wherever located, actually or allegedly owned, controlled, or operated by any corporation or business concern headquartered, organized, or based in Switzerland or any affiliate thereof, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have at any time asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee other than Settling Defendants, the Swiss National Bank, and Other Swiss Banks for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets."[4]

[3] The same definition of "slave labor" applied to Slave Labor Class II as to Slave Labor Class I: "work for little or no remuneration actually or allegedly performed by individuals involuntarily at the insistence, direction, or under the auspices of the Nazi Regime." Settlement Agreement Section 1 (Jan. 26, 1999), attached to the Final Report as part of the exhibit entitled "Claimant Application Materials." This definition encompassed work generally known as "forced labor" as well as the "extermination through labor" program more commonly referred to as "slave labor."

Further litigation was required to define the parameters of the class, particularly which companies were eligible for releases. Eventually, the Court was able to publish a list of Swiss companies that allegedly or admittedly used slave laborers during World War II. Thousands of claimants applied, and each case had to be reviewed individually by the International Organization for Migration (IOM), the Court's administrative agent for Slave Labor Class II, with very little historical information upon which to assess the claims.

The IOM undertook a broad notice program for Slave Labor Class II. Information and material was presented in 28 languages and disseminated through more than 80 IOM field offices with the assistance of partners in those countries where the IOM did not have a presence. The IOM coordinated with victim associations, target group associations, local governments and authorities, international organizations, minority group representatives, international and national newspapers, and television and radio stations. There were special information campaigns for homosexual, Roma, Jehovah's Witness and disabled or handicapped potential claimants.[5]

The IOM analyzed 16,474 unique claims from individuals in 42 countries around the world. The Court approved payments of $1,450 each to 570 former slave laborers under the Slave Labor Class II program (including 13 on appeal), resulting in total approved payments from the Settlement Fund of $826,500, of which $696,448 ultimately was paid.[6]

A. Swiss Efforts to Learn About the Nation's Slave Labor Past

At the time of settlement, there was little data concerning Swiss companies or affiliates that may have used slave labor. As the Court noted in its July 26, 2000 opinion approving the Settlement Agreement as fair, the Special Masters had consulted with representatives of the Swiss Federal Archive (SFA). The SFA confirmed that although "indirect and scattered evidence could be found with time consuming research," "tangible information reflecting the situation of forced labor workers in German branches of Swiss firms" could not be identified.[7]

However, beginning prior to the Settlement and continuing through the implementation of the Distribution Plan, Switzerland started examining its role during World War II. This research included a report by the Swiss Press Agency, the "von Kauffungen Report," and the Bergier Commission's investigation and reports concerning Swiss companies' use of slave labor. Other scholars also investigated Swiss companies' use of slave labor in the context of these companies' economic development in Germany during World War II. This research proved important to the claims process.

1. Von Kauffungen Report

On August 24, 2000, following the Court's issuance of the Final Approval Order and prior to the September 11, 2000 submission of the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds (the "Distribution Plan"), the National Swiss Press Agency released a news report. This report, entitled "Firms with Swiss Capital and Forced Labour in Germany," was written by the Press Agency's Head of Operations, Roderick von Kauffungen.[8] Von Supp. 2d 139, 162 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (quoting Swiss Federal Archives, Forced Labor in Swiss Controlled Firms in NS Germany; Records in the Swiss Federal Archives; Preliminary Overview 2 (Apr. 10, 2000)). With respect to labor performed for Swiss companies, the term "forced labor" often was used in research reports and other documents reviewed by or provided to the Special Masters. It is possible that this term was meant to distinguish such work from that performed by Jewish individuals and others whom the Nazis intended as a matter of policy to work to death ("slave labor"). See Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 142 n. 387. However, the Settlement Agreement made no distinction between "slave" and "forced" labor; the class was defined as "Slave Labor Class II;" and accordingly all references to such labor in this Final Report are described as "slave labor" unless called otherwise by a third party in a direct quotation.

[8] Roderick von Kauffungen, Head of Operations, Nat'l Swiss Press Agency, Firms with Swiss Capital and Forced Labor in Germany (Aug. 24, 2000) (informal translation obtained by Special Masters and available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents/2015/von%20Kauffungen.pdf) ("Von Kauffungen Report").

Kauffungen estimated that "firms in Germany with Swiss capital employed over 11,000 forced laborers" and added that "[it] must nevertheless be assumed that the actual numbers are greater."[9]

As true for a number of categories of records relating to Holocaust-era events in Switzerland, such as with bank accounts and refugees, in the case of Swiss slave labor, the historical records also were incomplete. Von Kauffungen had difficulty obtaining documents and had to consult several sources to make some headway in tracking down the data:

> Firm and bureaucratic archives were bombed, disposed of, destroyed. Others are molding in damp cellars. . .
> . . . .
> In smaller enterprises, the search proves more difficult [than in larger enterprises]. Workers from the West can be determined through residence registration offices, social insurance agencies, and local health insurance institutions. The workers from the East, for whom a tax was owed to the state, can be found among the lists of the tax offices.[10]

Based on the available if somewhat limited information, von Kauffungen determined that all "large industrial enterprises with Swiss capital, that were still productive after 1943, were considered to be vital to the war effort. Only these firms received contingents of forced laborers [and they] were pr[e]scribed what they were to produce."[11] Without the use of such labor, a "steady flow of mass produced products would not have been possible."[12]

Von Kauffungen concluded that Swiss companies involved in the war efforts, such as those "which supplied metal (Alusuisse), produced parts for armament goods (Georg Fischer), processed foodstuffs (Maggi), or made textiles for the Army (Schiesser), continually used forced labor."[13] Another major business, Brown Boverie & Cie, developed into the largest armaments

Specifically, "during the last weeks of the war the [Brown Boverie & Cie] subsidiary Stotz-Kontact moved machines and equipment to the concentration camp Buchenwald. For a short period of time, parts for the unmanned large-scale V2 missile were produced there."[14]

Von Kauffungen reported in detail about the forced labor used by a company called the First German Ramie Company (Erste Deutsche Ramie-Gesellschaft), which was located in Emmendingen and was purchased by Swiss brothers in the 1930s.[15] The Emmendingen city archivist estimated the total number of forced laborers at the Ramie company, which produced both textiles and airplane parts, to be 800.[16]

Von Kauffungen concluded that these Swiss-owned firms profited three-fold. First, through the process of "Aryanization," some enterprises were able to buy Jewish businesses cheaply before the war.[17] Second, during the war, Swiss subsidiaries and affiliated companies (and their parent companies) profited from rising sales and profits. Third, at the end of the war, "letters of protection" shielded all enterprises which were able to prove the existence of Swiss capital from threatened dismantling, confiscation and theft by the Allies.[18]

[17] Aryanization has been described as follows: "As early as 1933, Jewish businessmen were being made to sell their companies. During the first few years, however, the firms were mostly left in peace by the authorities. The owners were free to decide to whom they would sell and the selling price was agreed between the two parties. Even if they were based at the time on the agreement of both parties, such take-overs cannot be termed 'fair deals' without closer investigation. The contracts were not drawn up on a legal basis and under free-market conditions. Instead, the situation was one in which the Jewish businessmen were under great pressure to sell. Furthermore, in view of the currency and tax restrictions it was difficult to use the income from the sale… From the middle of 1936 on, sales contracts had to be submitted to … regional economic advisors … Towards the end of 1937, pressure on large firms in particular increased, and from 1938 on take-overs had to be approved by the authorities. At this stage it was possible to sell a firm only at a price well below its real value. Economic persecution turned a new corner after the annexation of Austria … in March 1938, when within a few weeks thousands of Austrian companies were 'Aryanised' or liquidated. This 'uncontrolled Aryanisation' was followed by state regulation and an organized 'Aryanisation' which manifested the state's economic interest. The authorities imposed an 'Aryanisation tax' … and tried to ensure as great a margin as possible between the amount paid to the vendor and the actual sale price, the difference being paid into the state coffers." BERGIER FINAL REPORT 322-23.

[18] Von Kauffungen Report at 3.

For a number of companies, von Kauffungen discovered that name lists still existed. Georg Fischer had a computerized database that contained the names of 1,707 slave laborers at its Singen, Germany facility.[19] A study of Aluminum GmbH Rheinfelden identified 2,879 slave laborers by name.[20] Von Kauffungen reported that Swiss employers — Georg Fischer, Aluminum-Industrie Gemeinschafter, and Brown Boveri & Cie — together employed 8,709 slave workers.[21]

2. Bergier Commission

On December 13, 1996, the Swiss Parliament passed a decree establishing the Independent Commission of Experts, in response to continuing allegations that Swiss banks had hoarded Nazi gold and unlawfully retained the bank accounts of Jews who had perished in the Holocaust. The Commission was headed by Jean-François Bergier, a Swiss historian, and consisted of nine other members, including scholars from Switzerland, the United States, Israel and Poland. The Bergier Commission was mandated by the Swiss Federal Council to "examine the period prior to, during, and immediately after the Second World War."[22]

The Bergier Commission issued 18 interim reports and one comprehensive final report over its five-year examination of Switzerland's actions during the Nazi regime. Most relevant to Slave Labor Class II were the Commission's reports on Swiss subsidiary companies in the Third Reich and their use of slave labor.[23] While the information remaining after the war was

23 In addition, the Bergier Commission addressed the issue of slave labor in Swiss chemical enterprises in an interim report titled "Swiss Chemical Enterprises in the 'Third Reich.'" The summary reported, for example, that "[a]t the Roche plant in Grenzach, at least 61 prisoners-of-war and 150 foreign forced labourers were deployed between 1940 and 1945; they came from the Ukraine, Slovenia, the Netherlands and France, as well as other countries." incomplete,[24] there was still sufficient evidence for the Bergier Commission to conclude that Swiss subsidiaries operating in Germany "maintain[ed] their autonomy and their private sector character," and, at the same time "through their manufacturing activities and the employment of a vast number of workers, they contributed to the rallying and expansion of the German economy, thus supporting the Nazi system."[25]

For Swiss companies operating in Germany in 1933, the Bergier Commission found that "none of the parent companies that [were] looked at was guided by ideological motives or by an approbation of Hitler's regime that was anything more than formal."[26] Rather, their objectives were financial:

> The [Swiss] companies maintaining a presence in Germany had made investments that were now expected to produce a return. They had conquered a market and won over a certain clientele. They had taken on, and sometimes specially trained, staff. They had every reason for remaining operational.[27]

However, some Swiss companies "complied readily with the measures taken by the Nazis against the Jews, and in some cases even anticipated them." As early as 1934, a board member of Geigy assured the German authorities that the "company's capital was in purely 'Aryan' hands and that his senior managers were all of 'Aryan descent.'"[28] Other companies followed, dismissing Jewish employees, either spontaneously or on request. There were also companies that resisted as long as they could.[29] Some Swiss subsidiaries jockeyed for a competitive advantage. Maggi, for instance, "enthusiastically even obsequiously compl[ied] with the new regime and … never missed an opportunity to emphasise its German, 'Aryan' character."[30] The Bergier Commission concluded that "[i]t was the desire to survive rather than any ideological convictions which forced these subsidiaries into the arms of Nazism."[31]

The Bergier Commission made a number of findings on the Swiss use of slave labor: Swiss subsidiaries used slave laborers and prisoners-of-war; there were "repeated complaints particularly about the poor food situation and the maltreatment of workers by German staff," and "company management on the spot was essentially responsible for this deplorable situation, since there was in fact considerable room for discretion in how forced labour was managed, housed and treated in general."[32]

For example, at the Nestlé plant in Kappeln, Germany, 38 people were packed together in an area of 59.4 square meters (or approximately 640 square feet).[33] One Ukrainian slave laborer recalled that at Maggi GmbH in Singen, Germany, "[t]he work was hard and the food was pitiful: there was soup swimming with maggots. Begging for more bread or better food resulted in merciless beating from the camp commander."[34] Lonza Werke in Waldshut, Germany was "notorious … for the maltreatment taking place in the plant" and "a Ukrainian woman working in Singen spoke of a physically violent camp commander at Aluminum-Walzwerke."[35] There were, however, employees of Swiss subsidiaries that did treat their workers humanely, like the personnel manager at Georg Fischer in Singen, Germany or the Swiss head of the German Nestlé company.[36] There were also Swiss subsidiaries that demanded an increase in food rations, or made their own attempts to obtain additional food for the slave laborers.[37]

The Bergier Commission found that while senior managers at the parent companies in Switzerland were aware that slave labor was being used, there was no evidence as to whether, and to what degree, they knew about the generally poor living and working conditions at the subsidiaries.[38] The Bergier Commission observed that "[a]s a rule [the senior managers at the parent companies] were not worried or uneasy about the situation, and as long as production was maintained they had no thoughts of intervening in the management or personnel policy of their subsidiaries within Nazi territory."[39]

Some Swiss subsidiaries, specifically Aluminum GmbH in Rheinfelden, Baden, Germany, and Lonza-Werke in Waldshut, Germany, were allotted prisoners of war as early as 1940, after the defeat of France.[40] After Hitler ordered a large-scale deployment of Russian prisoners of war on October 31, 1941 "for the needs of the war economy," Lonza-Werke "announced a need for a further 400 workers in the autumn of 1941, and provided accommodation for 200 Soviet prisoners of war."[41] The "deportation of Soviet prisoners of war represented only the prelude to what was effectively the enslavement of large parts of the Soviet population."[42] Soon, Soviet civilians were ordered into slave labor, "the Nazi regime also began to use compulsion against Western Europeans," and the "last group of forced workers to be conscripted were Italian 'military internees,' who were deported to Germany after Italy's capitulation and about-face in September 1943."[43]

The Bergier Commission determined that it was impossible to determine how many slave laborers and prisoners of war were employed in Swiss subsidiary companies, but the figure estimated in the von Kauffungen report of 11,000 slave laborers was "likely to be on the low side."[44] What was clear was that "[a]ll branches of industry and commerce were involved" and "all sizes of businesses were represented, from small workshops or hotels such as the Insel in Konstanz, with only a few employees to large-scale set-ups such as Brown Boveri in Mannheim, which employed over 15,000 workers."[45] The Bergier Commission concluded that Swiss

Conditions in the camps were harsh, and inmates were subject to forced labor. Prisoners (whom the Nazis preferred to call "Italian Military Internees") were offered the opportunity to return to Italy if they agreed to support Hitler and Mussolini and rejoin their armed forces. A large majority of the prisoners refused and remained in forced labor in the camps. armament companies and their suppliers employed slave laborers and prisoners of war at higher rates than other industries, with slave labor and prisoners of war making up between 29.4% and 41.6% of their workforce, as compared with an average of 16.9% of the workforce overall at companies in the upper Rhine district.[46] Moreover, whereas von Kauffungen stated that only one Swiss plant had used concentration camp inmates as slave labor, the Bergier Commission concluded that this practice likely had existed at other Swiss corporate subsidiaries.[47]

As for the Swiss parent companies' knowledge about their subsidiaries' use of slave labor, "many Swiss companies tried to justify their passive or even accommodating attitude toward their subsidiaries' joining in the Nazi war effort by claiming that they had not been fully informed."[48] The parent companies "protected their own interests by giving the impression that their subsidiaries operated independently. They backed this up by invoking communication difficulties, inadequate information, and consequently the impossibility of maintaining proper control over their subsidiaries."[49] However, this was "far from the truth in most cases."[50] While the Bergier Commission noted that communication may have been hindered, the claim that parent companies were cut off from their subsidiaries was easily refuted. "On the whole … the information was sufficient, even comprehensive; and it flowed without interruption. It sometimes also went beyond purely business information: Ciba had precise details about the fate of Jews in Poland, and in 1942 Sandoz was fully informed about the 'euthanasia' programme, i.e., the murder of handicapped people."[51]

> One thing is sure: companies did not have to be coerced into taking forced labourers. On the contrary, the dramatic shortage of labour meant that companies — including Swiss subsidiaries — made active efforts to take on some of the forced labourers. It is true that a few businesses rejected the "Eastern workers" allocated to them on the grounds of "health problems and skills shortages, and because of their young age," but in most such cases there were no substitutes.

3. Additional Scholarly Research

The Swiss writer Sophie Pavillon investigated the development and participation in the German war effort of specific Swiss subsidiaries of the large firms Maggi, Georg Fischer and Aluminium Industrie that were established in Singen, southern Germany.[53] As later elaborated by the Bergier Commission, Pavillon found that some Swiss companies operating in Germany tried "to slip into the newly-imposed model of economic and social organization [by choosing] the more eminent members of the Nazi party for the directorate posts alongside the Swiss cadre."[54] Maggi's subsidiary in Singen, Germany > was especially noted in its manifested sympathies for the authorities of the Third Reich …. In 1935, when the racial laws of Nuremberg were promulgated, the Maggi directors produced a notarized document entitled "Certificate of Aryanhood" demonstrating that Maggi was an "Aryan" company, that all of its shareholders, employees and resources were of "Aryan" origins.[55]

To satisfy demand without increasing the salary-related costs of production, the Singen subsidiaries used slave laborers and prisoners of war. "Maggi exploited 164 prisoners of war and 184 forced laborers, Georg Fischer used 68 prisoners of war and 1,536 forced laborers," while "Aluminium Walzwerke exploited 403 prisoners of war and 792 forced laborers."56

56 Id. at 10. Waibel further assumed "to a very high degree of probability, that by the end of the war, the number of foreign workers was at least 3,000; this meant that with a population at the time of 18,000, one of every six inhabitants of Singen [Germany] was either a prisoner of war or an 'alien worker.'" Waibel at 48.

Included among these laborers were "numerous boys and girls under 20 years of age who were forcefully taken from Ukraine by the German army and brought to Germany in cattle cars."57 The directors of these subsidiaries, which were regularly visited by representatives of the parent companies, "treated the forced laborers in the same manner as the Nazis did."58 The laborers were "often beaten, living in unsanitary conditions approaching those of concentration camps, and existing on the edge of survival. The barracks where they were placed were under supervision of the Deutsche Arbeitsfront, an organization … used in the 1930s to destroy the German unions. The camps were surrounded by barbed wire, supervised by armed guards accompanied by watchdogs."[59] Pavillon concluded:

> During the negotiations between the allies and the Swiss industry representatives after the war, it appears that no questions were raised regarding forced labor exploited by the Swiss subsidiaries in Singen [Germany]. Neither the supporters of the Swiss industry, nor the occupying allied authorities seemed to pay any attention to this essential element which cannot be dissociated from the companies' history during the war.[60]

The Pavillon and von Kauffungen reports, and especially the Bergier Commission studies, provided substantial background to the Slave Labor Class II claims. The Court, the Special Masters and the IOM supplemented this knowledge through further data gained through the implementation of the Distribution Plan. The inclusion of Slave Labor Class II in the settlement and the Court's emphasis upon obtaining as much information as possible from those companies that sought releases, led to a broadening of the knowledge base about Swiss use of slave labor, as well as public discourse about this little-known area of Switzerland's history.

B. The Parameters of the Class

The class was not limited to the five categories designated under the Settlement Agreement as "victims or targets of Nazi persecution." Rather, the Settlement Agreement provided that Slave Labor Class II was open to all victims of the Holocaust. Because of the widespread use of slave labor, every survivor of the Nazi era, including millions of non-Jewish survivors from Poland, the former Soviet Union and Western Europe, theoretically could have been eligible for payment from what was conceived to be a limited class requiring minimal funding.

As the Court observed, however, that was not how the class had been presented at the outset:

> When this class was included in the Settlement Agreement, the defendant banks represented that Slave Labor Class II consists of an extremely small number of persons who may have performed slave labor directly for an extremely small number of Swiss companies during World War II. Since then, they have backed off of this representation.[61]

The defendants had stated that their "'assertions about the number of Swiss companies that used slave labor [was] based on our best estimate of historical facts…. No systematic or scientific investigation has been done on this issue.'"[62] Moreover, as the Court noted, the entities whose slave laborers were potentially class members "consist almost entirely of affiliates or subsidiaries of Swiss entities that were incorporated in Germany and elsewhere."[63] For that reason, "members of the class — e.g., those who were forced to perform slave labor for a Swiss company in Germany or elsewhere, but who had no reason to know at the time that the company was Swiss — may not be aware that they are in the class even if they have notice of the settlement."[64] This uncertainty hindered the Special Masters from "mak[ing] an intelligent allocation of the proceeds of the settlement fund."[65]

65 Id.

Unless the class were narrowed in some way, by requiring Swiss companies to specify themselves if they had some connection to the use of slave labor during the Holocaust, the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund could have been depleted solely by payments potentially owed to claimants under Slave Labor Class II, which had not been the intended purpose of the settlement.

1. Self-identification Requirement, After-Acquired Companies and Subsequent Litigation

Because of the scarcity of publicly available data concerning Swiss-owned companies that utilized slave labor, the Court ordered that "Swiss entities that seek releases from Slave Labor Class II [were] directed to identify themselves to the Special Master within 30 days" of the Court's July 26, 2000 order granting final approval of the settlement (the "Final Approval Order").[66] Swiss entities that failed to identify themselves would be denied releases. Along with the need for more information, the Court explained that this self-identification by the companies was necessary, because "without the ability to notify class members of the names of entities who employed slave laborers, releases against those entities would be worthless in any event."[67] The order did not materially alter the Settlement Agreement. Instead, > requiring this minimal cooperation as a condition for release does not deny any benefit that the Settlement Agreement confers. Simply stated, this means that a party who seeks to enforce a contract for a release extinguishing the claims of a particular class cannot in good faith withhold its identity from class members who need that information in order to claim benefits to which they are entitled.[68]

Before finalizing the Final Approval Order, the Court informed the defendants that there would be a self-identification requirement under Slave Labor Class II. The defendants objected and threatened to repudiate certain amendments to the Settlement Agreement relating to other classes.[69] Their objection to the self-identification condition was that "'[o]ne of the fundamental premises for our "all Switzerland" settlement was that, in exchange for a payment of $1.25 billion, all Swiss companies would be released from slave labor claims.'"[70] In addition, they argued that "'[i]t [was] not practical for the defendant banks to make public requests to all Swiss companies to investigate whether any of their subsidiaries used slave labor during World War II in order to respond to such a condition.'"[71]

The Court rejected those objections, pointing out that it was not proposing "to deny releases to which Swiss companies who utilized slave laborers are entitled." Rather, all that was required was for them "to identify themselves and provide information (if they possess it) that [was] critical to the fair and efficient administration of Slave Labor Class II."[72] Moreover, the Court considered the defendant banks' "practicality" concern to be "simply conclusory."[73] The "small number of Swiss companies who the defendant banks suggested utilized slave laborers have good reason to know who they are."[74] Certainty was not required; "the fact that they believe that it was likely or probable will suffice."[75]

In response to the Court's order, 37 Swiss companies wrote to the Special Masters to identify themselves under Slave Labor Class II. These companies were described in Annex I of the Distribution Plan and its Exhibit 1, a table of "Companies Which Seek a Release Under the Settlement Agreement by Identifying Themselves to the Special Master."

The diversity of the companies that did write echoed the Bergier Commission's findings. These companies included "small businesses bankrupted after the War as well as some of the largest industrial conglomerates in Switzerland, and they range[d] across many disparate industries, including, prominently, firms manufacturing pharmaceuticals, aluminum and armaments."[76] Some companies wrote to advise that they had not used slave labor. For example, the German subsidiary of Otto Suhner GmbH manufactured handheld power tools and employed approximately 50 individuals in 1939. Its president stated that the company > has no knowledge of slave labor activities at the German SUHNER-company. On August 16, 2000 I [] asked three former employees of our German company, who have been employed before, during and after World War II, about this topic. All three men … assured me that there was no slave labor performed at any time at the German OTTO SUHNER GmbH.[77]

By contrast, the large pharmaceutical company, Novartis AG, enclosed lists of (i) its subsidiaries located in Axis countries or Switzerland between 1933 and 1946; and (ii) companies acquired after 1946 which were incorporated or had production sites in former Axis countries.[78] The lists included dozens of companies, all of which theoretically could have used slave labor.[79]

Several companies stated that their archives were inadequate and they had little information about possible use of slave labor. GABA Holding AG requested a release, stating that after conducting research in its archives, "[o]n the basis of the condition of the files, we cannot judge with certainty whether we employed those types of persons; however, we also cannot explicitly rule it out."[80]

Others stated they did not believe their wartime subsidiaries had employed slave labor, but sought a release because they could not rule out the possibility.[81] For example, Stehli Seiden was a silk weaving company with mills in Switzerland, the United States, Germany and Italy.[82] It reported: "[u]nfortunately we have nearly no archives of this time as we are no longer a textile company. Our researchers did not give any evidence of having had any individuals who performed slave labor or were prisoners of war."[83]

A few companies provided the Special Masters with detailed research.[84] Roche Holding AG, a large Swiss pharmaceutical company, noted that at its production site in Grenzach, Germany, "[d]uring August until November 1942 the Russian prisoners were replaced by 90 civil persons of Ukrainian nationality (40 men and 50 women). There is reason to believe these persons have been forced laborers."[85] Roche also provided a list of names of individuals who were possibly forced laborers, based on their salary lists, and

> (1) [whose] names sounded of Eastern origin, (2) have indicated no home address on the salary list, but only the mention [of] "Grenzach" or "Herten" (a village near Grenzach) [Germany] appears on the list, [which] can be explained by the fact that the forced laborers [may have been] accommodated collectively in inns located in these two villages, (3) had not a function as foreman or the like or (4) left immediately after the war ended.[86]

Roche stated that the "list is not clear cut evidence but merely an indication."[87]

Clariant AG, a chemical company which was spun off from Sandoz AG in June 1995, provided the Special Masters with a detailed chart of its subsidiaries (and subsidiaries of companies acquired after World War II) that were located in the Axis countries and Switzerland.[88] The chart indicated whether the subsidiary used slave labor and, where possible, an approximate number of slave laborers.[89]

Altogether, the following companies reported to the Special Masters that they had evidence of slave labor use during World War II:

- Alusuisse Group AG
- Brown, Boverie & Cie
- Bucher Industries
- Ciba Specialty Chemicals Holding, Inc.
- Ernst Deutsche Ramie Gesellschaft
- Georg Fischer

In response to this information, the Special Masters noted:

> Many of the companies which identified their subsidiaries as having employed slave laborers had not previously acknowledged or had not previously been reported to have engaged in such practices. In that regard, Chief Judge Korman's direction that companies seeking a release must promptly identify themselves clearly contributed to a greater understanding of the scope of slave labor use by companies owned by Swiss entities, enabling … formulat[ion] of a recommendation for allocation and distribution to this class.[90]

On December 8, 2000, the Court issued a supplemental order directing the entities that had self-identified to notify the Special Masters, by January 19, 2001, as to whether they possessed the names of former slave laborers, and to provide such names if available.[91] The Court also ordered the IOM, by February 28, 2001, to publish the Slave Labor Class II List, i.e., the list of entities that had identified themselves to the Special Masters and had complied with their good faith obligation to provide available names of former slave laborers.[92]

Several companies responded to this order, including the large global businesses Georg Fischer and Nestlé, providing lists of thousands of individuals who worked for these companies and affiliates during World War II, many of whom may have performed slave labor. A number of companies also offered to assist in identifying former laborers as part of the claims process. The names provided by these companies were compiled to form the "Slave Labor Class II Name List," which the IOM used in the claims evaluation process.

On April 4, 2001, the Court issued an initial list of companies and affiliates, subsidiaries or predecessors comprising the "Slave Labor Class II List." Each company met the following criteria: "(a) it timely 'self-identified' to the Special Master as required by the Approval Order; (b) it was Swiss-owned in whole or in part during the War era; and (c) it ha[d] provided the Special Master with names of persons believed possibly to have been slave laborers, or it ha[d] represented that such names [were] unavailable despite diligent investigation."[93] The companies on the Slave Labor Class II List were entitled to releases, "subject to their continuing obligation to (1) supplement the information they have provided should additional data become available, and (2) cooperate with the IOM and the Court as needed throughout the claims process."[94] The Court ruled that "companies which did not self-identify [were] not entitled to releases."[95]

The Court further ruled that releases were not appropriate "for slave labor-using companies which were acquired by Swiss entities after the War but which were owned or controlled by German or other non-Swiss interests during the period of slave labor use."[96] The Court relied on the definition of "Releasee" in the Settlement Agreement, which listed several categories of releasees excluded from the settlement:

> The term Releasees also excludes parent companies and other affiliates of Swiss-based Concerns that (1) before 1945 were headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, (2) were not Owned or Controlled Affiliates as defined herein, and (3) disguised the identity, value or ownership of Cloaked Assets or used Slave Labor. A company shall not be deemed a Releasee by virtue of being [an] Owned or Controlled Affiliate if (1) the company was headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, and (2) the company's parent was a Swiss-based Concern for the sole purpose of disguising the identity, value, or ownership of Cloaked Assets.[97]

The defendant banks argued that the first sentence set forth "three cumulative criteria for excluding Swiss companies from the definition of releasees."[98] The Court agreed, but held that

"this argument is of no avail to them here because the plain language excludes slave labor-using companies that were acquired by Swiss entities after the war, but which were owned or controlled by German or other non-Swiss entities."[99] The defendant banks' proposed reading would alter the definition of "Owned or Controlled Affiliates" found in the Settlement Agreement by adding a requirement that the affiliates "must also have been established for the sole purpose of disguising the identity, value or ownership of cloaked assets.[100] Accordingly, the Court ruled that "slave-labor using companies acquired by Swiss entities after 1945 plainly are excluded as 'releasees' under the Settlement Agreement."[101]

On August 24, 2001, the defendant banks filed an appeal with the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. They challenged the District Court's self-identification requirement, as well as its ruling on "after-acquired" companies.[102]

As to the self-identification requirement, the defendant banks sought to "appeal the District Court's April 4, 2001 decision, which applied the self-identification requirement imposed by the District Court's August 9, 2000 Final Order and Judgment, in which the Settlement Agreement was interpreted to exclude Swiss companies seeking a release under Slave Labor Class II that failed to identify themselves to the District Court."[103] Lead Settlement Counsel, Professor Burt Neuborne, responded on behalf of the class. He stated that because "the requirement was clearly incorporated in the District Court's Final Order and Judgment of August 9, 2000," and no appeal was taken from that judgment, the appeal was untimely.[104] The Second Circuit agreed, and held that the challenge was too late. The "District Court clearly imposed the self-identification provision on August 9, 2000 as part of its Final Order and Judgment approving the Settlement Agreement." The defendant banks should have appealed from the Final Approval Order, and not from the April 4, 2001 order that applied the requirement.[105]

The defendant banks also appealed the "after-acquired companies" ruling in the April 4, 2001 Order. The Second Circuit observed that the Settlement Agreement "provides two confusing exclusions" from the definition of Releasees concerning a time period limitation.[106] Specifically, "[t]o satisfy element (1) of Exclusion I [to the definition of Releasees], a company must be headquartered, based, or incorporated in an Axis country during the period of the Second World War." However, "element (2) of Exclusion 1 incorporates no such explicit time period limitation.… It does not state that after-acquired affiliates are not Owned or Controlled Affiliates for the purpose of receiving a release under the Settlement Agreement."[107] The defendant banks argued "that the District Court's interpretation of Exclusion I to impose such a time-period limitation frustrates the intent of the Settlement Agreement — namely to achieve an 'All-Switzerland settlement.'" Moreover, the defendant banks provided an account of the negotiating history and contended that "the exclusions were added at the request of the plaintiffs, and, according to the Swiss Banks defendants, the purpose of the exclusion was to prevent the Settlement Agreement from releasing from liability those Axis-based companies that had set up Swiss fronts to hide their assets." [108]

The Second Circuit panel stated: "We do not see how the plain language of these dense and difficult provisions can settle this dispute. Plausible, alternative readings of the Releasee section of the Settlement Agreement support the interpretations of both the District Court and the Swiss Banks defendants."[109] The Court of Appeals held that the "Settlement Agreement is ambiguous as to whether Axis-based companies are required to have been Owned or Controlled Affiliates during the Second World War, and thus ambiguous as to whether after-acquired affiliates of Swiss companies may qualify as Owned or Controlled Affiliates for release."[110] The Second Circuit vacated and remanded this ruling for further proceedings to determine whether extrinsic evidence of the Settlement Agreement negotiations would resolve the ambiguity.[111]

2. The Slave Labor Class II Companies List

The dispute was resolved by stipulation dated October 7, 2003. The stipulation provided that "after-acquired companies" (i.e., companies that sought releases and which became Swiss owned or controlled within the meaning of the Settlement Agreement after World War II) were entitled to releases if they met one of the following conditions:

> (a) their activities during World War II occurred outside the area of Axis occupation and control; (b) they were created subsequent to World War II; or (c) they represent that after investigation they have found no evidence that they used "Slave Labor," as defined in the Settlement Agreement, during World War II.[112]

If an after-acquired company did not meet one of these conditions, it was still "entitled to releases from the Slave Labor Class II … but only from 'Claims' by 'Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution,' as defined in … the Settlement Agreement."[113] Therefore, "the self-identifying entities listed in the attachments to [the] Stipulation and Order should be listed as Releasees and … the Slave Labor Class II List, as issued by the Court on April 4, 2001, should accordingly be amended."[114] The stipulation attached lists of additional companies that qualified to be on the Slave Labor Class II List.[115] The list included, but was not limited to:

1. Entities that were "Swiss-Based Concerns as of October 3, 1996, or were Owned or Controlled Affiliates during World War II"[116] but which were inadvertently omitted from the Slave Labor Class II List. These entities included, for example, dozens of affiliates of ABB Ltd. (e.g., ABB Kraftwerke Berlin GmbH (Berlin, Germany)) and affiliates of Nestlé S.A. (e.g., Blaue Quellen (Germany)).

2. Entities that "qualify as Owned or Controlled Affiliates as of October 3, 1996, because during World War II they did not engage in business activities in an Axis or Axis-controlled country."[117] These entities included, for example, affiliates of Leica Microsystems International Holdings GmbH (e.g., Bausch & Lomb (U.S.A)) and SIG Swiss Industrial Company Holding Ltd. (e.g., SIG Combibloc Ltd. (Bangkok, Thailand)).

3. Entities that "qualify as Owned or Controlled Affiliates as of October 3, 1996, because they were created after World War II."[118] These entities included, for example, affiliates of Bucher Industries AG (e.g., Fahr-Bucher GmbH (Germany)) and Clariant AG (e.g., MB Emacolor (Zaventem, Belgium)).

4. Entities that "qualify as Owned or Controlled Affiliates as of October 3, 1996, because each entity has represented that, after a good faith investigation of available records and to the best of its knowledge, it did not utilize 'Slave Labor' … during World War II,"[119] subject to certain conditions. These entities included, for example, affiliates of Alusuisse Group Ltd. (e.g., Alusuisse Lonza Europe BV (Breda, Netherlands)) and Lonza Group Ltd. (e.g., Lonza Composites Srl (Milan, Italy)).

5. Entities that "were not Swiss-Based Concerns and were not Owned or Controlled Affiliates during World War II, but became Swiss-owned after the War."[120] These entities were entitled to releases only from members of Slave Labor Class II who were Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution. These entities included, for example, affiliates of Bühler AG (e.g., MIAG Mühlen- und Industrie AG (Braunschweig, Germany)) and Saurer AG (e.g., Volkmann GmbH (Krefeld, Germany)).

6. Entities for which "it is unclear … were Swiss or Swiss-owned as of October 3, 1996,"[121] were able to obtain releases if they clarified in writing that they were Swiss or Swiss-owned as of October 3, 1996. These entities included, for example, affiliates of Novartis AG (e.g., Ateco AG (Biel, Switzerland)) and Alusuisse Group Ltd. (e.g., Alusuisse Lonza GmbH (Singen, Germany)).

7. Finally, entities which "were correctly included in the April 4 Slave Labor Class II List, but their names were either incomplete or incorrectly recorded in the List."[122] These entities included, for example, affiliates of Danzas Holding AG (e.g., Danzas Beteiligungen GmbH (Schwalbach, Germany)) and Schindler Holding Ltd. (e.g., S.A. Schindler NV (Bruxelles, Belgium)).

As expected, and as was necessary to the fair administration of the settlement, the amended Slave Labor Class II List increased the number of claimants. In addition, in a letter to the Special Masters dated February 13, 2004, the IOM stated that it had "identified some claimants who submitted claims mentioning companies that were not included in the original Slave Labour Class II List but are included in the Amended Slave Labour Class II List."[123]

Specifically, the IOM appended as an exhibit a recommendation to pay a claimant who plausibly demonstrated that she worked for MIAG Mühlen- und Industrie AG, a subsidiary of Bühler AG, a company that appeared in Attachment E of the October 7, 2003 Stipulation.[124]

With the litigation and appeals completed and the Slave Labor Class II List finalized, the claims process finally could begin.

III. THE CLAIMS PROCESS

A. Eligible Applicants

Claimants who filed claims with the IOM and plausibly demonstrated that they performed slave labor for one or more of the companies on the Slave Labor Class II List were eligible to receive compensation.[125] The IOM claim form was generally geared toward the slave labor compensation programs that had been established under Slave Labor Class I, as well as under the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation"). For administrative efficiency, the claim form sought additional information that might be helpful under Slave Labor Class II of the Swiss Banks Settlement. Thus, it "requested names of the companies for which slave labour was allegedly performed. In the event that claimants could not remember the names of the companies, they were requested to provide locations or details of their experiences that could support a plausible inference that the company was a Swiss company named under the Swiss Banks settlement."[126]

The Distribution Plan initially awarded each member of Slave Labor Class II a payment of $1,000, the same amount to be paid to members of Slave Labor Class I.[127] Like Slave Labor

Class I, "only certain heirs of Slave Labor Class II members who died after February 15, 1999 [were] recommended to be paid."[128] The Distribution Plan noted:

> [B]ased on the data provided to the Special Master, several thousand persons performed slave labor for the entities to be named on the published list. If, however, many more eligible former slave laborers for entities on the published list than anticipated make claims, then the Court may have to reconsider the amounts recommended here.[129]

On September 25, 2002, the Court issued an order authorizing a 45% increase in payments to members of Slave Labor Class I, the Refugee Class, and the Looted Assets Class. "Slave Labor Class II payments were not increased at that time because, as explained in the Special Master's August 19, 2002 letter recommending the 45% increase for certain classes, the parameters of Slave Labor Class II were still uncertain due to the pendency of litigation concerning the scope and size of that class."[130] Upon the resolution of the disputes concerning the scope and size of Slave Labor Class II, an update from the IOM concerning anticipated total payments to class members, and based upon "principles of equity," on June 22, 2004, the Court authorized a 45% increase in the amount allocated under the Distribution Plan for members of Slave Labor Class II. That order brought the total award to each member of the class to $1,450.[131]

The Distribution Plan proposed rules for evaluating claims in Slave Labor Class II, which the IOM applied. Under these rules, claimants whose names appeared on the Slave Labor Class II Names List were presumed to have made a prima facie showing that they were members of Slave Labor Class II, and therefore were automatically eligible to receive compensation.[132] Claimants whose names did not appear on the Slave Labor Class II Names List could receive compensation if they "plausibly demonstrated to [] IOM that [they had] performed slave labor for one of the entities identified on the Slave Labor Class II List."[133]

To demonstrate plausibly that they had performed slave labor for one of these entities, claimants had to submit statements that described the company for which they had been forced to work, and were asked to explain the nature of the slave labor performed.[134] They also had to provide evidence, documentary or otherwise, that they may reasonably have been expected to possess in view of the circumstances and the years that had elapsed since World War II.[135] If such documentary or non-documentary evidence was not available, claimants could submit statements providing all details of the slave labor that could be recalled. These details could include the following:

a. the name and address of the location, if known, where slave labor was performed;
b. the type of work performed;
c. a detailed description of the location where slave labor was performed;
d. a detailed description of the conditions under which slave labor was performed;
e. the dates, if known or approximate, when slave labor was performed;
f. the names, if known, of any person or persons performing slave labor with the claimants;
g. the names, if known, of any person or persons supervising slave labor at the locations where the claimants performed slave labor.[136]

Following initial review of a Slave Labor Class II claim, the IOM prepared a written recommendation summarizing the relevant facts and reasons for the recommendation on each such claim, and submitted the recommendation to the Special Masters for review, and then to the Court for review and approval.

B. Evaluation Process

Unlike Slave Labor Class I, there was no immediately obvious link between eligibility for payments under the German Foundation and Slave Labor Class II programs. A German Foundation claim could only be construed as validating a Slave Labor Class II victim's eligibility for payment if the company where the slave labor was performed was also included in the Slave Labor Class II List.[137]

The IOM analyzed a total of 16,474 claims under Slave Labor Class II. Of these, 11,871 were submitted directly to the IOM under the Slave Labor Class II program, all of which had to be registered. Another 4,603 were included based upon information provided as part of the claims submitted under the German Foundation and Swiss Banks Slave Labor Class I programs. Using database-assisted techniques, the IOM compared these claims against the Slave Labor Class II Name List.[138]

"Any victims who had submitted claims to IOM for either the [German Foundation or Slave Labor Class I programs] and whose names were found on the Slave Labour Class II Name List were presumed prima facie to have plausibly demonstrated their membership in Slave Labour Class II and were thus certified by IOM to the Court for payment."[139] Additionally, the IOM compared the company names on the Slave Labor Class II List against variations of the company names that claimants had included on their claim forms.[140]

Once initial comparisons were complete, "final comprehensive comparisons of the Slave Labour Class II List and the Slave Labour Class II Name List with all victims and companies in the [German Foundation forced labor claims database] were made, with special concentration on those victims who were Western Europeans or Italian Military Internees" ["IMIs"], since "most of those claimants had not received payment in the German programme at all."[141]

Special focus was given to the latter claimants, because although under the German Foundation rules, they could not be compensated, they might have been eligible under the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement.[142] For victims who were from Western Europe, the German Foundation determined, based on the historical record, that the harm they suffered was not of the same magnitude as those who had resided in Central and Eastern Europe. Exceptions were made for those in camps or ghettos.[143] For IMIs, the German Foundation determined in an August 9, 2001 decision that they "were not eligible for compensation under the German Foundation Act because of their status as Prisoners of War ('POWs')."[144] Under the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement, however, Slave Labor Class II was open to all individuals who had performed slave labor for Swiss companies, regardless of their geographic, religious or national background, sexual orientation, or state of health during the Holocaust. Therefore, at the direction of the Court and the Special Masters, the IOM recommended approval of IMI claims under Slave Labor Class II "if they had performed slave labour for any of the Swiss companies during the Nazi regime, even when they had not met criteria for compensation under the German program."[145] A number of Western European claimants and a few IMIs were, in fact, found eligible for Slave Labor Class II payments.[146]

The IOM faced several difficulties in processing the Slave Labor Class II claims. The "vast majority (over 95%) [of applications] did not name a company on the Slave Labor II List, and many did not name any company at all, further impacting claims analysis."[147] The lists themselves created complexities. "This was especially true … where claims were submitted to IOM in the original Cyrillic and had to be transliterated into English. The individual names contained in the Slave Labour Class II Name List had generally been transliterated already, often incorrectly in the contemporaneous records, from the original Cyrillic into German."[148] Matches between the Slave Labor Class II Name List and Slave Labor Class II List and the applications were extremely low using conservative matching criteria, such as exact spelling matches. The IOM was more successful using "fuzzy" searches which utilized variations on names and expanded the results. Unfortunately, this also meant there were larger numbers of "false-positive" results, each of which had to be reviewed manually.[149]

As with Slave Labor Class I, claims that were ineligible because victims had died prior to February 16, 1999 were automatically excluded. The IOM also searched for and eliminated duplicate claims.[150]

For potentially eligible Slave Labor Class II claims that could not be validated through list comparisons, the IOM analyzed them on an individualized or semi-individualized basis.[151] "Some grouping could be done where it was found that individuals, especially those who were family members, from certain regions had been taken to locations where companies that [were] plausibly related to Swiss companies were known to have operated."[152] For example, five claimants who were related all had plausibly demonstrated that they had performed slave labor for one Swiss company, Schweizerische Schleppschiffahrtsgenossenschaft, so that all five claims could be recommended for compensation.[153] Overall, however, the IOM had to perform detailed individual analysis of thousands of claims, and conducted independent research relating to companies and locations.[154]

The IOM faced an additional issue in evaluating Slave Labor Class II claims: "claimants … having performed slave labour for subsidiaries of companies appearing on the Slave Labour Class II List. Such subsidiaries were often no longer in existence or had been taken over by other companies since the Nazi Regime."[155] Still, "some patterns could be found … for example, claimants deported from the Netherlands, most of whom had worked for Brown Boverie & Cie, in Mannheim, Käfertal, so as to justify recommendations for compensation."[156]

Every claim submitted for Slave Labor Class II was checked for a match against one of the two lists: the Slave Labor Class II List and Slave Labor Class II Names List. In general, no other claims were eligible. A limited exception involved several specific companies that were named by claimants, but were not on the Slave Labor Class II List.[157] Historical evidence demonstrated that they were Swiss slave labor-using entities that had not self-identified. The IOM believed "that equity dictates that omission on the part of these companies to self-identify either themselves or a particular subsidiary to the Court may have been inadvertent and should not result in the rejection of claims from claimants who have provided evidence of their forced labour for these companies and who have no other recourse."[158] For example:

- "One claimant has provided evidence confirming that he performed forced labour for Portland Cement in Karldstadt am Main [Germany]. This location was not specifically identified on the Slave Labour Class II List by the parent company, Holderbank Financiere Glaris, Ltd. Although the parent identified several of its subsidiaries, IOM notes that many companies indicated to the Special Master that they did not have complete information about all of their sites in which slave labour was used."[159]
- Another claimant provided evidence confirming that he worked for Portland Zementwerke in Golleschau. The IOM reported: "This company is not on the Slave Labour Class II List. It is unclear whether this company is an affiliate of Holderbank Financiere Glaris, Ltd. which self-identified to the Court. The claimant has provided evidence that a majority of the shares of Portland Zementwerke in Golleschau was held by UBS. Information provided to the Special Master indicates that documents in Berlin show forced labour use at this company and that 400 forced labourers were reported." [160] The IOM recommended payment "because of the evidence that indicates that this company was majority Swiss owned … [and] that it would [be] unfair to recommend this claim for rejection when the company's use of forced labourers has been confirmed and it appears to be the intention of UBS that any such claims would be covered under the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement."[161]

- The IOM recommended payment to 11 claimants who indicated they worked for Erste Deutsche Ramie-Gesellschaft. The IOM reported that "[t]his company does not appear in the Slave Labour Class II List. Its successor, Ramie-Seiler AG, disavowed any relationship with the former owners. In a letter to one of the IOM's claimants in 1999, … Ramie-Seiler AG stated that the company used to be fully Swiss-owned and is the same company as the predecessor except with different ownership and management. Information provided to the Special Masters indicates that the Emmendingen Municipal Archive contains the names of 2,016 forced labourers who worked in Emmendingen, where Erste Deutsche Ramie-Gesellschaft was located during WWII and that a large percentage of those forced labourers worked for Erste Deutsche Ramie-Gesellschaft. Claimants have provided work certificates and other documentation indicating that they performed forced labour for Erste Deutsche Ramie-Gesellschaft."[162]

As the IOM noted, in its recommendations to the Court, it did not address whether payments to these claimants "can or should be construed as a suggestion that the [companies] complied with the Court's Orders nor does it suggest that the company is entitled to a release under the terms of the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement."[163]

Despite the IOM's efforts and the manual review of claims, the IOM correctly assessed at the beginning of the evaluation process that, given the scarcity of information: "Even with the broadest interpretation of Slave Labour Class II and the updated list of releasees, this class is, by far, the least likely in which claimants will be compensated …."[164]

C. Appeals

For all claims in Slave Labor Class II that were not recommended for payment following their initial evaluation, the IOM notified claimants by mail, sent them copies of the decision, and provided them with appeals instructions. If a claimant wanted to appeal, he or she could submit a written request for review within 30 days of the receipt of the recommendation.[165]

Under the Distribution Plan, "it was initially foreseen that an Independent Review Officer ('IRO') would be designated to review appeals in Slave Labour Class II. The IRO was to conduct a de novo evaluation of the claim and then prepare a written recommendation approving or denying the claim on review."[166] Because a relatively small number of appeals were received (1,479), "in the interests of speed and efficiency, the Court requested that [the] IOM perform the initial de novo evaluation and review, prepare written recommendations for or against payment, and forward those recommendations directly to the Court for review and approval."[167]

Upon receiving a rejection letter, Slave Labor Class II claimants were advised that any appeal needed to be submitted to the IOM before the deadline specified. They were informed that an appeal was free of charge, and that each request for review should contain a detailed statement of the reasons for the appeal, as well as any new information or documentation that was not submitted with the original claim. The appeals materials were collected together with the materials in the original claim files, and supplemented with historical reports and relevant documents. "All appeals were then reviewed de novo pursuant to the Slave Labour Class II [evaluation] Rules. Recommendations were prepared on an individual or group basis, depending on such factors as the initial rejection group, country of origin, language of the appellants, and the substantive basis for rejection of the initial claim." [168]

Within the prescribed appeals deadline, the IOM received 1,479 requests for review in Slave Labor Class II. Of these, 759 were claims first submitted to the German Foundation and 720 were claims submitted directly to the IOM. A total of 13 Slave Labor Class II appeals were recommended for payment, and 1,466 appeals were rejected, primarily for the same reasons that the original claim had not been accepted (generally, because of the failure to demonstrate that slave labor for a Swiss entity had been performed).[169]

D. A Summary of the Claims Data

The IOM analyzed 16,474 claims, and recommended that the Court approve payments to 570 former slave laborers under the Slave Labor Class II program, resulting in a total approved payment from the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund of $826,500. Of the 570 approved claims, 532 claims were approved for survivors and 38 for heirs (with the heirs' share distributed among 45 eligible individuals).[170]

In a number of instances (specifically, in 91 cases), approved Slave Labor Class II awards could not be paid despite efforts to do so. As described by the IOM in its May 21, 2008 memorandum: "Most claims that could not be paid were 'claim processing forfeitures,' that is, there was no identifiable eligible beneficiary for an eligible victim who had died after submitting a claim that was approved for payment under HVAP. Other individuals could not be paid because of address problems, basically rendering them uncontactable. In the case of beneficiaries in Russia, beneficiaries also were required to provide new Russian passport information to meet Sberbank payment criteria. Despite repeated mailings from [the] IOM requesting this information, if no response was received or the response that was received was insufficient, [the] IOM could not make payment."[171] Funds that could not be distributed to approved claimants were returned to the Settlement Fund for redistribution to other class members.[172] Another 719 claims were resolved internally at the IOM but were not forwarded for review because they were registered erroneously or withdrawn by the claimants.[173]

E. Slave Laborers for Swiss Entities – Representative Awards

Like those compensated under Slave Labor Class I, those who survived enslavement by companies owned or operated by, or affiliated with, Swiss entities, suffered immensely. Because the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, claim forms, and related materials all promised claimants confidentiality (in recognition of the sensitivity of the information provided in support of their claims), the claimants' names are not disclosed here, but their names, and all other relevant identifying information, are known to and were filed with the Court under seal. Award summaries, which are available for each recipient on the internet, provide detailed information about the personal impact of the use of slave labor by Swiss companies.[174] Some of these summaries follow here:

- The claimant and his family were deported to Germany from occupied Poland in 1944. They were taken to Dachau. There, they were sorted and sent to a work reform camp in Grenzach on the Rhine River in Germany to perform slave labor for Hoffman La Roche, a pharmaceutical company. The claimant was forced to unload coal and clean boilers under supervision. The conditions at the camp were poor and the claimant was forced to live in a barn that had been previously used for animals. At the end of the war, the director of Hoffman La Roche told the claimant to go to Switzerland. At the Basel border, all of his documents relating to his labor for Hoffman La Roche were taken by the Swiss border guards. (IOM Claim No. 3402142).
- On March 10, 1944, the claimant, her parents and her two sisters were deported from her hometown in Crimea, USSR, to Germany to perform slave labor. In Flensburg, they were separated and sent to different employers. The claimant was sent to Kappeln, Germany, to a camp for laborers from Eastern countries. She worked for a milk processing plant, Nestlé. There were some Polish people, many young women and some POWs in the camp. The chief of the camp was a brutal woman. The plant was situated near the river (or a reservoir) Schlei. The claimant worked in the department that produced metallic cans for dry milk. She worked in two shifts. Food and hygienic conditions in the camp were poor. She was liberated by the American Army on May 12, 1945. The claimant's name appeared on the Slave Labor Class II Name List. The claimant plausibly demonstrated that she worked for Deutsche AG Für Nestlé Erzeugnisse (DAN), a company appearing on the Slave Labor Class II List. (IOM Claim No. 3207763).
- After the takeover by the extreme right wing Arrow Party in October 1944 in Hungary, the claimant and his sister were sent to a Budapest ghetto because their mother was Jewish. From there, the claimant was escorted daily to the pharmaceutical company, Dr. A. Wander AG, where he performed light (e.g. courtyard cleaning) and heavy (e.g. loading and unloading heavy materials to and from trucks) labor. He did not receive food or payment. The claimant carried out his work almost daily until January 1945, when fighting intensified in Budapest and the company closed its operations. The claimant was liberated by the Soviet Army in February 1945. (IOM Claim No. 3205387).

[174] A complete set of case summaries for Slave Labor Class II awards is available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/SlaveLaborII.aspx.

- In July 1943, the claimant was deported from the Netherlands to Germany to perform slave labor. He was sent to Rheinfelden, Baden, Germany, to work for the company Aluminum Werken Rheinfelden-Baden. He worked 8-hour shifts during the week and 12-hour shifts for two weekends a month. In January 1945, the claimant was transferred to work for Daimler in Wehr, Baden, Germany. On April 20, 1945, he was deported to Basel, Switzerland, and two days later, to Mulhouse, France. The claimant was liberated by the American Army and sent back to the Netherlands. In 1993, the claimant found out that the company he worked for in Rheinfelden was a subsidiary of Alusuisse Lonza Group AG from Zurich, Switzerland. On April 9, 1997, he was interviewed in Rheinfelden for a film titled "Hitler's Slaves." On June 7, 1998, the claimant filed a claim with Alusuisse for his 18 months of slave labor, which was denied. The claimant's name appeared on the Slave Labor Class II Name List. (IOM Claim No. 3205438).

- The claimant was deported from her hometown of Hermanowice, Poland to Germany to perform slave labor. She worked at Maggi GbmH in Singen, Germany. She lived in the Gütterle camp, located on the territory of the factory. The claimant had to share a small room with 16 young women. The room was not heated in the wintertime. After work, the supervisor would lock the room and they were not allowed to go outside. Only after six months was the claimant allowed to write a postcard, to be sent by the supervisor. She could not leave the camp for one year. Then, she was transferred to another place and could leave on Sundays for 4 hours after lunch. She used to sleep two weeks in the camp and one week in the factory, on the floor of the basement. She received 600 grams of bread per week. The claimant worked at Maggi GmbH until April 20, 1945. The claimant's name appeared on the Slave Labor Class II Name List. (IOM Claim No. 3205888).

- On October 28, 1942, the German occupational authorities deported the claimant from Novosanzharskiy Rayon, Poltavskaya Oblast, Ukraine to Germany to perform slave labor. The claimant was sent to Singen, Germany to work at an aluminum plant. At the beginning, he worked at a smelting furnace, and then at the polishing/grinding of stockpiles for the rolling of aluminum sheets. He was not paid. On January 1, 1943, the claimant, with two other workers, attempted to cross the border and flee to Switzerland. They were detained, sent to the Gestapo and beaten. Then they were returned to the aluminum plant. After the claimant's polishing machine tool broke, he was transferred to the Georg Fischer plant. On April 21, 1945, the claimant succeeded in fleeing to Switzerland. He underwent interrogation at a quarantine camp in Bern, and was sent to work in the village of Oberaudorf Dietikon, near Zurich. Later, he was handed over to the Soviet Forces and served in the Soviet Army. The claimant's name appeared on the Slave Labor Class II Name List. (IOM Claim No. 3203943).

- On October 1, 1942, the claimant was sent to Köszeg, to a Hungarian labor camp for Jews. In February 1943, the claimant worked in Devecser, Hungary on the construction of a railway. Later, he performed labor between the mines of Felix and Ajka, where they were building an aluminum factory, and between the mines of Felix and Kolontar, where they loaded railway cars. From July 1943 until April 1944, the claimant was sent to Szoec, Hungary, where he worked in the Felix mine. The owner of the Felix mine was the Swiss enterprise "Aluminium Industrie A.I.A.G," which had established a subsidiary in Hungary under the name of "Bakonyer Bauxit A.G." A representative of the Swiss company, by the name of Neuschwanger, supervised the claimant's work. In April 1944, the camp was moved to Pass Uzok, Hungary, near the front line. On October 15, 1944, the claimant escaped as the pro-Nazi forces came into power in Hungary. He reached Bratislava, but was captured there by an SS patrol and handed over to the Gestapo. On November 1, 1944 he was sent to the concentration camp Sered, and then deported to the concentration camp Theresienstadt. The claimant was liberated from Theresienstadt on May 5, 1945. (IOM Claim No. 3205156).

- On November 13, 1943, the claimant and her family were deported from Vitebsk, Belarus to Germany to perform slave labor. She was confined to a camp in Ludwigshafen, Germany. Every day, the claimant and her family were taken to the firm of the Brothers Sulzer (Gebrüder Sulzer) to perform general manual labor. She cleared the debris of the factory buildings destroyed by the bombardments and loaded stone, rubble and trash onto wheelbarrows. She was forced to work even during the air attacks. Just before liberation, the barracks in the camp were destroyed during an air strike, and the claimant was transferred to a camp in Mannheim, Germany, as she then believed, for extermination. The American Army arrived, however, and liberated her. (IOM Claim No. 3207385).

- The claimant was a prisoner-of-war, who, in June 1940, after having been injured in combat, managed to get to Switzerland. In Switzerland, he was interned and forced to give up his POW status. He was held in several labor camps, including Churwalden, near Büren an der Aare, Switzerland, and others. He had to perform slave labor, including road construction, work in forestry and agriculture. The claimant also was imprisoned in Lenzburg, Switzerland, and in a psychiatric ward in Königsfelden, Switzerland. Afterwards, he was forced to work at a foundry of the Sulzer factory in Winterthur. Switzerland. He did not receive any payment, as his wages were taken from him to cover his expenses of his preceding imprisonment. He was released after the end of the war. (IOM Claim No. 3204243).

- In March 1943, the claimant was deported from The Hague, Holland to Strasbourg, Alsace, to perform slave labor at an armament-manufacturing factory. In December 1943, the claimant was transferred to Rheinfelden, Germany, to an aluminum factory located on the Rhine river, close to the Swiss border. He was lodged in barracks near the factory and given a minimal allowance. He was prohibited from moving further than four kilometers from the factory. There were several shortages of food and the working conditions were terrible. The factory processed bauxite by melting the raw material in tubs. The claimant's task was to smash the crust, which formed on the surface of the tubs. A harmful gas emanating from the tubs permanently damaged the claimant's health. He was employed in Rheinfelden for approximately seven months. Afterwards, he was transferred to work in a brick factory, where he spent around three months. Then, the claimant was again transferred to an aluminum factory, which might have been in Singen, Germany, where large blocks of aluminum were rolled into sheets. The claimant had to work sharpening band-saw blades. The working and living conditions were similar to those in Rheinfelden. In April 1945, the claimant was taken to the Swiss border and was sent to Zurich and then to Bern. He spent two days in Bern, after which he was sent back to Holland. He returned home penniless after twenty-five months of hard labor. The claimant plausibly demonstrated that he worked for Aluminium-Walzwerke GmbH, a company on the Slave Labor Class II List. (IOM Claim No. 3205642).

- In June 1942, the claimant was deported from Kerch, Ukraine to Germany to perform slave labor. He was sent to work at the Weser-Hütte plant, in its blacksmith-compressing department. He used a press to punch machine parts. In August 1943, the claimant escaped, but was caught by the Gestapo in Mindon, Germany. He was sent to the prisons of Münster and Dortmund. He was then transferred to the penal camp in Warstein, Germany to work in a quarry. In October-November 1943, the claimant was sent to Rudersdorf, near Singen, Germany, to a small foundry. The claimant performed welding on long cisterns/tanks and prepared stock pilings of sheet metal, which were sent to the centralized plant, Georg Fischer, located in Singen. There were other workers at the plant, whom the claimant encouraged not to work efficiently. For that, he was sent to the prison of Düsseldorf, Germany, and then to the Fuhlsbüttel prison in Hamburg, Germany, where he was tried. By court decision, the claimant was sent to Neuengamme concentration camp and to Salzgitter-Drütte concentration camp. On April 7, 1945, the Salzgitter-Drütte camp was evacuated. After his train was bombed at the station in Zelle, the claimant escaped, but was immediately caught. Together with 300 other people, he was sent to Bergen-Belsen. On April 15, 1945, the claimant was liberated by the British army. (IOM Claim No. 3212427).

- In 1942, the claimant was deported from Ukraine to Germany to perform slave labor. He had to march from Slaviansk, Ukraine to Zaporozhye, Ukraine for eight weeks. No food was provided and he and other detainees had to rely only on the kindness of the people in the villages that they passed through. From Zaporozhye, the claimant was taken to Przemysl, Poland by cattle train. From there, he was sent to Kaufbeuren, Germany, where he had to work for a farmer. He had to work from 4 a.m. until 11 p.m., six days a week and a few hours on Sundays. The food was poor. At the request of the farmer, the police beat the claimant twice for talking to another worker. After the harvest, the claimant was sent to the Kempten labor camp. The camp was located in an abandoned factory building, where the inmates had no privacy. He slept on the floor using straw as a bed. He was awakened at 3:30 a.m. every morning and taken by armed guards to the Nestlé factory. At Nestlé, he had to shovel coal for the furnaces from rail wagons, and perform other heavy labor. Because he was small enough, he also had to climb inside the baking ovens to break out the burned brick lining. Due to the extremely confined space of the ovens and because they were still quite warm, he was very afraid and suffered from claustrophobia and nightmares after the war. The food at the camp was insufficient. The claimant was also sent to perform labor for a number of private owners and at a cheese factory in Opfenbach, Germany. After his liberation, the claimant immigrated to Australia. The claimant plausibly demonstrated that he worked for Nestlé

Deutschland GmbH, a company on the Slave Labor Class II List. (IOM Claim No. 3450980).

IV. CONCLUSION

The Slave Labor Class II claims process was, as anticipated, difficult to administer. However, the program ultimately recognized, for the first time, a group of individuals whose suffering had neither been known, nor compensated, despite the decades that had passed since the Holocaust. Moreover, the inclusion of the class in the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement Agreement expanded the historical knowledge of Switzerland's role during the war years, partly because of the new research into the relatively unexplored role of Swiss companies in the use of slave labor. Swiss subsidiaries operating in Germany "maintain[ed] their autonomy and their private sector character."[175] At the same time, "through their manufacturing activities and the employment of a vast number of workers, they contributed to the rallying and expansion of the German economy, thus supporting the Nazi system."[176] Certainly in the view of Switzerland's own historical commission, that nation's long-held belief in its wartime neutrality rested on questionable premises.

I. SWITZERLAND AS REFUGE?

On March 12, 1938, Germany incorporated Austria within the borders of the Reich (the Anschluss), and conditions for Jews in Austria immediately and drastically deteriorated. Of the more than 400,000 Jews now under Nazi control,[1] many sought to flee to safety just across the border to Switzerland. "[D]ue to its geographical position, it was the easiest country of refuge to reach on the continent."[2] Within weeks, however, the Swiss government decided that it was time to stem the tide of refugees. In rapid succession, Switzerland adopted a series of administrative measures that made entry into that country nearly impossible.

Decades later, Swiss historians began to examine Switzerland's response to the unique crises of the Holocaust. Jacques Picard published a report entitled "Switzerland and the Assets of the Missing Victims of the Nazis."[3] The Picard Report raised numerous questions about Switzerland's treatment of assets belonging to victims of racial, religious and political persecution during and after the Holocaust era.[4] Shortly thereafter, the media began to recount cases of Swiss banks dismissing seemingly legitimate claims of Holocaust survivors. Journalist Peter Gumbel wrote an article that appeared on the front pages of The Wall Street Journal on June 21, 1995.[5] Gumbel stated that "[f]or 50 years, since the end of the war, [Swiss] banks …

have cast a dismissive blanket of silence over the question of what they did with accounts opened by Jews and others who were then persecuted, and often murdered, by the Nazis."[6]

Amidst this media coverage of bank accounts, Swiss President Kaspar Villiger brought to light another concern: he stated that Switzerland needed to apologize for refusing entry into the country to thousands of Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany.[7] This acknowledgment ultimately culminated in a U.S.-based claims process for Holocaust victims who had been denied entry into Switzerland, expelled, or admitted but mistreated. The historical antecedents of this unique compensation program are described below.

In response to the tide of Austrian refugees who fled, or were expected soon to flee, after the Anschluss, the Swiss Federal Council on March 28, 1938 "made it compulsory for all holders of Austrian passports to have a visa." On August 18, 1938, it "decided to refuse entry to all refugees without a visa," thus effectively closing the Swiss borders.[8] To make sure that Jews seeking refuge in Switzerland could not slip into the country undetected, Switzerland next demanded that Germany mark the passports of Jews within the Reich. Following discussions conducted in secret and not revealed until the 1950s,[9] on September 29, 1938, the two countries signed an agreement in which Germany henceforth would mark all Jews' passports with a "J" – the notorious "J-stamp." On October 4, 1938, the Swiss Federal Council introduced "compulsory visas for German 'non-Aryans."[10]

Switzerland was not alone. Representatives of 32 nations attended a conference in July, 1938 in Evian, France. The purpose ostensibly was to "set up a permanent organisation whose task would be to facilitate the emigration of refugees from Austria and Germany." However, the conference was not successful. Rather, "the majority of the 32 governments represented seemed to be more concerned about 'getting rid' of the refugees they had already taken in."[11] In the face of narrowing options, tens of thousands of Jewish men, women and children, as well as other victims of the Nazis, sought safety in Switzerland. Many were able to enter that country, but many were not.

A small number of these stories can be told from an unusual perspective: that of the border authorities charged with enforcing Swiss restrictions on refugees. As part of the Swiss Banks Settlement claims process, the records of the Swiss Border Police Post were provided to the Special Masters by the Swiss Federal Archive in response to the Special Masters' request for all available information concerning the identity of those who sought refuge in Switzerland during the Holocaust.[12] These documents provide first-hand accounts of some of the encounters between border authorities and some "60 persons who were turned away."[13]

For example, according to the notes of the Basel Border Police (recorded in the files of the Basel State Archives as notes taken at the "German Reich. Train Station"), a refugee named Hans Porges left his home in Germany with his brother Alexander and sister-in-law Bertha.[14] They arrived in Basel on October 23, 1938. All three were stopped at the border. The border police took note of "special entries in [the family's] passport[s]: 'Free borders and relief in travel [12] The Special Masters' requests and the responses from the Swiss archives and other Swiss representatives are discussed in further detail below.

[13] Letter from State Archivist, State Archives of the Canton Basel-City, to Special Master Judah Gribetz (Aug. 9, 2009) ("Basel-City Archives Letter").

The Basel-City Archives Letter observed: "You receive a copy of this file … with the condition that you omit anything which may hurt the rights of the affected persons." Since the individuals described above are now publicly known to be Holocaust victims, because of the information that subsequently became available through the Yad Vashem and USHMM databases, the Court has confirmed that the narratives provided in this Final Report do not "hurt the rights of the affected persons."

[14] Details concerning the fate of Mr. Porges and other Swiss refugees are contained in the materials provided to the Special Masters by the Basel State Archives.

may not be accorded October 7, 1938.'" The police further observed that "[e]ach person is in possession of a … German passport with 'J' and an annulled Austrian passport. The German passports are not marked with the required 'Assurance of approval for stay in Switzerland,' while in the annulled Austrian passports there are visas No. 145, 146, and 150 entered from the Swiss Consulate Frankfurt am Main on August 24 and 25, 1938 for 4 week stays for recuperative purposes at Reichsmark 1.20. They allegedly want to travel to Zurich to visit Dr. Kratzenstein for 4-5 days and continue traveling to Paris. Visas for France are not present. They report that they spoke to the Swiss Consulate in Frankfurt before they left, where they were reportedly told that they could travel to Switzerland with the visas in their annulled Austrian passports. This information appears, however, to be unbelievable, so that we see it necessary to turn them back, because their continued travel out of Switzerland is not certain."

One month later, Oskar Elkan, his wife Hanny Elkan, and their 12-year-old daughter Ilse Elkan arrived at the Swiss border with their German passports, which had been issued in Berlin on September 21, 1938. At "14:30 o'clock" on November 25, 1938 — presumably fleeing Germany after the November 9, 1938 Kristallnacht rampage — they were "[t]urned away by the cantonal Alien Police, Basel, Herr Merz."

Paul Wagschal, a refugee who sought entry the next day (November 26, 1938), had more success. The Police Inspector of Basel City wrote to the Chief of the cantonal Alien Police, Basel: "In response to your telephone message of November 25 of this year regarding the entry of Austrian Jews from Vienna who are received by Herr Bernasconi, we hereby inform you that today, the following person arrived on Train D 164 at the Basel German Reich Train Station at 20:25 o'clock: Wagschal, Paul, born November 10, 1900 in Verbauti (Romania), German citizen, Salaried employee in the insurance industry, residence in Vienna. This same person has in his possession a German travel passport with 'J,' issued by the police headquarters in Vienna on September 27, 1938[15] … He was picked up by Herr Bernasconi. According to your instructions, we let Wagschal enter the country without the 'assurance of approval for stay in Switzerland' and without stamping his passport."

[15] The date may be inaccurate. The "J"-stamp agreement was signed on September 29, 1938, according to the Bergier Commission. See BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 129.

Hans Louis Enoch, however, did not receive such a welcome. On December 18, 1938, Mr. Enoch, a 24-year-old typewriter mechanic from Vienna, "crossed the Swiss border via forbidden paths on the upper Stettengrabenweg" and was "brought to the Riehen post for the purposes of determining personal information." Hans Enoch "was delivered back to the German customs authorities at the Custom Offices Lörrach-Stetten at 1:30 o'clock after thorough examination," according to the report of "Polm. Schmid, E. Station City Hall Post," Basel-City Police Corps.

The next day, December 19, 1938, the same office reported that "at 3:45 o'clock, … five Jewish refugees … were coming from Vienna over Lörrach-Maienbühl in an attempt to enter Switzerland." They were "stopped by Border Patrol Office Fehr, Station Customs Office, Inzlingerstrasse, on Holweg in Riehen and turned over to the police." Three of the five refugees — a "journeyman tradesman," an "apprentice tailor" and a "roofer" — were 18 years old. The other two were a married couple from Vienna, both 22 years old, Leo Preis (a "journeyman locksmith") and his wife Irma Preis née Riegler. The Police Corps member who recorded the encounter stated that the refugees were "turned over to the German border authorities at 5:00 o'clock" and that the "notation 'turned away' was marked in their passports. By the revelation that she must return to Germany, Frau Preis fainted and had to be carried to the border."

On March 11, 1939, Markus Helfer, according to the notes of the "Border Police Post, Basel, German Reich Train Station," was "stopped by the Border Patrol Corporal Roth Fritz as he tried to enter Switzerland illegally around 20:10 o'clock by Point 4 (cattle ramp). Helfer said that he came from Freiburg im Breisgau with the intent to enter Basel illegally, and then just as illegally to travel on to France, where his family is already supposedly situated. He was forced to take the rapid train at 20:45 o'clock back to Freiburg. We oversaw his return to Germany. He had only 3 Reichsmark in cash, as well as a return ticket to Freiburg."

A few days later, on March 16, 1939, Erna Ruzek, née Cohn ("previous married name Isay"), of Czechoslovakian nationality with a Czech passport issued in Frankfurt on April 29, 1935, arrived in Basel. She was there "[s]upposedly to visit the son from her first marriage, Isay, Günther, in Zurich, Universitätsstr. 65, c/o Scheidegger." She was "[t]urned away because lacking a visa." The Basel Border Police ("Basel, German Reich Train Station") noted that Mrs. Ruzek "[a]lready [was] turned away once today in Thayngen."[16]

The Swiss border police did not record, as they presumably did not know, what happened to these refugees after turning them away. But as a result of databases created more than 75 years later, in large part from funding provided by the Court under a program designated as the Victim List Project,[17] the ultimate fate of some of these individuals can be learned. And what is known is that Hans Porges, Hans Louis Enoch, Leo Preis, Irma Preis née Riegler, Markus Helfer, and Erna Ruzek née Cohn did not survive the Holocaust.

- Hans Porges was placed on "Transport 29 from Drancy, Camp, France to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 07/09/1942," according to a "List of murdered Jews from Austria" at the Documentation Centre for Austrian Resistance in Vienna. His "status" is shown as "murdered."[18]
- Hans Louis Enoch was placed on "Transport 43, Train Da 522 from Wien, Vienna, Austria to Theresienstadt, Ghetto, Czechoslovakia on 01/10/1942." He was prisoner number 348 in the transport. Like Hans Porges, his "status" in the source materials

Similarly, with the Court's support, the USHMM in the fall of 2004 began to create the electronic means to present different sorts of lists and the individual names of both non-Jews and Jews in what it called the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum Names Search," later "renamed the Holocaust Survivors and Victim Database").

Another document, a "List of Jews murdered in Auschwitz found in Auschwitz Death Registers, The State Museum Auschwitz-Birkenau page 24700/1942," shows that Markus Helfer, son of Isser Helfer and Jente Helfer, née Tajchman, was born in Bobrka, Poland and was married to Jochewet. He was killed a month after his transport, on "25/08/1942." As he had unsuccessfully tried to explain to the Basel border guards, "[d]uring the war he was in Paris, France," as confirmed not only by the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum records but also by the "Card file of the Relico committee of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva regarding Jews from various places." A submission to this file by "Helfer, Isaac, RELATIVE," shows Markus Helfer, the spouse of "Jochewed," was a "camp inmate" whose "last known place" was "Paris, Seine, France."[21]

Even Paul Wagschal, despite being admitted into Switzerland on November 26, 1938 (because of the special accommodations made for him by Herr Bernasconi, and by the Chief of the cantonal Alien Police in Basel), did not escape the Holocaust. For reasons that probably will never be known, he ended up in France. On August 31, 1942, he was deported from Drancy to Auschwitz.[24]

The Elkan family, however, did manage to escape Europe — a flight presumably motivated in no small part by the fact that Oskar Elkan had been imprisoned in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, and was surely in the Nazis' crosshairs. He was released from the camp ("entlassen") only a few days before the family was able to reach, but was turned away from the Swiss border.[25] Several weeks later, the Elkans were able to flee by ship (the "Remo") to Melbourne, Australia. They arrived in Victoria on January 16, 1939.

Fortunately, not all of the thousands of refugees turned away from the Swiss border (or otherwise denied entry, such as by visa application rejections) perished in the Holocaust. Like the Elkan family, some escaped. Others were caught by the Nazis, but managed to survive the ghettos and camps. Further, over 51,000 refugees did gain entry into Switzerland, and among them, more than 20,000 were Jewish or persecuted as Jews.

It is these individuals — those able to escape the terrible fate that awaited the unsuccessful refugees Hans Porges, Hans Louis Enoch, Leo Preis, Irma Preis née Riegler, Markus Helfer, and Erna Ruzek née Cohn — who were eligible for compensation as members of the Refugee Class of the Swiss Banks Settlement.

II. THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT REFUGEE PROGRAM: AN OVERVIEW

Of the thousands of Swiss refugees who survived the Holocaust, 4,158 were compensated through the Refugee Class programs established by the Court, receiving from the Settlement Fund a total of more than $11.5 million. The vast majority of these individuals were survivors.[26]

Each person who was denied entry or expelled received $3,625; each person admitted but mistreated received $725; and each person who suffered both fates received $4,350.[27]

Of the 4,158 individuals compensated as members of the Refugee Class, 3,923 were Jewish. Their claims were processed on behalf of the Court by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany ("Claims Conference"). Of these 3,923 Jewish refugees, 2,514 were expelled or denied entry (with total compensation of $9,113,250); 1,230 were [26] As with Slave Labor Class I and Slave Labor Class II, compensation was limited to survivors or, in the case of victims who died after February 15, 1999, their heirs.

[27] The original awards were established in the Distribution Plan at, respectively, $2,500 (expulsion/denial of entry) and $500 (mistreatment). As is true for several classes, these amounts were increased by 45% by order dated September 25, 2002. See Memorandum & Order at 2-3, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2002) (order increasing award amounts by 45%).

admitted but mistreated (total compensation of $891,750); and 179 suffered both fates (expulsion/denial, as well as mistreatment upon admission to Switzerland) ($778,650), for a total of $10,783,650 authorized, of which $10,743,425 was paid.[28] The 3,923 payments consisted of 3,884 paid in connection with the initial claim, and another 39 paid on appeal.[29]

Another 235 individuals were compensated through the refugee program supervised on the Court's behalf by the International Organization for Migration (IOM), which processed claims on behalf of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members. Of these 235 non-Jewish individuals, 213 were Roma, 13 were Jehovah's Witnesses, 2 were disabled, and 6 were homosexual.[30] These claimants included 214 who had been expelled or denied entry (total compensation of $775,750); 14 who were admitted but mistreated (total compensation of $10,150); and 7 who suffered both fates (total compensation of $30,450), for a total of $816,350 authorized and $783,051 paid.

Of the 235 approved claims, 212 claims were approved for survivors, and 23 for heirs (with the heirs' share distributed among 39 eligible individuals).[31] Further, of the 235 approved claims, 231 were approved in connection with the original claim and another 4 were approved on appeal, following review by the Special Masters.[32]

[28] Not all funds authorized could be paid, as recipients sometimes moved without a forwarding address, and such address could not be located after diligent efforts. Others passed away and no heirs could be located.

Taking both the Claims Conference and IOM programs together, of the 4,158 individuals who received compensation as refugees, 2,728 had been expelled or denied entry ($9,889,000); 1,244 had been admitted but mistreated ($901,900); and 186 had suffered both fates ($809,100); for total approved compensation of $11,600,000, of which $11,526,476 was paid.

Note: As reflected in the Distribution Statistics posted at www.swissbankclaims.com and as confirmed by the Settlement Fund accountant, a total of 3,923 Jewish Nazi victims were paid $10,743,425 under the Refugee class. This geographic distribution chart reflects a total of 3,926 Jewish Nazi victims; i.e. 3 more than the final number as reconciled, an insignificant discrepancy. Likewise, this geographic distribution chart reflects total payments of $10,739,210; i.e. $4,215 less than the final number as reconciled, an insignificant discrepancy.

Most of the 4,158 individuals compensated by the Court's programs recalled their harrowing experiences as Swiss refugees in considerable detail.

- Survivors Denied Entry/Expelled: The claimants, who were Jewish, were sisters who were born in Austria. They attempted to enter Switzerland in July 1938. They were informed in July 1938 that they would be placed on a children's transport to St. Gallen, Switzerland. At the train station in Vienna, the older sister was turned away by Swiss officials, who said that she was too old, and would not be accepted into the country. It was six weeks past her tenth birthday. The claimant wrote in her personal statement: "I have never forgotten nor have I forgiven the Swiss for not permitting me to go with the transport and treating a 10-year-old child like an enemy of the state." The younger sister, aged 7, was allowed to board the transport and went to Switzerland, but was sent back to Austria three weeks later. The treatment she received at the children's home in Switzerland for the three weeks she was allowed to remain in the country was "coldhearted." For many years, she had "nightmares." The two sisters and their parents stayed in Vienna. They were later deported to the Riga ghetto. The claimants' father perished in the Holocaust. The older sister became a professor at a New York City university and was the author of several books on the Holocaust, including a 1995 work detailing her family's experiences and describing her unsuccessful attempt to enter Switzerland as a refugee.

- Survivor Denied Entry/Expelled: The claimant, who was Jewish, was born on September 15, 1921 in the Netherlands. She was denied entry into Switzerland sometime between late February and early March 1943 at the French-Swiss border. The claimant fled the Netherlands with his wife and two friends with the help of a smuggler. The smuggler abandoned them along the way but they still managed to reach Le Locle, Switzerland. They were arrested soon after and taken to a local army office. The following day, they were driven across the French-Swiss border and deposited in the forests near a German border patrol. The group later attempted to cross into Spain, but was arrested. The claimant spent the war in various concentration camps, including Auschwitz. The claimant subsequently testified at Nuremberg in the slave labor trial against I.G. Farben.

- Survivor Denied Entry: The claimant – who at the time her claim was reviewed was 91 years old, and a professor of medicine at a California university – was born on April 14, 1912 in Germany. She was denied an entry permit into Switzerland in Berlin in 1938. In May 1938, the claimant, who was Jewish, enrolled at the University of Bern in Switzerland to complete her medical studies. After the first semester, the claimant received permission from the university for a brief trip to Berlin to visit her husband and child, with the understanding that she would return, to continue work on her dissertation. The claimant applied for reentry and residence at the Swiss Embassy in Berlin in July 1938. Her application was denied on November 18, 1938, a few days after Kristallnacht. In April 1939, the claimant and her family left for Belgium and three months later went to England. In August 1941, they immigrated to the United States.

- Survivor Expelled: The claimants, who were Jewish, were seven siblings. With their parents, they were expelled from Switzerland in August 1939. The claimants' father was a rabbi in Berlin. He was forced to go into hiding with his family after Kristallnacht. The family fled to Switzerland in January 1939. The claimants' family had been active in the Jewish community in Basel, where the father had been born and raised, and where their grandfather had been a rabbi. Nevertheless, they were granted permission to stay in Switzerland for only a few months, and were forced to leave Switzerland in August 1939. The family succeeded in obtaining visas to England, and traveled there through France.

- Survivor Denied Entry: The claimant was a Romani who was born in Germany in 1926. He lived with his family in Herbolzhein, near the Swiss border. On several occasions, the entire family of 16 people tried to enter Switzerland at Lörrach and Singen. The family was denied entry. They were told that they were a "tribe," and tribes were not allowed to enter Switzerland. The entire family was transported to Auschwitz. They had to perform such labor as digging graves and burying the dead, as well as construction work. The claimant was later transported to Buchenwald and performed slave labor in a quarry until he was liberated. He and one brother were the only family members who survived.

- Survivor Admitted but Mistreated: The claimant, who was Jewish, was born on September 27, 1907 in Poland. She entered Switzerland from France with her son. Upon arrival, she was placed in an internment camp where her movement was restricted. While in the camp, the claimant's son became ill, but nevertheless, she was not allowed to leave the camp to seek treatment for him. Her son died. The claimant suffered a nervous breakdown and was hospitalized.

- Survivor Denied Entry/ Admitted but Mistreated: The claimant, who was Jewish, was born on August 11, 1929 in Austria. She and her parents were denied entry into Switzerland at the French-Swiss border in August 1942. The claimant's family left Austria for Belgium in 1939 and stayed there until May 1940. They then escaped to Lyon, France. The claimant and her family attempted to enter Switzerland from Annemasse with a group. At the border, they were caught by armed guards and told that they were not allowed to enter. The claimant recalled crying and shouting at the border, which drew the attention of the German border police. The claimant and her parents were arrested by the Germans and transported to Drancy. From there, her parents were deported to Auschwitz. With the help of the OSE (Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants), the claimant escaped and went into hiding in Chambon sur Lignon, France.[33] On December 22, 1944, the claimant was sent with a transport to [33] In a 2018 obituary about one of the OSE's leading figures, Georges Loinger, the organization was described as follows: "It had all started as a game. During World War II, when hundreds of Jewish children were hidden at chateaus in the French countryside, kept out of sight from the nation's Nazi occupiers and Vichy collaborators, Georges Loinger entertained them with calisthenics, soccer matches and ball games. Tall and athletic, Mr. Loinger was a Jewish engineer turned physical-education teacher, whose blond hair and blue eyes helped him 'pass' as a non-Jew while he traveled across France, secretly visiting the chateaus and other makeshift refugee centers to keep his young wards healthy with exercise…. The Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, a French Holocaust remembrance group, credited him with helping more than 350 children cross into Switzerland [sometimes through the pretext of chasing a soccer ball], as well as with finding homes for 125 German Jewish children in central France." In the class action complaints consolidated before Judge Korman, no refugee claims were asserted. As traumatic as their experiences had been, none of these Holocaust victims had brought suit in the United States for compensation against Swiss institutions. Instead, the refugee claims were included in the Settlement Agreement, largely at the instance of the Swiss banks (Settling Defendants), presumably based partly on the fact that several former refugees had brought independent lawsuits in Switzerland. While those proceedings did not result in favorable decisions from Swiss courts, they did result in monetary settlements recognizing the "moral" bases of the claims.[34]

For example, in the summer of 1942, as the Nazis were rounding up Belgian Jews, the father of Charles and Sabine Sonabend — a well-known importer of Swiss watches — made arrangements for the family to flee to Switzerland. Despite intervention by various Swiss residents on the family's behalf, the family "was deported by Swiss police who deposited Simon Sonabend, his wife, and two children [Charles and Sabine] at the French border in the night without a map." The family was "immediately captured by Nazi Regime soldiers" and imprisoned in France. The "parents were put on a train to Drancy and then transported to Auschwitz where they were executed on August 24, 1942."[35] Charles and Sabine Sonabend brought suit in Switzerland, asserting a "state liability claim." They sought compensation of "about $70,000, the highest amount one may be awarded for the loss of two parents."[36] The "Swiss government … denied the state liability claim because, as it claimed, the statute of limitations had expired."[37] The Sonabends appealed to the Swiss Supreme Court. they reached a settlement with the Swiss government, receiving $118,000 to cover "costs incurred during their legal battle."[38]

Similarly, in January 2000, in a case that apparently prompted the Sonabend settlement, the Swiss Federal Tribunal "rejected a complaint by an Auschwitz survivor [Joseph Spring] that the Swiss government should be held responsible for handing him over to the Nazis, but awarded him 100,000 francs (dlrs 61,000) in damages anyway. The court ruled that Swiss authorities at the time did nothing illegal in arresting Joseph Spring [,] then 16 [,] as he tried to enter the country from France. It upheld the government's view that the border guards' action did not amount to complicity to genocide, as claimed by Spring's lawyers. But the judges decided that the 73-year-old should be awarded the money [,] the amount he had filed for on ethical grounds and to cover his costs."[39]

However, no such refugee claims were filed as part of the class action lawsuits. The absence of any allegations based upon refugee status may be due at least in part to the uncertain validity of such claims under United States law, which provides certain protections to foreign states for "sovereign" acts.[40] Nevertheless, the Refugee Class was included under the Settlement

Agreement to ensure the "all-Switzerland" release that the Swiss bank defendants demanded to cover all potential Holocaust-era claims. In effect, the private Swiss banks, as the Settling Defendants paying $1.25 billion to end the litigation, demanded that all of Switzerland be insulated from liability in American courts, for any claim arising out of Switzerland's Holocaust-era behavior.

Whatever the origin of these claims, the inclusion of a Refugee Class in the Settlement Agreement enabled thousands of Holocaust victims to recount their experiences, and to be compensated for their suffering at the hands of Swiss officials. These claims comprise an important part of the historical record. That record has been further expanded, in part, as a result of the class action litigation, the settlement and the distribution process.

III. SWISS REFUGEE POLICIES AND MOTIVATIONS DURING THE HOLOCAUST ERA: THE FINDINGS OF THE BERGIER COMMISSION

CURRENT AFFAIRS 231, 241 (Thomas Maissen & Fania Oz-Salzberger eds., Academic Studies Press 2012). However, American legal principles require an assessment of the relative legal merits of the claims in determining an appropriate allocation. Professor Maissen noted that "Korman and Gribetz considered only the [bank account] assets as actionable in a class action," id., but the Court of Appeals also expressed the same view in affirming the District Court's adoption of the Distribution Plan. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 413 F.3d 183, 186 (2d Cir. 2001) ("[a]ny allocation of a settlement of this magnitude and comprising such different types of claims must be based, at least in part, on the comparative strengths and weaknesses of the asserted legal claims"). With respect to the merits of the refugee claims, no plaintiff had even asserted such claims. Rather, the Refugee Class was included in the Settlement Agreement based on the arguments of the Settling Defendants. Had refugee claims been alleged, their legal validity was, at best, unclear. Thus, the Distribution Plan could not unduly emphasize the Refugee Class claims, however morally compelling, since they were questionable legally. As Judge Korman noted early in the case, in upholding the Settlement Agreement as fair, other courts had dismissed claims based on Holocaust-era injuries: "I take no position regarding whether these cases were correctly decided, or whether they would even apply here. Instead, I cite them as a reality check for those objectors who believe that strong moral claims are easily converted into successful legal causes of action." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, 105 F. acceptance of "outcasts continued through the nineteenth century, when Zurich, Geneva, Basel, and other Swiss cities usually harbored hundreds of colorful exiles from abroad …. Over 15 percent of Swiss inhabitants were aliens in 1914, and although this dropped to 8.7 percent in 1930, Switzerland had the highest proportion of outsiders of all European countries except Luxembourg at that time. Foreigners in major cities, such as Geneva or Basel, numbered as high as 40 percent of their populations."[43]

Despite concerns about the impact of foreigners upon the nation's economy and culture, Switzerland remained generally hospitable to refugees, even during the first years following Hitler's rise to power. Switzerland "admitted large numbers of refugees from Germany in 1933, allowing them to reside temporarily in Switzerland pending reimmigration elsewhere. For about five years, this remained the essence of Swiss policy: the Confederation was seen as a place of transit through which refugees might pass on their way to more permanent sanctuaries."[44] However, as the situation in Germany worsened, "Switzerland was confronted by an unprecedented and particularly grave problem which seriously called this humanitarian tradition into question."[45]

A. The Motivations for and Effects of Swiss Refugee Policies

The Bergier Commission explained in detail the Swiss response to the "unprecedented problem" posed by the flood of refugees, particularly Jewish refugees, who sought safety in Switzerland during the 1930s and 1940s.

The Bergier Commission was established on December 13, 1996, when the Swiss parliament passed a decree authorizing an Independent Commission of Experts (the "ICE" or the "Commission"). On December 19, 1996, the Commission was mandated by the Swiss Federal Council to "examine the period prior to, during, and immediately after the Second World War."[46] The Commission was composed of ten historians of diverse nationality, including Harold James and Saul Friedländer.[47] Dr. Sybil Milton, formerly a senior historian of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, also was a member of the Commission but unfortunately passed away during the period of the study. Dr. Helen B. Junz — who investigated Holocaust-era assets on behalf of the Volcker Committee and whom the Court subsequently appointed as CRT Special Master — thereafter joined the Bergier Commission. Other members included its Chairman, Jean-François Bergier, Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, Georg Kreis, Jacques Picard, Jakob Tanner, Daniel Thürer and Joseph Voyame.

