Respectfully submitted,

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

We owe a debt of gratitude to many individuals who provided us with their support in developing the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, administering the claims process, and preparing and reviewing this Final Report.

We have been inspired from the very beginning by the many Holocaust survivors and family members whom we have been fortunate to have met since our work began, among them, Greta Beer, whose commitment to justice first put the world on notice about the existence of unpaid Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, and who has offered her insights and guidance to us for all of these years.

We wish to thank the Honorable Edward R. Korman, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of New York, whose integrity, wisdom and compassion have guided this entire process. We know Judge Korman would be the first to give credit to his long-time courtroom deputy, Paula Marie Susi, and to all of the law clerks who assisted the Court in administering the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement.

We are grateful to our fellow Special Masters, Paul A. Volcker, Dr. Helen B. Junz and the late Michael Bradfield. Their knowledge of the Swiss banking system and expertise in the matter of Holocaust assets helped to ensure that the emphasis throughout the claims process remained on the bank accounts that were the heart of the lawsuits.

We were given invaluable advice and support throughout the course of the claims process from Lead Settlement Counsel, Professor Burt Neuborne, and from Settlement Fund accountant Tobias Feinerman and his staff.

With respect to the Deposited Assets Class programs, the many dedicated attorneys and staff members of the Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) in Zurich left no stone unturned in helping victims retrieve their accounts. They were led by the fiercely committed CRT Secretaries General, the late Mary Carter, and Dov Rubinstein, and their work was pivotal in helping to return over $720 million in assets to Holocaust victims and heirs. We also offer our thanks to Henrieta Parmar, Sascha Klacar and Jean-Marie Mettraux, along with all of the other many CRT attorneys and staff members in Zurich, who provided invaluable assistance over the years, among them, Lev Libeskind, who had served as our paralegal before moving over to the CRT. We also received important advice from Andreas Casutt and the CRT's other Swiss attorneys and accountants.

Many other personnel based in New York and Washington D.C. were crucial to this project. We wish to thank Jaimie Taff, who served as a CRT staff attorney and later worked closely with Special Master Bradfield on the CRT appeals process, and who also drafted portions of the Deposited Assets Class chapter of this Final Report. We received much support from Kristina Emminger of Special Master Bradfield's office. We are also grateful for the assistance of Elena Vournas and Valerie Fischer of the Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP) in New York, who oversaw the complex process of distributing nearly $720 million to thousands of award recipients around the world. We thank all of the other SDAP staff members who participated in this process, among them, John Kleeberg, Chen Yurista and Igor Sobolev.

We express our appreciation to the Hon. Elizabeth McCaul and the Hon. Diana Taylor, who served successively as the New York State Superintendent of Banks and whose Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) during the period in which most of the claims processing activities were completed. We thank HCPO's leadership, Catherine Lillie, Anna Rubin and Connie Walsh, who supported this process. We also wish to express our appreciation to several attorneys who provided counsel to certain Swiss banks and insurance companies, among them Britta Delmas, Marc Cohen and Marcus Pfenninger.

With respect to programs for Jewish members of the two Slave Labor classes, the Looted Assets Class, the Refugee Class and the Victim List Project, we received crucial advice and assistance from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. We were fortunate to benefit from the wisdom of Roman Kent, and from the late Saul Kagan, one of the original advocates for Holocaust compensation. His vast knowledge and gentle guidance were much appreciated, and now greatly missed. We are also grateful for the continuing support that we received from Claims Conference Executive Vice President Greg Schneider, as well as his predecessor, Gideon Taylor, and from other Claims Conference staff, including Karen Heilig, Arie Bucheister, Wesley Fisher, Miriam Weiner, Michael Elkin, Jim Rios, Ann Goldstein, Merri Markowitz and Candace Washington.

With respect to programs for Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims, we received a great deal of assistance from the International Organization for Migration. We benefited especially from the experience and advice of Dr. Norbert Wuehler, Delbert Field, Judith Cole, Cheryl Hill, Stephen Chambers, Peter Schatzer and Igor Cvetkovski.

In our work with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which helped in distributing aid to needy survivors, we were assisted greatly by its former Executive Vice President, Steven Schwager, and Assistant Executive Vice President Herbert Block, and by former President Judge Ellen Heller. We also wish to thank others at the JDC including current and former Executive Vice Presidents David Schizer and Alan Gill, and Inna Kotler and Ofer Glanz.

We are grateful for the guidance of the many scholars and experts who provided us with important insights about Holocaust compensation, among them, Ambassador Stuart Eizenstat; the late author and journalist Marilyn Henry; Yad Vashem's Avner Shalev and Shaya Ben Yahuda; the USHMM's Radu Ionid, Paul Shapiro and Scott Miller; Dr. David Marwell (former Director of the Museum of Jewish Heritage); and former Plaintiffs' Executive Committee members, Professor Morris Ratner and attorney Jean Geoppinger McCoy. Professor Michael Bazyler and Professor Leonard Orland, who have generously offered their counsel to us over these many years, also graciously reviewed drafts of portions of this Final Report, and provided us with many valuable suggestions.

We are grateful to Morgan Lewis & Bockius, LLP for its commitment to this work on behalf of the Court and Holocaust victims. We also wish to thank the many attorneys at Morgan Lewis who donated their time by reviewing and commenting upon drafts of this Final Report. Dina Kaufman, who began as our paralegal and is now a very busy attorney, has helped us at every step of the way, and we appreciate her enthusiasm and support for these many years. We also thank attorney Matthew Ladd, as well as our dedicated assistants Dianne Zimmerman, Ann Madden and Angela Marrero.

Finally, we express our immense gratitude to our colleague Talia Magnas, who for more than a decade has brought to this process her unwavering commitment, important insights and tireless efforts on behalf of Holocaust victims and their families.

IV. THE IMPACT OF THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT 97

I. ORIGINS OF THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT AND DISTRIBUTION PROCESS

Switzerland was a neutral nation during the Second World War. Both before and after Hitler's accession to power in Germany in 1933, Swiss banks appeared to provide a financial haven where foreigners at risk could safely deposit their funds. For decades after the war, however, Nazi victims and their families were told that if they were seeking to recover their property, Switzerland was not the place to look. They were told that there were no records of their assets or that they did not have proof that the assets belonged to them. They were turned away time and time again, but they did not forget and they did not give up.

In 1996 and 1997, a series of class action lawsuits were filed in several United States federal courts against Swiss banks and other Swiss entities. These lawsuits alleged that financial institutions in Switzerland collaborated with and aided the Nazi Regime by knowingly retaining and concealing assets of Holocaust victims, and by accepting and laundering illegally obtained Nazi loot and profits of slave labor. All of the cases were consolidated in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York ("the Court"). The lawsuits were litigated by Professor Burt Neuborne and a team of leading U.S. class action attorneys.

Judge Edward R. Korman, before whom the litigation was pending, actively encouraged the parties to settle. With his assistance, the parties reached a settlement in principle for $1.25 billion in August 1998, to be paid jointly by two large Swiss banks, Credit Suisse and Union Bank of Switzerland ("UBS"), creating a class action fund to be administered by the Court.[1] The Settlement had the support of the United States government, which had first become involved with the matter in 1994, when Stuart E. Eizenstat, then serving as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, had initiated an inquiry into the Holocaust-era activities of Swiss banks. Ambassador Eizenstat continued to oversee the U.S. government's role in matters of Holocaust compensation and played an important part in bringing about the Swiss Banks Settlement.[2] It

[1] The Swiss government did not participate in the settlement and paid no part of the Settlement Fund of $1.25 billion.

[2] Ambassador Eizenstat has served in many governmental roles, including Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Affairs, Under Secretary of Commerce, and Special Representative of the President and Secretary of State for Holocaust-Era Issues under President Clinton. He remains actively involved with Holocaust compensation issues. He described his experiences with the was envisioned that the Settlement Fund would be distributed among five different victim groups (ultimately designated under the Settlement Agreement as those who were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled), and among five different settlement classes (the Deposited Assets Class, Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, the Looted Assets Class, and the Refugee Class).

The Settlement Agreement did not, however, set forth a specific method of allocating the Settlement Fund among these diverse classes and victim groups. Rather, the agreement provided for the Court to appoint a Special Master to employ "open and equitable procedures to ensure fair consideration of all proposals for allocation and distribution."[3] The Plaintiffs' Executive Committee on December 15, 1998 unanimously endorsed Judge Korman's proposal to appoint Judah Gribetz as Special Master. Shortly thereafter, on January 26, 1999, the parties signed the Settlement Agreement. On March 31, 1999, the Court issued an order formalizing Mr. Gribetz's appointment (and by order dated October 3, 2002, Special Master Gribetz's colleague, Shari C. Reig, was appointed as Deputy Special Master). Judge Korman approved the Settlement

The Settlement Agreement is included as part of the exhibit to the Final Report entitled "Claimant Application Materials," and is also available on the website for these proceedings, http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents/Doc_9_Settlement.pdf. The website contains information about the litigation and settlement, the various claims processes for each of the settlement classes, statistics on distribution, and a "Chronology" highlighting some of the most significant events in the case and containing hyperlinks to thousands of documents, including individual decisions on Refugee, Slave Labor and Deposited Assets Classes claims.

Agreement — while imposing important conditions intended to facilitate the review of claims, particularly those relating to Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts — by order of July 26, 2000.[4] On September 11, 2000, the Special Masters filed the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds ("Distribution Plan"), which the Court approved in its entirety on November 22, 2000, a decision the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed on July 26, 2001.[5]

What has the claims process established under the Distribution Plan accomplished? It has resulted in the payment of more than the $1.25 billion settlement amount — nearly $1.285 billion — to over 458,400 Holocaust victims and their heirs. It has repaid nearly $720 million to owners or heirs of Swiss bank accounts, enabling 4,716 documented accounts, each with an average value of almost $116,000, to be returned to those families from whom the assets were wrongfully taken. The $720 million also includes payments to another 12,301 Holocaust victims and heirs, who were compensated for bank account claims that were credible but could not be documented because of the banks' massive destruction of Holocaust-era records.[6]

One of these bank account payments — for nearly $22 million, the largest single award issued by the Court — was made to members of a family that included Maria Altmann, whose relatives' art was looted by the Nazis, and who filed suit in federal court in Los Angeles against the Austrian government seeking return of that art.[7] Following several years of litigation, including proceedings before the U.S. Supreme Court as well as in Austrian courts, Ms. Altmann in 2006 finally was able to reclaim her family's paintings, including the celebrated "Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer" by Gustav Klimt. Her struggle for restitution was highlighted in the film "Woman in Gold." Less well known is that in addition to losing its art, the family also lost its business, one of Austria's largest sugar refineries (known as ÖZAG), because of maneuverings among the Nazis and Swiss bankers. Despite the family's extensive efforts to protect its assets, the Swiss bank "actively cooperated with the forced sale" of the ÖZAG shares, transferring the bank-held shares to a "designated Nazi 'purchaser' at a small fraction of the shares' value."[8] This was in violation of its contractual agreement with, and fiduciary duty to, the family. The value of these Swiss assets was returned to the family through the Deposited Assets Class claims process.