[47] As the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA) pointed out, "[t]here lurks an almost unbearable irony in the appointment of Saul Friedlander to an international commission of nine eminent historians to probe, evaluate and ultimately judge Switzerland's role and conduct during World War II... [O]n Sept. 29, 1942, Friedlander's Czech-born parents tried to cross into Switzerland from Vichy France. They were intercepted by Swiss border guards, who handed them over to French police. The French passed the couple on to the Germans, who shipped Jan and Elli Friedlander to Auschwitz, where both perished. Just before the Friedlanders embarked on their ill-fated attempt, they found a hiding place for their 10-year-old son in a French monastery, where he was raised as a Catholic... 'The Swiss knew what had happened to my parents, that I had written about Switzerland's role in the war, and that I was an Israeli citizen,' said Friedlander. 'Given all that, I took the Swiss offer as a sign that their intentions were really serious.'" Behind the Headlines: Israeli Scholar's Appointment to Swiss Body Filled with Irony, JEWISH TELEGRAPHIC AGENCY, May 13, 1997, http://www.jta.org/1997/05/13/archive/behind-the-headlines-israeli-scholars-appointment-to-swiss-body-filled-with-irony-2. See also Swati Pandy, Reading Minds: Personal History, L.A. His parents were stopped by the Swiss, passed back to the French, and in turn, handed over to the Germans. They died in Auschwitz. Now consider what has happened since: Friedlander discovered his parents were dead, reclaimed his Jewish heritage, fought with the Israeli army, was the first to hold a chair in Holocaust studies at UCLA, won a MacArthur genius grant and, among many other achievements, served on a fact-finding commission on Switzerland's role in the Holocaust, recruited by the very country whose wartime leaders had doomed his parents.").

appointment, and in light of the significant findings its members reached.[48] This Final Report on the distribution of the Swiss Banks Settlement therefore quotes extensively from the Final Bergier Report with the hope that the Bergier Commission's important research will be further noted and studied.

As one of its members has observed, in its examination of Swiss activities during the Holocaust era, the Bergier Commission "gave its clearest and harshest answers with respect to refugee policy."[49] While pointing out that Switzerland was far from alone in its reluctance to open its doors to refugees,[50] the Bergier Commission was particularly critical of two crucial determinations reached by Switzerland in 1938 (a year marked by the Austrian Anschluss in March, and the Kristallnacht pogrom in November), and in 1942 (the year following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, the Einsatzgruppen round-ups and shootings in the East, and the first wave of mass deportations to the death camps). The two key decisions were, respectively, Switzerland's successful pressuring of Germany to mark the passports of Jewish persons with a "J" stamp (1938); and the sealing of the Swiss borders (August 1942).[51]

In its preliminary report on refugees released on December 10, 1999, the Bergier Commission strongly condemned both the "J-stamp" and the 1942 border closure:

> What would have happened if Switzerland had not pushed for marking the passports of German Jews with the "J"-stamp in the summer of 1938? What would it have meant if Switzerland had not closed its borders for "racially" persecuted refugees in August 1942?
>
> The introduction of the "J"-stamp in 1938 made it more difficult for Jews living in the Third Reich to emigrate. Without Swiss pressure, the passports would not have been stamped until later, perhaps not at all. This would have made it less difficult for refugees to find a country willing to accept them. For many, Switzerland would not have been the goal of their flight. Without the "J"-stamp, however, many victims of National Socialism would have been able to escape persecution through Switzerland or another country.
>
> In 1942, the situation was completely different. Jews had been forbidden to leave the Nazi areas of occupation since 1941 and many thousands of Jewish men, women, and children were being systematically killed daily. For persecuted people, the journey to the Swiss border was already fraught with great danger. When they reached the Swiss border, Switzerland was their last hope. By creating additional barriers for them to overcome, Swiss officials helped the Nazi regime achieve its goals, whether intentionally or not.
> There is no indication that opening the border might have provoked an invasion by the Axis, or caused insurmountable economic difficulties. Nevertheless, Switzerland declined to help people in mortal danger. A more humane policy might have saved thousands of refugees from being killed by the Nazis and their accomplices.[52]

In its Final Report, released on March 22, 2002, the Bergier Commission reaffirmed its 1999 findings. The Commission noted that Switzerland passed a law in the spring of 1933, shortly after Hitler took power, "distinguishing between political and other refugees." While "Federal authorities were extremely reticent to recognize political refugees," and "non-political" refugees were "considered simply as foreigners from a legal point of view" and were subject to a variety of residence restrictions, nevertheless, "[b]etween 1933 and 1938 … the cantons still enjoyed a good deal of freedom in the way they implemented their policy with regard to refugees. Some cantons adopted a very restrictive policy while others freely issued tolerance permits."[53]

However, with the "intensification of anti-Jewish measures in Germany after 1937, the annexation of Austria in March 1938, the pogroms in November 1938, and the subsequent complete exclusion of Jews from the German economy the situation became considerably more tense…. The Swiss Federal Council strengthened border protection and adopted a series of administrative measures: on 28 March 1938, it made it compulsory for all holders of Austrian passports to have a visa; on 18 August 1938, it decided to refuse entry to all refugees without a visa; and from 4 October 1938 on, German 'non-Aryans' were also obliged to obtain a visa."[54]

In April 1938, within a month of the Anschluss, thousands of Jewish refugees began to flee Austria. Switzerland "held discussions with Germany in order to set up measures that would enable the border authorities to distinguish between Jewish and non-Jewish German citizens. When the [Swiss] Federal Council was weighing the idea of making it compulsory for all German citizens to obtain a visa, the German authorities feared that this would signal detrimental consequences for foreign affairs and that other countries would introduce similar measures." It 54 Id. at 108. The fact that the J-Stamp was a Swiss and not a German idea was kept secret for many years. Not until 1954 was it "revealed that the 'J' stamped in the passports of German Jews had been introduced following a Swiss request and was not an invention of the Gestapo, as was commonly believed." Switzerland, in THE HOLOCAUST ENCYCLOPEDIA 618, 618 (Walter Laqueur & Judith Tydor Baumel eds., 2001). Thus, on October 4, 1938, "the Swiss people were informed that 'German passport holders of German nationality and who, according to German law, are not Aryan' required a visa to enter Switzerland. Utter silence prevailed concerning the active involvement of the Swiss government." Id. When the Swiss role was revealed in the 1950s, there were "major reverberations in Switzerland — not least because they differed totally from what Swiss citizens had previously been told by their own government. Federal Councillor Eduard von Steiger, for many years director of the Confederal Justice and Police Department … and accordingly the person mainly responsible for Swiss policy on refugees, professed after the war that the Swiss government had been ignorant of the mass destruction of European Jewry, intimating that 'had we known what was happening over there in the Reich, we might have widened the bounds of what was possible.'" Id. The Swiss role in introducing the J-Stamp belied that statement. Id. Swiss historian Salomé Lienert disputes the origin of the J-stamp — "Switzerland did not propose the idea of the infamous passport stamp as is sometimes claimed" — but states that Switzerland "clearly carries a significant moral responsibility for it." Salomé Lienert, Swiss Immigration Policies 1933-1939, in BYSTANDERS, RESCUERS OR PERPETRATORS? THE NEUTRAL COUNTRIES AND THE SHOAH, INTERNATIONAL HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE ALLIANCE 41, 48 (Int'l Holocaust Remembrance Alliance ed., Metropol Verlag 2016).

was "for this reason" that the German authorities "agreed to identify the passports of German Jews with a 'J.'"[55]

As historian Michael Marrus has observed, Switzerland's actions had a multiplier effect across Europe. "As a result of this Swiss agreement with Germany and the stamping of Jewish passports, other countries now had the technical means to discriminate against Jews seeking to leave the Reich – even when the Jews attempted to hide their status as refugees."[56]

Conditions continued to worsen rapidly, driving more victims to seek to escape the Nazis. The Bergier Commission traced the chaos after the "German army invaded the Soviet Union in summer 1941," when the "Nazi persecution of Jews developed into systematic extermination."

> In the occupied parts of the Soviet Union German troops, aided by Soviet volunteers, carried out mass murders of Jews and communists. October 1941 saw the start of the systematic deportation of Jews as well as Roma and Sinti from the territory of the Reich; at the same time[,] Jews were forbidden to emigrate. In November 1941, any German Jews that were outside the country were deprived of their German citizenship and their assets confiscated. The first mass murder using poison gas occurred in December in Chelmno; in January 1942, the "final solution to the Jewish question" was drawn up at the Wannsee conference in Berlin. It was at the end of March 1942 that the first Jews were deported from France to Poland and at the beginning of July the French and German authorities agreed to deport all non-French Jews. In the following weeks there were round-ups all over France, and Jews from Western Europe as well as most of the other occupied countries were deported to extermination camps during the following months. The Jews in Western Europe were left with only two channels of escape: either via Spain to another continent, or to Switzerland.[57]

Beginning in the spring of 1942, the "number of refugees who tried to enter Switzerland increased."[58] Some Swiss authorities, including Robert Jezler, the deputy to Federal Police for Foreigners Chief Heinrich Rothmund, appeared to sympathize with the refugees' plight. He observed that "'conditions in the Jewish quarters in the east are so awful that one cannot help but understand the desperate attempts made by the refugees to escape from such a fate.'" He suggested that "'[r]efusing them entry is no longer an option.'" That sympathy, however, did not result in an opening of the borders. Rather, Jezler stated that "one could not afford to be 'squeamish' and recommended that the authorities exercise[] 'extreme reticence' in accepting refugees in the future."[59]

On August 13, 1942, the Police Division sent a circular letter to "civil and military authorities" that "laid down the measures to be taken. It stated that the influx of refugees and 'in particular of Jews of all nationalities' was reaching a level similar to that of the exodus of Jews in 1938. In view of the country's limited supply of food, of the need for internal and external security and of the impossible task of housing and supervising so many refugees, as well as finding them a third country to which they could emigrate, it was necessary to refuse them entry: 'Refugees who have fled purely on racial grounds, e.g., Jews, cannot be considered political refugees.' Such people should be refused entry without exception. The first time they tried to enter Switzerland they should be simply sent back across the border; if they tried again they should be handed over to the relevant authorities on the other side."[60]

There were some exceptions: for "refugees from countries such as Belgium and the Netherlands, whose exiled governments took steps to help their citizens;" "[d]eserters, escaped prisoners of war and other military personnel;" "political refugees in the strict sense of the word;" and "so-called hardship cases — old people, the sick, children and pregnant women."[61] Furthermore, notwithstanding the August 13, 1942 order, "several thousand refugees were allowed to enter Switzerland and were sent to detention camps over the following few months,"

[60] BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 114. The Bergier Commission questioned the argument that food was limited and so could not be shared with refugees. "Due to the fact that food was rationed and the amount of land cultivated was increased, people living in Switzerland were comparatively well fed, with the result that a real emergency situation with regard to the supply of food, which would have justified the restrictive policy vis-à-vis refugees, never in fact arose." Id. at 126. because "it was not possible to control the borders to the extent planned."[62] Furthermore, "the local population repeatedly protested against such deportation," including through a "nation-wide public protest" in the late summer of 1942. However, when the public protests waned, "control was once again tightened and surveillance along the Swiss borders was intensified."[63]

Not until July 12, 1944 did the Swiss police authorities issue "an official order that civilians whose lives were threatened should be admitted," an "indirect recognition of Jews as refugees," although "some Jewish people were still refused entry, as were a number of forced labourers from Eastern Europe." [64]

The Bergier Commission anticipated that some might defend Switzerland's refugee policies on the ground that the Swiss authorities were not aware of the magnitude of the threat under Hitler. However, the Berger Commission dismissed that notion.

> The assumption that the Swiss authorities were inadequately informed and would have acted differently "if one had known what was happening in the Third Reich" is false. Up until 1939, the Jews were publicly discriminated against, persecuted and driven out. The Swiss authorities and the population were well informed about the excesses that occurred in Austria after its annexation by Germany in > March 1938 and about the nation-wide pogroms in November 1938. The Nazi regime of course tried to conceal the "final solution," introduced at the end of 1941, whose aim was the complete annihilation of the Jews. Nevertheless, the authorities knew at the beginning of August 1942 that the Jewish refugees were in extreme danger. Although at the time they did not have precise details about the industrially organized extermination camps, information about the mass killings had been reaching Switzerland through various channels since the end of 1941.[65]

The Bergier Commission cited six examples of Swiss knowledge of the extreme dangers facing Jewish refugees. In the words of the Bergier Commission:[66]

1. An important source of information was the Swiss diplomatic corps abroad. As early as the end of 1941, Swiss diplomats — in particular in Cologne, Rome and Bucharest — were sending reports about the deportation of Jews from Germany and occupied territories under terrible conditions and sent quite detailed information concerning the mass killings. In May 1942, Franz-Rudolph von Weiss, the Swiss Consul in Cologne, sent photographs to Colonel Roger Masson, the head of the Military Information Service, which showed the bodies of suffocated Jews being unloaded from German goods wagons.[67]
2. The Swiss military authorities, who were keen to obtain as much information as possible concerning events across the border, gained information by the questioning of refugees. In February 1942, the Swiss Intelligence Service obtained detailed reports and sketches of mass shootings, through the interrogation of German deserters interned in Switzerland.
3. At the end of 1941 and the beginning of 1942, members of the Swiss medical missions on the Eastern front witnessed so-called hostage shootings. In addition, they obtained reliable information concerning the mass slaughter of Jews. In the 1950s, Dr. Rudolf Bucher explained that he had informed Federal Councillor Karl Kobelt in March 1942 of what he had seen. Kobelt denied this. It was in May 1942 that Dr. Bucher first reported these events to the Swiss Medical Council and held additional speeches even though forbidden to do so by the highest authorities.[68]

4. Throughout the whole war, Switzerland maintained close economic, cultural and political relations with many other countries, so that a good deal of information circulated through private contacts, particularly in business circles. It was in this way that Benjamin Sagalowitz, the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities (SFJC) press officer, learnt about plans for the total extermination of the Jewish race from a German businessman. Sagalowitz approached Gerhart M. Riegner, the World Jewish Congress representative in Geneva, who passed this information on to the Allies beginning 8 August 1942.

5. The political, religious and humanitarian organisations, whose members included both Swiss and foreigners, also represented a source of information. Carl Jacob Burckhardt, Vice-President of the ICRC [International Committee of the Red Cross] and President of the Association of Relief Organisations (Vereinigtes Hilfswerk), had detailed information on the extermination of the Jews which, as he confirmed to Gerhart M. Reigner in November 1942, he had obtained from German sources.[69]

[68] Because of these speeches, Bucher "was described as 'not normal … in his exhibitionism and his hatred for the German race' and as a 'dangerous fantasist' whose conduct suggested a need for psychiatric assessment. The source of those remarks was Albert von Erlach, a founding member of the Committee for Assistance Operations, which had initiated activities by the Swiss Medical Mission on behalf of the Germans." Id.

[69] Despite this information, however, the ICRC decided at its October 14, 1942 plenary meeting that it would not "launch[] a public protest against Hitler's genocide of the Jews," although the draft appeal, evidently seeking some degree of so-called balance, was intended to address "not just Hitler's racial policies but also the Allies' unrestricted aerial bombardment of German cities." Neville Wylie, The Sound of Silence: The History of the International Committee of the Red Cross as Past and Present, 13 DIPL. & STATECRAFT 186, 193, 200-01 (2002) (reviewing three books discussing the ICRC). "The sound of the ICRC's silence on 14 October 1942 has reverberated throughout the second half of the twentieth century." Id. at 202. In combination with the "[then-]recent assault on Switzerland's wartime record and the tarnishing of Swiss neutrality has inevitably raised fresh doubts over the ICRC's role and the extent to which the institution was able to act independently from Swiss control." Id. at 193. There were "[c]lose links" between the ICRC and "Berne," including the fact that "all members of the committee are Swiss nationals" and "a good part of the ICRC's budget has, traditionally, come from Swiss coffers." Id. at 195. Thus, the organization's "relationship with the Swiss government is a theme discussed in all the books under review. It cropped up as a recurrent issue in the early discussions of the international committee and … remained an important factor for the ICRC throughout the twentieth century." Id. In October 1942, Berne "interven[ed] … in discouraging the [ICRC] from taking a stand on the Holocaust…. The federal officials were not merely alarmed by the tactical ineptitude of the proposed appeal, but were anxious that the action would merely annoy the German government and trigger a new flood of refugees streaming towards Switzerland's frontiers," as "Berne had, barely six weeks before, closed its borders to further refugees and clearly had no wish to cause itself further problems." Id. at 196. "When discreet demarches to Berlin failed to bring about any improvement in German behaviour, the [ICRC] decided against making its concerns public, and instead concentrated its physical and emotional energies on developing a relief programme for the concentration camps and helping those few select groups of inmates whose nationality or circumstances singled them out from the huge mass of Hitler's intended victims." Id. at 194.

6. Radio and newspapers too played a role in spreading information. In his radio chronicle of February 1942, Prof. Jean Rodolphe von Salis pointed out that Hitler, true to his custom of issuing his direst threats on the anniversary of his taking power, had announced that "this war will not serve to destroy the Aryan race, but to exterminate the Jews." From summer 1942 on, the press also frequently published articles about the systematic extermination of the Jews. As early as July 1942, Swiss newspapers reported that the Nazis had killed around one million Jews.[70]

The Bergier Commission observed that "[i]n all fairness it should be said that there were grounds for being skeptical about the information received," and "the reports received were so horrendous that even in Jewish circles not all details, for example the industrial use of the bodies of those killed, were necessarily considered to be true, even at the end of August 1942." Nevertheless, when the Swiss borders were closed in August 1942, "the authorities had an accurate picture of what was happening."[71]

A 2003 profile of Switzerland stated of the Red Cross: "This inscrutable institution, accountable to no outside body, is governed by up to 25 elderly Swiss lawyers and businessmen whose predecessors on the International Committee whitewashed conditions in the concentration camps. Allied intelligence reportedly viewed Red Cross officials as nothing more than Nazi agents. Indeed, recently declassified documents from 1943 disclose that the US Joint Chiefs of Staff were so concerned about the role of the Swiss in supporting Nazi Germany that they recommended a total economic blockade on Switzerland. Their advice, however, was rejected by President Roosevelt." Francis Stonor Saunders, NS Profile: Switzerland, NEW STATESMAN, Apr. 28, 2003, http://www.newstatesman.com/node/157529.

Schulte told Koppelman that he had just learned details about German plans to mass murder all the Jews of Europe. Koppelman shared this information with Dr. Gerhart Riegner … the [World Jewish Congress] representative in Geneva, who passed it on to Sidney Silverman … a member of Britain's House of Commons"). Crowe points out that as early as 1942, similar information was conveyed to other British authorities, as well as to a variety of officials in the United States. Id. at 353-54.

As to Switzerland, although the Bergier Commission found that that nation was aware of Nazi extermination policies as early as 1942, and made these findings clear in its 2002 report, it took more than another decade, and a different report, to generate media interest. See, e.g., Cnaan Liphshiz, Report: Swiss kicked out Jews despite knowing of 'final solution,' JEWISH TELEGRAPHIC AGENCY, Jan. 28, 2013, http://www.jta.org/2013/01/28/news-opinion/world/report-swiss-kicked-out-jews-despite-knowing-of-final-solution (citing a "report aired by the German-language station SRF" which on January 27, 2013 "publicized" documents "previously unpublished" that had been "received by Eduard von Steiger, federal justice and police minister," including "hundreds of letters, telegrams and detailed reports collected by Swiss diplomats and sent to the federal cabinet during World War II," as well as "photos").

[71] BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 120.

In response to the inevitable question of why Switzerland maintained its "restrictive admission policy" despite this knowledge, the Bergier Commission cited a number of factors. These ranged from xenophobia and fear of "over-foreignisation" to "widespread anti-Semitism" as well as opposition to Roma and Sinti; "economic protectionism" motivated by unemployment and the "fear of added competition on the labour market;" concerns about the "difficulty of supplying the country with food and industrial goods" once the war broke out; and emphasis of the threat the refugees might pose to national security.[72]

On the subject of anti-Semitism, the Bergier Commission noted that the Swiss Federal Department of Justice and Police (EJPD) had "drawn up the ideological and legal basis for Swiss population policy" after World War I, and it had "implemented a policy on foreigners that had an anti-Semitic bias…. It is a known fact that there were strong xenophobic and anti-Semitic tendencies within the EJPD and that the Police Division concentrated its efforts on refusing admission to refugees."[73] Swiss Police Chief Rothmund made it clear that he believed "'Jewification' (meaning an excessive Jewish presence and influence) would arouse antisemitism among the Swiss themselves," although the "Jewish population never exceeded 0.5 per cent of Switzerland's total inhabitants in these years."[74] James G. McDonald, then-League of Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Coming from Germany (and later U.S. Ambassador to Israel), in his diary entry of September 19, 1934, observed of Rothmund: "At the close of our talk" — during which Rothmund had "remained adamant on his definition of a political refugee" (a definition that excluded Jews) — "Rothmund spoke of the [Swiss] Jewish community as being very moderate in its view and very cooperative, but repeated the usual comments about the eastern Jews, and the danger of anti-Semitism if there is not care."[75] Rothmund expressed a similar sentiment several years later, in 1938: "[u]nder no circumstances can we allow emigrants to enter the Swiss job market in any way. Our unemployed, among whom can be found numerous Swiss who have returned from living abroad, would resist this and they would be right in doing so. The result would be an antisemitism that is unworthy of our country."[76]

The restrictive refugee policy did not go unchallenged in Switzerland. Rather, there was "criticism from every political camp." Social Democrat Paul Graber of Neuchâtel accused "the Federal administration of anti-Semitic comportment." Albert Oeri, a Liberal from Basel, opposed the notorious remark of Federal Councillor Eduard von Steiger that "the boat is full," responding that "[o]ur boat is not yet overcrowded, let alone full, and as long as it isn't full we would be committing a sin by not taking in those that we still have room for."[77] Nevertheless, the Federal

One example of these tendencies was in the area of children's relief. Despite the "immense popularity of Swiss aid to children," and the organization of a Swiss Red Cross Children's Relief program that "enabled over 60,000 children to stay and recuperate in Switzerland during the war thanks to the generosity and commitment of numerous Swiss families," this generosity was not extended to Jewish children. "[A]s early as May 1941, Rothmund ordered that Jewish children be excluded from the convoys coming to Switzerland." BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 132. Several of the survivors compensated through the Court's Refugee Class program were, in fact, so excluded (see infra).

"In view of the public protest and the critical newspaper articles that followed," the Swiss Red Cross-Children's Relief organization "applied for permission to include 200 Jewish children in each convoy arriving for a 3-month stay in Switzerland. This proposal was refused, with the exception of Jewish children of French nationality, because in their case there was a guarantee that they could be sent back to France after 3 months. In August 1942, thousands of children whose parents had been deported were left alone in the unoccupied part of France." BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 132. Despite additional proposals submitted by the relief organization, including one intended to accept "a few thousand children on a temporary basis to prevent their deportation and to enable them to continue on to the USA," Federal Councillor Pilet-Golaz vetoed the proposals and so "[a]ll plans for saving the children were thus dashed." Some Jewish children later were able to enter Switzerland illegally, due to the "commitment of [the] staff of the Red Cross Aid to Children and other organisations operating in France." Id. "In comparison, between 1938 and 1940, the British took in 10,000 children" by "collective admissions." Council's restrictive policy "gained the support of the bourgeois parliamentary majority, although no vote was held which would have revealed the exact pattern of opinion."[78]

The Bergier Commission pointed out that Switzerland was not alone in its approach. Switzerland's restrictive policy was similar to that of many other nations, and "Swiss refugee policy cannot be understood or judged without taking into account worldwide developments at the time." In "Europe as well as overseas, resistance to 'all things foreign' and anti-Semitism had been widespread since the turn of the century." Like Switzerland, many other countries — including Canada and the United States — adopted significant restrictions against entry.[79]

As early as 1940, U.S. officials had adopted a rational for excluding "immigrants" that essentially paralleled the Swiss aversion to creating an atmosphere of anti-Semitism "unworthy of our country." As described in the June 14, 1940 edition of The New York Times, Attorney General Robert H. Jackson announced a change in immigration policy, so that "the doctrine that [78] Id. at 135. Swiss historians Regula Ludi and Anton-Andreas Speck have pointed out that Switzerland's treatment of Jewish refugees also should be considered in light of that nation's policies toward its own Jewish citizens who lived abroad and were persecuted by the Nazi regime. Ludi and Speck observed that "research has made clear to what extent Swiss Jews became victims of National Socialist race policy, and … the new research has also rescued from oblivion the history of Nazi victims from Switzerland. In reality, the number of Swiss victims of persecution is not inconsiderable. At the end of the 1950s, the government estimated that there were about 1,100 Swiss citizens alone who were not eligible for restitution from the Federal Republic of Germany [due to German restrictions; see Distribution Plan, Annex E ("Holocaust Compensation")]." Regula Ludi & Anton-Andreas Speck, Swiss Victims of National Socialism: An Example of how Switzerland Came to Terms with the Past, in 2 REMEMBERING FOR THE FUTURE: THE HOLOCAUST IN AN AGE OF GENOCIDE 907, 907 (John K. Roth & Elisabeth Maxwell eds., Palgrave Macmillan 2001). Ludi and Speck estimated that "the actual number of Swiss victims is likely to have numbered several thousand," id. at 907, and observed that "even in individual cases where the rights of Jewish citizens had obviously been violated, Switzerland reacted only under pressure from outside. Although the Swiss government was informed about what took place in the extermination camps of the east, the arrest of Swiss Jews did not really become a problem until relatives or other interested parties intervened on behalf of the persecuted individuals." Id. at 908. When anti-Semitic legislation was enacted in France in 1941, the "Federal Council took the position that Jews with Swiss nationality could not claim privileged status about those in their host country and chose not to demand equal treatment for all Swiss citizens living in France. This choice confirmed and strengthened the policy followed since the 1930s by Swiss foreign missions in Germany, which did not protest when Swiss Jews were subjected to anti-Semitic measures." Id. at 909.

[79] BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 164, 166-67. In the United States, the "delicacy with which the administration felt it had to tread on the issue is illustrated by an incident in 1942 when Lord Halifax, the British Ambassador in Washington, discussed with Roosevelt a proposal for the admission to the U.S. of a group of Polish refugees, women and children, among whom 5 percent might be Jewish. According to Halifax's account the President was particularly nervous about the Jewish aspect of the scheme and he 'admitted that what [the] administration feared was anti[S]emitic agitation.'" Bernard Wasserstein, The JDC During the Holocaust, MIDSTREAM, Feb. 1985, at 56, 57.

any person might come here unless it was shown that he was a menace 'must at least temporarily yield to the policy that none shall be admitted unless it affirmatively appears to be for the American interest.'" The "'hateful or unjust treatment of loyal noncitizens may have the result of making them the prey of those who would organize a 'fifth column' here. No greater disservice to the cause of American unity and defense can be perpetrated than the wholesale arousing of hate against persons of foreign birth who have been attracted to this country by our promise of American opportunity.'"[80]

However, the Bergier Commission concluded that the Swiss response to, and impact upon, refugees was particularly troublesome, given Switzerland's unique attributes. First, "[i]t must be noted that Switzerland (like Sweden until the end of 1942) seems to have been the only country to openly apply racist selection criteria according to the Nazi definition."[81] Second, although Swiss refugee policies were not exceptional, their effect on refugees was. "From 1940 on, Switzerland's restrictive admission policy proved to be especially dramatic because, due to its geographical position, it was the easiest country of refuge to reach on the continent, and several thousand refugees were turned back although the authorities knew that this might mean sending them to their death."[82] While "the refugee policy applied in Switzerland in the 1930s was comparable to that pursued by other countries," in 1942 and 1943, "Switzerland found itself in a historically unique position which cannot be compared to that of other countries. The international community as a whole did far less than it might have done to save refugees. In this respect individual countries reacted in different ways to the challenges specific to their own position. Switzerland, and in particular its political leaders, failed when it came to generously offering protection to persecuted Jews."[83]

In summing up the impact of Switzerland's refugee policies, the Bergier Commission considered the Swiss response to have been > all the more serious in view of the fact that the authorities, who were quite aware of the possible consequences of their decision, not only closed the borders in August 1942, but continued to apply this restrictive policy for over a year. By adopting numerous measures making it more difficult for refugees to reach safety, and by handing over the refugees caught directly to their persecutors, the Swiss authorities were instrumental in helping the Nazi regime to attain its goals.[84]

In a press conference announcing the release of the Final Report, Jean-François Bergier observed that although many individuals and groups sought to ameliorate the impact of Switzerland's strict refugee policies, the nation was "obliged to sustain the affirmation, perhaps provocative in form, but nonetheless in conformity with the facts: The refugee policy of our authorities contributed to the most atrocious of Nazi objectives - the Holocaust."[85]

The Bergier Commission's conclusion that Swiss actions contributed to the Nazi regime's success drew particular attention, including from the renowned historian Gerhard Weinberg. In reviewing the Bergier Report, Weinberg observed that given Switzerland's "unique geographical situation as a possible haven on the one hand and the rigidity of its anti-immigrant policy and procedures on the other," the Bergier Commission "not surprisingly came to the conclusion that 'the Swiss authorities were instrumental in helping the Nazi regime attain its goals.'"[86]

B. The Bergier Commission's Findings on the Treatment of Admitted Refugees

In analyzing the fates that awaited those refugees who were able to obtain entry into Switzerland, the Bergier Commission provided a snapshot of the various living situations that might have been encountered in 1944.

> The following figures for spring 1944, which are partly based on estimations, illustrate the variety of conditions in which the refugees lived. Out of the 25,000 or so civilian refugees living in Switzerland at that time, 9,300 were living in civilian camps and homes; 3,000 were waiting in reception camps to be admitted to civilian quarters; 5,300 were living with relatives or in boarding houses; 1,600 men and women were working on the land or as domestic staff and had private accommodation; 1,000 people had a "free place" in a Swiss household, and 2,500 children lived with foster families; 580 refugees had access to higher education.[87]

While highlighting the significant numbers of refugees admitted into Switzerland toward the end of the war, the Bergier Commission criticized their treatment. The Commission noted that "[b]efore the refugees were billeted in civilian accommodations, they passed through various camps run by the military. The assembly centres near the border were followed by at least three weeks in a quarantine camp. The refugees had to wait in reception camps, also run by the military, until places were available in the civilian work camps and homes. Many waited several months, some even more than half a year. In many cases, living conditions in the reception camps did not even meet the simplest of standards: often there was no heating, the sanitary facilities were inadequate, and the diet was poor ... Discipline in the camps was maintained [by the military] not only for reasons of necessity but more often out of an educational need that was tainted with an anti-Semitic prejudice."[88]

REV. 157, 158 (2006) (reviewing SIMON ERLANGER, "ONLY A TRANSIT COUNTRY": WORK CAMPS AND INTERNMENT HOMES FOR REFUGEES AMONG EMIGRANTS IN SWITZERLAND, 1940-1949 (2006)) ("Gerstenfeld review") (Erlanger pointed out "that the internment camps were established partly because of the Swiss authorities' fear that an excessive number of Jewish immigrants would stir up latent anti-Semitism in the country's population. This is striking in light of the fact that Jews constituted far less than 1 percent of the Swiss population").

Swiss historian Simon Erlanger noted that the camp system arose in response to the October 17, 1939 Resolution on Changes in Police Regulations for Foreigners, passed by the Swiss Council of Ministers. The Resolution called on the cantons to deport illegal refugees, while also making it clear that those remaining in the country were to be placed in long-term internment, and to provide work beneficial to Switzerland. "The military was concerned about the presence of suspicious foreigners in strategically sensitive areas, such as the border regions. At the same time, in the winter of 1939-1940, due to the general mass mobilization, there was an acute shortage of laborers for the construction of barriers, fortifications, and roads." Following a March 12, 1940 announcement by the Council of Ministers observing that "labor camps for emigrants are being set up in the interior of the country" and assigning the Federal Department of Justice and the Police the responsibility for organizing and operating the camps, Heinrich Rothmund and his department established a central authority, the "ZL." On April 4, 1940, the first labor camp was established, in Felsberg.[89]

Later, in May, 1942, the ZL established the first "refugee home," in Leysin. The "homes" were intended primarily to house women, children and men unable to work. In 1943 and 1944, the ZL began to establish other types of homes, such as for training, as well as for "'scholars and scientists.'"[90]

In its Final Report to the Court, the IOM described the refugee camp arrangement as follows:

> [Certain] reception camps were set up by the military ... after 1942 and were planned only for short stays. First, there was the assembly camp ("Sammellager"), in which refugees were investigated in order to decide in which category they belonged; under certain circumstances, they were expelled. From the assembly camp, they were moved to a quarantine camp ("Quarantänelager") for three weeks and then to the reception camp ("Auffanglager"). In many places, refugees who were admitted into Switzerland spent their first days there in prison, > without knowing for sure whether they would be returned to the border and expelled or not. They also had to endure interrogations by the military police and were photographed and fingerprinted, often made to feel like delinquents. Daily life in the military-run camps included inspections and roll-calls, even for women and children, and all refugees were subjected to strict discipline. Accommodations were completely inadequate and food was one of the major problems; fresh fruit was never seen, and most people suffered from malnutrition.[91]

The military continued to manage the camps until July 1946, when control was transferred to civilian authorities.[92]

As one former refugee stated: "At the time when physical self-preservation was our dominant daily priority, we have found in Switzerland a haven and a heaven; we are grateful to this country for having admitted us, thus saving our lives, we are grateful to the Swiss people who had understanding and sympathy for us, the refugees, and who shared their restricted food rations with us." Id.

of a petitioner."[94] The labor was, however, "obligatory, not voluntary. Any attempt to avoid such forced internment met with severe penalties and could even lead to expulsion from the country. Internment in a camp often meant the long-term breakup and separation of families. Inmates could be kept in these ZL camps and homes for years on end."[95]

On the other hand, the work requirement was not limited only to refugees. "Swiss citizens, both men and women, were required to perform labor service beginning in May 1940. Tens of thousands of them did such work during the war…."[96] Swiss historian Erlanger in his book on Swiss work camps and internment homes gave a "nuanced picture of the internment camps," noting that "the organization that was responsible for their management made a substantial effort to hire competent personnel. A number of these were genuinely interested in the refugees' wellbeing. Some others stole food from the refugees and sold it on the black market."[97]

Erlanger himself described the camp administrative arrangements as follows: "When the ZL [Zentralleitung der Arbeitslager für Emigranten, the Swiss central authority for labor camps] began its work … in 1940 it had a total of four staff members. Under the impact of the rising tide of refugees, that would soon change. Four years later these modest beginnings had burgeoned into a huge apparatus: on January 31, 1944, there were a total of 8,689 refugees and emigrants interned in thirty-seven camps and thirty-one ZL homes. The number of ZL personnel had soared to around 500. Less than one year later, at the end of 1944, the number of emigrants and refugees under the jurisdiction of the ZL had risen to almost 12,000, while the ZL personnel ranks expanded at times to a staff of some 900. At the end of March 1945, there were about 104 camps and homes in operation." Erlanger, Order Versus Education, at 184. However, while "fragmentar[y]" records exist which are "scattered among a number of archives," "[n]o intact, self-contained corpus of ZL files or a ZL archive has been found to date." Id. at 185. Like many aspects of Swiss refugee policy (as the Bergier Commission explained in addressing the lack of a complete record of those expelled or denied entry; see infra), "any reconstruction and evaluation of this key chapter in Swiss refugee policy must, for the present, be based on the scattered documents and records that have been fortuitously preserved elsewhere." Id.

Conditions in the internment camps did prove to be extremely difficult for many refugees. The Swiss official who headed up the labor camp system, Otto Pfister, considered the purpose of the system not "'to carry out a specific type of work,'" but rather "'to exercise an educational, formative impact on its participants'" and to "'integrate the workers into an ordered, healthy and useful existence.'"[98] As Erlanger noted, however, "Pfister seems to have forgotten one point: he was dealing with individuals who, for the most part, had in fact lived a quite 'ordered, healthy and useful existence' in a middle-class milieu until the moment they were excluded from society, persecuted, and driven to flight and exile."[99]

Between 1940 and 1948, "159 persons died in the ZL camps and homes; among them, the world-renowned tenor and cantor Joseph Schmidt,"[100] who in 1933 starred in one of the most successful films in Germany of that year.[101]

Joseph (also known as Josef) Schmidt's poignant story was recounted by the Court's administrative agency charged with reviewing Deposited Assets Class Claims, the Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) in Zurich. The CRT recommended that Schmidt's heirs receive an award in the amount of $30,743.80, because Schmidt's Swiss accounts had not been returned. As the CRT observed, Josef Schmidt, who was born in Romania in 1904, "began his career as a cantor and became an internationally known opera star and recording artist."[102] He "died at the age of 38 in Switzerland, where he had fled as a refugee and had been interned in the Gyrenbad refugee camp."

The CRT conducted extensive research to supplement the information provided in claim forms and other documents filed by seven different claimants to Josef Schmidt's Swiss account. The CRT traced Josef Schmidt's career from his '"first vocal training … as a classic Hebrew singer in the local synagogue in Cernowitz,'" through his studies of voice and piano in Berlin and his military service from 1926 to 1929, followed by "international acclaim." He performed in German films in the early 1930s, and at Carnegie Hall in 1937. However, as the CRT explained, after touring the United States, Schmidt interrupted his career and returned to Cernowitz in 1939 "'for a final visit with his recently widowed mother. As war erupted he tried to make his way to America, but made it only as far as a Swiss refugee camp in Gyrenbad.'"

The CRT noted that Josef Schmidt had been discussed in "a seminal work on Swiss refugee policies, 'The Lifeboat is Full' (Das Boot ist Voll)."[103] Quoting from the book, which described Schmidt's internment as a refugee in Switzerland, the CRT explained:

> "The fate of Joseph Schmidt, the singer, cannot be forgotten. The sudden death of this internationally known and loved artist, who starred in the film A Song Goes Round the World (Ein Lied Geht um die Welt), among many others, was reported at the end of November 1942 by Dr. Fritz Heberlein [in several Swiss newspapers]. Joseph Schmidt was removed on October 27, 1942, from the Gyrenbad camp to the cantonal hospital in Zürich, where his illness was diagnosed as a minor laryngitis and tracheitis. He was then discharged as cured, although he complained of chest pains. He was very fearful at the thought of returning to the camp, because he dreaded — and certainly not without reason — the serious damage to his most precious asset, his voice, that might result from the extremely bad hygienic conditions and the dust of the straw pallets in Gyrenbad. A private physician was prepared to accept him into his own clinic after his release from the hospital, give him a thorough examination, and treat him. But the camp authorities, without any malevolence, refused permission — in fact, on the ground of democracy — because even refugees of means were supposed to be treated only in cantonal hospitals. So the thirty-eight-year-old singer finally went back to the camp. As a concession, the camp commander billeted him in the inn that adjoined the camp.
> The next morning Schmidt died of a heart attack.
> Granted that his death cannot be simply ascribed to the functionaries. But if they had been somewhat less bureaucratic and thus avoided agitating the singer, at least they would not have been vulnerable to the charge of contributing to his death."

As the CRT noted, The Lifeboat is Full pointed out that the "'story did not end with Schmidt's death.'" Dr. Heberlein, who reported on the death, asked that conditions at the refugee camp be investigated. Instead, Dr. Heberlein was informed that his writings "'fell within the definition of punishable rumor-mongering and it was possible that his eulogy of Josef Schmidt might be injurious to Switzerland's reputation in the United States!'"

In addition to having been a refugee in Switzerland, Josef Schmidt also was a depositor there. He had opened a safe deposit box on September 18, 1933, according to bank records reviewed by the CRT, and there was no evidence indicating that Mr. Schmidt's heirs had received the proceeds. As a result of the Court's claims processes, two of Josef Schmidt's nieces received compensation.

Beyond the work conditions in the camps, which the Bergier Commission concluded had contributed to Josef Schmidt's death, the Bergier Commission also was disturbed by the "separation of parents and their children — which raised legal problems too — [but which] was not due solely to regulations laid down by the authorities, but was also encouraged by the Swiss Committee for Aid to Children of Emigres (SHEK). In the SHEK's opinion for the sake of the development of the children, a 'normal' family atmosphere was preferable to living with their mothers in refugee homes."[104]

The Bergier Commission observed that "[a]t the end of 1943, a turning point was reached in the way the authorities dealt with the refugees: on the side of the authorities there was more willingness to meet the needs and wishes of refugees in homes and camps. The principle of separating families was abandoned. After 1943, students were allowed to continue their studies — which had been interrupted by their flight — at Swiss universities and thanks to private initiatives university camps were set up for students, as well as a high-school camp for Italian teenagers. These changes can be largely explained by the progress of the war: thanks to the Allied victories, the end of the refugees' stay in Switzerland could be foreseen."[105]

The Jewish refugees who gained admission were considered largely the financial responsibility of the Swiss Jewish community. Its members "were in an especially difficult situation, with a heavy financial and moral burden resting on their shoulders. As a tiny minority striving for respectability, they were not in a position to oppose official demands, but as the number of impoverished refugees arriving in Switzerland grew and possibilities for transferring assets from Nazi Germany rapidly dwindled, community leaders faced a major dilemma: insisting on a liberal and open asylum policy to save German Jews would sooner or later risk the community's financial ruin. Declaring insolvency, however, would inevitably give the authorities a pretext to send Jewish refugees back to Nazi Germany."[106] The solution "was to tap into the much larger funds of the international relief organisations," and beginning in 1939, "the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee offered Switzerland's Jewish community its help, and in the following years, it provided 50 per cent or more of the funds needed to support Jewish refugees in Switzerland."[107]

In the view of the Bergier Commission, the "question of cost [of supporting refugees] …. was principally an argument put forward to justify restrictive measures that were, in reality, based on other considerations."[108] Furthermore, as Swiss historian Jacques Picard has pointed out: "Non-Jewish refugees were not classified into Catholic or Protestant categories and the Swiss Catholic or Protestant communities were not expected to pay for their respective refugees. Thus while other refugees were financed by refugee charities in general, the Swiss government in effect relegated the Jews to the status of second-grade refugees and told the Jewish community to sort out and pay for its own refugee problem…. [This was a] racial distinction and morally questionable."[109]

The refugees should pay their own way as far as possible; if necessary, the appropriate support groups should provide financial support for 'their' people. After the persecution of Jews was intensified in 1938 and tens of thousands of people fled Austria and Germany, the Swiss relief organisations ran out of funds…. From 1940 on, the financial burden on the relief organisations was somewhat alleviated by the fact that emigrants were interned in work camps; from 1943 on, the commitment of the Federal authorities became more substantial as thousands of refugees were sent to camps and homes…. In our opinion, the global cost to the national economy generated by having taken in the civilian refugees, is impossible to calculate. Apart from direct costs for board and lodging plus medical care, any such calculations would have to include the economic benefit gained from the presence of the refugees. This would encompass their manpower or, for example, what they spent on accommodation in boarding houses and with private families").

The Swiss reluctance to admit Jewish Nazi victims did not, however, extend to their assets. Decisions on admission into the country "depend[ed] on whether persons or property were involved," and indeed the "influx of European capital took place with practically no obstacles, whereas the border was often hermetically sealed against persons in search of asylum."[110] Those who were admitted as refugees thus found that their assets were also welcome. As discussed in greater detail in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process," the "refugees' stay in Switzerland was characterized by supervision and the removal of personal responsibility," including the confiscation of "valuables and cash," which were "handed over to the Federal Department of Justice and Police to be administered."[111]

Although "[a]s a rule refugees were handed back their assets upon leaving Switzerland,"[112] this was not always the case. The Court approved several CRT awards based upon bank records and documentation indicating that the accounts had not been returned to the refugee (or his/her heirs). For example, in In re Accounts of Mario Calfon, the Court authorized a Deposited Assets Class award where the account owner had been required, pursuant to a Swiss Federal Council Decree of March 12, 1943, to deposit his assets in a Swiss bank for management by Swiss police authorities. While forced to work in refugee camps, Mr. Calfon and his wife were hospitalized and incurred a debt. Mr. Calfon tried to negotiate with the bank, noting that he had not been paid for his work as a refugee, but he was unsuccessful. The bank records indicate that Mr. Calfon's gold jewelry and other assets had been used to cover his debts and had not been returned to him. Mr. Calfon's heirs received an award in the amount of SF 289,087.50.

As to those who were able to retrieve their assets before leaving the country, "in the meantime most of the balances had decreased considerably. Apart from the repayment for their keep, this can also be explained by the high administrative fees levied by the bank. In addition, the authorities had exonerated the bank from paying the refugees interest on their current accounts. A particularly severe measure from the refugees' point of view was that the Police Division was authorized to sell pieces of confiscated jewelry if necessary (including even family heirlooms) without obtaining the owner's permission."[113]

C. The Number of Refugees Denied Entry or Expelled, and the Number of Refugees Admitted

One of the key questions facing the Bergier Commission was the number of individuals affected by Switzerland's refugee policies. As true for records relating to Swiss bank accounts, much of the necessary documentation on refugees had been destroyed. Like the Volcker Committee, which investigated Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts,[114] the Bergier Commission had to analyze and draw conclusions from an incomplete historical record.

In its Refugee Report of 1999, the Bergier Commission explained that it had studied "files relevant to refugee policies" that had been opened by the Swiss Federal Archive, "including the personal files of all refugees granted asylum . . . Even though the sources in the Federal Archives generally reflect the views of the government, records of the Swiss Central Office for Refugee Relief (SZF) and the Swiss Jewish Association for Refugee Relief (VSJF), deposited in the Archives for Contemporary History of the Federal Institute of Technology

[114] The Volcker Committee's work is discussed in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process." Briefly, the Volcker Committee was established in 1996 by the Swiss Bankers Association, the World Jewish Congress, and other Jewish organizations, to conduct an independent audit of Holocaust-era bank accounts. The committee was led by Paul A. Volcker, former Chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank. Its findings that 6.7 million Holocaust-era accounts had existed, of which records for 4.1 million accounts had been destroyed, informed much of the administration of the Court's Deposited Assets Class claims process.

(ETH) Zurich present a somewhat differentiated picture. Other primary sources include the archives of other relief organizations, oral history, written statements, and personal papers."[115]

Despite the availability of considerable data, "[s]ome files … no longer exist, in particular those containing information about the expulsion of refugees."[116] Further, "[a]mong the most important records lost or partially lost are the register of refugees expelled by the Federal Police Division, the records of the territorial commands (except for Territorial divisions 1 and 4, the State Archives of the cantons Geneva and Tessin), and the records of the Federal Central Office for Refugee Homes and Camps."[117]

Other significant files also had been destroyed, including those of the "Swiss Federal Police for Foreigners," from which data regarding visa applications could have been derived.[118] As to visas, then, "[t]he general practice can only be reconstructed fragmentarily using the few remaining files from Swiss legations and consulates. The relevant files are missing from the foreign missions in Germany. The only still existing files are for the Swiss Legation in Paris and in Vichy."[119]

Similarly, "there are no official reports that document the fate of [expelled] refugees after Switzerland turned them away. For Swiss officials, a 'case' existed only up to the border; what happened after that was outside their field of vision."[120] Thus, the Commission relied upon documents such as letters "found in files pertaining to other matters," or that happened to have been sent to attorneys, relief organizations, or the press. However, such "often hastily scribbled reports by refugees" exist "only by chance."[121]

With respect to treatment of refugees permitted to remain in Switzerland, "[i]n contrast to the camp system, research about private housing of refugees has been absent because of decentralized sources." Id. at 163 n.391. As of December, 1999, the date of publication of its interim report on refugees, the Bergier Commission had been informed that the "Federal Archives are creating a database that is supposed to contain all available information on refugees known to have been expelled." Id. at 129 n.172.

Lastly, the "number of people who did not try to enter Switzerland either following the rejection of their application for a visa by a Swiss consular office, or in the wake of information about restrictive Swiss policy, is uncertain. Thus, the exact number of people Switzerland could have saved from deportation and murder remains unknown."[122]

In addition to these archival documents (however incomplete), the Bergier Commission relied upon the following additional sources in reconstructing the statistical data:

- "Documents on German Foreign Policy," a 1953 publication which "revealed that in 1938 Switzerland had participated in stamping the passports of German Jews with a 'J'."[123]
- Flüchtlingspolitik, a report commissioned by the Swiss Federal Council in 1954 and published by legal expert Carl Ludwig in 1957, which "is still regarded today as indispensable for understanding Swiss refugee policies." It comprehensively examined the prevailing legal parameters and named Federal Councillor [Edouard] von Steiger and Heinrich Rothmund, head of the Police Division in the EJPD [Swiss Department of Justice and Police] as primarily responsible;" and claimed that the "restrictive refugee policies" supposedly were warranted by the "'inundation by foreigners' … and the 'strained job market.'"[124]
- DAS BOOT IST VOLL…DIE SCHWEIZ UND DIE FLÜCHTLINGE 1933-1945 (THE BOAT IS FULL) (Fretz & Wasmuth 1967), a book authored by journalist Alfred A. Häsler which "presented to a broad audience the horrifying consequences of expelling and turning back refugees."[125]
- Various "well-researched studies" conducted under the auspices of Swiss universities, including analyses of the operation and division of responsibilities among various governmental departments, Swiss policies toward Jews, refugee internment camps, and "Swiss knowledge about Nazi mass murder policies from 1941 to 1943."[126]

Based upon the available primary and secondary sources, in its 1999 Refugee Report, the Bergier Commission reached the following conclusions regarding the relevant statistical data:

- "[T]he limitations of statistics must be considered. There are hardly any reliable figures available for the years 1933 to 1939."[127]
- "[O]nly those refugees granted asylum were registered individually, enabling us today to compile various figures; however, very little is known about the refugees denied asylum."[128]
- "There is proof that about 24,500 refugees were turned away at the border between January 1940 and May 1945. The actual figure is probably somewhat higher, but a more exact calculation is not possible because of a lack of sources."[129]
- "The exact number of refugees denied asylum at the Swiss border after 1933 can never be reconstructed . . . Important sources were destroyed in the postwar period. Many expulsions before the fall of 1942 were not even registered. The most verifiable exact figure is that a total of 24,398 refugees can be proven to have been expelled during the war years. Between the spring of 1938 and November 1944, the Police for Foreigners also rejected 14,500 of a total of 24,100 entry applications by refugees."[130]

Guido Koller of the Swiss Federal Archive, with whom the Special Masters had several communications and who provided considerable assistance in analyzing and assembling relevant data, explained these statistics in further detail in his work, Life and Death Decisions: The Administrative Practice of Swiss Refugee Policy during the Second World War ("Entscheidungen über Leben und Tod: Die behördliche Praxis in der schweizerischen Flüchtlingspolitik wärhrend des Zweiten Weltkrieges"), in DIE SCHWEIZ UND DIE FLÜCHTLINGE, 1933-1945 17 (Haupt 1996) ("Koller").

Koller stated that the assessment propounded in the 1950s by Carl Ludwig was that approximately 10,000 refugees were "rejected," a number that "was adopted in most publications on the refugee policy until today," although "[m]ost authors also agree with Ludwig on the point that a much higher number of persecuted, due to the defensiveness of the Swiss, did not even attempt to flee to Switzerland." Koller at 91. However, Koller's subsequent analysis of the existing archival materials led both Koller and ultimately the Bergier Commission – which relied upon his work (see e.g., BERGIER REFUGEE REPORT, Chapter 1 and passim) – to conclude that "the number of rejections Carl Ludwig cited must … be revised." Koller at 92.

As Koller observed, Ludwig's analysis of rejections had been > …based [on] a statistic that was compiled by the police department (PA) in the end of 1945, which was based upon the Card Index according to Date of Entry. This card index recorded only those rejected

- With the closing of the Swiss borders in the summer of 1942, "the number of expulsions rose steeply beginning in August 1942 and remained high until the fall of 1943; more than 5,000 rejections of asylum-seeking refugees are documented in writing during this period alone, out of more than 24,000 documented rejections for the entire wartime period."[131]
- For those granted asylum, "[o]f the 51,100 refugees accepted during the war, 14,000 came from Italy; 10,400 from France; 8,000 from Poland; 3,250 from the Soviet Union; and 2,600 from Germany . . . Among them were 19,495 Jews and 1,809 individuals who were persecuted because of their Jewish ancestry."[132]
- "From September 1 to December 31, 1942, 7,372 refugees were admitted; the statistics on rejection (incomplete) indicate at least 1,628 rejections for the same time period. In the period covering January 1 through August 31, 1943, 4,833 refugees were accepted while 3,331 were (according to official documentation) rejected." [133] refugees who on the basis of border guard reports and the rejection lists of the territorial commands (TK) were known by name. In the case of rejections immediately on the spot of the border crossing, the border authorities often only passed on anonymous reports. These were statistically recorded by the police department (PA). In their inventories of files, they can still in part be found. It is therefore possible to correct the rejections which are recorded in the card catalogue on the basis of the anonymous information of the border authorities. In such a manner, one obtains a more exact quotation of the actual registered rejections during the war.

Koller at 92-93 (citation omitted) (emphasis in original). Accordingly, Koller concluded that approximately 24,000 refugees – not always registered by name – were expelled from Switzerland or turned away at the border. That figure was more than twice as high as Ludwig's.

As for the conclusion in the 1999 report that approximately "14,500 of a total of 24,100 entry applications" were rejected (BERGIER REFUGEE REPORT at 129), Koller explained that the "entry applications" were the result of Switzerland's "introduction of [a] general visa requirement on September 5, 1939," so that "those seeking protection would have been referred to the way to petition for entry." Koller at 97. However, the specific "identities of the rejected male and female applicants can only be documented in a very few cases, as the majority of corresponding personal dossiers of the Foreign Police were destroyed." Id. at 97 n.234.

Koller criticized the destruction of refugee files. "Contemporary witnesses cite registrar specific[s], and especially the lack of space as motives. Yet the police department (PA) knew that historically relevant files were to be saved, and, in general, the destruction of files was not to be undertaken without first consulting the federal archivist. However, during the time period in question, the federal archive was often never consulted. In addition, the capacities of the federal archivist were not sufficient to personally inspect inventories. It can not be excluded from the outset that the motive for destruction of the files was to obliterate incriminating evidence. In the connection to the debate about the Ludwig Report, it is hardly imaginable that the significance of the rejection files was not recognized." Id. at 100.

132 Id. at 24; see also id. at 24, Table 2 ("Nationality and religion of civilian refugees").

133 Id. at 146 n.273.

- "In November 1944 nearly 12,000 refugees were housed in reception and quarantine camps."[134]

The Bergier Commission reached similar conclusions in its 2002 Final Report. In the immediate post-War era, Swiss authorities had highlighted what they indicated was the nation's generous refugee policy, in that Switzerland had admitted "some 300,000" refugees. However, the "total of 300,000 refugees admitted that was quoted by the authorities was based on the sum of all possible categories of people who sought refuge in Switzerland, thereby drawing attention away from the central problem: the restrictive policy adopted with regard to Jewish refugees."[135]

Thus, "[m]ore significant [than the refugee admissions into Switzerland] are the numbers of civilian refugees admitted or refused, although there are also numerous difficulties attached to interpreting the figures." The Bergier Commission noted that "sources relating to those refused admission are very scanty." Many of the refusals "were only recorded anonymously," and there was "no record at all of those people who were so discouraged by the restrictive policy adopted by Switzerland that they never even tried to enter the country."[136]

In its Final Report, the Bergier Commission reiterated its 1999 finding that the number of refugees admitted between September 1, 1939 and May 8, 1945 (i.e., the war years) could be determined with some certainty. For that period, there were records of 51,129 refugees "who had entered Switzerland without a valid visa," and were interned. "Of these, just over 14,000 came from Italy, 10,400 held French passports, 8,000 were Poles, 3,250 were from the Soviet Union and 2,600 were German citizens. According to the records, a further 2,200 were stateless persons, although the real number of stateless persons was in fact higher." The "number of Jews was 19,495; another 1,809 refugees had been persecuted because of their Jewish origins."[137]

134 Id. at 156 n.337.

135 BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 116.

136 Id. at 117.

Thus, Switzerland admitted and kept records of 21,304 individuals who were or were believed to be Jewish, and who were interned as refugees.[138]

In addition to these numbers, several other categories of admitted persons needed to be added: the "2,000 people who were issued a cantonal tolerance permit," the "7,000 to 8,000 mainly Jewish emigrants who were in Switzerland at the outbreak of the war," and the "the small number of political refugees." Thus, in total, Switzerland "offered around 60,000 civilians refuge from persecution by the Nazis for periods ranging from a few weeks to several years. Slightly less than half these people were Jewish."[139]

On the other hand, the Bergier Commission observed — as it had in its 1999 interim report on refugees — that it was "extremely difficult … to calculate the number of refugees who were refused entry." The Bergier Commission was aware that some had raised issues with certain of its 1999 statistics, and responded to these concerns in its 2002 Final Report.

> The figures on refugees refused entry that we published in 1999 based upon earlier research in the Federal Archives, have since been called into question. There is no uncertainty about the 9,703 refugees refused entry who are recorded by name. The register of people refused entry, which no longer exists today, was the basis for the figures published by Carl Ludwig in 1957, according to which Switzerland turned back a total of around 10,000 refugees. This figure represents an absolute minimum, which is accurately documented. The comprehensive research carried out over the past few years has shown, however, that there are statistics referring to some 24,500 people who were refused entry during the war. If one then deducts the 10,000 people who were recorded by name, this leaves a total of 14,500 anonymous refugees who were turned back. Some refugees made several attempts to get across the border and were perhaps finally admitted. Such people would then be included several times in the statistics concerning refusals, and at the same time in those on refugees admitted. Others were handed over directly to the border guards, imprisoned and deported. Still others did not make a second attempt because they knew that if they failed again, they would be handed over to the authorities. Today it is impossible to ascertain how many

138 Swiss researcher Ruth Fivaz-Silbermann concluded, based on her own studies, that "[i]n total, Switzerland can take responsibility for having saved between 28,000 and 29,000 Jewish li[v]es" by admitting them during the Holocaust. Ruth Fivaz-Silbermann, Ignorance, Realpolitik and Human Rights: Switzerland between Active Refusal and Passive Help, in BYSTANDERS, RESCUERS OR PERPETRATORS? people came into this category. It is precisely because many cases are recorded where refugees were handed back to the very people who had been persecuting them that it may be assumed that the number of refugees included more than once in the statistics is not very high. If one assumes that one in three refugees was refused entry twice, the number of 14,500 anonymous people refused entry corresponds roughly to around 10,000 further cases refused. Finally, it is a recognised fact that not all refusals were recorded. It must therefore be assumed that Switzerland turned back or deported over 20,000 refugees during the Second World War. Furthermore, between 1938 and November 1944, around 14,500 applications for entry visas submitted by hopeful emigrants to the Swiss diplomatic missions abroad were refused. It is not known how many of these people later tried to enter Switzerland just the same and are included in the statistics concerning refugees admitted or refused entry.[140]

[140] Id. at 117-18. The Bergier Commission noted that questions had been raised by Jean-Christian Lambelet in the newspaper NZZ and elsewhere (citing, e.g., NZZ no. 192, 19/20 August 2000), to which Guido Koller of the Swiss Federal Archive had responded (Die Weltwoche, August 31, 2000). "From 10 October 2000 on, a series of 14 articles on this subject appeared in Le Temps, including a reply from the ICE [the Bergier Commission] published on 20 October 2000." BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 170 n.37. "Concerning Geneva see also Fivaz-Silbermann, Refoulement, 2000. In the foreword to this publication, Serge Klarsfeld sets out his belief, which is not further justified, that no more than 5,000 Jewish refugees in all were refused entry. It would appear that he is taking into account only the situation on Switzerland's western border and not the events that occurred in late summer 1943 along the border with Italy." Id.

In 2013, the Bergier Commission's data again were questioned by the same individuals, who contended that "far fewer Jewish refugees were turned away at Swiss borders than previously thought. Klarsfeld puts the number at 3,000, compared to a previous estimate of 24,500. The higher figure included in the 1999 Bergier report into the refugee policy of Switzerland during the Second World War was based on imprecise archive material which did not specify the rejection of Jews or the reasons for denying people entry, Klarsfeld told the Sonntag newspaper…. Klarsfeld joined forces with fellow historian Ruth Fivaz-Silbermann to conduct more research in France, Italy and Germany." See Clare O'Dea, Nazi hunter says Swiss rejected fewer Jews, SWISSINFO.CH (Feb. 10, 2013, 3:32 PM), http:// http://origin.swissinfo.ch/eng/nazi-hunter-says-swiss-rejected-fewer-jews/34951620. Marc Perrenoud, who served as Research Adviser to the Bergier Commission, was reported to have responded: "'We never said our figures were definitive'" and "it was always possible that new historic sources would emerge after the commission's report was published." See Swiss rejected fewer Jews, Nazi tracker says, LOCAL (Feb. 11, 2013, 10:52 AM), http://www.thelocal.ch/20130211/swiss-rejected-fewer-jews-than-estimated-historian.

In May 2013, Switzerland formally rejected the suggestion that it reexamine the refugee data. "'A new committee would not necessarily yield more accurate figures than the ones reached' through previous inquiries, the Swiss Federal Council said in its reply published Thursday in Le Matin, a Swiss French-speaking daily, to a request by Swiss lawmaker Yvan Perrin to re-open the issue." Swiss government says won't re-examine deportation of Jewish refugees, JEWISH TELEGRAPHIC AGENCY (May 24, 2013, 6:34 AM), http://www.jta.org/2013/05/24/news-opinion/world/swiss-government-says-wont-re-examine-deportation-of-jewish-refugees.

Thereafter, Swiss historian Regula Ludi referred to the "[c]onservative estimates" that close to 40,000 refugees were denied asylum. She noted that in "recent years … the accuracy of these figures has been the subject of heated debate and attempts at revision." Regula Ludi, More and Less Deserving Refugees: Shifting Priorities in Swiss Asylum Policy from the Interwar Era to the Hungarian Refugee Crisis of 1956, 49 J. CONTEMP. HIST. 577, 580 n.7 (2014).

The Bergier Commission thus indicated that approximately 20,000 individuals were "turned back or deported," and 14,500 were refused visas, for a total of 34,500 individuals whom Switzerland refused to admit.

The Bergier Commission noted that it was likely that some individuals had made multiple attempts in one or both categories, and there might be some duplicates within the figure of 34,500 individuals turned away. On the other hand, there likely was undercounting too. "The shortcomings associated with the statistics on anonymous refusals which have been discussed here can, however, also be used to yield the opposite effect. In this interpretation, a case file on refugee rejection recorded anonymously could theoretically imply the rejection of several persons, as in the case of a married couple or a family group. Then the figure of refugees rejected would certainly have to exceed the number of registered refusals."[141]

Those who questioned some of the refugee statistics did not appear to directly address the Bergier Commission's finding that not all of the documentation was available, and thus the numbers could never be fully known. Important records were missing or had been destroyed (as also reported by archival authorities to the Special Masters; see infra). Further, the Bergier Commission had observed that the names of thousands of individuals turned away at the border were unrecorded. In addition, thousands more applied for but were refused visas. Fivaz-Silbermann more recently has noted that "[s]ome 16,000 requests for legal entry to Switzerland, submitted directly either to the National Immigration Police (Eidgenössische Fremdenpolizei) or to Swiss consulates abroad, seem to have been turned down" and "[n]o conclusive figure is possible because the relevant archives have been lost." See Ruth Fivaz-Silbermann, Ignorance, Realpolitik and Human Rights: Switzerland between Active Refusal and Passive Help, in BYSTANDERS, RESCUERS OR PERPETRATORS? THE NEUTRAL COUNTRIES AND THE SHOAH 87, 89 (Int'l Holocaust Remembrance Alliance ed., Metropol Verlag 2016). In addition, untold numbers of Nazi victims were deterred by the restrictive refugee policies from ever making the attempt. As the Bergier Commission explained, none of these individuals could be counted and none of this missing data could be precisely quantified. However, based upon the evidence that was available, estimates still were possible.

[141] Id. Regula Ludi observed that "[o]ne issue of particular contention was the number of refugees to whom Switzerland denied asylum. Based on economic models, the critics attempted to show that chances for refugees to be accepted were considerably higher than is generally assumed. They treated the available data as confirmed figures, even though the actual number of expelled persons cannot possibly be reconstructed: relevant sources were destroyed in the postwar era, and many expulsions left no traces in official records." Ludi, Waging War on Wartime Memory, at 137. Ludi agreed with the Bergier Commission's findings that "[b]ased on available documents, the number of 24,000 expulsions carried out during the war has been reconstructed. It has also been corroborated that at least 14,000 visa applications by refugees were rejected. Yet there is no way to find out how many individuals were denied asylum" because, as the Bergier Commission observed, the "identity of most expelled refugees is unknown, and it is impossible to ascertain data for the pre-war period and the first years of the war, when the obligation to keep records was not yet enforced." Some still "claimed that the figures were exaggerated" in that they included multiple attempts by the same persons. Id. Professor Ludi reiterated these sentiments in 2010: "For the entire prewar era, no reliable data exist regarding the number of refugees who crossed the borders into Switzerland, who were allowed to stay or expelled, as such

There were thus thousands of potentially eligible victims under the claims process.

IV. PROCESSING REFUGEE CLASS CLAIMS

A. Research and Assembly of Archival Data

In contrast to the Deposited Assets Class claims process, which was lengthy and difficult not only because the banks had destroyed records relating to millions of Holocaust-era accounts, but because many (although not all) banking authorities also held back other important documents for years, the Refugee Class claims process benefitted greatly from the broad cooperation of Swiss officials, particularly those associated with the Swiss Federal Archive.

In connection with formulating allocation and distribution recommendations for consideration by the Court, the Special Masters communicated with the Swiss government (Ambassador Jacques Reverdin) as well as officials from the Swiss Federal Archive, including Prof. Dr. Christoph Graf and Mr. Guido Koller.[142]

In attempting to provide background information, in a memorandum transmitted to the Special Masters dated March 22, 2000, the Swiss Federal Archive ("SFA") advised that it was statistical information was not collected systematically before the Second World War. A centralised registration only emerged after 1939. In addition, authorities changed the categorization of refugees several times between 1933 and 1945, thus aggravating methodological problems. Finally, many of the records that would have allowed the reconstruction of data at local and cantonal levels have been lost or destroyed by the agencies responsible." Ludi, Dwindling Options, at 84.

Ludi observed that in light of the "methodological problems," as acknowledged by the Bergier Commission, "the heated debate on numbers appears preposterous." She noted that it "would not have achieved such emotional intensity if there were not more at stake than just mere numbers. Indeed, what the critics called for was a revision of historical interpretation," seeking, among other things, a revocation of the government's "apology to the Jews." Ludi, Waging War on Wartime Memory, at 137. See also Maissen, Republican and Liberal Values, at 250 (Federal Councillor Jean Pascal Delamuraz, with "his colleagues in government, … shared the conviction that the Swiss had no reason to feel ashamed. If somebody dared to accuse them of misdeeds, he or she must be an extortionist. When one dealt with problematic topics, especially the undeniable repulse of Jewish refugees, this was not interpreted as proper misbehavior that might root, for example, in Swiss traditions of anti-Semitism. Swiss refugee policy was considered to have been merely a reaction, even though an awkward one, to the evil incarnated exclusively in Germany").

[142] Guido Koller's research into the status of refugee archives, published in a 1996 volume analyzing Swiss refugee policy, was incorporated into the Bergier Commission's 1999 report.

"trying to establish a list of names of refugees turned back at the Swiss border between 1939-45 with the help of the cantonal archives" but that it would be "possible to collect a small part of the names only." The SFA list as of March 2000 only contained "about 2'500 names," of which "one third have been registered as Jewish."[143]

Following further inquiries from the Court and the Special Masters, the SFA advised Judge Korman by letter dated June 29, 2000 that the Swiss Federal Council had "authorized the Swiss Federal Archive to transmit to the Court the requested data, under the condition that Swiss federal legislation on data protection is respected."[144] Thereafter, by letter dated July 14, 2000, the SFA transmitted "the requested data on 51,417 refugees admitted into Switzerland during World War II" and noted that "[d]ue to technical problems, we won't be in a position to send you the data on refugees not admitted into Switzerland, until a later date."[145]

For those expelled or turned back, some of the most important data would have been maintained by Switzerland's 26 cantons (states). However, of the 26 cantons, only Geneva was likely to have a "substantially complete set of data concerning refugees turned back at the 144 Letter from Prof. Dr. Christoph Graf to Hon. Edward R. Korman (June 29, 2000). In a letter dated June 21, 2000, following several communications between the Special Masters and the SFA concerning Swiss legislation protecting data from disclosure, the Court stated: "With my authorization, Special Master Gribetz has already assured you by letter dated April 12, 2000 that the Court is sensitive to Swiss privacy concerns, and that anyone whose name appears on any of the refugee databases you provide will be given a reasonable opportunity to be excluded from publication. I will direct that when notice is provided to the settlement classes of the Special Master's Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of the settlement fund, that notice will instruct potential members of the Refugee Class as to the procedure by which they may exclude their names from publication." Letter from Hon. Edward R. Korman to Prof. Dr. Christoph Graf (June 21, 2000).

145 Letter from Andreas Kellerhals, Deputy Dir., SFA, to Special Masters (July 14, 2000). The letter explained that the list of 51,417 refugees "contains the names of civilian refugees who entered Switzerland between 1936 and 1945 and who were legally interned by federal authorities in World War II. These refugees were normally sent to labor camps (men), homes (women, old), Swiss families (children) or schools (youth, students). A few thousand civilian refugees who received a cantonal legal status are not included on the list. These refugees were not forced into a residence as the civilian internees usually were. A complete set of data on refugees does not exist in most cantons." Id. (emphasis in original). The letter also stated that approximately 21,200 of the people appearing on the list were Jewish, and provided a breakdown of the refugees' respective nationalities. The letter further advised that although the list "mainly contains the names of victims of Nazi persecution," it is "essential to acknowledge the possibility that the list may also contain the names of perpetrators since many tried to evade capture by the Allies at the end of World War II. Switzerland refused to admit war criminals. However, in spite of strict controls lesser-known perpetrators may have entered Switzerland undetected." Id. (emphasis in original).

border."[146] The Geneva archives subsequently provided the requested information. In Basel, archives analyzed by Yad Vashem researchers were located in a specific file, "Emigranten die von der Grenzpolizei zuruckgewiesen wurden" ("Emigrants Who Were Turned Back by the Border Police"), which would be provided to the Special Masters at a later date.

On July 26, 2000, Judge Korman gave final approval to the Settlement Agreement, but noted a number of potential problems that could arise in implementing a plan of allocation and distribution. With respect to the names of possible members of the Refugee Class, the Court observed:

> If it proves impossible to assemble the information needed because Swiss entities (including cantonal entities) refuse to provide information that they have in their possession that is needed for the fair administration of the Refugee Class, I will consider an application for modification of the enforceability of releases with respect to those entities.[147]

On July 27, 2000, the Special Masters received another letter from the SFA, by which the archives provided "the requested data on refugees not admitted into or expelled from Switzerland during World War II."[148] The SFA letter advised:

> The data consists of three lists, which have been compiled according to the potential legal status of refugees as civilian internees in Switzerland in World War II.
> (1) The database refugees-turned-back-us-dc contains data on 1,715 civilian refugees turned back at the Swiss border or expelled from Switzerland between March 14, 1938 and May 09, 1945 and collected by the Swiss Federal Archive from various federal and cantonal record groups.

[146] Letter from Prof. Dr. Christoph Graf to Special Masters (May 16, 2000). The Court noted this response in its decision approving the settlement: "I acknowledge the good faith cooperation of the SFA [Swiss Federal Archive] in compiling this list. Unfortunately, however, SFA officials have informed the Special Master that it 'will be possible to collect a small part of the names only,' and that, '[a]t the moment, this list contains about 2,500' names. This is woefully inadequate. Nevertheless, the SFA further informed the Special Master that it 'is trying to establish a list of names of refugees ... with the help of the cantonal archives,' and that, of the cantons, only Geneva is likely to have a 'substantially complete set of data concerning refugees turned back at the border.' To that end, the SFA has contacted the Geneva archives for assistance in compiling this information." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d at 161 (citations omitted).

[148] Letter from Guido Koller to Special Masters (July 27, 2000).

(2) The "Liste de refugiés ayant été refoulés contre leur gré" contains data on 2,159 civilian refugees turned back at the border to Geneva between 1939 and 1945. It has been established and transferred to us by the State Archives of the Canton of Geneva. However, research on the pertinent records is still underway. It is possible that further data on refugees turned back, will be found and forwarded to you.

(3) The list called "Namen von zurückgewiesenen judischen Flüchtlingen aus den Beständen des Staatsarchivs Schaffhausen" contains data on 99 civilian refugees turned back at the border to the Canton of Schaffhausen shortly before and during World War II. The list has been established and transferred to us by the State Archives of the Canton of Schaffhausen.

The SFA letter observed that it was "important to note that:

(1) A complete set of data on refugees not admitted into or expelled from Switzerland exists neither in the federal government archives nor in the state archives.

(2) The lists handed over to you mainly contain the names of victims of Nazi persecution. That is, first of all Jewish refugees, second, Polish, Italian, French or other persons who managed to escape from a slave labor situation and third, other persons affected by the Nazi occupation of various European countries and the War. However, it is essential to acknowledge the possibility that the list may also contain the names of perpetrators and Nazi collaborators since many tried to evade capture by the Allies at the end of World War II. Switzerland refused to admit war criminals.

(3) A refugee can be mentioned on more than one list."[149]

The State Archives of the Canton Basel-City thereafter advised the Special Masters that since 1995, it had "worked with Yad Vashem," and had "made possible the evaluation of relevant files from the Archives." Beginning in January 1996, it "again began comprehensive investigations into the sources which could refer to the rejection of Jewish refugees."[150] As a result of this research, the State Archives of the Canton Basel-City was able to collect data "regarding circa 60 persons who were turned away (in: PD-REG 3, Nr. 31200 'Emigrants who were turned away by the border police,' 1938 [-1939])."[151] This file proved a unique source, as it contained not only basic identifying information about the refugees, but narratives by the border authorities who expelled them.

As the Distribution Plan was being finalized, and after it was submitted, the Special Masters continued to receive materials from archivists in Switzerland. The most significant documentation consisted of a list "compiled by the State Archives of the Canton of Ticino, contain[ing] entries to 2,343 refugees turned back at the Swiss border to Italy during World War II, mainly in 1943 and 1944."[152] In addition, the Special Masters received the files from the Canton Basel-City relating to 60 persons who were turned away.

Other cantonal archives provided additional information. As described in a September 11, 2000 letter to the Special Masters from the Swiss Federal Archives: the "Swiss Federal Archives requested the State Archives, in a circular letter of August 7, 2000, to review their research for the US District Court. We are hereby sending you the responses received from 24 [of 26] State Archives. The State Archive of Schaffhausen has advised that it has located no additional information to the data sent on July 27, 2000. The State Archive of the Canton of Valais will respond in the next days. We trust that you will appreciate the good faith cooperation of the State Archives and ourselves with the Court."[153]

In their individual letters, the cantons provided information about their refugee files, and also offered explanations as to what they were, and were not, able to locate.

- A number of cantons advised that all available materials had been conveyed to the SFA, and so any refugee names presumably already had been included on the list of 1,715 individuals that the SFA previously had provided to the Special Masters. This statement was made by, respectively, the Cantons of Aargau; Berne; Freiburg;

[151] Id. (brackets and parentheses in original).

[152] Letter from Guido Koller to Special Masters (Oct. 4, 2000). The letter advised that notwithstanding the list of 2,343 names that was being provided, a "complete set of data on refugees not admitted at the Swiss border to Italy exists neither in the federal government archives nor in the State Archives of Ticino."

[153] Letter from Prof. Dr. Christoph Graf, Dir., SFA, to Special Masters (Sept. 11, 2000), transmitting by diplomatic courier, letters to the Special Master from 24 state archives.

Geneva; Glarus; Jura; Neuchâtel; Schaffhausen; Solothurn; St. Gallen; Ticino; Thurgau and Vaud.[154]

- Certain cantons stated that relevant materials had been destroyed and thus nothing could be provided (Cantons of Appenzell A. Rhoden and Schwyz).[155]
- A number of cantons advised that as non-border states, refugees had not tried to enter the particular canton. This statement was made by, respectively, the cantons of Appenzell A. Rhoden; Appenzell Innerrhoden; Freiburg; Lucerne; Schwyz; Uri; Zug and Zurich.[156]
- Some cantons advised that no searchable lists existed, but that individual inquiries could be investigated on a case-by-case basis. This statement was made by, respectively, the cantons of Appenzell A. Rhoden; Basel-City; Basel-Countryside; Freiburg; Neuchâtel; Obwalden; St. Gallen and Zurich.

Accordingly, at the time the claims process commenced, the Court and Special Masters had been provided with five different lists, with a total of 6,376 names of refugees who were expelled or denied entry: the SFA List (1,715 names); the Geneva List (2,159 names); the Schaffhausen List (99 names); the Basel-City List (60 names); and the Ticino List (2,343 names). [157] While this list of 6,376 refugees was incomplete, either because records had been destroyed, or had never been maintained in the first place — as the Bergier Commission had indicated in its 1999 Refugee Report and later in its 2002 Final Report, and as the Swiss archival authorities acknowledged — it was still a good start.

[154] The Canton of Graubünden advised that its files had been provided to Yad Vashem. See Letter from State Archives Graubünden to SFA (Aug. 30, 2000).

[155] The Cantons of Nidwalden and Valais, in their respective letters, stated that their archives contained no refugee files. See Letter from State Archives Nidwalden to SFA (Aug. 14, 2000).

[156] The Canton of Zurich archives advised that despite the common border with Germany, "the Rhine river separates the two territories and constitutes to a large extent an insuperable natural obstacle" and the "rest of the border presents only a few crossings opened to minor roads," so that the "Canton of Zurich is to be considered mainly like an inland canton." Letter from State Archives Zurich to SFA (Aug. 15, 2000).

[157] Based upon the dates of birth shown in the lists, it was clear that many of these individuals were no longer alive. See Distribution Plan, Annex J ("The Refugee Class"), at J-37 n.114. Further, as the SFA advised, even if the refugees on the lists were still alive, not all of them belonged to one of the five "victim or target" groups as defined under the Settlement Agreement (i.e., they were not targeted for persecution because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled).

B. The Claims Review Process

The Distribution Plan recommended by the Special Masters and adopted by the Court provided that the refugee class claims process was to rely considerably upon the lists of names provided by the Swiss Federal Archive and the cantonal archives. With respect to those admitted but mistreated, the Distribution Plan observed: "[T]the Swiss Federal Archives has made available to the Court its list of approximately 50,000 individuals who were admitted into Switzerland as refugees just before or during the War years, approximately 20,000 of whom are registered as Jewish. Claimants who plausibly demonstrate, through documents, a statement or otherwise, that they were admitted into Switzerland as refugees and were detained, mistreated or abused there, and whose names are matched against the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland, should receive a payment, identical in amount, of up to $500 (subsequently increased to $725) (but in no event less than $250). Based upon data in the Initial Questionnaires,[158] approximately 3,000 people are expected to make a claim of this nature. If, however, there are many more eligible claimants than currently anticipated, then the Court may have to reconsider the amount recommended here."[159]

As to those denied entry or expelled: "[A] Court-appointed agency should perform an initial evaluation of the claim. This evaluation will include an analysis of the claimant's information, the review of the lists provided to the Court by the Swiss Federal Archives for publication, the examination of additional sources of information relevant to the claim, and the initial recommendation as to whether the claimant should receive an award."

> Claimants who plausibly demonstrate, through documents, an interview or otherwise, that they were denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, should receive payments, identical in amount, of up to $2500 [subsequently increased to $3625] (but in no event less than $1250). One of the ways that claims will be evaluated will be to compare them to the List of Refugees Expelled From or

(SWISS BANKS), at 11, http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents_New/Glossary.pdf ("Initial Questionnaire"): "In connection with notice to the class of the proposed settlement, a six-page Initial Questionnaire was circulated to all potential class members to obtain information on the nature and scope of their claims. Over 600,000 Initial Questionnaires were received from Holocaust victims and heirs residing in more than 100 nations."

159 Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 172 (citation omitted).

> Denied Entry Into Switzerland, which the Swiss government has authorized for publication.[160] Former refugees expelled or denied entry whose names do not appear on the list also may make a claim, since information other than the published list also will be evaluated; indeed, based upon data in the Initial Questionnaires, approximately 17,000 people are expected to make a claim of expulsion or denial of entry. If, however, there are many more eligible claimants than currently anticipated, then the Court may have to reconsider the amount recommended here.[161]

As true for the two slave labor classes, payments were to be limited "to former refugees or certain heirs of refugees who died after February 15, 1999" (the date selected by the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" and adopted by the Court to minimize confusion between the German and Swiss compensation programs, which were established at approximately the same time).

At the time the Distribution Plan was proposed (September 11, 2000) and adopted (November 22, 2000), it was unclear how many class members would file claims or be eligible for payment. However, it appeared that some 20,000 individuals might apply: 3,000 in the "admitted" category, and 17,000 in the "expulsion or denial" category. Thus, as true for the slave labor classes, the Distribution Plan provided that "an initial payment of 50% of the recommended amount" would be made, once an application was approved. "[A]fter all claims have been processed, eligible claimants then may be able to receive a second payment of up to the remaining 50%." Because it soon became apparent that the number of claimants eligible for payment would not exceed the sums allocated, the Court was able to remove the partial payment restriction and authorize all eligible class members to receive their payments in full.[162]

[160] The Distribution Plan noted that "to comply with Swiss legislation protecting certain personal data from disclosure, the Court has assured the Swiss government that potential members of the Refugee Class will be provided the opportunity to exclude their names from publication. Since the Special Master does not recommend publication of the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland, but only of the much more limited List of Refugees Expelled from or Denied Entry into Switzerland, it is unlikely that many individuals will seek to remove their names from the list recommended for publication, although they certainly are free to do so." THE REFUGEE CLASS CLAIMS PROCESS

The Distribution Plan provided for the refugee class claims process to be administered by the Claims Conference (for Jewish class members) and the IOM (for Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members):

> Claims submitted in response to names appearing on the List of Refugees Denied Entry into or Expelled from Switzerland will have to be matched against the published lists. Additionally, to the extent that the claims process must go beyond matching, the entities responsible for initially reviewing the submitted claims will need to have a great deal of familiarity with the Holocaust, with a firm grasp of the historical circumstances surrounding those who sought but were denied refuge in Switzerland. To take but one obvious example, the agencies must be familiar with the geography and wartime circumstances that likely would have propelled one person to the Swiss border, and another to the eastern-most regions of the Soviet Union. In such a case, the evaluating agencies should be capable of determining the claimant's original nationality. Likewise, the agencies also should have the ability to assess the plausibility of a claimant's description of the fate that befell him or her after expulsion from, or denial of entry into, Switzerland. Perhaps most significantly, the agencies should be able to meet the special needs of Nazi victims, maintaining professional objectivity while at the same time providing comfort and reassurance to many traumatized elderly claimants.
> In the Special Master's opinion, the organizations ideally suited to this role are the Claims Conference and the IOM…. [T]he Claims Conference already has decades of experience in determining individual Holocaust compensation claims, and, more recently, has been designated, along with the IOM, as one of the agencies responsible for handling distributions under the German Fund. The Special Master has had extensive communications with the Claims Conference throughout his tenure, has been given invaluable assistance from its dedicated staff, and believes that the Claims Conference will efficiently and equitably review refugee claims submitted by Jewish class members. Likewise, the Special Master is confident that the internationally-renowned IOM and its equally committed staff will capably administer the refugee claims process for non-Jewish class members.[163] rather than in two phases. The Special Master also has proposed that payments to members of the Refugee Class be made immediately upon recommendation by the Claims Conference and/or IOM, rather than first requiring the class member to be notified of the recommendation prior to transmittal of the payment. I concur with these recommendations").

[163] Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 174-75. The two organizations also were tasked with reviewing claims of mistreatment.

The Claims Conference and the IOM submitted their proposed operational programs for the Refugee Class as well as the two Slave Labor classes, and the Court approved the proposals on April 13, 2001. An important element in encouraging and simplifying applications was the use of the Initial Questionnaires that had been solicited for informational purposes, when the proposed settlement was announced. Thus, class members who had indicated a possible refugee claim on their Initial Questionnaires were sent refugee program applications either by the Claims Conference or the IOM. As with the other classes, applications also were made available over the internet and at Holocaust survivor help centers around the world. Claim forms were delineated as "Swiss Refugee Program Application[s]" relating to a process in the United States District Court. Beyond the basic identification details, the claim forms also solicited information such as whether the claimant previously had received compensation of any kind relating to the Holocaust (this was for informational purposes only; no offsets were to be taken, as claimants were advised on their claim forms), and whether the claimant had provided information to Holocaust archives such as Yad Vashem and/or the USHMM.[164]

As a new program involving a type of claim that never had been previously compensated on a large-scale basis, the Refugee Class claims program posed unique logistical difficulties. In contrast to the two Slave Labor classes, moreover, the Refugee Class could not be coordinated with the elaborate and widely-publicized German slave labor compensation program. As the IOM observed in its Final Report to the Court on its claims processing activities, "[u]nlike the situation with Slave Labour Class I, there was no immediately obvious link" between the German Foundation payments and Refugee Class eligibility. A German Foundation payment was not "automatic validation for the eligibility of a claim for payment under the Refugee Class because the individual circumstances of the victim's experience with Swiss authorities still had to be reviewed."[165]

The IOM claim form, while geared generally toward slave labor, thus also incorporated additional questions intended to "elicit confidential or sensitive information such as membership in an ethnic, religious, political, or social group that was Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled, or homosexual. So long as other evidence or information provided did not contradict an assertion of membership in one of these groups… IOM accepted claimants' self-identification with these target groups and correspondingly marked such [slave labor] claims for review" under the "Refugee Class, without requiring separate claim forms to be re-submitted to IOM."[166] Those individuals "who indicated potential eligibility for [the] Refugee Class were requested to provide details relating to their experience with Swiss authorities during their attempts to enter Switzerland while fleeing persecution during the Nazi era in order to demonstrate that their claims were plausible."[167]

The Claims Conference adopted a similar approach. It devoted a portion of its website to a description of the "Swiss Banks Settlement: Refugee Class," providing background information about the Settlement Agreement, Distribution Plan, and Bergier Commission.

> A Swiss government list of 6,300 refugees expelled from or denied entry into Switzerland is posted on the Claims Conference website. Several survivors who have received payments told the Claims Conference that they applied for compensation after they found their names on the list. The Claims Conference also worked with its network of 350 partner agencies in local Jewish communities worldwide to provide information and assistance to survivors on an individual basis. [168]

One survivor's surprise in learning that her name was on the list was recounted in a 2001 article in The Jewish Week. At a press conference announcing the first payments to members of the Refugee Class, survivor Ruth Schloss spoke of her experiences as "one of 15 Jews who were denied entry or expelled from Switzerland" who was slated to receive the first payments, with "applications from several thousand other[s] . . . still being processed."[169] Mrs. Schloss's husband "said he discovered his wife's name on the Web site shortly after it was posted a few months ago."[170] Mrs. Schloss, who was 13 when she tried to enter Switzerland, had sought refuge after her parents had been deported from France in 1943; her parents died in Auschwitz. Mrs. Schloss stated that she and two companions had crossed over the Swiss border and were caught. They were not allowed to use the restroom, and were told to "'drink saltwater'" when they said they were thirsty. They were "handed over to German and French guards by a Swiss official, who said to the guards: 'Have a good time.'"[171] Mrs. Schloss was saved by the French priest Alexandre Glasberg, who smuggled her out of a camp used as a staging site for Auschwitz-bound transports. Every Refugee Class claim was analyzed individually by Claims Conference or IOM staff and submitted to Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig for consultation and review. Thereafter, each claim recommended for approval was submitted to the Court, often with documentation and/or a detailed narrative, and each decision was summarized in a report filed with the Court and docketed for public review, with claimants' names redacted in the interest of privacy.

The complexity of the process was highlighted by the IOM in its Final Report on claims processing activities:

> Of all IOM's classes in the HVAP [Holocaust Victim Assets Programme / Swiss Banks Settlement] programme, Refugee Class claims were probably the most labour-intensive, in view of the comparatively small number (1,169) of claims received. Database-assisted matching techniques were used to identify targeted victims whose names appeared on the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland and also to identify those whose names appeared on the List of Refugees Expelled from or Denied Entry into Switzerland. As with Slave Labour Class I and Slave Labour Class II, database-assisted techniques were also used to exclude patently ineligible claims, such as those on behalf of victims whose dates of death occurred prior to 16 February 1999, and duplicate claims.[172]

[172] IOM Final Report at 159.

In the case of Roma, who normally led a "nomadic lifestyle,"[173] the claims review process posed particular issues. As the IOM observed, "bureaucracy was generally to be avoided," and the "very nature of the target victim group did not lend itself to official records. Circumstances were exacerbated for all target group victims in that all countries surrounding Switzerland were occupied or controlled by the Nazi Regime. Attempts to enter Switzerland had to be clandestine of necessity for Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution given the Swiss government's restrictive entry policies, so it is not surprising that refugee claimants' names were most often not present on official lists. As a result, all individual reviews had to consider the credibility of the specific facts and circumstances alleged by the claimants, in the context of the geographical and historical wartime situation for these target groups."[174]

The IOM and Claims Conference followed similar procedures in reviewing their claims, and coordinated closely with each other and with the Special Masters (who in turn regularly consulted with the Court) to ensure consistency of policies and recommendations. The IOM's description, which applies likewise to the Claims Conference, provides an overview of the process:

> Both the Claims Conference and IOM worked closely in consultation with the Special Master[s] in assessing individual Refugee Class claims. They also collaborated in drafting internal procedures for the review of Refugee Class claims, sharing materials, and findings derived from review of individual circumstances. For its own reviews, IOM developed internal assessment forms that assigned credibility weights to certain types of information or evidence provided in the claimants' statements or submitted with the claims. In claims for detention, mistreatment or abuse, this information included the detail in the description provided for the approximate time that the events occurred, names of locations or camps where the detention was alleged to have taken place, descriptions of the abuse(s) suffered, whether children and parents were separated and what happened thereafter. For claims for denial of entry or expulsion, the relevant information included the date(s) when the denial of entry or expulsion was alleged, the method, route or point of attempted entry into Switzerland, the circumstances of the attempted entry or expulsion, and corroborative details such as whether any organizations or individuals had assisted the victims in their > attempts to enter. The information in the assessment forms was then compared to known historical circumstances, reports and the official practices of Switzerland towards refugees during the periods alleged. One factor that increased credibility was when the circumstances described were consistent with other contemporaneous accounts for similarly situated individuals. Finally, when all circumstances were considered, the accounts were determined either to be generally plausible or not.[175]

The IOM and Claims Conference provided applicants with the opportunity to supplement their claim forms, either by responding in writing or by calling a case worker. For example, in the case of the Claims Conference, claimants who stated that they had been expelled or turned away from Switzerland were asked whether they might have additional information in response to one or more of the following questions:

- "Was there a specific reason that you/your family tried to go to Switzerland?"
- "From what country did you try to get to Switzerland? How did you travel?"
- "Do you remember when you made the attempt to enter Switzerland - any dates, the season, or your age at the time?"
- "Can you recall the specific border, region or town where you made your attempt to enter Switzerland?"
- "What happened at the Swiss border? Do you remember what personnel you encountered? Do you remember what was said or done? Or how long the border encounter was?"
- "What happened immediately AFTER you tried to enter Switzerland? Where did you go? How did you get there?"
- "What happened in the months after you tried to enter Switzerland?" [176]

For claimants who stated that their visa applications had been rejected, or that they had otherwise applied for entry and had been turned away by Swiss governmental authorities, they were requested in some instances to supplement their applications by responding, if possible, to one or more of the following questions:

[175] Id. at 160-61. In addition, as true for Slave Labor Class I claims, the "IOM forwarded lists of claims to the Claims Conference for matching in the Swiss programme so that neither the Claims Conference nor IOM would pay the same victim twice for the same claim." Id. at 161.

- "Do you recall the date of the attempt to get visa/permission to enter Switzerland?"
- "What specifically was applied for (e.g., visa, special permission, etc.)?"
- "What was the country, region, city or other detail of location of the application for visa?"
- "From what agency or organization was the visa, etc. sought?"
- "Do you remember any other details about seeking the visa, e.g., names of persons or officers; what you or family members were told by officials?"
- "Was there a specific location in Switzerland where you sought to go?"
- "Do you recall a particular reason WHY the visa or other permission was being sought (e.g., business reasons, family or friends living in specific Swiss cities)?" [177]

Claimants who sought compensation for mistreatment while in Switzerland often were contacted by telephone, particularly when their names matched to the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland (the list of 51,417 names provided by the Swiss Federal Archive). Such claimants were asked to confirm their identifying information (name, birth date and so forth), as well as to "describe the time you were in Switzerland," if possible, and to state whether there had been "mistreat[ment]" while in Switzerland.[178] As with all of the classes for which individual compensation was available, claims were assessed in the light most favorable to claimant, and with a view to whether the claim was plausible, given the passage of time and general lack of documentation available to claimants.

In the case of those whose claims were found ineligible for compensation under the criteria of the Refugee Class and who then appealed, the Court authorized two approaches. For claims filed with the Claims Conference, the Court requested Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Burt Neuborne to review appeals and to provide the Court with his recommendations. In its July 12, 2006 submission ("Group 1 Appeals"), the Claims Conference explained that there were 168 appellate decisions to be considered, of which 39 denial reversals were recommended.

> Each of the 168 recommendations, along with the Request for Review submitted by each claimant (with translations provided by the Claims Conference) and relevant documentation from the original application was provided to Lead Settlement Counsel, Burt Neuborne, as requested by the Court. Professor Neuborne has indicated that he concurred in whole with the recommendations of the Claims Conference …. Further, all of the above described material was submitted to Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig for review. They too concurred with each recommendation…. Previously, the Court has awarded a total of $10,650,975 on behalf of claims relating to 3,884 Holocaust survivors under the Refugee Class …. With the additional 39 awards recommended herein, the total awards under Refugee Class will aggregate 3,923 at $10,783,650.[179]

As to the IOM, it was originally anticipated that, as true for the Claims Conference, a Court-appointed review officer would evaluate appeals. That approach was reconsidered once the filing deadlines expired. Given "the small numbers of appeals in [the] Refugee Class, as well as … the interests of speed and administrative efficiency, the Court later determined that IOM should perform the initial de novo appellate review, prepare written recommendations for or against payment, and forward the recommendations directly to the Court for final review and approval."[180]

In its January 22, 2007 submission, the IOM recommended approval of 4 claims on appeal, and rejection of 87 claims on appeal (because the claimants were not victims or targets of Nazi persecution; or they had failed to plausibly show that they had been denied entry/expelled, or mistreated).[181] In its May 23, 2007 submission, the IOM recommended rejection of 1 additional appeal.[182]

C. Policy Issues

The Claims Conference and IOM communicated regularly with the Special Masters (who, in turn, consulted with Judge Korman). As was true for the other claims processes, certain unanticipated substantive and procedural issues arose requiring further research and analysis, and in some cases court approval of adjustments in the Distribution Plan or the claims processing procedures. Some examples are described below.

1. Expansion of eligibility to those not appearing on the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland

The Distribution Plan had recommended that the "Claims Conference and the IOM … should be appointed to handle the largely administrative task of confirming whether those who plausibly attest to 'detention,' 'mistreatment' or 'abuse' upon entry into Switzerland appear on the List of Refugees Admitted into Switzerland, and certifying valid claims to the Court for evaluation and payment."[183] As the claims process progressed, however, it became clear that a considerable number of applicants who were not on the List of Refugees Admitted nevertheless had provided detailed, plausible claims of having been admitted but mistreated in Switzerland, sometimes accompanied by documentary evidence.

The Claims Conference and the IOM consulted with the Special Masters and, with the Court's approval, broadened the eligibility criteria. The historical record supported this decision, given that the Bergier Commission itself had pointed out that there were several thousand individuals who were admitted or otherwise considered as refugees in Switzerland, but who would not necessarily have been included on the list of internees.[184]

[183] Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 175 n.450.

[184] See BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 117 (this included several thousand refugees who had been issued a "cantonal tolerance permit" or who had been in Switzerland "at the outbreak of the war," as well as some political refugees).

2. 45% increase in awards

On September 25, 2002, the Court authorized a 45% increase in the amounts allocated under the Distribution Plan for members of the Looted Assets Class, Slave Labor Class I and the Refugee Class.[185] The increase was prompted by unanticipated additional interest income, as well as a tax exemption on interest earned on the Settlement Fund. As a result, payments to members of the Refugee Class were increased from $2,500 (for those denied entry or expelled) and $500 (for those mistreated), to $3,625 and $725, respectively. Retroactive payments were made to those who already had received their awards prior to the Court's September 25, 2002 order.

3. Expulsions prior to the 1938 introduction of the "J-stamp"

Although Switzerland tightened its refugee policies in 1938 with the introduction of the "J-stamp," the Bergier Commission report demonstrated that Jewish refugees had been subjected to hostile treatment from the earliest years of the Nazi regime. The J-stamp did not represent a "bright-line" change in policy but merely a reaffirmation of principles already guiding Swiss officials charged with patrolling the border. Thus, the Claims Conference and the IOM highlighted the historical evidence supporting refugee claims for all applicants, including for those who were turned away in the first phase of the Holocaust era, 1933 to 1938.

In its submission of January 29, 2003 ("Group 6"), the Claims Conference cited the Bergier Final Report in recommending payment to 115 individuals who had been expelled or denied entry, including 10 persons who were turned away before 1938.[186] In its May 20, 2003 submission ("Group 10"), the Claims Conference recommended payment of 7 individuals who had been expelled or denied entry before the introduction of the J-stamp, including one individual who had submitted a June 2, 1933 document "from the Police Department of the Canton of Zurich" which named the claimant, his parents and siblings. The document stated: "'Moving to the Canton Zurich and residency has to be denied for reason of foreign infiltration.

Wife and four children will be included in this order.'" The Claims Conference noted that this was the "earliest evidence of enforcement of Swiss Refugee policy found thus far in the administration of the Swiss Refugee Program."[187]

By the time the claims process was over, the Claims Conference had recommended and the Court had approved payment to 397 individuals who were expelled or denied entry during the years 1933 through mid-1938, when the J-stamp was introduced.

4. Approval of claims for both expulsion or denial of entry, and mistreatment

The Distribution Plan, drawing upon the terms of the Settlement Agreement, originally envisioned two mutually exclusive categories of compensation under the Refugee Class: for (1) expulsion/denial of entry; or (2) mistreatment after admission. However, as the Claims Conference and IOM began to analyze claims and to consult with one another, it became clear that a number of individuals had suffered both types of harm. Typically, these Nazi victims had made one, and sometimes numerous, unsuccessful attempts to enter Switzerland. They eventually managed to secure admission, but were then imprisoned in Swiss camps or otherwise mistreated. In other instances, they had been admitted but subjected to mistreatment, and at some point thereafter, expelled.

For example, the Claims Conference in its October 24, 2002 submission ("Group 5") described a "mother and daughter" who lived in Israel at the time of their application. They had "fled to France after the German invasion of Belgium. From Lyon, they made five separate attempts to enter Switzerland, but were turned back to France each time. Finally, they gained admission and were sent to a Swiss family, where the mother performed hard work. She became ill and was sent to women's camps. Her young daughter was placed with a Swiss family. The mother gave birth in a work camp, where she and the infant did not receive proper nutrition. The names of the mother and daughter appear on the List of Persons Admitted to Switzerland provided by the Swiss Federal Archive to the Court."[188]

In its July 31, 2003 submission ("Group 14"), the Claims Conference noted that as to one of the survivors for whom compensation was recommended, his name appeared on both lists that had been provided to the Court by the Swiss Federal Archive: those who had been expelled or denied entry, and those who had been admitted.[189]

Upon consultation with the Special Masters and the Court, it was determined that in such instances, each type of injury should be compensated. Thus, claimants plausibly demonstrating that they were expelled or denied entry, and at some other point during the Holocaust era also admitted into Switzerland but mistreated, received payment of $4,350 each ($3,625 based upon expulsion/denial of entry, plus $725 based upon mistreatment). In total, 186 individuals received such compensation, 179 through the Claims Conference program and 7 through the IOM program.

5. "Schutzpass" claims

During the review process, the Claims Conference alerted the Special Masters to a unique category of claim that appeared to warrant compensation. In its November 19, 2003 submission ("Group 19"), the Claims Conference explained that one claimant had "applied for a visa to Switzerland in Budapest and was denied the visa and given a 'Schutzpass.' The Schutzpass [Schutzbriefe] was a document that bore the official stamp of the Swiss Legation and stated that the person possessing the Schutzpass had a valid passport and was part of a Swiss emigration collective. It did not grant its holder permission to enter Switzerland. It provided targets of Nazi persecution in Hungary a degree of protection from Hungarian government authorities who were allied with Nazi Germany."[190] The Swiss Legation in Budapest, including at the so-called "Glass House," issued tens of thousands of Schutzpasses between 1942 and 1945.[191]

The Schutzpass was due largely to the efforts of Carl Lutz, a Swiss consul in Budapest, who "saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from deportation and certain death in Auschwitz by issuing 'collective protection passports' [Schutzpasses]. His reward was to be packed off after the war to an insignificant provincial post. And there were many other men and women – some known and others whose identities remain unknown – who quietly achieved impressive results on behalf of Jewish refugees."[192] In 1957, the Swiss parliament recognized Carl Lutz, and in 1964, Yad Vashem honored him (and in 1978, his wife Gertrud) as "Righteous Among the Nations."[193]

In 1999, Switzerland issued a stamp in his honor.

The Claims Conference recommended and the Special Masters and Court agreed that those who had received Schutzpasses, while saved in Hungary by the valiant efforts of Carl Lutz and others who assisted him, at the same time had been denied entry into Switzerland. In total, 18 claimants were compensated on this basis.

6. Actions by Non-Swiss Officials

In its submission of January 12, 2005 (amended on March 10, 2005) ("Group 33" — the last group of refugee claims recommended for payment by the Claims Conference), the Claims Conference requested reconsideration of 41 claims that had been previously recommended for denial.

("Righteous Among the Nations is an official title awarded by Yad Vashem on behalf of the State of Israel and the Jewish people to non-Jews who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust."). In addition to issuing Schutzpasses, Lutz and his wife, Gertrud, rented 76 buildings for people under his protection; followed behind the death marches of November 10-22, 1944, pulling out many Jewish victims from the marches and returning them to relative safety in Budapest; and stayed behind in Budapest to save Jews, at risk to their own lives, when all other diplomatic and consular missions except the Swedish delegation had left the city in response to the Soviet siege. See The Righteous Among the Nations: Lutz Family, YAD VASHEM, https://db.yadvashem.org/righteous/family.html?language=en&itemId=4035632 (last accessed Mar. 18, 2016).

The Claims Conference explained that "[u]pon further review of the historical record and in consultation with the Court, the Special Master and the IOM, we recommend that [the 41 cases be compensated.] These … claims initially were recommended for denial and so approved by the Court because the officials directly responsible for barring the claimants from Switzerland were nationals of Germany, France or other nations, and not Swiss, and therefore [the claims were] thought not compensable under the terms of the Settlement Agreement and the Distribution Plan and implementation orders. However, upon further analysis by the Special Master, the Bergier Interim Refugee Report makes clear that Swiss authorities took deliberate steps to ensure that the Reich prevented emigration to Switzerland. Notoriously, in the beginning of March 1938, Swiss authorities negotiated with the German government for the purpose of introducing anti-immigration measures. Significantly, the agreement with Germany stipulated that the German agencies in charge of border surveillance would be obligated to prevent the entry into Switzerland of Jews. As a result of these negotiations, the Swiss legations in Berlin and Austria put political pressure on the German authorities to ensure that the agreement was strictly enforced. Accordingly, after March 1938, to the extent that individuals who attempted to flee to Switzerland were stopped by German, French or other authorities, these entry denials are attributable to official Swiss policy pursuant to its agreement with Nazi Germany."[194]

The Court approved this recommendation, so that the 41 claimants whose applications originally had not been approved later received compensation for denial of entry into Switzerland.

7. Late Claims

As true for all of the classes and claims processes under the Swiss Banks Settlement, the Court sought to maintain a process for the Refugee Class that was both equitable and efficient. Thus, filing deadlines were established, but extended, once it became clear that many elderly Holocaust survivors had some confusion about whether they needed to file claims. While it was important to move the process along so that payments could be issued, that goal was outweighed by the need to reach and include as many survivors as possible.

Thus, in the case of the Refugee Class, by Memorandum & Order dated November 4, 2003, the Court deemed as timely the claims filed by 79 Refugee Class claimants. As set forth in a July 28, 2004 letter to the Court from Special Master Gribetz, although those claimants "had filed their claims after the original filing deadline for the Refugee Class [September 30, 2001], each had made a showing of good faith and excusable neglect, and the Court exercised its equitable authority in accepting the claims."[195]

The Claims Conference and IOM notified the Special Masters in July 2004 that during the period between January 1, 2003 and June 30, 2004, another 340 individuals had filed late refugee claims: 325 with the Claims Conference, and 15 with the IOM. As described in the Special Masters' July 28, 2004 letter to the Court, each claimant had provided a specific reason for his or her failure to adhere to the deadline, including "advanced age; confusion about Holocaust compensation programs, including for the Refugee Class; illness, death or other family hardship; resubmission of a previously filed (but not registered) claim; timely request of a claim form but failure either to receive or to complete it; or filing of other timely claims in the Swiss Banks Settlement."

The Court approved the Special Masters' recommendation to permit the 340 late claims to be considered timely, concurring that the claimants had shown "good faith" and "excusable neglect." Further, "accepting these claims as timely will not prejudice other parties: no portion of the $1.25 billion settlement reverts to defendants, while other timely filed Refugee Class claims will continue to be processed and paid in full if eligible."[196]

[195] The letter cited, e.g., In re Crazy Eddie Sec. Litig., 906 F. Supp. 840, 844 (E.D.N.Y. 1995) (relevant factors in considering whether there has been "excusable neglect" in meeting filing deadlines include "the danger of prejudice to other parties, the length of the delay and its potential impact on judicial proceedings, the reason for the delay, including whether it was within the reasonable control of the [claimant], and whether the [claimant] acted in good faith") (internal quotations omitted).

In some instances, it was the Court and its agents that alerted survivors and heirs to the possibility of a claim, even after the initial deadlines had passed. Because of the close coordination among the Court, Special Masters and claims administrators in New York and Zurich, it was possible for a claim (or possible claims) to be flagged in one program and called to the attention of another. While this sometimes caused delay and added to the complexity of an already intricate, multi-forum system, those concerns were far outweighed by the importance of ensuring aging survivors and their heirs the opportunity to obtain compensation for which they were potentially eligible, and to provide them with a sense of recognition for what they had suffered decades earlier.

Thus, for example, in the course of reviewing preliminary Deposited Assets Class awards prepared by the CRT, the Special Masters noted that several claimants, in describing their experiences with Swiss banks, had alluded to their expulsion or mistreatment as Swiss refugees. The Special Masters called these possible claims to the attention of the CRT, which alerted the claimants and advised them, by letter and then by telephone, to contact the Claims Conference about their possible refugee claims. All of these communications took place after the Refugee Class filing deadlines had passed, and after it had been confirmed that the individuals in question had not, in fact, filed Refugee Class claims. Thus, one claimant was advised: "In [your CRT] claim, you identified your relative, Joseph Ullmann, as the owner of a Swiss bank account. Reference was found in your claim form to the fact that you were a refugee in Switzerland during the Second World War." Another CRT claimant similarly was advised that in her CRT claim, "in which you identified your relative, Amalia Roth, as the owner of a Swiss Bank account," it had been noted "that you attempted to enter Switzerland as a refugee in 1939, but were refused entry." The claimants were advised that the refugee filing deadlines had expired over 18 months earlier, but that they should nevertheless contact the Claims Conference and explain why they had not filed timely refugee claims. The Claims Conference, in turn, would present the late claims to the Court for consideration.

In both cases, and in many others as well, the claimants ended up receiving compensation under a program that they apparently did not know existed. Thus, the claimant to the Joseph Ullmann bank account – who filed a claim for her father's accounts, but was advised by the CRT that it was actually her uncle who had owned accounts, and that she was the rightful heir — received nearly $53,000 for those assets (In re Account of Martin Ullmann), and also was able to receive recognition, and compensation, for her suffering as a refugee. The claimant to the Amalia Roth accounts received nearly $156,000 for assets owned by her aunt (In re Accounts of Amalie Roth and Leiser Roth), but she also had her own personal experiences recognized and compensated, under the separate Refugee Class claims process.

D. Refugee Awards: Additional Examples

The decisions on claims made by members of the Refugee Class are docketed with the Court, as true for all other classes for which individual payments have been issued. Because the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, claim forms, and related materials all promised claimants confidentiality (in recognition of the sensitivity of the information provided in support of their claims), the claimants' names are not disclosed here, but their names, and all other relevant identifying information, are known to and were filed with the Court under seal. Summaries of the awards are available on the internet.[197] Some of those decisions, which are representative of the thousands compensated through the Court's programs, are highlighted below.

[197] These summaries originally were prepared by the Claims Conference and IOM, respectively, and can be found at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/RefugeeClass.aspx.

1. Refugees Expelled or Denied Entry

a. Jewish Holocaust Victims

i. Expulsion from Switzerland or Denial of Entry at the Border

- The claimant, born on 01/26/1922 in Germany, attempted to enter Switzerland from France in 1942 with three other people. Upon arrival, the group was stopped by a Swiss military patrol and was taken in for interrogation, which lasted several hours. While two members of the group were allowed to stay, the claimant was accompanied back to the French border and warned never to attempt to re-enter Switzerland. Nevertheless, during the days that followed, the claimant attempted twice more to cross the French-Swiss border at different locations, but was stopped and brought back to French territory each time.
- The claimant, born on 08/01/1923 in Holland, attempted to enter Switzerland with a group of five people at Annemasse. Immediately upon arrival, they were stopped by Swiss border police and were told to return to France. The claimant started screaming and running until the police officers overpowered her. The officers eventually agreed to let the group remain. The group was then placed in a center with other refugees. After three days, they were summoned, and put into a van. Without being told anything, the claimant and the others were transported back to French territory, where they were dropped off and left to walk.
- The claimant, born on 07/12/1927 in Germany, tried to enter Switzerland through Annemasse between April and March 1943. She was among a group of children, organized by the French Child Care Organization OSE. After being jailed in a school in Geneva and being interrogated the next day, the claimant and his sister were not permitted to stay in Switzerland. They were brought back to the border, and forced to go back to France. They made their way back to Annemasse, and then to Limoges, where they hid on the roof of a cathedral. They then went to Grenoble, where they found their parents, but they could not stay there. They next went to Voiron, where they hid in several places, including basements, warehouses, and silos, in the woods and on farms.
- The claimant, born on 12/28/1930 in Austria, was denied entry into Switzerland in 1939. The claimant and her parents left Austria following Kristallnacht. Their apartment and the family's store in Vienna were seized by the Nazis. The family took a train from Vienna to Switzerland. At the border, they were taken off the train so that their passports could be checked. The claimant was told by her mother that they were not allowed to enter Switzerland because of the "J" stamp on their passports. The family returned to Vienna, where they stayed with friends for one month. Subsequently, they went to Hamburg by train, and boarded a boat to Cuba.
- The claimant, born on 05/09/1918 in Hungary, was expelled from Switzerland in August 1939. The claimant left Budapest and intended to enroll at the Federal Institute of Technology in Zurich. Upon arrival in Zurich, the claimant was told to report to the police station. At the police station, he was questioned about his and his parents' religious affiliation. He was told to leave Switzerland within 24 hours. Within the next few days, the claimant was picked up by the police and escorted by officers in civilian dress to a train to Budapest, Hungary. After he returned to Budapest, the claimant was caught by the Hungarian army. He was forced into labor in Hungary and Transylvania.

- The claimant, born on 03/23/1923 in France, was denied entry into Switzerland at the French-Swiss border in fall 1943. A smuggler drove the claimant and her father, along with other refugees, in a small truck to the French-Swiss border. The smuggler instructed them to cross into Switzerland by running between two German border patrols. They managed to reach the Swiss side, but Swiss guards turned them away. The claimant and her father attempted to cross three times, but were rejected by Swiss authorities each time. They managed to get back to the waiting smuggler and returned to Paris. The claimant later fled to Lyon, where she spent the rest of the war in hiding. The claimant's father was deported to Auschwitz, where he perished.

- The claimant, born on 10/01/1928 in Austria, was denied entry into Switzerland at the Austrian-Swiss border in the summer of 1938. After the claimant and her sister were expelled from school, the family tried to cross illegally into Switzerland. In the summer of 1938, they traveled to the Austrian-Swiss border at Bregenz. Swiss border guards stopped them, searched them, and stole their jewelry and money. The claimant and her family were verbally abused and then sent back. They returned to Vienna. In late 1938, the family sought refuge in Trinidad. They obtained permission to leave for the United States in November 1940.

- The claimant, born 11/05/1932 in Czechoslovakia, was denied entry into Switzerland in 1944. The claimant and her brother were taken to an orphanage in Budapest after it became increasingly dangerous in Czechoslovakia. They were then placed on a children's transport to Switzerland organized by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in 1944. At the border, the claimant and the other children remained on the train. They were then told that they could not enter Switzerland. They were forced to return to Budapest. The claimant was placed in a safe house in Budapest and was later forced into a ghetto.

- The claimant, born on 04/10/1916 in Poland, was denied entry into Switzerland with her infant and a group on October 21, 1943 at the French-Swiss border. After her husband was deported, the claimant, with her ten-month-old baby, fled France toward the Swiss border, assisted by two smugglers. At the border, the smugglers cut the barbed wire to let them in. As soon as they crossed, they were confronted by guard dogs and gunfire. The claimant was slightly injured, but her baby was killed in her arms. She was interrogated all night, despite being traumatized, and then sent to Pax prison the next day in France. She was later transferred to a hospital under a false identity.

- The claimant, born on 11/23/1918 in Poland, was denied permission to remain in Switzerland in 1940. The claimant arrived in Switzerland in March 1938 from Vienna, Austria. He was a student at the University of Geneva. At the outbreak of the war, the claimant came under pressure from Swiss authorities to leave the country, and his visa was cancelled. In April 1940, he was given a train ticket from Geneva to the Italian border. He was told that foreign students who did not leave and could not support themselves would be placed in labor camps. The claimant therefore left Switzerland.

- The claimant, born on 03/29/1927 in Austria, was denied entry in September 1938 at the German-Swiss border. The claimant and his mother had to leave Vienna in 1938, and were unable to secure visas to several countries. They first tried to enter France, but were caught. They then tried to enter Switzerland near Basel in September 1938. A Swiss border patrol stopped them and handed them over to the German border post. The claimant's mother stayed in Freiburg, Germany. The claimant tried to enter Switzerland again at the Basel train station. He was caught by railroad workers and handed over to the Gestapo. The claimant was interrogated and sent back to Freiburg. The claimant and his mother returned to Austria, and on November 10, 1938, they fled to France. They were arrested in Strasbourg. The claimant's mother was imprisoned for thirty days, while the claimant was put in a hospital ward. They then received an order to leave France within three days. The claimant was placed with the OSE. He later was sent to Rivesaltes, and then escaped to St. Martin Vésubie. He later escaped into Italy, where he hid in the mountains from 1942 until 1944. He was liberated in Italy in June 1944.
- The claimant, born on 02/15/1935 in Hungary, was denied entry into Switzerland in 1944. The claimant and his sister were taken to an orphanage in Budapest. The claimant stated that the JDC tried to obtain visas for the children from the Swiss Embassy, but failed. The children were then placed on a children's transport to Switzerland organized by the JDC in 1944. At the border, the claimant and the other children remained on the train. They were told that they could not enter Switzerland and were forced to return to Budapest. The claimant was placed in a safe house in Budapest and was later forced into a ghetto in Budapest.

ii. Denial of Permission to Enter (e.g. Denial of Visa)

- The claimant, born on 11/10/1925 in Poland, was denied a visa to Switzerland at the Swiss consulate in Warsaw in September 1939, and again in June 1941. As the owner of a leather factory, the claimant's father had substantial assets in Switzerland. Immediately following the outbreak of war in September 1939, the claimant's family filed applications at the Swiss consulate in Warsaw to obtain visas to enter Switzerland. These visas were denied. A second application to the Swiss authorities was filed in June 1941, but again permission was not granted. The claimant was detained in various ghettos and concentration camps until her liberation from Bergen-Belsen by British forces in April 1945.

- The claimant, born on 07/09/1929 in Czechoslovakia, was denied an entry permit into Switzerland in Zurich, and again in Czechoslovakia in 1938. The claimant's father and his Swiss business partner made several attempts to obtain permission for the claimant and her family to enter Switzerland. Swiss authorities repeatedly denied their requests. In June 1938, the family fled to Mukačevo. They were forced into the Mukačevo ghetto in March 1944. They were transported to Auschwitz in May 1944, and the claimant was separated from the rest of her family. She was transferred to a labor camp in Germany, and later to Bergen-Belsen.
- The claimant, born on 03/14/1938 in Budapest, Hungary, was denied a visa to Switzerland in the summer of 1944 at the Swiss consulate in Budapest, Hungary. The claimant and his parents applied for a visa several times. They were denied each time. On one occasion, they stood in line for hours, until a Swiss official informed them that the consulate would not issue any more visas to Switzerland. He asked them to leave the premises. The claimant returned to the Budapest ghetto and went into hiding until liberation.
- The claimant, born on 10/30/1924 in Romania, was denied a visa to Switzerland by the Swiss Embassy in Budapest, Hungary. On March 18, 1944, the claimant applied for a visa at the Swiss Embassy. She was denied by Swiss officials, who told her that the list of applicants was already full. The Swiss officials advised her to try again in three months. The following morning, the claimant was arrested. She was sent to several concentration camps and forced to work.
- The claimant, born on 12/08/1925 in Czechoslovakia, was denied a visa to Switzerland at the Swiss Embassy in Budapest, Hungary. In March 1944, he applied for a visa at the Swiss Embassy. He was denied by Swiss officials, who told him that the list of applicants was already full. The Swiss officials advised him to try again in three months. In April 1944, the claimant was sent to a ghetto, and from there, to several concentration camps.
- The claimant, born on 03/15/1923 in Czechoslovakia, was denied a visa to Switzerland by Swiss authorities in Prague, Czechoslovakia. In 1939, the claimant's parents applied for visas to Switzerland with the support of friends in Zurich. Their application was denied. Subsequently, the claimant was sent with a Kindertransport[198] to England, where she arrived on July 1, 1939. Her parents were deported and killed in Auschwitz.

198 "Kindertransport (Children's Transport) was the informal name of a series of rescue efforts which brought thousands of refugee Jewish children to Great Britain from Nazi Germany between 1938 and 1940." Under the program, "British authorities agreed to permit an unspecified number of children under the age of 17 to enter Great Britain from Germany and German-annexed territories (namely, Austria and the Czech lands). Private citizens or organizations had to guarantee to pay for each child's care, education, and eventual emigration from Britain. In return for this guarantee, the British government agreed to allow unaccompanied refugee children to enter the country on temporary travel visas." See Kindertransport 1938-1940, USHMM HOLOCAUST ENCYCLOPEDIA, available at https://www.ushmm.org/wlc/en/article.php?ModuleId=10005260.

- The claimant, born on 06/27/1927 in Yugoslavia, was denied permission to enter Switzerland by the Swiss consulate in Budapest, Hungary. In September or October of 1942, the claimant's mother applied for permission to enter Switzerland in transit to Palestine. The claimant already had received a Schutzpass. She had been placed on a list of potential immigrants to Palestine. The claimant's mother's application was denied. The claimant remained in hiding for the rest of the war.
- The claimant, born on 04/10/1928 in Hungary, was denied a visa to Switzerland in March 1944. The claimant's father went to the Swiss Legation in Budapest to apply for a visa for the family, but received a Schutzpass. The family was later placed into a ghetto. The claimant's parents were taken by German soldiers to the river Danube, where they were shot. The claimant and her sister were imprisoned in the ghetto until liberation.
- The claimant, born on 03/05/1935 in Hungary, was denied a visa to Switzerland with his family sometime after March 1944, at the Swiss Embassy in Budapest, Hungary. The claimant's father was taken away by the Germans and killed. The claimant's mother applied for a visa to Switzerland, but was denied. Instead, she received a Schutzpass, which enabled the claimant, her mother and her sister to live in a Swiss protected house. Subsequently, Germans arrived at the house. The claimant's mother and sister were taken to a labor camp, and the claimant was sent to the ghetto.

b. Roma, Jehovah's Witness, Homosexual and Disabled Holocaust Victims

- The claimant, a Romani, was born in Ghent, Belgium in 1929. His family fled in the spring of 1940, and tried to seek asylum in Switzerland. An uncle was travelling with them who had Swiss nationality. His mother had papers, but his father did not. They travelled through Belgium and France, and tried to enter Switzerland near "Dissebergern," "Limbern" or "Libain." The claimant could not provide exact name spellings, and was not sure if these names were correct. The family was allowed to enter. They were held in barracks for two days, before being expelled back to France. His father was arrested by the Belgian police. The claimant travelled with his mother throughout France, Belgium and Holland.
- The claimants were three Romani sisters born in 1929, 1932 and 1934, respectively. They lived in Karlsruhe, Germany, prior to fleeing to Switzerland. Their mother was born in Switzerland and they had relatives there. The claimants' family attempted to enter Switzerland with documents in 1939 near Kreuzlingen. They were expelled from Switzerland and delivered to the German police, who took them to Dorfgastein, Austria, where they were interned until 1939. They were sent to a camp near Salzburg (Maxglan) from 1939 to 1942. From 1942 to 1945, they were imprisoned in the Lackenbach concentration camp.

- The claimant, a Romani, was born in Austria in 1934. In the summer of 1942, the claimant, his parents, grandmother and three siblings attempted to flee Austria and seek asylum in Switzerland. The family had a circus business. At the Austrian-Swiss border, they presented their passports and were allowed to enter with their entire circus, including animals. They were detained in Switzerland for a few days before being expelled to Germany. However, their circus was confiscated. They were arrested in Germany and sent to several concentration camps, including Mauthausen and Auschwitz.

- The claimant was born in Moselkèrn, Germany in 1928. During the autumn of either 1939 or 1940, the claimant entered Switzerland with a group of people who were strangers to her. Because she was a child, she did not remember the route that was taken. Her recollection was that German was spoken in the region. She was arrested by the Swiss police, harassed and beaten. The claimant was returned to Germany by train. She was taken to Auschwitz in 1942 and was imprisoned there for approximately 1½ years, where she worked carrying stones and helping to build streets. Six of her siblings were imprisoned in Auschwitz. She was transferred to Norhaudsen/Harz in 1944 and later to Bergen-Belsen, where she remained until liberation by American troops. While at Auschwitz, she was beaten with clubs and sticks because she did not want to leave her siblings.

- The claimant, who was Romani, was born in 1921 in Germany. In the autumn of 1938, the claimant's family sought asylum in Switzerland. They traveled from Baden through the city of Donaueschingen, their father's hometown, to Schaffhausen, Switzerland. They attempted to enter Switzerland legally, with ID cards. However, their entry was denied. Later, in the spring and summer of 1939, the family attempted five times to enter at the border, illegally. However, they were always caught and immediately expelled. On their last attempt, the Swiss border guards handed them over to German soldiers, who sent them back to Baden. In 1943, the family was deported to Auschwitz, where the claimant's child perished. Later, the claimant was transferred to Ravensbrück, Buchenwald and Schlieben concentration camps, where she remained until the end of the war.

- The claimant, who was Romani, was born in 1939 in Geiselhöring, Germany. The claimant and her parents sought asylum in Switzerland between 1941-1942. They traveled to Singen at the German-Swiss border. There, they heard that there were many German soldiers at Singen, and that it would be very difficult to cross the border. Subsequently, they went east along the German-Swiss border, until they arrived at Lake Bodensee, where they attempted to enter Switzerland from the lake near Schaffhausen. However, they were caught by Swiss border guards and were immediately expelled. Soon after, they were caught by German soldiers, who took the claimant away from her parents. Her parents were executed in the forest. The claimant was sent to several ghettos and camps, where she remained until liberation.

- The claimant, who was a Jehovah's Witness, was born in 1927 in Austria. In 1940, he was expelled from primary school because he refused to perform the Heil Hitler salute or to join the "Hitler-Youth." In April 1941, the claimant and his father were arrested. The claimant's father was sentenced to four years of imprisonment. The claimant was transferred to a reform school, where he remained, until he managed to escape in October 1941. In the spring or early summer of 1944, the claimant traveled from Vienna by way of Innsbruck. He attempted to enter Switzerland near Nauders. Before crossing the border, the claimant met American pilots who had been shot down by the German army. The pilots informed him that the only way to enter Switzerland was legally, through the border station at Nauders. They told him that the Swiss expelled all refugees who attempted to enter Switzerland illegally, and that at Nauders, there were no German soldiers. However, 200 meters before the Swiss border, the claimant was arrested by a German soldier. The claimant was transferred to Vienna. Between September 1944 and January 1945, the claimant was forced to work. Later, he was transferred to a police prison in Inglau, where he was detained until April 1945.

- The claimant was born in 1927 in Yugoslavia. As a child, he attended Jehovah's Witness meetings with his parents. The claimant's father was the owner of some coal mines and established trade contacts with Switzerland through his partner, who transported the coal to Davos, Switzerland. The Nazis killed the claimant's father and brother. His father's partner tried to rescue the claimant by sending him to Switzerland with his secretary. The claimant and the secretary traveled from Tuzla via Zagreb, Ljubljana, and Udine. They attempted to enter Switzerland by crossing the Italian border. The claimant did not remember the border point, but recalled that they headed toward the city of Davos. However, the secretary could not convince the border guards to allow the claimant to enter, and the claimant was immediately expelled at the border. Later, the secretary managed to bring the claimant back to Tuzla. In 1942, the claimant was detained in the prison in Tuzla.

- The claimant, a homosexual, was born in Poland in 1924. He was deported to Germany to perform forced labor for an aircraft factory. He remained in Germany until 1943. He had to work in inhumane conditions and suffered from malnutrition. In March 1943, he and his friend decided to flee to Switzerland. Their journey was arranged by a German friend, who purchased their tickets. On March 20, 1943, they reached Bregenz, a small town near Lake Bodensee and the Swiss border. On March 22, 1943, they were caught by Swiss border guards and expelled to Germany. They were arrested, interrogated and sent to a prison in Lindau. A few days later, the Gestapo sent them to a prison in Munich. They stayed in Munich for several days before being transferred to Dachau, where they remained until the end of the war.

- The claimant, a homosexual, was born in 1923 in The Netherlands. Around the summer of 1943, the claimant sought asylum in Switzerland. He attempted to enter Switzerland near Basel. However, his entry was denied. Subsequently, the claimant was deported to Germany, where he performed forced labor for German companies. In 1944, the claimant had an eye infection and was exempted from work; however, he was not allowed to return home. Later, the claimant met a woman who ran an actors' school. As the claimant was an actor, they decided to work together. They moved to Berlin, where the claimant had a role in some of the films that she directed. In Berlin, the claimant met a man who became his partner. By the end of 1944, his partner was arrested and forced to reveal the claimant's name. Subsequently, the claimant was arrested in 1945 because of his homosexuality. He was detained in a prison in Berlin. After the war, the claimant and his partner lived together again.

- The claimant, a mentally handicapped native of Ukraine, was born in 1926. She was deported to Germany in August 1943 to perform forced labor. She was transferred to a concentration camp in Barby in the spring of 1944. While at this camp, she escaped with some other prisoners. She attempted to enter Switzerland, probably near Lörrach and the canton of Schaffhausen. She stated that she was denied entry because "she was physically ill, swollen from hunger, and suffering from a mental disorder." Her companions were denied entry because they were Jewish.

2. Refugees Admitted into Switzerland but Mistreated

a. Jewish Holocaust Victims

- The claimant, born on 11/06/1926 in Czechoslovakia, entered Switzerland with a group of children at Annemasse on March 10, 1944. The claimant was interned in seven camps, where he felt depressed, nervous and demoralized. In April of 1944, he was transferred to another camp guarded by armed soldiers, where conditions worsened. During Passover, the camp management refused to distribute matzo from local Jews, and the claimant had only water and some potatoes for 9 days. In the prison work camp at Witzwiel, the claimant was incarcerated alongside murderers. He was forced to work on Shabbat, even though he pleaded to work on Sundays instead.
- The claimant, born on 12/15/1931 in Germany, entered Switzerland in 1944. At the border, the claimant and her parents were treated very badly. Her mother pleaded to be allowed to stay in Switzerland; if not, she said she would rather be shot. The claimant and her parents were put into a reception camp, and then in a camp in the Italian part of Switzerland. Her father suffered from angina, and her mother was forced to perform such hard labor that she had a heart attack. Only after that, was the claimant's mother given easier work. The claimant was placed with her grandmother in Zurich.
- The claimant, born on 06/17/1937 in Germany, was smuggled into Switzerland from France with a group of children in April 1943. After crossing the border, she was caught by Swiss soldiers. Even though she was wet, cold and injured from the journey, she had to undergo a brutal and humiliating interrogation. During this long interrogation, she was denied medical treatment, was not given anything to eat or drink, and was not allowed to go to the bathroom. She also was threatened with expulsion. The next morning, the claimant and her group were made to walk the streets of Geneva, wounded and dirty, in front of local residents. The claimant stated she recalled this experience as extremely painful and humiliating. She was later placed in a refugee camp, where she stated that the conditions were unbearable. From there, she was transferred to a children's institution in Bex Les Bains. She was forced to attend a Catholic school, where she was subjected to insults and taunts because she was Jewish. She was not allowed to move freely, and was denied contact with her brother, who was also in Switzerland. She was later transferred to Engelberg.

- The claimant, born on 06/05/1926 in Germany, entered Switzerland from France with his uncle and his uncle's family in 1942. Upon crossing the border, the family was caught by Swiss Army personnel. They were sent to Camp Augsberg, where they were guarded by armed soldiers and had to sleep on straw. After 6 months, the claimant was separated from the family. Over three years, the claimant was interned in eight different camps in Switzerland. He was forced to perform heavy unpaid labor, including building roads and lifting heavy rocks. He had to work in extreme weather conditions with inadequate clothing. As a result, he contracted pneumonia and had to be hospitalized. The claimant stated that he was a prisoner in Switzerland for three years, his young life was wasted there, and he was deprived of the opportunity to further his education.

- The claimant, born on 05/20/1922 in France, entered Switzerland in September 1942 from Annemasse, France. The claimant was quarantined in Geneva, where Swiss police confiscated most of his money. The claimant was then transferred to Camp Buren, where he suffered from hunger. He was later sent to camps Wald, Eggitswil/Kloten, Eggiwill, and Chantiers Ambulants. While in Switzerland, he was forced to perform hard labor. He worked as a lumberjack and in construction, and stated that he had never done such hard and painful work until the war.

- The claimant, born on 02/06/1922 in Czechoslovakia, arrived in Switzerland on December 7, 1944 from Bergen-Belsen. The claimant was placed in Caux-Montreux, in what she described as a closed camp. She stated that she suffered from severe cold due to the lack of heating, and from hunger due to insufficient food. She also feared being expelled to Algeria.

- The claimant was born on 03/01/1929 in Romania, and she died on 04/07/2000.[199] The claimant was sent from Bergen-Belsen to Switzerland in September 1944. At the border, the group was held for five days. The claimant was then detained in a Swiss refugee camp for several weeks, before she managed to immigrate to Palestine. The claimant stated that she was badly treated while in Switzerland, and held as if she were a prisoner.

- The claimant, who was born on 07/02/1920 in Belgium, entered Switzerland in July 1942 from France. The claimant was detained in Tour Haldimand, Clarons, Chamby, and in Engelberg. During her time in Switzerland, the claimant worked for no pay. She was subject to verbal abuse, constantly being reminded that "the border is close" and that "you are eating our food." She was constantly in fear of expulsion.

[199] Because she died after February 15, 1999, her heirs were eligible to receive compensation, as provided under the Distribution Plan.

- The claimant, born on 06/23/1936 in France, entered Switzerland with her family from France, near Annemasse, in November 1942. They were taken by truck to Bex, where they were detained in a barrack for several weeks. The claimant and her mother were transferred to Morgins, while her father stayed behind to work as an unpaid laborer. After Morgins, the claimant and her mother were transferred to a camp in Champéry. They were there for about a year, and later were joined by her father. Shortly thereafter, she was separated from her parents, and placed in the care of a childless Jewish couple in Basel for two and a half years.
- The claimant, born on 05/17/1926 in Belgium, entered Switzerland from France in September 1942. The claimant entered Switzerland near Geneva, and was taken to the military camp Varembe. She stated that she was treated like a servant and had to clean the canteen. She was sent to the Salvation Army for a week, and then, with her two sisters, to a children's home in Wartheim, Appenzell, for nine months. The claimant had to clean the home every day. She was abused by the director. She was separated from her family and sent to a labor camp in Morgins, where she worked in the laundry. She was not allowed to go to school, and was not allowed to leave the camp without permission. She returned to Belgium in June 1945.

b. Roma, Jehovah's Witness, Homosexual and Disabled Holocaust Victims

- The claimant, a Romani, was born in 1921 in Austro-Hungary. In July 1944, he was deported to Austria to work for Henkel Company. Later, he was transferred to Hauders Company (Tot-Lager 3) at Auschwitz. He worked there until he escaped to Switzerland, and was admitted into St. Margareto. He was forced to work for his landlord for a month before being transferred to Camp Lager in Bern. In August 1945, he left Switzerland for Austria.
- The claimant, a Romani, was born in Germany in 1921. She was married and had two children. During the autumn and winter of 1942, she fled to Switzerland to escape the Nazi regime. She traveled from the Czech Republic through Freiburg, Germany and on to Basel, Switzerland. She was allowed to enter Switzerland, and was interned at a camp on the border near Basel. She recalled the names of other prisoners, including a Jewish family, who also were at the camp. After a few weeks, she was expelled back to Germany. Her children died while the family was in flight, and she never saw her husband again.
- The claimant was born in 1937 in the USSR. Claimant's family members were Jehovah's Witnesses. The claimant believed they were removed from the USSR and persecuted because of their faith. In October 1943, the claimant and her sisters were taken to Estonia, where they were detained in a camp. In February 1944, they were deported to a camp in the city of Friedrichshafen, Germany. After the camp was bombed, they were transferred to a camp in the city of "Gotnatyngen." She did not perform any labor because she was a child. The Nazis used to leave the children naked so that they would not run to their parents. During the bombardment of the camp in April 1945, they ran and hid in craters to avoid being hurt by splinters. As they later found out, they were in Swiss territory. In the morning, a policeman approached them, told them not to be afraid, and took them to a refugee camp. They were locked inside a large shed for disinfection. Later, they were kept in a camp in the city of Soluthurn behind barbed wire, but were not guarded. In Switzerland, the claimant's sisters were required to work. The claimant's sisters used to leave for work in the morning, but the claimant did not know what kind of work they did. They went back to Russia in September 1945. The claimant also mentioned the names of the cities of "Rikon" and "Tseythayn" in Switzerland.

- The claimant, a Jehovah's Witness, was born in 1930 in Poland. In approximately 1941, she was deported to Buchenwald, where she was detained with other Jehovah's Witnesses. Around 1943, the claimant and some other Jehovah's Witnesses were released from the camp. Subsequently, they sought asylum in Switzerland. They traveled from Innsbruck, Austria and entered Switzerland. They were detained in a refugee camp near Winterthur. While there, they were forced to perform forced labor in agriculture and in the railroads. When the war ended, the claimant was expelled from Switzerland.

3. Refugees Expelled or Denied Entry, and Admitted but Mistreated

a. Jewish Holocaust Victims

- The claimant, born on 05/22/1921 in Austria, entered Switzerland from France in August 1942. The claimant, her husband and mother traveled to Switzerland by train. Germans entered the train. The claimant and her mother were taken off the train, and interrogated in a small village. They were able to rejoin her husband and continued on foot to Switzerland, entering near St. Cergue. They went to the police and were told they had to leave. The claimant stated that she was subjected to terrible anti-Semitic treatment. The claimant and her husband gave the guard diamonds of great value in the hope that they could stay, but they were escorted to the border and expelled. They were in the forest for about two weeks, living in fear. The claimant approached a Swiss soldier. She stated that he was kind and told them how to re-enter Switzerland, and to find a Jewish family who would help them. The claimant and her husband walked back into Switzerland. After finding the family, who provided food and clothes, they went on to Zurich, where they were imprisoned. They were subsequently sent to camps Beatenburg, Adliswil, and Morgins.
- The claimant, born on 01/30/1928 in Germany, was denied entry into Switzerland between 1938 and 1939 at the German-Swiss border near Kreuzlingen. The claimant's father was arrested by the Gestapo on November 10, 1938 and sent to Dachau. He was released on the condition that he leave Germany. The claimant and her family then traveled from their home in Konstanz to the German-Swiss border. They were denied entry at the border near Kreuzlingen. In October 1940, the claimant and her mother were deported to Gurs, France. In 1941, they were transferred to Rivesaltes, and at the end of December, the claimant was rescued by the OSE and taken to an orphanage. She then went into hiding in Chambery and Annecy, and in May 1943, she crossed the French-Swiss border at Annemasse. The claimant was taken to Swiss officials in Geneva, where, she stated, she was greeted with anti-Semitic slurs. She was sent to a camp in Switzerland, where she slept on straw. She was deprived of proper medical treatment during her time in Switzerland.

- The claimant, born on 10/09/1928 in Austria, was denied entry into Switzerland at the German-Swiss border in 1938. The claimant and her family fled Vienna, Austria. They attempted to enter Switzerland via Waldshut, Germany. They were caught at the border, jailed for three days and then sent back to Germany, where they were imprisoned. After their release, they made a second attempt. This time, they were able to enter Switzerland, and were brought to Zurich. The claimant was not allowed to attend the regular school because she was a Jewish immigrant. Her father was constantly contacted by the police and was asked why he did not leave Switzerland and immigrate to Palestine. In 1941, the family left Switzerland and went to the Dominican Republic. The claimant arrived in Santo Domingo in 1941 with help from the Jewish organization "Dorsa."

- The claimants, with their parents, were denied entry into Switzerland at the French-Swiss border in June 1943. Their parents had fled to Grenoble, where friends helped them organize a guide, who took the family to the Haute-Savoie region of France. The family arrived in Switzerland in June 1943. Swiss border guards denied them entry and sent them back to France. In May 1944, the claimants' parents put the children in the care of the OSE, and they were sent on a transport to Switzerland. At the border, the group was apprehended and arrested by the Gestapo. They were jailed in the Pax prison in Annemasse for two months, and then sent to a children's home under German surveillance. At the end of August 1944, the French resistance rescued the children and sent them to Switzerland. Upon arrival, they were transferred to the reception camp Champel in Geneva, where they stayed for six months. The claimant stated that living conditions in the camp were terrible. They were interned and their movement was restricted. They also were quarantined, due to an outbreak of diphtheria.

b. Roma, Jehovah's Witness, Homosexual and Disabled Holocaust Victims

- The claimant was born in 1920 in Heilbronn, Germany. Her father was Jewish. As her mother was Romani, the claimant identified herself as Romani. In 1933, she and her family entered Switzerland via Weil am Rhein. In 1934, they were expelled to France. Later that year, they were expelled from France to Binningen, Switzerland.

Between 1934 and 1937, she and her family were transferred, by the respective cantonal police, to several locations: Basel, Binningen, Liestal, Lugano, Locarno and other cities. By relocating the claimant's family, the Swiss authorities tried to encourage the family to return to Germany. Around 1937, they were interned at the "White House" in Basel. In 1937, they were expelled from Switzerland by the Swiss police to Schaan, Liechtenstein. In 1940, the claimant came back to Switzerland for a reunion of her father's family. However, she did not receive a work permit, and had to leave Switzerland.

- The claimant was born in 1926 in USSR. He stated that he was born with a birth defect, a deformed leg, and that this was the reason for his persecution by the Nazi Regime. Between the autumn of 1941 and February 1944, he and his family lived under Nazi occupation. In February 1944, the claimant was deported to Germany, where he was forced to perform agricultural labor near Strasbourg. Later, he was transferred to the other side of the Rhine River, where he worked in a saw mill. By the end of the war, the claimant and five other inmates escaped from the saw mill and entered Switzerland near Basel. They were admitted into Switzerland and were sent to a quarantine camp near Lausanne. Later, they were transferred to a wooden barrack near the mountains, where they worked on road construction until August 1945. The Swiss authorities handed the group over to the KGB. Although the claimant had a birth defect, he was drafted into the Soviet Army and had to work with horses. For a long time, the claimant was considered as an "enemy of the Soviet people."[200]

E. Denials

As true for all aspects of the Swiss Banks Settlement claims process, every effort was made to assist survivors in putting forward their claims, such as by performing additional research; reconsidering earlier recommendations in light of additional historical or documentary evidence; and contacting claimants for further details. Moreover, as with all claims processes, the standard was whether the claim was "plausible," taking into account the massive destruction of Holocaust-era documentation and the fading of memories in the decades after the Holocaust.

[200] The IOM sought and received permission to consider individuals expelled from or interned in Switzerland during the period January 1, 1933 through December 31, 1945 as eligible for compensation under the Refugee Class. As the IOM advised in February 16, 2004 correspondence from its Senior Legal Officer: (1) the Nazi Regime was defined in the Settlement Agreement as the National Socialist Government of Germany from 1933 through 1945; (2) the BERGIER FINAL REPORT indicated that refugees interned in Swiss camps and elsewhere were not automatically released on the day the War ended (May 9, 1945) but rather often were interned for months thereafter; and (3) relief organizations still were assisting refugees in Switzerland through early 1946.

Nevertheless, a number of claims were denied, and in the case of the Refugee Class, this often was because the claimants had not met the basic threshold requirements for compensation. As described by the Claims Conference in its May 10, 2004 and January 2, 2005 submissions, the grounds for denial rested upon one or more of the following factors:

A. "No Nexus to Switzerland: Claimant did not allege an attempt to enter Switzerland at the Swiss border or expulsion from Switzerland nor did claimant allege a request for permission to enter Switzerland at a Swiss Consulate or Embassy."

B. "Ineligible Heir: The refugee on whose behalf the claimant filed died on or before February 15, 1999."

C. "Insufficient Information: Claimant did not provide enough information to render the claim plausible. Claimants were given the opportunity to supplement their applications with written questionnaires and/or through telephonic interviews with Claims Conference caseworkers," but nevertheless did not provide sufficient information.

D. "Not Fleeing Nazi Persecution: The date upon which claimant attempted to enter Switzerland at the Swiss border or requested permission to enter Switzerland render[ed] it implausible that claimant 'sought entry into Switzerland in whole or in part to avoid Nazi persecution.'"

E. "Postwar Attempt: Claimant stated that he or she attempted to enter Switzerland after May 9, 1945."

F. "No Statement of Detention, Abuse or Mistreatment: Claimant did not state that he or she was detained, abused or otherwise mistreated while in Switzerland as a refugee. Claimants were given the opportunity to describe their experience in Switzerland in a telephonic interview with a Claims Conference caseworker."

G. "Withdrawals: Claimants stated in writing or a telephonic interview that they wanted their application to the Swiss Refugee Program withdrawn."

H. "Embassy or Consulate Invalid: Claimant stated that a request for permission to enter Switzerland was made in a city or country where there is no record of an active Swiss Embassy or Consulate."[201]

[201] The Claims Conference obtained a list of Swiss embassies and consulates, which showed the city and opening/closing dates of the various Swiss diplomatic offices throughout Europe. See Swiss Federal Department of Foreign Relations (Eidgenössisches Department für auswärtige Angelegenheiten), 1798-1998, Zwei Jahrhunderte Schweizer Aussenvertretungen: Two Hundred Years of Swiss Representation. On the basis of this list, the Claims Conference recommended, and the Special Masters and thereafter the Court agreed, that a claim based upon an alleged effort to obtain a visa in a Swiss embassy or consulate that was known not to have existed at the place and time specified by the claimant was to be rejected.

I. "Not Born at Time of Attempt: Claimant provide[d] a description of his or her family attempting to enter Switzerland that occurred before the claimant's date of birth."

J. "Loss of Contact: Claimant [did not] respond[] to multiple attempts to contact [him or her] by phone or in writing over a period of several months."

K. "Claimant Deceased and No Known Heir: Claimant died after submitting the application and there [were] no known surviving heirs."

L. "Failure to Fulfill the Requirements of Heir Application: Claimant [did] not submit[] the required documentation to complete the Heir Application to the Swiss Refugee Program."

M. "Not a Member of a Target Group: Claimant did not declare membership in one of the target groups nor did [he or she] attest to … membership in a target group in response to supplemental communication."

After conferring with the Special Masters, the Claims Conference recommended and the Court approved a total of 1,313 refugee claims for denial.[202]

With respect to the IOM, in its submission of June 29, 2004 ("Group VII"), a total of 273 refugee claims were recommended for denial. The IOM explained that the claimants had not "declare[d] their membership in one of IOM's Swiss Banks target groups nor did they attest to their membership in a target group in response to IOM's supplemental communication. Other claimants did not allege that they attempted to enter Switzerland to escape persecution because of their target group, nor did they provide information about their Swiss refugee experiences following IOM's supplemental communication."[203] After conferring with the Special Masters, the IOM recommended and the Court approved a total of 504 refugee claims for denial.

[202] See Claims Conference Final Statistics, April 12, 2010.

[203] For similar reasons, the IOM recommended denial of 472 refugee claims in its April 12, 2005 submission ("Group XI"); 13 claims in its December 5, 2005 submission ("Group XIII"); 11 claims in its February 22, 2006 submission ("Group XVII"); and 8 claims in its May 22, 2007 submission ("Group XXI").

V. POST-SCRIPT: SWITZERLAND REVISITS ITS EXPULSION DIRECTIVES

Many Swiss have reflected on whether their country really was such a "full lifeboat" during the years of Hitler's rule that it could not take on any additional passengers. Some raised those questions at the time when it mattered most: during the Holocaust. Not all of the Swiss authorities who interacted with refugees believed that the only option was expulsion. Like many others in Switzerland, a number of officials, acting at considerable risk to their careers and livelihood, defied orders and instead chose to help refugees. "[C]onfronted with the refugees' distress on a daily basis," they "expressed revulsion about the increasingly brutalised methods applied on both sides of the border...."[204]

One such official was Paul Grüninger, "the police captain of St. Gallen, who had a long record of opposition to the hardline stance of the federal authorities. With some of his men, he actively assisted refugees after the border was closed in August 1938 … It is estimated that he saved up to a thousand or even more Jewish refugees from Austria. By the end of 1938, however, as rumours and accusations against him began to multiply, his superiors withdrew their protection, which cost Grüninger his job, his career and his reputation."[205]

As Yad Vashem has said of Grüninger, to "legalize the refugees' status, he falsified their registration, so that their passports showed that they had arrived in Switzerland before March 1938, when entry into the country had been restricted…. Gr[ü]ninger, the policeman who decided to break the law, turned in false reports about the number of arrivals and the status of the refugees in his district, and impeded efforts to trace refugees who were known to have entered Switzerland illegally. He even paid with his own money to buy winter clothes for needy refugees who had been forced to leave all their belongings behind…. [After the] Germans informed the Swiss authorities of Gr[ü]ninger's exploits … he was dismissed from the police force in March 1939… In March 1941 the court found him guilty of breach of duty. His retirement benefits were forfeited, and he was fined and had to pay the trial costs... Ostracized and forgotten, Gr[ü]ninger lived for the rest of his life in difficult circumstances. Despite the difficulties, he never regretted his action on behalf of the Jews. In 1954 he explained his motives: 'It was basically a question of saving human lives threatened with death. How could I then seriously consider bureaucratic schemes and calculations.'"[206]

In 1971, St. Gallen declared Paul Grüninger's behavior to have been "morally correct." In the same year, he was honored by Yad Vashem as one of the "Righteous Among Nations."[207] He died the next year, in 1972. He was pardoned posthumously by a Swiss court in 1995.[208]

Years after his death, Switzerland enacted a law intended to exonerate others who had undertaken risks of the kind assumed by Grüninger. In January 2004, this "new law took effect … pardoning Swiss citizens who were penalized — even jailed — for helping Jews escape from Nazi Germany, nearly six decades after the fact and too late for many who died with the burden of misplaced shame…. The new law acknowledge[d] that these so-called offenders 'acted out of altruism' and many 'fell into total misery after their condemnation,' according to comments by the Swiss Federal Council…." Those affected, or their families, were given five years to seek to have their court records cleared (although there was no provision for compensation).[209]

Others who sought to thwart Swiss refugee restrictions included Carl Lutz, who arranged for "Schutzpasses" which provided some degree of protection to Nazi victims in Budapest. There were also National Councillors such as Paul Graber and Albert Oeri, who had ardently disputed the notion that the "boat" was "full."[210]

In Bregenz, Swiss consular employee Ernest Prodolliet "helped several thousand refugees enter Switzerland, ignoring the federal authorities' regulations." During disciplinary proceedings against him, during which he was instructed that "'[o]ur agency is not there to assist Jews,'" he stated that his "'principle was always to help…. In addition, authorities operating from within Switzerland also sought to assist with rescue efforts. A recently-discovered effort undertaken by the "Bernese Group" has been recognized by the United Nations at its Geneva headquarters in its "Passports for Life" exhibition. Polish diplomats based in Switzerland, including the Polish ambassador to Switzerland, "Aleksander Ładoś, his deputy Stefan Ryniewicz, consul Konstatnty Rokicki and deputy consul Juliusz Kühl as well as Abraham Silberschein, a Polish-Jewish lawyer and Rabbi Chaim Eiss, an orthodox Jewish activist," issued "hundreds of illegally obtained Latin American passports" and smuggled them to Jews throughout occupied Europe.[212] The operation rescued hundreds of Nazi victims despite the fact that Swiss police authorities "detained for questioning at some point" the various members of the Bernese Group.[213]

It took decades for Switzerland to reconsider the plight of some of its citizens who had assisted Jewish refugees. Monique Eckmann, a scholar of Holocaust education in Switzerland, has called this "soft denial." [214] An aspect of this "soft denial" was that "not only were their actions criticized in Switzerland, but that their rehabilitation and recognition came so late."[215] Thus, in 2011, Switzerland announced that "it had finally finished the process of rehabilitating more than a hundred people punished during WWII for having helped Jews escape Nazi persecution. But only one of the 137 people vindicated by the report actually lived to see their name cleared." That person was Aimée Stitelman. In 1945, she was sentenced to 15 days' detention "for having helped 15 Jewish children who were fleeing the Nazis, some of them orphans, enter Switzerland." The "rehabilitation commission struck down the conviction in March 2004, when she was 79 years old. She died a year later."[216] Ms. Stitelman, who was a

I. THE POST-SETTLEMENT CREATION OF AN "INSURANCE" CLASS

When the class action claims were under discussion for purposes of approval of the proposed Settlement, the matter of Swiss insurance claims was raised. Specifically, an issue arose as to whether there had been effective notice that claims were being released for certain Swiss insurers. In the absence of a mechanism to pay valid Holocaust-era insurance claims as part of the distribution of the Settlement Fund, the appropriateness of a release was discussed. In response, counsel for the defendant banks and counsel for the plaintiff class entered into negotiations. These discussions resulted in modifications to the Settlement Agreement to provide for a mechanism to compensate certain insurance claims. The parties agreed to the de facto creation of a sixth class of beneficiaries. These individuals would be entitled to file claims against the participating insurance carriers, Swiss Re and Swiss Life. The claims process was to be funded through a $100 million program created by the infusion of an additional $50 million in cash to the settlement fund by the two insurers, as well as the allocation of $50 million of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund for insurance claims.[1]

Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement provided that the insurance carriers participating in the Settlement (Swiss Re and Swiss Life, referred to as the "Participating Insurance Carriers" or the "PICs") and the Settlement Fund each were to be responsible for one-half of insurance award payments.

As set forth in Amendment No. 2:

> The Settlement Fund and the Participating Insurance Carriers will each be responsible for one half of the amount awarded on valid Policy Claims for the first $100 million (up to a cap of $50 million for the Settlement Fund, on the one hand, and up to a cap of $50 million for the Participating Insurance Carriers, collectively, on the other hand) . . . If valid Policy Claims exceed $100 million, either the Settlement Fund will pay any amounts in excess of the first $100 million or valid Policy Claims will be paid pro rata within the combined cap of $100 million. Under no circumstances will the Participating Insurance Carriers collectively be responsible for more than $50 million, and . . . all Releasees other than the Participating Insurance Carriers will have no liability for Policy Claims.

[1] See generally In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d 139, 160 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

> All Looted Assets Claims including those relating to insurance policies will be paid exclusively from the Settlement Fund.[2]

Subsequently, when it became clear that the number of insurance claims was lower than anticipated, the parties revised the Settlement Agreement, so that the insurance program would cover up to $50 million in payments, $25 million of which was to be paid by the insurance carriers and $25 million by the Settlement Fund.[3]

The PICs and their affiliates were listed in Exhibit 1 and Exhibit 1A to Amendment No. 2 and were named "Releasees" under the Settlement Agreement.[4] Three other Swiss insurance companies were not released under the Settlement Agreement: Basler Lebensversicherung Gesellschaft, Zürich Lebensversicherung Gesellschaft, and Winterthur Lebensversicherung Gesellschaft. None of the latter three companies participated in the claims process under the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund. Instead, Basler worked informally with the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" (created in 2000 primarily to address claims relating to slave labor), and Zürich Leben and Winterthur both were members of the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims ("ICHEIC").[5]

In the Swiss Banks Settlement insurance process, claims were invited for the following types of policies issued or guaranteed by the PICs and their affiliates listed in Exhibit 1 and 1A to Amendment No. 2: life; annuity; endowment; and education/dowry policies, if purchased in the period from 1920 to 1945. As true for all classes under the Settlement Agreement with the exception of Slave Labor Class II, the categories of potential beneficiaries were pre-defined. The policyholder, insured, beneficiary or heirs to the policy had to have been "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution", i.e., Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled Holocaust victims.

Information about the insurance process was included in the worldwide outreach program for the overall distribution process. The initial filing deadline was September 30, 2001. As in the case of bank account claims, several court orders extended the filing deadline until December 30, 2004. Further, pursuant to a proposal by Swiss Re, and in tandem with the publication of additional account owner names following post-settlement litigation, on January 13, 2005 a list of 36 Holocaust-era insurance policyholders was published (the "2005 List"). For these 2005 List accounts, claims were accepted until July 13, 2005. As indicated on the CRT's website, "[t]he 36 Holocaust-era policyholders on the List had insurance policies that were issued in Germany, Austria, Hungary and Poland by the Austrian insurer Der Anker that, because of special circumstances [i.e., the fact that Swiss Re had issued guarantees on each of these Austrian Anker policies], are covered by the Swiss Settlement."[6]

II. INSURANCE CLAIMS GUIDELINES AND PROCESS

A. The Insurance Guidelines

On June 12, 2001, counsel for the respective parties agreed to the Insurance Claims Process Guidelines (the "Guidelines"), in which they established a claims process and procedures. The introduction to the Guidelines stated:

> Where applicable, the procedures set forth in the Guidelines shall guide the conduct of all of the parties and the Claims Evaluator … that has been designated by the Court to process insurance claims. The parties are committed to follow the letter and spirit of the Guidelines in good faith.[7]

Because the Zurich-based Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) already had been selected to administer the Deposited Assets Class claims process on behalf of the Court, the parties recommended, and the Court agreed, that the CRT also should administer the insurance process.

Pursuant to the Guidelines, the CRT performed an initial review of each claim to determine whether the claim was complete. In cases where key pieces of information were missing, a CRT staff member contacted the claimant for more information. Once all of the information was assembled and logged into the CRT's database, the claim was copied for submission to the relevant insurance company.

The CRT's role in reviewing insurance claims differed from its role in the bank account claims process. The bank account claims process was administered largely by the CRT, which matched the claims against the available lists of possible Holocaust-era bank accounts, and evaluated the claims. The insurance claims process, however, provided that insurance claims were to be submitted for analysis to the PICs (Swiss Re and Swiss Life). The companies, not the CRT, were supposed to control the matching, research and final determination of claims. The Guidelines set forth a search protocol for the PICs to follow.[8] All research was carried out at the PICs' headquarters. The CRT had no right of direct access to the research process. During the negotiations, the PICs had indicated that they had, and would continue to review, databases in their archives containing names of policyholders, insured persons and beneficiaries.

B. Commencement of the Insurance Claims Process

Following the Court's approval of the Settlement Agreement and Amendment No. 2, the CRT began receiving insurance claims filed directly with the Swiss insurance claims program. While processing these so-called "direct claims," the CRT identified many claims to policies issued by non-Swiss insurance carriers, or by Swiss insurance carriers that did not participate in the Settlement Agreement (i.e., Swiss insurers that were not named in Exhibit 1 and 1A to Amendment No. 2). In light of the information provided by the claimants regarding the companies that issued their Holocaust-era policies, it was clear that many of these claims should have been filed with ICHEIC. Similarly, ICHEIC informed the CRT that it had a number of claims identifying the Swiss PICs, and those should have been filed directly with the CRT.

[8] See Guidelines Tabs 3-5.

The CRT and ICHEIC therefore agreed that claims received by the CRT that named insurance companies participating in ICHEIC should be forwarded to ICHEIC for analysis, unless ICHEIC already had received a claim from the same claimant relating to the same policyholder. The CRT, in turn, agreed to accept ICHEIC claims naming the PICs and the affiliates listed in Exhibit 1 and 1A to Amendment No. 2. Based upon this agreement, starting in September 2002, the CRT forwarded 121 claims to ICHEIC, and ICHEIC forwarded 1,295 claims to the CRT.[9]

In total, the CRT received 2,080 claims: 785 claims filed directly with the CRT (including late claims) and 1,295 forwarded by ICHEIC. The CRT sent all insurance claims, both direct claims as well as those received from ICHEIC, to the Swiss PICs for matching and research. Subsequently, the CRT resubmitted certain claims for further research. Certain late claims and claims to policies on the 2005 List were forwarded to the PICs thereafter, so that ultimately 2,050 claims were sent to the PICS.

The PICs recommended that the CRT forward certain claims to the another entity that was processing Holocaust-era insurance claims, the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation"), and the CRT sought to do so. The section that follows provides a brief background of the German Foundation, and describes the provisions for the CRT's referral of insurance claims to the German Foundation.

C. Impact of Other Insurance Claims Processes

Beginning in 1998, several class action lawsuits were filed in the United States against German companies arising from their use of slave and forced labor during World War II, and the aryanization of properties.[10] Claims were asserted not only by Jewish slave laborers, but also by [9] ICHEIC used a different definition of "victim" in its claims processes than did the CRT, which followed the Settlement Agreement. ICHEIC did not limit victim status to membership in one of the five "victim or target" groups defined by the Settlement Agreement. Consequently, the CRT had no jurisdiction over certain claims forwarded to it by ICHEIC. These claims were returned to ICHEIC.

[10] Aryanization has been described as follows: "As early as 1933, Jewish businessmen were being made to sell their companies. During the first few years, however, the firms were mostly left in peace by the authorities. The owners were free to decide to whom they would sell and the selling price was agreed between the two parties. Even if they were based at the time on the agreement of both parties, such take-overs cannot be termed non-Jewish forced laborers primarily from Poland, Ukraine, and other parts of Central and Eastern Europe. In March 2000, the United States and German governments agreed on the terms of an approximately $5 billion global settlement of these claims, and the German Bundestag adopted legislation on July 17, 2000 creating the German Foundation.

The German Foundation identified ICHEIC as the official conduit for all insurance claims. Under Article 1(4) of the German Foundation legislation:

> The Federal Republic of Germany agrees that insurance claims that come within the scope of the current claims handling procedures adopted by the International Commission o[n] Holocaust Era Insurance Claims ("ICHEIC") and are made against German insurance companies shall be processed by the companies and the German Insurance Association on the basis of such procedures and on the basis of additional claims handling procedures that may be agreed among the Foundation, ICHEIC, and the German Insurance Association.[11]

Claimants seeking recovery for policies issued by a German insurance company were instructed to file their claims through ICHEIC. The deadline for filing claims under that process was December 31, 2003.

The Claims Processing Guidelines negotiated by the parties in connection with the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement provided for the referral of claims to the German Foundation for German market and looted policies:

'fair deals' without closer investigation. The contracts were not drawn up on a legal basis and under free-market conditions. Instead, the situation was one in which the Jewish businessmen were under great pressure to sell. Furthermore, in view of the currency and tax restrictions it was difficult to use the income from the sale… From the middle of 1936 on, sales contracts had to be submitted to … regional economic advisors ... Towards the end of 1937, pressure on large firms in particular increased, and from 1938 on take-overs had to be approved by the authorities. At this stage it was possible to sell a firm only at a price well below its real value. Economic persecution turned a new corner after the annexation of Austria … in March 1938, when within a few weeks thousands of Austrian companies were 'Aryanised' or liquidated. This 'uncontrolled Aryanisation' was followed by state regulation and an organized 'Aryanisation' which manifested the state's economic interest. The authorities imposed an 'Aryanisation tax' … and tried to ensure as great a margin as possible between the amount paid to the vendor and the actual sale price, the difference being paid into the state coffers." FINAL REPORT OF THE INDEPENDENT COMMISSION OF EXPERTS SWITZERLAND-SECOND WORLD WAR 322-323 (Pendo Verlag GmbH 2002) (available at https://www.uek.ch/en/schlussbericht/synthesis/ueke.pdf) (also known as the "Bergier Commission").

[11] Agreement Between the United States and Germany Concerning the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future," U.S.-Ger., art. 1(4), July 17, 2000, T.I.A.S. No. 13104 ("German Foundation Legislation"), Article 1(4).

> The Guidelines primarily address Policy Claims, but also provide for research of claims that are covered under the European national foundation initiatives, such as the German Foundation Initiative that covers German market insurance claims and looted asset claims. Such research shall be conducted on the same terms as the research of the claims covered by the Settlement, except that the results of the research of such claims shall be provided to the appropriate European national foundation initiatives for them to resolve.[12]

However, Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement contradicted the Guidelines on this point. Section 17.3 of Amendment No. 2 indicated that looted assets claims relating to insurance policies were to be paid exclusively by the Settlement Fund, not by any other programs (such as the German Foundation), but apparently with no contribution to be made by the PICs.[13]

Ultimately, and despite lengthy negotiations, ICHEIC, the German Foundation, and the German Insurers Association (Gesamtverband der Deutschen Versicherungswirtschaft or "GDV") did not accept many claims from the CRT.[14] To ensure that elderly Holocaust victims (and heirs) were not prejudiced by procedural requirements that may have been misunderstood, particularly those not under the Court's control and not subject to judicial oversight, Judge Korman determined that those claims should be analyzed by the CRT. In the interest of equity, if awards were warranted, they would be paid by the Settlement Fund.

III. CRT INSURANCE RECOMMENDATIONS, DECISIONS AND APPEALS

For each insurance claim submitted to the Court for payment, the CRT had determined the validity of the claim based on the following factors: (1) the claimant had made a plausible [14] For a more detailed discussion of the negotiations surrounding this issue, see Memorandum from CRT to Hon. Edward R. Korman (Oct. 11, 2006) (regarding "Chairman Eagleburger's letter of September 11, 2006"), annexed to Letter from Hon. Edward R. Korman to Lawrence S. Eagleburger, ICHEIC Chairman (Oct. 27, 2006). ICHEIC Chairman Eagleburger responded to Judge Korman in a December 22, 2006 Letter expressing appreciation for the decision to allow the CRT to "process and potentially make payment" on four insurance claims. Chairman Eagleburger noted that the "confusion surrounding this category of claims stemmed from ICHEIC's misunderstanding that the list of 71 claims the CRT sent to ICHEIC included only CRT direct claims. We did not realize that this subset included claims that were originally submitted to ICHEIC and which ICHEIC had forwarded to the CRT for matching to Swiss insurance companies' records." Letter from Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Chairman, ICHEIC, to Hon. Edward R. Korman (Dec. 22, 2006).

showing that the policyholder, beneficiary and/or insured person was a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution," (2) documentary evidence existed of an insurance policy issued or guaranteed by a PIC or PIC affiliate (with the exception of the German Foundation cases discussed below), (3) the claimant was plausibly related to the policyholder, beneficiary and/or insured person, and (4) the CRT, sometimes contrary to the PIC's recommendation, had determined that neither the policyholder, beneficiary, insured person, nor heirs had received the proceeds of the policy, or that this should be presumed in the absence of contrary evidence.[15]

The Court ultimately approved six "batches" of insurance decisions recommended by the CRT. Each batch presented unique issues and revealed that the Guidelines did not (and perhaps could not) take into account the myriad questions that would arise in what was supposed to be a relatively straightforward process. In many cases, the CRT had to analyze these questions independently, while at the same time adhering as closely as possible to the Guidelines. In the end, the claims process interwove the Guidelines with the more general equitable principles the Court had adopted as part of the bank account claims process. As a result, claimants often benefited from application of more liberal inferences intended to compensate for the destruction of records and the passage of so many decades since the Holocaust.

The first two groups of insurance awards consisted entirely of those recommended by the PICs. These were valued according to the historical policy values that the PICs had assessed. The first group was for a single case in which the ailing claimant had made an urgent request that his claim be processed so that any award could be applied to his medical costs. The second group was for awards in which the claimants themselves had provided policy documents. In only some of those cases did the PICs state that they had located corresponding records in their own archives.[16]

In the third batch of decisions, certain issues arose that had not been addressed in the Guidelines. In the absence of specific direction under the Guidelines, the CRT recommended, and the Court approved, an interpretation that was more favorable to claimants than the parties had negotiated: (1) by accepting claims into the insurance process that otherwise would have been barred; and (2) by valuing many policies at higher levels than indicated under the Guidelines.

A. Acceptance of Additional Claims

In 2005, the CRT made various attempts to forward certain claims to the German Foundation, ICHEIC and the GDV. These organizations did not accept the claims for processing, however. They contended that the CRT sought to transfer these claims after ICHEIC's filing deadline, even though the claims had been timely filed by the claimants. To ensure that the affected claimants would not be penalized by bureaucratic obstacles, with the Court's permission, the CRT initiated its own review of all of the German Foundation referral claims. As a result, the CRT was able to recommend an additional group of awards that otherwise would have been barred from review under any of the Holocaust-related insurance claims processes then available.[17]

In approving the CRT's recommendations, the Court summarized the issue as follows:

> In requesting this payment, the CRT notes that 38 of the 54 Awards and all 13 Award Denials involve 64 claims that were recommended for referral to the German Foundation … because the two Swiss insurance carriers participating in the Settlement, Swiss Re or Swiss Life, and/or their member components, (1) identified a definite, probable, or possible match to a policy issued or guaranteed by a German company; (2) because either the Swiss insurance companies or the CRT found evidence suggesting that the policies had been previously paid out or surrendered (including possible looted policies); or (3) because the claimed policy was purchased in Germany or the policyholder was domiciled in Germany. According to the CRT's Insurance Processing Guidelines, claims falling into these categories are to be treated by the German Foundation. Some of these 64 claims were filed directly with the CRT, while others were filed with [ICHEIC], which then forwarded the claims to the CRT for matching to Swiss insurance > carriers. After the matching results from the Swiss insurance carriers showed that the claims belonged to one of the three categories listed above, the CRT sought to forward and/or return the claims to ICHEIC, which acts as the official conduit for all insurance claims filed pursuant to the German Foundation Agreement. ICHEIC, however, has refused to accept these claims for processing, because the CRT sought to transfer the claims to ICHEIC after ICHEIC's filing deadline, even though the claims themselves were timely filed by the claimants. The CRT recommends approval of the Awards and Award Denials at this time so that payments to the affected claimants are not delayed by bureaucratic obstacles, and suggests continued negotiations with ICHEIC to recoup payments, as appropriate.[18]

B. Valuation Issues

The process for valuing insurance policies under the Guidelines was complex, and also varied from the rules adopted in the bank deposit claims process. For example, the Guidelines indicated that:

> As necessary, insurance actuaries shall calculate the cash surrender value of a given policy at a given point in time. The cash surrender value is based on the face value of the policy, the term of the policy, the amount of time for which the policyholder paid the premiums, and a formula that may be contained in insurance company records or deduced from existing cash surrender value/premium free value charts.[19]

There were 11 steps to this calculation in the Guidelines. However, the PICs generally did not provide adequate information to enable the CRT to utilize this process. The value, term and date of issuance of policies was unknown in many cases; the length of time that the policyholder paid the premiums and the country of issue also sometimes were unknown. Further, information about loans taken against the policies was not usually available. Consequently, absent any other guidance on value, where a policy was awarded at a known value, the CRT employed the net cash surrender value if the policyholder survived the Holocaust. The CRT used the face value if the policyholder had perished.

[18] October 27, 2006 Order at 1-2. ICHEIC did not reimburse the claims that had been paid at the recommendation of the CRT.

[19] Guidelines Tab 6 at 2 n.4.

Furthermore, in contrast to the Court's processes for the Deposited Assets Class, in which the CRT was directed to apply "presumptive" (average) values where the bank documentation did not indicate the amount held in the account, the Guidelines lacked comparable valuation rules for Swiss Re cases where the policy documents contained insufficient information upon which to calculate an award. For these Swiss Re cases, the CRT recommended that all payments for policies of unknown or low value be based upon the Guidelines applicable to Swiss Life. These rules provided that where valuation documentation did not exist, imputed values, so-called Tier 2a values (calculated at US $11,284.25 if the policyholder perished in the Holocaust) and Tier 2b values (calculated at US $10,784.25 if the policyholder survived) would apply.

According to the Guidelines, the calculation basis for Tier 2a payments was an imputed reduced face value of RM 3,073.56, plus an add-on of US $500.00.[20] Tier 2b payments were based on an average imputed net cash surrender value of RM 3,073.56, without any add-on.[21] Tier 2a applied if the policyholder "perished in a concentration camp." Tier 2b applied if there was no evidence that the policyholder perished. These values were derived from "322 policies listed in the emigrants' lists," according to the Guidelines.[22] However, the CRT was given no further details on these 322 policies, or the emigrants' lists. The Guidelines contained the currency conversion values to be applied for the conversion of various currencies, including Reichsmark, into US dollars. The exchange rate for 1.00 Reichsmark was listed as 0.2807 US dollars. According to the Guidelines, if the actual (documented) value of an award was below the imputed or presumptive values, then the documented value was to be awarded.

By contrast, under the Court's rules governing deposited assets, if the actual value of a bank account was lower than the presumptive value for that type of account, the award was increased to the presumptive value. The historical record demonstrated that Nazi victims' assets were looted on an unprecedented scope. Thus, in the face of the banks' destruction of records,

[20] According to the Guidelines, Tab 5b, the Tier 2a value was the "[i]mputed reduced face value [of] the sum of the average net cash surrender value of all net cash surrender values of the 322 policies listed in the emigrants' lists: 3,073.56 RM plus an add-on of USD 500 (post valuation)."

[21] According to the Guidelines, Tab 5b, the Tier 2b value was the "[a]verage imputed net cash surrender value: the sum of the average net cash surrender value of all net cash surrender values of the 322 policies listed in the emigrants' lists: 3,073.56 RM."

and absent documentary evidence to the contrary, the Court directed the CRT to assume that a given account had been looted. For insurance claims, the Court adopted the same approach used in the bank account context, applying an "adverse inference" in favor of claimants.[23] As a result, plausible insurance claims that satisfied other criteria under the Guidelines were guaranteed a minimum award of US $10,784.25.

In accordance with this approach, many of the awards in the first and second groups were amended in the third group, so as to increase the award amount to Tier 2a and 2b values.[24]

In addition to the approvals, the third group of decisions contained the first set of "No Match Letters" ("NMLs") informing the claimants that the PICs had not located any policies that matched their claims. With respect to ICHEIC claims sent to the CRT, these generally did not receive NMLs. Instead, ICHEIC was responsible for notifying these claimants that their claims had been closed. In a handful of cases, because of direct contact between the ICHEIC claimant and the CRT, the CRT issued an NML to an ICHEIC claimant. Given the CRT's lack of access to the insurers' archives, the Court determined that claimants would not have the right to appeal NMLs, as there was no evidence available to the CRT from which to reassess the insurers' determinations.

[23] Because the banks had destroyed relevant information, the CRT recommended and the Court authorized the application of a standard presumption under U.S. law, the adverse inference. The burden of proof essentially would be shifted away from the claimant, to compensate for the banks' massive destruction of records that otherwise might have proven the fate of the account and/or its value. The Settlement Fund in effect was now standing in the shoes of the bank defendants. The application of the adverse inference meant that as long as some record existed to show that a Holocaust victim had owned a Swiss bank account, the Settlement Fund would compensate a plausible claim, even in the absence of data conclusively demonstrating the fate of the account. For a more detailed discussion of the "adverse inference," see chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process."

[24] See October 27, 2006 Order at 2 (noting that 11 awards in the "third batch" consisted of "additional payments to claimants who previously received expedited payments based on their Swiss insurance claims. In orders dated April 13, 2005 and May 31, 2005, the Court recommended expedited payments to 15 claims that had been matched by the Swiss insurance carriers. Based on the valuation calculation for the [German Foundation] Awards, the CRT recommends that 11 of these 15 payments that fall below the presumptive values set forth for Tier 2 payments in the Insurance Guidelines be increased to the Tier 2 presumptive values").

C. Insurance Companies Other than Swiss Re and Swiss Life

In the fourth group of cases, the CRT recommended decisions relating to claims that had been filed for policies published as part of the 2005 List, as well as policies issued or guaranteed by Swiss Re affiliates Vita Kotwica and Union Re. The claimants on the Vita Kotwica and Union Re policies originally had filed their claims with ICHEIC, which then forwarded the claims to the CRT for matching to Swiss insurance carriers. Each claimant previously had received a so-called "humanitarian" payment from ICHEIC in the amount of $1,000 each. These "humanitarian" ICHEIC payments were somewhat similar to the Plausible Undocumented Awards (PUAs) that the Court had authorized for claimants to Swiss bank accounts (but differing in the amount: Plausible Undocumented Awards were issued at $7,250 each).[25]

The fourth insurance program submission also included claims that the CRT had received after the filing deadline of December 31, 2004. Although technically barred under the Guidelines, with the Court's permission, the CRT nevertheless had forwarded these claims to the PICs for matching, but the PICs advised that they had not located any matches.[26]

D. PICs' "Reconsideration" of Prior Recommendations; Last Groups of Decisions

The fifth group of cases that the CRT submitted to the Court included a recommendation for rescission of a claim.[27] The CRT advised that a claimant who had previously received an

[25] A "Plausible Undocumented Award" (PUA) was an award authorized by the Court for a claim plausibly indicating entitlement to a Swiss bank account, but for which bank documentation had not been provided, or was no longer available. Awards originally were set at $5,000 per eligible claimant, an amount which, like most of the payments for other claims and other classes, subsequently was increased by 45% to $7,250. Among the criteria considered in determining such claims were the accounts owner's relationship to Switzerland; efforts made by the claimant or other family members to retrieve Swiss bank accounts prior to the finalization of the Settlement Agreement; and the relationship between the claimant and the account owner. See Glossary: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, HOLOCAUST VICTIM ASSETS LITIG. award, which had been divided among three individuals, should not have been included in that award. The CRT noted "that Swiss Re ha[d] not identified a matching insurance policy in this case; that ICHEIC arguably had the opportunity to treat the claims which [the claimant] filed with that organization; and that, with [a] limited exception … no other ICHEIC claimant ha[d] received an award payment for an Anker policy (including Polish Anker, aka Kotwica) that Swiss Re did not recommend for an award…"[28]

In addition, the CRT recommended, with respect to a different claimant, that upon further review of the documentation, there was "evidence of two life insurance policies" rather than just one, warranting an additional payment of $11,284.38.[29]

Further, the CRT recommended and the Court approved an Award Denial for an insurance policy located by a claimant who previously had received awards for two other policies held at the company Anker. When the CRT submitted this third policy to Swiss Re for review, Swiss Re "stated that its previous recommendation regarding [the claim] had been in error, and that one of the policies previously recommended for payment, as well as the third policy just submitted, were not eligible for payment." The CRT requested clarification. It was advised by Swiss Re that "upon re-examination of the documents, it had concluded that none of the policies submitted by [the claimant] were eligible for payment," as these policies supposedly were "non-guaranteed 'Kotwica' policies" ineligible under the Guidelines.[30] Swiss Re further advised the CRT that a different claim was similarly affected by this determination. However, the CRT recommended that the Court leave intact the prior awards, "as the Claimants have already received payment in accordance with Swiss Re's earlier recommendation." On the other hand, the third (newly submitted) policy had to be denied, in light of Swiss Re's reconsideration of the earlier policies. [31]

The sixth and final group of insurance decisions submitted to the Court included awards for policies issued by La Nationale Vie (Paris), a company that appeared in Exhibit 1 to Amendment No. 2 as an affiliate of Swiss Life. The policy documents in these cases were submitted by the claimants. ICHEIC forwarded these claims to the CRT with specific reference to La Nationale Vie's inclusion in Exhibit 1. However, Swiss Life asserted that La Nationale (Paris) was not a Swiss Life affiliate. Because Swiss Life previously had indicated that La Nationale (Paris) was an affiliated company, and also due to the impossibility of returning these claims to ICHEIC, the Court approved the awards.[32]

The sixth group of decisions also contained certain awards for policies issued by Vita Kotwica for which the awarded claimants already had received so-called "humanitarian payments" from ICHEIC.[33] The previous $1,000 ICHEIC payments were deducted from the CRT awards.

Additionally, the sixth group included claims matching to lists containing only the surnames (and occasionally the first initials) of policyholders who held policies guaranteed by Union Re, a Swiss Re affiliate in Germany. Swiss Re did not recommend that any of these be awarded, but indicated that they were "possible matches." Because of the lack of other identifying information in the policy documents, a number of these policies had "multiple plausible matches" ("MPM"s) to previously awarded claims filed by claimants who were unrelated to each other.[34] As with claims to Swiss bank accounts, the Court approved these MPM awards, determining that these additional claims were just as plausible as the previously [33] In its "8A2" Eastern European humanitarian payments process, ICHEIC reviewed certain named company claims for policies written by insurance companies in Eastern Europe that had been nationalized or liquidated since the Second World War and for which no present-day successor could be identified. In these cases, there was uncertainty as to which company or claims processing entities had responsibility for the portfolio in question. As a result, ICHEIC authorized eligible claimants to receive $1,000 as a "humanitarian" payment.

[34] As discussed more fully in the chapter entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process," the CRT determined that there was a "multiple plausible match" ("MPM") if the relatives of two or more unrelated claimants plausibly matched the account owner, based upon the usually limited information available in the bank records and other documentation. In such cases, the award was divided pro rata among all of the plausible claimants.

awarded claims. Further, because Union Re was a German market insurer, these cases would have been suitable for referral to the German Foundation.

Finally, the sixth group of decisions included a return of a payment, initiated at the instance of the claimant himself. Following notification that his award to an account published on the 2005 List had been approved, the claimant located additional archival information about the actual policyholder. This information led him to conclude that his relative and the policyholder were not, in fact, the same person. The claimant graciously advised the CRT that he did not consider it appropriate to accept payment. The CRT subsequently was able to locate the policyholder's actual relative (his granddaughter), who then received the award.[35]

In nearly all of the six groups of awards, the CRT recommended and the Court approved payment on policies closed after the date of Nazi occupation or control of the policyholder's country of residence — usually contrary to the recommendations of the PICs. In these cases, the CRT determined that, although there was reason to suspect that the surrender value may have been paid, the evidence also strongly suggested that the policies were looted. The policyholders, who were Jewish, lived in the Reich or in Nazi-occupied or allied countries. The policies were surrendered during this period of Nazi control, before the policyholders fled or were murdered, and thus the assets likely were turned over to Nazi authorities under duress. For the same reason, the CRT also recommended and the Court approved payment for claims for which the policy documentation included receipt of payment signed by either the policyholder or beneficiary, if that person resided at the time in the Reich or in a Nazi-occupied or allied country.