The Swiss Banks Settlement distribution program has enabled almost 198,000 people, the vast majority of whom were Holocaust survivors (and the remainder, heirs of survivors who passed away after the settlement), to receive a total of over $280 million. This sum was some measure of financial recognition of the slave labor they were forced to perform at the hands of the Nazis, the proceeds of which ended up in Switzerland.[9] The claims process has paid another 570 individuals nearly $700,000 for the slave labor they performed for Swiss-owned companies. It has recognized and paid over $11 million to 4,158 persons who sought refuge in Switzerland but were turned away or expelled, or who managed to gain admission into Switzerland but suffered mistreatment as refugees.

Although nothing in the settlement negotiated by the parties was directed specifically towards the plight of needy survivors, the Distribution Plan nevertheless made it possible for the Court to provide almost $256 million in food, medicine, medical devices, home health care, heating supplies, and other basic needs for more than 237,400 Holocaust survivors around the world, living at the edge of subsistence. Some of these victims settled, after the Holocaust, just a few blocks from the courthouse in Brooklyn, while others were many thousands of miles away. Wherever they lived, these survivors all shared an important common bond. All were looted during the Nazi era; some portion of their property or its proceeds might have been transacted through Switzerland; and all were needy when the lawsuits settled.

The distribution process was designed to take into consideration each and every Nazi victim on whose behalf the claims were brought. Otherwise, the compensation program would have run the risk of "anonymizing the victims," one of the many effects of the Holocaust itself. As historian Gerhard L. Weinberg has observed, grouping victims together can make one "lose sight of the fact that each Jew who was murdered was an individual with hopes and talents, family and feelings…. These persons were not just numbers, either as physically marked on their bodies or as analyzed in statistics…. It was always specific human beings who were killed. Whatever his or her age or gender, geographical location, or social status, each had a life to lead, a life that was cut short by the deliberate actions of others. And how much could these men, women, and children have contributed to the wider world?"[10] Holocaust historian Peter Hayes likewise has stressed the importance of emphasizing the impact upon individuals, noting that there is "an important educational and moral reason always to put human faces on the behaviors we chronicle."[11]

Each man, woman and child, whether he or she perished or managed to survive, had a story to tell. Those narratives were heard by the U.S. judicial system, under the supervision of a federal judge who favored "an individualized settlement distribution mechanism in order to contribute to the 'historical record.'"[12] Some of these narratives were recounted in person at public hearings. Hundreds of thousands more were described over the years as claims administrators working on the Court's behalf read and carefully summarized victims' personal histories: of great wealth, including Swiss accounts, meticulously stripped piece by piece; of back-breaking labor in the concentration camps and ghettos that then sent the profits of this free labor into Switzerland; of Swiss border guards handing families over to the Gestapo. As one scholar observed of the program relating to Swiss bank accounts, the claims process "memorializ[ed] every award in a written opinion, now publicly available on [the] website. Each award contains information provided by the claimant, including the name of the account owners, a personal story consisting of information regarding the owners followed by a brief explanation of family ties, and in some cases a description of the family's whereabouts during the war."[13]

Roth eds., Berghahn Books 2005). Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg often emphasized the activities of the perpetrators. Another approach, however, more closely examines the victims. For example, Omer Bartov has praised Tim Cole's 2016 work, HOLOCAUST LANDSCAPES, because the author placed Holocaust victims at the center of the narrative. "Cole thereby breaks down the homogeneous picture of the Holocaust in the popular imagination, alternating as it does between fascination with the perpetrators, a singular focus on Auschwitz, or an obsession with the clash of titans in the 'bloodlands' of the East; he also rescues the victims from the silent columns heading into the crematoria, the sealed trains with their muffled cries, and the faceless multitudes shot at the edge of pre-dug mass graves. Here the individual takes centre stage, incarcerated in a ghetto or hiding in a forest, struggling to survive in a camp or gasping for air in a deportation train, cramped for months in an attic, marching endlessly across the continent, rotting among piles of corpses in the last, chaotic camps of the disintegrating Reich, and finally searching for loved ones in a ruined, resentful, homicidal continent, often only to find that she has remained alone in the world." The Swiss Banks Settlement distribution likewise sought to put the individual at "center stage."

As a result of the $1.25 billion settlement, some of these losses were compensated (and in the case of those whose bank accounts were taken, repaid as nearly as possible in full). Perhaps of equal importance, their stories were preserved. They are available on the internet, where they will remain part of the historical record of the Holocaust. In addition, whether they perished or survived, whether they filed claims or not, whether they were or were not eligible for financial compensation, victims have been remembered in another way. Their names have been recorded, many for the first time, in a permanent database initiated and funded by the Settlement under the Victim List Project of the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement. With the Court's support of programs at Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum ("USHMM"), this database has compiled and made accessible worldwide millions of names of individuals whom the Settlement Agreement was intended to benefit — Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled victims or targets of Nazi persecution, those who perished and those who survived.[14]

By seeking to compensate, at least in some part, individual material losses, the Swiss Banks Settlement claims programs have helped to illuminate one of the lesser-known aspects of the Holocaust era: the role played by Swiss entities. Historian Simon Dubnow, as he was being taken away by the Nazis to be killed in December 1941, is said to have called out to the Jews of Riga: "write it down!"[15] The Court has overseen a process that emphasized the importance of "writing it down." The information that was gathered from a multitude of sources — among them banks, companies, archives and claimants — has been analyzed and presented in an effort to avert what Dubnow feared: "that the evidence would die with the victims; that if records were not kept then no one would know of the crime that was being perpetrated."[16]

These efforts helped to further the achievements of decades of prior restitution efforts that had resulted in billions of dollars in payments to Holocaust victims. As historian Michael Marrus has observed:

> Analysts differ on the specific nature and significance of the accomplishment…. Virtually everyone recognizes that, for some survivors living in difficult material circumstances — in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, but also [14] These individualized programs are the opposite of what was feared by some scholars, who believed that the class action mechanism of the Swiss Banks settlement necessarily meant that individual histories would be subsumed by the group claim. For example, one historian noted that "[i]f there is a point of extreme sensitivity to [H]olocaust survivors, it lies in their individuality; and if there is a duty [H]olocaust survivors consider sacred, it is to the memory of the dead. Class action suits by their nature challenge both of those sentiments, each for different reasons. The class action suit is that legal proceeding in which all plaintiffs are lumped together based on the allegedly identical and undifferentiated nature of their claims and situations. The voices of many are channeled into a univocal articulation." Vivian Grosswald Curran, Competing Frameworks for Assessing Contemporary Holocaust-Era Claims, Symposium - Holocaust Restitution: Reconciling Moral Imperatives with Legal Initiatives and Diplomacy, 25 FORDHAM INT'L L.J. S-107, S-119 (2001) ("2001 Fordham Symposium").

While the class action mechanism did run the risk that that survivors would be "lumped together," id., the highly individualized claims processes adopted by the Court were designed to avoid that result. Each claimant's "univocal articulation," id., was reviewed carefully so that every individual survivor could be heard.

> elsewhere, including the United States and Israel — settlements have provided badly needed financial assistance, however inadequate, to sometimes indigent pensioners. But one must always keep in mind the limited impact historically. Historian Ronald Zweig makes the valuable point that this achievement needs to be seen in the context of more than five decades of German and other restitution, and that however significant what has been accomplished recently, this involves no more than about 5 percent of what had been dispensed in the preceding period.[17]

Even if amounting to less than "5 percent of what had been dispensed in the preceding period," however, the Swiss Banks Settlement and distribution process were of historic importance.[18] Professor Michael Bazyler, one of the first scholars to delve into the Holocaust compensation lawsuits of the 1990s and beyond, has observed that the Swiss banks case was "the mother of all Holocaust restitution settlements." He has described as "startling" the "ability of the Swiss campaign to set the stage for the settlements achieved with Germany and its industries, Austria and its industries, French banks, European insurance companies, and also American corporations for their reprehensible wartime activities."[19] With the Holocaust-related litigation and settlements that arose in the 1990s, beginning with the Swiss Banks Settlement, "European nations that had previously denied they had played any role in or profited from the Holocaust now addressed their national myths and agreed it was time to face their actual history. In all these matters, acknowledgment of past wrongs would not have happened without pressure from the highest reaches of the American government, which would not have come without pressure from the leaders of the American Jewish community and, before that, pressure from survivors and their children."[20]

Financial journalist John Authers, a senior editor at Bloomberg, and formerly at the Financial Times, covered the case and co-authored a book on the 1990s Holocaust restitution process.[21] He noted in a review of Professor Bazyler's work that "[i]t was not until 1996, a half century after Nuremburg, that the movement to exact financial restitution from the companies that benefited from the destruction of European Jewry began, with the launch in Brooklyn of a lawsuit calling for Swiss banks to disgorge the contents of victims' accounts, which had been allowed to remain dormant."[22]

> What followed was an epic series of legal and political negotiations. It culminated in settlements with the Swiss banks, German industrial companies that had used slave labor, European insurers that had failed to pay out on life policies written on the lives of victims, French banks that had collaborated with the Vichy regime, and Austrian banks that had collaborated with German occupiers, along with a raft of new historical truth commissions that reassessed the wartime role of governments across Europe. It also triggered a series of lawsuits by individuals over the possession of artworks that had been looted from Jewish families by the Nazis.[23]

Professor Neuborne, who served as Lead Settlement Counsel in the Swiss Banks case, noted that the "litigation deliver[ed] an additional benefit" that he had "not anticipated." In a purely "diplomatic setting" divorced from the courtroom, "victims speak in the voice of charity, imploring governments and powerful private entities to recognize a non-binding moral imperative to redress a past wrong." By contrast, in a "legal setting, victims speak in the voice of obligation, demanding that defendants comply with a legal mandate compelling the righting of a past wrong. Not only is rights talk more powerful rhetoric than charity talk, it restores a sense of dignity to the victims by forcing powerful defendants to confront them as equals…. The victims view the payments, not as charity that reinforces their sense of victimhood and oppression, but as vindication, acknowledging their entitlement to compensation, and their status as equals."[24]

Likewise, the International Organization for Migration (IOM), which administered on the Court's behalf the various claims processes for Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled class members, highlighted the emphasis upon individuals:

> Real people were not ignored here…. stories were told by real individuals about an era when they were simply trying to stay alive in unprecedented circumstances, all the while vicious geopolitical, economic and personal agendas and vendettas swirled around them…. For so many of these individuals, acknowledgment and recognition were what they had sought for so long for lives that literally had been stolen from them. Those lives can never be reclaimed nor can the sufferings the victims endured be transformed into anything other than horror. But their testimonies can be meaningful for all as a lesson and reminder that all are touched by the plight of individuals, whether they acknowledge that connection or not.[25]

The ability of these survivors to receive compensation was due in large part to the fact that the judicial power of the United States was "harnessed in the cause of Holocaust justice and in the cause of informing the world that, on occasion, historical wrongs can be laid bare and victims receive some small measure of recognition and justice."[26]

This approach has been characterized as "managerial judging."[27] In such circumstances, the judge "actively manages the case from its inception through its implementation, encouraging the parties to reduce the area of dispute by agreeing on points of fact and law, and ideally, by settling. American judicial managerialism was of particular importance in the case against the Swiss banks, in light of their long-standing refusal to publish lists of dormant accounts…. Judge Korman actively encouraged the parties to settle, used his control over the settlement process to pressure the Swiss banks to cooperate in disclosing additional account information, and supervised the distribution of the settlement."[28] As noted by two attorneys who participated in the litigation, "the lesson from [the Swiss banks case] is that U.S. courts can effectively provide a forum for resolving these kinds of extraordinary historical wrongs."[29]

Other courts have been less ambitious. For example, slave laborers tried to sue German companies in the 1960s. One such claim was pursued against IG Farben, the notorious German conglomerate that requisitioned thousands of slave laborers from the SS, and had built a factory near Auschwitz to take advantage of its proximity to such a large slave labor pool. Farben was also the company that manufactured the Zyklon B poison used in the gas chambers. A case against Farben was rejected by the courts in 1966.

The United States Court of Appeals in that case held that the "span between the doing of the damage and the application of the claimed assuagement is too vague. The time is too long. The identity of the alleged tort feasors is too indefinite. The procedure sought – adjudication of some two hundred thousand claims for multifarious damages inflicted twenty to thirty years ago in a European area by a government then in power – is too complicated, too costly, to justify undertaking by a court without legislative provision of the means wherewith to proceed."[30]

As the Special Masters noted of the 1966 IG Farben case in their chapter included in the treatise, Reparations for Victims of Genocide, War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity: "We have had the great privilege over these years to have learned something of the personal histories of thousands of individual survivors of the Holocaust. We became acquainted with one of the more poignant and ironic of these stories while reviewing proposed awards for claimants with plausible undocumented bank account claims. demonstrated that her family had had a Swiss bank account that was never returned. Because she also had been a former slave laborer, she had received a separate payment under Slave Labor Class I. Her daughter is [an English] professor and she sent us her research concerning resistance efforts in the concentration camps. Her mother (the claimant) and aunt had been saved by this 'resistance' – by the concentration camp inmates who, at great personal risk, had warned them to lie about their ages, and about whether they were twins, [and other basic facts,] to avoid 'selection' for immediate death in the gas chambers."[31]

This former slave laborer – who was compensated under the Swiss Banks settlement because of the complex claims processes the Court was willing to undertake – happens to have

The heroic resistance efforts of concentration camp inmates at Auschwitz was described by the daughter and niece of the claimants, Professor Gail Ivy Berlin, in her paper entitled: "The 'Canada' Commando as a Force for Resistance in Auschwitz: Redefining Heroism," Proteus: A Journal of Ideas, Vol. 30: Deviance in Culture and Society, at 32 (Fall 1995). Professor Berlin explained how Lenka, Olga and Esther Berkovic — her mother, aunt and grandmother, respectively — were enslaved at Auschwitz and then later at one of its many sub-camps, part of the vast European system of sub-camps and ghettos. See, e.g., Erich Lichtblau, The Holocaust Just Got More Shocking, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 3, 2013, http://www.nytimes.com/2013/03/03/sunday-review/the-holocaust-just-got-more-shocking (discussing the research and cataloguing, as of that date, by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum of more than 42,000 Nazi camps and ghettos, many of which had not been previously known). That number has since increased to over 44,000. See https://www.ushmm.org/information/press/press-releases/museums-encyclopedia-of-camps-and-ghettos-available-online (June 2, 2017) (last accessed June 5, 2017)

Upon stepping off the train at Auschwitz, the Berkovic family was met by a "man in striped pajamas [who] was a Jewish prisoner, a member of the 'Canada' commando, assigned to empty out the cattle cars and gather the baggage." Berlin at 32. His seemingly "bizarre instructions and scraps of information" saved their lives, for he "knew what he could not tell them directly: anyone younger than sixteen was killed," and so the 15-and-16-year-old Lenka and Olga followed his whispered command and lied to Josef Mengele that they were 16 and 17. "[A]nyone older than forty was killed," and so Esther Berkovic dropped her age from 44 to 40. "[A]nyone accompanying a child was killed," and so the girls' older cousin, with her five children, was warned not to let her teenage cousins help her with her children on the selection ramp. "[T]wins were the object of vicious medical experiments," and so the sisters, who looked alike, made sure Mengele knew that they were not twins. "[I]nnocent-looking trucks marked with a red cross went directly to the gas chamber," and so the family was directed to walk rather than ride. "To the best of his ability, the man in striped pajamas, a Jewish inmate of Auschwitz, tried to offer life-saving information to three absolute strangers, all a little too young or a little too old to make it through the first selection safely without his help. His efforts resulted in three lives saved." Berlin at 32. Professor Berlin's review of other survivor statements indicated that although "the acts of these men" in the Canada commando, who risked their lives to warn new arrivals how they might stay alive, "are absent from the treatments of Jewish resistance or defiance in even the best Holocaust histories, they are found in the testimonies of survivors." Berlin at 33.

been one of the plaintiffs in the IG Farben case: the very lawsuit that was dismissed decades ago, in 1966, because the claims seemingly presented so many obstacles. Many years later, that Holocaust survivor finally received some measure of compensation for what happened to her in Europe in the 1940s, because the American judicial system concluded in the 1990s that justice was long overdue.[32]

Nearly $1.285 billion (more than the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund) has been paid to hundreds of thousands of victims, like the survivor described above, and some additional portion of the history of the Holocaust has been preserved. To take just a few additional examples:

Deposited Assets Class

- Julian Schachian was born in 1880 in Berlin, Germany. He was an attorney with the title of Doctor of Law. He perished in the Holocaust in 1942. His brother, Siegfried Schachian, was born in 1876 in Berlin, Germany. Siegfried Schachian was deported to Theresienstadt in 1942. Subsequently, he was sent further east, where he perished in 1944. Their niece, who at the time of the award was 91 years ago, claimed their accounts.

  This elderly claimant apparently did not remember (because she did not mention in her claim form) that in 1933, at the age of 26, she personally had visited the bank on behalf of her uncles. The bank records reflected this visit, for the bank had kept the claimant's calling card. Other bank records showed that on July 4, 1933, the claimant met with a bank representative and instructed the bank to no longer send account statements and correspondence to her uncle, Julian Schachian. She told the bank that her uncle also would destroy any account information that he held at his home.

  The bank records showed that Dr. Julian Schachian had held two accounts: a custody account opened on January 19, 1930, as well as a demand deposit account. Despite the entreaties of Dr. Schachian's niece — the claimant — the assets in Dr. Julian Schachian's custody account (worth SF 41,900) were transferred on December 22, 1936 to an account belonging to the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft in Berlin. That transfer was made following the Reich's November 1936 order forcing German owners of foreign securities that were held abroad to deposit those securities in a custody account belonging to a German bank. The Swiss bank thus transferred Julian Schachian's assets out of Switzerland to Nazi Germany, and closed his account on December 19, 1938. With respect to Siegfried Schachian, the bank records showed that the securities in his custody account (with a December 22, 1936 market value of SF 6,300.00), were transferred to an account belonging to the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft in Berlin. The account was closed on September 30, 1938. Decades after the Swiss bank closed these accounts and delivered them to the Third Reich, the 91-year-old claimant received an award from the Settlement Fund in the amount of SF 841,550 (approximately $762,802).

- Elisabeth Denes-Deutsch and Adolf Denes, born respectively in 1896 and 1893, were married and lived with their teenaged daughter Eva (born in 1926) in Oradea, Romania. Adolf Denes was a banker and manager of the English-Hungarian Bank in Oradea. The entire family was killed in Auschwitz. The bank records demonstrated that Adolf and Elisabeth Denes held a demand deposit account, and that they had used the fictive name "W. Aden" and the password "Silos." The Swiss bank transferred the account to a suspense account in September 1965 and closed it to fees in 1966. The bank records also showed that the last contact with the account owners was before the end of World War II. The account was reported in a survey conducted by Swiss banks in 1962 (which found only a few hundred possible Holocaust victim accounts). The account later was reported in November 1965 to the Cantonal Guardianship Authority of Zurich.

  According to the records provided by the banks in the course of the Court-supervised claims process, long before the CRT [Claims Resolution Tribunal, the administrative body charged with analyzing bank account claims on the Court's behalf] process began, two claims had been submitted to the Swiss Justice Department, seeking return of this account. One of these claims had been filed in August 1965 by a Denes relative who lived in Tel Aviv, Mr. Josef Deutsch, Elisabeth Denes' brother. Swiss authorities directed Mr. Deutsch to withhold evidence and documentation relating to his claim until he was expressly requested to hand it in. But Mr. Deutsch never was requested to present his evidence. Instead, in 1966, the bank closed the account to fees, notwithstanding Mr. Deutsch's communication only one year earlier seeking information about his sister's account. Mr. Deutsch was advised of the account's closure in 1968. It took another three decades, but when the CRT took over the claim, it was able to recommend and the Court was able to authorize an award to Mr. Deutsch's widow in the amount of SF 27,642.50 ($19,211).[33]

Slave Labor Class I

- The claimant, who was Jewish, was born in Hungary on May 2, 1915. Because the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, claim forms, and related materials all promised claimants confidentiality, particularly in recognition of the sensitivity of the information provided in support of their claims, the survivor's name is not disclosed here, but her name, and all other relevant identifying information, are known to and were filed with the Court under seal.[34] On December 23, 1944, the claimant was deported to Ravensbruck KZ. One month later, on January 25, 1945, she was sent to Mauselwitz work camp, a sub-camp of Buchenwald, where she worked all night from 6:00 p.m. to 6:00 a.m. in an ammunition factory. Allowed only a half-hour rest, the claimant was beaten by an SS guard for putting her head down on a workbench in exhaustion. On April 18, 1945, as the American Army approached, the Germans evacuated the camp. The claimant was able to escape and hid in a nearby forest. She was found by a farmer and his family, and driven by cart to Graslitz, already liberated. She was compensated through the Court's claims process.

- The claimant was a Romani who was born on June 16, 1923. At the time of her claim, she lived in the Czech Republic. She performed slave labor at various camps: Lety u Pisku, Auschwitz, Ravensbruck and Flossenburg. On August 12, 1942, she was captured and taken, pregnant, to Lety. She escaped from Lety in December 1942 and gave birth to a daughter in Prostejov. In March of 1943, the Nazis recaptured her and sent her to Auschwitz. There, her baby was killed. She received typhus and other injections from Dr. Mengele. In addition, she worked at a Munich factory while at Flossenberg. The claimant was forced on a Death March, but escaped. After the War, she gave birth to a mentally handicapped child as a result of the experiments she was forced to endure during the Holocaust. She was compensated through the Court's claims process.

Slave Labor Class II

- The claimant, who lived in Poland, performed slave labor at Sarotti AG in Berlin-Tempelhof, Germany. Because of his religious convictions as a Jehovah's Witness, he did not want to participate in the defense of the factory during the air raids, in collecting corpses or digging trenches. For this he suffered greatly, including beatings by the Gestapo. Because he performed slave labor for a Swiss-owned entity, he received compensation under Slave Labor Class II.

Refugee Class

- The claimant, born on November 14, 1929 in Belgium, was expelled from Switzerland in 1942. In the summer of 1942, the claimant, her parents and another couple traveled with a Belgian smuggler to Besançon, under false identity. The [34] By contrast, the names of the owners of Swiss bank accounts (most of whom had perished in the Holocaust, or had passed away subsequently), were publicly disclosed in order to permit heirs to locate and file claims to the accounts. Most of the heirs who received awards from the Settlement Fund chose to preserve their privacy, and their names were redacted from the publicly available decisions about their accounts, but as with other claimants, their names and other identifying information were docketed under seal. Certain claimants, such as Mrs. Altmann, chose to disclose their names and in some instances to discuss their personal circumstances, whether in the press or elsewhere.

smuggler took them to a farm, and then they crossed the border into Switzerland. They arrived at Neuchâtel and went to Basel, where they were advised to register at the police station. They were arrested at the Basel police station, jailed and questioned for a week. Upon their release they were told they would be taken to Bern, but instead were escorted to the border. They pleaded to stay in Switzerland. However, Swiss police threatened to hand them over to German patrols if they did not cooperate. They went back to Besançon, and then to Brussels. The claimant's mother was caught in Brussels and died in Auschwitz. The claimant remained in hiding throughout the war. She was compensated as a member of the Refugee Class.

- The claimant, born on July 11, 1919 in Poland, was denied permission to enter Switzerland by Swiss authorities in Berne, Switzerland in late 1938. The claimant had been studying medicine at the University of Bologna in Italy and was expelled from the university because he was Jewish. The claimant was accepted to the University of Geneva. He applied for a visa to Switzerland through the police department in Berne. The police denied his application, despite the fact that a dean from the University of Geneva had sent a recommendation to the police department. The claimant left Italy and went to Poland in January 1939. In June 1940, he was sent to a labor camp in Siberia, where he remained throughout the rest of the war. He received compensation based upon his denial of entry into Switzerland.

Looted Assets Class

- Ludmila M. was born in Minsk in 1940. Her parents worked at a local bank. The family tried to leave Minsk on foot after their home was destroyed, but they were seized and sent to the ghetto. Ludmila's mother, who was Belarusian, was able to leave the ghetto. She brought her typhoid-infected baby to her grandmother's house in the Peski village. It was Ludmila's illness that might have saved her from the Nazis, as the soldiers learned of the girl's typhoid and were afraid to enter the village. Ludmila's father and uncle escaped from the Minsk ghetto in 1942 and joined the partisans; her grandparents, however, perished. After the war, Ludmila taught Russian language and literature. Living on a monthly pension of $260, Ludmila was eligible for services, including food and medication subsidies, through humanitarian programs partly funded by the Court.

- Vasily L. lived near the Polish border. When the German army approached the village in 1941, 11-year-old Vasily and his family left and walked east to escape the heavy bombardment. They eventually reached the Mogilev region, where a non-Jewish family sheltered Vasily at great personal risk. After the war, Vasily worked at a brick-making factory. With serious health problems and a monthly pension of $287, Vasily and his wife were eligible for assistance partly funded under the Looted Assets Class programs, including medical aid, home care, personal hygiene items and rehabilitation equipment.

The starting point of the claims process that led to the compensation of these and over 458,400 other Nazi victims was the Settlement Agreement, signed on January 26, 1999.[35] The Settlement Agreement became operative as of March 30, 1999 following execution of written "Organizational Endorsements" of the agreement by 17 major worldwide Jewish organizations.[36]

The Settlement Agreement created five specific classes of claimants: the "Deposited Assets Class," the "Looted Assets Class," "Slave Labor Class I," "Slave Labor Class II" and the "Refugee Class." With the exception of "Slave Labor Class II," a class member was required to be a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution," defined as "any individual, corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, unincorporated association, community, congregation, group, organization, or other entity persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped."[37]

The five classes were defined in the Settlement Agreement (at Section 8.2) as follows:

- "The Deposited Assets Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Deposited Assets or any effort to recover Deposited Assets."
- "The Looted Assets Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution and their heirs, successors, administrators, executors, affiliates, and assigns who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets or any effort to recover Looted Assets or Cloaked Assets."[38]

Trust, the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Simon W[ie]senthal Center, the World Jewish Congress, and the World Zionist Organization in the form of Exhibit 1 hereto within twenty (20) days after the parties execute the Settlement Agreement." If any of the listed organizations failed to execute the endorsement, "Settling Defendants at their sole discretion" were entitled to "declare that the Settlement Agreement shall not become effective," and the parties were to resume negotiations "in a good-faith effort to resolve the issue."

The "Exhibit" referenced in the Related Agreement, entitled "Endorsement," provided that each entity "endorse[d] the Settlement Agreement …. as a fair, adequate and reasonable settlement," "affirm[ed] that the Settlement Agreement [brought] about complete closure and an end to confrontation with respect to the issues dealt with in the settlement," "agree[d] not to make any public statement or take any action that would violate or be inconsistent with this endorsement, including requesting or approving sanctions or opposing business transactions involving Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement," "covenant[ed] not to sue, call for suits against, or support suits against any Swiss entity released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement," and "waive[d] any and all claims it may have against the Swiss entities released by the Settlement Agreement based on conduct covered by the settlement."

The list of Organizational Endorsers is annexed as an Exhibit to this Final Report.

[37] Settlement Agreement, Section 1.

[38] The term "Assets" was defined as "any and all objects of value including but not limited to personal, commercial, real, tangible, and intangible property, including, without limitation, cash, securities, gems, gold

- "The Slave Labor Class I consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor for companies or entities that actually or allegedly deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with, or transacted such revenues or proceeds through, Releasees, and their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from the deposit of such revenues or proceeds or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with the revenues or proceeds of Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets."[39]

- "Slave Labor Class II consists of individuals who actually or allegedly performed Slave Labor at any facility or work site, wherever located, actually or allegedly owned, controlled, or operated by any corporation or other business concern headquartered, organized, or based in Switzerland or any affiliate thereof, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee other than Settling Defendants, the Swiss National Bank, and Other Swiss banks for relief of any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets or any effort to obtain redress in connection with Slave Labor or Cloaked Assets."

- "The Refugee Class consists of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution who sought entry into Switzerland in whole or in part to avoid Nazi persecution and who actually or allegedly either were denied entry into Switzerland or, after gaining entry, were deported, detained, abused, or otherwise mistreated, and the individuals' heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and who have or at any time have asserted, assert, or may in the future seek to assert Claims against any Releasee for relief of and other precious metals, jewelry, documents, artworks, equipment, and intellectual property." (Settlement Agreement, Section 1). "Looted Assets" were defined as "Assets actually or allegedly belonging in whole or in part to Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution that were actually or allegedly stolen, expropriated, Aryanized, confiscated, or that were otherwise wrongfully taken by, at the request of, or under the auspices of, the Nazi Regime." Id.

"Cloaked Assets" were defined as "Assets wholly or partly owned, controlled by, obtained from, or held for the benefit of, any company incorporated, headquartered, or based in Germany or any other Axis country or other country occupied by an Axis country between 1933 and 1946 or any other entity or individual associated with the Nazi Regime (regardless of where such entity or individual was or is located, incorporated, headquartered, or conducting business), the identity, value, or ownership of which was in fact or allegedly disguised by, through, or as the result of any intentional or unintentional act or omission of or otherwise involving any Releasee, including, without limitation, Internationale Industrie und Handelsbeteiligungen A.G. (a.k.a. 'Interhandel'), and its predecessors, successors, or affiliates." Settlement Agreement, Section 1.

[39] "Slave Labor" was defined in Section 1 of the Settlement Agreement as "work for little or no remuneration actually or allegedly performed by individuals involuntarily at the insistence, direction, or under the auspices of the Nazi Regime." The term "Nazi Regime" included not only the Nazi government of Germany, but all "its instrumentalities, agents, and allies (including, without limitation, all other Axis countries), all occupied countries, and all other individuals or entities in any way affiliated or associated with, or acting for or on behalf or under the control or influence of, the Nazi Regime..." Id.

> any kind whatsoever relating to or arising in any way from such actual or alleged denial of entry, deportation, detention, abuse, or other mistreatment."

Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne, who was not involved in drafting this complex document, has described his reaction to reviewing the Settlement Agreement for the first time:

> I remember thinking that the first half of the written settlement agreement in the Swiss case was a pretty good job. It set up five settlement classes that tracked our legal theories and defined the five victim groups whose members were eligible to receive payment from one or more of the settlement classes. Then, I looked for the rest of the settlement agreement — you know, the part that explained how much of the $1.25 billion each settlement class would receive, and how to go about processing the class members' claims for payment. Guess what. There was no rest of the settlement. The experienced class action lawyers had drafted one-half of an excellent agreement that guaranteed the entire Swiss nation complete relief from future Holocaust-related litigation, in return for payment of $1.25 billion to the five plaintiff classes. But the plaintiffs' lawyers had punted on how the $1.25 billion was to be allocated among the five settlement classes, and how individual class members were going to receive any funds…. The gritty work of allocating the settlement funds, and distributing the prize money to the victims, was someone else's problem.[40]

What was "someone else's problem" became the Court's, and the Special Masters.' This Final Report on the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement Distribution Process explains how that problem was resolved. It describes how a judicial process that began in a courthouse in Brooklyn was able to reach out to hundreds of thousands of Nazi victims and heirs around the world; to hear and record their experiences; and to offer some material assistance to more than 458,400 people, mostly Holocaust survivors, for losses beyond comprehension.