In awarding such policies, the Court applied the same principles that governed the bank account claims process. That the policy appeared to have been "paid" and closed out did not demonstrate that the rightful owner had been allowed to keep the proceeds. Rather, given that the "surrender" took place under Nazi occupation, and absent evidence to the contrary, the historical reality was that the policy likely was "surrendered" under duress – and the proceeds handed over to Nazi authorities – as the direct result of persecution.

E. Insurance Appeals Process and Decisions

Unlike the Court's rules governing the processing of Deposited Assets Class claims, the Insurance Guidelines did not provide for a mechanism for appeals, nor did the Guidelines establish criteria to guide the review process. Instead, the Guidelines provided for the Court, through the CRT, to establish an appeals mechanism: "the Claims Evaluator may elect to create an internal review process through which a party that receives an adverse decision may appeal."[36]

The CRT thus drew upon procedures established for bank account claims, including Article 30 of the CRT Rules relating to appeals ("Claimants … may appeal … to the Court through the Special Masters within ninety days of the date of the letter accompanying the decision"); summary denials ("Appeals submitted without either a plausible suggestion of error or relevant new evidence may be summarily denied"); and requests for reconsideration ("Claimants possessing documentary evidence that was not previously presented to the CRT … may request that the CRT reconsider its decision on the claim. A request for reconsideration shall be sent to the CRT within 90 days of the date of the letter accompanying the decision").[37]

The CRT received nine insurance appeals and one request for reconsideration. Most of the appeals challenged the amount of the award. As the decisions either had followed the mechanisms the settling parties had adopted under the Guidelines or, in the absence of specific direction, generally applied principles more favorable to claimants, most of the appeals were without merit, and thus were denied.

For example, in the case of In re Gaston Weill, the PIC that had identified the matching insurance policy initially found no evidence of a match in its policy number records. However, after the claimant submitted a 1941 letter from La Suisse insurance company addressed to his father, policyholder Gaston Weill, regarding an insurance policy numbered 88.798, the PIC subsequently informed the CRT that "the additional documents ... allowed us to find evidence of a policy," and recommended payment. The La Suisse policy document provided by the claimant informed the policyholder that because previous letters had remained unanswered and the policyholder had failed to make payments, the policy amount had been reduced to 2,527.00 Swiss Francs, the "capital réduit" or reduced capital amount.

The claimant received an expedited payment in May 2005 in the amount of $7,328.89. This amount was derived from the "capital réduit" converted to U.S. dollars using the 1941 exchange rate of USD 1.00 = SF 4.31, or $586.31. The latter sum then was increased by a factor of 12.5, in conformity with the 12.5 multiplier then applied to Deposited Assets claims (as opposed to the lower multiplier of 10 provided under the 2001 Insurance Guidelines, an amount that the Guidelines, unlike the CRT Rules for bank account claims, did not adjust). Following the Court's order of October 27, 2006, the claimant received a second payment of $3,455.49, to bring the total award up to the average value calculated under "Tier 2" of the Guidelines. Although the Guidelines did not provide for such an increase where the "actual" value was lower than the "average" value, the Court applied the more liberal valuation mechanisms used for bank account claims. Accordingly, the payment to the Weill claimant was greater than that provided under the Guidelines.

The Weill claimant challenged his award on two grounds. First, he stated that the CRT should not have based the award on the reduced "capital réduit" of 2,527.00 Swiss Francs, because it would have been illegal for the policyholder to continue to pay premiums to a Swiss company during the Nazi era. The claimant contended that it was forbidden to transfer funds to Switzerland and to own insurance policies issued in other countries. The punishment for breaching these laws was deportation to the death camps. Second, the claimant contended that his father had owned a second insurance policy, which he said was not reflected in the 1941 document described above. Because the PIC did not locate the first (documented) policy until after the claimant came forward with independent evidence of its existence, the claimant believed that the company's lack of documentation for the second policy should be viewed with suspicion.

The appeal was denied. As to the first contention — that the "capital réduit" was too low, because the owner was prevented from making payments under Nazi policies — assuming that this was the case, there was no available evidence to show what the actual value of the policy would have been, even if the owner had been able to pay the premiums. For that reason, the Insurance Guidelines provided for application of "average values" where actual values could not be determined. However, under the Guidelines alone, the claimant would have been awarded the lower known value (the "capital réduit"), rather than the higher average value amount that the CRT had recommended to establish some level of parity with the bank account claims process. Thus, the "capital réduit" did not diminish the amount of the award. The claimant received the same sum he would have received had valuation data not been available.[38]

As to the second contention — that the award should have taken into account a second insurance policy — the Guidelines provided for payment only on the basis of documentation plausibly demonstrating the existence of a policy. Since documentation of a second policy was not available in the Weill case, the Guidelines did not allow payment, and the appeal was denied.[39]

In another case submitted for consideration on appeal, In re Martin Berwin, the claimant had received an award of $12,474.62. This amount was calculated based upon the known surrender values of the policy as of 1938 (RM 994.70 and SF 3,150.00), amounts then converted to U.S. dollars for a total of $1,000.03. That sum then was adjusted upward by the 12.5 multiplier. From the resulting total of $12,500.38, the amount of $25.76 was deducted from the award (resulting in the payment of $12,474.62), to reflect that nominal restitution on the policy had been paid under Germany's post-War restitution statute, the BEG.[40]

[40] Id. at 7. In 1953, following negotiations with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the Federal Republic of Germany enacted its first Holocaust compensation statutes, collectively known as the "BEG" (Bundesentschädigungsgesetze). The program, which was administered by German authorities, provided for compensation for wrongful death, disability, injury to health, incarceration, and damage to

The prior restitution was significant because under the Guidelines and Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement, policyholders who had previously received restitution for a claimed policy were not authorized to receive any payments for insurance claims from the Settlement Fund. Paragraph 17.1 of Amendment No. 2 (relating to Swiss insurance policies) specifically excluded payment where "prior recovery was obtained pursuant to" a "law or regulation enacted after World War II that did not discriminate against Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution."[41] The BEG fell within the latter category. Therefore, even the minimal payment received from the German government for the Berwin policy would have barred compensation, under a strict reading of Amendment No. 2. However, at the CRT's recommendation, the Court determined in its October 27, 2006 Order that given the "gross discrepancy" between the value of the policy and the amount restituted, previous restitution would not preclude an award from the Settlement Fund.[42] Rather, the BEG payment was deducted from the award as an offset.

On appeal, the claimant requested that the CRT consider a claim to an additional policy not covered in the award. Specifically, the claimant asked whether the CRT "would look into the GERMAN NORDSTERN INSURANCE claim, which [was] filed at the same time and with the same documents of identification, payments of premiums, name of insurance agent and address of company. Although a token payment of less than 10% of the claimed loss (ca. RM 36 000) was paid out as part of the Restitution settlement (again, all data given for your files) it in no way represented a fraction of the loss suffered through the 1939 confiscation of Jewish policies."

Nordstern, however, was a German insurance company, not a Swiss PIC. Therefore, it was not included under the Insurance Guidelines, nor was it covered by the Settlement Agreement. Claims for Nordstern policies were to be filed with ICHEIC. The Berwin claimant had filed an ICHEIC claim, and had received a determination from ICHEIC. Accordingly, the Court did not have jurisdiction to analyze the Nordstern claim, and the appeal was denied.[43]

Finally, in In re Rona Kohn, the PIC located an insurance policy that contained only the last name of the policyholder, "Cohn," but did not contain information sufficient to reach a definite identity determination. The policy also contained no information as to its value. Taking into account spelling variations (including the fact that the claimant identified the name "Kohn," whereas the policy was held by someone named "Cohn"), the CRT determined that there was more than one plausible claim to this policy. In accordance with the procedures utilized in the Deposited Assets claims process for "multiple plausible matches" (MPMs), each claimant was informed that the "CRT has recommended and the Court has concluded that in cases in which the identity of the policyholder cannot be precisely determined due to the limited information contained in the policy records, and in which several unrelated claimants have established a plausible relationship to a person with the same name as the policyholder, the award will provide for a pro rata share of the full amount of the policy to each claimant." The policy was awarded at the "Tier 2a" average value of $11,284.38. That amount was divided equally between the two plausible claimants, so that each received $5,642.19.

The Kohn appellant objected to the division of the award, stating that she was the only heir to Ferenc Kohn (a.k.a. Ferenc Róna). She provided various inheritance documents that she had filed with her original claim. However, the insurance policy contained only the last name of the policyholder: "Cohn." The CRT did not conclude that "Ferenc Kohn" had another heir but, rather, that a second, unrelated, claimant also had plausibly identified a relative named "Kohn" or "Cohn" who owned a Swiss insurance policy located by one of the PICs. Since both claims were equally plausible, both had been properly paid on a pro rata basis, as the Court determined on appeal.[44]

F. Amount Awarded for Insurance Claims

1. Recoupment from PICs

The total amounts recommended for payment by Swiss Re was $395,485.35, for 27 awards covering 30 policies (some awards concerned more than one policy). The CRT recommended payment on, and the Court approved, a considerably higher number of Swiss Re policies: $973,989.08 for 49 awards covering 54 policies. The larger amounts recommended by the CRT corresponded to the Tier 2b presumptive values applied to policies of unknown value. The practice also was in accordance with the decision, in the context of bank accounts, to increase to presumptive value those accounts that were of known value, but below presumptive value, based upon the fact that many of these assets had been looted.[45]

In the case of Swiss Life, for similar reasons, the total amount that the company recommended for payment was $6,363.11, for two awards, whereas the Court had approved total payments for these two cases in the amount of $22,068.75. Moreover, the CRT recommended and the Court approved an additional 21 awards for policies issued by Swiss Life or one of its affiliates, including awards to four policies issued by La Nationale Vie Paris, which Swiss Life had not approved because it considered that entity not to have been an affiliate. The total approved by the Court for Swiss Life awards was $447,788.94.

Ultimately, both Swiss Re and Swiss Life agreed to reimburse the Settlement Fund for 50% of the larger amounts respectively awarded; i.e., each agreed to pay for one-half of the awards that the CRT had recommended and the Court had authorized, notwithstanding that each company initially had not recommended some of the awards in question. Thus, Swiss Re repaid $486,995 to the Settlement Fund, while Swiss Life repaid $223,894.47. These additional payments were made possible as a result of the Special Masters' ongoing discussions with and assistance from counsel for each of the respective companies. These payments were taken into consideration by the Court as indicative of the companies' good faith cooperation with administration of the Settlement.[46] The amounts were added to the funds distributed to needy survivors under the Court's cy pres remedy for the Looted Assets Class.

2. Amounts Authorized for Payment

The number of insurance claims filed with the CRT and authorized for payment was not substantial, despite the concerns that had been raised at the fairness hearing. Whereas the Court authorized over $726 million for Deposited Assets Class claims, of which nearly $720 million was paid, Insurance Class claims resulted in $1,434,786 in authorized awards, of which $1,400,251 was paid.[47]

Even so, the amount that the Court approved for insurance awards was in excess of the amount recommended for payment by the PICs. There are a variety of reasons for this higher amount, including the more liberal procedures adopted by the Court for valuing policies, the Court's decision to authorize awards for "Multiple Plausible Matches," and the Court's acceptance of German Foundation claims into the process, all with the intention of benefiting claimants even where the Guidelines and procedures negotiated by the parties and implemented by the insurance companies provided for a more restrictive approach.

[47] Not all approved claims could be paid. In some instances, claimants (or heirs) could not be located despite numerous attempts to obtain contact information. Some did not accept payment, and/or they refused to complete required documentation. Authorized but unpaid funds were returned to the Settlement Fund for redistribution to other class members.

I. INTRODUCTION: THE VICTIM LIST PROJECT

In 2000, fifty-five years after the end of World War II, the vast majority of the millions of victims and targets of the Nazis and their allies, both those who perished and those who survived, were still unidentified. Even the approximately 40,000 inmates of Auschwitz whose identity pictures were taken by Wilhelm Brasse, an inmate of German-Polish descent with photographic training, were known only by their prisoner numbers.

But as of 2018, over two-thirds (more than 4.5 million) of the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust have been identified, and individual identity has been returned to millions more, Jews and non-Jews, who suffered.[1] To a great extent, this achievement was due to the Victim List Project of the Swiss Banks Settlement.

The Court's program, which has restored identity to millions, has been widely praised. Holocaust historian and former Deputy Director of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum ("USHMM") in Washington, D.C., Michael Berenbaum, noted that "'[b]y collecting names one by one they humanize and re-identify the people who were supposed to be anonymous…. It essentially defies the wishes of the Nazis that these people die without names and without any identity.'"[2] Former national director of the Anti-Defamation League Abraham Foxman observed that "'[t]he more people we can identify, the more we set for history – for memory – that they existed and perished simply because they were Jews…This is a sacred duty for the victims."[3] Professor and novelist Thane Rosenbaum of the Fordham Law School has pointed out that "'so many of those lives were until recently nameless. Knowing the names surely humanizes that loss.'"[4] World Jewish Congress General Counsel and law professor Menachem Rosensaft, the founding chairman of the International Network of Children of Jewish Survivors, and the author of many works on the Holocaust, has stated: "'We should talk about the fact that every single name that is recovered is an identity of a murdered victim who is not lost to history, and it is important for us to remember.'"

A. ORIGINS AND DEFINITION

The Victim List Project (described as the "Victim List Foundation" in the Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds approved by Judge Korman on November 22, 2000) was intended as a mechanism under the Court's direction to encourage and help organize the compilation and greater accessibility worldwide of the names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement was intended to benefit – Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who perished and those who survived.

The idea of creating a Victim List Foundation, as it was initially called, was recommended by the Special Masters in the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds of September 11, 2000 (the "Distribution Plan").[5] The $1.25 billion Settlement Fund would not be enough to make payments to all Nazi victims, let alone their heirs. It was clear that among the millions of people affected by the actions of the Swiss banks during the Holocaust were many who would not be compensated by the Settlement, either because they had perished or since the end of World War II had passed away, or because of lack of documentation. The Victim List Foundation therefore was intended to benefit all class members, survivors and heirs alike, as defined by the Settlement. The creation of the Victim List Foundation was a way of recognizing them and ameliorating, to some extent, what was of necessity "imperfect justice."

> In researching the number and identities of the members of the Looted Assets and other classes, the Special Master was struck by the lack of a comprehensive list of the names and backgrounds of the victims of the Nazis, living and dead. Partial lists of some Nazi victims exist, but they are scattered, not widely accessible, and only incompletely available to scholars. For many class members, particularly heirs (who, for reasons discussed elsewhere, are too numerous for each to be paid individually), knowledge of their forebears stops at a concentration camp's gates. It would honor the memory of these victims, tangibly benefit all of their heirs and serve as powerful testimony to the horrors of the Holocaust, for a small portion of the Settlement Fund to be set aside to create a comprehensive list, available to all, of all the "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution," and all of their murdered ancestors. For the benefit of the entire Looted Assets Class – indeed, for the benefit of all members of all five classes who may not receive a cash payment under this Proposal – the Special Master recommends that the Court authorize the creation of a Victims List Foundation to collect and make widely available the names of all "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution."[6]

Setting aside funds from Holocaust restitution settlements for projects to honor the dead has been a common feature of such programs.[7] What is especially noteworthy, however, is that by calling for the compiling and making accessible of the names of all Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, the Distribution Plan — as true also for all other aspects of the proposed distribution process — intended to recognize individually each person who had suffered, even if the Settlement could not provide monetary compensation to each victim.

[6] Distribution Plan, Vol. I, at 115-116. The Distribution Plan further observed (at 116 n.343) that an "appropriate starting point in the work of the Victim List Foundation may be the approximately 562,000 Initial Questionnaires [received as of that date, now approximately 600,000], perhaps the largest survey of Nazi victims ever conducted. Permitting scholars to have access to the irreplaceable data contained in the Initial Questionnaires would contribute vital knowledge to the study of the survivor community, as well as their family members killed by the Nazis. Accordingly, the Special Master recommends that when the Notice Administrator has finished its analysis, the Court direct the conveyance of the Initial Questionnaires and the database already created from them, to the Victim List Foundation. The Court should provide an opportunity for those who filled out Initial Questionnaires to withhold them from the Victim List Foundation if they so choose." The Initial Questionnaires were conveyed to the USHMM by Order dated February 6, 2008, with terms of access established by order dated April 24, 2012.

The "Victim List Foundation" was a way to benefit residual categories of claimants while preserving the names, one by one, of as many of the victims or targets as possible. As described in the Distribution Plan:

> [I]t is proposed that a separate allocation of $10 million be designated for the benefit of … the members of all five classes, including heirs, to fund a Victim List Foundation to compile and preserve the names of all of the "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution," those who survived and those who perished. In this way, perhaps some benefit of the settlement can be preserved not only for the victims and their families, but also for future generations.[8]

The Court, which noted that no listing of the Victims and Targets of Nazi persecution existed, approved the Distribution Plan on November 22, 2000, and the Court of Appeals upheld the Court's decision on July 26, 2001.[9] As a result, of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund, a total of $10 million (0.8%) originally was set aside for the Victim List Project. All other funds were earmarked for individual payments to the Holocaust survivors (and certain heirs) who comprised the five classes designated under the Settlement Agreement: the Deposited Assets Class; the Looted Assets Class; Slave Labor Class I; Slave Labor Class II; and the Refugee Class. When the claims processes for all five classes were virtually complete and the Court determined that certain residual funds remained, the Court allocated most of these funds to programs assisting needy survivors under the "Looted Assets Class" mechanisms. The Court also increased Victim List Project funding by an additional $4.5 million, for a total of $14.5 million.[10] This 45% increase was consistent with the 45% increases that the Court previously had authorized for the five settlement classes.[11]

The Victim List Project was to be directed toward locating and recording the names of those specifically defined under the Settlement Agreement as "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution": those who were or were believed to be Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled. Names have symbolic importance, and there is a general tendency to find hidden significance in the names of persons. Historically, names have played a major role in remembrance in Western culture:

> Lost names: we are told in Isaiah (56:5) that "I shall give them an everlasting name," and inscribed on Commonwealth military cemeteries are the words, "Their names liveth forevermore." Names do not always live on, though, and these statements are best read as a call to remember. Names can be forgotten, never remembered in the first place, or changed. In these ways they become one of memory's hollows. Why does this particular silence of memory matter so? Why does the passing of names into oblivion leave one of those concave impressions, as an imperfection in our experience of the world? Plainly, names individuate us by identifying our family lineage and by giving us individually an identity within that lineage. They are the markers that separate us out, that help to preserve us from a faceless, unindividuated existence. At the same time, they serve as placeholders for our biographies, for the wholeness of our lives...The annihilation of the physical person destroys one seat of his unity and wholeness; the forgetting of his name condemns him to a deathlike absence...
> In ancient Greece, Hades was seen as a place for humans without names…[12]

Because of interest and tax benefits accruing to the $1.25 billion settlement fund, the Court was able to pay claimants more than that amount: a total of $1,284,604,443 was distributed to Holocaust victims and heirs. The $14.5 million allocated to the Victim List Project represented 1.1% of that sum.

[12] WILLIAM JAMES BOOTH, COMMUNITIES OF MEMORY: ON WITNESS, IDENTITY, AND JUSTICE 76-77 (Cornell Univ. Press 2006).

Names continue to play a major role in remembrance – recently, for example, in the 9/11 Memorial, which memorializes the names of all of the victims of that terror attack.[13]

In Judaism, to which remembrance is so central,[14] names have traditionally been of great importance and are thought to reveal the essence of one's being. Historically in Judaism, remembering the names of the dead was the responsibility of the family, not of the community. The dehumanization of their Victims and Targets by the Nazis and their Allies included the taking away of names,[15] and the enormity of the Holocaust was such that it altered Jewish patterns of remembrance towards communal remembering of the names of the dead. As described by Avner Shalev, the Chairman of the Directorate of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority of Israel:

> After the Holocaust, the ingrained Jewish tradition of remembrance faced an enormous challenge. Existing patterns of commemoration and mourning were called into question due to the unprecedented scale of the disaster, the depth of the trauma and the unique experience that had shattered relations between Jews and the rest of the world — an experience that undermined the fundamental values of human society. The futile nature of the mass murders gave rise to difficult questions with regard to human nature. The need to remember cried out to heaven.

> The Nazis sought to murder the Jews, and obliterate every memory of them. This not only changed the scale and scope of the murder, but also called for a new kind of remembrance. As such, from the very beginning of Holocaust commemoration, alongside the need to document the event itself, Yad Vashem recognized the importance of collecting and recording the names of the victims — to perpetuate the memory of every single person who died.[16]

Established in 1953, Yad Vashem began in 1954 to fulfill its mandate to preserve the memory of Holocaust victims by collecting their names and biographical details, specifically by collecting Pages of Testimony. Submitted by survivors, relatives or friends, Pages of Testimony contain the names, biographical details and, when available, photographs, of the victims. From its beginning, the central task of Yad Vashem has been to create a memorial of names, and this is reflected in the institution's own name: "And to them will I give in my house and within my walls a memorial ... an everlasting name [a 'yad vashem'], that shall not be cut off" (Isaiah, chapter 56, verse 5). As described on the American Society for Yad Vashem's web site, "The Pages of Testimony in Yad Vashem in Jerusalem stand as symbolic 'mazevoth' for the martyred Jews. The victims deserve to be remembered not as cold, anonymous numbers but as individual human beings. These Pages of Testimony preserve the unique identity and personal dignity that the murderers tried so hard to obliterate."[17]

Yad Vashem's attempt to compile its Pages of Testimony and present the names of the Jewish victims of the Nazis and their allies was the largest of the Jewish memorial efforts, but it was not the only one. Nor were other compilation efforts limited to Jewish victims, or only to those who had perished. Yad Vashem's compilation was, however, the obvious place to turn when the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (the Volcker Committee) needed to compare lists of Swiss bank accounts with the names of Holocaust victims.

In 1992, Yad Vashem began to computerize its Pages of Testimony. By 1997, it was envisioning the creation of an "integrative data-bank" that would include databases of names from different sources in addition to the Pages of Testimony, such as deportation lists, lists of prisoners from the camps, testimonies, and publication and other sources from within and outside Yad Vashem. The focus was exclusively on the names of those who had perished, and was seen as part of Yad Vashem's moral and legal mandate as the official authority for commemoration and research on the Holocaust, and its consequent duty to commemorate the names. But such an "integrative data-bank" was far from being a reality.

On June 1-3, 1997, Yad Vashem hosted a first international workshop to discuss the gathering, documentation and computerization of the names of the victims – i.e., those who perished – of the Holocaust.[18] In the course of 1997, Paul Volcker, head of the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons, as well as Swiss Ambassador Thomas Borer, head of the "Switzerland-World War II" Task Force, and others involved in the issue of the Swiss bank accounts, visited Yad Vashem.[19] In the various discussions of Holocaust-era assets in the late 1990s, it began to be clear that a listing or listings of Nazi victims would be useful for matching against various property lists. Thus, when in January 1998, Representative Eliot Engel introduced the Holocaust Victims Insurance Act (H.R. 3121) to the United States House of Representatives, it included a directive to the USHMM to produce a registry of Holocaust victims so that names could be checked against policies.[20] In a convergence of interests, in the beginning of 1999, the Swiss Bankers Association and the World Jewish Congress provided $8 million to Yad Vashem to computerize the Pages of Testimony and other documents to provide a list of Holocaust victims to the Volcker Committee, which was trying to track unclaimed Jewish assets in Swiss banks.[21]

With only three months to produce such a list, Yad Vashem engaged in mass hiring so as to create a team of some 1,200 data entry clerks, software technicians, Holocaust scholars and other specialists who worked in large temporary spaces in the Jerusalem suburb of Givat Shaul and in Beersheba. Some 50,000 of the Pages of Testimony were fed through two high-speed scanners every day, while 14 groups of data entry clerks in Jerusalem and Beersheba keyboarded in details from the handwritten pages after their high-resolution scanned images appeared on the computer screens. The time pressure from the Volcker Committee encouraged Yaacov Lozowick, then Director of Archives at Yad Vashem, and his colleagues to think not only in terms of mass data entry, but also in terms of mechanization of the entire intellectual process. Thus, a system of checks was devised whereby whenever a surname or place name was entered for the first time, the record was electronically sent up a hierarchy of specialists, who checked it against master lists compiled in many languages. The time pressure also prompted Yad Vashem to first create an Excel list of documents beyond the Pages of Testimony that also contained lists of names that the institution had collected – an initial "list of lists." Yad Vashem also entered into cooperation with other repositories to acquire lists of names.[22]

The Volcker Committee also used lists of names from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM) and elsewhere, but it was this mass computerization of names by Yad Vashem that proved most valuable in matches with those lists of bank accounts that the Swiss banks permitted to be accessed. As a result, then-Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Stuart E. Eizenstat – who at the time was also the U.S. Special Envoy for Property Claims in Central and Eastern Europe, reporting to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of State – recommended to Kenneth Klothen, Executive Director of the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States, that the Yad Vashem database be used for matches with lists of American dormant accounts.[23]

By the year 2000, Yad Vashem had developed not only some experience with the mass digitization of names, but also a desire to make the results available to the general public over the internet. This was conceived, however, as primarily making the Pages of Testimony available, and as a database specifically reflecting the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust. Just as the work for the Volcker Committee was ending, on May 8, 1999, in cooperation with the President of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman, Yad Vashem began a major campaign to collect additional Pages of Testimony, which was successful primarily in Israel.[24]

Thereafter, as part of the Swiss Banks Settlement distribution process, it was recognized that compilation of all the names of the Victims and Targets of the Nazi regime was a means of recognizing individually all who had suffered.

After establishing and overseeing the initial phases of the claims process for the five settlement classes, four of which directly engaged the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) as one of the Court-appointed administrative agents, the Special Masters sought the assistance of the Claims Conference to implement the "Victim List Foundation." The Claims Conference, which in the 1950s had founded Yad Vashem in cooperation with the Government of the State of Israel, by the 1990s had been the principal funder of Holocaust-related archives worldwide. The Claims Conference ensured that overall coordination of and cooperation among the various repositories would be established. Moreover, coordination and cooperation were specifically necessary for work on archival name lists relevant to documenting survivors as eligible to receive compensation under another compensation program negotiated and implemented at approximately the same time as the Swiss Banks Settlement: the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation").[25]

In mid-2003, the Claims Conference hired Wesley A. Fisher as Director of Research, with the understanding that in addition to handling archival and related issues for the Claims

The payments were the culmination of years of effort to compel the governments and businesses of Germany, Austria, Switzerland and several other European nations to acknowledge their use of slave and forced labor during World War II, and the benefits they derived from the victims' labor. Conference, he would separately report to the Special Masters and to the Court for the organization and implementation of the "Victim List Foundation."[26]

To avoid any confusion and to make it clear that all activities regarding names were under Judge Korman's supervision, it was decided to substitute the word "Project" in place of "Foundation."

By the fall of 2004, the Victim List Project could be described as follows:

> The Victim List Project of the Swiss Banks Settlement
>
> Under the direction of Chief Judge Edward R. Korman of the United States District Court, the Victim List Project of the Swiss Banks Settlement encourages and helps organize the compilation and greater accessibility worldwide of the names of individuals whom the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement is intended to benefit – Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, and physically or mentally disabled or handicapped victims of Nazi persecution, those who perished and those who survived – for research and remembrance.
>
> $10 million of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund has been reserved for the following types of activities under the Court's direction:
>
> - Location and identification of archival and testimonial sources of the names of those who perished and of survivors who suffered;
> - Improvement of access to archival repositories containing names;
> - Projects to digitize names, to place them on the internet, and to integrate them with further information about the individuals concerned and with other relevant information;
> - Broad-based cooperation among the leading relevant institutions towards these aims.
> The Court has appointed Dr. Wesley A. Fisher as Executive Director. In consultation with experts in the collection or digitization of the names of Victims

[26] Dr. Fisher, whom Judge Korman on June 1, 2004 formally appointed Executive Director of the Victim List Project, had previously been a member of the senior Founding Staff at the USHMM Museum (USHMM). His responsibilities included the archives and the international archival acquisition program of the USHMM, the Benjamin and Vladka Meed Registry of Holocaust Survivors, research activities – including the USHMM's work on the Swiss Banks issue - and international relations generally. He was deputy director of the 1998 Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets and helped create the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research (renamed in 2013 the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance). Prior to joining the staff of the USHMM, he had been Assistant Director and Director of Soviet Programs for the International Research & Exchanges Board (IREX) under the aegis of the American Council of Learned Societies (ACLS) and responsible for virtually all United States contacts with the Soviet Union in humanities and social sciences, and in this connection had opened archival cooperation between the two countries.

Reig, and consequently to Judge Korman. At the Court's request, the [Claims Conference] is providing technical and administrative support.
> At present priority concerns are the establishment of large-scale database containers that can accommodate the disparate types of lists of Jewish and non-Jewish Victims or Targets of Nazi persecution and the establishment of a comprehensive integrated catalog of all lists, not only historical-archival lists but also "testimonial" lists such as those resulting from the 600,000 questionnaires received in regard to the Swiss Banks Settlement itself. The Court understands that due to privacy and other considerations, it may not be possible to make all information public immediately.[27]

During the following decade, the Victim List Project fulfilled the Court's aims. In doing so, it was the catalyst for substantial changes in Holocaust studies and related fields.

II. AN ABUNDANCE OF ARCHIVES AND OF LISTS

The Nazis never created a central list of their victims. Prior to the Victim List Project, such fragmentary lists as existed had been only partially identified, and had not been brought together. Some lists were from documents from the period 1933-1945, while others dated from after World War II. While some lists were from historical-archival documents, others were registers of testimonies or surveys conducted for memorial functions, or in conjunction with reparations and restitution payments or social services or court procedures. A number of lists had been published prior to 2004, and there were numerous disparate projects to digitize lists of names.

The most prominent of the attempts to compile and present lists of victims of the Nazis and their allies for memorial purposes was the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem. Memorial lists were also to be found in the Yizkor (Memorial) Books published by former residents, or landsmanshaften, of communities in Central and Eastern Europe as a tribute to their former homes and the people who were murdered there during the Holocaust. The Yizkor Book Project of JewishGen, affiliated with the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York City, had begun to translate and digitize information from these publications. In a number of instances, major archival repositories in Europe had published and were digitizing memorial lists of names: e.g., the German Bundesarchiv's "Gedenkbuch" that reported the results of research into the fate of every Jew from West German territory.[28]

In addition to memorial lists of those who perished, there were lists of survivors. In particular, the USHMM in Washington, DC was maintaining a digitized Survivors Registry based on the records of the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors,[29] but which also went beyond those records to include any Jews and non-Jews who suffered from 1933 to 1945. The USHMM defined a survivor as "a person who was displaced, persecuted, and/or discriminated against by the racial, religious, ethnic, social, and/or political policies of the Nazis and their allies between 1933 and 1945. In addition to former inmates of concentration camps and ghettos, this includes refugees and people in hiding."[30]

Among other sources of lists of survivors, the restitution settlements beginning in the late 1990s had generated large numbers of documents that, in effect, were current surveys of survivors. Thus, applications in regard to the Swiss Bank Settlement, including the more than 600,000 Initial Questionnaires filed when the settlement was first announced, the slave labor settlement that resulted in the German Foundation, and other such settlements, also constituted lists of victims or targets of Nazi persecution.

The largest collection in the world of names of victims or targets of Nazi persecution was held by the International Tracing Service in Arolsen, Germany ("ITS"), which was administered by the International Committee of the Red Cross and governed by an International Commission of government representatives of eleven member-states.

Complicating matters further, historical-archival lists also were to be found in more than 1,000 repositories in over 40 countries around the globe.[31] As of the beginning of 2004, there were 34 institutions worldwide involved in projects to digitize names.[32]

There were a number of features of existing victim lists and of projects to collect, digitize and make them accessible that were noted at the time:

1. Many historical documents were not originally created with regard to a definition of victims or targets of Nazi persecution, nor did they always indicate the fate of victims.

2. For many cases of Nazi persecution, historical documentation was lacking, or had not to date been located.

3. Reports after the fact, such as testimonies and applications for reparations or restitution, were valuable resources, but were subject to error and to falsification.

4. It was not possible, as a result, to construct a definitive list of all victims. It was possible to make documentation available on the basis of which researchers would be able in time to determine, in accordance with given definitions, the identities of the victims of Nazi persecution.

5. Existing lists of victims, in particular memorial lists, tended to be of one ethnic or religious group only.

6. Lists of Jewish victims were more developed than lists of non-Jewish victims.

7. Privacy laws, particularly in Europe, restricted public access to the identity of victims and information about them.

8. Although it had been seventy years since the end of World War II, there were ethical concerns regarding public access to information regarding certain victims (e.g., hidden Jewish children who were adopted by non-Jewish families).

[31] As part of the general cooperation among Holocaust-related archives promoted by the Claims Conference in what became known as the International Shoah Archivists Forum, a listing of all relevant archives worldwide was compiled, primarily with the assistance of the USHMM and Yad Vashem. That listing has since formed the basis for the survey of Holocaust-related archives carried out by the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure (EHRI), resulting in a listing of 1,938 archival institutions in 51 countries. See https://portal.ehri-project.eu/ (last visited June 15, 2017).

[32] See Memorandum from Wesley Fisher, Exec. Dir., Victim List Project, to Judah Gribetz & Shari C. Reig, Special Masters (Oct. 7, 2003) (listing memorials and museums primarily in Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, Germany, Israel, Italy, Netherlands, Poland, Switzerland, and the United States).

9. Many archival repositories took a proprietary view of the documentation in their possession and would not release it to the public.

10. Even if there were no other obstacles to the collection of all information in one place, the large number of lists would make it difficult for the digitizing of names to be done by a single institution. In any event, distribution of digitization projects with linguistic and other specific expertise was desirable to best ensure accurate capture of name records.

A universal list of all victims and targets of Nazi persecution therefore was not possible. What was possible was to construct a worldwide informational tool that would direct the researcher to where information about an individual could be found. In other words, it was possible to create a searchable central database of names on the internet that would permit the user to then connect to the variety of databases created around the world for memorial or other purposes, and to locate information on how to contact those repositories that were closed or not digitized. In this manner, countries and individual repositories would be able to filter what researchers could see, in accordance with privacy laws and other considerations.

Such a central database was not to be a remembrance list in and of itself, but rather an electronic "library" of information that would permit the eventual identification and recording of the name of each victim or target of Nazi persecution. It would make possible, for the first time, the study on the individual level of mass events that involved millions of people, as well as the accounting for each and every person.[33]

Four institutions had particularly large collections and/or had programs to copy archives, including name list documentation, from around the world:

- International Tracing Service in Bad Arolsen, Germany: Created by the Allies during World War II, the International Tracing Service in Bad Arolsen, Germany was the largest repository of relevant names, with over 200 million pages of documentation with a Central Name Card Index of over 50 million entries concerning over 17.5 million persons victimized by the Nazis and their allies. It was governed by an International Commission of 11 states and administered by the International Committee of the Red Cross. It was, however, at the start of the Victim List Project virtually a closed archive.

- Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, Israel.

[33] Id.

- The USHMM in Washington, D.C.: As an agency of the United States Government, the USHMM had successfully helped to open previously sealed government archives in some 40 countries.

- Mémorial de la Shoah/Centre de documentation juive contemporaine, in Paris, France: The CDJC had been collecting names from throughout the world since its founding in 1943.

Given the difficulties of access to the International Tracing Service, and the fact that the Mémorial de la Shoah was cooperating closely with the USHMM, it was determined to ask the two institutions that collect lists and archival documentation most broadly from other repositories all over the world to be the leading institutions for the Victim List Project: Yad Vashem and the USHMM. The possible creation of a central search engine or connecting point between these institutions was left for consideration at a later time. The two institutions signed a formal agreement to cooperate, and the USHMM agreed to be responsible for non-Jewish names in addition to working with Yad Vashem on Jewish names, with an emphasis on Jewish survivors.

A. "List of Lists"

To proceed in an orderly and comprehensive fashion, the creation of a worldwide catalog of all known archival and testimonial sources, regardless of where held, of the names of those who perished and of survivors who suffered – a list of lists – was a necessary prerequisite to fulfilling the goals of the Court. A goal was set to do this by the 65th anniversary of the end of World War II in 2010. Funding under the Victim List Project made possible the compilation and presentation of such a unified catalog of all relevant name lists. Yad Vashem and the USHMM reviewed their respective collections, shared information on their holdings, and created catalogs that as much as possible included lists known to be held by other institutions.

On July 31, 2006, Yad Vashem made images of some 11,650 archival lists, indexed from about 1 million pages of documentation, available to the public online as part of its Shoah-Related Lists Database (see http://www.yadvashem.org/yv/en/resources/lists/index.asp). The imaged lists at the time contained some 5 million names with a relatively small amount of overlap, so that the number of individual persons covered was fewer, but still close to 5 million. A total of 40,868 researchers visited the Shoah-Related Lists Database in the first 5 months that it was made available, over twice the number visiting the Yad Vashem archives in person. The database of the lists was made searchable by various parameters such as geography, chronology, identity of the listed individuals and provenance of the documents. The scanned lists were made viewable online. Essentially this was the beginning of making scans of Holocaust-related archives available over the internet.

Similarly, the USHMM developed a presentation entitled Holocaust Name Lists Catalog Search that has since been made part of what is now called the Holocaust Survivors and Victims Database (http://www.ushmm.org/remember/the-holocaust-survivors-and-victims-resource-center/holocaust-survivors-and-victims-database). This catalog of name lists contains entries not only of lists in archival documents, but also of lists published in books and of lists in digitized form. While copies of most lists are or are expected soon to be in the collections of Yad Vashem and/or the USHMM, entries in the catalog refer also to lists held by other institutions. As of March 2016, the USHMM had 34,415 lists in its database.[34]

Yad Vashem and the USHMM have worked to include in their joint catalog of the lists in their respective collections those lists known to be held by other institutions. This comes close to the goal of establishing a much-needed worldwide, unified, "list of lists" of all sources of all types of the names of the victims of the Nazis and their allies, both those who perished and those who survived.[35] The catalog, which now comprises tens of thousands of lists, is updated daily. The opening of the International Tracing Service (see below) also has greatly increased the number of lists, as does the ongoing acquisition of copies of new archival materials by the two institutions.

[34] While many lists are mixed, there are lists that are specifically of victims of one particular type (Jews, 19,659; Jewish Survivors, 730; Roma, 344; Jehovah's Witnesses, 497; Homosexuals, 511; Disabled, 16). B. Acquisition of Specific Large-Scale Name Documentation

1. Background

Most of the name lists acquired by Yad Vashem and the USHMM come from the continuing process of acquisition of archival documentation from repositories around the world. These acquisition efforts are primarily funded by the Claims Conference and are largely focused on Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Partly as a result of the Swiss Banks Settlement, there is now greater willingness and greater ability on the part of both institutions to acquire historical files documenting confiscation of property that also are sources of the names of victims. In addition to written documentation, lists are acquired from miscellaneous sources, such as photographs, testimonies, Righteous Among the Nations case files,[36] information on artifacts, various card files, synagogue plaques and the like.

However, for certain sources of large-scale name documentation, the Court's authority, whether through funding or otherwise, was an important factor in obtaining access. These materials included the following:

- Lists resulting from the Swiss Banks Settlement itself and deposited with the USHMM.
- Lists resulting from the opening of the International Tracing Service, Bad Arolsen, the largest repository of the names of victims of the Nazis and their allies. These lists consist of incarceration records; slave and forced labor records; and the records of the displaced persons camps and are primarily focused on Western Europe.
- Lists from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee copied by the USHMM.
- Lists of those who survived in the Soviet Evacuation.
- Information on lists resulting from other compensation and restitution programs.

[36] By law, Yad Vashem's obligations include conveying the gratitude of the State of Israel and the Jewish people to non-Jews who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust. A public Commission headed by a Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Israel examines each case and is responsible for granting the title of "Righteous Among the Nations." See The Righteous Among the Nations, YAD VASHEM, http://www.yadvashem.org/righteous.html.

2. Acquisition of large-scale name documentation: Swiss Banks Settlement records

It was recognized that much of the documentation resulting from the Swiss Banks Settlement itself was of historical interest and helpful to the compilation of names. In particular this is true of the approximately 600,000 Initial Questionnaires (IQs), but it is also true of some of the other records resulting from the Settlement.

In 2007, Judge Korman thus authorized the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to transfer to the USHMM the claim files and related documentation pertaining to the IOM's role as the court-appointed administrator of Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II and Refugee Class claims filed by Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members. This included files of claims submitted by non-Jewish claimants directly to the Holocaust Victim Assets Program (Swiss Banks) ("HVAP") and utilizing claim forms designed specifically for the HVAP classes. This group of documents also consisted of claims submitted to the German Foundation's "German Forced Labor Compensation Program" ("GFLCP"), where the claimants had indicated that they intended those claims forms to serve as Swiss Banks (HVAP) applications as well. These materials were of historic importance and constituted in effect the largest survey of Roma and other non-Jewish survivors ever done.[37] Access to the GFLCP/HVAP overlap claim materials was established in accordance with German access standards and approved by the Court.[38]

In addition, in 2008 Judge Korman authorized transfer to the USHMM of the more than 600,000 Initial Questionnaires (IQs) that were filed in response to outreach efforts intended to effectuate worldwide notice of the settlement, and to solicit background information from potential class members. The IQs essentially constituted the largest survey of Holocaust survivors ever made.

Similarly, in 2011, Judge Korman authorized its administrative agent for the Deposited Assets Class claims process, the Claims Resolution Tribunal in Zurich (CRT), to transfer to the

USHMM the claims documentation and related materials held in Zurich.[39] "All three sets of materials were shipped to the USHMM under conditions establishing the USHMM as custodian of the documentation on behalf of the Court; protecting the security and confidentiality of the documents; and recognizing the need to establish rules to protect claimant privacy while ensuring the eventual accessibility of the documents to researchers and others as part of the Victim List Project's ongoing mission to collect victim names, and more broadly to contribute to the scholarship of the Holocaust, which after more than seventy years still remains incomplete."[40]

Special Master Judah Gribetz, Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig, and Victim List Project Director Wesley Fisher consulted with representatives of the USHMM in order to formulate and recommend appropriate access rules to the Court. This resulted in Judge Korman's approval in 2012 of access rules for the IOM claim files, Initial Questionnaires and CRT claim documentation transferred to the USHMM.[41]

The rules, which were intended to be consistent with existing international and U.S. privacy protections, provide that through the year 2020, claimants and legal successors, upon written request to the USHMM, may receive copies of their claim forms and other documents related solely to their claims. In the event that a bona fide researcher requests access to such materials, the USHMM will assess the request; determine whether the requested materials are "indispensable" to the research project; provide a recommendation to the Court; and upon obtaining Court approval, will redact personal and confidential information before providing the requested documents to the researcher. Beginning in 2021, the USHMM may remove access restrictions on claim files of individuals whose death has been proven by acceptable documentation, subject to redaction of personal and confidential information. The USHMM may transmit such materials to interested parties including bona fide researchers, subject to possible limitations upon publication or other use of the materials. Beginning in 2041, all access restrictions may be removed by the USHMM; however, bona fide researchers will be required to agree not to use or disclose personal or confidential information. In 2081, all access restrictions to the materials may be removed. The Court retains sole discretion to interpret and/or modify the access rules.[42]

3. Acquisition of large-scale name documentation: International Tracing Service records

The Court helped make possible the opening of the International Tracing Service, the most extensive collection of Holocaust-related archival name lists in existence, and the provision of electronic copies of the vast holdings of the ITS to the USHMM, Yad Vashem, and other repositories.

The archive, located in Bad Arolsen, Germany, for decades was the largest closed Holocaust archive in the world, containing information on approximately 17.5 million victims of Nazism, both Jews and non-Jews. In 2004, the Executive Director of the Victim List Project began to work closely with the USHMM and the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance, and Research (later renamed the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance or IHRA) to ensure that the 11 nations of the ITS governing board would ratify an agreement to open the collection. This effort succeeded in 2007. Dr. Fisher, on behalf of the Swiss Banks Settlement, participated in the working meetings regarding the digitization of the collections. Victim List Project funds provided by the Court to the USHMM became the contribution of the United States to the overall copying of the collections.[43]

To date, over 191 million digital images have been transferred by the ITS to recipient institutions in the nations on the ITS governing board. The primary recipients of this data are the USHMM, for the United States, and Yad Vashem, for Israel. Both institutions have been working with the ITS on cataloging and creating finding aids necessary for name extraction to proceed.

[43] Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 26, 2007). In the 1950s Yad Vashem had received copies from the ITS of some of the lists regarding Jews, and as a result Israel initially did not consider the newly-opened ITS collection to be of highest priority. This changed, however, when it became clear how vast the ITS collections were and how much material Yad Vashem did not have at the time.

Electronic copies also have been transferred to institutions in Poland, Luxembourg, Belgium, France, and the United Kingdom. The ITS itself has been transformed into a research institution and is no longer under the administration of the International Red Cross. To date, the transfers include copies of the entire "incarceration" section of the ITS archives; the entire "wartime/forced labor" section; over 3 million Displaced Persons ("DP") registration cards; the half-million DP case files in the "postwar" section of the ITS archive; and the entire Central Name Index ("CNI"), which consists of over 40 million cards. It is expected that eventually, over 200 million digital images will have been transferred by the ITS.[44]

4. Acquisition of large-scale name documentation: American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) records

With the Court's support,[45] the USHMM worked with the JDC to copy and make accessible the thousands of name lists held by the JDC Archives Jerusalem, which constitute one of the few remaining large collections of historical-archival name lists from the period of the Holocaust as such. These lists also are being made available to Yad Vashem. "The JDC's rescue work during World War II and afterwards generated massive numbers of name lists, in particular of Holocaust survivors, not only in Western and Eastern Europe and the form[er] Soviet Union, but also in Africa, Asia, and the Middle East…. Through its regional offices in Europe and its network of engaged activists, the JDC was in a unique position to collect information from all over Nazi-occupied Europe, often by secret courier, with lists of names of those in dire need. After the war, the JDC continued its assistance program by helping to resettle stranded Jewish refugees and Holocaust survivors and rebuild Jewish communities. Here, too, lists of names played a vital role in the distribution of aid."[46]

5. Acquisition of large-scale name documentation: Soviet Evacuation Records

The largest category of survivors whose names are not known are those Jews and others who fled east in the Soviet Union to the Urals, Siberia, Central Asia, and elsewhere. With the Court's support,[47] the USHMM and Yad Vashem have worked together to identify and copy hundreds of thousands of pages in the relevant archives so as to fill this gap in the historical record. The Executive Director of the Victim List Project has participated in extensive negotiations with the governmental archives of Russia, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan for the scanning and digitization of the principal card catalogs and lists for the Soviet evacuation. Pending establishment of appropriate access, the Victim List Project has supported Yad Vashem with its digitization of documentation concerning the Soviet evacuation.[48]

6. Acquisition of large-scale name documentation: Other collections

With the Court's support, the USHMM microfilmed and acquired historical-archival lists of names of victims or targets of Nazi persecution not readily accessible, including a name card index and judicial files documenting the persecution of homosexuals and other non-Jewish groups, documentation of the mentally disabled, and registration records for Jewish refugees in Central Asia.[49]

Under the guidance of the Executive Director of the Victim List Project, a draft catalog was produced of all of the known archives of compensation, restitution, and reparations organizations. Although the almost 200 sources listed hold materials that are not open due to privacy considerations, it was important for the sake of completeness that Yad Vashem and the USHMM possess such a catalog for future reference. While the holdings of such sources are primarily valuable in regard to those who survived, it is likely that, as in the case of the Initial Questionnaires of the Swiss Banks Settlement, historical information on those who perished also may be found in these documents.[50]

III. A BROAD RANGE OF VICTIMS

The Swiss Banks settlement was premised in large part upon the value of claims to Swiss bank accounts, most of which were owned by Jewish Nazi victims. Therefore, to ensure that the Settlement Fund would not be unduly diminished by an overwhelming number of claims, the Settlement Agreement negotiated by the parties defined "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" as Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims, necessarily omitting certain victim groups – notably Poles, Soviet Prisoners of War, and Slavs. For the Victim List Project, as a practical matter, victim categories were less significant, partly because of some parallel separate projects on those groups and partly because the historical-archival lists (e.g., camp lists) rarely divide persons into different groups. Much more important was the fact that the Court's definition was inclusive of both Jews and non-Jews, and of those who survived as well as those who died.

Yad Vashem, as the official memorial of Israel, considered its mandate to be limited to compiling and making accessible the names of Jewish victims. Moreover, in view of its mission as a memorial, Yad Vashem emphasized research focused upon the names of those who perished. The Pages of Testimony were exclusively about Jews and were memorial in nature. During 2003-2004, Yad Vashem was primarily concerned with placing on the internet its mass digitization of the Pages of Testimony for the Volcker Committee. Yad Vashem recognized that the other victim groups in the Court's definition did not have comparable memorial institutions of their own. It was considered that investigating the names of the other, much smaller, victim groups was more the purview of the USHMM, which was researching the names of all victims, including those who were not Jewish, as well as those who had survived the Nazis. This understanding had led to the creation in the USHMM of the Benjamin and Vladka Meed Registry of Holocaust Survivors.

The Court's desire to compile and make accessible as full a list as possible of the Victims and Targets of the Nazis and their allies, both those who perished and those who survived, meant that there had to be movement beyond the Pages of Testimony, to a full-scale examination of all extant historical-archival records. The decision was made to fund the hardware, software, and maintenance costs of putting Yad Vashem's Pages of Testimony on the internet, but not to cover the costs of collecting additional such testimonial evidence of names, which could be appropriately funded in other ways. The Victim List Project would concentrate on the historical-archival documentation, which was less likely to receive funding from elsewhere. It also seemed a particularly appropriate project under the Settlement Agreement, given that it was important to support activities that might be helpful to the distribution process, such as the identification of owners of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts.

It was clear that the Victim List Project required ongoing cooperation between Yad Vashem and the USHMM. In March 2004, the two institutions entered into an agreement whereby they would share their names data, giving credit to each other. It was understood that Yad Vashem would concentrate primarily on the names of Jews who had perished, and the USHMM would concentrate primarily on the names of non-Jews and of Jews who had survived, but the two institutions would work together.

There was contact with organizations representing the non-Jewish victim groups so as to ensure that the USHMM would be deemed the appropriate entity to handle the compilation, and to discuss where the sources were. Thus, after communication with the Jehovah's Witnesses' world headquarters in New York, a visit was made to Wachtturm Bibel- und Traktatgesellschaft der Zeugen Jehovas e.V. ("Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of the Jehovah's Witnesses") in Selters, Germany, where records of the experience under the Nazis had been carefully kept for years. The scanning of those records and the transfer of copies to the USHMM proved to be timely, as the German center had decided that the maintenance of the archive was not part of its religious mission and that the archive should be ended.

With respect to homosexual survivors, an organization had appeared before the Court to object to certain elements of the Looted Assets Class cy pres programs, believing that homosexual survivors were few in number and that therefore memorial and research projects, rather than programs serving the needy, should be funded; the District Court as well as the Court of Appeals denied these objections.[51] With respect to the Victim List Project, the organization had some concern that its own research would be subsumed, and also that the privacy of the homosexual victims would be impacted. However, it was explained that the focus would be on the compilation of names based on archival lists, with research on the specific fates of victims left to scholarly analysis by experts in the field. Privacy issues also were of concern in regard to the mentally and physically disabled and were similarly addressed.

As to Roma victims, discussions were held with Roma organizations as recommended by the IOM, and eventually with the European Roma Information Office in Brussels. There were sensitivities based on the experience of the misuse by the police of name lists against the Roma, but, nonetheless, there was also an understanding of the importance of the compilation of sources and names for research and remembrance.

Ultimately, there were no objections to the work of the Victim List Project and the USHMM, and in any event most of the relevant historical-archival documentation on these groups was to be found in the International Tracing Service and various government archives.

IV. DIGITALLY RECORDING THE INDIVIDUAL NAMES OF THE VICTIMS OF THE NAZIS AND THEIR ALLIES

With the Court's support, what is literally the largest presentation in history so far of the names of Holocaust victims began as Yad Vashem made its Central Database of Shoah Victims Names publicly available over the internet in November 2004 (in its present form, the Database may be seen at http://yvng.yadvashem.org/index.html?language=en). Given the centrality of Jewish victims, and the symbolic importance of Yad Vashem, it was appropriate that the first major funding by the Court was of the technical means to make the Pages of Testimony visible to the world. In the first year after the public launch in November 2004, over 4 million individuals from over 200 countries visited the website. Many of them came repeatedly, for a total of 7 million sessions with an average viewing of 20 separate pages each.

From the beginning, there was an attempt to connect the names to biographical materials concerning individual persons. The Court was in agreement, but also emphasized the importance first of identifying, to the greatest extent possible, victim names. Recognition that the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names was more than just a list came immediately, however. "The online Names Database creates a link not only with the dead but also among the living, within the Jewish people," said Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel after filling out a Page of Testimony for his father, Shlomo, just after the launch.[52]

Similarly, with the Court's support, the USHMM in the fall of 2004 began to create the electronic means to present different sorts of lists and the individual names of both non-Jews and Jews in what it called the USHMM Name Search. Later renamed the Holocaust Survivors and Victims Database, it may be seen in its current form at http://www.ushmm.org/remember/the-holocaust-survivors-and-victims-resource-center/holocaust-survivors-and-victims-database.

The two institutions developed different working styles. Yad Vashem preferred to operate in a more centralized fashion. The Jerusalem institution trained a team of over 50 experts in names indexing, and it formulated an advanced methodology whereby the documents were scanned, the information was catalogued according to various fields, and names contained in the documents were recorded. The information was verified by experts and, following authorization, was edited and stored in the online database, where it was made publicly accessible in Hebrew, English, Russian, Spanish, and German. The USHMM worked in a more decentralized fashion and outsourced activities to genealogists and local memorials and other institutions. The Holocaust Survivors and Victims Database was made publicly accessible in English. More recently, both institutions began to experiment with crowdsourcing — the broadcasting over the internet of particular issues or concerns in the form of an open call for solutions — as they invite the public to identify photographs and assist in other ways.[53]

Both institutions welcomed the accessibility of databases of already digitized names from other institutions. Yad Vashem, in particular, sought such contributions from other institutions in conjunction with the international conferences that it held at periodic intervals on "Recording the Names." Three such conferences were held even before the uploading of the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names to the internet in November 2004.

In addition to these conferences hosted by Yad Vashem, there were annually also the Digitization of National Socialist Victim Data Workshops of the German Gedenkstätte that brought together representatives of memorials in other countries, Yad Vashem, the USHMM, and the Victim List Project.

The Claims Conference had independently called for more coordination among Holocaust-related archives. In 2003, the Claims Conference organized what came to be called the International Shoah Archivists Working Forum, with a large conference of the primarily Jewish Holocaust-related archives held in New York in March 2004. It had become clear that with advancements in technology, cooperation among Holocaust-related archives could and should be increased greatly, with an eye eventually to the presentation on the internet of much of the documentation so as to assist education and research worldwide. The conference resulted in particular in three goals as follows:

a) Greater sharing of copies of Holocaust-related documentation among archives.
b) Creation of unified thesauri for such things as geographic place names and the names of organizations.
c) Mass digitization and uploading to the internet of Holocaust-related archival documentation.

As a practical matter, it turned out in regard to (a) that sharing of copies was primarily an issue in relation to the two main archives trying to copy Holocaust documentation worldwide, [53] See, for example, the World Memory Project, a crowd sourcing partnership between the USHMM and Ancestry.com to index and make searchable documents containing over 1 million names. https://www.ushmm.org/online/world-memory-project/.

namely Yad Vashem and the USHMM. It turned out in regard to (b) that the creation of unified thesauri could mostly be handled by Yad Vashem's sharing of its standardized lists of geographic place names and other such finding aids. And it turned out in regard to (c) that Tuvia Friling, then the Archivist of the State of Israel, who participated in the conference, was calling for the digitization and uploading to the internet of all Israeli government archival documentation that was not classified. It therefore made sense for mass digitization and uploading of Holocaust-related archival documentation to the internet to be done as a pilot matter among the Holocaust institutions in Israel.[54]

As mass digitization of names progressed under the Victim List Project, these matters became more and more linked to the question of cooperation on the documentation of names, and principally to the question of cooperation between Yad Vashem and the USHMM. Yad Vashem suggested that the software platform that had been developed by the company that it was using be adopted by the USHMM, as well as by other institutions that might join the collaborative project. Testing of Yad Vashem's software platform was done in the spring and summer of 2005, but its use would have meant that the USHMM would have had to replace its entire system. Although Yad Vashem was ready to make its geographic and other finding aids available, it could do this only if the receiving institution or institutions were also using the same software as Yad Vashem. Whatever the technical issues, the USHMM and other institutions were not prepared to make such a large shift in how they operated. In the meantime, the USHMM had a professional geographer on its staff and had been developing its own geographic lists. Moreover, the USHMM was concentrating on technological means to handle the names of Roma and other non-Jewish victims. Eventually, the institutions did not consider a unified common software platform to be the best use of resources.

The need to cooperate as a result of the Victim List Project, however, led to closer working relations between the two institutions, and in 2006 there began to be greater sharing of archival documentation between Yad Vashem and the USHMM.

[54] The Claims Conference had previously funded a digitization laboratory at Yad Vashem that in principle could assist the Ghetto Fighters' House, Moreshet, and other such repositories in Israel.

There was and continues to be a fair amount of cooperation with other institutions. At the onset of the program, a Victim List Forum – essentially a "listserv" with the capacity to handle large data sets that was run by the Yad Vashem IT department – was maintained to facilitate communication among professionals working on names projects, but in recent years technology advances have made this no longer necessary. The Forum was moderated by a coordinating group that represented the Swiss Banks Settlement, Yad Vashem, the USHMM, and the "Digitization of National Socialist Era Victim Data" Workshop. Yad Vashem had technical issues with sharing its geographic, organizational, and other finding aids to help standardize the field. However, it eventually did do so with the other Holocaust memorials in Israel, partly due to the encouragement of the Claims Conference, given that the Claims Conference was funding the digitization of all the relevant institutions in the country. Eventually, due to technological changes and the success of projects to bring Holocaust-related archives together – first and foremost the success of the names databases – the entire matter was absorbed into the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure, in which Yad Vashem is a partner organization (the USHMM became a partner organization as of May 2015, and the Executive Director of the Victim List Project is a member of the Advisory Board of EHRI). Essentially EHRI took over, on a larger scale, the initiative of the Claims Conference in creating the International Shoah Archivists Working Forum and the cooperation among institutions fostered by the Victim List Project.

By 2009, by which time the data from the most readily available lists already had been entered, data entry of necessity slowed somewhat, due to the fact that the remaining lists were more difficult to decipher. These lists required a higher degree of expertise to handle handwriting in various languages, and were generally more challenging and required greater research analysis than the simpler lists entered in previous years.

At the end of 2010, Yad Vashem announced that with the assistance of the Court, it had been able to document approximately 4 million of the approximately 6 million individual Jewish victims who certainly or most probably lost their lives during the Shoah. As of October 2015, Yad Vashem had in its database 6,983,132 name occurrences, representing approximately 4,500,000 individual Jewish victims who perished.[55] The total number of name occurrences, including not only those who perished but also those who survived, is considerably larger. Previously, the entire database could be seen only internally at Yad Vashem. However, aware of the greater difficulty of identifying the remaining names of those who died during the Holocaust, and recognizing that the entire enterprise was an enormous research project rather than simply a listing of names, Yad Vashem began to revise its database so as to make everything public, with an indication of which persons, in its professional opinion, are clearly among the six million who perished. A new version of the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names was made public in 2016.[56]

Some 2.6 million of the name records came from Pages of Testimony, while over twice that number have been located primarily in historical-archival documentation. This is a noticeable difference from the situation at the time of the Volcker Committee project, when the available information was overwhelmingly drawn from the Pages of Testimony.

As to the USHMM, as of March 2016, there were 6,695,154 name occurrences in its Holocaust Survivors and Victims Database. The number of individual persons covered (Jews, Roma, Jehovah's Witnesses, Homosexuals, Disabled) is under review.[57]

It may one day be possible to estimate of the percentage of names identified, in comparison with the universe of the names of the individuals whom the Settlement Agreement is intended to benefit, both those who perished and those who survived. At present this cannot be done because of a lack of clear statistical data on the number of survivors both Jewish and non-Jewish, and because not all names of survivors are known due to privacy considerations (despite the fact that almost all the sources of such names have been identified due to the Victim List Project). However, Yad Vashem has made some estimates, by country, of the percentages of names identified to date of Jews who perished in the Holocaust, in comparison with the total numbers of Jews known to have died.

The countries for which the percentages of names identified to date are low are primarily, though not exclusively, those of the former Soviet Union. In that region, there was primarily a "Holocaust by bullets," in which masses of people were shot without the deportation and other lists associated with the ghettos and camps more frequently found in the West. Under the auspices of the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure, Yad Vashem brought together the main specialists on names projects from the former Soviet Union, Poland, and Hungary-Romania – the areas where the percentages of still unidentified victims are greatest – such as the state archivist of Belarus and the persons responsible for the database of Soviet soldiers killed or missing in action in World War II,[58] who are knowledgeable about previously classified information. In general, there is movement from simply using lists, to viewing the compilation of the names as a research project.

V. POSITIVE IMPACTS OF THE VICTIM LIST PROJECT

Beyond its success in compiling and making accessible the names of the Victims and Targets of the Nazis and their Allies as such, the Victim List Project has had a major impact in a number of other areas.

A. Advances in cataloging methods for Holocaust-related archival materials as a whole

As a result of the need to catalog names lists, which involved decisions on the classification of information generally (e.g., geographic and organizational names), there have been advances in cataloging methods for Holocaust-related archival materials as a whole.

[58] It is likely that this database, begun in 2006, was inspired in part by the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names after the president of the Russian Federation visited Yad Vashem in 2005. The database may be seen at http://www.obd-memorial.ru.

When Yad Vashem began to catalog its lists for the Victim List Project intensively in 2005, Yaacov Lozowick, then Archivist of Yad Vashem, recognized that the automated processes that had been developed in the course of computerizing the Pages of Testimony on a mass and intensive basis could be extended beyond the names lists, and used to catalog archival information on the Holocaust generally. This more automated division of labor for cataloging came to be described as the Knowledgebase of the Shoah. The core idea was that no matter how broad the subject of the Shoah, the components that make up the history are limited in scope. There are the geographic locations, the historical figures, organizations, and events - and these repeat themselves throughout the documentation. Thus, just as a standardized list of the geographic locations had been created with all the relevant variants (e.g., Lvov, L'viv, Lemberg, etc.), standardized lists of the individuals and events in the history could be created. By creating an interlocking web of descriptions of all the relevant items of information, including a careful enumeration of the correlations between them, the user can be provided with a highly flexible guide through the history of the Shoah, accessible from any direction.

Constructing the record of the correlations in a systematic way allows users to devise new research paths that previously would have been too daunting to undertake. Thus, for example, if an observer wanted to know whether the "X Company" had anything to do with the Holocaust, the answer could not be found through ordinary cataloging processes. While it was possible that a reference archivist may have seen something about "X Company" somewhere in the holdings of his or her repository, relying on this methodology was not optimal. If, however, there had been standardized cataloging on the document level so as to create a list of organizations that appeared in the documentation (similar to the list of geographic sites), then the data entry staff need only check whether the organization (e.g., "X Company") already appeared on the standardized list or, if not, add it to the standardized list.

The method of the Knowledgebase of the Shoah, which derives from the work on the names lists, has become the way in which Yad Vashem catalogs everything in its collections, not only archival documentation but also videos, photographs, and the like.

The USHMM has followed a somewhat different path, providing more standard cataloging of its archival collections, so as to be able to keep up with its large continuing acquisition of new materials (the Knowledgebase of the Shoah method, even though automated, is slower). But in relation to its names database, the USHMM has refined such data as the geographic locations of the Holocaust, and it has had to focus upon additional and previously unexplored areas such as the names of Roma, and other matters not handled by Yad Vashem.

In both institutions, there has been a movement towards bringing all sorts of sources together, so as to be able to tell much more about individuals than their names. This is the challenge of the future. Indeed, an international workshop entitled "Names of Shoah Victims: From Scattered Sources to Individual Personal Stories" was hosted by the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe – which presents Yad Vashem's Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names in the center of Berlin – and the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure in October 2014. The announcement of the workshop reads in part as follows:

> A vast amount of work was done in the last decades in order to document and commemorate the names of as many as possible of the Shoah victims. There is still much to be done in order to name each and all of the victims and we will have to stay the course on this mission for yet a long time. Nevertheless, there are already in existence many large and small projects and databases based on a huge array of sources. More and more pressingly now we are facing another kind of challenge: the need to make sense of the abundance of data, to organize it and cluster together, when available, the multiple pieces and bits of information referring to one and the same victim. This means rising up from the level of the flat separate data items to that of a relational system linking them in a virtual personal file, sometimes eventually resulting, as far as possible, in reconstructing a brief personal life story.[59]

Yad Vashem has already begun to use the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names in educational projects. "The Stories Behind the Names: A Journey of Discovery" offers advice to educators on how students can piece together information about Holocaust victims. The project helps to complete stories of victims' lives, thus serving as portraits of Holocaust victims and enabling students to remember these victims as individuals, with faces and identities.[60]

B. The development of new types of research in fields such as historical demography and genealogy

The computerization of the names documentation has resulted in an ability to conduct certain types of research that previously would have been impossible, or at least extremely difficult to do. For example, it has been possible in a short period of time to compare the names on deportation lists at the point of departure with the names on lists at the point of arrival, and to compare the results to determine the mortality in that particular transport. There are many other sorts of research for which electronic access to specific lists and the digitized information on them is relevant.

It is expected that the compilation of the names of the persons who fled east in the Soviet Evacuation, along with comparisons to the pre-war Soviet census, will permit a better estimate of the numbers of Jews who perished in the Holocaust on Soviet territory. The precise number of persons shot in the mass killings in the Baltics, Belarus, Ukraine, and elsewhere is not known, although it is likely that it exceeds the number of persons killed through the concentration camp system in the West. At the same time, the Soviet government has not provided accurate estimates of the number of persons who were evacuated into the interior of the U.S.S.R. Comparison of the names of Jews who were in the Soviet Evacuation with the pre-war Soviet census is likely to change not only the knowledge of the numbers of Jews who died in the Shoah, but also the image held in the West of the Holocaust as a mechanized, organized affair carried out primarily in ghettos, concentration camps, and gas chambers.[61]

In addition, genealogical research has been greatly enhanced by the names databases, as family members are able to identify relatives who were affected by the Holocaust. There have been a number of proposals for use of the databases, including through contacting surviving relatives to determine, via DNA identification methods, the individuals buried in mass graves.

C. The inspiration for similar names projects in other areas

Following the 2004 uploading to the internet of the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, there have been some mass names projects that to some extent have been inspired by the Victim List Project. Thus, in 2005, the President of the Russian Federation visited Yad Vashem, and in 2006 the Ministry of Defense of the Russian Federation began an extensive project to create a database of the names of all Soviet soldiers who were killed or missing in action in World War II. The director of that database has visited Yad Vashem, and the information in it on Jewish soldiers is being incorporated by Yad Vashem into the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.[62] In similar fashion, the Spanish government has also created a database of the names of Spanish prisoners of the Nazis.[63]

D. Assistance in the documentation of claimants for reparations and for restitution of plundered property

Although the Swiss Banks Settlement considered the Victim List Project as primarily for research and remembrance, as a practical matter, one side effect is that the databases created by it are used quite regularly to document claims for reparations and for restitution of property.

In the last few years, the Claims Conference has successfully negotiated with the German Ministry of Finance for compensation of Holocaust survivors to be expanded to provide payments to Nazi victims from North Africa, as well as to those currently living in all areas of Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. For applicants to receive payments under these programs, there has to be archival proof regarding how they survived. The databases created by the Victim List Project have therefore become quite important in helping to document the tens of thousands of these new claimants.

63 See http://pares.mcu.es/Deportados/servlets/ServletController.

The databases created by the Victim List Project are also regularly consulted in the search for heirs for looted art and other cultural property, as well as other types of assets. Often these are searches for the fate of specific individuals.

On occasion, there are mass searches for thousands of names. In February 2016, partly as a result of the work of the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), the Serbian Parliament passed a law regarding Jewish heirless property. The Federation of Jewish Communities in Serbia (SAVEZ) compared the lists of properties in the country with the names databases at Yad Vashem and the USHMM to determine which properties belonged to Jews who perished. This project enabled claims for restitution or compensation to be filed. The proceeds have provided aid to Holocaust survivors in and from Serbia, and have assisted in the reconstruction of Jewish life in that nation.[64]

E. The reunion of family members

A number of families have been reunited through the names databases. Yad Vashem has a listing of some of these, along with photographs and in some cases videos, that includes even the reunion, so many decades later, of a brother and sister.[65] Very often a grandchild or other younger member of the family who is more comfortable with electronic technology is the person who finds the lost family member. In many cases, the identification of a family member is accomplished because the digitization of the Pages of Testimony includes information on the person who filled out the form. One of the negative consequences of privacy legislation is that the general public is unable to see the databases that have been created in their entirety. Once the public has full internet access to the information that has been amassed by the USHMM and Yad Vashem on those who survived in addition to those who perished, it can be expected and hoped that many more such reunions will take place.

Below is a photograph taken from a video showing the reunion of sister and brother Hilda (Glasberg) Shlick and Simon Glasberg. In the video, Hilda's grandson explained how he found Simon through Yad Vashem's Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.[66]

F. Improvements in cooperation among Holocaust-related organizations generally

Relations between Yad Vashem and the USHMM are now more extensive than they were at the start of the Victim List Project, and in many areas are highly productive. This is not due solely to the cooperation required to achieve the Court's objectives, but the participation of the two institutions in the Victim List Project certainly has played a role.

There is now greater networking generally among Holocaust-related institutions. While some of that is due to technological advances and other factors, it is quite clear in the meetings surrounding the various projects that the names databases that have been created by the Victim List Project and the international cooperation that has gone into it are prime examples for these other projects. This is perhaps most obvious as to the European Holocaust Research Infrastructure, financed by the European Union, in which Haim Gertner, the Archivist of Yad Vashem, plays a major role. In similar fashion, the International Research Portal for Records Related to Nazi-Era Cultural Property, administered by the National Archives and Records Administration of the United States,[67] is partially modeled on the experience of cooperation regarding names. So, too, there has been an influence on the Claims Conference's attempt to create a Holocaust Audio-Visual Testimonies Partnership to identify, preserve, and make accessible the approximately 100,000 audio-visual recordings of survivors that also contain much name information.

G. Refutation of Holocaust deniers

The identification by name of millions of the Victims and Targets of the Nazis and their allies on the basis of historical-archival sources helps to confront Holocaust denial and trivialization. One of the most frequent claims by Holocaust deniers is that the figure of approximately six million deaths is an exaggeration. Identifying the names of each and every individual victim, where possible, helps to disprove that falsehood.[68]

VI. ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE VICTIM LIST PROJECT

In summary, the Victim List Project of the Swiss Banks Settlement has resulted in the following developments:

- A unified, worldwide catalog of all relevant name lists (a "list of lists"), regardless of where held, has been created and made accessible over the internet.
- An electronic compilation of the names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement is intended to benefit – Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who perished and those who survived – has been made accessible worldwide (within the bounds of privacy laws).

- There have been improvements in cooperation among Holocaust-related organizations generally.
- There have been advances in cataloging methods for Holocaust-related archival materials as a whole.
- New types of research in fields such as historical demography and genealogy have been developing.
- Similar names projects in other areas have been inspired.
- Assistance in the documentation of claimants for reparations and for restitution of plundered property is being given.
- Family members have been and continue to be reunited.

Above all, in what ultimately may be one of the most lasting contributions of the distribution programs implemented under the Swiss Banks Settlement, the largest presentation of history on the individual level for research and remembrance has returned the identity to millions of people whose existence — including their very names — the Nazis attempted to obliterate.

Victim List Project Appendix:
A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF COURT ORDERS

Allocations in the chronological list below of Court orders were made for one or more of the following purposes:

- Identification of lists of names
- Acquisition of large-scale name documentation
- Mass digitization of the individual names of the victims of the Nazis and their allies

As the following orders indicate, in total, $10,455,000 was allocated to Yad Vashem; $3,995,980 was allocated to the USHMM; and $28,000 was allocated to Swiss Federal Archives, for a total of $14,478,980. The remaining balance of $21,021 from the $14.5 million allocated will be distributed at a later date to a project in furtherance of the goals of the Victim List Project.

Court order July 30, 2004: Allocation of $760,000 to Yad Vashem in support of the opening to the internet of Yad Vashem's Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

Court order November 16, 2004: Allocation of $339,781 to the USHMM in support of the collection and dissemination of information about Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust, both those who survived and those who perished, with special attention to the non-Jewish victim groups.

Court order March 15, 2005: Allocation of $1,000,000 to Yad Vashem for the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, specifically to maintain the Central Database, to serve its public, to conduct a preliminary survey of historical-archival documentation, and to begin the systematic digitization of historical-archival data.

Court order July 15, 2005: Allocation of $118,800 to the USHMM in support of the microfilming and acquisition of historical-archival lists of names of victims or targets of Nazi persecution not readily accessible, including a name card index and judicial files documenting the persecution of homosexuals and other non-Jewish groups, documentation of the mentally disabled, and registration records for Jewish refugees in Central Asia.

Court order March 23, 2006: Allocation of $681,272 to the USHMM in support of the completion of the cataloging of names lists in its possession, of research on lists of non-Jewish names worldwide, of the creation of technical interfaces with Yad Vashem for further cooperation, and the digitization of approximately 1 million records concerning non-Jewish victims.

Court order June 23, 2006: Allocation of $935,000 to Yad Vashem towards a combined Yad Vashem-USHMM list of lists, scanning of historical-archival name lists, digitization of names, ongoing maintenance of the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, and service to the public using the Central Database.

Court order May 24, 2007: Allocation of $58,108 to the USHMM in support of the transfer of materials relating to the Holocaust Victims Assets Program (Swiss Banks) (HVAP) held by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, for eventual cataloging and dissemination.

Court order June 5, 2007: Allocation of $1,210,000 to Yad Vashem towards mass data entry of names and vital data of Holocaust victims from historical documentation; as well as towards ongoing identification, scanning, and cataloging of lists; and maintenance, technology, and assistance to the public in regard to the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

Court order August 26, 2007: Allocation of $250,000 to the USHMM towards the provision of copies of the records held by the International Tracing Service (ITS) in Bad Arolsen, Germany to major Holocaust research and archival repositories in the eleven member countries of the International Commission of the ITS.

Court order December 5, 2007: Allocation of $800,877 to the USHMM towards the collection and dissemination of the names of Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Nazis and their allies, specifically large-scale name list cataloging, development of technological systems for holding and sharing name and list data, normalization of existing and new data, continuation of non-Jewish victim research, and digitization of individual names.

Court order February 6, 2008: Allocation of $179,825.36 to the USHMM to cover the costs of the transfer of the paper records of the Initial Questionnaires of the Swiss Banks Settlement and storage of the documents for a period of 25 years, for eventual cataloging and dissemination.

Court order September 17, 2008: Allocation of $1,000,000 to Yad Vashem towards the continuation of activities regarding names of Holocaust victims in records other than those in the collections of the International Tracing Service, including identification of lists, scanning, mass data entry of names, and development and maintenance of the online Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

Court order February 28, 2009: Allocation of $1,000,000 to Yad Vashem towards the continuation of activities regarding names of Holocaust victims in records other than those in the collections of the International Tracing Service, including identification of lists, scanning, mass data entry of names, and development and maintenance of the online Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

Court order October 27, 2009: Allocation of $242,363 to the USHMM towards the microfilming of historical-archival name collections held by the Joint Archives Jerusalem resulting from the activities of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) throughout the world during the Holocaust and its aftermath.

Court order January 30, 2010: Allocation of $493,561 to the USHMM to bring to conclusion the effort to identify, catalogue and digitize name-based information about victims of the Nazis and their allies who were Roma, Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexuals, or mentally or physically disabled, as well as to continue the effort to identify and catalogue Jewish name list material within the Museum's archival holdings.

Court order May 13, 2010: Allocation of $700,000 to Yad Vashem towards the continuation of activities regarding names of Holocaust victims in records other than those in the collections of the International Tracing Service, including identification of lists, scanning, mass data entry of names, and development and maintenance of the online Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

Court order June 13, 2011: Allocation of $181,393 to the USHMM in support of the transfer of the CRT claims documentation held in Zurich, Switzerland to the USHMM and the storage of the CRT claims documentation, for eventual cataloging and dissemination.

Court order April 24, 2012: Establishment of access rules for the IOM claim files, Initial Questionnaires and CRT claim documentation that were transferred to the USHMM.

Court order May 13, 2013: Allocation of $3,600,000 to Yad Vashem for the completion of review of the archival sources to identify the name of the approximately six million Jewish men, women, and children who perished in the Holocaust. Allocation of $650,000 to the USHMM for work to be done in cooperation with Yad Vashem to identify, copy, and acquire name-based and related documentation concerning those who survived in the Soviet evacuation. Allocation of $250,000 to the Claims Conference to be used in cooperation with Yad Vashem and the USHMM toward the cost of scanning and digitizing of the card catalog of the Tracing and Information Center of the Russian Red Cross.

Court order January 14, 2014: Allocation of $28,000 to pay for the transfer of the paper (analog) CRT-II bank records to the Swiss Federal Archives in Bern and the preparation of the paper (analog) CRT-II bank records by the Swiss Federal Archives for longtime archiving, cataloging and dissemination.

Court order August 25, 2015: Due to issues relating to the Russian Red Cross' Tracing and Information Center, the scanning and digitization project anticipated in the May 13, 2013 order could not be effectuated; accordingly, the Court authorized the $250,000 allocated to that project instead to be transferred to Yad Vashem to support name indexing on the Soviet evacuation.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT FUND

This chapter reviews some of the key factors impacting the establishment and administration of the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement claims programs. The Swiss Banks Settlement Fund achieved historic results. By emphasizing the restitution of property and the compensation of individual Holocaust victims, nearly $1.285 billion – a sum greater than the $1.25 billion settlement amount – was returned to more than 458,400 survivors and heirs.

For some perspective, it is useful to compare the Swiss Banks Settlement with other large-scale compensation programs: the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims ("ICHEIC"); the September 11 Fund ("9/11"); and the Agent Orange Settlement Fund. The Swiss Banks Settlement program was subject to a variety of administrative complexities not attendant to the ICHEIC, 9/11 and Agent Orange programs. Nevertheless, administrative expenses for the Swiss Banks Settlement distribution process, which were issued upon review and pursuant to order of the Court, were on par with, and in some instances below, those of the other programs. The costs of administration of the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund as a percentage of the total fund were lower than those for ICHEIC and Agent Orange. In addition, the processing costs per Swiss Banks Settlement claim paid and claim received were significantly lower than those for the 9/11 Fund, lower than for ICHEIC, and not substantially higher than those for Agent Orange, a program that had operated many years before the Swiss Banks program.

I. OVERVIEW: THE CLAIMS PROCESSES ESTABLISHED UNDER THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT FUND

The Settlement Agreement negotiated by settling plaintiffs and defendants created five classes of claimants: the "Deposited Assets Class," the "Looted Assets Class," "Slave Labor Class I," "Slave Labor Class II" and the "Refugee Class." The Settlement Agreement later was amended to include a separate program for claims arising from certain Swiss insurance policies.

With the exception of "Slave Labor Class II," a class member was required to be a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution," defined as "any individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped."

The Special Master was charged with filing a Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, and did so on September 11, 2000, a few weeks after the Court granted final approval of the Settlement Agreement. Following a public hearing, the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds (the "Distribution Plan") was adopted in its entirety on November 22, 2000. To briefly recap the key elements of the Distribution Plan:

- Deposited Assets Class: The Distribution Plan allocated up to $800 million to repay the claims of those who owned bank accounts and other assets deposited in Swiss financial institutions. The allocation of two-thirds of the Settlement Fund to these claims was based upon the priority accorded to the bank accounts under the Settlement Agreement and under fundamental principles of U.S. law, which recognized the unpaid accounts as basic contractual obligations owed by the banks to their depositors. The allocation of up to $800 million also was premised upon the findings of an audit of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul A. Volcker ("Volcker Committee"). The Distribution Plan provided for Deposited Assets claims to be administered on the Court's behalf by the Claims Resolution Tribunal in Zurich ("CRT-II"), which already had been processing claims against Swiss bank accounts under a separate claims process pre-dating the Settlement, and which was required to be located in Switzerland due to banking secrecy laws prohibiting bank records from leaving Switzerland.
- Slave Labor Class I: The Distribution Plan provided for payments to surviving slave laborers, or to their heirs if the former slave laborer died on or after February 16, 1999. In the interest of efficiency and to minimize survivor confusion, the Distribution Plan provided for the same administrative agencies, processing mechanisms and deadlines utilized by the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" ("German Foundation"), a $5.2 billion foundation created on July 17, 2000, partly in response to class action slave labor claims filed against German companies in the United States. The German Foundation designated the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Inc. ("Claims Conference") and the International Organization for Migration ("IOM") as administrative agents to process the claims of, respectively, Jewish and non-Jewish former slave laborers. The two organizations were appointed by the Court to perform the same functions on behalf of Slave Labor Class I of the Swiss Banks Settlement.

- Slave Labor Class II: The Distribution Plan provided for payments to former slave laborers for Swiss entities, or the heirs of those slave laborers who died on or after February 16, 1999. As noted above, under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, this class was not limited to the five "victim or target" groups specified in the settlement but was instead open to all Nazi victims. All Slave Labor Class II claims were processed by the IOM.

- Refugee Class: Surviving refugees, or the heirs of refugees who died on or after February 16, 1999, were eligible for compensation if they were denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, or were admitted but mistreated. The Distribution Plan designated the Claims Conference to process the claims of Jewish claimants, and the IOM to process the claims of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled claimants.

- Looted Assets Class: The Looted Assets Class potentially included millions of people, since all Holocaust victims and their heirs had been looted. The vast size of the class, coupled with the impossibility of determining whether specific property was transacted through a Swiss entity, rendered an individualized claims process impractical. The Distribution Plan provided instead that the neediest class members were to benefit from a cy pres remedy — "the next best thing" — through humanitarian aid programs distributing food, medicine, shelter, emergency grants and similar assistance. The program augmented already-existing assistance programs for Jewish survivors overseen by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee ("JDC") and Claims Conference, while creating new programs for Roma and other non-Jewish class members to be implemented and monitored by the IOM.

- Insurance Claims: Separately from the Distribution Plan, plaintiffs and defendants established a claims resolution mechanism for certain Holocaust-era insurance policies, a program administered by CRT-II, but directed in considerable measure by specific Swiss insurance companies that agreed to participate in the Settlement.

- Victim List Project: On behalf of all class members, the Distribution Plan provided for the creation of a $14.5 million project to memorialize all Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, those who survived and those who perished. The project funded new research, primarily by Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, to collect and digitize the names of millions of Holocaust victims whose identities had not previously been known.

II. UNIQUE ATTRIBUTES OF THE SWISS BANKS DISTRIBUTION PROCESS IMPACTING ADMINISTRATION

The Swiss Banks Settlement Fund was affected by a number of unique circumstances rendering the establishment and administration of the claims process complex: the legal requirements necessitated by the Settlement Agreement and U.S. class action law; the obligation to design and administer compensation programs for six different classes and five separate victim groups; and the constraints imposed by the need to operate the Deposited Assets Class program in Switzerland to access the bank records that still remained, coupled with the difficulties posed by the banks' destruction of millions of relevant documents.

A. Legal Parameters: Requirements Imposed by the Settlement Agreement and Class Action Law

1. Global Scope and Participation:

The Swiss Banks Settlement was global, impacting Holocaust victims and heirs (and interested third parties) all over the world. The Notice Plan was implemented immediately after the Settlement was announced, and some elements of it continued for several years after the claims processes were under way, as new information needed to be disseminated to class members.

No lists of class members were available for a simple direct mail notice program. Instead, the notice program required the coordination of several different components including direct mail, worldwide publication, public relations, the internet, and grass roots community outreach. Information about the Settlement was translated into 26 different languages; subsequently, the claims programs utilized five to seven languages.

Due to class action requirements as well as the decision of the Court and Special Masters to solicit the views of class members and other interested parties, Holocaust victims and their advocates, as well as other observers worldwide, were invited to provide their detailed opinions on the initial distribution, and the uses of possible residual funds. Hundreds of proposals were submitted and analyzed, impacting the Special Masters' recommendations and the Court's decisions. In addition, more than 600,000 individuals returned "Initial Questionnaires" to the Court, detailing personal information about their lives before, during and after the Holocaust.

Assessing the scope of the notice program, the Court found that it had been "the most comprehensive, effective and successful in the history of class action litigation."[1]

2. Multiple Victim Groups:

The Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement specified five "victim or target" groups: Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled. Each victim group was represented by one or more advocates who monitored carefully the development and implementation of the Distribution Plan. Each group required unique methods of communication and claims processing programs.

With respect to Roma class members, this victim group posed unprecedented challenges. Early estimates indicated that about 15,000 Roma victims of the Nazis would participate in the Settlement Fund. However, as a result of extensive outreach efforts supported by the Court, over 71,000 Roma victims ultimately were eligible for and benefitted from the Settlement. The majority of Roma victims were illiterate, lived in remote towns unreachable except by personal visits through claims administrators, were deeply suspicious of non-Roma as well as Roma from other villages/regions, and were unfamiliar with Holocaust-related claims processes. Further, internal disputes among numerous Roma leaders in different communities required the claims administrators to invest in extensive on-site outreach and monitoring. Nevertheless, with considerable effort, the American judicial system was able to locate and assist a group of elderly and generally impoverished victims who for the most part had not been recognized under previous compensation programs.

The Court further observed that "even one of the unsuccessful objectors [to certain aspects of the distribution process] acknowledged that '[t]the notification process in this case was hailed as the most ambitious effort ever to notify beneficiaries of a legal settlement.' In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 314 F. Supp. 2d 155, 158 (E.D.N.Y. 2004) (quotation marks omitted)." 2014 WL 2440612, at *5.

3. Multiple Classes Requiring Multiple Claims Programs:

The Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement required the Court to administer programs on behalf of five distinct classes: the Deposited Assets Class, Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class. An additional claims program for an Insurance Class was later added following negotiations between counsel for Settling Plaintiffs and counsel for Settling Defendants (UBS and Credit Suisse), resulting in six different types of claims.

Each class and victim group required separate analysis and design of a distinct claims program. The Court and its agents were required to study the legal and historical connection between victims and Switzerland (see the two-volume, 900-page Special Masters' Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, adopted in its entirety by the Court); designate separate administrative agencies and create distinct claims processes; and train and supervise separate staffs for claims analysis and appellate review. Although efforts were made to conserve resources by using the same claims agencies for some of the different class programs, the varying types of wrongdoing and injuries contemplated under the different classes resulted in few synergies among the different programs. Moreover, there was little if any overlap among claim forms, measures of proof, historical documentation, and other elements of claims processing.[2]

Because of these differences between classes and class members, it was necessary for the Court to appoint four agencies to oversee the various claims programs: the Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT-II), which under Swiss law was required to operate in Switzerland in order to access Holocaust-era Swiss bank records, as assisted with administrative responsibilities by the New York-based Swiss Deposited Assets Claims Program (SDAP); the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC); the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference); and the International Organization for Migration (IOM).

[2] Copies of the different claimant application materials are annexed as an Exhibit to this Final Report.

4. Judicial Review:

In contrast to most Holocaust-related compensation programs, the Swiss Banks claims process operated under the auspices of the United States court system and was subject to judicial review and appeal. Some 23 significant matters were litigated even after the Settlement Agreement was signed, in proceedings before the District Court, the Court of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court. In addition, one or more challenges to the District Court's rulings were filed on behalf of nearly all of the "victim" groups (sometimes on several different occasions), focusing upon various elements of the settlement and/or distribution process. All of these proceedings (and others not reflected in reported decisions) arose after the lawsuits had settled. These included:

1. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (the District Court issued a comprehensive opinion describing the Swiss banks litigation and upholding the fairness of the $1.25 billion settlement);

2. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15644 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 9, 2000) (the District Court approved amendments to the Settlement Agreement involving access to claims data and establishment of an insurance claims program);

3. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 225 F.3d 191 (2d Cir. 2000) (the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit upheld the definition of the plaintiff-class in the Settlement Agreement to exclude Polish and other non-Jewish forced laborers);

4. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2000 U.S.App.LEXIS 29529 (2d Cir. Nov. 20, 2000) (the Court of Appeals dismissed an appeal challenging the validity of class certification; the appeal was reinstated and eventually withdrawn with prejudice on June 15, 2001);

5. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2000 WL 33241660 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 22, 2000) (the District Court approved the Special Masters' Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds ("Distribution Plan"));

6. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 14 F. App'x. 132 (2d Cir. 2001), redesignated as an opinion, 413 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2005) (the Court of Appeals upheld the District Court's approval of the Distribution Plan);

7. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2001 WL 419967 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 4, 2001), vacated in part by 282 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2002) (the Court of Appeals upheld the District Court's "self-identification" requirement directed at Swiss companies that used Holocaust-era slave labor, while vacating aspects of the definition of the Slave Labor II class, and remanding for determination of the parties' intentions; the proceeding was resolved following extensive negotiation by stipulation);

8. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 256 F. Supp. 2d 150 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (the District Court required the Swiss banks to pay $5 million in compound interest on escrow funds);

9. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20686 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 17, 2003) (the District Court adopted the Special Masters' Interim Report on Allocation and Distribution);

10. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F. Supp. 2d 59, amended and superseded by 319 F. Supp. 2d 301 (E.D.N.Y. 2004) (the District Court rejected the banks' opposition to the Special Masters' Interim Report and discussed at length the banks' misconduct during and after the Holocaust);

11. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F. B. Administrative Complexities Presented by Specific Settlement Classes

1. Deposited Assets Class

To equitably administer the Swiss Banks Settlement and to comply with U.S. legal principles — by accessing the bank records that were at the core of the claims — it was necessary to establish an administrative entity that, under Swiss law, was required to operate primarily in Switzerland, where costs were considerably higher than in the United States.[3] That entity, the Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT-II), at its height employed nearly 100 attorneys and other staff members in Zurich, and over the years of its operation employed approximately 280 staff members in total. CRT-II was charged with analyzing more than 104,000 claims to over 415,000 potential account owners; matching these claims to over 37,000 documented account owners; analyzing the validity of over 1.5 million matches[4]; assessing issues of ownership, entitlement, and valuation for accounts of considerable value (with awards for accounts for which documentation existed averaging $184,130); writing detailed decisions to preserve the historical record; establishing and carrying out an appeals process; analyzing each of the 104,000 claims to determine if an award was warranted for a "Plausible Undocumented" claim where bank records for the account had been destroyed (with awards for such claims paid at $7,250 each); and communicating in multiple languages with, and where appropriate arranging payment to, tens of thousands of individuals around the world. This process was complex and time-consuming. As the widely-read Israeli newspaper Haaretz has noted in connection with a property restitution program arising from Holocaust-era assets held by Israeli institutions:

PORTAL, http://finfacts.com/costofliving4.htm (last visited Nov. 7, 2014) (according to the "World Cost of Living 2004" survey, Zurich was the fourth most expensive place to live in the world in 2003, and the sixth most expensive in 2004, as compared to New York, which ranked as the 27th most expensive place to live during approximately the same period; the CRT had dozens of staff members working and living in Switzerland during that time frame); Daily Chart: Zurich, ECONOMIST, http://www.economist.com/blogs/graphicdetail/2012/02/daily-chart-7/print (last visited Nov. 11, 2014) (reporting on February 13, 2012 that "Zurich has become the world's most expensive city to live in" whereas "since 2001 … New York has fallen from 7th to joint 47th").