A. The Consolidated Class Action Lawsuit and its Historical Context[41]

The lawsuits were filed because in the decades after the Holocaust, Swiss financial institutions had failed to return deposits to the Nazi victims (or their relatives) who had entrusted their assets to the banks. When inquiries were made, the banks "denied the existence of a substantial number of unpaid accounts, or claimed that the accounts had already been paid." They demanded "proof that could only be supplied by access to the banks' records."[42]

The problem was that the Swiss banking system was not designed to encourage the return of property. To the contrary, during and after the Holocaust, as Professor Neuborne described it, Switzerland was "the only developed country without an escheat law."[43] In Switzerland, "long-dormant accounts do not escheat to the state, but continue to be held on the banks' books under the fiction that the true owner may turn up some day. In the meantime, the banks get to use the money. At the same time, Swiss law authorizes the destruction of bank records when an account has been dormant for 10 years. So much for worrying about owners of abandoned accounts. The reality is that Swiss banks treat abandoned accounts as found money, subject only to a fictive reserve against future claimants. Thus, not only was there no list of abandoned property to check, the banks had a huge economic incentive to deny the existence of the Holocaust-era accounts, since they got to keep the money, and had a made-to-order authorization to destroy records of any account that was dormant for 10 years."[44]

The banks also were "unwilling to acknowledge" that they had transferred "Jewish-owned Swiss bank deposits to the Reichsbank on the basis of coerced authorizations," since that practice "called their loyalty to depositors in question, and because they feared being asked to pay again since carrying out coerced payments to third-persons violated Swiss law."[45] Judge Korman observed in a 2004 opinion that it "is possible to imagine situations where a bank's decision to order a forced transfer would have been morally justified as a way to protect a client's life, but that was clearly not the case for these banks. These banks did not decide to order forced transfers because they thought it would serve their clients well — they did so to 'avoid friction and unpleasantness' with their business interests in Germany. Unpleasantness for their clients was not even a consideration."[46] The question was "'not whether [the Swiss banking industry] should or could have maintained its [business contacts with Nazi powers], but rather how far these activities went: in other words, where the line should have been drawn between unavoidable concessions and intentional collaboration.'"[47] The banks "drew a line quite near intentional collaboration."[48]

The Court, drawing upon the conclusions of experts who had studied the Swiss banking system, noted that the banks "stonewalled" in the face of post-War questions, which "was generally an effective way for the Swiss banks to insulate themselves from liability and benefit economically."[49] The banks' destruction of records facilitated their goal. While the "Swiss banks generally complied with Swiss law on record keeping," this was "precisely the ruse. The Swiss Code of Obligations requires only that banks keep correspondence and accounting records for a period of ten years, regardless of whether an account is open or closed. If the banks could stonewall for ten years, then they could 'legally' destroy the very documents which might answer claimants' questions. This is exactly what they did. Banks 'regularly and systematically' destroyed material that was ten years old…. And thus the banks destroyed countless records that might have been critical in explaining their Nazi era actions with respect to accounts once held by Nazi victims. The destruction was part of the banks' ordinary course of business, and it was massive…. [T]he banks made no effort to save relevant documents, despite the fact that they knew Nazi victims and their representatives were clamoring for them."[50]

Frustrated with the banks' continuing efforts to downplay their misconduct, even after the 1999 settlement, the Court in 2004 was "compel[led] to "write," because "over the past year-and-a-half, the bank defendants have filed a series of frivolous and offensive objections to the distribution process…. These objections bring to mind the theory that, 'if you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it.' The 'Big Lie' for the Swiss banks is that during the Nazi era and in its wake, the banks never engaged in substantial wrongdoing."[51]

Michael Bradfield, who served as legal counsel to the committee that investigated Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts (the "Volcker Committee," headed by former U.S. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul Volcker), and with Volcker subsequently was appointed one of the Court's Special Masters, had a similar view. He noted: "[T]here [was] really a historical failure here. There [was] a historical failure. The Swiss had many opportunities from the

With no apparent remedy under the Swiss banking system, Holocaust victims and their heirs turned to the United States courts.

B. Early Efforts to Recover Assets

The first of the class action lawsuits relating to claims against Swiss banks and other entities was filed in October 1996.[53] But the events outlined in the lawsuits had occurred decades earlier. As framed by Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat, who played an important role in the Holocaust compensation movement beginning in the 1990s and who remains actively involved with Holocaust compensation issues:

> Why the sudden surge of interest in these tragic events of five decades ago? There are a variety of explanations. The end of the Cold War gave us the chance to examine issues long pushed to the background. Some previously unavailable documents have been declassified, and made publicly available. As Holocaust survivors come to the end of their lives, they have an urgent desire to ensure that long-suppressed facts come to light and to see a greater degree of justice to assuage, however slightly, their sufferings. And a younger generation seeks a deeper understanding of one of the most profound events of the twentieth century as we enter the twenty-first.[54]

The lawsuits resulting in the Settlement Agreement, while the most well-known, were not the first attempt to recover assets deposited in Switzerland that belonged to victims of Nazi persecution or their heirs. Rather, the litigation was part of a continuing series of efforts that began immediately after World War II.

Following the War, the Allies — the United States, Great Britain and France — sought the return of monetary gold and other assets that the Nazis had looted and deposited in neutral countries, including Switzerland.[55] On January 14, 1946, as a result of the Paris Reparations Conference, 18 countries entered into the Agreement on Reparation from Germany, Establishment of Inter-Allied Reparation Agency, and Restitution of Monetary Gold (the "Paris Reparations Agreement").[56] The Paris Reparations Agreement provided for: (i) restitution on a sharing basis of monetary gold looted by Nazi Germany; (ii) allocation of all nonmonetary gold[57] found in Germany to the relief and resettlement of surviving Nazi persecutees; (iii) establishment of a $25 million fund (out of German external assets located in neutral countries) for the rehabilitation and resettlement of Nazi persecutees; and (iv) the establishment of organizational structures, including the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency, to effectuate the Agreement.[58] Allied representatives "were instructed to take possession of German external assets in neutral countries (such assets in Allied nations were to be taken by the Allied nations themselves)" and to "'request' that neutrals turn over 'heirless assets' or their proceeds to the persecutees, for relief and resettlement."[59]

After the Paris Reparations Agreement was entered into force, the Allies negotiated with other countries, including Switzerland, in an effort to implement the Agreement. As a result of these negotiations, on May 25, 1946, Switzerland and the Allies entered into the Accord on the Multilateral Liquidation of German Property in Switzerland (the "Washington Accord").[60] Pursuant to the Washington Accord, Switzerland agreed to transfer approximately $58 million in gold and 50% of liquidated German assets located in the country to the Allies, who would then use such funds to reconstruct devastated areas of Europe and to assist stateless Nazi victims.[61] Switzerland also agreed, via a side letter, to "examine sympathetically" the means by which to place the assets of heirless Nazi victims found in Switzerland at the disposal of the Allies for purposes of refugee relief and rehabilitation.[62]

Under the terms of the Washington Accord, Switzerland paid approximately $58 million in monetary gold[63] to the Tripartite Gold Commission (the "TGC").[64] According to the Eizenstat Report, however, Switzerland did not comply fully with its obligation under the Washington Accord to liquidate and pay 50% of German assets to the Allies. The Swiss raised numerous objections, argued over exchange rates, and refused to recognize an exemption for assets of surviving or heirless German Jews, maintaining that such assets were subject to liquidation.[65] A compromise was reached in 1952 whereby Switzerland paid $28 million in German assets.[66]

To comply with the side letter concerning dormant, unclaimed assets referenced in the 1946 Washington Accord, the Swiss Bankers Association ("SBA") in 1947 requested that each of its member banks report the unclaimed ("heirless") assets of Nazi persecutees in its possession.[67] Very little information, however, was revealed.

> The 1947 Survey did not produce a great deal of information. It was a relatively informal survey ignored by some banks and not taken seriously enough by others. The survey reported assets with a total of only SFr. 482,000.[68]

Meanwhile, Swiss banking secrecy laws, enacted in 1934, made it extremely difficult for heirs of Nazi victims to obtain access to essential bank records and files, often blocking them from tracing the accounts of their deceased relatives. Other obstacles were raised, such as rules requiring official documentary evidence of the victims' death, or proof of the right of inheritance.[69] Not surprisingly, with the massive destruction and upheaval of the Holocaust, formal documentation usually was unavailable.

Jewish humanitarian organizations pressed for special legislation, particularly compulsory registration laws, to remedy the problem of dormant accounts and heirless assets.[70]

The SBA objected to such laws[71] and initiated another survey in 1956.[72] This survey requested banks to report those assets belonging to known or suspected Nazi persecutees who had no known heirs.[73] The scope of the survey, however, was "quite narrow," with ill-defined reporting categories.[74] The restrictive survey methods all but dictated the outcome:

> A most interesting aspect of the 1956 Survey is the manner in which it was initiated; the SBA apparently understood that the threatened legislation would not be enacted if the survey showed that the value of accounts was below SFr. 4 million. Thus, the SBA seemed to have a motivation to keep the numbers as low as possible. In fact, a letter from the SBA to its board members dated June 7, 1956, which included a discussion of the survey, stated "[a] meager result from the survey will doubtless contribute to the resolution of this matter in our favor."
> Not surprisingly, the results of this survey were quite modest. Only four accounts were reported as being dormant accounts pertaining to known victims of Nazi persecution, while 82 dormant accounts pertain to assumed victims of Nazi violence. Only six cantonal banks participated in the survey; they reported a total of 14 accounts. Only one private bank reported accounts, and it reported only two accounts. The total value for the 86 accounts was SFr. 862,410. These results led the SBA to state in a letter to the Swiss President that the problem "by no means [had] the significance which the other side is constantly attempting to ascribe to it."[75]

In its 2004 opinion addressing the activities of the Swiss banks during and after the Holocaust, the Court observed of the ineffective 1956 survey:

> "[T]he banks and their Association lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of … so called 'heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated the … controversy of the last 30 years."[76] Indeed, in order to thwart such legislation, the SBA encouraged Swiss banks to underreport the number of such accounts in a 1956 survey. "A meager result from the survey," it said, "will doubtless contribute to the resolution of this matter [the proposed legislation] in our > favor."[77] …. The banks adhered to the SBA's recommendation: "For instance, Swiss Bank Corporation (Schweizerischer Bankverein, SBV) indicated in 1956 that it could not state 'with certainty' that it had such accounts but there were 13 cases (with a total value of 82,000 francs) where this was probable."[78] Given what the Volcker Committee was able to find 40 years later [over 36,000 victim accounts], these estimates were clearly nothing more than a lie.[79]

Historian David M. Crowe has posed the question: "Why did Switzerland get off so easily?" The answer was related to Cold War politics. "In addition to worrying about the use of Swiss funds to revive a Nazi movement in Europe, the Western powers were concerned about keeping Switzerland in the Allied camp during the early stages of the cold war. Switzerland was viewed as a key player in rebuilding Europe, and the Allies did not want Switzerland, which was already doing a lot of business with the Soviet Union, to strengthen its economic ties with the Kremlin."[80]