[4] "Matching" was the process of comparing computer databases of names of victims and/or claimants with names of bank account owners using algorithms to identify exact name matches, near-exact name matches, and name matches with confirming factors under procedures used in the Volcker Committee investigation and under the claims processing system used by the CRT. See http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Glossary.aspx ("Glossary").

"Locating assets owners lost 60 years ago and returning them to their heirs is difficult and complicated work that requires an appropriate budget."[5]

This task was made more "difficult and complicated"[6] because millions of account records had been deliberately destroyed by the banks. Countless other files were unavailable to the claims process, or available only with restricted access. Faced with a lack of documentation in many cases, or only a fragmentary record in others, as well as the passage of several decades, the CRT spent considerable effort tracking down information from wherever it was available: the defendant Swiss banks (when they agreed to cooperate); European archives; and claimants. In some instances, the resulting documentation was extensive, with thousands of pages requiring painstaking analysis.

The CRT's work could have been completed more quickly, and thus would have been somewhat less complex, if the process was limited to searching only for the person identified in a formal claim form as the possible account owner. However, after a 60-year hiatus and a determined effort on the part of Swiss banking authorities to restrict access to accounts, the Court concluded that claimants would be best served if the CRT reviewed not only the specific account(s) that the individual may have claimed, but other accounts potentially owned, even if not specifically claimed. This resulted in the analysis of some 415,000 potential account owner names. The Court also authorized approximately 63,000 "informal" claim forms — Initial Questionnaires ("IQs") — to be analyzed, in addition to the approximately 41,000 "formal" claim forms received, even though the information in the IQs was often incomplete and required more follow-up with potential claimants.

Other difficulties presented by administration of this class have been well documented.[7] Because of the legal strength of the bank account claims, the notice requirements of class action law, the complexities posed by decades of obstruction by Swiss banks, and the improbability of future claims due to the class action settlement, the publication of account owner names, and access to all existing account records, was paramount. Nevertheless, the CRT and the Court were hindered by continuing access restrictions imposed by Swiss banks and banking authorities. Among these restrictions were:

- the failure of Swiss banking authorities to comply with the recommendation of the audit committee led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul Volcker to create a centralized database ("Total Accounts Database") of all 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records still existed (of approximately 6.8 million for which records once existed, but which Swiss banks subsequently destroyed);

- the publication of only 21,000 account owner names originally (in February 2001), augmented only after litigation by the publication of an additional approximately 3,000 names (in January 2005);

- the restrictions upon the ability of the Court and CRT to review auditor and banking records even for those 36,000 accounts to which the CRT was provided access (the "Account History Database"). Swiss banking authorities required the Settlement Fund to employ a "Data Librarian" who reviewed and redacted information from each bank record before it was provided to the CRT for analysis; and

- the failure, for several years, of one of the two defendant banks to cooperate with the CRT's requests for "voluntary" assistance (i.e. requests to produce bank records underlying the data provided by the Volcker Committee auditors at the outset of the claims process, an obligation set forth clearly by the Court as a condition to approval of the settlement).

The "voluntary assistance" issue provides an example of the difficulties posed by the lack of full and early access to important documentation. One of the defendant banks offered fairly regular assistance. The other ultimately provided some of the requested additional information, but relatively late in the claims process.[8] The supplemental information ended up being highly significant for several reasons. It enabled the CRT to identify a number of bank account owners more accurately, leading either to a conclusive positive identification resulting in an award, or a "match disconfirmation" resulting in a claim denial. The examination of these additional records also led to the discovery of more accounts that could be awarded; improved the assessment of the value of securities held in custody accounts; and, crucially, contributed materially to the reconsideration and upward adjustment of many of the awards that had been made at the "presumptive" (average) values that had been established by the Volcker Committee auditors before the claims process was under way — amounts that stood in for the missing bank records that would have shown actual values.[9] As a result, the Court was able to authorize additional awards and improve the valuation base for Deposited Assets Class payments.

Financial journalist John Authers, who followed the Swiss Banks Settlement closely, believed that the bank account claims process was the most important legacy of the Settlement (as had been intended) largely because it sought to address individual injustices:

> Rather than use the Swiss pay-out for a big charitable gesture, the US legal system had pulled the settlement towards a different version of justice. Banks could make good on their faults, and the often long-deceased owners of their accounts could receive the dignity they deserved, only if the court made every last attempt to make sure every surviving claimant received exactly their due. That meant more delays and more frustration, but it was the closest to "justice" that the Holocaust's victims were likely to get.[10]

In its effort to "make sure every surviving claimant received exactly their due," the Deposited Assets Class claims program was able to resolve claims, on a highly individualized basis, relating to over 415,000 potential account owners, returning nearly $720 million to Holocaust victims and their heirs.

2. Slave Labor Classes I and II; Refugee Class; Looted Assets Class

The other four settlement classes presented their own administrative complexities. Where possible, the Court sought to minimize the burden that would have been posed by creating a system of complicated individualized claims analysis to determine, for example, the type and duration of confinement (Slave Labor Classes I and II); the effect of expulsion from or mistreatment in Switzerland (Refugee Class); or the value of material losses sustained (Looted Assets Class). For purposes of Slave Labor Class I, moreover, the Court considered it most efficient to adhere to many of the same filing requirements and elements of proof as the German Foundation, which was established to compensate slave labor and other claims at approximately the same time as the Swiss Banks Settlement. The recommendations put forth in the Distribution Plan and adopted by the Court also enabled the Settlement Fund to take advantage of the administrative efficiencies available from utilizing agencies that had been selected by the German Foundation to handle some similar claims, the Claims Conference (for Jewish victims) and the IOM (for Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims). As the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit stated in this case: "The efficacy of having [the same] organization process the claims of individuals entitled to recover from both programs cannot be gainsaid."[11]

Nevertheless, the claims processing programs were complicated by a variety of issues, nearly all arising from the destruction wrought by the Holocaust and the fact that the events from which the claims arose had taken place many decades earlier. These issues included, for example, the lack of detailed information about Swiss refugee policies (Refugee Class) and the number of individuals impacted; the dearth of data about Swiss companies that made use of slave labor (Slave Labor Class II); and the difficulty in many instances of obtaining historical evidence of incarceration in a slave labor camp (whether controlled by Switzerland or Germany), or status as a refugee. All of these difficulties were compounded by restrictions in access to crucial documents held by the International Tracing Service (ITS) administered by the International Committee of the Red Cross and later the German Federal Archives, German and Austrian archives, the Swiss Federal Archives, and other important archives across Europe, particularly those in Central and Eastern Europe.

Additionally, since the German Foundation focused upon claims of slave laborers for German entities, the Court had to establish stand-alone programs for claims unique to the Swiss Banks Settlement; namely, Slave Labor Class II (relating to slave labor for Swiss, rather than German, entities), and the Refugee Class.

These complex programs required considerable administrative resources. Nevertheless, the programs were managed in such a way as to conserve the negotiated settlement amount (and more) entirely for distributions to class members. The settlement amount was $1.25 billion. By the end of the process, the Settlement Fund totaled nearly $1.510 billion ($1,509,780,276). The additional funds were due primarily to interest income ($248,166,845) as well as a tax refund ($10,521,000), for a total of $258,687,845. The tax refund was the result of discussions among the Court, Special Masters, Settlement Fund accountant and plaintiffs' class counsel, who observed that interest on the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund was subject to taxation, and perhaps so, too, might be distributions to claimants. The matter was brought to the attention of members of the United States Congress, resulting in a provision of the 2001 Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act, Section 803, entitled: "No Federal Income Tax on Restitution Received by Victims of the Nazi Regime or their Heirs or Estates."[12] The law exempted from taxation the interest earned on the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund, the fund established under ICHEIC, and similar Holocaust compensation funds.

[12] See, e.g., Memorandum & Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2002); see also In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 270 F. Supp. 2d 313, 325 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) ("After Special Master Judah Gribetz called attention to the diminution of the Settlement Fund by taxes on earned interest as well as the taxation of benefits awarded to the members of the classes," a successful effort was made "to persuade Congress to adopt legislation exempting from taxation interest earned by the Settlement Fund and payments to its beneficiaries").

In addition to refunding the taxes that already had been paid on interest earned, Section 803 of the tax law — initiated largely by those involved with creating and overseeing the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund — resulted in overall savings to the Settlement Fund of approximately $25 million in taxes, the sum that would have been due had the exemption not been enacted.[13] These savings were passed along to class members as distributions from the fund. The law also exempted from taxation the individual distributions that were made from the Swiss Banks Settlement and other Holocaust compensation funds, benefiting many thousands of U.S. citizens by ensuring that such payments were not reportable as taxable income.

In addition to these tax benefits, the Settlement Fund also received additional income. This included $486,995 from Swiss Re and $223,874.47 from Swiss Life, for a total of $710,869, as their contributions toward payments under the Insurance Class process. Further, the Settlement Fund received $381,562 in unspent funds previously held in the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation Settlement Account established on behalf of the Volcker Committee.

The complex program requiring the creation and administration of six different categories of claims (for Deposited Assets; Insurance; Slave Labor I; Slave Labor II; Looted Assets; and Refugees), and five different victim groups (Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled Nazi victims, and, for Slave Labor Class II, all Nazi victims), incurred administrative expenses of $171,212,554. All administrative expenses were reviewed, authorized and docketed by the Court, and were covered entirely by interest earned on the Settlement Fund. Accordingly, the Court was able to distribute nearly $1.285 million – more than the $1.25 billion principal – to over 458,436 Holocaust victims and heirs.[14] [13] See, e.g., In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 528 F. Supp. 2d 109, 112 (E.D.N.Y. 2007) (Block, J.) (noting that the "Congressional legislation making the settlement fund tax exempt" resulted in a "potential savings of 25 million dollars").

[14] A total of $1,284,928,006 was distributed to Holocaust victims and heirs. However, administrative expenses were incurred in connection with the processing of all claims, including claims that could not be approved. Administrative efforts also were expended for claims that were determined to be valid, but for which payments could not be distributed. The total value of claims approved was $1,298,643,604. Not all of these funds could reach the claimants for a variety of reasons, primarily because some approved claimants and/or heirs could not be located despite the best efforts to obtain contact information. In other instances, approved claimants refused

The process for returning Swiss bank accounts to the Holocaust victims and heirs from whom they had been taken 60 to 70 years earlier constituted the most significant component of these administrative expenses. Of the approximately $171.2 million required to administer the various claims programs under the Settlement Fund, approximately $147.6 million was attributable to the operating expenses for the Court's four administrative agencies (the CRT; JDC, Claims Conference and IOM). Of this $147.6 million, approximately $108.2 million – 73% – was related to the bank account claims process undertaken in Zurich by the CRT, assisted in New York by the Swiss Deposited Assets Program.

Administrative expenses also included professional fees, primarily for the services provided by the various legal and accounting firms at which the Court-appointed Special Masters (including the CRT Special Masters), and the Settlement Fund accountant, were employed. These various professional services were discounted at amounts at, or lower than, the sums specified under the Court's various orders of appointment, and in some instances were provided pro bono. The total professional fees approved by the Court, along with certain related expenses associated with oversight of the distribution process, constituted approximately $23.6 million of the $171.2 million cost of administration. These professional fees represented less than 1.6% of the total Settlement Fund of nearly $1.510 billion.[15]

The Settlement Fund also was required to expend $37.6 million in fees for notice to the class, as required by United States class action law. Because there was "no list of all the

to complete the necessary paperwork required to transmit the award, or refused to accept payment. Thus, of the approximately 1.299 billion approved, approximately $1.285 billion was distributed. All sums approved but not paid were returned to the Settlement for reallocation to other class members.

[15] Included within these professional fees are those for law firms at which Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari Reig were employed during and after Special Master Gribetz's March 31, 1999 appointment by the Court: Richards & O'Neil and Bingham McCutchen. Although the March 31, 1999 order of appointment specified that the Special Masters' fees were to be discounted by 20%, these law firms applied a significantly greater discount of nearly 62% for the Special Masters' services as well as those of other personnel at the law firm involved with this matter, at a blended hourly rate of $260. Furthermore, for the last several years, throughout the entirety of the period during which the Special Masters have been employed by a third law firm, Morgan Lewis & Bockius, LLP, during which time the preparation of the Final Report continued and the wind-down of the various distribution processes has proceeded, all work on this matter has been performed entirely on a pro bono basis. Over the nearly 20 years since the Special Masters' appointment, responsible for overseeing all facets of the distribution process, these services have constituted less than 1% (0.84%) of the total Settlement Fund of nearly $1.510 billion.

members of the settlement classes that would have permitted the notice administrators to send notice exclusively by direct mail to all settlement class members," the Court "directed settlement class counsel, through four notice administrators, to implement [a] multi-faceted notice plan, involving, in addition to direct mail utilizing existing lists covering segments of the settlement classes [ultimately providing some 1.4 million notice packages to people in 48 different countries], worldwide publication, public relations (i.e., 'earned media'), internet and grass roots community outreach."[16] Notice expenses also included global outreach programs by the claims administrators; preparation of the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement; compilation of bank accounts for publication; and operation of call centers.

Finally, Plaintiffs' class counsel received $11,728,215, constituting less than 1% of both the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund that they had negotiated (0.94%) and the nearly $1.510 billion total fund (including interest and additional amounts, as described earlier) (0.78%). These legal fees were based primarily upon the attorneys' respective roles in litigating the claims and negotiating the settlement, activities which took place prior to the creation and distribution of the Settlement Fund. These amounts are substantially lower than those incurred in the typical class action. For example, in In re Payment Card Interchange Fee and Merchant Discount Antitrust Litig., MDL No. 1720 (JG) (JO) (E.D.N.Y.), law school professor and expert on attorneys' fees Charles Silver advised the District Court that in contingency cases, "sophisticated clients use the percentage approach" and "commonly pay 20 percent of recovered amounts or more." As to class action cases, in a table provided to the District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Professor Silver listed 66 class action cases "with recoveries of at least $100 million and fee awards equal to or greater than 20 percent." In the largest class action case in his chart, the recovery was $1.060 billion and the attorneys' fees awarded were 31.33 % of that sum; the next largest case ($956 million recovery) resulted in an attorneys' fee award of 20%, and the third largest case ($697 million) resulted in an attorneys' fee award of 25%. In one instance, attorney's fees of 40% of the recovery were awarded.[17]

Similarly, the NYU Center for Law, Economics and Organization studied attorneys' fees in 458 class action settlements reported between 2009-2013. The

Had the typical sum been paid to class action attorneys in this case, that amount would have ranged from approximately $250 million (20%) to over $412 million (33%) of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund negotiated by the parties. Here, however, plaintiffs' attorneys and the Court all agreed that payments should be limited, in recognition of the unique nature of this matter. Therefore, the savings in attorneys' fees, alone, covered all administrative expenses required to litigate, settle, provide notice of, create, and manage, this complex and historically unprecedented global agreement and all of the various claims processes for the several different classes.

Furthermore, as noted previously, the active involvement of the Court and its representatives resulted in the passage of tax legislation in the U.S. benefitting both the Settlement Fund itself (thus resulting in the ability to distribute some $25 million in additional payments to Holocaust victims, due to these tax savings), and thousands of individual recipients of distributions (who, as U.S. citizens, did not have to pay taxes on payments they received from the Settlement Fund).

III. SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT FUND ADMINISTRATION: A COMPARISON WITH ICHEIC, THE SEPTEMBER 11TH FUND AND THE AGENT ORANGE SETTLEMENT

The September 11th Fund, Agent Orange and ICHEIC distribution processes all involved large-scale programs intended to compensate individuals from funds created in response to mass claims, and in that respect they bear some similarity to the Swiss Banks Settlement program.

authors were updating their earlier analysis, in which they had determined that attorneys' fees in class action settlements during the period 1993-2008 had averaged 23% of the total recovery. Theodore Eisenberg, Geoffrey P. Miller, & Roy Germano, Attorneys' Fees in Class Actions: 2009-2013, 92 N.Y.U. L. REV. 937, 947 (Oct. 2017), http://www.nyulawreview.org/sites/default/files/pdf/NYULawReview-92-4-EisenbergMillerGermano.pdf). Since that period, the average attorneys' fees award has increased. The "average fee percentage" during the period 2009-2013 was "between 25% and 30% of the gross recovery." In cases with recoveries of more than $100 million, the recovery ranged from "a low of 16.6% in 2009 to a high of 25.5% in 2011." Id. In the Second Circuit, specifically, during the period 1993-2008, attorneys' fees were 28% (mean) or 30% (median) of the total recovery. Id., at 950.

The September 11th Fund, established for victims or relatives of those killed or injured in the 9/11 terrorist attacks on the U.S., was created by an act of the United States Congress. The Agent Orange fund was established in settlement of class action claims brought in the U.S. by service members and their families who alleged that they had been harmed during the Vietnam War by exposure to the herbicide Agent Orange. The ICHEIC program created a claims process for unpaid Holocaust-era insurance policies, following a 1998 agreement among European insurance companies and U.S. insurance regulators, representatives of international Jewish and survivor organizations, and the State of Israel.

The Swiss Banks Settlement Fund, like the Agent Orange program, arose from class action claims in the U.S., but as discussed above, the Swiss Banks case was subject to a variety of administrative complexities not present either in Agent Orange or in the other two programs. Even with these additional legal and practical requirements, administrative expenses for the Swiss Banks Settlement program did not exceed, and in some instances were considerably below, the expenses incurred by the other programs. Thus, as more fully explained herein, the costs of administration of the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund as a percentage of the total fund (11.3%) were lower than those for ICHEIC (17.4%) and Agent Orange (12.1%).[18]

There has been some discussion about whether administrative expenses are the appropriate measure of performance in connection with charitable enterprises, an area somewhat comparable to these distribution programs. In connection with charitable giving, three major review organizations – Charity Navigator, Guidestar, and the BBB Wise Giving Alliance – issued a joint statement in 2013, "The Overhead Myth." The purpose of the statement was to address a "misperception about what matters when deciding which charity to support."[19] Charity Navigator, Guidestar and the BBB Wise Giving Alliance asked donors to consider factors such as "transparency, governance, leadership, and results;" by contrast, the "percent of charity expenses that go to administrative and fundraising costs – commonly referred to as 'overhead' – is a poor measure of a charity's performance."[20] [18] The 9/11 program did not have a cap on the fund.

On the other hand, CharityWatch, another organization in the field of charity evaluation, has pointed out that groups included on its "Top-Rated list generally spend 75% or more of their budgets on programs [i.e., up to 25% on administrative expenses]."[21] Forbes evaluates charities based on three "efficiency ratios," including "Charitable Commitment," which "figures out how much of a charity's total expense went directly to the charitable purpose (also known as program support or program expense), as opposed to management, certain overhead expenses and fundraising. The average [in 2016] is 85% [i.e., 15% for administrative expenses] ... Charity watchdogs like the Better Business Bureau Wise Giving Alliance say charitable commitment should be no lower than 65% [i.e., no higher than 35% for administration]. No charity on our list is below 71% [i.e., up to 29% for administration]."[22]

Germany's "leading watchdog for charities,"[23] the Deutsches Zentralinstitut für soziale Fragen (DZI) (German Institute for Social Questions), offers its "Seal-of-Approval" to organizations that are, among other things, "careful and responsible in spending donors' money."[24] The DZI notes that administrative expenses that are "too small" are just as problematic as those that are "too big," and categorizes administrative expenses of less than 10% as "low," 10% to under 20% as "appropriate," 20% to 30% as "acceptable," and over 30% as "not acceptable."[25]

Under all of these measures, administrative expenses for the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund program (11.3%) were at the lower end of what would be considered efficient and appropriate.

There is also another perspective by which to measure the efficiency of these programs: the processing costs per claim paid, and claim received. In the Swiss Banks case, it cost $373, on average, to analyze each of the more than 458,436 victim claims that were paid. In addition, every claim submitted, whether paid or not, had to be examined, and the average cost of reviewing each of the more than 1.1 million claims received was $154. These expenses were significantly lower than those incurred by the 9/11 Fund, which cost $15,629 per claim paid, and $11,738 per claim received. The Swiss Banks Settlement costs per claim also were lower than those for ICHEIC, which cost $1,979 per claim paid, and $1,043 per claim received. The costs per claim for the Swiss Banks Settlement were not substantially greater than those in the Agent Orange case – which averaged $137 per claim paid, and $116 per claim received – even though the Agent Orange program had operated, for the most part, several years earlier, under different global economic conditions, with a narrower scope of claims and claimants.

Each program is reviewed in further detail below.

1. Swiss Banks Settlement Fund

The Swiss Banks Settlement Fund totaled nearly $1.510 billion as a result of principal, interest, repayment under the insurance program, and tax refunds.

In all, 1,112,752 claims were received, and over 458,436 claims were approved. The claims received and approved consisted of the following:

- Deposited Assets Class (claimants provided the names of 415,453 individual Holocaust victims who potentially owned Swiss bank accounts, and each potential account owner required individualized research and analysis to determine if a documented account existed; ultimately 18,096 Holocaust victims or heirs were approved for payment);

- Looted Assets Class (at least 312,245 needy elderly individuals were known to claims administrators, each of whom required individualized research and analysis to determine if he or she was a Nazi victim eligible for programs authorized under the cy pres remedy established under the Distribution Plan; at least 237,464 survivors ultimately received Court-funded services);

- Slave Labor Class I (there were 360,150 applicants, of whom 198,023 survivors and certain heirs were compensated);

- Slave Labor Class II (there were 16,474 applicants, of whom 570 survivors and certain heirs were compensated);

- Refugee Class (there were 6,343 applicants, of whom 4,158 survivors and certain heirs were compensated);
- Insurance (there were 2,080 applicants, of whom 118 survivors and certain heirs were compensated); and
- Incentive Awards (payments were made to 7 class members in recognition of their efforts on behalf of the class).

In total, nearly $1.285 billion ($1,284,928,006) — more than the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund — was paid to some 458,436 Holocaust victims and certain heirs.

As discussed above, the distribution of the Settlement Fund incurred administrative expenses of $171,212,554. As a percentage of the total Settlement Fund (almost $1.510 billion), administrative expenses were 11.3%.[26] The cost per claim approved for payment was $373, calculated by dividing administrative expenses (approximately $171.2 million) by the number of claims approved for payment (458,436). The cost per claim received was $154, calculated by dividing administrative expenses ($171.2 million) by the number of claims received (1,112,752).[27]

The multiple classes and multiple categories of claimants created under the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund were not present in the case of the 9/11 Fund, the Agent Orange Settlement or the ICHEIC program. That fact alone simplified and streamlined the claims processes for the other three programs. In addition, a number of other factors rendered administration of the Swiss Banks Settlement particularly complex as compared with the other programs. These differences are discussed below.

[26] The Settlement Fund incurred additional administrative costs, relating to its status as a class action, in an amount approved by the Court of $49.3 million, including for notice of the settlement and development and dissemination of distribution plan as required under U.S. class action law ($37,552,560) and also attorneys' fees ($11,728,215). If all class action costs in support of litigation, settlement, notice, attorneys' fees, and oversight of the fund distribution process are included, the cost of administration was 14.6%, well within the range of what charitable evaluation organizations consider appropriate.

[27] If the additional class action costs are included, the cost per claim paid was $481 and the cost per claim received was $198.

2. September 11th Fund (9/11 Fund)

The September 11th Fund ("9/11 Fund") was established by federal legislation in the immediate aftermath of the September 11th attacks on the United States. The purpose of the fund was to compensate victims or relatives of those killed or injured in the attacks.[28] The fund ultimately paid out approximately $7 billion.

The 9/11 Fund was created by congressional statute and was not subject to class action requirements, unlike the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund. While the 9/11 Fund administrators held hearings for individual families concerning their specific claims, the Fund administrators were not required to offer public hearings to solicit suggestions on broader policy determinations. Furthermore, the program was concentrated largely in the United States, where most of the victims had lived. By contrast, in the Swiss Banks Settlement, a complex worldwide, multi-language notice program was required.

In addition, the review process for claims under the 9/11 Fund differed significantly from the more complex analysis necessary under the Swiss Banks Settlement. Eligibility under the 9/11 Fund was rarely in question. The vast majority of claims were for those who had been employed at the World Trade Center, generally a fairly straightforward inquiry. This contrasts with determining whether someone – sixty or more years after the fact – had been a Holocaust-era slave laborer, refugee, or owner or heir to a Swiss bank account. The records at issue in the Swiss Banks Settlement, if they existed at all, were many decades old, incomplete, redacted, generally unavailable in English, often arcane, and usually accessible only on restricted terms. The relevant documents for the 9/11 Fund, by comparison, were of fairly recent genesis and readily available.

The key issue for the 9/11 Fund was valuation of victims' income, something that could be determined from routine documents such as pay stubs and employer statements, W2s, insurance policies, actuarial data, health records, and the like. This paperwork generally was already in the possession of claimants, families, and/or employers, and written in English. Determinations as to future earnings were made by 9/11 Fund claims administrators at the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers, LLP, based upon average income for the period 1998-2001, information that most claimants had in their possession or could obtain at the start of the claims process.[29]

Other factors considered as part of the 9/11 Fund review process included the value of pensions, health insurance and other fringe benefits, stock options, projected remaining years in the work force, projected household expenditures, taxes, risk of unemployment, present value, and several other elements, most of which are well-known to accountants who calculate similar projections in typical wrongful death cases. Most of the data were available from records in the possession of claimants or the victims' employers. Additional payments based upon pain and suffering were of a pre-set amount ($250,000 for deceased victims and $100,000 for spouses and dependents), so that individual assessments were unnecessary. Collateral offsets including the value of life insurance, pension plans, tax benefits and other payments, all readily ascertainable by claimants or the claims administrators, also were taken into account.[30]

With respect to 9/11 Fund administrative expenses, Congress neither specified nor capped the amount that the 9/11 Fund could distribute. "The Act [Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act of September 22, 2001] does not limit either the aggregate amount to be paid for all claims or the amount to be paid to any individual claimant." [31] Because the 9/11 Fund was unlimited, "principal" and "interest" are not relevant terms.

Some 2,968 death claims, and 4,435 personal injury claims, were filed under the 9/11 Fund, for a total of 7,403 claims submitted.[32] Payments were issued for 2,880 death claims, and 2,680 personal injury claims, for a total of 5,560 claims compensated under the 9/11 Fund.[33]

The 9/11 Fund incurred administrative expenses of approximately $86.9 million. The cost per claim paid under the 9/11 Fund was $15,629, calculated by dividing administrative expenses (approximately ($86.9 million) by the number of claims compensated (5,560).The cost per claim received under the 9/11 Fund was $11,738, calculated by dividing administrative expenses by the number of claims received (7,403).[34]

3. Agent Orange Settlement

The Agent Orange Settlement arose from a class action lawsuit in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York. U.S. service members and their families alleged personal injuries due to the exposure of the service members to certain herbicides, including Agent Orange, during the Vietnam War. The parties settled their claims in 1984 and, after a period of litigation, ultimately established a Settlement Fund under the authority of District Judge Jack Weinstein.[35] The last payments were made in 1996 and the fund closed in 1997, some 13 years after the lawsuit settled.[36]

While the Agent Orange Settlement, like the Swiss Banks Settlement, was subject to principles of class action and U.S. law, the claimants in the Agent Orange case generally were not difficult to reach. They were U.S. service members, most living in the U.S. and able to communicate in English, with records available from the claimants or from authorities in the U.S. The global Swiss Banks Settlement, which focused upon compensating elderly individuals originally from European nations but living all over the world at the time of settlement, arising from events that took place in a variety of European nations decades earlier, with documents deliberately destroyed or lost to war or the passage of decades, had levels of intricacy not present in the Agent Orange proceedings.

The Agent Orange program was comprised of two components: a Payment Program providing cash payments to "those veterans who were most injured or in need of assistance," and a Class Assistance Program providing for the "distribution of Settlement Fund assets through grants for the purpose of providing both direct and indirect services benefiting class members." The claims program in Agent Orange was limited to only one specific type of claimant: a totally disabled veteran (or his/her surviving spouse, or children) who had been exposed to Agent Orange. The claims administrators thus needed to analyze three main issues, all capable of assessment through documentation that could be readily located: whether a claimant was a Vietnam veteran or surviving spouse or child of a veteran (available from military, marital and birth records); whether that veteran had been exposed to Agent Orange (available from military records); and whether he or she was "totally disabled" (available from medical records). Significantly, the veteran was not required to demonstrate that Agent Orange had caused his or her disability.[37]

With respect to administrative expenses, the Agent Orange Settlement Fund principal was $180 million, to which another $150 million in interest eventually was added, for a total fund of $330 million. [38]

[38] See Final Report of the Special Master on the Distribution of the Agent Orange Settlement Fund, September 1997 ("Agent Orange Final Report"), at 2, 3. As with the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund and the ICHEIC program, pursuant to an IRS ruling, the Agent Orange Settlement Fund as well as distributions to class members

A total of 105,763 claims were submitted under the Agent Orange Payment Program. Another 239,110 individuals were served by the Class Assistance Program.[39] No statistics are available for the total number of applicants to the Class Assistance Program and thus the number assisted under that program also must stand in for the number of applicants. Accordingly, at least 344,873 claims were reviewed. A total of 52,216 claims were approved under the Agent Orange Payment Program (38,296 claims from disabled veterans, and 13,920 claims from survivors of deceased veterans). Payments averaged approximately $3,800 each.[40] Another 239,110 individuals were aided by the Class Assistance Program. Thus, a total of 291,326 claims were approved under the Agent Orange Settlement Fund.

Over the "nine-year distribution process, the Settlement Fund distributed a total of $267,901,842.66 (consisting of $196,595,084.66 distributed through the Agent Orange Veteran Payment Program and $71,306,758 distributed through the Agent Orange Class Assistance Program) to and for the benefit of some 291,000 class members in the United States in the form of either direct cash payments or provision of services."[41]

Administrative expenses for the Agent Orange Settlement Fund included the "set-up of the Payment Program, equipment and all claims-processing functions from July 7, 1988 through September 9, 1997;" the cost of "administering the Class Assistance Program – including [its] set-up ..., equipment and all grant management functions," for a total of "$19.1 million, or 5.8 percent of the total Settlement Fund assets distributed." Further, "[a]side from these direct administration expenses, the Settlement Fund incurred additional costs, including costs of investment services; accounting services; auditing services; legal and other services provided by the Special Master, the office of Special Master for Appeals and tax services; costs associated with the initial management of the settlement, including extensive notification to the class (i.e., the initial notice of the settlement, the maintenance of records of preliminary claims and subsequent notices); and costs of evaluating, establishing and developing the distribution programs. These other costs totaled $20.9 million – or 6 percent of the total amount distributed."[42] Accordingly, $40 million in administrative expenses were incurred in total ($19.1 million plus $20.9 million).

The costs of administering the Agent Orange Settlement Fund were 12.1%, calculated by dividing the administrative expenses by the total amount of the fund ($330 million). The cost per claim paid was $137, calculated by dividing administrative expenses ($40 million) by claims compensated (291,326).The cost per claim received was $116, calculated by dividing administrative expenses by claims received (344,873).[43]

The International Commission for Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC) was established in 1998 following negotiations among European insurance companies and U.S. insurance regulators, as well as representatives of international Jewish and survivor organizations and the State of Israel. ICHEIC was charged with creating a process to collect and facilitate the signatory companies' processing of insurance claims from the Holocaust period.[44]

In contrast to the Swiss Banks Settlement, which was governed by U.S. class action principles requiring notice and class participation, ICHEIC was an agreement among various governmental and non-governmental interests. ICHEIC leadership was not required to obtain the [42] See Agent Orange Final Report, at 52-3. Class action notice expenses are included in this amount because the Agent Orange Final Report did not specify how much of the category labeled as "additional costs" (i.e. costs not considered "direct costs") were attributable to notice alone. The other "additional costs" described in the final report clearly relate to oversight and distribution of the fund. The Agent Orange Final Report further stated that attorneys' fees and expenses totaled 4% of the sum distributed ($268 million).

[43] The Agent Orange Final Report does not provide data on the total number of applications to the Class Assistance Program (as distinguished from the Payment Program), but only on the total number of individuals served (i.e. "claims paid"). The number of applicants presumably was higher than the number of persons actually assisted. The actual processing cost per claim received therefore would have been lower than $116, but without further data on applicants, that amount cannot be determined.

formal participation of victim groups and their advocates, nor was ICHEIC subject to the rigorous notice requirements under U.S. class action law.

As another point of difference, although the ICHEIC process was established for Holocaust victims, it does not appear that Roma victims were designated as participants in ICHEIC.[45] This is an important element distinguishing ICHEIC from the Swiss Banks Settlement programs, for, as discussed above, reaching and compensating Roma survivors and heirs posed unique complexities.

With respect to claims review, in contrast to the CRT, which undertook extensive and time-consuming inquiries on behalf of over 104,000 claimants to Swiss bank accounts, the individual insurance companies participating in the ICHEIC process were responsible for conducting their own research and analysis. It is unclear whether ICHEIC actively sought access to names of additional policyholders, including access for purposes of publication, as did the CRT under the authority of the Court. It is also unclear whether ICHEIC and/or its member companies actively researched policies potentially owned by Holocaust victims, although not specifically claimed. By contrast, the CRT proactively sought to include as many potential claims and account holders as possible, ultimately individually analyzing over 415,000 possible account owners.

With respect to the ICHEIC fund, the "[t]otal funds received by ICHEIC, including funds received from participating insurance companies and the German government, the Bermuda Trust, realized exchange gains, and interest earned amount to $550 million."[46] The publicly available ICHEIC data do not provide a breakdown of principal versus interest, or other categories of funding.

A total of 91,558 "claims/inquiries received [were] eligible under the ICHEIC claims process," of which 31,447 "name[d] a company" and 60,111 "d[id] not name a company."[47]

[45] Likewise, it does not appear that the Agent Orange or September 11th programs were required to address the complex issues posed by locating and compensating a group of claimants as underserved and as difficult to reach as Roma.

[46] See Concluding Meeting of the International Commission for Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (Wash. D.C.), Mar. 20, 2007, at 1, 23, available at https://icheic.ushmm.org/pdf/Meeting%20Presentation%203-20-07.pdf (last visited Oct. 21, 2014) ("ICHEIC Concluding Meeting Report").

[47] See "ICHEIC Claims Process, 19-Mar-07."

ICHEIC also funded social welfare and educational programs, many of which served elderly Holocaust survivors. ICHEIC has not provided data on the number of individuals assisted by such programs.

ICHEIC has stated that it issued a total of 48,263 awards, consisting of 14,186 "[t]otal offers made using ICHEIC Valuation Guidelines," 31,284 offers "made to claimants through the ICHEIC 8a1 humanitarian claims process," and 2,874 offers "made to claimants through the ICHEIC 8a2 humanitarian claims process."[48] "The 8a1 humanitarian claims process evaluate[d] claims containing only anecdotal evidence referencing a Holocaust-era insurance policy, and for which no supporting documentation [was] found. Payments of $1,000 [were] made on a per-claimant basis on claims that qualif[ied] for an award under this category." The "8a2 Humanitarian claims process cover[ed] claims on companies that were liquidated or nationalized after World War II and for which no present-day successor company [was] identified. Awards in this humanitarian claims process [were] calculated on a per policy basis in accordance with the ICHEIC Valuation Guidelines."[49]

According to ICHEIC, a total of $306.25 million was offered on insurance policies, a figure that included $238.27 million offered to ICHEIC claimants from companies and partner entities, either through the ICHEIC process ($223.08 million) or on claims submitted directly to the companies ($15.19 million). The total of $306.25 million also included $31.28 million through ICHEIC's "8A1 humanitarian claims process," $30.54 million through its 8A2 process, and $6.16 million through appeals.

In addition, ICHEIC awarded or allocated another approximately $172.3 million for social welfare and educational programs. "Oversight and distribution of funds for the programs sponsored by ICHEIC were outsourced to the Claims Conference."[50] The programs consisted of the following: $146 million was paid or allocated for programs for "Social Welfare for Needy

[48] See ICHEIC Claims Process, 19-Mar-07. When the three numbers are added, however, the total equals 48,344 and not 48,263. It is unclear why ICHEIC reported a slightly lower total of 48,263 offers. For purpose of this analysis, ICHEIC's own final number (48,263) will be used, as it is possible that ICHEIC reduced the number by 81 offers for undisclosed reasons.

[49] Id. at 3 ("Notes on the Claims Section").

Holocaust Victims;" the ICHEIC Service Corps received or was allocated $1.8 million; the Initiative to Bring Jewish Cultural Literacy to Youth in the Former Soviet Union received or was allocated "over $12 million;" the ICHEIC Program for Holocaust Education in Europe ("created and carried out by Yad Vashem") received or was allocated "over $12 million;" and the March of the Living received a one-time grant of $500,000.

In total, then, ICHEIC reported distributions of $478.55 million: $306.25 million in individual payments, and $172.3 million in social welfare and educational programs.

ICHEIC has not specified the number of individuals assisted by its social welfare and educational programs. ICHEIC also has not specified how the balance of the funds, $71.45 million remaining from the $550 million total fund, was distributed or otherwise spent.

The "total lifetime budget amount[ed] to $95.5 million, or 17.4% of the total funds received" ($550 million) as part of the ICHEIC process. [51] It is unclear if the "lifetime budget" is equivalent to the expenses actually incurred in administering the ICHEIC programs; however, it is assumed that the $95.5 million "budgeted" refers to administrative expenses.[52]

Although ICHEIC distributed or allocated approximately $172.3 million for social welfare and educational programs, data concerning the number of claimants to those funds is unavailable. Likewise, the number of individuals assisted through such programs also is unavailable. Without precise information concerning the number of applicants to, and individual payments from, the social welfare and educational programs, ICHEIC's total processing costs per claim received and per claim paid cannot be fully determined. However, based upon what ICHEIC defined as "eligible" insurance claims, the processing cost per claim paid was $1,979, calculated by dividing ICHEIC's budgeted expenses of $95.5 million by the number of insurance claims ICHEIC stated that it had compensated (48,263). The processing cost per claim received

[51] See ICHEIC Concluding Meeting Report, at 23.

[52] ICHEIC did not specify whether the $95.5 million "budgeted" was actually spent. If some portion of the $95.5 million budgeted for administrative expenses was not spent in support of distribution but rather was allocated for payments to claimants, ICHEIC's costs of administration would have been lower than the amount ICHEIC cited in its report, 17.4%. That information, however, is not available.

was $1,043, calculated by dividing ICHEIC's budgeted administrative expenses by the number of claims received (91,558).[53]

Another figure of note is the $172.3 million that ICHEIC distributed or allocated to social welfare and humanitarian programs. That sum constituted 36% of the total amount paid out by ICHEIC ($478.55 million). By way of comparison, the approximately $256.3 million cy pres Looted Assets Class program of the Swiss Banks Settlement, assisting the neediest survivors, along with the $14.5 million Victim List Project ($270.8 million) – together essentially equivalent to ICHEIC's social welfare and educational programs – constituted 21% of the almost $1.285 billion distributed through the Court's processes. These figures are significant because administrative expenses in connection with oversight of social welfare/educational programs generally are lower than those required to establish and oversee an individualized claims review process. In the Swiss Banks Settlement, 79% of the funds distributed were based upon individual claims analysis, whereas in the case of ICHEIC, 64% of the funds distributed were based upon individual claims analysis.

IV. CONCLUSION

The Swiss Banks Settlement program was subject to a variety of administrative complexities not attendant to the other three programs analyzed herein. Nevertheless, administrative expenses for the Swiss Banks Settlement distribution process, analyzed and authorized pursuant to court order, were on par with, and in some instances below, those of the other programs. The costs of administration of the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund as a percentage of the total fund (11.3%) were lower than those for ICHEIC (17.4%) and Agent Orange (12.1%). Moreover, the processing costs per claim paid and claim received ($373/$154) were significantly lower than for the contemporaneous 9/11 Fund ($15,629/$11,738), and also lower than for ICHEIC ($1,979/$1,043). Nor were these costs significantly higher than those in Agent Orange, a less complex program that had operated several years earlier under different national and [53] The cost per claim received and per claim paid likely would be lower if data concerning applications to and payments from ICHEIC's social welfare and educational programs were available.

global economic conditions ($137/$116). While maintaining the focus on individual victims and recognizing and recording their history, the claims process also was able to preserve the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund, and ultimately to award more than that amount – nearly $1.285 billion – to over 458,436 Holocaust survivors and heirs worldwide.

	March 8, 1920: Switzerland is admitted to the League of Nations.
1926: The Bavarian government passes a stringent anti-Romani law, and founds a Central Office to collect information on the Roma; by 1936, the office holds nearly 20,000 files.
	1930: Switzerland has 4.1 million inhabitants; approximately 0.5 percent of the population is Jewish.
	March 26, 1931: Switzerland adopts the Law on Foreigner State and Settlement (Gesetz über Aufenthalt und Niederlassung der Ausländer - "ANAG"), essentially preventing most foreigners from settling in the country and becoming naturalized Swiss citizens. The law also regulates asylum, establishing Switzerland as a temporary rather than permanent stopping point for refugees. The law goes into effect on January 1, 1934.
	October 27, 1931: The NYTimes reports on a Viennese newspaper article describing a large-scale espionage operation in Switzerland; the spies report to various governments the details of their nationals' Swiss bank deposits.
January 1933: On the eve of Adolf Hitler's rise to power, approximately 503,000 Jews live in Germany. The Jewish population of Berlin was 160,564. Jewish nationals comprise less than 1% of the total German population of 65 million. About 99,000 (19.8%) of Germany's Jewish population are eastern European nationals. mental disabilities; Roma (Gypsies); "asocial elements;" and Afro-Germans. August 25, 1933: The Haavara Transfer Agreement is signed by German officials and Zionist representatives from Germany and Palestine. The agreement permits Jews emigrating to Palestine to take a small amount of their German assets with them. September 6, 1933: Frederick T. Birchall, a Pulitzer prize-winning NYTimes correspondent reporting on the Nazi Party Rally at Nuremberg, Germany, writes: "Especially will there be no relenting in the Nazi hostility toward supposed enemies, and particularly toward the Jews. Aryanism is now the keystone of Nazi policy, as all along it has been the principal tenet of Adolf Hitler's personal faith. It is also in Germany the most popular of the Nazi principles and of all the Nazi tendencies is the most warmly defended by the Germans. Its corollary is persecution even to extermination - the word is the Nazis' own - of the non-Aryans, if that can be accomplished without too great world disturbance." September 17, 1933: The Reichsvertretung der Deutschen Juden (Reich Representation of German Jews) is established under the leadership of Rabbi Leo Baeck. The Reichsvertretung calls on German Jews to demonstrate "unity and honor." It seeks to assist in all areas of Jewish life including education, occupational training, social welfare, and emigration assistance. September 22, 1933: In Germany, the newly founded Chambers of Literature, Press, Broadcasting, Theater, Film, Music, and Fine Arts required to swear an oath of loyalty to Hitler. September 18, 1934: The Soviet Union enters the League of Nations.

	September 19, 1934: James G. McDonald, then-League of Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Coming from Germany (and later U.S. Ambassador to Israel) writes in his diary of a talk with Swiss Police Chief Heinrich Rothmund in which Rothmund excludes Jews from his definition of political refugees. Rothmund speaks of his belief that excessive Jewish presence and influence would arouse antisemitism among the Swiss.
October 7, 1934: In standardized letters sent to the government, congregations of Jehovah's Witnesses all over Germany declare political neutrality, while rejecting government restrictions on the practice of their religion.
November-December 1934: SS chief Himmler consolidates control over and de facto unifies the German state political police forces into the Gestapo office in Berlin under the authority of his deputy, Reinhard Heydrich.	November 19, 1934: The Swiss Federal Council enacts a law providing for banking secrecy, with violation subject to criminal penalties and fines. The law is intended to thwart foreign governments' investigations into their clients' investments abroad. It protects tax evaders from prosecution and gives Swiss banks competitive advantage. The law is not enacted for the purpose of protecting funds deposited in Swiss banks by Jewish victims of Nazi persecution.
December 10, 1934: SS chief Himmler creates the Inspectorate of Concentration Camps under the leadership of SS General Theodor Eicke. This move formalizes the July 1934 SS takeover and centralization of the concentration camp system.

with the intent of 1) expanding the range of criminal offenses to encompass any contact between men, both physical and in form of word or gesture, that could be construed as sexual; and 2) strengthening penalties for all violations of the revised law. The revision facilitates the systematic persecution of homosexual men and provides police with broader means for prosecuting homosexual men. August 31, 1935: President Roosevelt signs the Neutrality Act, which prohibits the sale of arms and other materials to belligerent nations. The act is a victory for U.S. isolationists.
	September 8, 1935: A popular referendum halts the attempt to introduce an authoritarian total reform of the Swiss federal constitution.
September 15, 1935: At the Nazi party rally in Nuremberg, Germany adopts the "Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor" (Nuremberg laws), which officially disenfranchises and classifies Jews as noncitizens. The population is divided into two classes - Reich citizens, of Aryan ancestry; and state subjects, Jews. Jews can no longer hold government jobs, serve in the army, vote, marry non-Jews, engage in extramarital sexual relations with Aryans, or hire female non-Jewish domestic workers. October 3, 1935: Italian forces invade Ethiopia.

recognizes many regulations and restrictions already in place at the local level on Roma (Gypsies) residing in Germany. Under its authority, state and local police forces round up Roma as well as other persons who they deem to be behaving in "a Gypsy-like manner."
June 17, 1936: Hitler consolidates all German police agencies under the SS, and appoints Heinrich Himmler as Chief of the German Police and Reich Leader of the SS.	June 17, 1936: The Swiss Central Office for Refugee Relief (SZF) is created.
	July 4, 1936: Under a Provisional Agreement of the League of Nations, ratified by Switzerland and other nations, refugees are to be turned back only after receiving prior notification, and only after they fail to take steps necessary to leave for another nation.
July 12, 1936: The SS establishes the Sachsenhausen concentration camp near Oranienburg, located to the north of Berlin, Germany. By September, German authorities have imprisoned about 1,000 people in the camp.
July 16, 1936: Civil war erupts in Spain. The Loyalists are anticlerical and antimonarchy leftists, and the nationalists are conservatives led by General Francisco Franco. Germany and Italy begin military assistance to the nationalists, while Russia supports the Loyalists. German authorities order the arrest and forcible relocation of all Roma (Gypsies) in the Greater Berlin area to a special camp in the Berlin suburb of Marzahn. Beginning in 1938 the authorities begin to deport Roma from Marzahn to other concentration camps.

	around the world. Its aims are to mobilize the Jewish people against the rise of Nazism, to secure equal political and economic rights worldwide, and to support the establishment of a national Jewish home in Palestine.
August 1, 1936: The Summer Olympic Games open in Berlin. The Olympic Games are a Nazi propaganda success. German officials remove anti-Jewish signs from public display and restrain anti-Jewish activities. The U.S. Olympic Committee bars two Jewish runners from competing. Hitler refuses to present African-American sprinter Jesse Owen his four gold medals. The NYTimes notes at the end of the year that Hitler's investment in the Games was immensely popular among his countrymen. "Perfect in setting, brilliant in presentation and unparalleled in performance, the Olympic Games of 1936 stand apart in history as the greatest sports event of all time. With the fanatical support of the entire German nation backing it, with 5,000 athletes from fifty nations competing and with the almost incredible number of 4,500,000 spectators witnessing the show, the Berlin festival set a standard of such superlative excellence that it may never be matched again …. Money meant nothing. Adolf Hitler merely ordered that everything be gotten ready and everything was gotten ready." August 28, 1936: German authorities implement mass arrests of Jehovah's Witnesses in Germany. Most are sent to concentration camps. September 1936: At their world convention in Lucerne, the Jehovah's Witnesses pass a resolution strongly criticizing the German government and its policies against Jews, communists, the church and others,

May 29, 1938: Hungary adopts comprehensive anti-Jewish laws and measures, excluding Jews from many professions. June 13-18, 1938: German police round up 9,000 so-called asocials and convicted criminals in "Operation Work Shy," along with 1,000 Jews, who are sent to concentration camps. One thousand Roma also are arrested as part of "Gypsy Clean-up Week." June 14, 1938: Jewish-owned commercial enterprises are identified and registered under the "Third Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law." June 25, 1938: German Jewish doctors, having lost their right to practice in government hospitals (March 3, 1936), now are forbidden from treating non-Jewish patients. July 6-14, 1938: Because the League of Nations is unable to deal with refugee conditions in Germany, President Roosevelt convenes a conference at Evian, France, attended by 32 nations. No nation except the Dominican Republic offers to accept refugees. The Bergier Final Report notes that "the majority of the 32 governments represented seemed to be more concerned about 'getting rid' of the refugees they had already taken in." In 1998, Seymour J. Rubin, one of the U.S. negotiators of the 1946 Washington Accords with Switzerland, notes that "Switzerland did admit many more refugees in proportion to its population than any other nation." July 8, 1938: Munich's main synagogue is demolished on Adolf Hitler's express orders.

August 8, 1938: SS authorities open the Mauthausen concentration camp near Linz, Austria. August 17, 1938: The Reich Minister of the Interior decrees that all Jewish men residing in Germany must adopt the middle name "Israel." Jewish women are required to take the middle name "Sarah."
	August 18, 1938: The Swiss Federal Council decides to refuse entry to all refugees without a visa, thus effectively closing the Swiss borders. August 19, 1938: International Committee of the Red Cross delegate Colonel Guillaume Favre visits the Dachau concentration camp.
August 26, 1938: Adolf Eichmann, working in the Nazi Security Service (SD) and a self-styled "expert" on Jews, opens the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna. September 1-3, 1938: Italy announces that foreign Jews no longer may reside in Italy or its possessions, while those already living in Italy must leave within six months. Jews nationalized after January 1, 1919 lose their Italian citizenship.
	September 7, 1938: A circular is issued clarifying the August 19, 1938 instructions: refugees without visas are to be turned back, especially those "who are Jewish or probably Jewish," and their passports are to be marked "turned back."
September 29-30, 1938: Germany, Italy, Great Britain, and France sign the Munich agreement, by which Czechoslovakia must surrender its border regions and defenses (the so-called Sudeten region) to Nazi Germany. German troops occupy these regions between October 1 and 10, 1938. September 30, 1938: All licenses for Jewish doctors are revoked (except those treating Jewish patients are allowed to continue). October 1, 1938: The "Police Station for Gypsies" at Munich Police headquarters becomes part of the Reich Criminal Investigation Police Office.

	October 4, 1938: Germany agrees to Switzerland's demand to stamp passports of Jews with a "J" ("Jude"). Switzerland thus becomes the only neutral country to initiate a German anti-Jewish decree. This Swiss demand is not made public until 1954.
October 5, 1938: All German passports held by Jews are invalidated by the Reich Ministry of the Interior; Jews must surrender their old passports to be marked with a "J." October 6, 1938: Germany annexes the Sudetenland, while Slovakia becomes autonomous. October 8, 1938: In Slovakia, the right-wing, antisemitic Hlinka Guard is created. October 28, 1938: Nearly 17,000 stateless Jews, mostly from Poland, are expelled from Germany to Poland. November 6, 1938: Herschel Grynszpan, a Jewish student in Paris whose parents were deported on October 28, assassinates Ernst vom Rath, counsellor at the German embassy in Paris. November 9-10, 1938: Under the pretext of retaliation of the vom Rath assassination, Kristallnacht ("Night of the Broken Glass") riots occur in Germany and Austria. The Nazis set fire to 191 synagogues. Ninety-one Jews are killed. More than 30,000, or more than 10%, of Germany's remaining Jews are arrested and sent to concentration camps. The Nazis break into and loot thousands of homes and shops. November 12, 1938: The German government issues the Decree on the Elimination of the Jews from Economic Life, barring Jews from operating retail stores, sales agencies, and from carrying on a trade. The law also forbids Jews from selling goods or services at an establishment of any kind. Cultural events for Jews (theater, film, exhibitions and the like) are banned. Additionally, a fine of 1 billion marks is imposed upon all German Jewry for the Kristallnacht damage (the "Sühneleistung" or "atonement fine"); Jews are banned from receiving insurance payments. In addition, the Reichsfluchtsteuer (emigration taxes), enacted in 1931 and levied on people likely to emigrate, are extended. To avoid the high penalties and meet the financial burden, many Jews and others who were persecuted have to withdraw their assets and securities, including deposits abroad such as in Switzerland. November 15, 1938: German authorities ban Jewish children from German public schools; Jewish children now can only attend segregated Jewish schools financed and managed by the Jewish communities.	November 15, 1938: In a speech before parliament, Heinrich Rothmund responds to criticism of his restrictive policies with an explicit denunciation of "Eastern Jews": "As you will see, we are not such horrible monsters after all! But that we do not let anyone walk all over us, and especially not Eastern Jews, who as is well known, try and try again to do just that, because they think a straight line is crooked, here our position is probably in complete agreement with our Swiss people."

November 17, 1938: Italy announces new racial laws defining who is a Jew, barring intermarriage between Italians and Jews, and limiting Jewish economic activity. November 30, 1938: The licenses of all Jewish attorneys are revoked. December 1938: The remaining 6,000 Jews of the free city of Danzig develop an "orderly" plan with the Nazi government to leave Danzig by May 1939 (later extended until the fall of 1939). Under an agreement with Nazi officials to finance the emigration, they negotiate the sale of Jewish communal property, including the historic Danzig Great Synagogue, which is torn down in 1939, and the cemetery. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) "purchases" the ritual collection, which is sent to the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. December 3, 1938: The German government issues the Decree on the Utilization of Jewish Property, making "aryanization" of all Jewish businesses compulsory. German authorities force Jews to sell immovable property, businesses, and stocks to non-Jews, usually at prices far below market value. Drivers' licenses for Jews are revoked, and Berlin institutes a "Jewish curfew." December 8, 1938: SS chief and Chief of German Police Heinrich Himmler issues the Decree for "Combating the Gypsy Plague." The decree centralizes Nazi Germany's official response to so-called "Gypsy Question;" defines Gypsies as an inferior race; tasks the German Criminal Police with establishing a nationwide database, identifies all Gypsies residing on the territory of the so-called Greater German Reich; and proclaims Dr. Robert Ritter's Research Institute for Racial Hygiene and Population Biology as the "expert" authority to determine membership in the "Gypsy race." December 1938-August 1939: The United Kingdom admits between 9,000 and 10,000 primarily Jewish children as refugees from the Greater German Reich. Through the Kindertransport, British authorities agree to permit children under the age of 17 to enter Great Britain from Germany, Austria and the annexed Czech territories. Private citizens and organizations must guarantee payment of each child's care, education, and eventual emigration from Britain. January 1, 1939: Jewish businesses are forced to close under the Law Excluding Jews from Commercial Enterprises. January 17, 1939: The German government prohibits Jews from working as nurses, veterinarians, holistic practitioners, dentists and pharmacists.	January 20, 1939: The Swiss Federal Council orders visas to be required for all foreign emigrants.

January 24, 1939: The Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration opens in Berlin, centralizing in the hands of the SS all authority over Jewish emigration. January 30, 1939: In a Reichstag speech, Hitler threatens to exterminate the Jewish race in Europe

if world war should once again break out. He states: "If international-finance Jewry inside and outside Europe should succeed once more in plunging the nations into yet another world war, the consequence will not be the Bolshevization of the earth and thereby the victory of Jewry, but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe." February 9, 1939: Senator Robert Wagner of New York and Representative Edith Rogers of Massachusetts introduce a bill to permit the entry of 20,000 refugee children, ages 14 and under, from the Greater German Reich into the United States over the course of two years (1939 and 1940). The children would be granted entry without reference to the quota system. In contrast to the United Kingdom, which accepts several thousand Jewish refugee children as part of the "Kindertransport," the U.S. bill dies in committee in the summer of 1939.	February 20, 1939: Heinrich Rothmund, chief of the police division of the Swiss Ministry of Justice, announces that Switzerland at that time was harboring 10,000-12,000 refugees, 3,000 being penniless Jews for whom the Swiss Jewish community is required to contribute approximately 250,000 Swiss Francs monthly. Bregenz consular employee Ernst Prodolliet, who had been issuing entry visas to Austrians, is subjected to a disciplinary hearing for this activity and is told at the hearing that "'[o]ur consulate's job is not to ensure the well-being of Jews.'"
March 2, 1939: Cardinal Pacelli (1876-1958) is elected Pope Pius XII.	March 1939: St. Gallen police chief Paul Grueninger, who had ignored official Swiss policy and falsified records to assist preparations are made to establish "Jews' houses" requiring Jewish families to live together. May 15, 1939: More than 900 German Jewish refugees arrive at Cuba aboard the German passenger ship SS St. Louis and are refused entry on the grounds that their entry permits are invalid. The U.S. also refuses entry, and the refugees return to Europe, where they are admitted to England, Belgium, Holland, and France. A concentration camp for women is opened north of Berlin, at Ravensbrück. May 17, 1939: British Colonial Secretary Malcolm MacDonald issues a White Paper proposing an independent Palestinian state within 10 years; permitting 75,000 Jews to enter Palestine within five years, with subsequent immigration subject to Arab consent; and immediately prohibiting the sale of land to Jews. In effect, the British government repudiates the Balfour Declaration. The White Paper is never endorsed by the League of Nations nor agreed to by the Zionists, the Palestinian Arabs, and the Arab states. July 4, 1939: German authorities establish the Reich Association of Jews in Germany, with leadership handpicked by the German Security Police, as the sole legal Jewish organization in Germany. The Association is charged with the administration of Jewish schools and financial support of poor Jews.	July 30, 1939: The NYTimes reports that, in anticipation of another European war, the Swiss Bank Corporation has leased property in New York previously occupied by the Federal Reserve Bank, including large underground vaults capable of August 2, 1939: At the urging of Leo Szilard (1998-1964), a Hungarian nuclear physicist who is alarmed that Nazi Germany might develop the atomic bomb, Albert Einstein writes to President Roosevelt advising of the military potential of atomic energy. His letter, delivered to President Roosevelt on October 11, leads to the Manhattan Project and the U.S. development of the atomic bomb.

August 23, 1939: V.M. Molotov and Joachim von Ribbentrop, foreign ministers of the Soviet Union and Germany, sign a German-Russian nonaggression pact in Moscow. They secretly carve out spheres of influence in eastern and central Europe, with Russia gaining eastern Poland, Bessarabia, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.
	August 30, 1939: The Swiss Parliament grants the Federal Council broad legislative power and the power to make changes in the constitution.
September 1, 1939: Germany invades Poland, marking the beginning of World War II. Adolf Hitler orders the first Nazi program of murder, a "euthanasia program" known as T4. German physicians are empowered to determine which mentally and physically ill persons are to be killed; ultimately some 70,000 Germans are euthanized between September 1939 and late summer 1941. Curfews restricting Jewish individuals from going out in public after 9 p.m. in summer and 8 p.m. in winter are imposed.	September 1, 1939: Switzerland proclaims its neutrality and successfully preserves it throughout World War II. [Langer, An Encyclopedia of World History] When the war begins, there are 7,000 to 8,000 refugees in Switzerland.
September 3, 1939: Great Britain and France declare war on Germany.

children into a euthanasia center. The first deportations to occupied Poland from Austria and the former Czechoslovakia begin.
October 17, 1939: The Reich Security Main Offices issues its "Freezing-of-Movement Directive," barring Roma from leaving their towns of residence or other current places of residence.	October 17, 1939: The Resolution on Changes in Police Regulations for Foreigners, passed by the Swiss Council of Ministers, calls on the cantons to deport illegal refugees (i.e. all but deserters and "political" refugees), while also calling for those remaining in the country to be placed in long-term internment, to provide work beneficial for Switzerland, and to contribute to their room and board.
October 20-26, 1939: Adolf Eichmann oversees the deportation of approximately 3,800 Austrian, Czech, and Polish Jews from Vienna, Moravská Ostrava, and Katowice to an area south of Lublin called Nisko. October 26, 1939: Germany annexes the former Polish regions of Upper Silesia, West Prussia, Pomerania, Poznan, Ciechanow (Zichenau), part of Lodz, and the Free City of Danzig (Gdansk). From these newly annexed regions, the German government creates two new administrative districts: Danzig-West Prussia and Posen. German authorities place those areas of occupied Poland not annexed directly by Germany or by the Soviet Union under a German civilian administration, the Generalgouvernement. Governor General Hans Frank imposes compulsory labor on Jews in the Generalgouvernment.
	November 20, 1939: Following Nazi occupation of Poland, Polish bank Lodzer Industrieller GmbH asks Credit Suisse to transfer assets deposited with it to an account at the German Reichsbank in Berlin; the Swiss bank's legal department recommends not complying with the who have died of disease and hunger. Upon return to Switzerland, Blättler gives public lectures, but is quickly stopped by the Swiss authorities.

January 30, 1942: In a Berlin speech marking the ninth anniversary of Nazi rule in Germany, Adolf Hitler speaks of the Jews: "I took great care to make no inconsiderate prophecies, but this war will never end in the fashion in which the Jews so confidently hope. It is not the Aryan peoples which will be ejected from the Continent of Europe. For the first time in centuries the Mosaic law of an eye for an eye and tooth for a tooth will be applied increasingly as our struggles spread and the hour will come when the most insidious enemy of all times will cease having a role to play and the destruction of Judaism will be accomplished." These words are reported the next day in the NYTimes.
	February 1942: The Bergier Commission Final Report notes that at this time: "The Swiss Intelligence Service obtained detailed reports and sketches of mass shootings, through interrogation of German deserters interned in Switzerland."

February 18, 1943: Police in Munich destroy the White Rose student resistance movement, arresting its leaders. February 26, 1943: The first large transport of Roma (Gypsies) deported from the so-called Greater German Reich arrives at Auschwitz. German authorities open the Gypsy family camp BIIe at Auschwitz-Birkenau. February 27, 1943: The "Factory Action," or deportation of German Jews working in the armanents industry in Berlin, begins. March 1943: The World Jewish Congress and the Ecumenical Council of Churches send a report to the High Commissioner for Refugees at the League of Nations, copying the British and American governments, warning that "the deliberate extermination campaign of the Jews" is "at its height" and requesting guarantees for neutral nations regarding re-emigration of refugees after the war. March 1943: Trude Neumann, the daughter of Zionist leader Theodor Herzl, dies of starvation at the Theresienstadt ghetto. March 1, 1943: The American Jewish Congress sponsors a rally at New York's Madison Square Garden to "Stop Hitler Now." Attended by 75,000 people in the Garden and surrounding streets, rally leaders present a rescue plan to President Roosevelt. March 3-22, 1943: Bulgarian occupation authorities deport 11,343 Jews from Bulgarian-occupied Thrace, Macedonia, and Pirot to German custody. After taking custody of the Jews, the German authorities deport them to Treblinka. On March 10, however, Bulgaria accedes to internal pressure from its own citizens and refuses to deport Bulgarian Jews.

	March 12, 1943: By decree, the Swiss Federal Council "place[s] all refugee assets under the control of the Confederation. Currency and valuables [are] to be taken from refugees and placed under the trusteeship administration. This decree retroactively creates a legal basis for a practice that had long been adopted in the reception camps." Thus, refugees can no longer manage their own assets without approval by police authorities. In May, the "trusteeship" for these assets is assumed by the Swiss Volksbank, which the Bergier Commission notes "ma[kes] every effort to maintain the account correctly."
March 15, 1943: German units begin deporting Jews from Salonika, Greece, to Auschwitz.
April 7, 1943: The SS shuts down the Chelmno killing center, eliminates the evidence of the killings there and abandons the site.
April 12, 1943: According to German propagandists, the bodies of thousands of Polish officers massacred by the USSR are discovered in mass graves at Katyn near Smolensk.
April 19-30, 1943: On the day of the Warsaw ghetto uprising, the Allies convene an international conference in Bermuda to study the refugee question. No government expresses a willingness to accept Jewish victims of Nazism. Palestine is excluded from consideration.
April 19-May 16, 1943: German forces, led by SS General Juergen Stroop, renew deportations and began to destroy the Warsaw ghetto, triggering an armed uprising within the ghetto. Jewish fighters battle the Germans in the streets and from hidden bunkers. German forces begin burning the ghetto, building by building. The Warsaw ghetto uprising continues for weeks, ending on May 16. April 27, 1943: The U.S. Board of Economic Warfare ("BEW") estimates that the Nazis have looted $36 billion as of the end of 1941 and continue to pillage at the rate of tens of billions of dollars a year. The BEW reports that "'for magnitude and ruthlessness the German looting of occupied Europe surpasses all previous conquests in history.'" A NYTimes editorial observes that the Nazis have "stolen and shipped to Germany industrial machinery, raw materials, scientific equipment, horses, cattle, sheep and pigs; they have stripped public and private art collections of their treasures to adorn their palaces; they have filched office furniture, park benches and garden tools, food, soap, clothing and shoes; they have even pilfered the hinges from doors and windows." As to property that could not be moved, the Nazis "simply [took] over title." Further, "300,000,000 Europeans are today the slaves of their Nazi masters, forced to work for them or starve." April 30, 1943: Jews holding foreign passports in the Bergen-Belsen ghetto (later a concentration camp) are to be exchanged for German nationals held by the Allies. May 8, 1943: The Jewish resistance headquarters in the Warsaw Ghetto, Mila 18, is overrun by German troops and resistance leaders commit suicide or are killed.	May 9, 1943: The Synod of the Evangelical-Reformed Churches of the City of Basel

May 13, 1943: The North African campaign ends with the capture of 125,000 German and 115,000 Italian troops.
June 23, 1943: Himmler orders the liquidation of all still existing ghettos in eastern Europe and the removal of Jews able to work to forced labor camps; those incapable of work are sent to killing centers.
July 1, 1943: Jews in the Reich are placed under police law, under the "Regulation to the Reich Citizenship Law."
July 5, 1943: The Germans launch a major offensive at the Kursk region of the Russian central front. Germany is repulsed by the Soviet army in a major turning point of the war.
July 10, 1943: The Allies invade Sicily.
July 25, 1943: Mussolini resigns and is arrested. Pietro Badoglio forms a new Italian government.
	July 26, 1943: The Swiss Police Division eases conditions for refugees entering Switzerland.
July 27, 1943: The Royal Air Force (RAF) bombs Hamburg, causing a firestorm that kills 40,000 civilians.	July 27, 1943: A Swiss Police Division directive orders all illegal refugees along the southern border to be expelled to Italy.
July 28, 1943: Polish Catholic courier Jan Karski arrives in the U.S. to inform officials about the plight of the Jews.
August 2, 1943: Several hundred Jewish partisans revolt at Treblinka. Some 200 escape but many are recaptured and killed. In September the camp is dismantled and all traces of its existence are removed.

	August 13, 1943: An American B-24 combat plane crashes in Switzerland; members of its crew are interned and in some cases imprisoned in Switzerland for the duration of the war. Although Switzerland repatriates German military personnel who are found on Swiss territory, Switzerland interns American military personnel, often under poor conditions. Switzerland also shoots down a number of the Allied planes flying over Swiss air space.
	August 22, 1943: The British Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Economic Warfare delivers a letter to the Swiss legation in London, which is shared with the U.S. Secretary of State. The letter expresses "astonishment" that Swiss exports to Germany, including important military equipment, have increased substantially from the first to the second quarter of the year. The letter observes that the Swiss had promised to impose an export quota on these items as of August 1; however, the "benefit which we expected to obtain from this concession is largely nullified by the very substantial exports in July." Thus, "at a time when our armies are commencing the invasion of Axis Europe, we are faced with a sudden marked increase in Swiss assistance to Germany and her satellites," which is "hardly … evidence of a desire on the part of your Government to contribute to the liberation of Europe."
September 8, 1943: Italy, Germany's Axis partner, surrenders unconditionally to the Allies. German military and police units quickly occupy northern Italy.
September 9, 1943: Allied troops land at Salerno, south of Naples, on the Italian mainland. German forces occupy most of Italy and disarm Italian	September-December, 1943: Switzerland accepts 7,800 civilians and 20,000 members of the military from Italy.

forces in the north.
	September 14-22, 1943: In a series of directives, Switzerland begins to liberalize its refugee policy in the south (Ticino), responding to the massive numbers of refugees fleeing Italy. Switzerland recognizes mortal danger as a basis for asylum; authorizes acceptance of women and children; and forbids the army from expelling refugees without consulting civilian authorities. On September 22, Rothmund orders acceptance of greater numbers of Jewish refugees in the Ticino area, finding that they are in "exceptional danger." Expulsions continue in other parts of the country.
September 20 - October, 1943: Approximately 7,200 Danish Jews escape to Sweden, many by boat, with the help of the Danish resistance movement and many individual Danish citizens.
	October 1, 1943: Switzerland freezes assets in its territory owned by nationals of Italy.
October 4, 1943: In his talk to SS leaders, Himmler speaks openly about the extermination of the Jews, calling it "a page of glory in our history" that "has never been written and is never to be written."	October 4, 1943: The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. William Leahy, writes to U.S. Secretary of State Cordell Hull to recommend a total economic blockade of Switzerland because of its military aid to Germany. He states that "Switzerland should not be permitted to receive any imports whatsoever which we can control so long as she continues to lend material aid to the German war effort." The letter notes: "It is particularly significant that at the very time that the British and American combined bomber offensive is beginning to substantially affect German production of munitions, Swiss exports of munitions to Germany have been considerably increased, thus materially decreasing the military effectiveness of our air attacks on the Axis."

October 13, 1943: Italy declares war on Germany. October 14, 1943: Jewish prisoners at Sobibor begin an armed revolt. About 300 escape. About 100 are recaptured and killed. After the revolt, SS Special Detachment Sobibor supervises the dismantling of the camp. October 16, 1943: More than 8,300 Italian Jews are sent to Auschwitz. Although an ally of Hitler, Mussolini's government does not cooperate in the deportation and murder of Italian Jews, and the Vatican and monasteries together shelter nearly 5,000 Jews. In the wake of Mussolini's deposal, however, the Nazis begin deportations.	November 9, 1943: The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) is created in Washington D.C.; its purpose is to deliver emergency aid to displaced persons. Switzerland, citing neutrality, does not join the organization.
November 17, 1943: In October, the Nazis begin to dismantle the Treblinka camp, and in November complete the process, plowing the camp into the ground and planting trees to remove all traces of the killing facility. November 28, 1943: Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin meet for the first time at talks in Tehran (the Tehran Conference). December 2, 1943: The Inspectorate of Concentration Camps redesignates the Buna subcamp of Auschwitz I as Concentration Camp Auschwitz III, or Monowitz.	End of 1943: The Swiss military attaché in Helsinki, Finland, Major Lüthi, sends Bern, Switzerland a report by a Baltic national who on his own admission had been involved in the murder of about 16,000 people. The man describes systematic mass shootings and murder by asphyxiation with carbon monoxide gas from engine exhaust. In the report, Lüthi mentions a high-ranking German officer who confirms the mass execution, and puts the number of victims in Lodz at 450,000 and in Warsaw at 380,000.

	1944: The Swiss Vice-Consul in Budapest, Carl Lutz, saves tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from deportation and death in Auschwitz by creating and issuing an official-looking but false protective document, the Schutzpass. He is demoted after the war to an insignificant post.
January 13 - 16, 1944: Upon receiving a U.S. Treasury Department report on the "Acquiescence of this Government to the Murder of European Jews," Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau, Jr. meets with President Roosevelt. Shortly after, on January 22, 1944, Roosevelt issues Executive Order 9417, creating the War Refugee Board. Roosevelt instructs the War Refugee Board to take measures to rescue victims of enemy oppression in imminent danger of death. The Board's activity contributes to saving tens of thousands of Jews from deportation and death, possibly up to 200,000.
January 27, 1944: The Nazis' siege of Leningrad, lasting 900 days and resulting in more than one million Soviet civilian deaths, is ended by Soviet forces.
	February 1944: The Allies announce their "Gold Declaration," opposing the sale of gold by Germany to other nations, including Switzerland.

March 19, 1944: German troops occupy Hungary, and anti-Jewish laws are promptly implemented.
Early Spring, 1944: German authorities begin to evacuate Lublin/Majdanek and deport the remaining inmates to Auschwitz, Natzweiler-Struthof, Ravensbrück, Plaszow, and Gross-Rosen.
	April 2, 1944: The NYTimes reports on its front page that "[a]t least fifty persons were killed and more than 150 seriously wounded" on April 1, 1944 after 30 American military planes, likely due to weather conditions, bombed Schaffhausen, Switzerland rather than the presumed target, Singen, Germany. The U.S. pays $4 million in reparations.
April 4, 1944: The U.S. obtains photographs of Auschwitz via air reconnaissance.
April 5, 1944: Hungarian authorities require all Jews to wear the yellow star.
	May 13, 1944: Heinrich Rothmund states to members of the American Legation in Bern that he is "convinced that the news of Jewish extermination by the Gestapo [is] consistent with reality."
May 15-July 9, 1944: Hungarian gendarmerie officials, under the direction of the German SS, deport around 440,000 Jews from Hungary. Most are deported to Auschwitz, Nazi war criminals. August 11, 1945: The first of several anti-Jewish riots begins in Poland (Cracow); other riots take place in Sosnowiec (October 25) and Lublin (November 19). August 14, 1945: Japan accepts the Allied terms for surrender. September 2, 1945: Japan surrenders and World War II officially ends.	September 14, 1945: The Swiss Police Division relaxes restrictions upon refugees' freedom of movement.

October, 1945: The post-War military government assumes control over all German assets abroad. November 13, 1945: The Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, charged with reviewing political, economic and social conditions in Palestine in connection with possible Jewish immigration, is established. In its April 20, 1946 report, it accepts the Harrison Report recommendation that 100,000 Jewish DPs immigrate to Palestine. The U.S. proposes that a share of the assets looted by Germany be allocated for relief and rehabilitation of needy Jewish Nazi victims. November 20, 1945: The International Military Tribunal (IMT), made up of US, British, French, and Soviet judges, begins a trial of 22 major Nazi leaders at Nuremberg, Germany. December 20, 1945: The military governors of the four German occupation zones adopt a law authorizing each zone to establish courts to try Nazi war criminals.

December 22, 1945: Under the "Truman Directive," displaced persons, particularly children, are allowed entry into the United States.
	1946: SIG (the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities) and the World Jewish Congress initiate discussions with Swiss government representatives concerning unclaimed Holocaust victims' funds.
January 14, 1946: 18 countries enter into the Paris Reparations Agreement, providing for restitution of monetary gold looted by Nazi Germany; allocation of nonmonetary gold located in Germany; and $25 million of such assets found in neutral countries, for the relief and resettlement of surviving Nazi persecutees. Switzerland does not join this agreement but in May 1946 agrees to the Washington Accords (see below).
	March 1946: Swiss refugee camps begin to close.
May 1, 1946: Britain rejects the recommendation of the Anglo-American Commission to admit 100,000 Jews into Palestine.
	May 25, 1946: By an exchange of letters, the Washington Accords are confirmed by the United States, United Kingdom, and France in agreement with Switzerland. The aim of the Accords is to return hundreds of millions of dollars in assets that Nazi Germany looted from European banks and Holocaust victims. Switzerland agrees to transfer approximately $58 million in gold and 50% of liquidated German assets located in that country to the Allies, who would then use such funds to reconstruct devastated areas of Europe and to assist stateless Nazi victims. Switzerland also agrees, via a side letter, to "examine sympathetically" the means by which to place the assets of heirless Nazi victims found in Switzerland at the disposal of the Allies for purposes of refugee relief and rehabilitation.

July 4, 1946: Polish civilians carry out a pogrom against Jewish survivors in Kielce, Poland. Following a ritual murder accusation, a mob of civilians kills more than 40 Jews and wounds dozens of others. This attack sparks a second mass migration of Jews from Poland and Eastern Europe to displaced persons camps in Germany, Austria, and Italy.
October 1, 1946: The International Military Tribunal hands down its rulings on major Nazi war criminals on trial in Nuremberg, Germany. Eighteen are convicted, of whom eleven are sentenced to death, and three are acquitted. Trials of Nazi diplomats, judges, doctors, industrialists and others continue throughout 1947.
	October 10, 1946: A New York court, hearing the claims of a Holocaust victim whose Swiss bank account was turned over to the Nazis, rules in his favor, holding that the defendant Swiss bank should not have complied with transfer orders the banks knew or should have known were made under duress (Albers v. Credit Suisse).
October 16, 1946: Ten of the Nuremberg defendants are executed by hanging. One defendant, Hermann Göring, commits suicide in his cell.
	1947: The SIG issues a report listing some unclaimed funds of Holocaust victims, describing the list as "just the tip of the iceberg."

	1947: Switzerland begins to accept refugees from Communist nations in Eastern Europe.
March 1947: Britain refers the issue of Palestine to the UN.
	March 7, 1947: The Swiss Federal Council allows for permanent asylum for refugees who cannot leave the country. It also rescinds the 1943 decree requiring the mandatory deposit and management of refugee property; 1,000 dormant and/or heirless accounts are liquidated and deposited with the Swiss Treasury. Accounts owned by refugees still in Switzerland are returned to them after their internment costs are deducted.
	August 21, 1947: The Swiss Bankers Association ("SBA") requests that all member banks provide details of assets they managed for people who the banks knew or suspected were victims of Nazi persecution.
	October 7, 1947: The SBA reports the assets located pursuant to the August 21, 1947 directive. The Volcker report states: "The 1947 Survey did not produce a great deal of information. It was a relatively informal survey ignored by some banks and not taken seriously enough by others. The survey reported assets with a total of only 482,000 Swiss Francs."
November 10, 1947: Military Government Law 59 takes effect, providing for the possibility of restitution to Nazi victims whose property was taken under duress between January 30, 1933 and May 8, 1945, if such property was located in the U.S. zone in Germany.
November 29, 1947: The UN General Assembly endorses Resolution 181, providing for the partition of Palestine and the establishment of Jewish and in 1949 (see below).

May 23, 1949: The Federal Republic of Germany (West Germany) is established. October 7, 1949: The Democratic Republic of Germany (East Germany) is established.	October 21, 1949: The U.S. and Switzerland agree to a $14.4 million payment from the U.S., representing the balance due on reparations for the mistaken bombing of Schaffhausen, Basel and Zurich, as well as compensation for the care of U.S. service members shot down or found in Switzerland and interned there during the duration of the war. December 7, 1949: The NYTimes reports: "The Swiss Government has agreed to turn over to the Polish Government funds placed in Swiss banks and other institutions by Polish Jews who died heirless during World War II … In objecting to the Swiss decision to give the heirless property of Polish victims of Nazi concentration camps to the Polish Government, Jewish organizations cite the Allied declaration of June, 1946, that such property should go to an international body (the International Refugee Organization, which was then in the planning stage) for use in resettling refugees belonging to groups to which dead owners had belonged." The accord had been signed on June 25, 1949 and released for publication on November 8, 1949. December 20-22, 1949: The American, British and French diplomatic missions seek further information about the Swiss-Polish agreement, which was considered to be inconsistent with Switzerland's 1946 commitments as part of the 1946

	Washington Accords.
	December 22, 1949: Switzerland enters into a compensation arrangement with Czechoslovakia, similar to that with Poland in 1949.
	April 25, 1950: The U.S., British and French diplomatic missions again criticize the Swiss-Polish agreement as contrary to Switzerland's commitment as part of the 1946 Washington Accords.
	July 19, 1950: Switzerland enters into a compensation arrangement with Hungary, similar to that entered with Poland in 1949.
1951: The International Organization for Migration (IOM) is established by member states (now 157); it works closely with governmental, intergovernmental and non-governmental partners in the field of migration and other human rights areas.
	August 3, 1951: Switzerland enters into a compensation arrangement with Romania, similar to that with Poland in 1949.
September 27, 1951: Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany Konrad Adenauer states before a special session of the Bundestag that "[u]nspeakable crimes were perpetrated in the name of the German people which impose upon them the obligation to make moral and material amends" to the Jewish people, for individual damage, and for heirless property. October, 1951: 23 major Jewish organizations join together to establish a central body to represent Holocaust survivors in seeking compensation from Germany: the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany ("Claims Conference"). The organization is chaired by Nahum Goldmann of the World Jewish Congress; staff members include Benjamin Ferencz (who prosecuted the Einsatzgruppen at Nuremberg) and Saul Kagan.	January 22, 1952: The Swiss government instructs the Federal Department of Justice and Police to prepare legislation addressing unclaimed assets in Switzerland. August 28, 1952: The NYTimes reports that the Allies and Switzerland reached a compromise of the terms of the Washington Accords, with Switzerland to pay $28 million "in a lump sum to settle in full all Allied claims respecting property of 'Germans in Germany' blocked in Switzerland since 1945." Switzerland originally intended to use this sum "partly to indemnify Swiss nationals domiciled in Germany for their losses" during the war. The Swiss government asserts in confidential side letters to the U.S., UK and France that Switzerland holds no unclaimed assets of Nazi victims.

September 10, 1952: West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett sign an agreement providing for compensation to the State of Israel in support of resettlement of Jewish refugees. Adenauer and Claims Conference president Nahum Goldmann sign an agreement providing for direct compensation of Jewish Nazi victims based upon personal and property injuries (the "BEG"), including lump-sum payments and pensions. The programs, collectively known as the "Luxembourg Agreements," begin in 1953 and are renegotiated and extended several times thereafter.

	March 27, 1953: The NYTimes reports that following final liquidation of blocked German assets in Switzerland, 10% of that sum ($700,000) is to be allocated to surviving German Nazi victims; the remainder will reimburse private relief agencies for aid to refugees.
June 10, 1953: The Frankfurt District Court holds I.G. Farben liable on slave labor claims brought by Auschwitz survivor Norbert Wollheim, in a proceeding supported by the Claims Conference.
August, 1953: Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority of Israel, is established. In 1954, it begins to collect Pages of Testimony, documents submitted by survivors, relatives or friends containing the names, biographical details and photographs of victims.
1954: The Israeli law for "Disabled Veterans of the War Against the Nazis," a pension program funded by West Germany for Israeli veterans at least 10% disabled, takes effect. 1954: The United Restitution Organization begins to assist needy survivors in their claims under German	1954: The negotiations that led to Germany's 1938 adoption of the "J-stamp," at the insistence of Switzerland, to mark the passports of Jewish Germans, become public for the first time, when the U.S. publishes German foreign ministry documents. compensation laws.	Ludwig to study Swiss refugee policies. May 1954: As described by Judge Korman in a 2004 opinion, citing the conclusion of Switzerland's Bergier Commission (which investigated Switzerland's Holocaust-era activities): "In May 1954, the legal representatives of the big banks co-ordinated their response to heirs so that the banks would have at their disposal a concerted mechanism for deflecting any kind of enquiry. They agreed not to provide further information on transactions dating back more than ten years under any circumstances, and to refer to the statutory obligation to keep files for only ten years, even if their records would have allowed them to provide the information." November 26, 1954: Switzerland enters into a compensation agreement with Bulgaria similar to that with Poland in 1949.
May 15, 1955: Austria is reestablished as an independent and democratic nation, and is obligated under its treaty of creation to provide compensation for losses during the Nazi era.	October 13, 1955, December 13, 1956: Swiss banks report unclaimed assets belonging to missing Polish persons in the amount of SF 22,300. 1956: The SBA surveys its members to establish whether the banks hold dormant accounts of victims of Nazi persecution in Germany. The survey reports 86 accounts with a total value of 862,410 Swiss Francs.

June 29, 1956: Germany enacts the BEG, intended to compensate Nazi persecutees for injuries, financial losses and other personal damage. The program is limited to those who were German citizens or had German linguistic roots. It excludes, among others, homosexuals imprisoned under Paragraph 175.
1957: Austria enacts a property compensation program, selling unclaimed Holocaust-era property and paying the proceeds to Nazi victims.	1957: The Swiss Federal Council publishes a report by legal expert Carl Ludwig, which states that Switzerland denied entry to around 10,000 refugees. The report also states that thousands of refugees, particularly Jews, were not admitted between 1933 and the end of World War II because of over-rigid rules of asylum. The report names Federal Councillor Edouard von Steiger and head of the Swiss Department of Justice and Police Heinrich Rothmund as primarily responsible. Restrictive refugee policies were said to have been enforced because of the "inundation by foreigners" and the "strained job market." The Swiss Parliament recognizes Carl Lutz, the Swiss diplomat who saves tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from deportation and death in Auschwitz by creating and issuing an official-looking but false protective document, the Schutzpass.
February 5, 1957: Following litigation in Germany and negotiations with the Claims Conference, in the first settlement of slave labor claims, IG Farben establishes a $7 million fund to compensate its former slave laborers. April 1, 1957: Under the Disabled Victims of Nazi Persecution Law, Nazi victims who emigrated to Israel before October 1, 1953 and who were Israeli citizens as of April 1, 1957 become eligible for need-based pensions from Israel through a program funded by West Germany.

	April 15, 1957: Swiss authorities suggest in internal communications that possible unclaimed assets owned by Nazi victims total approximately SF 900,000.
July 19, 1957: Germany enacts a property restitution program, the "BRUEG," with complex territorial and proof requirements. The original filing deadline is April 1959; under revised statutes, the deadline is extended through 1966.
	May 22, 1959: The Swiss Department of Justice states in an internal memo that Swiss banks hold unclaimed assets from France in the amount of several hundred million Swiss francs.
December, 1959: The Friedrich Krupp company, following negotiations with the Claims Conference, creates a fund of approximately $2.4 million to compensate its former slave laborers.
1959-1964: Pursuant to a series of bilateral treaties, Germany makes the following payments to European nations in connection with Holocaust reparations. In the 1990s, some of these same nations later establish other compensation programs.[3] • Denmark receives DM 16 million (1959) which it uses to compensate Nazi victims, including those who fled to Sweden. • Norway receives DM 60 million (1959), which it uses for one-time payments to Norwegian citizens who were imprisoned and suffered were Nazi victims. August 1960: The AEG-Telefunken company, following negotiations with the Claims Conference, creates a fund of approximately $1 million to compensate its former slave laborers.	June 21, 1961: The NYTimes reports that the "Israeli government has taken renewed hope that it many soon become heir to unclaimed millions of dollars in foreign currencies and valuables that were deposited in Swiss banks by European Jews who died in Nazi death camps," as the "Swiss Ministry of Justice and Police has started drafting legislation that would compel organizations and individuals in Switzerland to report any deposits they controlled that have been unclaimed for a long period." The article notes that "there is some question about how fast the Swiss bankers will want to comply with a law that counters all their tradition."

November 27, 1961: The Bad Kreuznach treaty settles financial issues between West Germany and Austria, and includes provisions to indemnify victims of Nazi persecution as well as displaced persons. December 15, 1961: Adolf Eichmann, captured in Argentina on May 11, 1960 and brought to Israel to stand trial for his war crimes, is sentenced to death in a Jerusalem court.

May, 1962: The Siemens-Halske company, following negotiations with the Claims Conference, creates a fund of approximately $1.75 million to compensate its former slave laborers.
	July 6, 1962: The Swiss Federal Council "commission[s] the historian Edgar Bonjour to independently conduct a major study of Swiss neutrality."
	December 20, 1962: The Swiss Federal Council passes a decree requiring all individuals, legal entities, and associations to report any Swiss-based assets whose last-known owners were foreign nationals or stateless persons of whom nothing had been heard since May 9, 1945, and who were known or presumed to have been victims of racial, religious, or political persecution. Such assets are to be transferred to an "Unclaimed Assets Fund." The survey reports 739 accounts containing a total of 6,219,000 Swiss Francs.
	March 13, 1964: The NYTimes reports that the "Swiss Government announced today that a six-month search had uncovered the equivalent of just in excess of $2 million in unclaimed assets [held by 961 foreigners or stateless persons] hidden in Switzerland by Jews who later became victims of Nazi Germany." The article reports that a "Jewish welfare official described the sum announced by the [Swiss] government as 'disappointingly low'" based upon the "millions of Jews who were exterminated" and the "flight of capital" during the Nazi era.
May 1964: The Dynamit Nobel company, owned by Friedrich Flick, agrees to establish a DM 5 million fund to compensate its former slave laborers, to be administered by the Claims Conference. However, not until Flick's death and the company's purchase by Deutsche Bank in the early 1980s is the agreement implemented.

	August 20, 1965: The Swiss Federal Council recognizes the Swiss-Polish agreement but limits its application by deciding not to give the Polish government information concerning unclaimed assets; assets deemed heirless are transferred not to the Unclaimed Assets Fund, but instead are credited directly to the Swiss National Bank for the benefit of the Polish National Bank. August 27, 1965: The Swiss Federal Council does not recognize the Swiss-Hungarian agreement and does not provide Hungary with lists of assets in Switzerland owned by Hungarians. The Council does accept the Hungarian government's demand for any such assets already incorporated into the Unclaimed Assets Fund.
April 7, 1966: The United States District Court, in Kelberine v. Societe Internationale, dismisses claims by U.S. citizens against IG Farben based on the company's use of Holocaust-era slave labor. The court holds that the "adjudication of some two hundred thousand claims for multifarious damages inflicted twenty to thirty years ago in a European area by a government then in power – is too complicated, too costly, to justify undertaking by a court without legislative provision of the means wherewith to proceed." Decades later, one of the Kelberine plaintiffs is compensated for bank account and slave labor claims under Judge Korman's Swiss Banks Settlement

May, 1966: The Rheinmetall company, following negotiations with the Claims Conference, creates a fund of approximately $625,000 to compensate its former slave laborers.
	1969: Alfred A. Häsler writes the book, THE LIFEBOAT IS FULL: SWITZERLAND AND THE REFUGEES, 1933-1945, a seminal work explaining Swiss behavior toward refugees during World War II.
September 1, 1969: The German penal code eliminates paragraph 175, the basis for Nazi persecution of homosexuals.
1970: West Germany pays DM 97 million to Hungary, which establishes a program to pay Nazi victims in that country.
1972: West Germany pays DM 100 million to an International Red Cross program designed to compensate primarily non-Jewish Polish nationals who were victims of Nazi medical experiments.
	February 28, 1972: The Swiss Federal Council, by presidential decree, without a declaration of presumption of death and call for heirs, incorporates directly into the Unclaimed Assets Fund, assets owned by nationals of unclaimed funds from owners who had resided in the former Soviet Union and Eastern European nations.
1973: The Netherlands enacts a law to compensate present and former interest in the Nazi era.