A few years later, in 1962, the Swiss government again faced questions over the still-open issue of unclaimed assets deposited in Swiss banks by Nazi victims. In response, the Swiss Parliament passed the Federal Resolution of December 20, 1962 (the "1962 Resolution").[81] This statute preempted bank secrecy laws. It required individuals and institutions "administering, possessing, holding in safekeeping or overseeing" the assets in Switzerland of "foreign nationals or stateless persons about whom no reliable information has been received since [] May 9, 1945 and who are known or presumed to have fallen victim to racial, religious or political persecution," to register any such unclaimed assets with a central registration office at the Federal Justice

Ministry.[82] The law provided for a five year period to make claims for such funds and the entire process was to last ten years.[83]

The 1962 Resolution met with considerable resistance. The commission of historians appointed by Switzerland to investigate that nation's Holocaust-era activities, the "Bergier Commission"[84] (after its chair, Jean-Françoise Bergier) pointed out that in Switzerland, "there were strong objections to the use of the term 'Wiedergutmachung'[85] [restitution] after 1945. This became apparent during the discussions of 1962 …. Addressing a National Council committee meeting, Federal Councillor Ludwig von Moos (Catholic Conservative People's Party) denied that there was any moral obligation on Switzerland in the sense of 'Wiedergutmachung.'"[86] Federal Councillor von Moos stated that "'Switzerland has nothing to make amends for … either to the victims of Nazi persecution or to Jewish or other organizations

[84] The Bergier Commission was established by the Swiss Parliament on December 13, 1996 to examine the period prior to, during and immediately after the Second World War. One of its members was the economic historian Dr. Helen B. Junz. In 2004 the Court appointed Helen Junz as CRT Special Master.

On March 22, 2002, the Bergier Commission issued its final report, as well as a number of detailed studies, concerning the activities of the Swiss banks and other institutions during the Holocaust period. See BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 5.

[85] "Wiedergutmachung" is a German phrase used in the Holocaust compensation context, literally meaning "making good again." However, as observed by the late Saul Kagan, a founder of the Claims Conference and a father of the Holocaust compensation movement, Wiedergutmachung implies making whole. That is "a term with which I [Mr. Kagan] have great difficulty and therefore do not use." Saul Kagan, Comment: A Participant's Response, in HOLOCAUST AND SHILUMIM: THE POLICY OF WIEDERGUTMACHUNG IN THE EARLY 1950S 53, 54 (Axel Frohn & Dr. Hartmut Lehmann eds., German Historical Institute 1991). See also id., Axel Frohn, Introduction: The Origins of Shilumim, at 1-2 (Israelis refer to compensation payments "with the Hebrew word Shilumim (recompense)," a term which indicates "that these payments did not imply an expiration of guilt, nor did their acceptance connote a sign of forgiveness…. Shilumim is fundamentally different from the German word Wiedergutmachung, which etymologically means returning to former conditions and, in a broader sense, to a former state of co-existence. and certainly not to the State of Israel,'" while "Social Democrat National Councillor Harald Huber, who had proposed the Registration Decree in 1957, took a quite similar tone: 'Actually, Switzerland has nothing to make amends for and countries are not entitled to make any claims.'"[87] In Switzerland, "the rejection of a claim for 'Wiedergutmachung' enjoyed a broad consensus."[88]

Fewer than one-third of the accounts initially considered in the 1962 Survey actually were reported. Only 1,374 accounts were registered with the central office (worth SFr 11.2 million after interest).[89] Of these assets, SFr. 3.5 million were determined to be outside the scope of the decree, thereby remaining with the asset managers or banks. Identifiable heirs received only SFr. 3.7 million.[90] SFr. 2.1 million and SFr. 1.1 million were distributed to the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities and the Swiss Central Office for Refugee Aid, respectively, and SFr. 464,000 and SFr. 325,000 were distributed to the Polish and the Hungarian Unclaimed Asset Funds, respectively.[91]

Critics have pointed out the shortcomings of the 1962 Resolution, including the absence of any meaningful enforcement mechanism to compel the banks' compliance, the exclusion of many potential claimants residing in Eastern Europe,[92] and loose rules, some of which exempted company accounts and deposits of those who died after World War II.[93] The Swiss adopted restrictive interpretations of the law, particularly with respect to the definition of "'victim of racial, religious, or political persecution,'" including only those persons who "'died a violent death or were missing because of the reasons for persecution as specified in the law.'"[94]

In the years that followed, the "powerful and secretive Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) used delusion and questions about adequate documentation to reject Holocaust-era claims. In the end, the Swiss banks paid few of the thousands of claims filed by Holocaust victims and their families. Until the mid-1990s, the banks claimed they were able to locate only about $2.5 million in stolen assets."[95]

C. 1990s - Continuing Efforts to Recover Assets

The atmosphere was different by the 1990s. This time, the issue did not go away. "[I]n contrast to previous decades, most of [the] stories concerned the bystanders rather than the perpetrators or victims. Swiss banks, international corporations, insurance companies, leading museums, the Red Cross, and the Vatican all found themselves under unprecedented pressure to account for their record during the Holocaust. Some opened up their archives in response. Most 'discovered' that they had terrible skeletons in their closet, though they may have knowingly kept those skeletons there. Now, however, they could not so easily deny their wartime wrongs and their postwar failings. They had held on to financial assets that rightfully belonged to survivors. These funds sat in their coffers while survivors were rebuffed, often in the most glib and callous fashion."[96]

By the 1990s, "the rules have changed. Bank secrecy laws are out. Transparency is in. Moral standards are increasingly global. World public opinion matters. Institutions of all kinds have taken big steps in confronting their past. After decades of appearing at the branches of Credit Suisse one at a time, now victims are taking action en masse. They are pooling their resources. They are receiving support from the wider Jewish community, the human rights community, and people of all persuasions who see the dispute in terms of equity."[97] An unsuccessful 1995 meeting between representatives of Swiss banks and the World Jewish Congress "foreclose[d] any chance of resolving the bank account claims without the public relations equivalent of hand-to-hand combat." [98] And so:

> A gale becomes a category-4 hurricane, with specific events feeding the storm: UBS is caught red-handed destroying World War II-era bank records. The Senate Banking Committee holds public hearings on the Swiss banking industry. The proposed merger of SBC and UBS is held up by the New York State Banking Department. Eizenstat's office at the State Department releases an inter-agency report highly critical of wartime gold laundering by the Swiss National Bank. The report suggests that actions by the Swiss may even have prolonged World War II. The plaintiffs' bar joins the fray and enlists Holocaust survivors in public relations efforts. European business executives, displaying a certain moral obtuseness, feed the fire. The WJC [World Jewish Congress] launches attack ads. The Swiss public, initially critical of the banks, does an about-face when scrutiny moves from the post-War behavior of the banks to the wartime actions of the Swiss government. Two blue-ribbon commissions [Volcker and Bergier] conclude that complicity was rife in Switzerland during the War and afterwards. Small but vocal minorities call for economic boycotts.[99]

Whereas historically, "[d]ebate was polarised between those who argued that rescue was possible, who accordingly held governments and leaders responsible for sins of omission, and those who did not," this time, the "eruption of the 'Nazi gold' issue from 1995 to 1999 suddenly and dramatically altered the basis of this compartmentalisation. The transformation began with the hearings of the US Senate Banking Committee, presided over by Senator Alfonse D'Amato in 1996-97, which publicised the accusations made against Swiss banks by Holocaust survivors. D'Amato provided an unprecedented platform for frail and elderly Jews whose murdered relatives had made deposits in these institutions prior to the war but whose heirs were prevented from retrieving the assets due to the duplicity or insensitivity of the banks when adjudicating claims. In 1997, investigators pursuing the Swiss hit upon a new line of attack when they realised that the Third Reich had sold to the Swiss national bank and commercial banks gold looted from the treasuries of conquered states and from the Jews. This was not news to historians, but there was global indignation that Switzerland had profited from the Nazi trade in plundered gold and astonishment when it was learned that international efforts to restitute the gold that had begun in 1945 were still continuing. Thanks to the inherent nature of the issue and the effect of media globalisation, the revelations about Swiss banks and the Nazi gold trade became the subject of worldwide comment. The current stance of Swiss bankers on the subject of 'dormant accounts' as well as the fate of the surviving 'Nazi gold' was the focus of intense international lobbying and rapidly climbed the political agenda in dozens of countries."[100]

It was this unique confluence of history and politics that led to further academic investigation in Switzerland, global media attention, and, eventually, class action lawsuits in the United States.

1. A Reexamination of Assets in Switzerland

In late 1992, Jacques Picard, a Swiss historian, published a report entitled "Switzerland and the Assets of the Missing Victims of the Nazis."[101] The Picard Report raised numerous questions about Switzerland's treatment of assets in the country belonging to victims of racial, religious and political persecution following World War II.[102]

Thereafter, the media began to recount cases of Swiss banks dismissing seemingly legitimate claims of elderly, impoverished Holocaust survivors. Journalist Peter Gumbel wrote an article that appeared on the front page of The Wall Street Journal on June 21, 1995.[103] Gumbel stated that "[f]or 50 years, since the end of the war, [Swiss] banks … have cast a dismissive blanket of silence over the question of what they did with accounts opened by Jews and others who were then persecuted, and often murdered, by the Nazis."[104] At approximately the same time, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the end of the war, May 7, 1995, Swiss President Kaspar Villiger brought to light an additional concern: he publicly stated that Switzerland needed to apologize for refusing entry into the country to thousands of Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany both before and during World War II. This statement garnered additional international media attention.[105]

The Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS) and the Swiss Bank Corporation (SBC) in 1995 acknowledged the possibility that they still retained unclaimed assets of Nazi victims.[106] The SBA agreed to establish a working group to conduct another survey[107] and issued guidelines that relaxed certain documentary requirements relating to bank account claims.[108]

The 1995 survey consisted of two parts: a preliminary survey and a main survey. The SBA reported the results of the preliminary survey in September 1995 and revealed a total of 893 dormant accounts, with a value of SFr. 40.9 million. The results of the main survey were reported in February 1996 and revealed an even lower amount: 775 accounts, with a value of SFr. 38.7 million (approximately $32 million).[109]

The SBA board minutes pertaining to the 1995 review suggest that there may have been an inherent bias in the survey, contributing to the lower-than-expected results.[110] The purpose of the 1995 survey, as set forth in the SBA board minutes, was to support the prior investigation and deflect the media. Thus, it was intended to show

In the meantime, members of the World Jewish Restitution Organization ("WJRO") and the World Jewish Congress ("WJC") continued to negotiate with the SBA regarding the restitution of Jewish assets and property.[112] In December 1995, dissatisfied with the progress of the negotiations, WJRO/WJC President Edgar M. Bronfman[113] and WJC Executive Secretary Dr. Israel Singer enlisted the support of Senator Alfonse D'Amato of New York, Chairman of the United States Senate Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee.[114] Senator D'Amato held a hearing on April 23, 1996 to inquire about dormant Swiss bank accounts possibly belonging to Nazi victims.[115]

At the same time, a study led by Ambassador Eizenstat about the Swiss role during World War II, and particularly its gold transactions, was under way in the United States. Meanwhile, in Switzerland, two expert commissions — one headed by former Chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board Paul A. Volcker, and one led by Swiss historian Jean-François Bergier — were gearing up for their own investigations.

By letter to Bronfman dated September 8, 1995, President Clinton similarly expressed his "support [of] the efforts of the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the World Jewish Congress to help resolve the question of Jewish properties confiscated during and after the Second World War." 2. The Volcker Committee

In a Memorandum of Understanding dated May 2, 1996, the SBA, the WJRO and the WJC agreed to establish the ICEP (also known as the Volcker Committee), chaired by Paul A. Volcker.[116] In addition to Volcker, ICEP consisted of three members and two alternates appointed by the WJRO and three members and two alternates appointed by the SBA, as well as a special consultant. The Committee also was led by legal counsel, Michael Bradfield, whom Judge Korman later appointed CRT Special Master along with Paul Volcker, and who remained actively involved with the Holocaust-era bank accounts issue throughout the settlement and distribution process.[117]

ICEP's main objectives, as described in the report produced at the end of the audit (known as the "Volcker Report"), were:

> (a) to identify accounts in Swiss banks of victims of Nazi persecution that have lain dormant since World War II or have otherwise not been made available to those victims or their heirs; and (b) to assess the treatment of the accounts of victims of Nazi persecution by Swiss banks.[118]

Dormant accounts were "broadly" defined "to mean those accounts with respect to which there have been no withdrawals or additions by, and no correspondence or other contacts with the accounts holders or their representatives or with the beneficiaries since at least the end of 1945 as well as accounts that should have been dormant as described above but for the fact that the funds in the account are unavailable for reasons other than their return to the original ICEP members Curt Gasteyger (Professor at the Graduate Institute of International Studies in Geneva, Switzerland), Klaus Jacobi (former State Secretary for Foreign Affairs of Switzerland and Swiss Ambassador to the United States) and Peider Mengiardi (former Chairman of the Board of Directors and Chief Executive Officer of ATAG Ernst & Young), and alternates Hans J. Baer (former Chairman of the Board of Directors of Bank Julius Baer) and René Rhinow (Professor of Law at the University of Basel and Senator in the Swiss Parliament) were appointed by the SBA. Michael Bradfield (then of the law firm Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue) was appointed as legal counsel to ICEP. Mr. Bradfield, with Paul Volcker, subsequently was appointed by Judge Korman as CRT Special Master. depositors or their legal representatives."[119] The latter statement referred to closed accounts — which proved to be a crucial component of the banks' inventory, and a central component of the eventual claims process.

ICEP employed five major auditing firms. "ICEP's investigation covered a period of more than 60 years" and included a review of "[a]ll available records" relating to the 1933-1945 time period from "some 254 Swiss banks existing in 1945."[120] The banks examined "represent[ed] 82 percent of the Swiss banking system in 1945 and nearly all deposits of foreign account holders, and include[d] all banks most likely to have attracted significant deposits from Holocaust victims."[121]

At the outset of the ICEP investigation, the Swiss banks pledged their "support and cooperation." At hearings held before the House Committee on Banking and Financial Services on December 11, 1996, for example, Dr. Georg Krayer, Chairman of the SBA, stated that:

> First, the SBA, its members and the Swiss bank supervisors are committed to providing their full support and cooperation to the [ICEP] audit and abiding by its results…. Second, the auditors will have full access to all relevant information. Third, because of this access, the audit findings will represent the best attainable results and therefore must be accepted as conclusive by all responsible parties.[122]

Consistent with Dr. Krayer's statement, on January 22, 1997, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission (the "SFBC") declared the ICEP audits as "official special audits" under the Swiss Banking Act of 1934 and the Swiss Banking Ordinance of 1972.[123] This declaration empowered the SFBC to compel the banks' cooperation with the ICEP investigation, and ensured that the

ICEP auditors would have "full and unfettered access" to relevant bank files, including customer files protected by bank secrecy legislation.[124]

In a further effort to support the ICEP process, the SFBC and the SBA agreed with ICEP in June 1997 to establish the Claims Resolution Tribunal (a process known as "CRT-I," as distinguished from the later "CRT-II" process that operated under the Court's authority). CRT-I had the mandate of analyzing claims to certain dormant accounts in Swiss banks dating from the pre-War era. According to a Joint Press Release issued by the SFBC and ICEP on June 27, 1997, this claims resolution process was to include the following elements:

- "An SFBC circular letter to Swiss banks requiring them to report the accounts of residents and non-residents of Switzerland that have been dormant since 1945,"
- "Publication of the names and other information on these accounts, with additional names publications [sic] to follow when other dormant accounts are identified by the Swiss banks or the ICEP process," and
- "An independent and objective international claims resolution panel to definitively and equitably decide claims, operating under liberal rules of evidence, with its decisions, in the form of written opinions, taken after due consideration of the representations of the claimants."[125]

Tight deadlines were set for implementation of the claims resolution process, including a deadline of July 23, 1997 for worldwide publication of the first list of dormant accounts belonging to foreign residents or nationals, and a deadline of October 20, 1997 for publication of a second list of domestic dormant accounts.[126] Consistent with these public statements, and with the encouragement of ICEP, the SFBC conducted yet another survey, instructing all Swiss banks to report to ATAG Ernst & Young all accounts opened before May 9, 1945 that remained dormant since that time.[127] At the conclusion of the 1997 survey, 5,570 foreign accounts with an aggregate value of approximately SFr. 72.3 million were reported and published in newspapers internationally and on the internet.

It is important to note that the "CRT-I" claims process that followed the publication of these 5,570 accounts was distinct from the program later operated under the Court's authority. CRT-I resulted in payment of some $10 million, mostly for accounts of non-Holocaust victims. By contrast, the claims review process established after the Volcker Committee's audit ("Volcker audit" or "ICEP audit") was completed and the Settlement Agreement was approved, was operated under the supervision of the Court. This later process — "CRT-II" — returned almost $720 million to Holocaust victims and heirs.

ICEP's comprehensive investigation continued for three years. The direct costs of the investigation, borne by the Swiss banks, were in the range of SFr. 300 million.[128] The Swiss banks also incurred substantial internal expenses, including for staffing and for collecting, processing and analyzing documents.[129] According to ICEP, this costly investigation could have been wholly avoided had the SBA and its member banks agreed to publish the names of dormant account holders in the immediate aftermath of World War II. As stated in the Volcker Report:

> The Swiss commitment to bank secrecy and a concern about maintaining the integrity of that secrecy — ironically in part a response to foreign exchange controls in Germany and their use to persecute Jews there — were undoubtedly factors in the decision not to publish the names of the dormant account holders after World War II. Switzerland had an informed and vigorous debate extending over a number of years on this subject. Banks were also concerned that too liberal a regime for processing claims to dormant accounts would result in payments to the wrong parties and double liability for the banks. Unfortunately, the banks and their Association lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of such so called 'heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated the ICEP investigation and the controversy of the last 30 years. An historic opportunity was missed.[130]

On December 6, 1999, the Volcker Committee released its final report containing the results of its three-year investigation. The "Volcker Report"

- determined that 6,858,116 accounts existed in Swiss banks between 1933 and 1945, either opened prior to or during that period, and remaining open throughout those years; however, no bank records remained for 2,757,950 (approximately one-third) of these accounts;
- described the auditors' review of records for the approximately 4.1 million Swiss Holocaust-era accounts for which documentation did still exist;[131]
- matched the names of account holders against the names of victims of Nazi persecution with respect to approximately 2.25 million accounts, approximately one-third of the total. The matching process was not undertaken regarding 1,065,630 domestic Swiss accounts and 784,791 small savings accounts in the interests of speed and manageability of the audit process, and thus, as stated by the Volcker Committee, "the total of the number and value of accounts with some presumption of involvement with victims of Nazi persecution identified by the [ICEP] investigation is clearly conservative;"[132]
- concluded that 53,886 accounts [subsequently reduced to approximately 36,000] had a "probable or possible relationship to victims of Nazi persecution;"[133]
- noted that the auditors had "reported no evidence of systematic destruction of records of victim accounts, organized discrimination against the accounts of victims of Nazi persecution, or concerted efforts to divert the funds of victims of Nazi persecution to improper purposes;"[134] and
- determined that there was "confirmed evidence of questionable and deceitful actions by some individual banks in the handling of accounts of victims, including withholding of information from Holocaust victims or their heirs about their accounts, inappropriate closing of accounts, failure to keep adequate records, many cases of insensitivity to the efforts of victims or heirs of victims to claim dormant or closed accounts, and a general lack of diligence — even active resistance — in response to earlier private and official inquiries about dormant accounts."[135]

These findings — that tens of thousands of accounts belonged to Holocaust victims (a number far greater than the few "hundreds" of accounts previously reported in earlier surveys) — very likely were unexpected by Swiss financial and banking authorities.

Lead Settlement Counsel Neuborne has written of his initial reluctance to accept the Volcker audit in place of traditional discovery through the litigation process. His reservations largely dissipated when the Volcker Committee released its conclusions:

> I initially called the whole thing a huge whitewash, but I was wrong. The Volcker audit wasn't as reliable as letting independent accountants hired by the lawyers look hard at the banks' records, and it came much too late because the banks had destroyed so much data, but it wasn't a whitewash. Many of the folks who carried out the audits, especially Michael Bradfield, Volcker's right-hand man, were deeply committed and very conscientious. In the end, though, they saw only what had survived destruction, and only what the banks allowed them to see. Despite the massive destruction of the historical record, the Volcker auditors eventually discovered traces of 36,000 Swiss bank accounts that were "probable or possible" unpaid Holocaust-era accounts. Who knows how many they missed because of the total record destruction of 2.8 million accounts and the banks' intransigence about opening their books?[136]

The Volcker Committee made several key recommendations.[137] These recommendations were described by Chairman Paul Volcker in his February 9, 2000 statement before the House Committee on Banking and Financial Services:[138]

- "The SFBC should promptly authorize consolidation of the existing but scattered auditor workpapers and databases (established during the ICEP investigation) relating to 4.1 million accounts open in the 1933-1945 period, and assembly of them into a central archive that can be used in a claims resolution process."
- "The SFBC should authorize publication of the names of holders of approximately 25,000 accounts having the highest probability of a relationship to victims of Nazi persecution."[139]
- "Any person with a claim to a dormant account of a victim, whether or not the name is published, should be provided facilities for resolving such claims through the CRT. Existing claims compiled by the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office[140] and others should be matched against the centralized database of accounts, and resolved by the CRT."