	August 20, 1980: Switzerland closes the Unclaimed Assets Fund.
October 14, 1980: Following several years of negotiations with the Claims Conference, West Germany establishes the Hardship Fund, paying one-time grants to survivors who had been ineligible for prior German compensation, mostly for those in the West who had previously lived behind the Iron Curtain. Those still living in communist nations remain ineligible. In contrast to earlier compensation programs, which were administered by West Germany, the Hardship Fund and subsequent compensation programs are to be administered by the Claims Conference.
December 1980: West Germany approves a one-time payment of DM 5,000 to victims of forced sterilization, a provision available to many non-Jewish victims who had not been eligible under the BEG and other restitution laws (such as Roma and disabled individuals), but limited to those who had not claimed under the BEG.
December 1986: Holocaust survivor, author Elie Wiesel, wins the Nobel Peace Prize.
March 23, 1988: In recognition of the 50th anniversary of the Anschluss, following negotiations with the Committee for Jewish Claims on Austria, Austria establishes a July 1994: The Claims Conference establishes a "Goodwill Fund," available to heirs to property in the former East Germany who failed to file claims before the 1992 deadline and who therefore were ineligible for compensation under the German law. From the proceeds of successful property claims under the German program, the Claims Conference issues payments to eligible heirs and utilizes the remaining funds for programs serving needy survivors around the world.

	May 7, 1995: On the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II, Swiss President Kaspar Villiger officially apologizes for its refugee policy. U.S. Ambassador Stuart Eizenstat[4] notes that President Villiger "did so without external pressure."
June 1, 1995: Austria establishes the Austrian National Fund, providing one-time payments to 29,500 Austrian Nazi victims worldwide.
	June 21, 1995: Wall Street Journal reporter Peter Gumbel writes on the newspaper's front page that "[f]or 50 years, since the end of the war, [Swiss] banks … have cast a dismissive blanket of silence over the question of what they did with accounts opened by Jews and others who were then persecuted, and often murdered, by the Nazis."

[4] Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat has served in many governmental roles, including Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Affairs, Under Secretary of Commerce, and Special Representative of the President and Secretary of State for Holocaust-Era Issues under President Clinton. He remains actively involved with Holocaust compensation issues. He described his experiences in leading the negotiations resulting in the settlement of claims arising from accounts held in Swiss bank accounts, slave labor performed on behalf of German and Austrian corporate and governmental entities, and other Holocaust-era injuries, in his book IMPERFECT JUSTICE: LOOTED ASSETS, SLAVE LABOR, AND THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF WORLD WAR II (PublicAffairs 2003).

	September 1995: The SBA surveys its member banks in Switzerland and Liechtenstein to determine the number and value of bank accounts belonging to foreigners. A preliminary survey identifies 893 dormant accounts with a value of SFr. 40.9 million belonging to foreign depositors who had not been heard from since May 9, 1945.
September 9, 1995: By letter to Edgar Bronfman, U.S. President William J. Clinton states: "I ... support the efforts of the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the World Jewish Congress to help resolve the question of Jewish properties during and after the Second World War," noting that "Ambassador Stuart Eizen[stat] has been given a special mission to assist in this task." September 10, 1995: By letter to Edgar Bronfman, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin states that as President of the WJRO, Bronfman "represents the Jewish people and the State of Israel" with respect to issues "of restitution of Jewish assets deposited in Switzerland, along with the issues of restitution of Jewish property…in countries of Central and Eastern Europe." September 19, 1995: The U.S.-German "Princz Agreement" establishes a compensation program of $18.5 million to be paid to 235 U.S. citizens who survived concentration camps, including Hugo Princz.
	February 7, 1996: The SBA announces that $32 million was found in 775 additional dormant accounts opened prior to 1945 that could have belonged to Jews who perished in the Holocaust. A NYTimes article reporting on the announcement states that the SBA "acknowledged it would be difficult for descendants of Nazi victims to present documents needed for proof of legitimacy, and said it might accept substitute documents with explanations. But it said many claims were based on hope, not facts. 'The reasons for assuming that assets may be in Switzerland are often only vaguely substantiated…'" April 23, 1996: The U.S. Senate Banking Committee, headed by Senator Alfonse D'Amato of New York, holds the first hearing on the status of Holocaust-era assets deposited in Swiss banks. Swiss financial institutions come under sharp criticism for their accounting methodology as well as for their treatment of Holocaust survivors/heirs, who had previously requested information about lost accounts but were rebuffed by Swiss bank officials.

May 2, 1996: In a letter to Edgar Bronfman, President of the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the World Jewish Congress, U.S. President William J. Clinton states, "I would like to express my continuing support in the area of restitution of Jewish property… the return of Jewish assets in Swiss banks enjoys the support of this Administration…It is a moral issue...."	May 2, 1996: The World Jewish Congress (WJC), the World Jewish Restitution Organization, the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem, and the SBA sign an agreement to relax Swiss banking secrecy laws to allow a joint independent commission to reexamine dormant Swiss accounts. An Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ("ICEP") led by Paul Volcker, former chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve System, is chosen to audit an earlier study by the Swiss bankers' ombudsman. The other six panel members are Professor Curt Gasteyger, a Swiss historian; Dr. Alain Hirsch, an expert on security and accounting; Prof. Dr. Klaus Jakobi, a former Swiss ambassador to the U.S.; Avraham Burg, chairman of the Jewish Agency in Israel; Reuben Beraja, chairman of the Latin American Jewish Congress; and Ronald Lauder, an American representing Jewish interests. A NYTimes article reporting on the agreement states: "An official close to the Swiss Bankers Association, which is participating in the plan, said that an industry agreement to open up such a large number of files to outside inspection would be unprecedented." August 15, 1996: ICEP issues a press release reporting that it has held its first meeting, chaired by Paul A. Volcker. "The group focused on the role of the Committee in identifying any dormant accounts, financial instruments or other assets that were deposited or otherwise conveyed to the custody of the Swiss banks before, during, or immediately after the Second World War. The Committee approved the process for selecting auditors to examine the methodology of the individual Swiss banks in maintaining and identifying dormant accounts and other assets and to conduct a thorough investigation of these matters."

September 10, 1996: The British Foreign and Commonwealth Office releases a document, Nazi Gold: Information from the British Archives, which alleges that the Allies knew of the large amounts of Nazi gold exported to Switzerland, but were afraid of losing Swiss support on the postwar economic recovery plan. The report also alleges that the Swiss could be holding more than $550 million worth of gold looted by Nazi Germany, valued at $7 billion. A Washington Post article notes that the report stated that in 1946, "…Allied negotiators agreed to accept from the Swiss a payment of $60 million to settle all claims connected with the gold, a sum the report noted was less than one-tenth the value of the Nazi gold in Swiss vaults at the time. It is not clear if any of this money ever reached Holocaust survivors."	September 16, 1996: The Swiss Parliament agrees to a full investigation into assets stolen by the Nazis. An independent commission of historians and banking and legal experts is recommended to investigate Switzerland's role as financial center for looted assets.

	September 21, 1996: A NYTimes article concerning the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office's report on Nazi Gold references Robert Vogler, a historian who wrote a 1985 study of the wartime gold transactions and who now is a spokesman for Union Bank of Switzerland. Vogler "argues the gold is merely covering old ground and will not turn up hidden hordes. 'The only profit was that the country was not brought into the war …If it is the aim of politicians to protect the people, the gold fulfilled that aim well. People have no idea how history was. They don't realize that Switzerland was encircled. We had to give the Germans something, to survive.'" September 25, 1996: A NYTimes editorial states: "For decades the Swiss banking industry arrogantly thwarted inquiries about its role in the Nazi period, and effectively discouraged the relatives of Holocaust victims searching for long-dormant accounts. The Swiss stonewall has now broken down under intense pressure from Jewish organizations and the unearthing of documentary records that show the shameful extent of Swiss cooperation with the Nazis. Faced with a mounting wave of negative publicity and the prospect of lost business, Swiss bankers are opening their archives and vaults to outside investigation … The search will not be easy and the amount of gold and other assets may prove smaller than imagined. But in a manner of historical accountability like this, monetary value is less important than honesty and openness. This is a reckoning long overdue."	October 3, 1996: Gizella Weisshaus, a Holocaust survivor living in Brooklyn, files the first class action suit in U.S. federal court, Weisshaus v. Union Bank of Switzerland, No. 96 CV 4849 (Eastern District of New York), against various Swiss Banks, asserting that the banks refused to return assets deposited before and during the war. The defendants include the Swiss Bank Corporation (also known as the Swiss National Bank), the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), and other banking institutions. More than 4,000 plaintiffs, Jews and non-Jews worldwide, are said to be represented by the class action lawsuit.

	October 16, 1996: Chairman of the Senate Banking Committee Senator D'Amato holds a hearing in New York City, during which Holocaust survivors unable to reclaim assets deposited in Swiss banks testify. D'Amato states that "the committee has found evidence to suggest that Swiss banking authorities, with official American acquiescence, turned over only a fraction of the deposits after World War II." Senator D'Amato accuses the banks of stalling in the hope that the last remaining survivor will die.
October 1996: An auction of unclaimed Jewish art in Austria, the "Mauerbach Auction," yields $13.5 million; 88% of the fund is allocated to assist Jewish victims in Austria, and the remaining 12% is allocated for non-Jewish victims.
		October 21, 1996: A second class action complaint relating to Switzerland's activities during and after the Holocaust era, Friedman v. Union Bank of Switzerland, No.96 CV 5161 (EDNY), is filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.
	October 24, 1996: Flavio Cotti, the Swiss foreign minister, creates a special task force to coordinate a Swiss diplomatic response to international criticism of Switzerland and its financial institutions. This special task force is directed by Special Ambassador Thomas Borer.

October 30, 1996: President Clinton writes to World Jewish Congress President Bronfman and asks him to expand the probe into Nazi assets, stating that his Administration "would make it a priority to classify and make available to the public all the relevant documents." President Clinton asks Stuart Eizenstat, then Undersecretary of Commerce, to coordinate efforts by the U.S. government.	October 31, 1996: Swiss Ambassador to the U.S. Carlo Jagmetti announces at a news conference at the Swiss Embassy in Washington, DC that the Swiss banks have made mistakes, but proclaims "the total commitment of the Swiss authorities to establish the truth and nothing but the truth, insofar as witnesses, records and documents will permit. November 13, 1996: The Swiss bankers' ombudsman announces that only SF 11,000 ($8,750) from 1.6 million francs ($1.26 million) in unclaimed dormant accounts are linked directly to Holocaust victims. These initial findings are sharply criticized by the World Jewish Congress as "unilateral and unacceptable." November 19, 1996: In response to criticism of the findings by the Swiss bankers' ombudsman, Paul Volcker, chairman of ICEP, announces that three American accounting firms (Arthur Andersen, KPMG Peat Marwick, and Price Waterhouse) have been hired to investigate dormant Swiss accounts during the World War II era. December 9, 1996: Both houses of the Swiss Parliament pass final legislation that waives the 3-month waiting period for laws to take force, thus allowing an independent panel to begin studying how much wealth was deposited into Swiss banks prior to and during World War II, and the Swiss response after the war.

	December 11, 1996: Dr. George Krayer, chairman of the SBA, at hearings held before the U.S. House Committee on Banking and Financial Services, states: "First, the SBA, its members and the Swiss bank supervisors are committed to providing their full support and cooperation to the [ICEP] audit and abiding by its results…. Second, the auditors will have full access to all relevant information. Third, because of this access, the audit findings will represent the best attainable results and therefore must be accepted as conclusive by all responsible parties." The U.S. House Banking Committee holds a hearing on Swiss banks and Jewish assets during World War II. Among the witnesses before the committee are Special Ambassador Thomas Borer, chief of the Swiss Foreign Ministry Task Force on the Swiss bank question; Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress; Paul Volcker, chairman of the Committee of Eminent Persons; Senator D'Amato, chairman of the U.S. Senate Banking Committee; and various Holocaust survivors/heirs. Mr. Krayer states that he has "'no knowledge' of large accounts that still contained considerable assets originally deposited by either Jews or the Nazi leadership. While estimates vary widely, some experts believe those accounts may have held upward of half a billion dollars in 1946." December 13, 1996: The Swiss Parliament establishes the Bergier Commission to examine the period prior to, during and immediately after the Second World War.[5] The decree includes the passage of a law banning the destruction of relevant documents. December 19, 1996: Peter Hug and Marc Perrenoud, two independent historians commissioned by the Swiss government, release a report on Swiss post-war Nazi gold transactions. Authorized in October 1996, the report investigates claims that assets from victims of the Holocaust were used by the Swiss to compensate its citizens whose property was seized by countries in Eastern Europe. The report rejects the charge that such funds were paid directly to Swiss citizens, but states instead that under post-war compensation agreements, Switzerland made payments to Poland and Hungary. December 31, 1996: The NYTimes reports that Swiss president Jean-Pascal Delamuraz has characterized as "blackmail" a call to establish a compensation fund for Jewish Nazi victims with claims to Swiss bank deposits, adding that he sometimes wonders "if Auschwitz was in Switzerland." On January 2, 1997, he characterizes his statement as having been "misunderstood' and expresses regret for any offense caused.

The other members of the Bergier Commission were: Wladyslaw Bartoszewski (Poland), Linus von Castelmur (Switzerland), Saul Friedländer (Israel), Harold James (United States), Georg Kreis (Switzerland), Sybil Milton (United States), Jacques Picard (Switzerland), Jakob Tanner (Switzerland) and Joseph Voyame (Switzerland). Sybil Milton passed away during her tenure, as did Joseph Voyame. Voyame was replaced by Daniel Thürer, and Milton was replaced by Dr. Helen Junz. Judge Korman subsequently appointed Dr. Junz to serve as a CRT Special Master.

Late 1996: President Clinton commissions an interagency task force, supervised by Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat, to investigate and report on Allied efforts to recover and restore Nazi-looted gold and other assets after World War II. 1997: Germany establishes a "Czech-German Fund for the Future," providing for payments to Czech Nazi victims. 1997: Hungary establishes a pension program for Jewish Nazi victims, pursuant to its obligations under the 1947 Paris Peace Treaty.

1997: Yad Vashem initiates an "integrative data-bank" to include databases of victim names from Pages of Testimony, deportation lists, lists of prisoners from the camps, testimonies, and other sources.	January 7, 1997: The Swiss cabinet offers to create a compensation fund with the $32 million found by the Swiss bankers' ombudsman in November 1996. Their offer is rejected by the World Jewish Congress. January 15, 1997: The NYTimes reports that on January 8, 1997, "[j]ust weeks after the Swiss government ordered its banks to preserve any remaining records of their dealings with Nazi Germany, a suspicious security guard at the Union Bank of Switzerland [Christopher Meili] halted the destruction of documents from the World War II era, including some that appeared to deal with the 'forced auctions' of property in Berlin in the 1930s." UBS states that it "regrets the incident" but the shredded documents did not contain information about specific bank customers. Meili himself becomes the target of a criminal investigation as to whether he violated banking secrecy. In May 1997, Meili and his family leave Switzerland with the assistance of Jewish leaders. January 22, 1997: The Swiss Federal Banking Commission (the "SFBC") declares the ICEP audits as "official special audits" under the Swiss Banking Act of 1934 and the Swiss Banking Ordinance of 1972. This declaration empowers the SFBC to compel the banks' cooperation with the ICEP investigation, and ensures that the ICEP auditors will have "full and unfettered access" to relevant bank files, including customer files protected by bank secrecy legislation." January 23, 1997: The Swiss government endorses a plan for a memorial fund of $70 million to compensate victim/heirs who claimed dormant assets in Swiss banks. With respect to who will contribute to the fund, the Swiss government states that "a decision on the appropriate participation of the Government in the financing of a fund will be made when the hard, historical facts are presented." January 27, 1997: The Swiss Ambassador to the U.S., Carlo Jagmetti, resigns after publication of his diplomatic cable in which he warns with respect to the Holocaust victim deposits issue that "this is a war which Switzerland must conduct on the foreign and domestic front, and must win," adding that the groups representing victims are "opponents" who "cannot be trusted."

		January 29, 1997: World Council of Orthodox Communities v. Union Bank of Switzerland, No.97 CV 0461 (EDNY), is filed in United States District Court.
	January 31, 1997: ICEP Chairman Paul Volcker announces that only 26 of Switzerland's then-500 banks searched for Holocaust victims' assets as part of the 1962 survey, which "raises questions of how assiduous everybody was in responding and how much follow-up there was." February 24, 1997: Time magazine's cover features a swastika of gold bars superimposed over a photo of Nazi victims: "Echoes of the Holocaust: The fight over Nazi gold reminds us why we must never forget." A feature story by Thomas Sancton (Zurich correspondent), entitled "A Painful History," focuses upon the Swiss bank account issue, stating that "one standing order has been to stall and stonewall when Holocaust survivors ask about their dead relatives' accounts," but the "orders are changing" with "two high-level commissions named by the Swiss government" now examining the nation's Holocaust-era activities. The article notes that other countries are similarly "examining their conscience -- and account books." February 26, 1997: The SBA announces formation of the Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust (Swiss Humanitarian Fund) endowed by UBS, Credit Suisse and the SBC. The Fund raises $173 million and allocates 88% to benefit needy Jewish victims and 12% to needy non-Jewish victims including Roma, Jehovah Witnesses, disabled and homosexuals. The Fund ultimately distributes SF 295 million to 312,000 victims worldwide. Holocaust survivors play a prominent role in its administration. March 5, 1997: Swiss President Arnold Koller, in a special address to Parliament, proposes the creation of the Swiss Foundation for Solidarity, a humanitarian fund of 7 billion Swiss francs ($4.7 billion). The foundation would donate up to SF 300 million a year to needy recipients in Switzerland and abroad from profits revaluing SF 5 million in gold reserves from the Swiss Central Bank. According to President Koller, the beneficiaries would include "victims of poverty and catastrophes, of genocide, and other serious human rights abuses, and for victims of the Holocaust." Though approved by parliament, the referendum is narrowly defeated at the polls on September 22, 2002.	March 7, 1997: Hon. Edward R. Korman, United States District Judge, Eastern District of New York, who is hearing the claims against Swiss banks and other Swiss entities, consolidates the Weisshaus, Friedman, and World Council lawsuits for pre-trial purposes under the caption In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation.

March 25, 1997: The French Prime Minister's Office Study Mission into the Looting of Jewish Assets in France, the "Matteoli Commission," is created. March 31, 1997: A class action lawsuit is filed in New York District Court against European insurers seeking recovery of Holocaust-era insurance policies.		April 30, 1997: Attorneys for Switzerland's three biggest banks petition Judge Korman to dismiss or delay lawsuits charging them with failing to return deposits of Holocaust victims.
	May 7, 1997: The Eizenstat Task Force releases a report detailing Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany and highlights Switzerland's handling of looted gold and other assets. Switzerland rejects the report as one-sided. The report estimates that as much as $400 million in German-looted gold remained in the Swiss National Bank at the end of the war, but no more than $58 million was returned.
	May 15, 1997: The U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, led by U.S. Senator D'Amato, holds a hearing on Holocaust-era Swiss assets.	May 15, 1997: Swiss bank defendants respond to plaintiffs' complaints by filing several motions to dismiss or, in the alternative, to stay the lawsuits.
	June, 1997: Upon recommendation of the Volcker Committee, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") requires Swiss banks to report to ATAG Ernst & Young all foreign accounts, Swiss accounts and accounts of persons of unknown or uncertain domicile that were opened before May 9, 1945, and dormant since at least that time. The SFBC and the SBA agree with ICEP in June 1997 to establish the Claims Resolution Tribunal (a process known as "CRT-I") with the mandate of analyzing claims to certain dormant accounts in Swiss banks dating from the pre-war era. CRT-I is intended to serve as an independent international claims resolution panel operating under liberal rules of evidence, with its decisions to be issued in the form of written opinions.

		June 3, 1997: Alfred Defago, the Swiss Ambassador to the U.S., urges Judge Korman to dismiss the lawsuits accusing Swiss banks of retaining Holocaust victims' assets. Ambassador Defago writes: "The Government of Switzerland believes that the conduct of this litigation in the United States will interfere with the extensive ongoing and proposed efforts in Switzerland … The most effective and just means for dealing with these matters are in Switzerland, not in a United States court."
		June 16, 1997: Plaintiffs' counsel, including Professor Burt Neuborne of the New York University School of Law, file a Memorandum of Law/Declaration summarizing plaintiffs' legal theories in the class action lawsuits.
	June 25, 1997: The U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Banking and Financial Services holds hearings on Holocaust-era Swiss accounts; among others, Paul Volcker and historian Gerhard Weinberg testify. In a joint press release, Kurt Hauri (SBA) and Paul Volcker announce that the Claims Resolution Process has several major elements, including: "An SFBC circular letter to Swiss banks requiring them to report the accounts of residents and non-residents of Switzerland that have been dormant since 1945; Publication of the names and other information on these accounts … Further there is to be publication of additional dormant accounts to be made promptly as the information becomes available to Swiss banks or to ICEP." July 23, 1997: Major Swiss banks publish a list of 2,000 dormant World War II-era accounts opened by non-Swiss depositors. The list names more than twice the number of such accounts the banks said they had identified just one year ago. The SBA says that claims will be processed by Ernst & Young and judged by an international panel of independent arbitrators who will employ relaxed standards of proof.	July 24, 1997: In response to the possibility that the Court will issue discovery orders concerning the ICEP investigation, Paul Volcker files papers describing the "background of the formation of the [Volcker] Committee, its work program, the Investigative Audit completion target, and the potential effects of discovery directed to its papers and personnel." Volcker observes that the litigation, "to the extent that it deals with dormant accounts and impacts the Committee and its documents and records, could have an important and potentially crippling effect on the Committee's ability to do its job." Volcker states that "we have an obligation to keep you well informed of our work as it proceeds and I plan to provide the Court with the Committee's interim and final reports."

July 27, 1997 The NYTimes reports (in an article by Serge Schmemann) that Israeli Minister of Industry and Trade Natan Sharansky states: "Frankly speaking, not only Israel as a whole, but me personally, I find myself much less involved in this [Holocaust compensation] than many American friends."		July 30, 1997: Amended complaints are filed in the Weisshaus, Friedman, and World Council lawsuits in an effort to group all plaintiffs seeking relief under the same jurisdictional theory in a single complaint. August 1, 1997: The Court hears oral argument on the Swiss Bank defendants' motions to dismiss or stay and reserves decision. Settlement negotiations commence.

	August 14, 1997: The U.S. House Committee on Banking and Financial Services holds a hearing on Holocaust-era Swiss assets. Among others, Neil Levin, Chairman of the New York State Commission on the Recovery of Holocaust Victims' Assets, testifies. Levin, who later serves as Executive Director of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, is killed in the World Trade Center attacks on September 11, 2001.
September 4, 1997: The Jerusalem Report publishes an article entitled: "Shamed into Action - For 50 years, Israel has concealed lists of property and bank accounts that belonged to Holocaust victims and other Jews. After the Swiss came clean, it's Israel's turn." September 15, 1997: New York Governor George E. Pataki opens the Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) to assist Holocaust survivors and their heirs (residing anywhere) to recover Holocaust-era assets, including Swiss bank accounts and insurance policies.
	October 10, 1997: The NYTimes reports that "New York City quietly administered a major sanction against [UBS] last week by barring it from participating in a billion-dollar bond offering, a move meant to underline disapproval of the way the bank has responded to the investigations into dealings with Nazi Germany." The sanctions are criticized by Stuart Eizenstat on behalf of the U.S. State Department. October 29, 1997: The Swiss Bankers Association supplements its publication of July 23, 1997 with an additional list of dormant accounts, for a total of 5,570 accounts published under the pre-Settlement "CRT-I" (Claims Resolution Tribunal I) process. The value of these accounts is 74.3 million Swiss Francs. These accounts are unrelated to the accounts subsequently located and published through the ICEP process. November 18, 1997: The first payments are made from the Swiss Humanitarian Fund, to 80 Jewish survivors in Riga, Latvia.

December 1, 1997: In anticipation of a 41-nation conference on Nazi gold in London, the NYTimes reports that a new report shows that "[s]even years after World War II ended, the United States melted down gold plates, buttons, coins and smoking-pipe ornaments that were apparently looted from Hitler's victims, and turned the gold over to European central banks." The U.S. and Great Britain pledge to contribute to a new fund to benefit Holocaust survivors.	December 8, 1997: The NYTimes reports that UBS and SBC (Swiss Bank Corporation) are planning to merge, which will create the world's second largest bank. December 18, 1997: The first payments to non-Jewish Nazi victims are made from the Swiss Humanitarian Fund, to political persecutees in Albania.

	July 2, 1998: New York City and State officials (New York State Controller H. Carl McCall and New York City Controller Alan Hevesi) announce their intention to impose sanctions on Swiss banks beginning September 1, 1998, and continuing with additional sanctions on November 15 and then through 1999, in the event that the banks do not settle Holocaust victims' claims; the State of California also announces its intention to impose sanctions.
August 7, 1998: The first lawsuit based on Nazi-looted art -- G*oodman v. Saserale*, filed in 1996 over a disputed Degas, Landscape with Smokestacs -- is settled; the parties agree to share ownership and the painting will be on display in the Art Institute of Chicago.
		August 12, 1998: An informal agreement in principle to settle the "Swiss Banks" class action lawsuits for U.S. $1.25 billion is reached in Judge Korman's chambers; attorneys for plaintiffs and defendants UBS and Credit Suisse begin negotiating the settlement terms.
		August 14, 1998: Ambassador Eizenstat, who for months had assisted in mediating the settlement talks, states in a Jerusalem Post interview that the settlement "is the most significant action in terms of compensation since the German reparations agreement in the early 1950s, and it is important that it be distributed in the widest possible way … What leads me to believe that this will be done in an orderly, seemly and dignified way is because it will be done under judicial scrutiny."
	August 17, 1998: The Swiss Humanitarian Fund announces the start of the August 19, 1998: Generali agrees to pay $100 million to settle Holocaust-era insurance claims.

August 21, 1998: A class action lawsuit is filed in New Jersey District Court against Degussa, alleging that the company profited from manufacturing the poison used in the death camps, and from smelting victims' gold.		August 21, 1998: The Swiss Central Bank announces that it will not contribute to the $1.25 billion settlement reached by UBS and Credit Suisse.
August 25, 1998: The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC), intended to address and resolve unpaid Holocaust-era insurance policies, is established by a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) among the National Association of Insurance Commissioners in the United States, several European insurance companies, insurance regulators, representatives of several Jewish organizations, and the State of Israel.
August 30, 1998: A class action lawsuit is filed in Brooklyn Federal Court against Germany's largest industrial companies including BMW, Siemens, Krupp and Volkswagen, following earlier suits against the German banks Deutsche Bank and Dresdner Bank, Ford and Degussa, on the basis of profits the companies received from Holocaust-era slave labor; soon after, another class action suit is filed in Newark District Court against Krupp.
September 11, 1998: Volkswagen announces that it is establishing a DM 20 million "humanitarian relief" fund because of its moral, although not legal, obligation to compensate its former slave laborers.

September 23, 1998: Siemens announces that it is establishing an $11.9 million humanitarian fund for its former slave laborers. October 1998: Shortly before taking office, German Chancellor-elect Gerhard Schroeder convenes executives of Germany's top companies to discuss compensation for Holocaust-era slave labor. During a visit to Washington in the middle of the election campaign, Mr. Schroeder meets with the Claims Conference to discuss outstanding Jewish claims.	October 9, 1998: The Swiss government announces that it will publish the names of 51,000 refugees admitted to the country during World War II, drawing from files in the Swiss Federal Archive (and previously conveyed to Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum).
October 20, 1998: German Chancellor-elect Gerhard Schroeder announces his intention that Germany will establish a fund to compensate Holocaust-era slave laborers, reversing the prior government's stance on the issue.	October 29, 1998: The Swiss Humanitarian Fund begins payments to Jewish victims in Belarus and to former prisoners of Nazi concentration camps who were persecuted for political reasons. November 5, 1998: A year-long study by a Swiss governmental commission is released, showing that anti-Semitism in Switzerland has increased, largely due to recent scrutiny of the nation's wartime behavior.
November 11, 1998: In connection with the ICHEIC agreement, six European insurers agree to deposit $90 million in escrow, toward repayment of Holocaust-era insurance policies. November 30, 1998: The U.S. convenes the 44-nation Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets, to address open issues concerning art, land and insurance looted during the Holocaust. On December 3, 1998, the participants endorse the Washington Conference Principles on Nazi-Confiscated Art ("Washington Principles") to develop a consensus on non-binding guidelines to assist in resolving issues relating to Nazi-confiscated art. December 4, 1998: In the wake of the Swiss banks settlement and the endorsement of the Washington Principles, the Anti-Defamation League's National Director, Abraham Foxman, writes in the Wall Street Journal: "Seeking restitution is important, but at what price? Look at what happened in Switzerland. Yes, we got a check, but what about morality, reconciliation, and confronting the past? The Swiss have yet to come to grips with the realities that their history, not the Jews, is their enemy, and that the settlement was not blackmail but a moral debt they should have paid voluntarily … Full justice could never be obtained from the Swiss, because we cannot put a price on the life of a child whom the Swiss turned back at the border when they saw a 'J' in his documents. We can only hope for a measure of justice, a symbolic justice that demonstrates an accounting and accountability."	November 17, 1998: The Wall Street Journal reports that due to the costs of the investigation and the "prospect that the probe will be extended," the Volcker Committee review "is taking longer than expected and a final report will be delayed by about six months."

		December 15, 1998: The Plaintiffs' Executive Committee unanimously endorses the Court's proposal to appoint Judah Gribetz as Special Master to develop a Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds.
December 23, 1998: The first lawsuits against U.S. banks arising from Holocaust-era activities are brought against Chase Manhattan Corp. and J.P. Morgan & Co. The complaints, filed in Brooklyn Federal Court, allege that the banks' Paris branches aided in the Nazis' seizure of these assets. The first class action lawsuit arising from Holocaust-era activities in France is brought; survivors allege in Bodner v. Banque Paribas that French banks took their assets following German occupation in 1940.
	1999: At the beginning of the year, the Swiss Bankers Association and the World Jewish Congress provide $8 million to Yad Vashem to computerize Pages of Testimony and other documents to provide a list of Holocaust victims to the Volcker Committee.
		January 26, 1999: Following over five months of negotiations, the parties sign a Settlement Agreement. The agreement creates five settlement classes: Deposited Assets (bank accounts and other assets deposited in Swiss financial institutions), Slave Labor Class I (individuals who performed slave labor for German and other companies which transacted their profits through Swiss entities), Slave Labor Class II (individuals who performed slave labor for Swiss entities), Refugees (individuals denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, or admitted into Switzerland but abused or mistreated), and Looted Assets (individuals whose assets were looted and transacted through Switzerland or Swiss entities during the Nazi era). The Settlement Agreement also creates five categories of individuals eligible under four of the five settlement classes, designated "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution": persons who were persecuted or targeted for persecution because they were or were believed to be Jewish; Romani (Gypsy); Jehovah's Witnesses; disabled; or homosexual; and their heirs. Slave Labor Class II is not limited to the five "Victim or Target" groups. The Settlement Agreement provides for a Special Master to be appointed to recommend the allocation and distribution of the Settlement Fund among the different classes and victim groups. The "releasees" are the defendant banks, UBS and Credit Suisse, as well as virtually all other Swiss governmental and business entities, including the Swiss Federation.

February 16, 1999: With the intention of averting a Swiss Banks-style class action while obtaining "'global'" protection from future litigation, the German government announces that it will create a $1.7 billion fund for victims of Nazi slave labor policies, to be funded by German industry and banks. The amount is called "substantial but inadequate" by an attorney for the claimants. March 11, 1999: Suits against German banks are consolidated in the Southern District of New York as In re Austrian and German Bank Holocaust Litigation before Judge Shirley Wohl Kram; the Court approves the $40 million settlement on January 6, 2000 and a claims program is established.		March 30, 1999: The Court preliminarily approves the Settlement Agreement and provisionally certifies the five Settlement Classes, pending notice and a formal hearing on the fairness of the settlement. "Organizational endorsements" required by the defendant banks as a condition to the Settlement Agreement are signed by seventeen major worldwide Jewish organizations. March 31, 1999: The Court issues an order appointing Judah Gribetz as Special Master, setting forth terms of appointment including responsibilities, deadlines and compensation. April 19, 1999: The Court appoints members of the Plaintiffs' Executive Committee to serve as settlement counsel. Professor Burt Neuborne is named Lead Settlement Counsel. May 10, 1999: In accordance with class action settlement requirements under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Court appoints Notice Administrators, approves plaintiffs' notice plan, schedules exclusion request ("opt-out") and objection deadlines of October 22, 1999, and schedules a final "fairness hearing" on the Settlement Agreement on November 29, 1999. June 4, 1999: To enable the Special Master to take into account any comments raised at the fairness hearing scheduled for November 29, 1999, the Court directs the Special Master to publish his draft proposed plan for comment on December 28, 1999 and to file his final proposed with the Court on April 28, 2000. June 11, 1999: Worldwide notice of the proposed settlement commences, including informational documents in 27 languages; ultimately approximately 600,000 class member surveys ("Initial Questionnaires") are submitted; the internet site www.swissbankclaims.com is established.

September 12, 1999: U.S. v. Portrait of Wally, a lawsuit over disputed paintings by Egon Schiele, is filed in New York. September 14, 1999: The U.S. House of Representatives Banking Committee, chaired by Congressman Jim Leach, holds hearings on French financial institutions' past misappropriations of Holocaust victims' assets in wartime France. September 19, 1999: Two New Jersey district judges dismiss five German slave labor class action lawsuits, finding the suits non-justiciable and time-barred. October 14, 1999: A preliminary report by U.S. investigators -- the U. S Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets (PCHA) -- indicates that U.S. forces who were charged with safeguarding assets of Hungarian Jews looted by the Nazis, which had been loaded onto a forty-two wagon freight train (the so-called "Gold Train"), "were neither careful nor selfless custodians" but rather had taken loot for themselves.		October 22, 1999: "Swiss Banks" litigation class members who do not wish to be part of the settlement are required to file exclusion requests ("opt-outs").

	October 27, 1999: The far-right Swiss People's Party, led by Christoph Blocher, wins the second-largest parliamentary block in Swiss elections. News reports attribute the electoral surge to anti-immigrant sentiment as well as rejection of criticism of Switzerland's Holocaust-era activities.
		November 29, 1999: The Court conducts a "fairness hearing" in Brooklyn, New York. The hearing allows public comment on the proposed Settlement Agreement, pursuant to the Court's obligation under U.S. class action law to determine whether the settlement is fair.
	December 6, 1999: The Volcker Committee releases its final report on its three-year investigation of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts. The Volcker Committee determines that 6.8 million accounts had been opened or open in Swiss banks between 1933-1945. No records remain for 2.7 million accounts. Of the remaining 4.1 million accounts, 54,000 (subsequently reduced to approximately 36,000) are deemed to have a "probable" or "possible" relationship to victims of Nazi persecution. The Volcker Committee recommends that these accounts be made available to the claims process in an "Accounts History Database" (AHD). The Volcker Committee further recommends that approximately 25,000 (subsequently reduced to 21,000) of these AHD accounts should be published. The Volcker Committee concludes that the value of the accounts in the AHD is approximately $643 million to $1.36 billion, including interest. The Volcker Committee recommends that all of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records continue to exist should be consolidated into a "Total Accounts Database" (TAD) for use in a claims process. The investigation costs approximately SF 300 million. The Volcker Report states: "Unfortunately, the banks … lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of such 'so-called heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated the ICEP investigation and the controversy of the last 30 years." The SFBC announces that it is "solely responsible for decisions on publishing further lists of accounts;" it "will analyze the ICEP recommendations on archiving data, further publication of unclaimed assets, and handling of claims;" and it will reach a decision on these recommendations in the first quarter of 2000. December 10, 1999: The Bergier Commission releases a report (Switzerland and Refugees in the Nazi Era) that addresses Switzerland's refugee policy in the period before, during, and after WWII. The Commission condemns Swiss decisions to encourage the marking of passports of Jewish persons with a "J" stamp in 1938, and the sealing of the Swiss borders to bar "racially" persecuted refugees in 1942.

December 14, 1999: German government and industry, together with Holocaust survivor representatives and plaintiffs' class action attorneys, announce an agreement in principle for a $5 billion program to compensate former slave and forced laborers for German enterprises, those injured due to medical experimentation, and certain property losses.		December 14, 1999: A fairness hearing on the Settlement Agreement is held in Israel, with telephonic connection to the Court in New York. December 23, 1999: The Court modifies its June 4, 1999 Order to Special Master Gribetz by directing that the proposed plan be filed by March 15, 2000, and that a hearing on the proposed plan be held on June 15, 2000, to enable the Special

		Master to take into account recent information: the Volcker Report of December 6, 1999, the Bergier Commission Report on Refugees of December 10, 1999, data contained in over 500,000 Initial Questionnaires then-received, and the terms of a December 14, 1999 agreement creating a $5 billion German fund (the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future") to compensate former slave and forced laborers.
February 2000: A Parliamentary committee led by Israeli Knesset member Colette Avital is established to inquire into the fate of possibly unreturned land, bank accounts and other assets held in Israel by Holocaust victims.
	February 9, 2000: ICEP Chairman Paul Volcker testifies at a hearing before the House Committee on Banking and Financial Services, reiterating the publication and data access recommendations of the Volcker Report.
February 15, 2000: The International Commission on Holocaust-Era Claims (ICHEIC) launches its claims process for unpaid insurance policies.
		March 14, 2000: The Court states that it cannot approve the Settlement Agreement until Swiss authorities agree to implement the central recommendations of the Volcker Report. Accordingly, the Special Master is to file his proposed plan within thirty days following the Court's approval of the Settlement Agreement, if approval is given.
	March 30, 2000: The SFBC announces that it has "authorized" the Swiss banks to publish 25,000 accounts (later reduced to 21,000) described in the Volcker Report as "probably" belonging to Holocaust victims, and to create a centralized database of 46,000 accounts (later reduced to 36,000) that the Volcker Report describes as "probably or possibly related to Holocaust victims." The SFBC declines to adopt the recommendation to create a centralized Total Accounts Database (TAD) of all 4.1 million Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, stating that the database is "neither necessary nor meaningful" because "ICEP itself had, after a very thorough investigation, no reason to believe that these accounts were in any way related to victims of the Holocaust." April 2000: The Swiss Humanitarian Fund begins issuing payments to survivors in Israel. April 12, 2000: Paul Volcker advises SFBC Chairman Hauri by letter that "the exclusion of millions of small savings accounts and Swiss address accounts from the ICEP analysis in the interest of speedy and manageable results does not, and cannot, mean that none of those accounts were Holocaust related," thus reiterating the Volcker Committee's recommendation that Swiss authorities permit the claims process to access the Total Accounts Database (TAD). May 26, 2000: Charles and Sabine Sonabend, whose father was a well-known importer of Swiss watches and who, with his wife, was killed in Auschwitz after Switzerland expelled the family in August 1942, are paid $118,000 in a settlement by Switzerland. The NYTimes reports that Switzerland has never before voluntarily agreed to payments based upon its deportation of thousands of Jews. May 30, 2000: The Swiss Humanitarian Fund makes its first payments to the "Righteous of the Nations," individuals who rescued or otherwise assisted Nazi victims.

July 17, 2000: Germany enacts legislation establishing the $5 billion German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future," intended primarily to pay former slave and forced laborers as well as certain personal injury and property claims.		July 26, 2000: Fairness Opinion: The Court approves the Settlement Agreement. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F.Supp.2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). The Court finds the Settlement Agreement to be fair under the circumstances, taking into account the "legal and practical impediments to the successful litigation of this case by the vast majority of individuals to whom money is justly due" because of the "successful campaign that the Swiss banks waged to prevent disclosure before records were destroyed," as described in the Volcker Report. Defendant banks are ordered to advise the Court within seven days whether they will execute certain amendments to the Settlement Agreement relating to implementation of the Volcker Report recommendations concerning publication of account names and access to bank records, as well as other amendments related to looted art and insurance, and further conditions requiring companies seeking releases under Slave Labor Class II to self-identify in view of the dearth of information about this class. If the banks do not execute the Settlement Agreement amendments, the Court will approve the original Settlement Agreement. In either case, the Court states that it will hold defendant banks and other releasees to a good faith duty to cooperate in implementing the Settlement Agreement. August 2, 2000: The parties execute "Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement" and the "Memorandum to the File," providing for the defendant banks' compliance with the Volcker Report's recommendations, and establishing procedures concerning looted art and insurance claims. August 9, 2000: The Court enters an order granting final approval to the Settlement Agreement, as amended by Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement and by the Memorandum to the File. August 11, 2000: The Court directs the Special Master to file his proposed plan on or before September 11, 2000.

September 5, 2000: Abrams v. Societe Nationale des Chemins de Fer Francais is filed against the French national railroad for its role in transporting Jews in cattle-cars to death camps in Germany and Eastern Europe.		September 7, 2000: One individual files a Notice of Appeal from the District Court's August 9, 2000 Final Order and Judgment approving the Settlement Agreement. Under the Settlement Agreement, no distributions from the Settlement Fund can be made until the "Settlement Date;" i.e., until all appeals from the Final Order and Judgment have been resolved. September 11, 2000: The Special Master files the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, a two-volume document approximately 900 pages in length, including annexes and appendices; summaries are mailed to all 580,000 persons who had returned Initial Questionnaires by that date. The proposed plan recommends that up to $800 million of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund should be allocated to the Deposited Assets Class in recognition of the estimates of the number and value of identifiable Holocaust victim accounts provided in the Volcker Report, the priority placed upon the bank accounts under the Settlement Agreement, and the legal and historical strength of the bank account claims; the Deposited Assets claims process is to be administered by the already-existing Claims Resolution Tribunal ("CRT") in Zurich, Switzerland. The remaining $425 million is to be distributed among approximately 200,000 surviving former slave laborers in payments of $1,000 each (subsequently increased to $1,450); surviving refugees ($2,500 each, subsequently increased to $3,625), for those who were denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, and $500, subsequently increased to $725, for those admitted but mistreated in Switzerland). The sum of $100 million (subsequently increased to $256 million) is designated for humanitarian assistance programs for the neediest survivors as members of the Looted Assets Class. An additional $10 million (later increased to $14.5 million) is recommended for the Victim List Fund on behalf of all class members to memorialize all victims of Nazi persecution, those who survived and those who perished. Along with the CRT, the distribution process is to be administered for the Court by the Conference on Jewish Material

	December 1, 2000: The Bergier Commission releases an interim report concluding that Swiss officials systematically expelled or turned away at the border Roma refugees fleeing the Nazis. The Swiss policies were carried out "'without considering the persecution likely to face those under the threat, and the danger to the lives of people expelled to Nazi Germany,'" and with "'good information about transportation of German Gypsies [Roma] eastward to Poland, and about mass killings beginning in 1941.'"
		December 8, 2000: The Court issues the first of hundreds of orders implementing the terms of the Distribution Plan, by appointing Paul Volcker and Michael Bradfield (counsel to the Volcker Committee) to serve as CRT Special Masters; extending the term of Judah Gribetz's appointment to oversee

January 16, 2001: The Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the U.S. reports that 2,200 books and other objects looted from Nazi victims were brought back by U.S. forces and are now in the Library of Congress, university collections and museums. January 17, 2001: Austria and the U.S. Government sign an agreement by which Austria creates a general settlement fund of $360 million to partially compensate Holocaust survivors for property and assets that were "aryanized" and stolen during WWII, and grants social welfare benefits including certain payments for nursing care and government pensions. January 18, 2001: An agreement is signed between the U.S. and France, in which French banks agree to pay $172.5 million to 64,000 known account holders during the Nazi era, and other undocumented claimants. The payments to the victims are to be made through the French government's Drai Commission.		January 19, 2001: Special Masters Volcker and Bradfield hold a hearing regarding the proposed CRT Rules, which establish certain access obligations on the part of the Swiss banks. The Swiss Federal Department of Justice and Police (SFDJP) grants permission for the Court to operate a claims program in Switzerland. February 5, 2001: A list of 21,000 Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts is published on the internet; the Court approves the CRT Rules. The deadline for filing claims to Deposited Assets is August 11, 2001. The deadline subsequently is extended to August 31, 2001 and, for claims which would not be prejudicial to timely filed claims, extended again to December 31, 2003 and then to December 31, 2004.

March 7, 2001: U.S. District Judge Shirley Wohl Kram declines to dismiss class action litigation against German banks, casting uncertainty over the finality of the German slave labor agreement, as "legal peace" for the defendants is one the conditions of the settlement. Judge Kram ultimately dismisses the cases on May 11, 2001, subject to certain requirements to be imposed under German law. The United States Court of Appeals reverses Judge Kram's imposition of these additional requirements on the ground that a U.S. court has no legal authority over the German Parliament, thus resolving the dispute and enabling payments to commence.		April 4, 2001: The Court issues an order setting forth the Slave Labor Class II List, consisting of companies that timely self-identified and provided information to the Special Master concerning their use of slave labor. April 13, 2001: The Court issues an order approving the Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, and Refugee Class claims procedures proposed by the Claims Conference, IOM and JDC, and approves the humanitarian assistance proposals on behalf of the Looted Assets Class filed by these administrative agencies.

May 2001: The Hungarian Gold Train litigation begins with the filing by Hungarian Holocaust survivors of a class action suit against the U.S. in the Southern District of Florida, Rosner v. U.S.
		May 16, 2001: Lead Settlement Counsel notifies the Court that the "Settlement Date" has been reached due to the withdrawal of the one appeal against the approval of the settlement, thus enabling distributions to class members to begin; on May 30, 2001, the Second Circuit formally grants the appellant's motion to withdraw.
May 22, 2001: The Knesset Finance Committee considers a proposed law that would establish a "Fund for the Jewish People" which, according to its sponsors, would be financed with the proceeds of Holocaust-era claims, and would recognize the State of Israel as the legal heir of all heirless Jewish assets.
		June 12, 2001: Counsel for defendants and plaintiffs' class counsel agree to the Claims Process Guidelines (the "Guidelines"), establishing procedures for implementing an insurance claims process for policies originating with either Swiss Re or Swiss Life. The parties recommend and the Court approves the CRT as administrator of the insurance process. On June 28, 2001, the Court issues an order adopting the Claims Process Guidelines for Insurance Claims. Eligible insurance claims are to be reviewed by the participating Swiss insurers, and payments are to be made from the Settlement Fund and from the participating insurers (50% each), up to a cap of $25 million on the insurers' total payments. June 28, 2001: The Court authorizes the first distributions to class members: $35 million to Holocaust survivors who were slave laborers (under Slave Labor Class I); and over $8.5 million to programs serving the neediest Jewish Nazi victims as members of the Looted Assets Class. July 26, 2001: The Second Circuit rejects the one remaining appeal from the Court's order adopting the Distribution Plan (the four remaining appeals had been previously withdrawn). The Second Circuit affirms that it was appropriate to appoint the Claims Conference to assist in the distribution process because of its experience with similar programs and its designation to assist with the German Foundation slave labor program. The Second Circuit also affirms the validity of allocating up to $800 million to the Deposited Assets Class because the "existence and estimated value of the claimed deposit accounts was established by extensive forensic accounting" and "these claims are based on well-established legal principles, have the ability of being proved with concrete documentation, and are readily valuated in terms of time and inflation;" "[b]y contrast, the claims of the other four classes are based on novel and untested legal theories of liability, would have been very difficult to prove at trial, and will be very difficult to accurately valuate." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Lit., 2001 WL 868507 (2d Cir. July 26, 2001), reissues as a published opinion on July 1, 2005, 413 F.3d 183

To maintain conformity in the claims procedures under the Swiss and German slave labor compensation programs, and to minimize survivor confusion concerning conflicting claims deadlines, the Court extends the application deadlines for Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II and the Refugee Class until December 31, 2001, the same date established under the German legislation. Moreover, as a result of the Settlement Date having been reached, settlement payments deposited by the settling defendants into the Escrow Fund now are to be transferred to two accounts constituting the Settlement Fund. September 24, 2001: The Court approves the IOM's Pilot Project Proposal for humanitarian assistance to Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled survivors, and orders the transfer of $1 million in implementation of these initial projects. 	October 12, 2001: Newspapers report that Swiss Banks had found only "$10 million" in Holocaust-era accounts, describing the final reports of the first phase of the Claims Resolution Tribunal in Zurich ("CRT-I"). The press coverage about CRT-I does not distinguish between CRT-I, which is ending, and CRT-II, which is just beginning under Judge Korman's authority. The articles do not explain that CRT-I was created to analyze different accounts, was open to different claimants, had different operating procedures, and was managed largely by different staff. The CRT-II process supervised by the Court ultimately awards over $726 million to Holocaust victims and heirs.

		through November 2005; (2) authorizing payment of $4,113,074.52 for 29 awards and 13 denials to Deposited Assets class members; and (3) authorizing payment of $1,057,573.25 for 11 awards and eight denials to Deposited Assets class members. December 21, 2004: The Court issues an order authorizing payment of $355,250 to 125 Jewish refugees. December 24, 2004: The Court issues orders authorizing payment to Deposited Assets Class members: $992,447.29 for 13 awards and three denials; and $1,494,095.87 for 16 awards and four denials. December 30, 2004: The Court issues orders authorizing payment to Deposited Assets Class members: (1) $4,589,552.23 for 25 awards and eight denials; (2) $1,169,911.50 for 13 awards; and (3) $1,724,424.74 for 41 award amendments. In the latter case, the Court adopts Special Master Junz' recommendation to increase the sums awarded to claimants associated with 39 previously approved awards by authorizing the CRT to calculate payments to claimants based upon presumptive values, where the account values reported in the bank records are lower than the presumptive values used by the CRT, because the evidence indicates that account owners underreported their accounts or the banks imposed fees and other charges against the accounts. The Court issues another order approving the CRT's request to treat as timely any claims on behalf of "victims or targets of Nazi persecution" filed with entities authorized to treat these claims prior to the Settlement Agreement: ICEP, values set forth under current CRT Rules. The recommendation is based upon extensive study of the presumptive values determined by the ICEP auditors at the inception of the claims process in 2000, as compared with the average values of known-value accounts awarded to date. CRT Special Master Junz advises that adoption of the recommendation would result in additional payments of approximately $179 million to $285 million; the total amount of Deposited Assets Class payments could be $803 million (although the Distribution Plan allocated up to $800 million for such claims). March 23, 2006: The Court issues an order authorizing payment of $681,272 to the USHMM under the Victim List Project in support of the completion of the cataloging of names lists, research on lists of non-Jewish names worldwide, the creation of technical interfaces with Yad Vashem for further cooperation, and the digitization of approximately 1 million records concerning non-Jewish victims. March 27, 2006: The Court issues an order authorizing payment of $5,652,100 to Jewish members of Slave Labor Class I: 417 survivors and 3,481 heir claims on behalf of Jewish survivors who performed slave labor and died on or after February 15, 1999. March 29, 2006: The Court issues an order authorizing payment of $1,271,170.52 for 11 awards, five award amendments and five denials to Deposited Assets class members. The Court issues an order authorizing payment of $10,000,000 for 2,000 PUAs to Deposited Assets

Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation
Case No. CV 96-4849

Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2018 (Amounts Approved and Paid by the Court)

	Funds Authorized*	Funds Paid	Approved Claimants
Deposited Assets Class	$726,272,177	$719,745,337	≅ 18,096
Looted Assets Class	$256,271,791	$256,271,791	≅ 237,464

GRAND TOTAL:	$1,298,643,604	$1,284,928,006	≅ 458,436 claimants

* In connection with the reconciliation of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund (and preparation of a final report), these statistics have been updated to set forth two categories of information: (1) "Funds Authorized": amounts authorized by court order upon the Court's review and approval of materials analyzed, prepared and submitted by the administrative agencies in consultation with the Special Masters; and (2) "Funds Paid": amounts paid to individual claimants after their claims were approved by the Court. "Funds authorized" exceeded "funds paid" for the following reasons: (1) approved claimants could not be located despite numerous efforts to obtain contact information; (2) approved claimants passed away and no eligible heirs could be located; (3) approved claimants refused to accept payment and/or refused to complete documentation required to effectuate payment; and/or (4) in a limited number of cases, certain approved Deposited Assets Class awards were withdrawn by Court order as a result of information which came to the attention of the CRT subsequent to the authorization of such awards. In all instances, any funds authorized but unpaid were either applied to authorized but unfunded awards of the same class, or returned to the Settlement Fund for reauthorization and distribution to other class members. Accordingly, certain funds that were authorized but unpaid for one class (e.g., Deposited Assets) were reauthorized and distributed to another class (e.g., Looted Assets), and thus would be reflected twice under the "Funds Authorized" category, but once under the "Funds Paid" category.

[1] $575,000 in payments were authorized to seven class members whom the Court determined provided "efforts [which] materially aided the plaintiff class." See, e.g., Memorandum & Order, December 4, 2002.

[2] The Court has allocated $14.5 million to the Victim List Project (approximately 1% of the $1.284 billion that has been paid out; the latter amount exceeds the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund).

[3] The total number of approved claimants, 18,096, includes 5,248 claimants and represented parties (i.e., individuals who provided the CRT with Power of Attorney forms authorizing claimants to represent them) approved for awards based upon documentary evidence obtained from Swiss banks and other sources, under the process administered in Zurich by the CRT-II.

Additionally, the total number of approved claimants of Deposited Assets Class payments includes 12,596 claimants approved to receive Deposited Assets Class awards based upon their plausible undocumented claims ("Plausible Undocumented Awards" or "PUAs"), under the CRT-II process administered in New York under the Court's authority. Through continuing analysis of the bank files, documented awards subsequently were located for 295 individuals who had received PUA payments. For these 295 individuals, the PUAs were deducted from the amount of the documented award. Accordingly, the total number of claimants receiving plausible undocumented awards is reflected in these statistics as 12,301 rather than 12,596 because the additional 295 claimants already are included among the 5,248 individuals who received awards based upon bank records or other documentary evidence.

Finally, the total number of approved claimants of Deposited Assets Class payments includes 547 claimants approved under the CRT-I process who were paid by the Settlement Fund pursuant to the terms of the Settlement Agreement.

[4] In addition to awards, at the recommendation of CRT-II, the Court issued an additional 98,819 decisions rejecting claims, consisting of (1) 6,673 denials, (2) 2,288 determinations of inadmissibility, and (3) 89,858 "No Match" Decisions.

(1) Denials were claims that the CRT determined to be ineligible for awards. There were a variety of bases for such determinations: (a) the claimant's relative and the account owner were not the same individual, based upon information in the bank records and/or other sources ("identity" denials); (b) the available evidence indicated that the account was closed properly and the account owner received the proceeds ("disposition denials"); (c) the claimant was not entitled to the claimed account, whether due to the absence of a family relationship to the account owner or for other reasons ("entitlement" denials); and (d) the name(s) of the relative(s) claimed to have owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, and the names of account owners made available to the CRT by the Swiss banks or located via other sources, did not match ("no match" denials).

(2) Inadmissibility decisions were claims that the CRT determined to be ineligible to participate in the Deposited Assets Class process. Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, only the accounts of "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" were payable from the Settlement Fund (with the exception of Slave Labor Class II, which was open to all Nazi victims). The Settlement Agreement defines "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" as those who were, or were perceived to be, Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, disabled, or homosexual. Neither the CRT nor the Court had the authority to address Deposited Assets Class claims asserted on behalf of account owners who were not "victims or targets" as defined under the Settlement Agreement.

(3) "No Match" Decisions were issued when the CRT determined that there were no accounts in the Account History Database (AHD) matching to names of account owners that were provided to the CRT by the claimant. The AHD consisted of 36,138 accounts identified during the investigation of Swiss banks by the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP or the Volcker Committee) as probably or possibly belonging to victims of Nazi persecution, augmented to 37,954 accounts through information obtained by the CRT from other sources such as archival records. The CRT used advanced name matching systems and computer programs in conducting its matching analysis. The CRT matched not only the names of persons specifically claimed to have owned a Swiss bank account, but the names of other family members identified by the claimant. More than 415,000 such names were provided by claimants and matched to the AHD.

[5] In calculating the average values of documented CRT awards, four awards were excluded (three involving the same account owners) because their size would have skewed the results. These awards related to the three decisions issued in connection with In re Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG Syndicate ("ÖZAG," also known as "Bloch-Bauer") (one decision issued on April 13, 2005 in the amount of $21,860,325.09, and two decisions issued on December 29, 2006, in the amounts of $15,688,718.34 and $9,610,660.66, respectively); and the decision issued in In re Löw ($12,030,605.95). The average values further exclude payments issued pursuant to three agreements approved by the Court: In re Alfons and Maria Thorsch ($3,757,657.19); In re Accounts of Paul Wittgenstein et al. ($6,063,918.88); and In re the Assets of Siegfried Budge ($4,600,000).

[6] Approximately 237,464 surviving Nazi victims have been compensated thus far from the Settlement Fund through programs serving the neediest members of the Looted Assets Class. Under the Court's order of May 13, 2013 allocating residual funds, these programs will continue through 2018 and updated information will be provided at a later date. The number of victims compensated through Looted Assets Class programs to date is derived from the following three sources:

(1) An estimated 27,599 Jewish victims were served by programs administered on the Court's behalf by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Inc. (Claims Conference). See May 11, 2012 Letter of Greg Schneider, Claims Conference Executive Vice President. According to the Letter, "…As opposed to other classes under the Settlement such as Slave Labor Class I and Refugee Class in which a class member is entitled to one payment per lifetime, social services and emergency grants provided under Looted Assets Class may be given multiple times to the same Nazi victim during the [course] of the 10 year funding period. Indeed, many Nazi victims receiving an emergency grant under Looted Assets Class in one year will, in fact, require a second or third grant in the subsequent year(s). Concomitantly, not every Nazi victim will require multiple grants and further new clients are added. The result is that we do not have a cumulative list of the number of Nazi victims who benefited under Looted Assets; rather, annual totals of the number of Nazi victims served. By definition, the total cumulative number served over the ten year period to date must exceed any particular annual number served because, although many of the same Nazi victims are again served in a second year, many new clients are also added. The total number served cannot be lower than the total number of people served in years past; that service, once received, is counted toward the grand total of all people assisted even if they do not receive the same aid in later years. Therefore, surely, the number of Nazi victims aided under Looted Assets via the Claims Conference for the period July 1, 2001-December 31, 2011 exceeds the number of survivors served in a one-year period, namely 27,599."

(2) The Court's programs on behalf of Jewish Nazi victims in the Former Soviet Union were administered by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) through its Hesed program. Since 2001, an estimated total of at least 134,689 Jewish Nazi victims have been served by the Looted Assets Class program in the FSU. See May 8, 2012 Letter of Herbert Block, Assistant Executive Vice President of the JDC. The total number of Jewish Nazi Victims served by the Looted Assets Class program in the FSU was calculated based on the average number of JDC clients who received services funded by the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund from the period of 2003 through 2005. As the May 8, 2012 Letter explains:

> "From the period of July 2001 through December 2011, a total of 209,470 Jewish victims of Nazi persecution received welfare services as clients of the network of Hesed welfare centers in the Former Soviet Union (FSU), administered by the JDC. Some of these clients received services which were funded under the Looted Assets Class of the Swiss Banks Settlement…[F]or each year during the period 2003-2005, on average 64.3% of Jewish Nazi victims in the FSU received services funded by the Looted Assets Class of the Swiss Banks Settlement. As JDC does not track funding of services for individual clients by funding source across years, based on this average we estimate that the approximate total number of individual clients in the FSU who have been assisted to-date with Court funds to be at least 134,689[1]. However, it is likely that, in fact, the number of clients served by Settlement funds is actually somewhat higher than calculated by this statistical averaging method. This is due to the fact that every year that Looted Assets Class services are provided, some number of individuals will be receiving services for the first time, even if the total number of persons served by the program in that year may have decreased. Thus, the cumulative number of persons served will be higher than the number derived by determining the average number of persons served in any given year or period of years. The cumulative number, however, is unavailable for the reasons described above.
> [1] Each year food packages have been the service provided to the great[est] number of clients and therefore the percentage of clients who received this service was used to calculate the total clients served by Settlement funds. However, as the percentage of clients who received food packages funded by the Settlement decreased in 2006-2011 (as Settlement funds were used more for homecare services), if the 2006-2011 percentages were included in the calculation it would artificially and inaccurately decrease the total number of clients served."

(3) 75,176 non-Jewish victims (Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled and homosexual) were served by programs administered on the Court's behalf by the International Organization for Migration (IOM). See "Final Report on Assistance to Needy, Elderly Survivors of Nazi Persecution Humanitarian and Social Programmes", IOM-HSP

2006. In addition to the number of survivors described in the IOM's Final Report, new beneficiaries were assisted as a result of the Court's distribution of residual funds beginning in 2013.

[7] The Court authorized the allocation of interest income that had accrued on funds transferred to the JDC and the Claims Conference, thereby increasing the amount allocated to Jewish class members by $948,235. Accordingly, when adding this accrued interest to the principal, the amounts ultimately authorized for and distributed through programs administered by the JDC and the Claims Conference slightly exceeded the sum originally calculated utilizing the 90%/10% allocation between Jewish and non-Jewish class members. It is anticipated that the Court similarly will authorize the IOM to allocate accrued interest to needy survivors in connection with the IOM's disbursement of remaining residual funds.

[8] The Swiss Banks Settlement Insurance Claims Process provided Nazi Victims and their heirs the opportunity to submit claims concerning policies purchased from certain insurance companies (the "Participating Companies") between 1920 and 1945 for review by the Claims Resolution Tribunal operated under the authority of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York ("CRT-II"). Under the terms of the Insurance Claims Process, the Settlement Agreement compensated claimants who demonstrated that they were the legitimate owners of or heirs to unpaid insurance policies issued prior to or during the Second World War by the Participating Companies. Claimants also were required to demonstrate that policyholders or policyholders' heirs were Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution.

[1] This chart provides data concerning distributions or allocations to Jewish Nazi victims through December 31, 2018. For data concerning distributions or allocations to all class members -- Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled -- see chart entitled "Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2018 ($1,298,643,604 authorized and $1,284,928,006 paid to all 458,436 class members)." In addition to the 357,689 beneficiaries reflected in the chart herein, the Court approved funding to an additional 100,762 claimants (see chart entitled "Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2017), for a total of 458,451. The 100,762 is comprised of: (1) 547 Holocaust victims or heirs awarded under CRT-I; (2) a total of 100,090 non-Jewish Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members were assisted under the Court's supervision via programs administered by the IOM as follows: 75,176 Looted Assets Class members, 24,109 Slave Labor Class I victim claims, 570 Slave Labor Class II victim claims, and 235 Refugee victim claims; (3) 118 Holocaust victim claims approved under the Swiss Banks Settlement Insurance Claims process; and (4) 7 class members whom the Court determined provided "efforts [which] materially aided the plaintiff class." See e.g., Memorandum & Order, December 4, 2002.

[2] This geographic distribution chart provides data concerning funds authorized. In connection with the reconciliation of the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund (and preparation of a final report), the statistics in the chart, "Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2018" were updated to set forth two categories of information: (1) "Funds Authorized": amounts authorized by court order upon the Court's review and approval of materials analyzed, prepared and submitted by the administrative agencies in consultation with the Special Masters; and (2) "Funds Paid": amounts paid to individual claimants after their claims were approved by the Court. "Funds authorized" exceeded "funds paid" for the following reasons: (1) approved claimants could not be located despite numerous efforts to obtain contact information; (2) approved claimants passed away and no eligible heirs could be located; (3) approved claimants refused to accept payment and/or refused to complete documentation required to effectuate payment; and/or (4) in a limited number of cases, certain approved Deposited Assets Class awards were withdrawn by Court order as a result of information which came to the attention of the CRT subsequent to the authorization of such awards. In all instances, any funds authorized but unpaid were either applied to authorized but unfunded awards of the same class, or returned to the Settlement Fund for reauthorization and distribution to other class members. Accordingly, certain funds that were authorized but unpaid for one class (e.g., Deposited Assets) were reauthorized and distributed to another class (e.g., Looted Assets), and thus would be reflected twice under the "Funds Authorized" category, but once under the "Funds Paid" category.

[3] As reflected in the chart, "Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2018", a total of 173,914 Jewish Nazi victims were paid $252,175,300 under Slave Labor Class I. This geographic distribution chart reflects a total of 173,929 Jewish Nazi victims; i.e. 15 more than the final number as reconciled, a statistical discrepancy of zero. Likewise, this geographic distribution chart reflects total payments of $252,197,050; i.e. $21,750 more than the final number as reconciled, also a statistical discrepancy of zero.

[4] This chart does not reflect CRT-I awards of $18,184,493. Total authorized CRT-I and CRT-II awards were $726,272,177.

[5] The Looted Assets Class data consists of funds distributed through 2017 as well as estimations of funds to be allocated through the end of the program in 2018.

GLOSSARY: IN RE HOLOCAUST VICTIM ASSETS LITIGATION

1945 Freeze: Pursuant to a decree of the Swiss Federal Council, all assets in Switzerland belonging to citizens of Germany and the territories incorporated into the Third Reich were frozen on February 16, 1945. A Swiss government ruling of May 29, 1945 required that all German assets in Switzerland had to be reported to the Swiss Compensation Office. The freeze was lifted pursuant to the agreements concluded between Switzerland and Western Germany and between Switzerland, USA, France and the United Kingdom in August 1952. These agreements entered into force on 19 March 1953.

1962 Survey: By Federal Decree of December 20, 1962, the Swiss Federal Council obliged all individuals, legal entities, and associations to report any Swiss-based assets whose last-known owners were foreign nationals or stateless persons of whom nothing had been heard since May 9, 1945 and who were known or presumed to have been victims of racial, religious, or political persecution.

2001 List: On February 5, 2001, a list was published with the endorsement of the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") that contained names of owners of approximately 21,000 accounts that were determined by the auditors for the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP) to have probably or possibly belonged to victims of Nazi persecutions. In addition to the 21,000 published accounts, another 15,000 accounts also were determined to have probably or possibly belonged to victims of Nazi persecution but were not authorized for publication by the SFBC. All 36,000 accounts were made available to the claims process established under the Settlement Agreement as part of the "Account History Database" (AHD) (see below).

2005 List: On January 13, 2005, the Claims Resolution Tribunal (the "CRT") published an additional list of names of approximately 2,700 Account Owners and 400 Power of Attorney holders of Swiss bank accounts whose owners were probably or possibly Victims of Nazi persecution. The purpose of the 2005 List was to enable eligible claimants to identify the owners of Swiss bank accounts that were open or opened between 1933 and 1945 and to make claims to those accounts to which they may have been entitled. The list included names previously identified during the ICEP investigation of Swiss banks as possibly belonging to Holocaust victims. These names were not included in the list of names previously published with the endorsement of the SFBC in 2001. In addition, the 2005 List contained names of Account Owners and Power of Attorney Holders previously identified in a survey of dormant bank accounts conducted pursuant to the 1962 Survey (see 1962 Survey supra). Additional names of Account Owners were identified in records available to the CRT from archival sources.

Account History Database (AHD): On December 6, 1999, the Volcker Committee (see infra) released its final report. Its research showed that some 6.8 million Swiss bank accounts were open or opened during the relevant period of 1933-1945. Of these, the banks had destroyed documents relating to approximately 2.7 million accounts. Despite this massive document destruction, records still remained for approximately 4.1 million Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. The auditors conducted research on approximately 300,000 of these 4.1 million accounts. The Volcker Committee determined that of the 300,000 accounts investigated, a total of approximately 54,000 (specifically 53,886) had a "probable" or "possible" relationship to victims of Nazi persecution. These 53,886 accounts -- subsequently reduced to 36,000 by a so-called "scrubbing" process -- were to constitute the Accounts History Database ("AHD"); i.e., the database of accounts that would be made available to the CRT for use in the claims process. The Volcker Committee further recommended that approximately 21,000 of the 36,000 AHD accounts should be published. The remaining approximately 15,000 accounts were not to be published, but were to be available to the CRT for review in the event that a Holocaust victim or heir submitted a claim that appeared to match to the unpublished account. As to the bulk of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records continued to exist, but which were not included as part of the AHD, the Volcker Committee recommended that those remaining accounts should be consolidated into a "Total Accounts Database" (TAD) that also would be available for use in a claims process. The SFBC declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to create a Total Accounts Database for all of the 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss Banks in the relevant 1933-1945 period. The 36,000-account AHD was augmented to 38,624 accounts by information obtained by the CRT from archival records, claimant data and other sources.

Account Owner: The person named in the bank records as the owner or beneficiary of the account.

Adverse Inference: In the absence of evidence to the contrary, based upon the legal principle of spoliation, there were a variety of circumstances in which the Claims Resolution Tribunal presumed that neither the Account Owner, the Beneficial Owners, nor their heirs received the proceeds of a claimed Account. Please see Appendix A of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process (As Amended) for specific circumstances.

Amendment 2: An amendment modifying the original Settlement Agreement, relating to looted art and insurance claims. Additional modifications included the defendant banks' agreement to cooperate with the recommendations of the Volcker Committee; provisions regarding the payment of Deposited Assets claims; and provisions regarding the continued operation and funding of the CRT.

American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC): In existence since 1914, the JDC is a humanitarian agency which has been involved in relief efforts on behalf of Jewish and non-Jewish individuals worldwide. The Court appointed the JDC to implement distribution of humanitarian assistance to the neediest Jewish members of the Looted Assets Class residing in Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Appendix C: A provision adopted by the Court as part of the CRT Rules (defined below), which presumed as follows: "where accounts of German owners were closed on or after January 30, 1933, the date of Hitler's accession as Chancellor, absent evidence to the contrary such as bank records, the CRT will presume that the account owners and their heirs did not receive the benefit of their assets."

Article 2 Fund: Program established by Article 2 of the Implementation Agreement to the German Unification Treaty of October 3, 1990 and administered by the Claims Conference to compensate survivors of the Holocaust who had previously received little or no indemnification from the German government. Eligibility is restricted to survivors who meet certain defined criteria, including income limitations and minimum incarceration periods.

Austrian Census: By decree on 26 April 1938, the Nazi Regime required all Jews who resided within the Reich, or who were nationals of the Reich, including Austria, and who held assets above a specified level, to register all assets as of 27 April 1938. The records of the 1938 Austrian census are housed in the Austrian State Archive (Archive of the Republic, Finance).

Average Value: See "Presumptive Value" infra.

Award: A final decision of the CRT that the claimant was the rightful owner of a specified amount of money to be paid with the approval of the Court.

Bank Account Categories: Any type of bank account including custody, demand deposit (also known as current), passbook/savings, safety deposit boxes, "other" and unknown type. See also "Custody Account," "Demand Deposit Account," "Passbook/Savings Account," "Safe Deposit Box Account," "Other Account," and "Unknown Type of Account."

Bundesentschädigungsgesetz (BEG): In 1953, in accordance with its commitment to the Claims Conference set forth in Protocol 1 of the Luxembourg Agreement, the Federal Republic of Germany enacted its first Holocaust Indemnification statutes. The law was revised in 1956 and again in 1965. The statutes, collectively known as the "BEG," provided for compensation for wrongful death, disability, injury to health, incarceration, and damage to professional and economic standing, and, to a limited extent, property loss. The BEG was administered entirely by and within Germany.

Category 1: The Volcker Committee classified the AHD accounts into four different categories. "Category 1" was comprised of 3,191 accounts. These were accounts that remained open and dormant, were placed in suspense accounts, or closed after some period of dormancy, and matched exactly or almost exactly with names of known Holocaust victims or claimants.

Category 2: The second of the four categories of accounts with a "probable or possible relationship to victims of Nazi persecution" identified by the Volcker Committee. "Category 2" consisted of 7,280 accounts that did not meet the exact or near-exact name matching test, but nonetheless had other characteristics that suggested a probable or possible relationship between the account holders and victims of Nazi persecution -- Relevant Period (see infra) accounts of people who were resident in an Axis or Axis-occupied country during that Period, that were either inactive for at least 10 years after 1945 or, in some cases, identified by the bank as the account of a victim, or met other criteria.

Category 3: The third of the four categories of accounts with a "probable or possible relationship to victims of Nazi persecution" identified by the Volcker Committee. Category 3 consisted of a much larger number of closed accounts -- 30,692 -- open in the Relevant Period by residents of Axis or Axis-occupied countries, matched exactly or almost exactly to names of victims, which were closed (except for Germany) during or subsequent to the year of Axis occupation of the country of residence of the account holder or after the war. These characteristics were indicators of a probable or possible relationship of these accounts to victims. The Volcker Report noted that these accounts had no direct evidence of an extended period of dormancy, or of unauthorized closure, important elements of the presumption that there was a relationship to a victim. However, the Volcker Report also pointed out that 14,716 of these accounts had unique name matches or had confirming factors, and a total of 15,980 had unique or almost unique matches. These name matches therefore indicated a significantly higher probability that the relationship of these accounts to victims was not simply a coincidence of common names but were genuine matches between account holders and victims of Nazi persecution.

Category 4: The fourth of the four categories of accounts with a "probable or possible relationship to victims of Nazi persecution" identified by the Volcker Committee. Category 4 consisted of 12,723 nominally foreign accounts open in the Relevant Period that could not be matched to victim names and lacked evidence of a residence by an account holder in an Axis or Axis-occupied country during the Relevant Period. Some 8,400 suspended, unknown and savings type accounts in this Category came from Swiss Volksbank (now a part of Credit Suisse Group) and Banque Cantonale Neuchâteloise. Although these banks had a predominantly domestic retail business during the Relevant Period, they also had many contacts with foreigners. All of the accounts in this Category were considered as having a sufficiently possible relationship to Holocaust victims to warrant their inclusion in Category 4.

Central and Eastern European Fund (CEEF): In January 1998, after negotiations with the German government, the Claims Conference reached an agreement providing compensation for the first time to Jewish victims of Nazi persecution in Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Eligibility is restricted to survivors who meet certain defined criteria, including income limitations and minimum incarceration periods.

Claimed Account Owner: The person asserted by the Claimant to have owned a Holocaust-era Swiss bank account. In addition to researching accounts possibly owned by the Claimed Account Owner, the CRT also conducted other research to determine whether accounts may have been owned by other family members identified by claimants in their claim forms, Initial Questionnaires, and other communications to the CRT, even if those other family members were not specifically identified by Claimants as "Claimed Account Owners."

Claims or Settled Claims: As defined under the Settlement Agreement: "Any and all actions, causes of action, claims, Unknown Claims, obligations, damages, costs, expenses, losses, rights, promises, and agreements of any nature and demands whatsoever, from the beginning of the world to now and any time in the future, arising from or in connection with actual or alleged facts occurring on or before the date of this Settlement Agreement, whether in law, admiralty, or equity, whether class or individual, under any international, national, state, provincial, or municipal law, whether now accrued or asserted or hereafter arising or discovered, that may be, may have been, could have been, or could be brought in any jurisdiction before any court, arbitral tribunal, or similar body against any Releasee directly or indirectly, for, upon, by reason of, or in connection with any act or omission in any way relating to the Holocaust, World War II and its prelude and aftermath, Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, transactions with or actions of the Nazi Regime, treatment of refugees fleeing Nazi persecution by the Swiss Confederation or other Releasees, or any related cause or thing whatever, including, without limitation, all claims in the Filed Actions and all other claims relating to Deposited Assets, Looted Assets, Cloaked Assets, and/or Slave Labor, or any prior or future efforts to recover on such claims directly or indirectly from any Releasee."

Claims Processing System (CPS): A computer system utilized by the CRT beginning in the fall of 2003 to register and track claims, record communication with claimants and document decisions regarding each claim. The CRT switched from the Claims Adjudication System ("CAS") to CPS because: (1) the CPS matching program was superior, (2) CPS had the technical capacity to deal with the approximately 70,000 additional claims contained in Initial Questionnaires which, by Court order, were authorized to be processed as claim forms; and (3) CPS could be used by staff in Zurich and New York, allowed for sharing of claimant information and provided a variety of security measures.

Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT): The administrative agency responsible for processing claims relating to assets deposited in Swiss banks by Victims or Targets of Nazi persecution prior to and during the Second World War. The CRT operated in Zurich and, for certain functions, in New York, under the direct supervision of the Court and the Court-appointed Special Masters.

Closed Account: To make an Award for claims to Accounts that were categorized by ICEP as "closed unknown by whom," the CRT had to determine whether the Account Owners or their heirs received the proceeds of the Account prior to the time when the claim was submitted to the CRT. For presumptions relating to claims to certain closed accounts, see CRT Rules, Article 28.

Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference): The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany since 1951 has secured compensation and restitution for survivors of the Holocaust and heirs of victims. The organization has negotiated for and distributed payments from Germany, Austria, other governments, and certain industry; recovered unclaimed German Jewish property; and funded programs to assist the neediest Jewish victims of Nazism. Under the supervision of the Court and Special Masters, the Claims Conference administered the Court's programs for Jewish members of Slave Labor Class I, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class. Through the Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP) (see infra), the Claims Conference also provided technical and other assistance to the CRT.

Confirmed Match: The CRT's determination that the Claimed Account Owner identified by the Claimant(s) was definitely or plausibly the Account Owner identified in the bank records.

Court: The US. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, U.S.A., Judge Edward R. Korman presiding in the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation.

Custody Account: An interest-bearing account, also known as a "depot" or securities account. The bank held the account owner's property, usually consisting of securities (i.e., stocks or bonds).

CRT-I: The Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) was established in 1997 and its original mission was to arbitrate claims to 5,570 dormant accounts in Swiss banks that were published in 1997, prior to the completion of the ICEP investigation in 1999. That arbitration process is now referred to as CRT-I. The accounts adjudicated by CRT-I dated from 1933 to 1945 and remained open and dormant. Those accounts were owned both by Victims of Nazi persecution, and by non-Nazi victims. Ultimately, CRT-I adjudicated over 9,000 claims to accounts published in 1997. The work of CRT-I involving these accounts was completed in the spring of 2001.

CRT-II: The CRT began a new phase of its existence when it was charged with the processing of Deposited Assets claims as part of the Settlement Agreement and is now known as CRT-II. On February 5, 2001, CRT-II was established to provide Nazi victims or their heirs with an opportunity to make claims to assets deposited in Swiss Banks in the period before and during World War II. The claims process was part of the settlement of the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Judge Edward R. Korman presiding. CRT-II operated in Zurich under the supervision of the Court and the Special Masters.

CRT Rules: The rules governing the Claims Resolution Process established to provide the framework for the CRT to adjudicate the claims of victims or targets of Nazi persecution or their heirs to deposited assets in Swiss banks arising from the settlement of the Holocaust Victims Assets Litigation.

Cy Pres*: A remedy for relief through a class-wide benefit program where it is difficult or impractical to provide direct monetary compensation to individual class members; also referred to as the "next best thing."

Data Integrity: Data Integrity ("DI") was the manual process of controlling the quality of the data that was entered into the CRT's database. During DI, claim forms and Initial Questionnaires ("IQs") (see infra) authorized for treatment as claim forms were reviewed to ensure that the name of every relevant family member for each claimant was included for matching to names of account owners appearing in the Swiss bank records and other documentation to which the CRT has had access.

Data Librarian: An accountant employed by the Court, as required by the Swiss banking authorities, to review and often redact information from each bank record before it was provided to the CRT for analysis.

Defendant Banks (also known as "Settling Defendants"): As defined under the Settlement Agreement: "Credit Suisse and UBS AG (as successor to Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation) and each of their former and current corporate parents, subsidiaries, affiliates and branches (including, without limitation, Credit Suisse Group, Credit Suisse, Credit Suisse First Boston, Credit Suisse Financial Products, Credit Suisse First Boston (Europe) Ltd., Credit Suisse First Boston Canada, Inc. and CSFB Aktiengesellschaft), predecessors, successors, assigns, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, executors, administrators, and personal administrators, wherever they were, are, or may be located, incorporated, or conducting business, except for Winterthur Lebensversicherungs Gesellschaft and its subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell et al vs. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A. et al."

Demand Deposit Account: Also known as a "current account." A cash account providing instant access to funds (similar to a checking account in the present day). Demand deposit accounts were held for liquidity, rather than for investment, and collected minimal or no interest.

Denial: The CRT's determination that the claim was ineligible for an award. There were a variety of bases for such determinations: (a) the claimant's relative and the account owner were not the same individual, based upon information in the bank records and/or other sources ("identity" denials); (b) the available evidence indicated that the account was closed properly and the account owner received the proceeds ("disposition denials"); (c) the claimant was not entitled to the claimed account, whether due to the absence of a family relationship to the account owner or for other reasons ("entitlement" denials); and (d) the name(s) of the relative(s) claimed to have owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, and the names of account owners made available to the CRT by the Swiss banks or located via other sources, did not match ("no match" denials).

Deposited Assets: As defined under the Settlement Agreement: "(1) Any and all Assets actually or allegedly deposited by the beneficial owner, fiduciary, or other individual or organization with any custodian, including, without limitation, a bank, branch or agency of a bank, other banking organization or custodial institution or investment fund established or operated by a bank incorporated, headquartered or based in Switzerland at any time (including, without limitation, the affiliates, subsidiaries, branches, agencies, or offices of such banks, branches, agencies, custodial institutions, and investment funds that are or were located either inside or outside Switzerland at any time) in any kind of account (including, without limitation, a safe deposit box or securities account) prior to May 9, 1945, that belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, including, without limitation, any Assets that Settling Defendants or Other Swiss Banks determine should be paid to a particular claimant because the Assets definitely or possibly belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution; and/or (2) any and all Assets that the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal determines should be paid to a particular claimant or to the Settlement Fund because the Asset definitely or possibly belonged to an individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity (including, without limitation, their respective heirs, successors, affiliates, and assigns) actually persecuted by the Nazi Regime for any reason. A determination by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal to award a special adjustment to interest or fees to a particular claimant pursuant to the guidelines of the Panel of Experts on Interest and Fees and Other Charges shall be deemed to establish that the claimant was persecuted or targeted for persecution within the meaning of subsection (2) of this definition."

Deposited Assets Class: As defined under the Settlement Agreement: "Victims and Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Deposited Assets or any effort to recover Deposited Assets."

Disconfirmed Match: The CRT's determination that the Claimed Account Owner identified by the Claimant(s) was not the same person as the Account Owner identified in the bank records.

Disposition Denial: The CRT's determination that the available evidence indicated that the account was closed properly and the account owner received the proceeds.

Distribution Plan: The Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds. Special Master Gribetz submitted a Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds on September 11, 2000 ("Special Master's Proposal"), in accordance with the terms of the Settlement Agreement and the Court's March 31, 2999 Referral to Special Master for Development of Plan to Allocate and Distribute Settlement Proceeds, and subsequent amendments. On November 22, 2000, following public hearing on November 20, 2000, the Court adopted the Special Master's Proposal in its entirety. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2000 WL 33241660 (E.D.N.Y. November 22, 2000). On July 26, 2001, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the Court's November 22, 2000 decision. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 2001 WL 868507 (2d Cir. July 26, 2001), reissued as a published opinion on July 1, 2005, 413 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2005).

Dormant Account: As defined by the Volcker Report: "Those accounts with respect to which there have been no withdrawals or additions by, and no correspondence or other contacts with the account holders or their representatives or with beneficiaries since at least the end of 1945 as well as accounts that should have been dormant as described above but for the fact that the funds in the account are unavailable for reasons other than their return to the original depositors or their legal representatives."

Eizenstat Report: A report prepared in connection with the late 1990s inquiry into Holocaust-era Swiss assets, officially entitled U.S. and Allied Efforts to Recover Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden by Germany During World War II - Preliminary Study (May 1997). The Eizenstat Report was coordinated by then-Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade Stuart E. Eizenstat and prepared by William Z. Slany, Department of State Historian.

Entitlement Denial: The CRT's determination that the claimant was not entitled to the claimed account, whether due to the absence of a family relationship to the account owner or for other reasons.

Fairness Hearing: The hearings held in Brooklyn, New York on November 29, 1999 and, by telephonic connection, in Israel on December 14, 1999, by Judge Edward R. Korman, United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, to hear public comment on the proposed Settlement Agreement pursuant to the Court's obligation under United States class action law to determine whether the settlement was fair.

Fairness Opinion: The Court's decision of July 26, 2000 approving the Settlement Agreement as fair as required under United States class action law. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F.Supp.2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

Final Order and Judgment: The Court's order of August 9, 2000, in which the Court granted final approval and rendered final judgment approving the Settlement Agreement, as amended.

Flight Tax: A substantial tax levied by the Nazis upon those able to flee. As described in the Bergier Final Report, beginning in 1938, "many special taxes and levies were introduced such as the so-called 'Sühneleistung' (atonement fine) instituted after the pogrom in November 1938 [Kristallnacht] and the Reichsfluchtsteuer (emigration tax), which were extended and already levied on people who were likely to emigrate. To avoid the high penalties and meet the financial burden, many Jews and others who were persecuted had to withdraw their assets and securities from Switzerland."

German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility, and the Future": The Foundation established by the German government to make financial compensation available through partner organizations to former forced laborers and to those affected by other injustices from the National Socialist period. A "Remembrance and Future" fund was established within the Foundation to foster projects promoting social justice, the interests of survivors, and international cooperation in humanitarian endeavors. A significant part of the German Foundation fund is for non-Jewish slave and forced laborers.

Hardship Fund: The Fund established by the German government and administered by the Claims Conference to compensate Holocaust survivors who were refugees from Soviet bloc countries and who had not previously received indemnification.

Hesed*: A network of social service programs created by the JDC in 1992 to assist destitute, elderly Jewish victims of Nazi persecution still living in the former Soviet Union. Major Hesed services include food, medical relief, home care and winter assistance, in the home, at local community sites, and at multi-service centers in larger cities.

Holocaust Claims Processing Office of the New York State Banking Department (HCPO): To provide institutional assistance to individuals seeking to recover Holocaust-looted assets, on June 25, 1997, Governor Pataki created the Holocaust Claims Processing Office of the New York State Banking Department. The mission of the HCPO is to recover assets deposited in European banks; recover monies never paid in connection with insurance policies issued by European insurers; and recover lost or looted art.

Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation (HVAL): The lawsuit against and settlement with Swiss governmental and private entities in connection with claims to Holocaust-era assets. In late 1996 and early 1997, several class action lawsuits were filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York against certain Swiss banks, alleging that the Swiss banks knowingly retained and concealed assets of Holocaust victims and collaborated with and aided the Nazi Regime by accepting and laundering illegally obtained Nazi loot and profits of slave labor. The defendant banks included two of Switzerland's largest banks, Credit Suisse and United Bank of Switzerland ("UBS"). The lawsuit was brought before, and the settlement was supervised by, Judge Edward R. Korman of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Holocaust Victim Assets Programme (HVAP): The program operated by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) (see infra) under the Court's supervision, on behalf of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled members of Slave Labor Class I and the Refugee Class. The IOM also administered all Slave Labor Class II claims. In addition, in a separate "Humanitarian and Social Programme" (see below), the IOM administered the Court's Looted Assets Class programs on behalf of needy Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled Nazi victims.

Humanitarian and Social Programmes (HSP): The program administered on behalf of the Court by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) as part of the services provided to the neediest Nazi victims, all of whom were members of the Looted Assets Class. The IOM was responsible for operating programs on behalf of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, disabled and homosexual victims or targets of Nazi persecution. The program, which was supervised by the Court and the Special Master and is now complete, provided food, medical aid, coal, and other basic necessities of life to more than 73,000 needy Nazi victims, most of whom had not previously received Holocaust compensation.

Identity Denial: The CRT's determination that the Claimed Account Owner (as identified by the Claimant) and the Account Owner (as identified in the bank records or other documentation) were not the same individual.

Inadmissibility Decision: The CRT's determination that a claim was ineligible under the Deposited Assets Class process. Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, only the accounts of "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" could be paid from the Settlement Fund. The Settlement Agreement defined "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" as those who were, or were perceived to be, Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, disabled, or homosexual. Other grounds for issuance of an Inadmissibility Decision were as follows: the claim was based essentially on a statement that the Claimant or his or her relative and the Account Owner had the same or similar last name; the Claimant provided no relevant information and/or documentation regarding his or her relationship to the Account Owner; the Claimant did not assert a relationship to the Account Owner that would justify an Award to the Account; or, it was apparent that the person the Claimant believed to be the Account Owner and the actual Account Owner were not the same person.

Incentive Award: $575,000 in payments were made to seven class members whom the Court determined provided efforts which materially aided the plaintiff class.

Independent Claims Resolution Foundation (ICRF): Foundation chaired by Paul A. Volcker which was established to oversee an objective, impartial, streamlined process for resolving claims to dormant accounts listed in notification published worldwide by the Swiss Bankers Association.

Independent Commission of Experts (ICE); Bergier Commission: An independent group of internationally recognized historians chaired by Jean Françoise Bergier, which the Swiss Confederation established in 1996 to examine Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany. The Commission was established in December 1996 by a unanimously approved resolution of the Swiss federal assembly (parliament). Its mandate was to investigate the volume and fate of assets moved to Switzerland before, during and immediately after the Second World War from a historical and legal point of view, and to present a final report. See also Bergier Report.

Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP): Committee, chaired by Paul A. Volcker, former Chairman of the United States Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. ICEP was established in 1996 by the Swiss Bankers Association, the World Jewish Congress and other Jewish organizations to conduct an independent audit of Swiss banks to identify accounts from the World War II era that could possibly belong to victims of Nazi persecution.

Initial Questionnaire (IQ): In connection with notice to the class of the proposed settlement, a six-page Initial Questionnaire was circulated to all potential class members to obtain information on the nature and scope of their claims. Over 600,000 Initial Questionnaires were received from Holocaust victims and heirs residing in more than 100 nations.

Insurance Claim: The Settlement Agreement permitted claims to be filed by those who could demonstrate that they were the legitimate owners of or heirs to unpaid insurance policies issued prior to or during the Second World War by the Participating Companies. Claimants were also required to demonstrate that policyholders or policyholders' heirs were Victims or Targets of Nazi persecution.

International Commission for Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC): Commission established in 1998 following negotiations among European insurance companies and U.S. insurance regulators, as well as representatives of international Jewish and survivor organizations and the State of Israel, charged with establishing a just process to collect and facilitate the signatory companies' processing of insurance claims from the Holocaust period.

International Organization for Migration (IOM): One of the four Court-appointed agencies designated to process claims under the Settlement Agreement, the IOM is a non-governmental organization which was established in 1951, and as reported at www.iom.int, remains the leading inter-governmental organization in the field of migration. The IOM has 127 member states, another 17 states holding observer status, and has offices in over 100 nations. The IOM administered the settlement on behalf of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled members of Slave Labor Class I, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class, as well as all members of Slave Labor Class II.

"J" Stamp: A mark on the passports of Jews from the Reich. The "J"-stamp commenced with an August 22, 1938 communication from the Swiss Legation in Bern to the German Foreign Office proposing that there be some delineation on German passports as to whether the person was Aryan or non-Aryan.

Independent Commission of Experts (ICE); Bergier Commission: An independent group of internationally recognized historians chaired by Jean Françoise Bergier, which the Swiss Confederation established in 1996 to examine Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany. The Commission was established in December 1996 by a unanimously approved resolution of the Swiss federal assembly (parliament). Its mandate was to investigate the volume and fate of assets moved to Switzerland before, during and immediately after the Second World War from a historical and legal point of view, and to present a final report. See also Bergier Report.

Kapo: A prisoner given a supervisory position by the Germans over slave laborers.

Kaufman Factor: At its September 4, 1997 meeting, ICEP decided to establish a panel of experts to provide advice on the adjustment factor to be applied to the 1945 balance of an account in order to calculate its present value. Financial economist Henry Kaufman chaired the panel and on September 8, 1998, the Kaufman Panel submitted its final report to members of ICEP. After considering the Kaufman Panel Report, the ICEP Board agreed that the applicable rate of return would be an adjustment factor of 10 from the 1945 value. As a result of Court-authorized amendments recommended by Mr. Volcker, the Kaufman factor ultimately was increased to 12.5.

Late Claim: Claims filed after the Court-ordered deadline. Under Rule 6(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the court has the authority to extend the time for complying with a court-ordered deadline upon motion by a party and a finding that the failure to act was the result of excusable neglect. The Court extended the filing deadlines several times for the various classes. The last extended deadline, that for the Deposited Assets Class, expired on December 31, 2004.

Lead Settlement Counsel: The Court appointed Members of the Plaintiffs' Executive Committee to serve as Settlement Class Counsel with regard to the Settlement Agreement. Burt Neuborne, the Norman Dorsen Professor of Civil Liberties at New York University Law School, was designated Lead Settlement Counsel.

Looted Assets: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: "Assets actually or allegedly belonging in whole or in part to Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution that were actually or allegedly stolen, expropriated, Aryanized, confiscated, or that were otherwise wrongfully taken by, at the request of, or under the auspices of the Nazi Regime."

Looted Assets Class: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: the Class consisting of "Victims and Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets or any effort to recover Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets."

Match: The CRT's determination that there was information about the account owner in the bank records made available to the CRT which corresponded to the information about the claimed account owner (CAO) (see infra) provided in the claim form.

Matching: The process of comparing computer databases of names of Victims and/or Claimants with names of Account Owners using algorithms to identify exact name matches, near-exact name matches, and name matches with confirming factors under procedures used in the ICEP investigation and under the CAS system. For definitions of "ICEP" and "CAS," see supra.

Multiple Plausible Match (MPM): The CRT's determination that the relatives of two or more unrelated claimants plausibly matched the account owner; in such instances, if it was determined that an award of the account(s) is appropriate, the payment was divided pro rata among the claimants.

Nazi Regime: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: "The National Socialist government of Germany from 1933 through 1945 and its instrumentalities, agents, and allies (including, without limitation, all other Axis countries), all occupied countries, and all other individuals or entities in any way affiliated or associated with, or acting for or on behalf or under the control or influence of, the Nazi Regime, including, without limitation, the Accused Organizations and Individuals in the Nurnberg Trial, 6 F.R.D. 69 (1946)."

No Match Decision: The CRT's determination that the name of the relative claimed to have owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, and the names of account owners made available to the CRT by the Swiss banks or located via other sources, did not match. The CRT used advanced name matching systems and computer programs in conducting its matching analysis. Further, the CRT matched not only the names of persons specifically claimed to have owned a Swiss bank account, but the names of other family members identified by the claimant.

Occupation and Alliance Dates: For purposes of the Deposited Assets Class claims process, the date upon which the Third Reich gained control over the account owner's country of residence, whether by incorporation into the Reich, occupation or formal alliance; this is the date upon which it was presumed that the Account Owner lost control over his/her Swiss bank account.

Organizational Endorsements: The Settlement Agreement became operative as of March 30, 1999 following execution of written "Organizational Endorsements" of the agreement by the following 17 major worldwide Jewish organizations: Agudath Israel World Organization, Alliance Israelite Universelle, the American Gathering/Federation of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, B'nai B'rith International, the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel, the Conference [on] Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the Council of Jews from Germany, the European Council of Jewish Communities, the Holocaust Educational Trust, the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Simon W[ie]senthal Center, the World Jewish Congress, and the World Zionist Organization. See also "Related Agreement."

Österreischische Zuckerindustrie AG (OZAG): A Deposited Assets Class Award compensating the heirs of Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer and Otto Pick, two of the major shareholders of ÖZAG, Austria's most important pre-War refiner of sugar, for the major losses that they suffered as a result of the Bank's active participation in the confiscation of their shareholdings in ÖZAG by Nazi authorities. This Award, SF 26,450,993.36 (approximately $21 million) was the largest approved by the Court. The amount of the Award reflected the value of the stock in question on the date the Bank violated the terms of the Syndicate Agreement by unlawfully transferring ownership to a designated Nazi "purchaser" at a fraction of the shares' value, less any sums received by the Claimant and represented parties (i.e. prior restitution). The Award included the standard interest equivalent multiplier of 12.5 to bring the Award up to current value. While this Award was unique in its size, it was representative of several general findings by the CRT.

"Other" Account: These were Holocaust-era Swiss accounts which the ICEP auditors determined also were known as Bürge, Festgeldkonto, Pfandbestellung or Depositenkonto.

Participating Insurance Carriers: Swiss Re, Swiss Life, and their member companies.

Passbook/Savings Account: A savings account in which a passbook had to be presented upon withdrawal of assets. Savings accounts with values under 250 Swiss Francs or unknown values were excluded by ICEP. The terms "passbook account" and "savings account" were used interchangeably.

Plausible Undocumented Award: An award for a claim plausibly indicating entitlement to a Swiss bank account, but for which bank documentation had not been provided or was no longer available due to the banks' destruction of records relating to millions of Holocaust-era accounts. Among the criteria considered in determining such claims were the account owner's relationship to Switzerland; efforts made by the claimant or other family members to retrieve Swiss bank accounts prior to the finalization of the Settlement Agreement; the relationship between the claimant and the account owner; and other factors.

Presumptive Value: "Presumptive values," or average values, were utilized by the CRT to determine the amount of an award for a particular Holocaust-era Swiss bank account where bank records containing the actual valuation data no longer existed. When the amount in a bank account was unavailable from bank records or the amount was less than the amount determined by the CRT Special Masters at the beginning of the Claims Resolution Process, the amount in the account was to be determined by a schedule of value presumptions, in the absence of plausible evidence to the contrary.

Probable or Possible Accounts: All accounts identified at each bank investigated by the ICEP Audit Firms and reported to ICEP as being in Categories 1 to 4 for its Report of December 6, 1999 and designated by ICEP as probably or possibly related to Victims, as adjusted as a result of a review of such Accounts for the purpose of identifying duplicate Accounts, missing Accounts, and other similar factors. Approximately 36,000 Swiss bank accounts were identified by the ICEP auditors as "probably" or "possibly" belonging to victims of the Holocaust. See also "Accounts History Database."

Proposals on Allocation of Residual Funds: Proposals solicited by the Court from all interested individuals and organization for the allocation of unclaimed residual funds (if any) that might remain from the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class.

Refugee Class: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: the Class consisting of "Victims and Targets of Nazi Persecution who sought entry into Switzerland in whole or in part to avoid Nazi persecution and who actually or allegedly either were denied entry into Switzerland or, after gaining entry, were deported, detained, abused, or otherwise mistreated, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such actual or alleged denial of entry, deportation, detention, abuse, or other mistreatment."

Related Agreement: In a so-called "Related Agreement" executed in connection with the Settlement Agreement, each "Organizational Endorser" (defined supra) "endorse[d] the Settlement Agreement …. as a fair, adequate and reasonable settlement"; "affirm[ed] that the Settlement Agreement brings about complete closure and an end to confrontation with respect to the issues dealt with in the settlement"; "agree[d] not to make any public statement or take any action that would violate or be inconsistent with this endorsement, including requesting or approving sanctions or opposing business transactions involving Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement"; "covenant[ed] not to sue, call for suits against, or support suits against any Swiss entity released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement"; and "waive[ed] any and all claims it may have against the Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement."

Relevant Period: As defined by the Volcker Report, the period from January 1, 1933 to December 31, 1945.

Safe Deposit Box Account: Customers rented boxes for a fee, with two keys associated with the box, one for the customer and one for the bank.

Second Memorandum to Files: On June 10, 2004, the parties entered into an agreement approved by the District Court on June 17, 2004, the "Second Memorandum to the File." The agreement permitted the New York SDAP facility to be linked by computer to the Zurich-based CRT; provided for the publication of approximately 3,000 additional bank accounts; and established access conditions for the Total Accounts Database. The Swiss Federal Banking Commission approved the agreement on July 26, 2004.

Self-Identification Requirement: As a condition to approval of the Settlement Agreement, the Court required Swiss entities who used slave labor and who sought releases under Slave Labor Class II to self-identify. The Court explained that "those who were forced to perform slave labor for a Swiss company in German or elsewhere" had "no reason to know at the time that the company was Swiss" and "may not be aware that they are in the class" even with notice of the settlement. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F.Supp.2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

Settlement Agreement: The agreement between the plaintiff class members and the two defendant Swiss banks, governed by basic contract law but also subject to the due process requirements of a class action lawsuit, settling Holocaust-era claims against Swiss entities in the amount of $1.25 billion.

Settlement Class or Settlement Classes: The plaintiff classes designated under the terms of the Settlement Agreement: the Deposited Assets Class, Looted Assets Class, Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, and the Refugee Class; a separate Insurance Class later was added upon further negotiation by the parties.

Settlement Date: Under the Settlement Agreement, distributions from the Settlement Fund could not commence until the "Settlement Date"; i.e., until all appeals from the Final Order and Judgment were resolved. Lead Settlement Counsel advised on May 16, 2001 that the Settlement Date had been reach upon the withdrawal of the one appeal that had been filed against the Court's order approving the Settlement Agreement.

Settlement Fund: The $1.25 billion amount paid by the defendant banks in settlement of Holocaust-era claims against Swiss entities.

Settling Defendants: See "Defendant Banks" supra.

Settling Plaintiffs: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: "(a) the named plaintiffs in the Filed Actions, and their heirs, successors, affiliates, and assigns, and (b) all members of the classes of plaintiffs for which Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants shall seek conditional certification pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, except those who, in accordance with the terms of the Settlement Agreement and the Court's order certifying the classes, submit a timely request for exclusion from the classes."

Slave Labor: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: Work for little or no remuneration actually or allegedly performed by individuals involuntarily at the insistence, direction, or under the auspices of the Nazi Regime."

Slave Labor Class I: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: the Class "consisting of Victims and Targets of Nazi Persecution who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor for companies or entities that actually or allegedly deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with, or transacted such revenues or proceeds through, Releasees, and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from the deposit of such revenues or proceeds or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with the revenues or proceeds of Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets."

Slave Labor Class II: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: the Class "consisting of Victims and Targets of Nazi Persecution who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor at any facility or work site, wherever located, actually or allegedly owned, controlled, or operated by any corporation or other business concern headquartered, organized, or based in Switzerland or any affiliate thereof, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or in the future may seek to assert Claims against any Releasee other than Settling Defendants, the Swiss National Bank, and Other Swiss Banks for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets."

Special Master: Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement and the Court's order of referral of March 31, 1999 and subsequent orders, and pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 53, Judah Gribetz served as Special Master, with responsibility for proposing to the Court a plan to allocate and distribute the $1.25 billion settlement (adopted as the Distribution Plan; see above], and thereafter, overseeing implementation of the Distribution Plan. By order of the Court, Shari C. Reig served as Deputy Special Master. In addition, by Court order, Michael Bradfield (previously with Paul Volcker) and Helen B. Junz served as Special Masters with responsibility for assisting the Court in administering the Deposited Assets Class claims process.

Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP): The program operated in New York by the Claims Conference to provide administrative, technical and other assistance to the Court and CRT-II in Zurich in connection with the Deposited Assets Class.

Swiss Humanitarian Fund: On February 26, 1997, the Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa was established "to support persons in need who were persecuted for reasons of their race, religion or political views or for other reasons, or otherwise were victims of the Holocaust/Shoa."

Total Accounts Database (TAD): On December 6, 1999, the Volcker Committee released its final report. Its research showed that some 6.8 million Swiss bank accounts were open or opened during the relevant period of 1933-1945. Of these, the banks had destroyed documents relating to approximately 2.7 million accounts. Despite this massive document destruction, records still remained for approximately 4.1 million Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. The auditors conducted research on approximately 300,000 of these 4.1 million accounts. The Volcker Committee determined that of the 300,000 accounts investigated, a total of approximately 54,000 (specifically 53,886) had a "probable" or "possible" relationship to victims of Nazi persecution. These 53,886 accounts -- subsequently reduced to 36,000 by a so-called "scrubbing" process -- were to constitute the Accounts History Database ("AHD"); i.e., the database of accounts that would be made available to the CRT for use in the claims process. The Volcker Committee further recommended that approximately 21,000 of the 36,000 AHD accounts should be published. The remaining approximately 15,000 accounts were not to be published, but were to be available to the CRT for review in the event that a Holocaust victim or heir submitted a claim that appeared to match to the unpublished account. As to the bulk of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records continued to exist, but which were not included as part of the AHD, the Volcker Committee recommended that those remaining accounts should be consolidated into a "Total Accounts Database" (TAD) that also would be available for use in a claims process. The SFBC declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to create a Total Accounts Database for all of the 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss Banks in the relevant 1933-1945 period.

United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM): The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum is America's national institution for the documentation, study, and interpretation of Holocaust history, and serves as America's memorial to the millions of people murdered during the Holocaust.

Unknown Type of Account: This category was used by the ICEP auditors if they were unable to definitively determine the type of account at issue. However, the CRT often was able to discern the account type upon thorough analysis of the account records.

Voluntary Assistance: The voluntary production of additional records, including bank records, which were intended to allow the CRT to assess all existing documents as part of the review of each claim. This mechanism was required by the Court as part of its July 26, 2000 decision approving the Settlement Agreement.

Victim List Project: The Court-approved Distribution Plan allocated $14.5 million to the Victim List Program. The intent of the Program was to collect and make widely available the names of all victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who perished as well as those who survived. The program transferred funds to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Israel and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in implementation of these goals. The Claims Conference served as the Court's agent for purposes of administration of the Victim List Project.

Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution: As defined by the Settlement Agreement: "Any individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped."

Volcker Report: See Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP) supra.

Yad Vashem (The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority): Yad Vashem was established in 1953 by an act of the Israeli Knesset. As described at www.yadvashem.org: "Since its inception, Yad Vashem has been entrusted with documenting the history of the Jewish people during the Holocaust period, preserving the memory and story of each of the six million victims, and imparting the legacy of the Holocaust for generations to come through its archives, library, school, museums and recognition of the Righteous Among the Nations."

Class Action Settlement Agreement

This Settlement Agreement ("Settlement Agreement") is made and entered into as of this 26th day of January 1999, by and between Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs.

WHEREAS concerns have been raised about actions and omissions of Settling Defendants and other Releasees before, during, and after the Nazi Regime's rule in Germany relating principally to financial transactions with or affecting Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution as defined herein;

WHEREAS Plaintiffs commenced the Filed Actions, and specifically alleged, inter alia, that Settling Defendants (1) collaborated with the Nazi Regime and participated in a scheme to (a) unlawfully retain class members' accounts deposited prior to and during the Second World War; (b) obtain for deposit, transfer, or exchange, assets looted by the Nazi Regime and its agents; and (c) profit from the use of slave labor, the fruits of which were deposited with Settling Defendants; and (2) concealed the true nature and scope of their conduct during and following the Holocaust all allegations that Settling Defendants dispute;

WHEREAS Settling Defendants believe that they could assert, have asserted, and would prevail in court on, defenses to the claims asserted against them; and Settling Plaintiffs believe to the contrary;

WHEREAS Settling Defendants and other Releasees, in recognition of the legal, moral and material aspects of the concerns referred to above, have initiated and pursued certain ameliorative measures outside the context of any litigation, such as establishing and supporting: (1) the Special Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoah ("Humanitarian Fund"), initiated by Settling Defendants in February 1997 with a voluntary contribution of approximately $70 million to provide humanitarian aid to needy Holocaust survivors; (2) the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ("ICEP"), chaired by Paul A. Volcker, which was established in 1996 by the Swiss Bankers Association, the World Jewish Congress, and other Jewish organizations to conduct an independent audit of Swiss banks to identify accounts from the World War II era that could possibly belong to victims of Nazi persecution; (3) the Independent Claims Resolution Foundation ("ICRF"), also chaired by Paul A. Volcker, which was established to oversee an objective, impartial, streamlined process for resolving claims to dormant accounts listed in notifications published worldwide by the Swiss Bankers Association; and (4) the Independent Commission of Experts, an independent group of internationally recognized historians chaired by Professor Jean François Bergier, which the Swiss Confederation established in 1996 to examine Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany;

WHEREAS Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants commit to support and urge the conclusion of the mandates of the Volcker Committee and the Bergier Commission;

WHEREAS Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs wish to bring about prompt and complete closure with respect to the concerns and allegations referred to in the paragraphs above;

WHEREAS Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs believe and affirm that this Settlement Agreement, in conjunction with the steps initiated by Settling Defendants and other Releasees described above, does and should bring about complete closure with respect to the concerns and allegations described in the paragraphs above, and thereby brings to an end all confrontation between Settling Plaintiffs and Organizational Endorsers on the one hand and Releasees on the other hand;

WHEREAS counsel for Settling Plaintiffs have conducted as thorough an investigation as possible relating to the claims and the underlying events and transactions alleged in Settling Plaintiffs' complaints, having (1) analyzed available information adduced through informal discovery, (2) reviewed relevant public information at the U.S. Archives and other sources, (3) researched the applicable law with respect to the claims of Settling Plaintiffs and defenses of Settling Defendants and other Releasees, and (4) consulted with experts;

WHEREAS Settling Plaintiffs, by their counsel, have conducted arms-length negotiations with Settling Defendants with respect to a compromise and settlement of the Filed Actions and other Claims against Releasees with a view to settling and finally resolving the Settled Claims, and to achieving the best possible relief consistent with the interests of the Settlement Classes;

WHEREAS solely for purposes of the settlement set forth in this Settlement Agreement, Settling Defendants have consented to conditional certification of Settlement Classes pursuant to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("Fed. R. Civ. P. 23");

WHEREAS based on the investigation, discovery, review of public information, and research described above, Settling Plaintiffs have concluded that the terms and conditions of this Settlement Agreement are fair, reasonable, and adequate to Settling Plaintiffs and in their best interests;

WHEREAS Settling Plaintiffs, through their counsel, have agreed to settle the claims raised in the Filed Actions and to resolve any additional Claims that they have or could bring against any Releasee, after considering (1) the substantial benefits that Settling Plaintiffs will receive from the settlement, (2) the attendant risks of litigation, and (3) the desirability of an immediate resolution;

WHEREAS this Settlement Agreement is fully supported by the Organizational Endorsers that have endorsed it; and

WHEREAS nothing in this Settlement Agreement shall be construed as or deemed to be an admission of any kind by any party or Releasee.

NOW THEREFORE, it is agreed by and among the parties to this Settlement Agreement, through their respective attorneys, subject to approval of the Court pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, in consideration of the covenants herein and the benefits flowing to the parties, the Settlement Classes, and the Releasees under this Settlement Agreement, that all Claims against the Releasees shall be settled and released, and that the Filed Actions shall be dismissed with prejudice, upon and subject to the following terms and conditions, and in exchange for the substantial benefits this Settlement Agreement confers upon the Settlement Classes.

1. DEFINITIONS

As used in this Settlement Agreement and in addition to any definitions elsewhere in this Settlement Agreement, the following terms shall have the meanings set forth below:

Assets means any and all objects of value including but not limited to personal, commercial, real, tangible, and intangible property, including, without limitation, cash, securities, gems, gold and other precious metals, jewelry, documents, artworks, equipment, and intellectual property.

Claims or Settled Claims means any and all actions, causes of action, claims, Unknown Claims, obligations, damages, costs, expenses, losses, rights, promises, and agreements of any nature and demands whatsoever, from the beginning of the world to now and any time in the future, arising from or in connection with actual or alleged facts occurring on or before the date of this Settlement Agreement, whether in law, admiralty, or equity, whether class or individual, under any international, national, state, provincial, or municipal law, whether now accrued or asserted or hereafter arising or discovered, that may be, may have been, could have been, or could, be brought in any jurisdiction before any court, arbitral tribunal, or similar body against any Releasee directly or indirectly, for, upon, by reason of, or in connection with any act or omission in any way relating to the Holocaust, World War II and its prelude and aftermath, Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, transactions with or actions of the Nazi Regime, treatment of refugees fleeing Nazi persecution by the Swiss Confederation or other Releasees, or any related cause or thing whatever, including, without limitation, all claims in the Filed Actions and all other claims relating to Deposited Assets, Looted Assets, Cloaked Assets, and/or Slave Labor, or any prior or future effort to recover on such claims directly or indirectly from any Releasee.

Claims Resolution Tribunal means the group of arbitrators acting under the auspices of the ICRF.

Class Notice has the meaning set forth in Section 9.2 hereof

Cloaked Assets means Assets wholly or partly owned, controlled by, obtained from, or held for the benefit of, any company incorporated, headquartered, or based in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946 or any other entity or individual associated with the Nazi Regime (regardless of where such entity or individual was or is located, incorporated, headquartered, or conducting business), the identity, value, or ownership of which was in fact or allegedly disguised by, through, or as the result of any intentional or unintentional act or omission of or otherwise involving any Releasee, including, without limitation, Internationale Industrie und Handelsbeteiligungen A.G. (a.k.a. "Interhandel"), and its predecessors, successors, or affiliates.

Court means the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Deposited Assets means (1) any and all Assets actually or allegedly deposited by the beneficial owner, fiduciary, or other individual or organization with any custodian, including, without limitation, a bank, branch or agency of a bank, other banking organization or custodial institution or investment fund established or operated by a bank incorporated, headquartered, or based in Switzerland at any time (including, without limitation, the affiliates, subsidiaries, branches, agencies, or offices of such banks, branches, agencies, custodial institutions, and investment funds that are or were located either inside or outside Switzerland at any time) in any kind of account (including, without limitation, a safe deposit box or securities account) prior to May 9, 1945, that belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, including, without limitation, any Assets that Settling Defendants or Other Swiss Banks determine should be paid to a particular claimant because the Assets definitely or possibly belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution; and/or (2) any and all Assets that the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal determines should be paid to a particular claimant or to the Settlement Fund because the Asset definitely or possibly belonged to an individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity (including, without limitation, their respective heirs, successors, affiliates, and assigns) actually persecuted by the Nazi Regime or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime for any reason. A determination by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal to award a special adjustment for interest or fees to a particular claimant pursuant to the guidelines of the Panel of Experts on Interest and Fees and Other Charges shall be deemed to establish that the claimant was persecuted or targeted for persecution within the meaning of subsection (2) of this definition.

Escrow Agreement means the agreement dated November 19, 1998, attached hereto as Exhibit A.

Escrow Fund means the fund referenced in Section 5.1 herein and established pursuant to the Escrow Agreement.

Fairness Hearing means the hearing conducted by the Court in connection with the determination of fairness, adequacy, and reasonableness of this Settlement Agreement under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

Filed Actions means Weisshaus, et al, v. Union Bank of Switzerland. et al., CV-96-4849, Friedman, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland. et al., CV-96-5161, Trilling-Grotch. et al., v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et al., CV-96-5161, Sonabend, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et at., CV-96-5161, and World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities v. Union Bank of Switzerland. et al., CV-97-0461, which are being considered together for pretrial purposes under the caption In re Holocaust Victim Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849, pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York; Markovicova et al. v. Swiss Bank Corporation, et al., CV-98-2934, pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California; and Rosenberg v. Swiss National Bank, No. CV-98-1647, pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

Final Order and Judgment means the order to be entered by the Court, in a form to be mutually agreed upon by the parties, approving this Settlement Agreement without material alterations, as fair, adequate, and reasonable under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, confirming the certification of the Settlement Classes under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, and making such other findings and determinations as the Court deems necessary and appropriate to effectuate the terms of this Settlement Agreement. For purposes of this Settlement Agreement, such order shall not become the Final Order and Judgment unless and until the Settlement Date occurs.

Humanitarian Fund means the Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoah referenced in the Decree of the Swiss Federal Council dated February 26, 1997, and described in the fifth paragraph of this Settlement Agreement.

ICEP means the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons described in the fifth paragraph of this Settlement Agreement.

ICRF means the Independent Claims Resolution Foundation described in the fifth paragraph of this Settlement Agreement.

Looted Assets means Assets actually or allegedly belonging in whole or in part to Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution that were actually or allegedly stolen, expropriated, Aryanized, confiscated, or that were otherwise wrongfully taken by, at the request of, or under the auspices of, the Nazi Regime.

Matched Assets means Deposited Assets that the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal determines belong, and should be paid to, particular claimants.

Nazi Regime means the National Socialist government of Germany from 1933 through 1945 and its instrumentalities, agents, and allies (including, without limitation, all other Axis countries), all occupied countries, and all other individuals or entities in any way affiliated or associated with, or acting for or on behalf or under the control or influence of, the Nazi Regime, including, without limitation, the Accused Organizations and Individuals in the Nurnberg Trial, 6 F.R.D. 69 (1946).

Organizational Endorsers means the organizations signing written endorsements of this Settlement Agreement.

Other Swiss Banks means banks listed on Exhibit B hereto.

Preliminary Approval means the Court's issuance of an order conditionally certifying the Settlement Classes, preliminarily approving this Settlement Agreement, and approving the plan for Class Notice to the Settlement Classes.

Releasees means the Settling Defendants; the Swiss National Bank; Other Swiss Banks; the Swiss Bankers Association; the Swiss Confederation (including, without limitation, the Cantons and all other political subdivisions and governmental instrumentalities in Switzerland); all business concerns (whether organized as corporations or otherwise) headquartered, organized, or incorporated in Switzerland as of October 3, 1996, including, without limitation, corporations incorporated in Switzerland that are owned, operated, or controlled directly or indirectly by corporations located outside Switzerland ("the Swiss-based Concerns") and their branches and offices, wherever located; and all affiliates of any Swiss-based Concern (whether organized as corporations, partnerships, sole proprietorships or otherwise) wherever headquartered, organized, or incorporated in which the Swiss-based Concern owns or controls directly or indirectly at least 25 percent of any class of voting securities or controls in any manner the election or appointment of a majority of the board of directors, trustees or similar body ("Owned or Controlled Affiliates"). As to each of the foregoing Releasees, the term Releasees also includes, without limitation, each of its predecessors, successors, assigns, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, executors, administrators, and personal representatives wherever located. The term Releasees excludes Basler Lebens-Versicherungs-Gesellschaft, Zürich Lebensversicherungs-Gesellschaft, and Winterthur Lebensversicherungs Gesellschaft and their subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A., et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.). The term Releasees also excludes parent companies and other affiliates of Swiss-based Concerns that (1) before 1945 were headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, (2) were not Owned or Controlled Affiliates as defined herein, and (3) disguised the identity, value, or ownership of Cloaked Assets or used Slave Labor. A company shall not be deemed a Releasee by virtue of being an Owned or Controlled Affiliate if (1) the company was headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, and (2) the company's parent was a Swiss-based Concern established for the sole purpose of disguising the identity, value, or ownership of Cloaked Assets.

Settlement Agreement means this agreement.

Settlement Amount has the meaning set forth in Section 5.1 hereof.

Settlement Class or Settlement Classes means the plaintiff classes described in Section 8.2 hereof for which Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants shall seek certification pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, except those persons who, in accordance with the terms of this Settlement Agreement and the Court's order certifying the Settlement Classes, submit a timely request for exclusion from the classes. For the sole purpose of permitting the WJRO to act as a representative of the Settlement Class or Settlement Classes, the WJRO is hereby included as a member of the Settlement Class or Settlement Classes as defined above and as used in this Settlement Agreement.

Settlement Date means the date on which all of the following have occurred: (1) the entry of the Final Order and Judgment without material modification; (2) the achievement of finality for the Final Order and Judgment by virtue of that Order having become final and non-appealable through (a) the expiration of all appropriate appeal periods without an appeal having been filed (not including any provision for challenging the Final Order and Judgment pursuant to Rule 60 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure), (b) final affirmance of the Final Order and Judgment on appeal or final dismissal or denial of all such appeals, including petitions for review, rehearing, or certiorari; or (c) final disposition of any proceedings, including any appeals, resulting from any appeal from the entry of the Final Order and Judgment, and (3) the expiration of any right of withdrawal or termination under Section 15 of this Settlement Agreement.

Settlement Fund means the fund established pursuant to Section 5.1 of this Settlement Agreement.

Settling Defendants means Credit Suisse and UBS AG (as successor to Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation) and each of their former and current corporate parents, subsidiaries, affiliates, and branches (including, without limitation, Credit Suisse Group, Credit Suisse, Credit Suisse First Boston, Credit Suisse First Boston Corporation, Credit Suisse Financial Products, Credit Suisse First Boston (Europe) Ltd., Credit Suisse First Boston Canada, Inc., and CSFB Aktiengesellschaft), predecessors, successors, assigns, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, executors, administrators, and personal representatives, wherever they were, are, or may be located, incorporated, or conducting business, except for Winterthur Lebensversicherungs Gesellschaft and its subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A., et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.).

Settling Plaintiffs means (1) the named plaintiffs in the Filed Actions, and their heirs, successors, affiliates, and assigns, and (2) all members of the Settlement Classes, except those who, in accordance with the terms of this Settlement Agreement and the Court's order certifying the Settlement Classes, submit a timely request for exclusion from the classes.

Slave Labor means work for little or no remuneration actually or allegedly performed by individuals involuntarily at the insistence, direction, or under the auspices of the Nazi Regime.

Supplemental Agreement means the agreement to be filed under seal with the Court permitting Settling Defendants to terminate this Settlement Agreement based on the number of exclusion requests filed in accordance with Section 10.1 herein.

Unknown Claims means Claims that a claimant does not know or suspect to exist in his/her favor as of the date of this Settlement Agreement.

Unmatched Assets means Deposited Assets identified by ICEP that are not awarded or paid to particular claimants, other than Matched Assets.

Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution means any individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped.

WJRO means the World Jewish Restitution Organization and all of its constituent bodies. For purposes of this Settlement Agreement, the WJRO shall intervene as a party to this litigation and shall be, along with others, a representative of the Settlement Classes.

2. SETTLEMENT PURPOSES ONLY

2.1. This Settlement Agreement is for settlement purposes only, and, notwithstanding anything else in this Settlement Agreement, neither the fact of, nor any provision contained in, this Settlement Agreement nor any action taken hereunder shall constitute, be construed as, or be offered or received in evidence as an admission of any Claim or any fact by any party or any Releasee.

2.2. Any certification of a Settlement Class pursuant to the terms of this Settlement Agreement shall not constitute and shall not be construed as an admission on the part of any Releasee that this action, or any other proposed or certified class action, is appropriate for trial class treatment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 or any similar class action statute or rule. This Settlement Agreement is without prejudice to the rights of any Releasee (1) to oppose any request for certification in the Filed Actions should the Settlement Agreement not be approved or implemented for any reason, or (2) to oppose any request for certification or certification in any other proposed or certified class action.

2.3. If this Settlement Agreement is not approved, is terminated, or fails to be implemented for any reason, any certification, either preliminary or final, of the Settlement Classes or any other alleged class shall be deemed null and void ab initio.

3. SUBMISSION FOR PRELIMINARY APPROVAL

Promptly after execution of this Settlement Agreement, Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs shall submit this Settlement Agreement, through their respective attorneys, to the Court for Preliminary Approval.

4. ICEP INVESTIGATION AND CLAIMS RESOLUTION

4.1. Although the parties anticipate that the ICEP and the Claims Resolution Tribunal will continue, at certain Releasees' expense, in a manner that is appropriate in light of this Settlement Agreement, Releasees shall have no additional financial exposure or additional liability of any kind whatsoever beyond the Settlement Amount on account of the activities or findings of the ICEP, the ICRF, or the Claims Resolution Tribunal, or on account of any cessation of or change in the activities of the ICEP, the ICRF, or the Claims Resolution Tribunal, excluding costs associated with the functioning of those entities.

4.2. Settling Defendants shall pay Matched Assets, together with interest and fees as determined pursuant to guidelines established by the ICRF, to rightful claimants as and when determined by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal. Such payments of Matched Assets shall be deemed to be included in, and part of, the Settlement Amount and shall in no event cause the Settlement Amount to be increased. As provided in Section 5.3, Matched Assets paid to claimants after Settling Defendants have paid the final installment of the Settlement Amount shall be refunded to Settling Defendants from the Settlement Fund if and to the extent the balance remaining in the Settlement Fund is sufficient to pay the refund.

4.3. Persons receiving payments as determined by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal shall not be precluded on account of those payments from receiving a distribution from the Settlement Fund.

5. SETTLEMENT PAYMENTS

5.1. Settling Defendants together shall pay to the funds identified in this Section 5.1 a total of $1.25 billion ("Settlement Amount"), including the payments referred to in Section 4.2 hereof, which are deemed credits as provided for in Sections 5.2 and 5.3 hereof. The Settlement Amount constitutes the maximum principal amount that Settling Defendants shall have to pay for any reason with respect to Claims. Payment of the Settlement Amount shall fully satisfy and discharge Settling Defendants' and Other Swiss Banks' obligations with respect to Unmatched Assets. Except as provided in Sections 5.2 and 5.3, Settling Defendants shall pay the Settlement Amount in four installments: (1) $250 million ("Installment 1") on November 23, 1998; (2) $333 million ("Installment 2") on November 23, 1999; (3) $333 million ("Installment 3") on November 23, 2000; and (4) $334 million ("Installment 4") on November 23, 2001.

Settling Defendants have paid Installment 1 into an escrow account established in accordance with the Escrow Agreement attached hereto as Exhibit A ("Escrow Fund"). Settling Defendants shall pay Installments 2, 3, and 4 to a separate fund ("Settlement Fund") that Settling Plaintiffs shall establish following the Court's issuance of Preliminary Approval. Within thirty (30) days after the Settlement Date, the Escrow Agents shall authorize the transfer of the then existing balance of the Escrow Fund (including interest earned thereon), less a reserve for taxes payable by the Escrow Fund, to the Settlement Fund.

Settling Defendants will accelerate payment of a portion of Installments 2, 3, or 4 to benefit needy members of the Settlement Class in the event that Settling Plaintiffs make a written request to Settling Defendants showing that (1) the Humanitarian Fund has been exhausted, (2) preceding installments of the Settlement Amount have been fully disbursed in accordance with a Court-approved distribution plan, and (3) there is an immediate and specific need to provide relief to identified Settlement Class members prior to the next scheduled installment. Any dispute as to whether Settling Defendants must make an accelerated payment, or any dispute as to the amount of any such accelerated payment, will be submitted to the Court for resolution.

5.2. All amounts (including, without limitation, interest and fees) that Settling Defendants and Other Swiss Banks have paid since October 3, 1996, or may pay in the future to Deposited Asset claimants as a result of determinations made by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal shall reduce the Settlement Amount and may be credited in full against the installment next due (e.g., payments made before November 23, 1999, may be credited against Installment 2) or against any subsequent installment. Any payments made to such claimants on account of claims relating to Looted Assets shall be credited in an amount commensurate with the amount such claimants would have received from the Settlement Fund as members of the Looted Assets Class. Within thirty (30) days after the Court grants Preliminary Approval, Settling Defendants shall submit to the Court a schedule of payments made as of that date that are to be credited against the Settlement Amount pursuant to this Section 5.2. Settling Defendants shall thereafter provide the Court a schedule showing subsequent payments on a quarterly basis until Settling Defendants have paid the final installment of the Settlement Amount.

Payments to claimants on account of determinations by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal made after Settling Defendants have paid the final installment of the Settlement Amount shall be refunded to Settling Defendants from the Settlement Fund if and to the extent the balance remaining in the Settlement Fund is sufficient to pay the refund. Beginning thirty (30) days after Settling Defendants pay the final installment of the Settlement Amount, Settling Defendants shall provide the Court a schedule every thirty (30) days reflecting such payments. The Settlement Fund shall pay the scheduled amount to Settling Defendants within fifteen (15) business days after the schedule is submitted.

5.3. All amounts that Settling Defendants and Other Swiss Banks have paid since October 3, 1996, or may pay in the future to individuals or entities (including, without limitation, individuals or entities falling within the class definitions for the Settlement Classes) to discharge Claims (including, without limitation, claims for contribution or common law indemnity) brought against Settling Defendants or Other Swiss Banks directly by claimants or through private or governmental organizations such as, without limitation, the New York Holocaust Claims Processing Office shall reduce the Settlement Amount and may be credited against the installment next due (e.g., payments made before November 23, 1999, may be credited against Installment 2) or against any subsequent installment. Payments made to claimants on account of claims relating to Looted Assets shall be credited in an amount commensurate with the amount such claimants would have received from the Settlement Fund as members of the Looted Assets Class. Within thirty (30) days after the Court grants Preliminary Approval, Settling Defendants shall submit to Settling Plaintiffs a schedule of payments made as of that date that are to be credited against the Settlement Amount pursuant to this Section 5.3. Within fifteen (15) business days thereafter, Settling Plaintiffs shall notify Settling Defendants of any objections to the scheduled amounts. If objections are raised, the parties shall promptly meet and confer to resolve them. If there are remaining disagreements, the parties shall notify the Court at least fifteen (15) business days before Settling Defendants are due to pay the next installment of the Settlement Amount. The Court shall decide, before the next installment of the Settlement Amount is due, which payments or portions thereof may be credited against any installment.

For subsequent payments to be credited against the Settlement Amount pursuant to this Section 5.3, Settling Defendants shall submit a quarterly schedule of such payments to Settling Plaintiffs. Within fifteen (15) business days after receiving a schedule, Settling Plaintiffs shall notify Settling Defendants of any objections to the schedule. If objections are raised, the parties shall promptly meet and confer to resolve them. If there are remaining disagreements, the parties shall notify the Court at least fifteen (15) business days before Settling Defendants are due to pay the next installment of the Settlement Amount. The Court shall decide, before the next installment of the Settlement Amount is due, which payments or portions thereof may be credited against the installment.

If Settling Defendants or Other Swiss Banks make payments that Settling Defendants are entitled to credit against the Settlement Amount under this Section 5.3 after Settling Defendants have paid the last installment of the Settlement Amount, Settling Defendants shall be entitled to a refund from the Settlement Fund for such payments if and to the extent the balance remaining in the Settlement Fund is sufficient to pay the refund. Beginning thirty (30) days after Settling Defendants pay the final installment of the Settlement Amount, Settling Defendants shall provide Settling Plaintiffs a schedule showing such payments every thirty (30) days. Settling Plaintiffs must notify Settling Defendants of any objection to the schedule within fifteen (15) business days of receiving the schedule. If Settling Plaintiffs raise no objection, the Settlement Fund shall pay the scheduled amount to Settling Defendants within fifteen (15) business days of receiving the schedule. If Settling Plaintiffs object to refunding all or part of the scheduled amount, the Court shall decide whether a refund is to be given and the amount of the refund.

To protect the privacy of claimants, schedules submitted to Settling Plaintiffs or the Court pursuant to Section 5.2 or Section 5.3 may, in lieu of listing the names of those receiving payments, describe the nature of the Claims for which payments were made and include a certification by Settling Defendants that the descriptions are accurate. Settling Defendants shall request that the ICEP and the Claims Resolution Tribunal cooperate with Settling Plaintiffs in providing information necessary to determine whether a particular claimant seeking compensation from the Settlement Fund has received compensation from Settling Defendants or Other Swiss Banks on account of a determination by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal. Failure by the ICEP or the Claims Resolution Tribunal to provide the requested information shall in no way affect the credits and refunds to which Settling Defendants are entitled pursuant to Section 5.2 and Section 5.3.

5.4. Settling Defendants' obligation to pay the Settlement Amount may be terminated or reduced if (1) Settling Plaintiffs commit a material breach of this Settlement Agreement including without limitation, a breach of any of the provisions, of Section 11, or (2) any Organizational Endorser commits a material breach of its written endorsement of this Settlement Agreement. For purposes of this Section 5.4, the act or omission of any officer, director, leader, or spokesperson of or for an Organizational Endorser shall be deemed the act or omission of the Organizational Endorser. If Settling Defendants determine that one or more Settling Plaintiffs or Organizational Endorsers have committed a material breach, Settling Defendants shall so notify the Court and Settling Plaintiffs within thirty (30) business days of detecting the breach. The Court shall determine whether the claimed breach has occurred and, if so, whether it constitutes a material breach warranting the termination of Settling Defendants' obligations to make further payment of the Settlement Amount. In lieu of ordering termination, the Court may order an equitable reduction in the Settlement Amount to compensate for losses suffered by Settling Defendants and other Releasees on account of the breach and to deter future breaches.

5.5. Commencing on January 23, 2001, interest at a rate of 3.78% per annum shall be payable on any unpaid installments of the Settlement Amount (after deducting any uncredited payments that are entitled to be credited against future installments as set forth in this Section 5). Interest shall be paid on each installment at the time the installment payment is made.

5.6. The Escrow Fund and the Settlement Fund shall be used to pay the expenses and fees authorized under Section 7; Settling Defendants and Releasees shall have no other responsibility or liability for fees and expenses in connection with this settlement. The balance of the Escrow Fund and Settlement Fund shall be distributed in accordance with the distribution plan developed by the Special Master and finally approved by the Court in accordance with Section 7 of this Settlement Agreement.

5.7. All funds held in the Escrow Fund and Settlement Fund pursuant to this Settlement Agreement shall be deemed to be in custodia legis of the Court and shall remain subject to the jurisdiction of the Court until such time as the funds shall be distributed pursuant to this Settlement Agreement or this Settlement Agreement terminates in accordance with Section 15 hereof. Funds held in the Settlement Fund shall be invested in United States Government obligations with a maturity of 180 days or less and shall collect and reinvest the interest accrued thereon. At such time that the balance of the Settlement Fund shall total less than $100,000, such balance may be held in an interest-bearing bank account insured by the FDIC.

5.8. If this Settlement Agreement is not approved or is terminated, canceled, or fails to become effective for any reason, the Escrow Fund and the Settlement Fund, together with interest earned but less expenses for fund administration and class notice actually incurred or due and owing and approved by the Court in connection with this Settlement Agreement, shall be refunded to Settling Defendants within ten (10) business days.

6. TAX STATUS OF FUNDS

At Settling Defendants' option, the Escrow Fund and/or the Settlement Fund may be established as, or converted to, Qualified Settlement Funds in accordance with Section 468B of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, as amended, and the regulations promulgated thereunder. The parties agree to negotiate in good faith and to cooperate in order to obtain an appropriate order, or the approval of the Court, and to fulfill any other legal necessity for this purpose.

7. FUND ADMINISTRATION AND DISTRIBUTION

7.1. Settling Plaintiffs shall apply to the Court for appointment of a Special Master within thirty (30) days after Preliminary Approval. The Special Master shall develop a proposed plan of allocation and distribution of the Settlement Fund, employing open and equitable procedures to ensure fair consideration of all proposals for allocation and distribution. The proposed allocation and distribution plan must be approved by the Court before the Settlement Fund may be distributed. Settling Plaintiffs shall implement the Court-approved plan under the Court's supervision. Settling Plaintiffs shall provide the Court and Settling Defendants a quarterly report accounting for expenses paid from the Settlement Fund and itemizing the amounts distributed to claimants against the Settlement Fund and other recipients of payments from the Settlement Fund.

7.2. Any attorney of record in the Filed Actions may apply to the Court for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses from the Escrow Fund or Settlement Fund. However, no attorneys' fees or expenses may be paid from the Escrow Fund or Settlement Fund until the Settlement Date. Settling Defendants and other Releasees shall have no liability for attorneys' fees or expenses beyond the Settlement Amount.

7.3. Pending issuance of the Final Order and Judgment, and subject to the requirements of the Escrow Agreement, the escrow agent(s) for the Escrow Fund may authorize disbursements of up to $10 million in the aggregate for payment of bona fide costs normally, reasonably, and necessarily incurred for purposes of providing Class Notice or otherwise effectuating this Settlement Agreement, provided, however, no disbursements may be made for purposes of paying Settling Plaintiffs' attorneys' fees or expenses (other than expenses incurred for class notice or fund administration).

7.4. Additional amounts may be allocated to pay for notice costs with the approval of the Court.

7.5. Commencing on the Settlement Date, and pursuant to the Court's supervision, Settling Plaintiffs may distribute the Settlement Fund in accordance with the plan of allocation and distribution finally approved by the Court. Subject to Court approval, the reasonable fees and expenses of administering the Settlement Fund may be paid from the Settlement Fund. Subject to Court approval, unpaid administrative debts of the Escrow Fund shall be assumed and paid by the Settlement Fund. Settling Defendants and other Releasees shall have no liability for such administrative fees and expenses beyond the Settlement Amount.

7.6. Each person or entity receiving a distribution from the Settlement Fund shall be required to submit to Settling Plaintiffs an executed Proof of Claim in a form to be designated in the administration and distribution plan. The required Proof of Claim shall include an acknowledgment of the release of all Claims. The releases and covenants not to sue granted in Section 12 are absolute, and shall not be affected in any way by the failure of any recipient of a payment from the Settlement Fund to submit the Proof of Claim or by any deficiencies in any Proof of Claim. On or before the tenth day of each month, Settling Plaintiffs shall provide Settling Defendants copies of all Proof of Claim forms filed within the preceding month.

7.7. The plan of allocation and distribution shall permit payments to any member of the Settlement Classes, regardless of whether the member received funds in connection with the ICEP's or the Claims Resolution Tribunal's determinations. Such payments shall not imply reappraisal or criticism of the findings and determinations of the ICEP, the ICRF, the Claims Resolution Tribunal, or related bodies or individuals.

7.8. Settling Defendants shall have no responsibility for preparing or implementing the plan for administration and distribution of the Settlement Fund, and shall have no liability to the Settlement Classes or any other person or entity in connection with the administration, allocation, and distribution of the Settlement Fund.

8. CLASS CERTIFICATION

8.1. Settling Plaintiffs shall submit to the Court a motion seeking, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, solely for purposes of settlement, certification of the classes of plaintiffs that are described in Section 8.2 hereof ("Settlement Classes"). The motion will state that Settling Defendants' consent to class certification is for settlement purposes only and is conditioned on the Court's entering the Final Order and Judgment and such order becoming fully effective on the Settlement Date. If the Court declines to confirm certification of the Settlement Classes as defined in Section 8.2, Settling Defendants may withdraw their consent to class certification and terminate this Settlement Agreement in accordance with Section 15. Following issuance of the Class Notice and the Fairness Hearing, Settling Plaintiffs shall seek an order from the Court confirming the certification of the Settlement Classes.

8.2. The motion for conditional class certification shall seek certification of the following Settlement Classes:

(a) Deposited Assets Class: The Deposited Assets Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Deposited Assets or any effort to recover Deposited Assets.

(b) Looted Assets Class: The Looted Assets Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets or any effort to recover Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets.

(c) Slave Labor Class I: Slave Labor Class I consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor for companies or entities that actually or allegedly deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with, or transacted such revenues or proceeds through, Releasees, and their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from the deposit of such revenues or proceeds or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with the revenues or proceeds of Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets.

(d) Slave Labor Class II: Slave Labor Class II consists of individuals who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor at any facility or work site, wherever located, actually or allegedly owned, controlled, or operated by any corporation or other business concern headquartered, organized, or based in Switzerland or any affiliate thereof, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee other than Settling Defendants, the Swiss National Bank, and Other Swiss Banks for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets.

(e) Refugee Class: The Refugee Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution who sought entry into Switzerland in whole or in part to avoid Nazi persecution and who actually or allegedly either were denied entry into Switzerland or, after gaining entry, were deported, detained, abused, or otherwise mistreated, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such actual or alleged denial of entry, deportation, detention, abuse, or other mistreatment.

9. NOTICE TO THE SETTLEMENT CLASSES

9.1. Settling Plaintiffs shall develop and submit to the Court for Preliminary Approval a plan for providing, in accordance with Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, notice to the Settlement Classes of the proposed class certification and settlement. Before submitting the plan to the Court, Settling Plaintiffs shall provide the plan to Settling Defendants and shall consider including such revisions to the plan that Settling Defendants may recommend. Any disagreements over the form, content, or method of class notification shall be resolved by the Court.

9.2. Upon Preliminary Approval and as the Court may direct, Settling Plaintiffs or their designee shall cause notice ("Class Notice") of the pendency of the actions consolidated for pre-trial purposes in In re Holocaust Victims Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849, the settlement embodied herein, the conditional certification of the Settlement Classes, class members' exclusion and objection rights, and the Fairness Hearing to be provided to the members of the Settlement Classes in accordance with the Court-approved notice plan. The Class Notice shall include a reasonably detailed description of the process for developing the allocation and distribution plan under the Special Master's direction.

10. SETTLEMENT CLASS MEMBERS' RIGHT OF EXCLUSION

10.1. Any Settlement Class Member who wishes to be excluded from the settlement must submit a written request for exclusion to class counsel or an approved or appointed designee by the date specified in the Class Notice. The Court may, in its discretion, request such persons to describe the nature and amount of any Claims that the requestor may in the future wish to assert. The class counsel or the approved or appointed designee shall provide copies of any exclusion request to the Court, Settling Plaintiffs, and Settling Defendants within five (5) business days of receiving the request.

10.2. Any Settlement Class Member who does not submit an exclusion request meeting the requirements set forth in Section 10.1 by the date specified in the Class Notice will be a Settlement Class Member for all purposes under this Settlement Agreement. Any Settlement Class Member who elects to be excluded from the Settlement Class pursuant to Section 10.1 shall not be entitled to relief under or be affected in any way by this Settlement Agreement.

11. SETTLING PLAINTIFFS' OBLIGATIONS

11.1. Settling Plaintiffs endorse this Settlement Agreement as a fair, adequate, and reasonable settlement, and affirm that the Settlement Agreement brings about complete closure and an end to confrontation with respect to the subject matter it covers.

11.2. Settling Plaintiffs shall not make any public statement or take any action that would violate or be inconsistent with this Settlement Agreement, including seeking or approving economic or other sanctions against, or opposing business transactions involving, any Releasee based on Releasees' alleged conduct covered by the Settlement Agreement.

11.3. Settling Plaintiffs shall not call for or support suits or other proceedings asserting Claims against any Releasee.

11.4. Settling Plaintiffs shall instruct their counsel to comply with this Section 11, and any failure by counsel to comply shall be deemed the failure of Settling Plaintiffs to comply.

11.5. In accordance with and subject to Section 5.4, Settling Defendants may seek a Court order terminating or equitably reducing payment of the Settlement Amount if Settling Plaintiffs commit a material breach of this Settlement Agreement, including, without limitation, a breach of any of the provisions of this Section 11.

11.6. Settling Defendants shall not make any public statement or take any action that would violate or be inconsistent with this Settlement Agreement. Settling Defendants shall instruct their counsel to comply with this Section 11.6, and any failure by counsel to do so shall be deemed the failure of Settling Defendants to comply.

12. RELEASES AND COVENANT NOT TO SUE

12.1. As of the Settlement Date, Settling Plaintiffs irrevocably and unconditionally release, acquit, and forever discharge Releasees from any and all Claims. This release applies irrespective of whether any Settling Plaintiff receives a distribution from the Settlement Fund. Settling Plaintiffs covenant not to sue Releasees or initiate any form of proceeding seeking redress of any kind for any Claim covered by this Settlement Agreement in any judicial, administrative, or other proceeding anywhere in the world at any time, other than to enforce this Settlement Agreement, and consent to immediate dismissal with prejudice of any proceeding brought in violation of this provision. This release does not apply to Basler Lebens-Versicherungs-Gesellschaft, Zürich Lebensversicherungs-Gesellschaft, or Winterthur Lebensversicherungs Gesellschaft or their subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A., et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.).

12.2. Settling Plaintiffs, in releasing all Unknown Claims, shall waive any and all provisions, rights, and benefits conferred by Section 1542 of the Civil Code of the State of California, or any similar statute, regulation, rule, or principle of law or equity of any other state or applicable jurisdiction, and do so understanding and acknowledging the significance of such waiver. Section 1542 of the Civil Code of the State of California provides that:

A general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, which if known by him must have materially affected his settlement with the debtor.

12.3. Settling Plaintiffs also irrevocably and unconditionally release, acquit, and forever discharge the ICEP, the ICRF, the Claims Resolution Tribunal, and the Secretariat of the Claims Resolution Tribunal, as well as their respective officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, and contractors (including, without limitation, the individual arbitrators for the Claims Resolution Tribunal and the audit firms retained by the ICEP, including the audit firms' officers, directors, partners, employees, and agents) (collectively, "ICEP Entities"), including without limitation the ICEP Entities listed on Exhibit C, from any and all liability, claims, causes of action, obligations, damages, costs, and expenses arising out of or in any way associated with the ICEP Entities' activities relating to the investigation of Claims. Settling Plaintiffs covenant not to sue the ICEP Entities or initiate any form of proceeding seeking redress of any kind regarding ICEP activities in any judicial, administrative, or other proceeding anywhere in the world at any time, and consent to immediate dismissal with prejudice of any proceeding brought in violation of this provision.

12.4. At the request of any Releasee, Settling Plaintiffs shall provide a written release to the individual Releasee in the form of Exhibit D hereto. Settling Plaintiffs hereby grant power of attorney to Robert A. Swift to execute the requested release(s) on their behalf and instruct Robert A. Swift to execute each requested release within fifteen (15) business days of receiving the request for the release. Settling Plaintiffs shall appoint a replacement for Robert A. Swift in the event he is unavailable for any reason to carry out the requirements of this Section 12.4, and shall notify Settling Defendants of the replacement within ten (10) business days of appointing the replacement.

12.5. All Releasees themselves hereby irrevocably and unconditionally release, acquit, and forever discharge all persons from any and all claims relating to public statements or writings made before August 12, 1998, critical of the Releasees' conduct with respect to the Claims and/or issues raised in the Filed Actions.

13. DISMISSAL OF RELATED CASES

Within five (5) business days of executing this Settlement Agreement, Settling Plaintiffs shall seek to stay without prejudice Markovicova. et al. v. Swiss Bank Corporation. et al., CV-98-2934 (N.D. Cal.) and No. 996160 (Cal. Super. Ct.) ("Markovicova") and Rosenberg, et al. v. Swiss National Bank, No. CV-98-1647 (D.D.C.) ("Rosenberg") (unless Settling Plaintiffs have previously stayed the cases). If the court denies Settling Plaintiffs' request for a stay, or if the court terminates any stay before the Settlement Date, Settling Plaintiffs shall move to dismiss without prejudice Markovicova and Rosenberg within five days of such denial or termination, subject to Settling Defendants' agreement (without waiving any defenses then available, including defenses based on the passage of time) to toll any applicable statutes of limitations from the date of dismissal without prejudice to such date as this Settlement Agreement may terminate. Any statutes of limitations tolled under this Section shall resume running on such date as Settling Plaintiffs become entitled to refile Markovicova and Rosenberg under the terms of this Section. Within fifteen (15) business days after the Settlement Date, Settling Plaintiffs shall file notices dismissing Markovicova and Rosenberg with prejudice.

14. COURT'S FINAL ORDER AND DISMISSAL

This Settlement Agreement is subject to and conditioned upon (1) the issuance by the Court following the Fairness Hearing of a Final Order and Judgment granting final approval of this Settlement Agreement in accordance with Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 and dismissing with prejudice the cases consolidated for pre-trial purposes under the caption In re Holocaust Victims Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849, as well as any other suits pending before the Court asserting Claims that are released pursuant to Section 12 of this Settlement Agreement, and (2) the Final Order and Judgment becoming fully effective on the Settlement Date. As part of the Final Order and Judgment, the Court shall retain jurisdiction for the purpose of overseeing the administration and distribution of the Escrow Fund and the Settlement Fund and for the purpose of enforcing this Settlement Agreement.

15. TERMINATION OF THE AGREEMENT

15.1. Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants shall separately have the right to terminate this Settlement Agreement by providing written notice of an intent to do so to counsel for the non-terminating party within twenty (20) days of (1) the Court's declining to grant Preliminary Approval in any material respect and/or declining to enter a preliminary order in a form to be mutually agreed upon by the parties; (2) the Court's refusal to approve this Settlement Agreement or any material part of it; (3) the Court's declining to certify the Settlement Classes as defined in this Settlement Agreement; (4) the Court's declining to enter a Final Order and Judgment in a form to be mutually agreed upon by the parties; or (5) any court modifying or reversing in any material respect the Final Order and Judgment as entered by this Court.

15.2. Prior to entry of the Final Order and Judgment, Settling Defendants shall have the right to terminate this Settlement Agreement if (1) economic sanctions are imposed or threatened against Releasees based on alleged acts or omissions covered by the Settlement Agreement; (2) any Settling Plaintiff named in the Filed Actions disavows this Settlement Agreement or acts in a manner contrary to Section 11 of this Settlement Agreement; (3) any Organizational Endorser or officer, director, leader, or spokesperson of or for any Organizational Endorser disavows this Settlement Agreement or acts in a manner contrary to the Organizational Endorser's endorsement of this Settlement Agreement; or (4) a sufficient number of exclusion requests are filed in accordance with Section 10.1 of this Settlement Agreement that Settling Defendants' termination rights are triggered pursuant to the Supplemental Agreement.

15.3. If this Settlement Agreement is terminated for any reason under this Section or otherwise or it fails to become effective or implemented for any reason, the Settlement Agreement will have no force or effect whatsoever and will be rendered null and void ab initio and not admissible as evidence for any purpose in any pending or future litigation in any jurisdiction involving any of the parties hereto. In such an instance, the parties will be deemed to have reverted to their respective status as of the date immediately before the execution of this Settlement Agreement except for costs which have been expended in connection with class notice or administration of the Escrow Fund.

16. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

16.1. Upon the Settlement Date, all prior stipulations and orders entered by the Court shall terminate. Nothing in this Section 16.1 shall be construed to prevent Settling Defendants or Settling Plaintiffs from applying to the Court for relief from any such stipulation or order before issuance of the Final Order and Judgment.

16.2. This Settlement Agreement, including the Supplemental Agreement, the Escrow Agreement, and all other Exhibits attached hereto and hereby incorporated by reference herein, shall supersede any previous agreements and understandings between the parties with respect to the subject matter of this Settlement Agreement. This Settlement Agreement may not be changed, modified, or amended except in writing signed by all parties, subject to Court approval.

16.3. This Settlement Agreement shall be construed under and governed by the laws of the State of New York, applied without regard to its laws applicable to choice of law.

16.4. This Settlement Agreement may be executed in one or more counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original but all of which together shall constitute one and the same instrument.

16.5. This Settlement Agreement shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of the parties, the Settlement Classes, and their representatives, heirs, successors, and assigns.

16.6. Representatives of the Settlement Classes under this Settlement Agreement shall have only that status and rights as conferred under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

16.7. The headings of this Settlement Agreement are included for convenience only and shall not be deemed to constitute part of this Settlement Agreement or to affect its construction. The decimal numbering of provisions herein is intended to designate subsections where applicable.

16.8. No party to this Settlement Agreement shall be considered to be the drafter of this Settlement Agreement or any of its provisions for the purpose of any statute, case law, or rule of interpretation or construction that would or might cause any provision to be construed against the drafter of this Settlement Agreement.

16.9. The waiver by one party of any breach of this Settlement Agreement by any other party shall not be deemed a waiver of any prior or subsequent breach of this Settlement Agreement.

16.10. All counsel and other persons or entities executing this Settlement Agreement or any related settlement documents warrant and represent that they have the full authority to do so and that they have the authority to take the appropriate action required or permitted to be taken pursuant to the Settlement Agreement in order to effectuate its terms.

16.11. No portion of the Settlement Fund shall be deemed subject to the escheat or forfeiture laws of any government.

16.12. Any notice, request, instruction, application for Court approval or application for court orders sought in connection with the Settlement Agreement or other document to be given by any party to the other party shall be in writing and delivered personally or sent by registered or certified mail, postage prepaid, with copies by facsimile to the attention of Settling Defendants' representative, if to Settling Defendants, and to Settling Plaintiffs' representative, if to Settling Plaintiffs, or to other recipients as the Court may specify. As of the date of this Settlement Agreement, the respective representatives are as follows:

RELATED AGREEMENT

This Related Agreement ("Related Agreement") is made and entered into as of this ____ day of _____, 1999, by and between Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs in conjunction with the Settlement Agreement that the parties have executed or will execute in settling the consolidated actions known as In re Holocaust Victim Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849 (E.D.N.Y.) ("Settlement Agreement").

1. Capitalized terms in this Related Agreement shall have the meanings assigned to them in the Settlement Agreement.

2. Settling Plaintiffs shall use their best efforts to obtain the written endorsements of the Agudath Israel World Organization, Alliance Israelite Universelle, the American Gathering/Federation of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, B'nai B'rith International, the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel, the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the Council of Jews from Germany, the European Council of Jewish Communities, the Holocaust Educational Trust, the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Simon Weisenthal Center, the World Jewish Congress, and the World Zionist Organization in the form of Exhibit 1 hereto within twenty (20) days after the parties execute the Settlement Agreement.

3. If Settling Plaintiffs obtain the endorsements of all of the organizations listed in paragraph 2 above within the twenty-day period specified, the Settlement Agreement will become effective immediately upon Settling Plaintiffs' written notification to Settling Defendants of this fact. If Settling Plaintiffs fail to obtain the endorsements of all of the organizations listed in paragraph 2 above within the applicable twenty-day period: (a) Settling Defendants at their sole discretion may declare that the Settlement Agreement shall not become effective; and (b) Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants will resume their negotiations in a good-faith effort to resolve the issue.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the parties have executed this Related Agreement as of the date first written above.

[signature] hereby:

1. endorses the Settlement Agreement entered to resolve the consolidated actions known as In re Holocaust Victim Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849 (E.D.N.Y.) ("Settlement Agreement"), as a fair, adequate, and reasonable settlement;

2. affirms that the Settlement Agreement brings about complete closure and an end to confrontation with respect to the issues dealt with in the settlement;

3. agrees not to make any public statement or take any action that would violate or be inconsistent with this endorsement, including requesting or approving sanctions or opposing business transactions involving Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement;

4. covenants not to sue, call for suits against, or support suits against any Swiss entity released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement;

5. waives any and all claims it may have against the Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement; and

6. agrees to be bound by Sections 11 and 12 of the Settlement Agreement as if it had executed the Settlement Agreement as a Settling Plaintiff.

For and on behalf of Settling Plaintiffs

ESCROW AGREEMENT

This Escrow Agreement is made and entered into this 24th day of November, 1998, by and between Settling Defendants and Settling Plaintiffs.

WHEREAS, the parties have entered into an agreement in principle to settle all claims against Settling Defendants as set forth in the Court transcripts dated August 12, 1998 (the "August 12 Agreement");

WHEREAS, Settling Defendants have agreed to deposit in escrow $250,000,000 on November 23, 1998; and

WHEREAS, the parties have agreed that, if the Court issues a Final Order and Judgment approving the settlement, the balance of the Escrow Fund then existing, less a reserve for taxes payable, will be transferred to the Settlement Fund on or after the Settlement Date;

NOW, THEREFORE, it is agreed by and among the parties to this Escrow Agreement, through their respective attorneys, in consideration of the benefits flowing under the August 12 Agreement and the Escrow Agreement to Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants, and other good and valuable consideration, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, that:

1. DEFINITIONS

The following terms used in this Escrow Agreement shall have the meanings given below, provided, however, that any defined term given a different meaning in the Settlement Agreement shall be deemed to have the meaning set forth in the Settlement Agreement:

August 12 Agreement means the agreement in principle referenced in the second paragraph of this Escrow Agreement and set forth in the Court transcripts dated August 12, 1998.

Bank means the bank into which the Escrow Fund is deposited pursuant to Section 2.1 hereof.

Court means the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Escrow Agents shall have the meaning set forth in Section 3 hereof.

Escrow Agreement means this agreement.

Escrow Fund shall have the meaning set forth in Section 2.1 hereof.

Filed Actions means Weisshaus, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et al., CV-96-4849, Friedman, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et al., CV-96-5161, Trilling-Grotch, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland et al., CV-96-5161, Sonabend, et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et al., CV-96-5161, and World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities v. Union Bank of Switzerland, et al., CV-97-0461, which are being considered together for pretrial purposes under the caption In re Holocaust Victim Assets, Master Docket CV-96-4849, pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York; Markovicova, et al. v. Swiss Bank Corporation, et al., C98-2934, pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California; and Rosenberg v. Swiss National Bank, No. CV-98-1647, pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

Final Order and Judgment means the order to be entered by the Court, in a form to be mutually agreed upon by the parties, approving the Settlement Agreement without material alterations, as fair, adequate, and reasonable under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, confirming the certification of the Settlement Classes under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, and making such other findings and determinations as the Court deems necessary and appropriate to effectuate the terms of the Settlement Agreement. For purposes of this Escrow Agreement, such order shall not become the Final Order and Judgment unless and until the Settlement Date occurs.

Settlement Agreement means the written settlement agreement to be executed by Settling Plaintiffs, Settling Defendants, and any other parties for purposes of giving effect to the August 12 Agreement.

Settlement Date means the date on which all of the following have occurred: (a) the entry of the Final Order and Judgment without material modification; (b) the achievement of finality for the Final Order and Judgment by virtue of that Order having become final and non-appealable through (i) the expiration of all appropriate appeal periods without an appeal having been filed (not including any provision for challenging the Final Order and Judgment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 60); (ii) final affirmance of the Final Order and Judgment on appeal or final dismissal or denial of all such appeals, including petitions for review, rehearing, or certiorari; or (iii) final disposition of any proceedings, including any appeals, resulting from any appeal from the entry of the Final Order and Judgment; and (c) the expiration of any right of withdrawal or termination under the Settlement Agreement.

Settlement Fund means the fund to be established pursuant to the Settlement Agreement.

Settling Defendants means Credit Suisse and UBS AG (as successor to Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation) and each of their former and current corporate parents, subsidiaries, affiliates, and branches (including, without limitation, Credit Suisse Group, Credit Suisse, Credit Suisse First Boston, Credit Suisse First Boston Corporation, Credit Suisse Financial Products, Credit Suisse First Boston (Europe) Ltd., Credit Suisse First Boston Canada, Inc., and CSFB Aktiengesellschaft), predecessors, successors, assigns, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, executors, administrators, and personal representatives, wherever they were, are, or may be located, incorporated, or conducting business, except for Winterthur Lebensversicherungs Gesellschaft and its subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A. et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.).

Settling Plaintiffs means (a) the named plaintiffs in the Filed Actions, and their heirs, successors, affiliates, and assigns, and (b) all members of the classes of plaintiffs for which Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants shall seek conditional certification pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, except those who, in accordance with the terms of the Settlement Agreement and the Court's order certifying the classes, submit a timely request for exclusion from the classes.

2. ESTABLISHMENT OF ESCROW FUND

2.1. On November 23, 1998, Settling Defendants shall deposit $250,000,000 in cash into an account with, at the discretion of Settling Defendants, Credit Suisse First Boston or UBS AG ("Bank") in New York City ("Escrow Fund"). The Escrow Fund shall be operated under the terms of the Settlement Agreement and this Escrow Agreement.

2.2. Except as provided in Section 4.1, the Bank shall pay interest on the Escrow Fund at the six (6)-month London Inter-Bank Offered Rate ("LIBOR"). Interest shall be calculated on the principal of the Escrow Fund for each day that the Escrow Fund is on deposit at the Bank until the Settlement Date based on the six (6)-month LIBOR rate in effect for that day. Interest shall be due, and shall be paid into and become part of the Escrow Fund, on the Settlement Date.

2.3. The Bank shall waive all fees for the establishment, maintenance, or dissolution of the Escrow Fund.

2.4. All funds held in the Escrow Fund shall be deemed to be in custodia legis of the Court and shall remain subject to the jurisdiction of the Court until the Escrow Fund terminates pursuant to Section 6 hereof. Except for payments or distributions authorized by this Escrow Agreement, neither Settling Plaintiffs nor Settling Defendants shall have the authority to, or shall, assign, transfer, encumber, or grant a security interest in the Escrow Fund.

3. APPOINTMENT OF ESCROW AGENTS AND THEIR GENERAL AUTHORITY

3.1. The parties hereby appoint and acknowledge Roger M. Witten and Melvyn I. Weiss as co-escrow agents ("Escrow Agents") of the Escrow Fund.

3.2. The Escrow Agents are hereby authorized, by joint signature only, to make withdrawals, payments, and distributions from the Escrow Fund, in accordance with Section 4 of this Escrow Agreement, by check, wire, electronic, or internal process. No withdrawal, payment, or distribution from the Escrow Fund, in accordance with Section 4, shall be made without signatures of both Escrow Agents.

3.3. The Escrow Agents shall not be entitled to compensation for their services from the Escrow Fund; however, their reasonable expenses incurred for administering the Escrow Fund (including, without limitation, expenses to hire an accounting firm as authorized under Section 3 4 hereof) shall be reimbursed from the Escrow Fund in accordance with Section 4.

3.4. The Escrow Agents shall have the authority to hire an accounting firm as reasonably necessary to assist them in the performance of their duties as Escrow Agents.

3.5. An Escrow Agent may resign by delivery of his resignation in writing to the Court at any time. Settling Defendants may replace Roger M. Witten with a substitute and Settling Plaintiffs may replace Melvyn I. Weiss with a substitute by delivery of notice in writing to the Court at any time. The foregoing notwithstanding, any such resignation or replacement shall not be effective until a successor (reasonably acceptable to the other party) has been appointed and the successor accepts the appointment. If an Escrow Agent tenders his resignation and a successor has not been appointed within thirty (30) days of the resignation, Settling Defendants or Settling Plaintiffs may petition the Court to nominate a successor.

4. DISBURSEMENTS FROM THE ESCROW FUND

4.1. Except as provided in Section 4.2, the Escrow Fund shall be disbursed only in the following circumstances: If the Court issues a Final Order and Judgment, the Escrow Agents shall, within thirty (30) days after the Settlement Date, authorize the transfer of the then-existing balance of the Escrow Fund (including interest earned thereon), less a reserve for taxes payable by the Escrow Fund, to the Settlement Fund. As soon as practicable after all tax returns have been filed and taxes paid in accordance with such returns, any excess reserve shall be paid to the Settlement Fund. If the Settlement Fund has not been established within thirty (30) days after the Settlement Date, the funds shall remain in the Escrow Fund until the Settlement Fund has been established, at which time the balance of the Escrow Fund shall be transferred to the Settlement Fund as soon as practicable. The Bank shall not be obligated to pay interest at the 6-month LIBOR rate as of the Settlement Date, but may instead negotiate the rate to be paid on any funds to remain on deposit at the Bank after that date.

4.2. In addition to disbursements authorized under Section 4.1, the Escrow Agents may authorize disbursements from the Escrow Fund of up to $10,000,000 in the aggregate for payment of bona fide costs normally, reasonably, and necessarily incurred in the settlement process, such as for class notice and administration of the Escrow Fund (including costs to retain an accounting firm as provided for in Section 3.4); provided, however, the Escrow Fund shall not be used to pay Settling Plaintiffs' attorneys' fees until after the Settlement Date, and only upon approval by the Court.

4.3. Any dispute as to whether an expense qualifies as an authorized payment or as to the amount to be disbursed that cannot be resolved by agreement of the Escrow Agents shall be submitted to the Court for final resolution without any right of appeal.

5. TAX STATUS OF ESCROW FUND

5.1. The parties agree that the Escrow Fund is intended to be treated as a Qualified Settlement Fund ("QSF") for the purposes of the Internal Revenue Code and the regulations promulgated thereunder, including, but not limited to, the regulations set forth under 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.468B-1 through 1.468B-5. To that end, the parties shall cooperate with each other and shall not take a position in any filing or before any tax authority that is inconsistent with such treatment.

5.2. If for any reason the Escrow Fund is not a QSF as of the date it is established, at the request of Settling Defendants, a "relation-back election" as described in 26 C.F.R. § 1.468B-1(j) shall be made to cause the Escrow Fund to be deemed a QSF at the earliest allowable date and the Escrow Agents shall take such actions as may be necessary or appropriate in connection therewith.

5.3. The Escrow Agents jointly shall be the administrator of the QSF and, with the assistance of an accounting firm retained pursuant to Section 3.4 hereof, shall undertake the following actions in administering the Escrow Fund as a QSF: (a) apply for a taxpayer identification number for the Escrow Fund; (b) file, or cause to be filed, all tax and information returns that the Escrow Fund is required to file under foreign, federal, state, and local laws and regulations; (c) pay from the Escrow Fund all taxes that are imposed on the Escrow Fund under foreign, federal, state, and local laws and regulations; (d) file, or cause to be filed, tax elections available to the Escrow Fund, including without limitation a "relation-back election" in accordance with Section 5.2; and (e) file a request for a prompt assessment under § 6501(d) of the Internal Revenue Code if Settling Defendants instruct them to do so.

5.4. If, upon audit by the Internal Revenue Service, the Escrow Fund is found not to be a QSF for any period of time, the Escrow Agents shall apply for a refund of any taxes paid by the Escrow Fund and shall pay the refund into the Escrow Fund (or into the Settlement Fund if the refund is received after the Escrow Fund is transferred into the Settlement Fund). The Escrow Fund (or the Settlement Fund if the Escrow Fund has been transferred into the Settlement Fund) shall promptly reimburse Settling Defendants for any tax liability (including interest and penalties, if any) that Settling Defendants incur with respect to earnings of the Escrow Fund as a result of any determination that the Escrow Fund does not constitute a QSF.

6. TERMINATION OF ESCROW FUND

The Escrow Fund shall terminate upon: (a) transfer of the balance of the Escrow Fund to the Settlement Fund pursuant to Section 4.1 of this Escrow Agreement; (b) termination of the August 12 Agreement; or (c) termination of the Settlement Agreement. If termination of the Escrow Fund occurs pursuant to subsection (a), the Settlement Fund shall assume any unpaid administrative debts of the Escrow Fund and any tax liability that is asserted on audit of the Escrow Fund after its termination that is not otherwise covered by the reserve established pursuant to Section 4.1 If termination of the Escrow Fund occurs pursuant to subsection (b) or (c), the then-existing balance of the Escrow Fund (including interest earned thereon) less a reserve for taxes shall revert to Settling Defendants, who shall pay any unpaid costs authorized by the Escrow Agents or the Court pursuant to Sections 4.2 or 4.3.

7. IMMUNITY OF ESCROW AGENTS

The Escrow Agents shall not incur personal liability of any nature in connection with any act or omission in the administration of the Escrow Fund, unless the act or omission constitutes gross negligence or willful misconduct.

8. MISCELLANEOUS

8.1. This document, once executed by properly authorized signatures on behalf of the parties, represents agreement by the parties to all the terms and conditions set forth herein. The signatories to this Escrow Agreement warrant and represent that they have full and complete authority to enter into this Escrow Agreement and to sign said Escrow Agreement on behalf of themselves and/or the entity or persons they represent.

8.2. The parties hereby irrevocably consent to the jurisdiction of the Court in connection with any action or proceeding arising out of or relating to this Escrow Agreement; any document or instrument delivered pursuant to, in connection with, or simultaneously with this Escrow Agreement; a breach of this Escrow Agreement or of any such document or instrument; or the Escrow Fund. Any disputes between or among the parties concerning the matters contained in this Escrow Agreement shall, if they cannot be resolved by agreement, be submitted to the Court for final resolution without any right of appeal. The Court shall retain jurisdiction over the implementation and enforcement of this Escrow Agreement.

8.3. This Escrow Agreement shall be governed by and construed in accordance with the laws of the State of New York, applied without regard to its law applicable to choice of law.

8.4. This Escrow Agreement shall constitute the entire agreement among the parties with regard to the subject of this Escrow Agreement and shall supersede any previous agreements and understandings between the parties with respect to the subject matter of this Escrow Agreement. This Escrow Agreement may not be changed, modified, or amended except in writing signed by all parties, subject to Court approval.

8.5. The headings of this Escrow Agreement are included for convenience only and shall be not be deemed to constitute part of this Escrow Agreement or to affect its construction. The decimal numbering of provisions herein is intended to designate subsections where applicable.

8.6. This Escrow Agreement shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of the parties and their representatives, heirs, successors, and assigns.

8.7. No party to this Escrow Agreement shall be considered to be the drafter of this Escrow Agreement or any of its provisions for the purpose of any statute, case law, or rule of interpretation or construction that would or might cause any provision to be construed against the drafter of this Escrow Agreement.

8.8. The invalidity or unenforceability of any provision of this Escrow Agreement shall not affect any other provision hereof, and the remainder of the Escrow Agreement shall be construed and enforced as if such invalid or unenforceable provision were omitted.

8.9. The waiver by one party of any breach of this Escrow Agreement by any other party shall not be deemed a waiver of any prior or subsequent breach of this Escrow Agreement.

8.10. This Escrow Agreement may be executed in one or more counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original but all of which together shall constitute one and the same instrument.

8.11. Any notice, request, instruction, application for Court approval or application for Court orders sought in connection with this Escrow Agreement or other document to be given by any party to the other party shall be in writing and delivered personally or sent by registered or certified mail, postage prepaid, with copies by facsimile to the attention of Settling Defendants' representative, if to Settling Defendants, and to Settling Plaintiffs' representative, if to Settling Plaintiffs, or to other recipients as the Court may specify. As of the date of this Escrow Agreement, the respective representatives are as follows:

Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement

This Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement is made and entered into this 9th day of August, 2000, by and between Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants.

WHEREAS, the parties entered into a settlement agreement dated January 26, 1999, and amended it on November 16, 1999 (the "Settlement Agreement");

WHEREAS, Settling Plaintiffs and Settling Defendants wish further to amend the Settlement Agreement in view of comments made at the Fairness Hearings and in view of other developments bearing on the Settlement Agreement; and

WHEREAS, these further amendments relate to and fully resolve questions regarding the applicability of the Settlement Agreement to looted Artworks (a term defined below) and to claims involving Participating Insurance Carriers (a term defined below), as well as issues relating to the manner in which the Settlement Fund will be distributed and the payment of distribution costs;

NOW, THEREFORE, it is agreed by and among the parties to the Settlement Agreement, through their respective attorneys, that:

1. DEFINITIONS

1.1. The capitalized terms used in this Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement shall have the meanings assigned to them in the Settlement Agreement, unless otherwise modified by this Amendment No. 2.

1.2. The definition of the term Assets in Section 1 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding the phrase "insurance policies" after the word "equipment." The definition of Assets in Section 1 of the Settlement Agreement is further amended by capitalizing the word "artworks."

1.3. Section 1 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding the following definitions:

> "Artworks means any specifically identified objects of artistic value, including, but not limited to, Judaica, rare books, paintings, drawings, and sculpture, actually or allegedly belonging in whole or in part to Settling Plaintiffs that are currently in the possession, custody, or control of any Releasee and that were actually or allegedly stolen, expropriated, Aryanized, confiscated, or were otherwise wrongfully taken by, at the request of, or under the auspices of, the Nazi Regime."

"Claims Resolution Tribunal – SD ('CRT-SD') means the Claims Resolution Tribunal as it may be reconstituted to perform functions relating to the distribution of the Settlement Fund."

"Policy Claims means all Claims or Settled Claims relating to direct insurance policies issued by Participating Insurance Carriers to Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution that (1) do not otherwise qualify as claims relating to Looted Assets, and (2) have not been paid by the issuing Participating Insurance Carrier, its affiliate, successor, or subsidiary, provided that, for the purposes of this clause, a policy will not be considered "paid" if documentary evidence demonstrates that the policy was paid in contravention of applicable law."

"Participating Insurance Carriers means all Releasees listed on Exhibit 1 hereto, as it may be amended pursuant to the terms of this Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement."

2. ARTWORKS

2.1. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 12.6 as follows:

"12.6. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Settlement Agreement including this Section 12 hereof, Settling Plaintiffs' discharge of Releasees from any and all Claims shall not bar any Settling Plaintiff from bringing a lawsuit to recover specifically identified Artworks that qualify as Looted Assets where the suit seeks relief in the nature of a replevin action for return of such specifically identified Artworks against a Releasee who allegedly is currently in actual possession of such specifically identified Artworks; provided, however, that any such Settling Plaintiff may not seek to recover any damages, fees, or costs of any kind or seek any relief whatsoever beyond return of the specifically identified Artworks except such payment of court costs as are routinely awarded to prevailing parties in the courts of the country in which the lawsuit was brought; provided further, that any such suit may only be brought in the courts of the country where the Artworks allegedly are located at the time the suit is begun, or the courts of the country from which the Artworks were looted; and provided further that, before any such suit may be brought, the Settling Plaintiff must first take reasonable steps to secure the return of the Artworks from the Releasee through means other than litigation."

3. DISTRIBUTION OF SETTLEMENT FUNDS

3.1. Section 4.1 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking it in its entirety, and substituting the following:

> "4.1. Notwithstanding any further activities, findings, recommendations, or conclusions of, or costs incurred by, the ICEP, ICRF, CRT, or any CRT-SD, and notwithstanding any other provisions of this Settlement Agreement, Releasees shall have no financial exposure or additional liability of any kind whatsoever beyond the Settlement Amount for any cost incurred by the ICEP and the Independent Association of Eminent Persons and their agents, counsel, and auditors, after ICEP's final meeting of February 23, 2000; the ICRF; the CRT after the date of this Amendment No. 2, except to the extent the CRT establishes that any cost incurred was for the purpose of processing claims to the account lists published by the Swiss Bankers Association in 1997; any CRT-SD, including all costs incurred for establishing the CRT-SD; or by any other person that is in any way connected to or arises out of the distribution of the Settlement Fund; including, without limitation, all costs and expenses incurred in connection with the publication of additional accounts, centralizing of account databases, and preparation of bank files for the use of the CRT-SD or any other claims facility established by the Court for resolving claims of the Deposited Assets Class or other Settling Plaintiffs; all such costs shall be paid in their entirety by the Settlement Fund."

3.2. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 4.4 as follows:

> "4.4. Settling parties agree to support the Swiss Federal Banking Commission's decision of March 30, 2000 to authorize expeditious publication, on the Internet, of identifying information relating to approximately 26,000 open, suspended, and closed accounts dating from the relevant era that, in the opinion of ICEP, probably or possibly belong to Victims of Nazi Persecution; provided, however, that the accounts authorized for publication shall first be reviewed at the bank's expense for the purpose of removing account names that do not meet the publication criteria. The review process shall not unreasonably delay the expeditious publication of the account information. Publication will occur as soon as feasible after the Court issues an order approving a plan of allocation and distribution hereunder, which the parties anticipate will occur in September, 2000. Once publication has been completed, Settling Plaintiffs shall be required to submit claims to Deposited Assets within a reasonable period of time to be set by the Court."

3.3. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 4.5 as follows:

> "4.5 Settling parties agree to support the Swiss Federal Banking Commission's decision of March 30, 2000 to authorize expeditious centralization, as soon as feasible after the Court issues an order approving a plan of allocation and distribution, of the database of all account holders that, according to the final conclusions of ICEP, probably or possibly belong to Victims of Nazi Persecution. The centralized database shall be used, subject to the directives of the Swiss Federal Banking Commission, for the matching and research of claims submitted by Settling Plaintiffs through the settlement procedures. All costs incurred for establishing and operating the centralized database shall be paid in their entirety by the Settlement Fund."

3.4. Section 5.1 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking the last sentence of the first paragraph of that section and substituting the following: "Except as provided in Sections 5.2 and 5.3, Settling Defendants shall pay into the Escrow Fund the Settlement Amount in four installments: (1) $250 million ("Installment 1") on November 23, 1998; (2) $333 million ("Installment 2") on November 23, 1999; (3) $333 million ("Installment 3") on November 23, 2000; and (4) $334 million ("Installment 4") also on November 23, 2000."

3.5. Section 5.1 is further amended by striking the last sentence of the second paragraph of that section and substituting the following: "Unless Settling Plaintiffs direct otherwise, within thirty (30) days after the Settlement Date, the Escrow Agents shall authorize the transfer of the then-existing balance of the Escrow Fund (including interest earned thereon), less a reserve for taxes payable by the Escrow Fund, to the Settlement Fund."

3.6. Section 5.1 is further amended by striking the third paragraph of that section.

3.7. Section 5.2 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding between the first and second sentences of this Section the following: "Provided, however, that the Settlement Fund shall directly pay to claimants all special adjustments for interest and fees awarded by the Claims Resolution Tribunal pursuant to guidelines established by the ICRF."

3.8. Section 5.3 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding to the first paragraph between the first and second sentences of that paragraph the following: "All payments made to claimants of or through the New York State Banking Department (including but not limited to its Holocaust Claims Processing Office) will be credited against the Settlement Amount for the full amount of these payments."

3.9. Section 5.5 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking it in its entirety and substituting the following:

> "5.5. Within ten (10) business days after the later of court approval of this Settlement Agreement as amended or execution of > Amendment No. 2 by the parties, Settling Defendants shall pay into the Escrow Fund $10,521,000, which is the amount of interest that would have been due and payable on November 23, 2001 under Section 5.5 of this Settlement Agreement prior to this amendment thereto."

3.10. Section 7.3 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking it in its entirety and substituting the following:

> "7.3 Pending issuance of the Final Order and Judgment, and subject to the requirements of the Escrow Agreement, the Escrow Agent(s) for the Escrow Fund may authorize disbursements of up to $20 million in the aggregate for payment of bona fide costs normally, reasonably, and necessarily incurred for purposes of providing Class Notice or otherwise effectuating this Settlement Agreement, including costs associated with establishing a deposited assets claims process, provided, however, no disbursements may be made for purposes of paying Settling Plaintiffs' attorneys' fees or expenses (other than expenses incurred for class notice or fund administration)."

3.11. Section 7.4 of the Settlement Agreement, as set forth in Amendment No. 1 to the Settlement Agreement, is hereby amended by striking it in its entirety and substituting the following:

> "7.4 Upon approval of the Court, the Escrow Agents may authorize disbursements of additional amounts from the Escrow Fund to pay bona fide costs normally, reasonably, and necessarily incurred in the settlement process, such as for class notice or for establishing a deposited assets claims process."

3.12. Section 7.5 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking the second sentence in its entirety and substituting the following: "All fees and expenses of administering the Settlement Fund shall, subject to Court approval, be paid from the Settlement Fund."

3.13. Section 7.5 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby further amended by striking the last sentence of that section and substituting the following: "Settling Defendants and other Releasees shall have no liability for such administrative fees and expenses beyond the Settlement Amount, including any fees or expenses incurred by the CRT-SD or any other person or entity."

3.14. Section 7.8 of the Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by striking the entire section and substituting the following: "Settling Defendants shall have no responsibility for preparing, implementing, or funding the plan for administration and distribution of the Settlement Fund, and shall have no liability to the Settlement Classes or any other person or entity in connection with the administration, allocation, and distribution of the Settlement Fund, including, but not limited to, with respect to the CRT-SD."

3.15. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding Section 7.9, which reads as follows:

> "7.9. Any plan for administering this settlement, including any claims resolution process, shall be carried out under the supervision and control of the Court. Among other things, the Court will maintain judicial control over the procedural and substantive rules, all amendments thereto, and the appointment of personnel and staff in connection with any claims resolution process. Subject to the Swiss Federal Banking Commission's directives, the CRT-SD or other Swiss-based contact office for the claims resolution process will have access to the existing files prepared by the ICEP auditors in the course of their investigation on specific accounts that in the opinion of the ICEP probably or possibly belong to Holocaust victims where required for resolving specific claims by Settling Plaintiffs. No information on specific bank accounts may be disclosed, directly or indirectly, by the CRT-SD or other Swiss-based contact office for the claims resolution process to the Court or the Settling Plaintiffs unless (i) the files are required for resolving specific claims by Settling Plaintiffs, (ii) the claimant has provided plausible evidence that an account holder is his or her relative and a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution; and (iii) the claimant who is deemed entitled to an account agrees to, or the competent Swiss authority permits, the transfer of such information. No claims resolution process established hereunder shall be empowered to act, or to provide information concerning any account, in connection with any claim by a person who is not a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, other than to reject the claim on such grounds. All payments approved by any claims resolution process established hereunder shall be made directly from the Settlement Fund. No Releasee shall have any liability for claims of any kind submitted by Settling Plaintiffs apart from the Settlement Amount, whether or not such claims are resolved by any claims resolution process established hereunder."

3.16 The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 7.10 as follows:

> "7.10. Pending issuance of the Final Order and Judgment, the Escrow Agents for the Escrow Fund may authorize, subject to the requirements of the Escrow Agreement, disbursements from the Escrow Fund for payment to Settling Plaintiffs of well-documented Claims."

3.17. Nothing herein shall be deemed to abrogate whatever power the Court may have under Rule 23(d)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to make appropriate orders required for the fair conduct of any claims process; provided, however, that no such order may be inconsistent with the terms of this Settlement Agreement. The Settlement Fund shall pay all costs incurred by the Settling Defendants in complying with such orders, including, but not limited to, the expenditure of time by the Settling Defendants' own employees.