- "To provide a fair return to victims (and their heirs), whose accounts became de facto illiquid, individual account values should be adjusted on the basis of long-term Swiss rates of interest, involving multiplying 1945 account values by 10 times."[141]

The head of the Swiss banking system had committed to the audit process in testimony before the United States Congress, stating during a 1996 hearing that the "the audit findings will represent the best attainable results and therefore must be accepted as conclusive by all responsible parties."[142] Once the Volcker audit was completed, however, Swiss banking authorities seemed somewhat less inclined to adopt the results. Thus, on the same day that the Volcker Report was released, December 6, 1999, the SFBC issued its own press release stating that it was "solely responsible for decisions on publishing further lists of accounts;" that it would "analyze individual ICEP recommendations on archiving data, further publication of unclaimed assets, and handling of claims;" and that it would "decide on the ICEP recommendations in the first quarter of 2000 after consulting other parties concerned."[143]

Nearly four months later, on March 30, 2000, the SFBC announced that it had "authorized" the Swiss banks to: (i) "publish 26,000 [later reduced to 21,000] accounts … deemed by the Volcker Committee to have a probability of being related to victims of the Holocaust;" and (ii) "create a central data base containing 46,000 [later reduced to 36,000] accounts that the Volcker Committee consider[ed] to be probably or possibly related to Holocaust victims."[144] The SFBC declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to create a central database for all 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss banks in the 1933-1945 period, stating that such a large central database was "neither necessary nor meaningful" because "ICEP itself had, after a very thorough investigation, no reason to believe that these accounts were in any way related to victims of [the] Holocaust."[145]

As the Court observed in its Final Approval Order, ICEP Chairman Paul Volcker later clarified in a letter to SFBC Chairman Kurt Hauri that the "exclusion of millions of small savings accounts and Swiss address accounts from the ICEP analysis in the interest of speedy and manageable results does not, and cannot, mean that none of those accounts were Holocaust related."[146] Volcker concluded that "'there will be some limited but significant number of Holocaust related accounts to be found among the millions of savings and Swiss address accounts that [were] arbitrarily excluded from [ICEP's] research…. [and that,] [t]o the extent that such accounts can be practically and expeditiously identified, which is what the test experiment suggests is entirely feasible, the effort should be done to put this matter to rest.'"[147]

Following the SFBC's March 30 Press Release, the parties continued to negotiate the Swiss banks' implementation of the Volcker Committee's recommendations. The two defendant banks, UBS and Credit Suisse, ultimately agreed to:

- "cooperate in assembling information concerning their portion of the [21,000] 'probable' accounts referred to in the SFBC's March 30 order … to permit expeditious publication of names and other identifying information associated with those accounts after approval of a final plan of allocation and distribution;"
- "cooperate in achieving an earlier publication date if approval of the allocation and distribution plan encounters substantial delays, if it is possible to assemble the information needed for publication prior to such approval and if an adequate court-approved claims process is in place to assist claimants;"
- "create a centralized electronic database relating to their share of the [approximately 36,000] accounts referred to in the Volcker Report" as "probably" or "possibly" related to Holocaust victims;

- "permit the personnel of the Claims Resolution Tribunal established under the Settlement Agreement to have convenient access to the centralized database of the [approximately 36,000] accounts and to the Volcker Committee's auditors' paper files in connection with such accounts;"
- "assist[ ] in the matching of claims to accounts that claims personnel have a reasoned and satisfactory basis for concluding may be listed under a Swiss address (including accounts opened in the names of intermediaries) against existing bank databases containing 2.1 million accounts opened during the relevant period;" and
- "'consider in a spirit of cooperation requests for further assistance in any particular cases where there is a reasonably strong likelihood that further assistance would provide probative information and where the costs of such further assistance do not outweigh the potential benefits.'"[148]

The significant impact of the Volcker Committee's findings, the Swiss banks' reaction to them, and the Court's decisions incorporating these findings into the claims process, is the subject of the chapter in this Final Report entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process."

Further historical context for the settlement and all of the claims processes that followed is provided below.

3. The Eizenstat Report

In late 1996, President Clinton commissioned a special inter-agency task force under the supervision of Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat to investigate and prepare a report describing the Allied efforts to recover and restore Nazi looted gold and other assets after World War II.[149] The Eizenstat Report, released in May 1997, detailed Switzerland's relationship with Nazi Germany and highlighted Switzerland's handling of looted gold and other assets.[150]

[150] See id. The task force led by Stuart E. Eizenstat released a second report in June 1998, entitled "U.S. and Allied Wartime and Postwar Relations and Negotiations With Argentina, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Turkey on Looted Gold and German External Assets and U.S. Concerns About the Fate of the Wartime Ustasha Treasury" (Supplement to Preliminary Study on U.S. and Allied Efforts to Restore Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden by Germany During World War II).

> Switzerland was Nazi Germany's banker and financial facilitator, taking and transferring German gold — most of it looted — and providing Germany with Swiss francs to purchase needed products. Switzerland also supplied Germany with key war materials such as arms, ammunition, aluminum, machinery and locomotives.[151]

The Eizenstat Report concluded that the "acceptance of the stolen gold in exchange for critically important goods and raw materials helped sustain the Nazi regime and prolong its war effort."[152]

The Swiss Federal Council criticized the Eizenstat Report as being "one-sided" and containing "unsupported" conclusions and "political and moral judgments that go beyond the historical report."[153] Some years later, the historians whom Switzerland had commissioned to examine the nation's wartime past — the Bergier Commission — while not considering Switzerland to have prolonged the war,[154] agreed that Swiss institutions had played an important role in assisting Nazi Germany.

Historian David M. Crowe has noted that "Swiss banks acted as an important conduit for gold reserves stolen from the various countries occupied by the Germans, and, presumably, gold stolen from Holocaust victims. In fact, almost four-fifths of Germany's shipments of gold went through Swiss banks…. According to a U.S. Army intelligence report, 'Switzerland constituted the principal foreign market for the large quantities of gold which Germany spent in financing her war effort.'" Crowe, The Holocaust: Roots, History, and Aftermath, at 353. Crowe drew his findings from the BERGIER FINAL REPORT, which noted (at 238) that during World War II, "Switzerland was the most important market for gold from the territories controlled by the Third Reich. Almost four-fifths of the Reichsbank's gold shipments abroad were arranged via Switzerland." The Bergier Commission observed that it was "hardly surprising that the SNB's [Swiss National Bank's] decisions have — quite legitimately — been the subject of historical and moral assessment on frequent occasions, and that its decisions are judged as having been reprehensible." 4. The Bergier Commission

On December 13, 1996, the Swiss Parliament passed a decree establishing the Bergier Commission,[155] which on December 19, 1996 received a mandate from the Swiss Federal Council to "examine the period prior to, during, and immediately after the Second World War."[156] The Bergier Commission consisted of ten members, including distinguished scholars from Switzerland, the United States, Israel and Poland.[157]

The Bergier Commission released two preliminary reports followed by a comprehensive final report. In July 1998, the Bergier Commission offered its initial assessment of wartime gold transactions between Switzerland and Germany, reaching many conclusions similar to Eizenstat.[158] Thus, the Bergier Gold Report concluded that the Swiss National Bank (the "SNB"), an institution "supervised by the Swiss government," played an important role in handling Reichsbank gold, and that the commercial banks played a less significant but still noteworthy role.[159]

> During World War II, Switzerland was the most important conduit for gold originating from countries occupied or controlled by the Third Reich. Roughly 79 percent of all gold shipments from the Reichsbank to other countries were routed through Switzerland. In terms of volume, the SNB accounted for 87 percent of this bar, with Swiss commercial banks handling the remaining 13 percent ….

[157] Jean-François Bergier (a Swiss historian) was appointed Chairman of the Bergier Commission. The other nine members of the Bergier Commission were: Wladyslaw Bartoszewski (Poland), Linus von Castelmur (Switzerland), Saul Friedländer (Israel), Harold James (United States), Georg Kreis (Switzerland), Sybil Milton (United States), Jacques Picard (Switzerland), Jakob Tanner (Switzerland) and Joseph Voyame (Switzerland). Sybil Milton passed away during her tenure, as did Joseph Voyame. Voyame was replaced by Daniel Thürer, and Milton was replaced by Dr. Helen Junz. The Court subsequently appointed Helen Junz to serve as a CRT Special Master.

> [T]he value of the gold delivered by the Reichsbank to the SNB was between SFr. 1.6 and SFr. 1.7 billion.[160]

The SNB was engaged in significant gold transactions with Nazi Germany. However, the Bergier Commission found no evidence that the SNB was aware that some of the gold it received from Germany was looted from individual victims of the Nazis.

> The total value of the gold shipped by the Reichsbank to Switzerland which is known to have been stolen from the victims of Nazi oppression is SFr. 581,899. Although the subject of gold confiscated from Jewish deportees was discussed by the SNB management in late 1943, there is no indication that those responsible for deciding SNB policy were aware of the origin of such gold shipped by the Reichsbank to Switzerland.[161]

The Bergier Commission did conclude, however, that if the SNB did not know that the gold came from Nazi victims, the SNB nevertheless was aware that much of the gold it received from Germany had been taken from occupied countries. To that extent, the Bergier Commission found that the SNB's gold transactions during the Holocaust era were not in good faith.

> From today's perspective, the SNB's claims that it acted in good faith and that Switzerland's neutrality obliged it to accept the gold offered by Nazi Germany are clearly not justified …. SNB officials became aware while the war was still in progress that the precious metal being shipped by the Reichsbank to Switzerland included gold that had been looted. Swiss neutrality in no way obliged the country to accept stolen gold…. [E]conomic deterrence [of an alleged possible German invasion] was an argument cobbled together a posteriori to justify the previous gold policy.[162]

The Bergier Commission released its second preliminary report, the Bergier Refugee Report, on December 10, 1999. The Report condemned the Swiss decisions to (1) demand that Germany mark the passports of Jewish persons with a "J" stamp in 1938; and (2) seal its borders to "racially" persecuted refugees in 1942.[163] Although the Bergier Commission noted that many refugees were granted asylum by Switzerland during the War,[164] it also found that "Switzerland declined to help people in mortal danger," and that "[a] more humane policy might have saved thousands of refugees from being killed by the Nazis and their accomplices."[165] The Bergier Commission concluded that the exact number of refugees refused entry into or expelled from Switzerland could not be determined, but there was verifiable proof that approximately 24,500 refugees were turned away at the border or expelled between January 1940 and May 1945, and approximately 14,500 entry applications were rejected.[166]

On March 22, 2002, the Bergier Commission released its