4. INSURANCE

4.1. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 9.3 as follows:

> "9.3. The Court shall cause notice to be provided to Settlement Class members of the allocation and distribution plan for the Settlement Fund. That notice shall, inter alia, include a reasonably detailed description of the procedures set forth in this Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement for making Looted Asset Claims and for making Policy Claims involving Participating Insurance Carriers, and shall provide for a reasonable period of time to opt out solely from the aspects of the Settlement relating to the releases of the Participating Insurance Carriers. Such notice shall also include a list of the Participating Insurance Carriers who will be subject to Section 17 of the Settlement Agreement. Nothing in this Section or in the notice to be provided under this Section shall be construed to mean that the prior class action notice was insufficient in any respect."

4.2. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding the following Section 17, entitled "Policy Claims":

> "17.1. Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution may make Policy Claims to the Court or its designee (subject to the Court's review) within a reasonable period to be specified in the allocation and distribution plan. The Court or its designee will determine whether Policy Claims are valid pursuant to criteria to be established within sixty days from the date of court approval of the settlement by agreement acceptable to the parties and the Participating Insurance Carriers. The conclusion of such agreement is a condition precedent of any undertaking concerning insurance in this Amendment No. 2, including, without limitation, any undertaking of the Participating Insurance Carriers in Section 17.3, and any Participating Insurance Carrier that does not subscribe to such agreement shall be removed from Exhibit 1 hereto and thereafter shall not be a Participating Insurance Carrier. In principle, Policy Claims will be deemed valid where (1) the claimant is a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution; (2) there is documentary evidence that the claimant is making a claim on a direct insurance policy issued by a Participating Insurance Carrier; (3) the claimant is entitled to the proceeds of the policy because the claimant is the policyholder, the beneficiary of the policy, or a rightful heir of such persons; and (4) there is documentary evidence that the net cash surrender value of the policy (as defined in Section 17.3) has not already been paid to the policyholder, the beneficiary, another beneficiary, or a rightful heir, provided, however, that prior recovery of less than the net cash surrender value will not preclude a claimant from recovering the difference between the prior recovery and the net cash surrender value under this Settlement, unless the prior recovery was obtained pursuant to (a) a law or regulation enacted after World War II that did not discriminate against Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, or (b) an accord and satisfaction.

"17.2. The Participating Insurance Carriers will make available at their expense all information or documentation in their possession (or in the possession of any current affiliate or subsidiary listed on Exhibit 1 hereto (as amended) that would reasonably be expected to have information or documentation relating to the policy at issue) relating to submitted Policy Claims, but only after the Court or the designee has determined that the submitted Policy Claim is not frivolous. Any Policy Claim submitted to a Participating Insurance Carrier shall be accompanied by the claimant's authorization of such Participating Insurance Carrier to procure information relating to the Policy Claim from archives of governmental restitution offices. Where a Policy Claim is not directed at a particular Participating Insurance Carrier because the claimant does not know which Carrier issued his or her policy, all of the Participating Insurance Carriers will search their records or the records of their current affiliates or subsidiaries listed on Exhibit 1 hereto (as amended) that are reasonably expected to have information or documentation relating to the policy at issue, but only if there is a reasonable basis, as determined by the Court or its designee, to believe that one of the Participating Insurance Carriers may have issued the policy in question. The Participating Insurance Carriers will enter into arrangements with the Swiss insurance supervisory authority, who will have authority to monitor the Participating Insurance Carriers' obligations under this Section 17.2 by: (a) reviewing written search protocols that each Participating Insurance Carrier will use to perform the searches required by this Section 17.2 to make sure those protocols are fully adequate; (b) taking steps it deems reasonable to confirm that the Participating Insurance Carrier is following the approved protocol in conducting its searches, and (c) preparing periodic reports generally describing the actions it has taken pursuant to this Section 17.2. The foregoing actions of the Swiss insurance supervisory authority will be the exclusive measures taken to confirm the Participating Insurance Carriers' compliance with their undertakings under the Settlement Agreement.

"17.3. Policy Claims found to be valid by the Court or its designee (subject to the Court's review) will be paid at the net cash surrender value – the policy value adjusted to reflect the amount for which the policy could be redeemed at the relevant time – multiplied by a reasonable gross-up factor. Solely for the purposes of determining a reasonable gross-up factor, the parties agree to follow the guidelines specifically related to the computation of such a factor, as promulgated by the International Commission on Holocaust-era Insurance Claims. The Settlement Fund and the Participating Insurance Carriers will each be responsible for one half of the amount awarded on valid Policy Claims for the first $100 million (up to a cap of $50 million for the Settlement Fund, on the one hand, and up to a cap of $50 million for the Participating Insurance Carriers, collectively, on the other hand) to be paid according to Section 17.4 hereof. If valid Policy Claims exceed $100 million, either the Settlement Fund will pay any amounts in excess of the first $100 million or valid Policy Claims will be paid pro rata within the combined cap of $100 million. Under no circumstances will the Participating Insurance Carriers collectively be responsible for more than $50 million, and , subject to the provisions of Section 17.4, all Releasees other than the Participating Insurance Carriers will have no liability for Policy Claims. All Looted Asset Claims including those relating to insurance policies will be paid exclusively from the Settlement Fund.

"17.4. Commencing thirty days after the last time period set forth in this Amendment No. 2 for any Participating Insurance Carrier to withdraw, the Court or its designee (subject to the Court's review) will issue a certificate of validity to each claimant whom it finds has a valid Policy Claim relating to a Participating Insurance Carrier that has not withdrawn. Within six months following the date of issuance, a claimant may present the certificate of validity to Settling Plaintiffs to receive the amount awarded pursuant to procedures to be included in the Court's plan of allocation and distribution of the Settlement Fund. All awards relating to Policy Claims shall be paid jointly by the Settlement Fund and the Settling Defendants. Counsel for Settling Plaintiffs shall promptly provide Settling Defendants with copies of all certificates of validity presented to them for payment. Settling Defendants shall pay 50% of the amount designated in such certificate up to the $50 million cap on the Participating Insurance Carriers' responsibility, within 15 business days of presentation."

"17.5. All of the parties to this Settlement Agreement agree, and as a condition to submitting any claim under the Settlement Agreement any claimant must acknowledge, that (i) neither the direct nor indirect participation by any Participating Insurance Carrier or its attorneys or agents in the negotiation or implementation of the Settlement Agreement, including but not limited to reviewing or providing information related to Looted Assets Claims or Policy Claims, providing information concerning publishing notice or actually publishing notice of the names of holders of policies subject to Looted Assets Claims or Policy Claims or contributing funds toward the payment of Policy Claims, shall subject any Participating Insurance Carrier to the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York or any other state or federal court in the United States, (ii) the Court's retention of jurisdiction to enforce the Settlement Agreement shall not supply jurisdiction over any Participating Insurance Carrier, and (iii) the parties to this Settlement Agreement shall not argue that any Participating Insurance Carrier is subject to such jurisdiction either in this pending action or any other action in the United States based, in whole or in part, on any or all of the aforementioned factors."

"17.6. The voluntary dismissal, with prejudice, of the Releasees listed in Exhibit 2 (provided, however, they have not previously withdrawn) from the actions entitled Cornell, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A., et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.), and Winters, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali S.p.A., et al., 98 Civ. 9186 (S.D.N.Y.), and of all claims, whether known or unknown, that have been or could have been asserted therein against any Participating Insurance Carrier pursuant to order and judgment of the United States District Court of the Southern District of New York shall occur within thirty days of the earlier of (a) the Settlement Date or (b) the last time period set forth in this Amendment No. 2 for any Participating Insurance Carrier to withdraw and is a condition precedent of the undertakings of such Participating Insurance Carrier in Section 17.3 and the Settling Defendants in Section 17.4.

a) If the Court, after due consultation with the interested parties, determines that, in its opinion, this Section 17 cannot reasonably be implemented without public disclosure of the names of holders of policies subject to Looted Asset Claims or Policy Claims, the Court, no later than halfway through the period for filing Looted Asset Claims and Policy Claims provided in the distribution plan, may recommend such disclosure, recognizing that the Court lacks jurisdiction over the Participating Insurance Carriers. The Court shall only recommend such disclosure if (1) based on the experience with claims that are being submitted, it appears that there is a strong likelihood that significantly more valid Looted Asset Claims and Policy Claims would be submitted if the names of holders of policies subject to Looted Asset Claims and Policy Claims were to be publicly disclosed, (2) it would be reasonably feasible for any or all of the Participating Insurance Carriers to identify the names of such policyholders, and (3) that recommendation, if implemented, would not cause a significant extension of the period for making such Claims. In determining whether disclosure of policyholder names is reasonably feasible pursuant to clause (2) of the preceding sentence, the Court shall consider a Participating Insurance Carrier's ability to identify relevant policyholder names, the amount of effort that would be required to develop reasonably comprehensive and reasonably accurate information, the cost of doing so, and the time it would take to do so; and the Court shall not recommend such disclosure if the likely costs and burdens are disproportionate to the likely benefits.

b) If the Court makes a recommendation pursuant to subsection (a) with respect to disclosure of policyholder names, then the Settling Defendants shall, within five (5) days thereafter inform the Participating Insurance Carriers of the Court's recommendation and the Participating Insurance Carriers shall then have thirty (30) days within which to inform the Settling Defendants whether they intend to make the disclosure recommended by the Court and the Settling Defendants shall so inform the Court within five (5) days of being advised of the Participating Insurance Carriers' intentions. If a Participating Insurance Carrier fails to respond timely to an inquiry of a Settling Defendant, the Participating Insurance Carrier shall be deemed to have responded negatively.

(1) If the Participating Insurance Carrier responds positively, any efforts to identify names to be disclosed shall be made by the Participating Insurance Carrier subject to review by the Swiss Insurance Supervisor, as provided in Section 17.2, and the reasonable costs incurred by the Participating Insurance Carrier in connection therewith and all other costs connected to the disclosure shall be paid by the Settlement Fund as a cost of distribution.

(2) If the Participating Insurance Carrier responds negatively, then any and all provisions with respect to insurance in this Agreement shall become null and void with respect to that Participating Insurance Carrier, including (without limitation) the provisions found in Section 17.3 hereof.

c) In no event, and notwithstanding Section 17.4 hereof or any other provision of this Agreement, will any Settling Defendant have any liability to pay Policy Claims or make payments of any kind in respect of a Participating Insurance Carrier that has withdrawn pursuant to Section 17.7(b)(2) hereof."

"17.8 Any of the four groups of Participating Insurance Carriers (as reflected in Exhibit 1) may withdraw from this Settlement Agreement and this Amendment No. 2 (a) if no agreement is reached concerning payment criteria within the time period prescribed in Section 17.1; or (b) if pursuant to Section 17.7(b), it declines to follow a recommendation of the Court regarding publication. In the event any of the four groups of Participating Insurance Carriers withdraws, the amount of the $50 million "cap" applicable to the Participating Insurance Carriers as a whole shall be reduced pro rata, per number of groups of Participating Insurance Carriers that withdraws. (For example, should one group of Participating Insurance Carriers withdraw, the amount of the cap shall be reduced to $37.5 million.)"

5. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

5.1. The Settlement Agreement is hereby amended by adding a new Section 16.13 as follows:

"16.13 The parties agree that the provisions of section 16.2 of the Settlement Agreement (merger clause) will not apply to the understandings reached in the Memorandum to File dated August 9, 2000, and its two accompanying attachments."

6. EXECUTION

6.1. This Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement may be executed in one or more counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original but all of which together shall constitute one and the same instrument.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the parties have executed this Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement as of the date first written above.

Memorandum to the File

A. In connection with Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement, the defendant banks will offer their good faith cooperation with the implementation of the settlement. Judge Korman may refer to the continued pledge of good faith cooperation in his opinion approving the Settlement Agreement.

B. Discussions between and among counsel about the issues likely to arise during the implementation phase of the settlement have resulted in general agreement that good faith cooperation in the implementation of the settlement means:

1. The defendant banks will continue to cooperate with respect to publication of their share of the approximately 26,000 names referred to in the ICEP report, subject to the checking process described in C. The defendant banks will bear their own internal expenses; other expenses will be borne by the settlement.

2. The defendant banks will continue to cooperate with respect to establishment of a consolidated electronic database concerning the approximately 46,000 accounts referred to in the ICEP report, subject to the checking process described in paragraph C. The defendant banks will bear their own internal expenses; other expenses will be borne by the settlement. The defendant banks will provide reasonable access by claims personnel to the consolidated database and to ICEP audit files prepared in connection with such accounts.

3. If a Class Member who does not appear on the list of approximately 46,000 or on other previously published lists makes a deposited asset claim, and if claims personnel find that the Class Member has provided a reasoned and satisfactory basis for a conclusion that his or her account may be under the name of a person with a Swiss address, then the ICEP auditors' database for the relevant bank will be searched (beyond the bank's share of the approximately 46,000) for potential matches for these persons. The bank may opt to conduct the database search itself under the supervision of the ICEP auditors or to have the ICEP auditors conduct the search; under either option, the Settlement Fund shall pay for the auditors' activities. The judgment whether a Class Member has provided a reasoned and satisfactory basis for this conclusion shall be guided by the attached hypotheticals (Attachment #1), and with respect to accounts opened in the name of an intermediary, by the attached statement of Swiss law secrecy constraints (Attachment #2), and decisions of claims personnel with regard to whether a Class Member has satisfied this standard may be reviewed at the request of a defendant bank by the Court on a de novo basis. If there are name matches, then the existing ICEP electronic and hard-copy files will be searched for further information, e.g., to confirm the match, to ascertain the amount that may have been in the account, etc. The bank may opt to conduct the search itself under the supervision of the ICEP auditors or to have the ICEP auditors conduct the search; under either option, the Settlement Fund shall pay for the auditors' activities. The defendant banks will not be obligated to search beyond these existing ICEP files, but they will consider in a spirit of cooperation requests for further assistance in any particular cases where there is a reasonably strong likelihood that further assistance would provide probative information and where the costs of such further assistance do not outweigh the potential benefits. Allocation of the costs of any such further research as between the Settlement Fund and the banks will be decided on an ad hoc consensual basis at the time.

C. It is understood that the lists of approximately 26,000 and 46,000 names are being checked to eliminate errors, e.g., duplicative accounts. The ICEP auditors control this process and make the final decision whether to eliminate an account or name from the lists. The ICEP auditors are using the previously agreed ICEP criteria with two exceptions. First, the auditors are eliminating accounts for persons domiciled in countries that were later occupied by the Nazis where the account was unquestionably closed before the actual date the country was occupied. Second, the auditors are eliminating accounts that were opened after May 9, 1945, when the War in Europe ended. The banks are paying the costs of this project.

D. It is the intent and agreement of the parties that all payments that the CRT and the CRT-SD have determined or will determine should be paid shall continue to be distributed promptly, without regard to any provisions in the Settlement Agreement or in Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement referring or relating to the "Settlement Date" or the "Final Judgment and Order." The banks do not object to the continuation of the activities of the CRT and understand that the Court may appoint the CRT-SD to play a role in determining deposited assets claims, including interest and fees. Any awards to deposited assets claimants as a result of such determinations by the CRT or the CRT-SD shall be paid directly from the Settlement Fund or the Escrow Fund, upon Court approval. Payments in connection with the publication of the names of account holders or in connection with the creation of centralized databases needed to implement the settlement shall be made from the Settlement Fund, or the Escrow Fund, with Court approval. Administrative expenses of the CRT-SD shall also be paid from the Settlement Fund or the Escrow Fund, with Court approval. The payments, awards, and/or expenses of the CRT and CRT-SD shall include, but not be limited to: (1) the expenses contemplated by Section 4.1 of the Settlement Agreement as amended by Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement; (2) the sums contemplated by Section 5.2 of the Settlement Agreement as amended by Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement; and (3) the payments contemplated by Section 7.9 of the Settlement Agreement as amended by Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement. The escrow agents are authorized to make payments without Court approval of up to $3 million for the purposes of funding CRT or CRT-SD functions under the settlement; additional amounts may be disbursed by the escrow agents to fund CRT or CRT-SD functions upon application to the Court, and within the Court's discretion, after hearing objections, if any, from any party.

It is also the intent and agreement of the parties that payments made or contemplated to be made pursuant to Section 5.3 of the Settlement Agreement as well as payments of deposited assets claims deemed sufficiently well documented shall be made promptly from the Settlement Fund or the Escrow Fund, upon Court approval, without regard to any provisions in the Settlement Agreement or in Amendment No. 2 referring or relating to the "Settlement Date" or the "Final Judgment and Order."

E. Having reviewed this memorandum, pursuant to which the defendant banks are acting in accordance with the substance of the ICEP's recommendations, Judge Korman has advised the parties that he will approve this aspect of the settlement.

INITIAL QUESTIONNAIRE

INSTRUCTIONS

THIS QUESTIONNAIRE IS FOR INFORMATION PURPOSES ONLY. COMPLETION OF THIS QUESTIONNAIRE DOES NOT AUTOMATICALLY ENTITLE YOU TO RECEIVE PAYMENTS FROM THE SETTLEMENT FUND.

This Initial Questionnaire is for information purposes only, to let us know the address at which we can mail you future notices regarding any claims process, and to give us information about your particular circumstances. Completion of this questionnaire does not entitle you to any Settlement funds.

Because no Plan of Allocation has yet been adopted, there is not yet a claims process relating to this Settlement. We expect a claims process to commence next year (2000). This is not a claim form, although the information you provide may affect the amount of money you may receive from the Settlement Fund, if any.

It is important that you provide answers that are as complete and accurate as possible, though you need not worry if you cannot answer every question. We recognize that this information is over 50 years old, and that you may not know or may have forgotten some names and dates. You may complete this Questionnaire, even if you are the heir of a Holocaust victim, or if you no longer have documents.

You should complete and return this Initial Questionnaire if you think you are or may be a member of one of the Settlement Classes. Where copies of documents are requested in the Initial Questionnaire, you should send photocopies of the documents. Do NOT send the original documents.

IN ORDER TO BE CERTAIN OF BEING CONSIDERED FOR A SHARE IN THE SETTLEMENT FUND, YOU MUST, BY NO LATER THAN OCTOBER 22, 1999, EITHER RETURN THE INITIAL QUESTIONNAIRE OR SEND A LETTER TO THE FOLLOWING ADDRESS ASKING FOR FURTHER NOTICE OF THE PLAN OF ALLOCATION.

If you have any questions about how to fill out the Initial Questionnaire, you should contact a local community organization. They will be able to direct you to a person in your locality who will be able to help you.

When you return the Initial Questionnaire, we will send you a postcard within one month to let you know that we have received it. If we have questions, or need additional information, we will contact you by letter. Consequently, if you change your address, please let the Notice Administrator know by sending a signed letter to the same address that you sent the Initial Questionnaire. If you do not keep the Notice Administrator apprised of your new address, you may not receive further notices or communications.

The information you provide in response to this questionnaire will be kept confidential.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

IN RE HOLOCAUST VICTIM ASSETS LITIGATION	Master Docket No. CV-96-4849 (ERK) (MDG) (Consolidated with CV-96-5161 and CV-97-461)

NOTICE OF PENDENCY OF CLASS ACTION AND PROPOSED SETTLEMENT AND HEARING; INITIAL QUESTIONNAIRE

To: All persons or entities (and their heirs or successors) who were persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime during World War II because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, Homosexual, or Physically or Mentally Disabled or Handicapped, AND who:

1. Had assets (including such things as bank accounts, securities and safe deposit box contents), on deposit with any Swiss bank, investment fund, or other custodian, prior to May 9, 1945, (Deposited Assets Class), or

2. May have claims against Swiss entities relating to assets that were looted or taken by the Nazi Regime, or relating to "Cloaked Assets," which are assets disguised by a Swiss entity for the benefit of an Axis company or entity or person associated with the Nazi Regime, between 1933 and 1946 (Looted Assets Class), or

3. Performed Slave Labor for entities that may have deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with or transacted that profit through Swiss entities (Slave Labor Class I), or

4. Unsuccessfully sought entry into Switzerland to avoid Nazi persecution, or after gaining entry, were deported or mistreated, and may have related claims against any Swiss entity (Refugee Class).

And To: All persons (and their heirs), whether or not a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, who performed Slave Labor in any facility or work site, wherever located, owned, controlled or operated by any Swiss entity (Slave Labor Class II).

This notice contains important information about rights you may have under a proposed $1.25 billion (U.S. dollars) Settlement of a class action lawsuit against private Swiss banks and other Swiss entities for their alleged conduct related to World War II and the Holocaust. This Notice provides information regarding the class action lawsuit, the proposed Settlement, how to determine if you are a member of the Settlement Classes, steps that will be taken to distribute the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund, and what you can do if you wish to comment on, exclude yourself from, or participate in the Settlement. An Initial Questionnaire is also attached, although the claims program will not begin unless and until the Settlement is finally approved, and until after the Court has adopted a Plan of Allocation, as described below.

Even if you are not sure whether you are a member of one or more of the Settlement Classes, you should still read this Notice, and follow procedures described below for preserving your rights, commenting on the Settlement, and getting claims information. For example, you may have performed Slave Labor, but you may not know whether profits from that labor were deposited in or transacted through a Swiss entity. You should still consider yourself to be a member of the Settlement Classes.

If, after reading this Notice, you want more information, see Question 22, below.

THIS NOTICE ANSWERS THE FOLLOWING QUESTIONS:

1. What is this litigation about?

2. Did the Court decide any of Plaintiffs' claims?

3. Am I a member of one or more of the Settlement Classes?

4. What is a "class action" lawsuit?

5. What is a "settlement"?

6. Who are the Class Representatives and Class Counsel in this "class action"?

7. What are the basic monetary terms of the proposed Settlement?

8. How will the Settlement money be distributed?

9. Are any other defendants involved in this Settlement besides Swiss banks?

10. What Claims are released under the Settlement?

11. Does this Settlement affect other World War II-era claims, such as claims against companies that employed Slave Labor, insurance companies, and other banks?

12. How did the lawyers and class representatives determine the Settlement Amount?

13. What do I have to do now if I want to participate in the Settlement?

14. How much will I recover if I participate in the Settlement? When will I receive payment from the Settlement Fund?

15. When will I get a claim form? What proofs will I need when I file my claim form?

16. Will my claim information be kept confidential?

17. Will I have to pay attorneys' fees and costs?

18. What do I do if I want to exclude myself from the Settlement Classes?

19. What happens next?

20. When will the funds be paid?

21. How does the $1.25 billion Settlement fund relate to other Holocaust compensation programs?

22. How can I get more information? — What if I have questions? — Where do I send my Initial Questionnaire?— Where do I mail other types of documents?

For purposes of this Notice, certain terms have been given special meanings, which are precisely defined in the Settlement Agreement that is summarized in this Notice. You may obtain a copy of the Settlement Agreement by writing to the Notice Administrator at the address listed in response to Question 22, below. A glossary defining these terms is attached to this Notice.

The "Settling Defendants" include Credit Suisse and UBS AG (as successor to Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation) and each of their former and current corporate parents, subsidiaries, affiliates, and branches, predecessors, successors, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, and personal representatives. These Settling Defendants have agreed to pay $1.25 billion to resolve claims against them, against all other Swiss banks, and against all other Swiss entities ("Releasees," defined below) under the terms described in this Notice and in the Settlement Agreement. In this Notice, the Settling Defendants are sometimes referred to as the "Defendants" or "Swiss Banks."

1. What Is This Litigation About?

In the Fall of 1996, Plaintiffs initiated lawsuits in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, which were assigned to the Hon. Edward R. Korman (the "Court"), and which were consolidated into a single proceeding titled In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, Master Docket No. CV-96-4849. The suits named Credit Suisse, the Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation as defendants. The Plaintiffs alleged that the Swiss Banks (1) collaborated with the National Socialist government of Germany from 1933 through 1945, and its instrumentalities, agents and allies (the "Nazi Regime") and participated in a scheme to (a) unlawfully retain Class members' accounts deposited prior to and during the Second World War; (b) accept for deposit, transfer, or exchange, assets looted by the Nazi Regime; and (c) engage in transactions involving the profits of companies that used Slave Labor; and (2) concealed the true nature and scope of their conduct. More specifically, the Plaintiffs claimed that, from 1933 to 1945:

- the Defendants accepted deposits of assets ("Deposited Assets") from Class members, did not return these assets to their rightful owners at the close of the War, and then denied the assets existed;

- the Defendants accepted personal, commercial, real, and/or intangible property, including cash, securities, gold, jewelry, businesses, art, and other items that had been looted, confiscated or stolen from Class members ("Looted Assets");

- the Defendants assisted German companies during the war by disguising or "cloaking" their assets ("Cloaked Assets" include assets wholly or partly owned by, controlled by, obtained from, or held for the benefit of, any company incorporated, headquartered, or based in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, or any other entity or individual associated with the Nazi Regime, the identity, value, or ownership of which was disguised by any Releasee);

- the Defendants engaged in various transactions with the Nazi Regime and companies using Slave Labor; and

- the Defendants aided and abetted the Nazi Regime's war effort by providing valuable foreign exchange to the Nazi Regime in exchange for Deposited Assets, Looted Assets, and slave labor goods.

On behalf of themselves and all other Class members, the Plaintiffs asserted legal claims for breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, an accounting, unjust enrichment, conversion, and violation of international human rights law. The Plaintiffs sought compensatory damages, equitable and injunctive relief, and punitive damages.

The Defendants filed motions to dismiss the Plaintiffs' complaints based on numerous grounds. Plaintiffs opposed these motions. The Court never ruled on the motions.

The parties have reached a Settlement, under which the Swiss Banks are to pay $1.25 billion, in exchange for which Class Members release their legal claims against the Swiss Banks, as well as all other Swiss business entities, the Swiss National Bank, the Swiss Bankers Association, the Swiss Confederation, and all other Releasees, other than certain claims against certain Swiss insurance companies that are defendants in separate litigation, described below.

2. Did the Court Decide Any of Plaintiffs' Claims?

The Court has not ruled on the merits of any of Plaintiffs' claims.

3. Am I a Member of One or More of the Settlement Classes?

Not all Holocaust victims, survivors, or their heirs are affected by this Settlement. If you are a member of any one (or more) of the five groups described in the paragraphs below, you are a member of the Settlement Classes and therefore affected by the Settlement. As used in this Notice, the term "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution" means any individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped. Also, as used in this Notice, the term "Releasees" includes Swiss entities, such as the Swiss Banks, other Swiss banks, Swiss commercial entities, the Swiss government, and other entities listed in the definition of Releasees described in the answer to Question 9, below.

There are five Settlement Classes. Four of the Classes include Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution who:

1. Had assets (including such things as bank accounts, securities and safe deposit box contents), on deposit in any Swiss bank, investment fund, or other custodian prior to May 9, 1945 (Deposited Assets Class), or

2. May have claims against Swiss entities relating to assets that were looted or taken by the Nazi Regime, or relating to "Cloaked Assets," which are assets disguised by a Swiss entity for the benefit of an Axis company, entity or person associated with the Nazi Regime, between 1933 and 1946 (Looted Assets Class), or

3. Performed slave labor for companies or other entities that may have deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with or transacted such revenues or proceeds through Swiss entities (Slave Labor Class I), or

4. Unsuccessfully sought entry into Switzerland to avoid Nazi persecution, or after gaining entry, were deported or mistreated, and may have related claims against any Swiss entity (Refugee Class).

The fifth Settlement Class consists of all persons, whether or not a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution as previously defined, who were forced to perform slave labor in any facility or work site, wherever located, that was owned, controlled or operated by any Swiss company or other entity (Slave Labor Class II).

All five of these Settlement Classes include heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates and assigns of the persons or entities who are described in the paragraphs above. It is important to know that at this time the methods for establishing proof of class membership have not yet been established. If you are in doubt about proof, yet wish to participate, you should proceed.

If you receive this Notice but you are not a member of one of the Settlement Classes described above, then you need do nothing.

4. What is a "Class Action" Lawsuit?

A "Class Action" is a type of lawsuit where a large group of individuals with common interests and issues (the "Class") join together to enforce their rights in court. The people who file the lawsuit are called the "Plaintiffs." The persons or entities against which the lawsuit is filed are called "Defendants."

This Settlement resolves four different class action lawsuits, all of which were filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York against Settling Defendants, and consolidated into a single proceeding, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, Master Docket No. CV-96-4849 (ERK). The Settlement provides for the dismissal of two related class action lawsuits: one in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California (Markovicova, et al. v. Swiss Bank Corporation, et al., Case No. C98-02924 MMC); and the second in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia against the Swiss National Bank (Rosenberg, et al. v. Swiss National Bank, Civil Action No. 1:98 CV 01647).

5. What is a "Settlement"?

A "Settlement" is an agreement by which parties in a legal dispute agree to a compromise to resolve and end their legal differences, and to forever end the litigation. Here, a Settlement has been reached in the Class Action Litigation. The Settlement was set forth in a document called the "Settlement Agreement." A copy of the Settlement Agreement may be obtained by writing to the address listed in the answer to Question 22, below.

6. Who Are the Class Representatives and Class Counsel in this "Class Action"?

The following "Class Representatives" have been appointed by the Court to represent the interests of the members of the Settlement Classes: Elizabeth Trilling-Grotch, Lillie Ryba, Jacob Friedman, Charles Sonabend, David Boruchowicz, Joshua Lustmann, Miriam Stern, the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities, Inc., and the World Jewish Restitution Organization. These Class Representatives represent each of the five Settlement Classes.

The Court has appointed the following attorneys and firms to represent the Class as Settlement Class Counsel: Michael Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll PLLC; Melvyn Weiss of Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach LLP; Robert Lieff of Lieff, Cabraser, Heimann & Bernstein LLP; Irwin Levin of Cohen & Malad, PC; Robert Swift of Kohn, Swift & Graf, PC; Professor Burt Neuborne of New York University Law School; Edward Fagan of Fagan & D'Avino; Stephen Whinston of Berger & Montague, PC; Mel Urbach of the Law Offices of Mel Urbach; Arnold Levin of Levin, Fishbein, Sedran & Berman; Martin Mendelsohn of Verner, Liipfert, Bernhard, McPherson and Hand, Chartered; and Stanley Chesley of Waite, Schneider, Bayless & Chesley Co., LPA.

Depending upon the nature of your correspondence, you may contact Settlement Class Counsel by writing to one of the P.O. boxes, or by accessing the Internet site listed in the answer to Question 22, below.

7. What are the Basic Monetary Terms of the Proposed Settlement?

The proposed Settlement creates a fund in the principal amount of $1.25 billion (U.S.), plus any interest that accrues on the fund prior to distribution. The Settling Defendants must pay the Settlement amount of $1.25 billion (U.S.) in four installments:

- On November 23, 1998, Settling Defendants paid $250 million into an Escrow Fund;
- Settling Defendants must pay an additional $333 million on November 23, 1999;
- Settling Defendants must pay an additional $333 million on November 23, 2000; and
- Settling Defendants must pay an additional $334 million on November 23, 2001.

Under certain limited circumstances, the Settling Defendants may be required to accelerate payments of portions of the amounts due.

All amounts paid to certain persons and entities as a result of determinations made by the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (also known as the "ICEP" and commonly referred to as the "Volcker Commission"), the Independent Claims Resolution Foundation, and the Claims Resolution Tribunal, or otherwise to discharge Claims, are to be credited against the scheduled installments.

8. How Will the Settlement Money be Distributed?

No claims process or Plan of Allocation has yet been established. In March 1999, the Court appointed Judah Gribetz to serve as a Special Master. The Special Master will develop a proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of the Settlement Fund, employing open and equitable procedures to ensure fair consideration of all proposals for allocation and distribution. Settlement Class Members will have an opportunity to comment on the Plan, and may now offer suggestions to the Special Master. The proposed Plan of Allocation must be approved by the Court before the Settlement Fund may be distributed. The Court-approved Plan will then be implemented under the Court's supervision. The Special Master will also be charged with recommending to the Court where residual funds, if any, remaining after the distribution to all eligible members of the Class and payment of all costs and fees approved by the Court, should be distributed.

You may submit your suggestions to the Special Master by writing to the address listed in the answer to Question 22, below.

If you wish to make a claim in this Settlement, then to ensure you receive notice of the Plan of Allocation and claims-filing process, you must either (a) complete and return the attached Initial Questionnaire, or (b) write to the address listed in the answer to Question 22, below, and specifically indicate that you wish to receive notice of the terms of the Plan of Allocation. If you do not either submit an Initial Questionnaire or request further notice of the Plan of Allocation, you will not be mailed notice of the terms of the Plan of Allocation, and may not be able to file a claim.

9. Are Any Other Defendants Involved in this Settlement Besides the Defendant Banks?

In addition to resolving claims against the Settling Defendants, all Settlement Class members agree to release their Claims against the following "Releasees": the Settling Defendants; the Swiss National Bank; all Other Swiss Banks; the Swiss Bankers Association; the Swiss Confederation (including, without limitation, the Cantons, and all other political subdivisions and governmental instrumentalities in Switzerland); all business concerns (whether organized as corporations or otherwise) headquartered, organized, or incorporated in Switzerland as of October 3, 1996, including, without limitation, corporations incorporated in Switzerland that are owned, operated, or controlled directly or indirectly by corporations located outside Switzerland ("the Swiss-based Concerns") and their branches and offices, wherever located; and all affiliates of any Swiss-based Concern (whether organized as corporations, partnerships, sole proprietorships or otherwise) wherever headquartered, organized or incorporated in which the Swiss-based Concern owns or controls directly or indirectly at least twenty-five percent of any class of voting securities or controls in any manner the election or appointment of a majority of the board of directors, trustees, or similar body ("Owned or Controlled Affiliates").

As to each of the foregoing Releasees, the term "Releasees" also includes, without limitation, each of its predecessors, successors, assigns, officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, heirs, executors, administrators, and personal representatives wherever located. The term "Releasees" excludes Basler Lebensversicherungs- Gesellschaft, Zürich Lebensversicherungs-Gesellschaft, and Winterthur Lebensversicherungs-Gesellschaft, and their subsidiaries in the insurance business, but only to the extent of insurance claims of the type asserted in Cornell, et al. v. Assicurazioni Generali, S.d.A., et al., 97 Civ. 2262 (S.D.N.Y.). The term "Releasees" also excludes parent companies and other affiliates of Swiss-based Concerns that (1) before 1945 were headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, (2) were not Owned or Controlled Affiliates, as defined above, and (3) disguised the identity, value, or ownership of Cloaked Assets or used Slave Labor. A company shall not be deemed a Releasee by virtue of being an Owned or Controlled Affiliate if (1) the company was headquartered, based, or incorporated in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946, and (2) the company's parent was a Swiss-based Concern established for the sole purpose of disguising the identity, value, or ownership of Cloaked Assets.

10. What Claims Are Released Under The Settlement?

By participating in this Settlement and remaining members of the Settlement Classes, Settlement Class Members agree to waive all legal rights with respect to Releasees in exchange for the $1.25 billion settlement amount, with respect to all "Claims," which includes all actions, claims, obligations, losses, expenses, damages, and agreements of any nature and demands whatsoever from the beginning of time to now and any time in the future relating to facts occurring on or before the date of the Settlement Agreement (January 26, 1999), whether class or individual, under any international, national, state, provincial, or municipal law, whether now accrued or asserted or hereafter arising or discovered, that may be, may have been, could have been or could be brought in any jurisdiction before any court, arbitral tribunal, or similar body against any Releasee, in connection with any act or omission in any way relating to the Holocaust, World War II, and its prelude and aftermath, Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, transactions with or actions of the Nazi regime, treatment of refuges fleeing Nazi persecution by the Swiss Confederation or other Releasees, or any related cause or thing whatever, including without limitation all claims relating to Deposited Assets, Looted Assets, Cloaked Assets, and/or Slave Labor, or any prior or future effort to recover on such claims directly or indirectly from any Releasee.

The Settlement Class Members also irrevocably and unconditionally release and discharge the ICEP, the ICRF, the Claims Resolution Tribunal and the Secretariat of the Claims Resolution Tribunal, as well as their respective officers, directors, employees, agents, attorneys, and contractors (including, without limitation, arbitrators and audit firms), from any and all liability, claims, causes of action, arising out of or in any way associated with these entities' and individuals' activities relating to the investigation of Claims.

The foregoing releases apply irrespective of whether any Settlement Class member receives a distribution from the Settlement Fund. Settling Class members covenant not to sue Releasees or initiate any form of proceeding seeking redress of any kind for any Claim covered by this Settlement Agreement in any judicial, administrative, or other proceeding anywhere in the world at any time, other than to enforce the Settlement Agreement, and consent to immediate dismissal with prejudice of any proceeding brought in violation of this provision.

11. Does This Class Action Settlement Affect Other World War II-era Claims, such as Claims Against Companies That Employed Slave Labor, Insurance Companies, and Other Banks?

This Class Action Settlement releases all Settlement Class Member Claims but only insofar as those Claims concern the Releasees. This Class Action Settlement does not address any other Holocaust or World War II-related claims relating to non-Swiss and/or non-Swiss-affiliated banks or other companies, including claims against non-Swiss and non-Swiss-affiliated banks, insurance companies, and manufacturers that employed Slave Labor or otherwise assisted in the Nazi Regime's war effort. The Settlement Agreement precisely defines the scope of the release.

12. How Did the Lawyers and Class Representatives Determine the Settlement Amount?

After World War II, Jewish organizations began working to secure restitution of, and compensation for, Jewish property throughout Europe and in Switzerland. In 1995, when the specific issue of dormant Swiss bank accounts containing unclaimed assets of Holocaust victims came under public scrutiny, the WJRO reinitiated formal discussion with the Swiss regarding restitution issues. Such negotiations led to, among other things, the creation of the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ("ICEP") and the Independent Commission of Experts ("ICE"). The ICEP, chaired by Paul A. Volcker, was established in May, 1996 by the Swiss Bankers' Association, the World Jewish Congress, and other Jewish organizations to conduct an independent audit of Settling Defendants and Other Swiss Banks to identify accounts from the World War II era that could possibly belong to Victims of Nazi Persecution. The ICE, in turn, is an independent group of internationally recognized historians, chaired by Jean Francois Bergier, which the Swiss Confederation established in 1996 to examine Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany.

The litigation was commenced by plaintiffs in 1996. Settlement Class Counsel, the WJRO, and others, including the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities, investigated the claims and the underlying events and transactions alleged in the Complaints, including: (1) reviewing thousands of pages of documents obtained from public information sources and through other, informal means; (2) interviewing hundreds of Class Members; (3) consulting with experts; (4) researching and analyzing applicable law with respect to the Class claims and the Defendants' defenses; (5) reviewing and analyzing the report produced by ICE; and (6) reviewing and analyzing the reports prepared under the auspices of Stuart Eizenstat, United States Undersecretary of Commerce for International Trade, and by William Z. Slany, an historian for the United States Department of State, with the participation of various federal government agencies and the United States Holocaust Museum. Settlement Class Counsel, the WJRO, and the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities conferred with survivors and survivor representatives, and participated in Court-supervised settlement discussions, mediated in part by United States Under Secretary of State Stuart Eizenstat. The Settlement is the result of more than a year of arms-length negotiations.

You should evaluate the terms of the Settlement, and the risks and costs of continued litigation, and decide for yourself whether you think the Settlement is fair and reasonable, and whether you wish to remain a member of the Settlement Class.

13. What Do I Have to Do Now If I Want to Participate in the Settlement?

If you are a member of one or more of the Settlement Classes, and you wish to participate in the Settlement, then to ensure you receive notice of the Plan of Allocation and claims filing process, you must either (a) mail a written request to receive such notice to the address listed in response to Question 22 below, or (b) complete and return the attached Initial Questionnaire. The Initial Questionnaire will not be utilized for purposes of determining distribution amounts until after a Plan of Allocation is adopted by the Court. By filling out the Initial Questionnaire, accordingly, you are not necessarily entitled to any funds, unless and until such an entitlement is established by the Plan of Allocation adopted by the Court. You will automatically receive written notice of the terms of the Plan of Allocation if you submit an Initial Questionnaire that includes your correct address for mailing.

Please notify the Notice Administrator at the address listed in response to Question 22 below, of any change of address.

As long as you do not submit a written request for exclusion, you will remain a member of the Settlement Classes, and will be bound by the Settlement regardless of whether you request further notice of the Plan of Allocation, and regardless of whether you make a claim, or receive a distribution from the Settlement Fund.

14. How Much Will I Recover If I Participate in the Settlement? When Will I Receive Payment From the Settlement Fund?

Each individual award will be based on factors to be recommended by the Special Master and approved by the Court after the Settlement is finally approved by the Court. At this time, the threshold issue that must be decided by the Court is whether the $1.25 billion-settlement amount is fair and reasonable.

No Plan of Allocation will be developed or available for your review prior to the date on which you must decide whether to exclude yourself from or comment upon the Settlement. Not all Settlement Class Members will necessarily receive an allocation from the Settlement Fund; it is not possible at this time to estimate what, if anything, you will receive because the Plan of Allocation does not exist yet. A Plan of Allocation will not be submitted for public comment unless and until the Court finally approves the $1.25 billion Settlement Amount.

It is expected that, if the Settlement is granted final approval, the Special Master will quickly present a recommended Plan of Allocation. The Court will then adopt a final Plan of Allocation, pursuant to which the Settlement Amount will be swiftly disbursed.

15. When Will I Get a Claim Form? What Proofs Will I Need When I File My Claim Form?

An Initial Questionnaire is attached to this Notice. If you wish to make a claim in this Settlement, then to ensure you receive notice of the Plan of Allocation and claims-filing process, you must either (a) complete and return the attached Initial Questionnaire, or (b) write to the address listed in the answer to Question 22, below, and specifically indicate that you wish to receive notice of the terms of the Plan of Allocation. If you do not either submit an Initial Questionnaire or request further notice of the Plan of Allocation, you will not be mailed notice of the terms of the Plan of Allocation, and may not be able to file a claim.

Because no Plan of Allocation has yet been established, we do not yet know what, if any, proof will be required to support claims by members of the Settlement Classes for a portion of the Settlement Fund. The Plan of Allocation will not be presented to the Court unless and until the $1.25 (U.S.) billion Settlement Amount is granted final approval, on or after November 29, 1999; accordingly, no final determination on the claims process will be made until after that date.

16. Will My Claim Information Be Kept Confidential?

The confidentiality of information you submit in support of your claim will be maintained, though Defendants will be provided copies of Proof of Claim forms.

17. Will I Have to Pay Attorneys' Fees and Costs?

Class members are not personally liable for Court-appointed plaintiffs' attorneys' fees and costs. Although you may retain your own lawyer at your own expense, you do not need to use the services of a lawyer to participate in or exclude yourself from this Settlement. You need only follow the procedures described in this Notice.

"Plaintiffs' Counsel" includes all plaintiffs' counsel of record in In re Holocaust Victims Assets Litigation, Master Docket No. CV-96-4849 (E.D.N.Y.); Markovicova, et al. v. Swiss Bank Corporation, et al., Case No. C98-02924 (N.D. Cal.); and Rosenberg, et al. v. Swiss National Bank, Civil Action No. 1:98 CV 01647 (District of Columbia), except counsel for the WJRO.

At the "Fairness Hearing" (described below), all of the Court-appointed Plaintiffs' Counsel will apply to the Court to be reimbursed for their costs, in an amount not to exceed approximately 0.2% of the Settlement Fund, or $2.5 (U.S.) million. The majority of Plaintiffs' Counsel will not apply for an award of fees. Certain Plaintiffs' Counsel will apply to the Court for an award of fees up to a total amount of 1.8% of the Settlement Fund, or $22.5 (U.S.) million. The Court has the discretion to award a lower amount, after considering the fee applications made by those Plaintiffs' Counsel who will apply for fees.

Counsel for the WJRO, who are working pro bono, will not seek reimbursement for its costs, and will not apply for an award of fees.

18. What Do I Do If I Want to Exclude Myself From the Settlement Classes?

If you do not wish to be included in the Class and you do not wish to participate in the proposed Settlement, you must individually and personally request to be excluded in writing by October 22, 1999. To request exclusion you must write a letter that states (1) the name of this Litigation (Swiss Banks); (2) your name; (3) your address; (4) and that you do not want to participate in the Settlement. The exclusion request must be personally signed by you and mailed to the address listed in Section 22, below.

No request for exclusion will be considered valid unless all the information described above is included and the request is postmarked by October 22, 1999.

If you validly request exclusion from the Class: (a) you will be excluded from the Class; (b) YOU WILL NOT BE ELIGIBLE TO SHARE IN THE PROCEEDS OF THE SETTLEMENT; (c) you will not be bound by any judgment entered in the Litigation; and (d) you will not be precluded from otherwise prosecuting an individual claim, if timely, against the Settling Defendants based on the matters complained of in the Litigation.

19. What Happens Next?

A Fairness Hearing will be held on November 29, 1999 at 10:00 A.M. EST before the Hon. Edward R. Korman at the United States District Courthouse, United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, 225 Cadman Plaza East, Brooklyn, NY 11201 (the "Fairness Hearing"). At that time, the Court will determine (1) whether the proposed Settlement consisting of a principal sum of $1.25 billion, plus accrued interest, is fair, reasonable, adequate, and in the best interest of the Class; (2) whether Class Counsel's request for attorneys' fees, expenses and costs of notice and administration should be approved; and (3) whether the Litigation should be dismissed with prejudice. The Court may adjourn or continue the Fairness Hearing without further notice to the Class. You do not need to attend the hearing in order to participate in or comment upon the Settlement, or to exclude yourself from the Settlement Class.

Any Class member who has not requested exclusion may (but need not) appear at the Fairness Hearing in person or through Counsel to address why the proposed Settlement should or should not be approved, and to comment on or object to the application of Class Counsel for attorneys' fees, costs, and expenses; provided, however, that no such person shall be heard unless his or her objection or opposition is made in writing and is filed, together with copies of all other papers and briefs to be presented by him or her to the Court at the Fairness Hearing, no later than October 22, 1999, and mailed to the address listed in response to Question 22 below.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Court, any member of the Settlement Class who does not make his or her objection or opposition in the manner provided shall be deemed to have waived all such objections.

20. When Will the Funds Be Paid?

The Settlement is conditioned on the occurrence of certain events. Those events include the Court's approval of the Settlement at the Fairness Hearing, and entry of Final Order and Judgment by the Court, as provided in the Settlement Agreement. If, for any reason, any one of the conditions described in the Settlement Agreement is not met, the Settlement Agreement might be terminated, and if terminated, will become null and void.

If the Settlement Agreement is granted final approval, then the Special Master will recommend a Plan of Allocation for the Settlement Fund. Persons who complete an Initial Questionnaire or write to request such notice will be mailed a notice of the Plan of Allocation proposed by the Special Master. The Court will then hold a hearing on whether to approve the proposed Plan of Allocation or a variation of it. After a Plan of Allocation is adopted by the Court, the claims and distribution procedures set forth in the plan will be swiftly implemented. We hope that distribution of funds will commence as early as the first part of the year 2000.

21. How Does the $1.25 Billion Settlement Fund Relate to Other Holocaust Compensation Programs?

This Settlement is different from and unrelated to the Swiss Humanitarian Fund, or other restitution or compensation programs in Germany or elsewhere.

22. How Can I Get More Information? — What If I Have Questions? — Where do I Send My Initial Claim Form? — Where Do I Mail Other Types of Documents?

This notice contains only a summary of the terms of the proposed Settlement. For more detailed information regarding this Litigation, members of the Class may inspect the Settlement Agreement, and all other papers filed in this action, at the Office of the Clerk, United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Instruction Sheet

In completing the Claim Form, please either type or print clearly in capital letters, using either blue or black ball point pen. Your Claim Form must be sent to the:

Claims Registration Office
Claims Resolution Tribunal
P.O. Box 2666
JAF Station
New York, NY 10116-2666
U.S.A.

within 6 months of the date of publication of the 2001 List.

PART 1: CLAIMANT INFORMATION

1. Personal Information

Please fill out this section completely and accurately; otherwise the Tribunal may not be able to contact you about your claim.

Please note that the Tribunal does not generally communicate via e-mail, but would like to have an e-mail address on file in case we are unable to reach you at the postal address you have provided.

2. Alternate Contact Information

In the event that the Tribunal is unable to reach you, please provide details regarding someone else we could contact. The Tribunal will not consider this person as your legal or other representative and will not provide this person with any documentation relating to your claim. However, if this contact person is your legal or other representative, you do not need to complete this section and you should instead fill out Question 29 of this Claim Form.

3. Family Member Information

If you are representing any other family members, please provide the requested details about each family member you are representing. Please note that if you are representing other family members, these relatives will be considered Claimants to the Account and their entitlement to a portion of the assets will be considered. However, the Tribunal will only correspond with you on matters regarding the claims.

Please indicate how you are related to the family member(s) you are representing. If you are the niece of this person, please state "I am the niece" or "This family member is my aunt".

Please note that each family member you are representing must sign and submit a completed Power of Attorney authorizing you to represent them and to act on their behalf. Please use the standard form Power of Attorney provided with this Claim Form and make additional copies, if necessary.

4. Previous Claims You or Your Family Members Have Made to Dormant Assets in Swiss Bank Accounts

a. Please state whether you have submitted an Initial Questionnaire with respect to the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York in 1999. If this is the case, you should already have received a claims packet.

b. Please identify any previous claims to dormant assets in Swiss bank accounts that you or your family members have made to any bank, organization or government body, including the Claims Resolution Tribunal, ATAG Ernst & Young, the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons, the Swiss Banking Ombudsman or the New York Holocaust Claims Processing Office. Please note that ATAG Ernst & Young or the Swiss Bankers Association may have acted as the contact office for your claim.

You do not need to submit this Claim Form for Account Owners whose assets you have previously claimed with the New York Holocaust Claims Processing Office.

5. Other Family Members Submitting Separate Claims to this Account

Please list the names of other family members who have submitted separate claims to the Account of the Account Owner and explain how you are related to that family member. Please note that this question refers to family members who have filed a separate claim and are not represented by you.

PART 2: ACCOUNT OWNER INFORMATION

6. Account You are Claiming

If you wish to submit a claim to more than one Account, you must complete a separate Claim Form for every person whose assets you are claiming and send all the Claim Forms in one envelope. Please submit copies of the relevant supporting documents with each claim.

Published Account Owners

Please identify the Account to which you believe you are entitled by providing the Account Owner's name, city and country as they appear on the list published on February 5, 2001. Simply provide the Account Owner's name if the name of the city and country is not on the published list.

Please note that if the Account Owner's name has been published in different forms, such as A. Smith as well as Ann Smith, you need only submit one Claim Form. Furthermore, if the Account Owner has been published under both her maiden name and married name, you need only submit one Claim Form.

Power of Attorney Holders

If you believe that a person who was published as a Power of Attorney Holder was the rightful owner of an Account, please provide this person's name. You will be asked in Question 10 to state reasons for your belief. For the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the Power of Attorney Holder as the Account Owner.

Non-published Account Owners

If you believe that you or a relative had a Swiss bank account to which you are entitled, but the Account Owner's name does not appear on the published list, please provide the name of the Account Owner and his or her country of residence. Please also state why you believe that the Account Owner had an Account in Switzerland.

7. Name of the Account Owner or Power of Attorney Holder

Please indicate the full name of the Account Owner and any other names he or she may have used, such as nicknames or Hebrew names. If you believe that the Account Owner was known by any other names or officially changed his or her name, please provide any available information or documents demonstrating the Account Owner's use of those other names.

8. Company Account Owner

If the Account Owner was a company, partnership, trust or other legal entity, please complete this section. With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person on whose ownership you base your claim as the Account Owner.

If you believe that you are entitled to such an Account, please give the reasons for your belief.

9. Actual or Beneficial Ownership

In some cases, the actual or beneficial owner of the assets in the Account may not have held the assets in his or her name, but may have deposited the assets through another individual, for example a family member, a friend or a lawyer. In such a case, the person published as the Account Owner was not the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

If you believe that a person published as an Account Owner was not the actual or beneficial owner of the Account, please provide the name of the actual or beneficial owner and his or her place or country of residence and the reasons for your belief. Please see Question 10 if you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder was the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person identified as the actual or beneficial owner in this section as the Account Owner.

10. Information regarding the Power of Attorney Holder

Complete this section only if you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder was the actual owner of the Account.

Please indicate the exact relationship between the person published as the Account Owner and the Power of Attorney Holder (e.g. married, siblings, parent and child, business partners).

Please explain why you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder and not the Account Owner was the rightful owner of the Account.

With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person identified as the Power of Attorney Holder in this section as the Account Owner.

11. General Information about the Account Owner

The Tribunal will need as much information as you can provide about the person you believe is the Account Owner in order to compare your information with the unpublished information about the Account Owner contained in the bank records and with the details provided by other claimants.

If possible, please provide copies of any documents that you may have relating to the Account Owner, for example, correspondence with the Account Owner, samples of the Account Owner's signature, birth, marriage or death certificates, or any other form of identification of the Account Owner. Please do not send originals.

Please provide any information you have about the Account Owner's citizenship and/or nationality. If the Account Owner held more than one citizenship, lost his or her citizenship, or was a national of more than one country, please list each citizenship and/or nationality.

Please indicate the Account Owner's gender. In addition, please provide the dates and places of the Account Owner's marriage. If the Account Owner was married more than once, please also provide this information.

Please indicate the date and place of the Account Owner's birth and death as accurately as possible.

Please provide any information you have about the Account Owner's occupation or profession, including the name or names of any businesses that were owned in whole or in part by the Account Owner. In addition, please provide a description of any such business.

12. Account Owner's Address Information

Please provide any information you have about the cities and/or countries in which you believe the Account Owner lived or worked. Please provide the Tribunal with specific addresses and corresponding dates wherever possible.

Please also state what cities and/or countries you believe the Account Owner emigrated from and immigrated to.

13. Account Owner's Permanent or Temporary Residence in Switzerland

Please state whether the Account Owner gave the bank an address in Switzerland and explain why he or she gave such an address.

14. Account Owner's Connections to Switzerland

Please provide any information you have regarding any other connection that the Account Owner may have had to Switzerland, such as where he or she may have had family, or where he or she may have traveled frequently for business or other reasons.

15. The Tribunal's Jurisdiction

The Tribunal has the authority to resolve claims to Accounts only where it appears that the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi persecution during the years 1933—1945. A Victim or Target of Nazi persecution is defined as an individual who was persecuted or targeted for persecution because he or she was or was believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped. Thus, it is necessary for you to state whether and why you believe that the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi persecution. In addition, it is important that you identify the group to which you believe the Account Owner belonged.

16. Account Owner's Circumstances and Fate

Please provide as much detailed information and any documents you may have relating to the Account Owner's circumstances and fate during the years 1933-1945. If the Account Owner was a company, partnership, trust or other legal entity, please provide information both about the person you believe owned or partly owned this entity, and about the fate of the entity itself.

17. Information Regarding the Account Owner's Representative

If the Account Owner had a lawyer, agent and/or representative who lived in Switzerland or who traveled to Switzerland on the Account Owner's behalf to open the Account, please provide the name of this individual or individuals and any relevant addresses.

18. Your Relationship to the Account Owner

Please indicate your precise relationship to the individual who you believe to be the Account Owner. A claim solely based on the fact that you or your relatives have the same last name as the Account Owner is not sufficient.

19. Spouse of the Account Owner

Please provide information about the Account Owner's spouse, including maiden name, if applicable. If the Account Owner was married more than once, please provide such information about each spouse. Please also provide the address of the Account Owner's spouse if it was different from the Account Owner's.

20. Father of the Account Owner

Please provide the full name of the Account Owner's father.

21. Mother of the Account Owner

Please provide the full name of the Account Owner's mother.

22. Children of the Account Owner

This section seeks information about biological and lawfully adopted children of the Account Owner. If you are a child of the Account Owner, you do not need to provide information about yourself here as such information has already been provided in Question 1.1. However, please provide information about any other children of the Account Owner.

23. Family Tree

To assist the Tribunal in understanding your family structure, please complete the attached Family Tree form or, if you prefer, prepare your own on a separate sheet of paper.

24. Claims Not Based on Familial Relationships

If your claim is not based on your familial relationship to the Account Owner, please indicate whether:

- you were named as a beneficiary in the Account Owner's will, or
- you inherited from someone who was one of the Account Owner's heirs.

25. Testamentary Documents

It would assist the Tribunal if you are able to provide inheritance documents that demonstrate a chain of inheritance from the Account Owner to you. For example, if you were your mother's heir and your mother inherited from the Account Owner, then it would be helpful if you are able to provide inheritance documents with respect to your mother and the Account Owner, and inheritance documents with respect to you and your mother. The Tribunal understands that such documents may not be available in light of the circumstances surrounding the Second World War. However, documents from more recent years may be available.

Please do not provide original documents.

26. Other Supporting Relevant Information

Please provide any other relevant information about the Account Owner that you believe supports your claim of entitlement to the Account Owner's Account.

PART 3: FINAL DETAILS BEFORE SUBMITTING THE CLAIM FORM

27. Language of Proceedings

The Tribunal can communicate with you in English, French, German, Hebrew, and Spanish. Please indicate if you are able to understand correspondence in more than one of the five languages listed above, as this may allow the Tribunal to treat your claim more quickly and efficiently.

Please note that the Tribunal can only accept claims that are submitted in one of the five languages listed above. However, you may include supporting documents (e.g. birth and death certificates, testaments) in their original language. If you have translations readily available, please submit them.

28. List of Supporting Documents Attached to the Claim

Please list and number the documents that you are providing as supporting documentation.

29. Claimant's Representative

If you are being represented by a legal or other representative, please remember that the Power of Attorney form that is attached to the Claim Form must be completed, signed by you, and submitted to the Tribunal with the Claim Form.

30. Agreement to Submit Claim to the Claims Resolution Tribunal

The decisions of the Tribunal may be made public. However, if you request confidential treatment, your decision will be published without disclosing your identity. Please note that some of the information you provide in this Claim Form may be shared with other claimants in the course of the proceedings. Additionally, a copy of the final decision relating to the Account will be provided to the bank which held the Account.

Please remember that you must sign the Claim Form. If you are being represented by a legal or other representative, your representative may sign for you. If the Tribunal receives an unsigned Claim Form, it will not be able to treat your claim.

31. Review and Checklist

This section is a checklist for you to verify that you have fully completed the Claim Form and submitted all the documents that you wish the Tribunal to review.

Claim Form

On 5 February 2001, a list was published giving the name and the city and country of residence, where known, of persons who opened or owned bank accounts in Switzerland in the period 1933—45 and who may have been Victims or Targets of Nazi/Axis persecution. This Claim Form provides you with an opportunity to file a claim where you believe that you should be considered the rightful owner of all or part of a listed account and where you believe that the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi/Axis persecution.

If you believe that you are entitled to a Swiss account that was opened or owned in the period 1933—45 and it does not appear on the list, but you believe it belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi/Axis Persecution, you may also submit this Claim Form.

The Claim Form has been designed to assist you in providing the information needed by the Tribunal to ensure that your claim is decided fairly and expeditiously. Please review the attached instruction sheet as it will help you to fill out this Claim Form correctly. Before completing this Claim Form, please note the following:

▶ The Tribunal may consider your claim only if you are claiming that the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution because he or she was or was believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped.

▶ You cannot claim an Account on the basis of a relationship to a person who only held a Power of Attorney from the Account Owner, because, under Swiss Law, the Power of Attorney Holder is not considered to be the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

▶ The mere fact that your family and an Account Owner named in the list of Accounts share the same last name is not enough to support a claim to an Account.

▶ You do not need to complete and submit this Claim Form for Account Owners for whose assets you have previously filed a claim with the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO).

▶ You must fill out this Claim Form as completely as possible.

▶ You should complete this Claim Form by typing or printing clearly in block capital letters.

▶ Please submit this Claim Form to the Claims Registration Office, Claims Resolution Tribunal, P.O. Box 2666, JAF Station, New York, NY 10116-2666, U.S.A.

▶ Claims must be submitted via mail only. The Tribunal will not consider claims submitted via e-mail or fax.

▶ The deadline for submitting a claim is 6 months from the date of publication of the 2001 List.

▶ You must sign your Claim Form. An unsigned Claim Form will be returned to you.

NOTE: With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the person identified in question 8 as the Account Owner.

9. Do you have reason to believe that the person published as the Account Owner was NOT the actual or beneficial owner of the Account, but rather opened the Account on behalf of someone related to you?

☐ YES ☐ NO

Actual or Beneficial Owner Details

Title | Last Name | Maiden Name

First Name | Middle Name(s)

Please list variations of Last Name.

Please list variations of First Name.

Please explain why you believe this person was the actual or beneficial owner of the Account:

NOTE: With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the person identified in Question 9 as the Account Owner.

10. If the person who you think was the rightful owner of an Account is listed as a Power of Attorney Holder on the 2001 List, please answer the following questions:

NOTE: Power of Attorney Holders are listed in italics on the 2001 List.

Please note that under Swiss law, the Power of Attorney Holder is not considered to be the owner of the Account. The Power of Attorney Holder may have had the right to access and use the funds in the Account during his or her lifetime. However, once the Power of Attorney Holder dies, his or her rights no longer exist and they do not pass to his or her heirs.
Therefore, you cannot claim an Account solely on the basis of a relationship to a Power of Attorney Holder. If you are claiming an Account on the basis of a relationship to the Power of Attorney Holder, you have to provide additional information as to why, in this particular case, the Power of Attorney Holder himself or herself was entitled to the assets in the Account.

Please state precisely how the Power of Attorney Holder is related to the Account Owner on the 2001 List:

If you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder rather than the published Account Owner was the rightful owner of the Account, please provide detailed information:

_____

_____

Instruction Sheet

In completing the Claim Form, please either type or print clearly in capital letters, using either blue or black ball point pen. Your Claim Form must be sent to the:

Claims Registration Office
Claims Resolution Tribunal
P.O. Box 1279 Old Chelsea Station
New York, NY 10113
U.S.A.

Claims may only be submitted for the accounts whose owners' names appear on the list of names published on January 13, 2005 (the "2005 List"), which is on the websites of the Claims Resolution Tribunal ("CRT"), www.crt-ii.org, and the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation (Swiss Banks Settlement), www.swissbankclaims.com. If you are unable to view the 2005 List on those websites, please call the appropriate toll-free number listed in Appendix A of the Information Booklet and at www.crt-ii.org. There is no fee or other charge for filing and processing claims. If you need assistance with the Claim Form, organizations that have volunteered to help claimants are listed in Appendix C of the Information Booklet and at www.crt-ii.org. You must submit your Claim Form within 6 months of the date of publication of the 2005 List. That is, you must submit your Claim Form - which must be postmarked - by the filing deadline of July 13, 2005. You may submit additional documents in support of your claim at a later date, if necessary.

Please check the website of the CRT, www.crt-ii.org, periodically for updates regarding the Swiss Banks Settlement.

PART 1: CLAIMANT INFORMATION

1. Personal Information

Please fill out this section completely and accurately; otherwise the CRT may not be able to contact you about your claim.

Please note that the CRT does not generally communicate via e-mail, but would like to have an e-mail address on file in case we are unable to reach you at the postal address you have provided.

2. Alternate Contact Information

In the event that the CRT is unable to reach you, please provide details regarding someone else we could contact. The CRT will not consider this person as your legal or other representative and will not provide this person with any documentation relating to your claim, unless you identify this contact person as your legal or other representative in Question 29 of this Claim Form.

3. Family Member(s) Information

If you are representing any other family members, please provide the requested details about each family member you are representing. Please note that if you are representing other family members, these relatives will be considered Claimants to the Account and their entitlement to a portion of the assets will be considered. However, the CRT will only correspond with you on matters regarding the claims.

Please indicate how you are related to the family member(s) you are representing. If you are the niece of this person, please state "I am the niece" or "This family member is my aunt."

Please note that each family member you are representing must sign and submit a completed Power of Attorney authorizing you to represent them and to act on their behalf.

Please use the standard Power of Attorney form provided with this Claim Form and make additional copies, if necessary.

4. Previous Claims You or Your Family Members Have Made to Dormant Assets in Swiss Bank Accounts

a. Please state whether you have submitted an Initial Questionnaire with respect to the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York in 1999.

b. Please identify any previous claims to dormant assets in Swiss bank accounts that you or your family members have made to any bank, organization or government body, including the Claims Resolution Tribunal for Dormant Accounts in Switzerland (CRT-I), ATAG Ernst & Young, the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons, the Swiss Banking Ombudsman, 1962 Swiss Federal Survey, the New York Holocaust Claims Processing Office, or previous claims to CRT-II, subsequent to the publication of names of February 1, 2001. Please note that ATAG Ernst & Young or the Swiss Bankers Association may have acted as the contact office for your claim.

You do not need to submit this Claim Form for Account Owners whose assets you have previously claimed with the New York Holocaust Claims Processing Office or with the CRT, subsequent to the publication of names of February 1, 2001.

5. Other Family Members Submitting Separate Claims to this Account

Please list the names of other family members who have submitted separate claims to the Account of the Account Owner and explain how you are related to that family member. Please note that this question refers to family members who have filed a separate claim and are not represented by you.

6. Payments Previously Received

Please provide information about any payment you or any members of your family have received for assets held in Switzerland between the years 1933 and 1945.

PART 2: ACCOUNT OWNER INFORMATION

7. Account You are Claiming

If you wish to submit a claim to more than one Account, you must complete a separate Claim Form for every person whose assets you are claiming and send all the Claim Forms in one envelope. Please submit copies of the relevant supporting documents with each claim.

You may only claim an Account whose owner's name was published on the 2005 List.

Please identify the Account to which you believe you are entitled by providing the Account Owner's name as it appears on the list published on January 13, 2005. Please provide the name as it appears, and other details regarding the name (e.g., title, maiden name, nicknames, variations of name, Hebrew names), in Latin characters.

If you believe that the Account Owner was known by any other names or officially changed his or her name, please provide any available information or documents demonstrating the Account Owner's use of those other names.

Power of Attorney Holders

If you believe that a person who was published as a Power of Attorney Holder was the rightful owner of an Account, please provide this person's name. You will be asked in Question 10 to state reasons for your belief. For the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the Power of Attorney Holder as the Account Owner.

Please note that, under Swiss law, a Power of Attorney Holder is not considered to be the owner of an Account. After a Power of Attorney Holder dies, his or her powers in an Account no longer exist, and they do not pass to his or her heirs. Accordingly, claimants who plausibly identify a Power of Attorney Holder as their relative are not entitled to receive the proceeds of the claimed Account, unless the bank's records indicate that the Power of Attorney Holder and the Account Owner were related.

Non-published Account Owners

If you believe that you or a relative had a Swiss bank account to which you are entitled, but the Account Owner's name does not appear on the published list, you may no longer make a claim.

8. Company Account Owner

If the Account Owner was a company, partnership, trust or other legal entity, please complete this section. With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person on whose ownership you base your claim as the Account Owner. Please provide the name in Latin characters as it appears on the 2005 List.

If you believe that you are entitled to such an Account, please give the reasons for your belief and submit any available documents that support your claim that your relative owned the company and/or is entitled to its Account.

9. Actual or Beneficial Ownership

In some cases, the actual or beneficial owner of the assets in the Account may not have held the assets in his or her name, but may have deposited the assets through another individual, for example a family member, a friend or a lawyer. In such a case, the person published as the Account Owner was not the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

If you believe that a person published as an Account Owner was not the actual or beneficial owner of the Account, please provide the name of the actual or beneficial owner and his or her place or country of residence and the reasons for your belief.

Please see Question 10 if you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder was the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person identified as the actual or beneficial owner in this section as the Account Owner.

10. Information regarding the Power of Attorney Holder

Complete this section only if you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder was the actual owner of the Account.

Please indicate the exact relationship between the person published as the Account Owner and the Power of Attorney Holder (e.g., married, siblings, parent and child, business partners).

Please explain why you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder and not the Account Owner was the rightful owner of the Account. If you are claiming an Account on the basis of a relationship to the Power of Attorney Holder, you must provide additional information as to why, in this particular case, the Power of Attorney Holder was entitled to the assets in the Account. You should also state precisely how the Power of Attorney Holder is related to the Account Holder.

With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please treat the person identified as the Power of Attorney Holder in this section as the Account Owner.

11. General Information about the Account Owner

The CRT will need as much information as you can provide about the person you believe is the Account Owner in order to compare your information with the unpublished information about the Account Owner contained in the bank records and with the details provided by other claimants.

If possible, please provide copies of any documents that you may have relating to the Account Owner, for example, correspondence with the Account Owner, samples of the Account Owner's signature, birth, marriage or death certificates, or any other form of identification of the Account Owner. Specifically, please submit any documents that can demonstrate a link between you (the Claimant) and the name of the Account Owner. Please do not send originals.

Please provide any information you have about the Account Owner's citizenship and/or nationality. If the Account Owner held more than one citizenship, lost his or her citizenship, or was a national of more than one country, please list each citizenship and/or nationality.

Please indicate the Account Owner's gender. In addition, please provide the dates and places of the Account Owner's marriage. If the Account Owner was married more than once, please also provide this information.

Please indicate the date and place of the Account Owner's birth and death as accurately as possible.

Please provide any information you have about the Account Owner's occupation or profession, including the name or names of any businesses that were owned in whole or in part by the Account Owner. In addition, please provide a description of any such business.

12. Account Owner's Address Information

Please provide any information you have about the cities and/or countries in which you believe the Account Owner lived or worked. Please provide the CRT with specific addresses and corresponding dates wherever possible.

Please also state what cities and/or countries you believe the Account Owner emigrated from and immigrated to.

13. Account Owner's Permanent or Temporary Residence in Switzerland

Please state whether the Account Owner may have given the bank an address in Switzerland and explain why he or she gave such an address.

14. Account Owner's Connections to Switzerland

Please provide any information you have regarding any other connection that the Account Owner may have had to Switzerland, such as where he or she may have had family, or where he or she may have traveled frequently for business or other reasons.

15. The CRT's Jurisdiction

The CRT can only decide claims to Accounts that belonged to Victims or Targets of Nazi persecution, as defined in the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended, and that were open or opened during the years 1933—1945. A Victim or Target of Nazi persecution is defined by the Settlement Agreement as an individual who was persecuted or targeted for persecution because he or she was or was believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped. Thus, it is necessary for you to state whether and why you believe that the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi persecution. In addition, it is important that you identify the group to which you believe the Account Owner belonged.

16. Account Owner's Circumstances and Fate

Please provide as much detailed information and any documents you may have relating to the Account Owner's circumstances and fate during the years 1933-1945. If the Account Owner was a company, partnership, trust or other legal entity, please provide information both about the person you believe owned or partly owned this entity, and about the fate of the entity itself.

17. Information Regarding the Account Owner's Representative

If the Account Owner had a lawyer, agent and/or representative who lived in Switzerland or who traveled to Switzerland on the Account Owner's behalf to open the Account, please provide the name of this individual or individuals and any relevant addresses.

18. Your Relationship to the Account Owner

Please indicate your precise relationship to the individual who you believe to be the Account Owner. A claim solely based on the fact that you or your relatives have the same last name as the Account Owner is not sufficient.

19. Spouse of the Account Owner

Please provide information about the Account Owner's spouse, including maiden name, if applicable. If the Account Owner was married more than once, please provide such information about each spouse. Please also provide the address of the Account Owner's spouse if it was different from that of the Account Owner's.

20. Father of the Account Owner

Please provide the full name of the Account Owner's father.

21. Mother of the Account Owner

Please provide the full name of the Account Owner's mother.

22. Children of the Account Owner

This section seeks information about biological and lawfully adopted children of the Account Owner. If you are a child of the Account Owner, you do not need to provide information about yourself here as such information has already been provided in Question 1. However, please provide information about any other children of the Account Owner.

23. Family Tree

To assist the CRT in understanding your family relationships, please complete the attached Family Tree form or, if you prefer, prepare your own on a separate sheet of paper.

24. Claims Not Based on Familial Relationships

If your claim is not based on your familial relationship to the Account Owner, please indicate whether:

– you were named as a beneficiary in the Account Owner's will, or

– you inherited from someone who was one of the Account Owner's heirs.

If you are relying only on a will or other testamentary documents as the basis for your entitlement to an Account, you should include a copy of such documents with your Claim Form.

25. Testamentary Documents

It would assist the CRT if you are able to provide inheritance documents that demonstrate a chain of inheritance from the Account Owner to you. For example, if you were your mother's heir and your mother inherited from the Account Owner, then it would be helpful if you are able to provide inheritance documents with respect to your mother and the Account Owner, and inheritance documents with respect to you and your mother. The CRT understands that such documents may not be available in light of the circumstances surrounding the Second World War. However, documents from more recent years may be available.

Please do not provide original documents.

26. Other Supporting Relevant Information

Please provide any other relevant information about the Account Owner that you believe supports your claim of entitlement to the Account Owner's Account.

PART 3: FINAL DETAILS BEFORE SUBMITTING THE CLAIM FORM

27. Language of Proceedings

The CRT can communicate with you in English, French, German, Hebrew, and Spanish. Please indicate if you are able to understand correspondence in more than one of the five languages listed above, as this may allow the CRT to treat your claim more quickly and efficiently.

Please note that the CRT can only accept claims that are submitted in one of the five languages listed above. However, you may include supporting documents (e.g., birth and death certificates, testaments) in their original language. If you have translations readily available, please submit them.

28. List of Supporting Documents Attached to the Claim

Please list and number the documents that you are providing as supporting documentation. Please note that you must submit your claim form - which must be postmarked - by the filing deadline of July 13, 2005. You may submit additional documents in support of your claim at a later date, if necessary.

29. Claimant's Representative

If you are being represented by a legal or other representative, please remember that the Power of Attorney form that is attached to the Claim Form must be completed, signed by you, and submitted to the CRT with the Claim Form.

30. Agreement to Submit Claim to the Claims Resolution Tribunal

The decisions of the CRT may be made public. However, if you request confidential treatment, your decision will be published without disclosing your identity. Please note that some of the information you provide in this Claim Form may be shared with other claimants in the course of the proceedings.

Additionally, a copy of the final decision relating to the Account will be provided to the bank which held the Account.

Please remember that you must sign the Claim Form. If you are being represented by a legal or other representative, your representative may sign for you. If the CRT receives an unsigned Claim Form, it will not be able to treat your claim.

31. Review and Checklist

This section is a checklist for you to verify that you have fully completed the Claim Form and submitted all the documents that you wish the CRT to review.

YOU MUST SUBMIT YOUR CLAIM FORM – WHICH MUST BE POSTMARKED – BY THE FILING DEADLINE OF JULY 13, 2005. PLEASE BE SURE TO SUBMIT, ALONG WITH YOUR COMPLETED CLAIM FORM, THE ACKNOWLEDGEMENT POSTCARD ON WHICH YOU HAVE WRITTEN YOUR CURRENT ADDRESS.

Claim Form

On January 13, 2005, the Claims Resolution Tribunal (the "CRT") published a list of names of owners and Power of Attorney Holders of Swiss bank accounts that were open or opened between 1933 and 1945 and whose owners were probably or possibly Victims of Nazi persecution (the "2005 List"). The 2005 List is located on the websites of the CRT, www.crt-ii.org, and of the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation (Swiss Banks Settlement), www.swissbankclaims.com. If you are unable to view the 2005 List on those websites, please call the appropriate toll-free number listed in Appendix A of the Information Booklet and at www.crt-ii.org. This Claim Form provides you with an opportunity to file a claim to accounts on the 2005 List to which you may be entitled. Please note that you may only claim an account whose owner's name was included on the 2005 List. Claims to other accounts will not be accepted. If you have previously filed a claim with the CRT and you now want to claim to an account on the 2005 List, you must submit a new claim. There is no fee or other charge for filing and processing claims.

The Claim Form has been designed to assist you in providing the information needed by the CRT to ensure that your claim is decided fairly. Please review the attached Instruction Sheet as it will help you to fill out this Claim Form correctly. Before completing this Claim Form, please note the following:

▶ The CRT may consider your claim only if the Account Owner was a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution because he or she was or was believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped.

▶ You cannot claim an Account on the basis of a relationship to a person who only held a Power of Attorney from the Account Owner, because, under Swiss Law, the Power of Attorney Holder is not considered to be the actual or beneficial owner of the Account.

▶ The mere fact that your family and an Account Owner named in the list of Accounts share the same last name is not enough to support a claim to an Account.

▶ You must fill out this Claim Form as completely as possible. Organizations that will assist individuals with the Claim Forms are listed in Appendix C of the Information Booklet and at www.crt-ii.org.

▶ You should complete this Claim Form by typing or printing clearly in block capital letters.

▶ Please submit your completed Claim Form, along with the Acknowledgment Postcard on which you have provided your current address, to the Claims Registration Office, Claims Resolution Tribunal, P.O. Box 1279 Old Chelsea Station, New York, NY 10113, U.S.A.

▶ Claims must be submitted via mail only. The CRT will not consider claims submitted via e-mail or fax.

▶ The deadline for submitting a claim is 6 months from January 13, 2005, the date of publication of the 2005 List. You must submit your Claim Form by the filing deadline of July 13, 2005, even if you do not have all supporting documents available. Such documents may be submitted to the CRT at a later date, but the Claim Form must be postmarked by July 13, 2005.

▶ You must sign your Claim Form. An unsigned Claim Form will be returned to you.

▶ Please check the website of the CRT, www.crt-ii.org, periodically for updates regarding the Swiss Banks Settlement.

Please list variations of First Name.

Please state why you believe that this person was the beneficial owner of the company, partnership, trust or other legal entity:

NOTE: With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the person identified in question 8 as the Account Owner. Please also attach any documentation you may have that demonstrates that this person owned this entity.

9. Do you have reason to believe that the person published as the Account Owner was NOT the actual or beneficial owner of the Account, but rather opened the Account on behalf of someone related to you?

☐ YES ☐ NO

Actual or Beneficial Owner Details

Title | Last Name | Maiden Name

First Name | Middle Name(s)

Please list variations of Last Name.

Please list variations of First Name.

Please explain why you believe this person was the actual or beneficial owner of the Account:

NOTE: With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the person identified in Question 9 as the Account Owner.

10. If the person who you think was the rightful owner of an Account is listed as a Power of Attorney Holder on the 2005 List, please answer the following questions:

NOTE: Power of Attorney Holders are listed in italics on the 2005 List.

Please note that under Swiss law, the Power of Attorney Holder is not considered to be the owner of the Account. The Power of Attorney Holder may have had the right to access to and use of the funds in the Account during his or her lifetime. However, once the Power of Attorney Holder dies, his or her rights no longer exist and they do not pass to his or her heirs. Therefore, you cannot claim an Account solely on the basis of a relationship to a Power of Attorney Holder. If you are claiming an Account on the basis of a relationship to the Power of Attorney Holder, you must provide additional information as to why, in this particular case, the Power of Attorney Holder himself or herself was entitled to the assets in the Account.

Please state precisely how the Power of Attorney Holder is related to the Account Owner on the 2005 List:

If you believe that the Power of Attorney Holder rather than the published Account Owner was the rightful owner of the Account, please provide detailed information:

NOTE: With respect to all the following questions about the Account Owner, please consider the person identified in Question 10 as the Account Owner.

11. General Information about the Account Owner

Gender: ☐ Male ☐ Female

Date of Birth (day/month/year) Place of Birth

Date of Death (day/month/year) Place of Death

Date of Marriage (day/month/year) Place of Marriage

13. Account Owner's Use of a Swiss Address

Do you know or have reason to believe that the Account Owner gave the bank a Swiss address?

☐ YES

If so, please state why you believe the Account Owner gave the bank a Swiss address and provide all available documents supporting this:

14. Please state whether the Account Owner had any connections to Switzerland (examples may include places where the Account Owner may have had family, or where he or she may have traveled for business or other reasons):

15. Was the Account you are claiming owned by a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution?

Because the CRT can only decide claims to Accounts that belonged to Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, as defined in the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended, and reproduced in the attached Instruction Sheet, it is important that the following sections are completed as thoroughly as possible.

☐ YES

To which of the following targeted or persecuted groups did the Account Owner belong?

☐ Jewish

☐ Romani

☐ Jehovah's Witness

☐ Homosexual

☐ Physically or mentally handicapped

☐ Other, please specify: _____

NOTE: If there were or are additional children, please include all relevant information on separate sheets of paper.

23. Family Tree

To explain the family relationships, please sketch a family tree on the family tree form, which is attached to the Claim Form, or on a separate sheet of paper.

In addition, please provide information and/or copies of any documents that would show that you are related to the Account Owner, such as a passport or other identifying documents; birth certificates; death certificates; marriage certificates; correspondence with identifying details. While the CRT understands that there are many reasons why information and documentation are not available, you are urged to provide as much as you have.

24. Claims Not Based on Familial Relationships

If your claim is not based on a familial relationship to the Account Owner, please explain why you believe that you are entitled to the Account:

25. Testamentary Documents

If possible, please provide information and copies of any testamentary documents that might show that you are entitled to the Account, such as:

☐ Wills – Testamente und letztwillige Verfügungen – Testaments et dispositions de dernières volontés

☐ Testamentary or probate documents – Entscheidungen von Nachlassgerichten – Décisions judiciaires

Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future"

CONFERENCE ON JEWISH MATERIAL CLAIMS AGAINST GERMANY, INC

PROGRAM FOR FORMER SLAVE AND FORCED LABORERS

www.claimscon.org

Application Form Guidelines

Please read these guidelines carefully before completing the application.

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany (Claims Conference) is responsible for implementing the program for certain Jewish former slave and forced laborers in accordance with criteria in the German Law on the creation of the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" (referred to herein as the "Foundation") and decisions of the Board of Trustees of the Foundation.

PLEASE NOTE: All applications must be received by the Claims Conference by AUGUST 11, 2001.

There is no fee to obtain or submit this application.

We understand that filling out this form is difficult for those who have suffered so much. The information is required to process the application. We will endeavor to do so as quickly and sensitively as possible.

WHO IS ELIGIBLE

Individuals who performed slave or forced labor under the National Socialist regime may be eligible for payment from the Foundation.

In accordance with the German legislation, eligibility for "slave labor" and "forced labor" are as follows:

- Slave Labor - work performed by force in a concentration camp (as defined in the German Indemnification Law) or a ghetto or another place of confinement under comparable conditions of hardship.
- Forced Labor - work performed by force (other than "Slave Labor") in the territory of the German Reich or in a German-occupied area, and outside the territory of Austria, under conditions resembling imprisonment or extremely harsh living conditions; or work performed by force under a program implementing the National Socialist policy of "extermination through work" (Vernichtung durch Arbeit) outside the territory of Austria.

Individuals who performed slave or forced labor exclusively while prisoners of war are not eligible.

WHO MAY COMPLETE THIS APPLICATION

Jewish Former Slave and Forced Laborers

This application is for persons who were Jewish at the time they performed slave or forced labor and who do not currently reside in one of the countries listed in the following paragraph.

Please Note:

All current residents, Jewish and non-Jewish, of the Czech Republic, Poland or countries which were republics of the former Soviet Union are required under the German legislation to apply to the Reconciliation Foundation for their country.

All other persons who are not Jewish, or who were not Jewish at the time they performed slave or forced labor, and who would like to apply for compensation for slave or forced labor should request the appropriate application from: International Organization for Migration (IOM), German Forced Labour Compensation Programme,17 route des Morillons, P.O.B. 71, CH-1211, Geneva 19, Switzerland. Tel. 41-22-717-9235 www.compensation-for-forced-labour.org

Heirs

In accordance with the German legislation, if the persecutee died on or after February 16, 1999, the heir may apply to this Fund. Heirs may be eligible only if they are the spouse, child, grandchild, sibling, or testamentary heir of the persecutee. Under the German Law, heirs of a persecutee who died before February 16, 1999 are not entitled to payment.

Application Form Guidelines

Continuation

PAYMENT INFORMATION

As required by the German legislation, applicants whose claims are approved will receive an initial payment. The remainder will be paid when all the claims have been processed.

The total amount of money available for all claims is fixed. Therefore, the amount of the final payment will depend on how many applications are approved. The maximum amount allowed under the German legislation is up to DM 15,000 for former slave laborers and up to DM 5,000 for former forced laborers.

Persons who received payments for slave and/or forced labor from a private industry fund, either recently or in the past, will have such payments deducted from the payment to be received under this initiative.

Please Note: The German legislation does not allow for any payments to be made to former slave and forced laborers until all the lawsuits brought in the United States federal courts on behalf of former slave and forced laborers are dismissed.

ADDITIONAL IMPORTANT INFORMATION

- This application may also qualify you for an additional payment from the separate and unrelated settlement of the class action lawsuit against Swiss banks.
- Persons who performed labor in Austria may be subject to different arrangements which are still to be determined. If appropriate, the application will be forwarded to the Austrian Foundation.
- The determination of whether a place of confinement was under comparable conditions of hardship is made by the Board of Trustees of the Foundation.
- Individuals who receive assistance in completing this application must nevertheless sign the application themselves, unless they are unable to do so and have granted a power of attorney to another individual to sign on their behalf. In either case, the signature must be notarized or confirmed by a notary public, bank, German consulate or a Jewish social service agency possessing a seal.
- Individuals who received and returned the Declaration Form from the German Compensation Offices (Wiedergutmachungsämter) or from the Claims Conference should not complete this application.
- Applicants not found eligible under this program will have the right of appeal.
- The German Law establishing the Foundation provides for certain limited claims for property loss as a result of the direct involvement of German business during the National Socialist Era. If you would like further information, please contact International Organization for Migration (IOM), German Forced Labour Compensation Programme – Property Claims, P.O.B. 71, CH-1211, Geneva 19, Switzerland. Tel. 41-22-717-9235 www.compensation-for-forced-labour.org
- The German Law establishing the Foundation provides for certain limited claims from those persons who suffered severe personal injury such as medical experimentation and other limited instances of severe personal injury based upon criteria to be determined by the Board of Trustees of the Foundation. If you would like further information, please contact Fund for Victims of Medical Experiments and Other Injuries, P.O. Box 1570, New York, NY 10159-1570, United States.

3. Concentration camp in Austria

Please check the box if at any time during your persecution, you performed slave labor in a concentration camp (or subcamp or satellite camp of a concentration camp) on the territory of the Republic of Austria.

B ☐

4. Personal Declarations

(A) Personal declaration

I affirm that these are all true statements:

I was forced to perform Slave Labor or Forced Labor.

- Please indicate one place at which you performed forced or slave labor (even if you were in more than one place, it is only necessary to indicate one place).

Place of incarceration at which you performed forced/slave labor	Year (Please indicate one year, even if you were incarcerated for a longer period) 19

- I was Jewish at the time I was forced to perform Slave Labor or Forced Labor.
- I am aware that I have no legal entitlement to receive a payment from the Foundation.
- I have not applied for or received any payments from the Foundation for the same Nazi injustice for which I claim on this application.
- I have not received any payment for slave or forced labor in Austria from the Austrian Fund "Reconciliation, Peace and Cooperation".

(B) Consent

This consent will allow the Claims Conference to verify the information in this application.

- I authorize the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future", the auditor it authorizes, the Claims Conference and its representatives to conduct appropriate investigations regarding my application with all relevant governmental authorities, archives, non-governmental organizations, including commercial enterprises in Germany and their legal predecessors and authorize the same authorities, archives and organizations to give all requested information to the Foundation, Claims Conference or its representatives.
- I agree that in conjunction with the processing and verification of my application to the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" or from its duly accredited representatives or partner organizations that their information may be used for:
  - Compilation of central records of the Foundation's payments;
  - Comparison with records of other indemnification payments for Nazi wrongs, for example, from the German government, from industry and the Fund "Reconciliation, Peace and Cooperation";
  - Research in archives in and out of Germany as is necessary to corroborate my statements.

(C) Waiver

The German legislation requires that you sign this waiver, but it will become effective only if and when you receive payment. This waiver does not affect your current payments or eligibility, now or in the future, for other German compensation and restitution programs.

In consideration for the payment from the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" I irrevocably waive the following claims outside of the Foundation law:

- Against the Federal Republic of Germany, German Federal States and other public German agencies from all claims arising out of slave or forced labor and property damage;
- Against all German companies for claims in connection to National Socialist injustices;
- Against the Republic of Austria and Austrian companies in connection with slave and forced labor.

This waiver does not apply to claims or payments under German law on the consequences of war or indemnification measures or to any claims for the restitution of artwork. However, claims for restitution of artwork may only be asserted in Germany or in the country in which the artwork was taken.

I confirm that the enclosed information substantiating my claim for compensation from the German Foundation is complete, truthful, and made according to the best of my knowledge. I am aware that false statements can lead to reclamation of the payment by the Foundation and to further legal consequences.

Please sign where indicated and fill in the date

Refugee's Name _____

SECTION (G)–SIGNATURE AND CONSENT

a) I (or the deceased) was a victim or target of Nazi persecution because I (or the deceased) was or was believed to be Jewish.

b) If it is determined that the claimant is a member of the Refugee Class, the claimant acknowledges by filing this claim form that he or she releases all Releasees of all Claims, as those terms are defined in the Settlement Agreement. "Releasees" generally include Swiss banks and business concerns and their affiliates, wherever located, and the Swiss Confederation and its governmental subdivisions. "Claims" include all claims and liability relating in any way to the Holocaust, World War II, and the treatment of refugees fleeing Nazi persecution by Releasees. A claimant that makes a claim as a member of the Refugee Class is not precluded from making claims under the Settlement Agreement or under any of the other four classes defined in the Settlement Agreement.

c) I agree that in connection with the processing and checking of this claim, my data (and that of the deceased) will be kept in a central database available to the court and a check will be made for the claims that may have been filed with IOM.

d) I authorize the Claims Conference and its representatives to conduct appropriate investigations regarding my application with all relevant governmental authorities, archives, non-governmental organizations, including commercial enterprises and their legal predecessors and authorize the same authorities, archives and organizations to give all requested information to the Claims Conference or its representatives.

e) I agree to a personal or telephonic interview by the Claims Conference in order for the Claims Conference to assist me in establishing my eligibility.

f) I confirm that the enclosed information sustaining my claim for compensation from the Swiss Refugee Program is complete, truthful, and made according to the best of my knowledge. I am aware that false statements can lead to reclamation of the payment.

g) Please sign where indicated and fill in the date.
The applicant's signature must be notarized or confirmed by a notary public, bank, Jewish social service agency, or other government official possessing a seal. For those applicants who are homebound, the written confirmation of the applicant's signature by an attending physician is sufficient. For those unable to sign, please submit both a physician's statement as well as a power of attorney or other legal guardianship.
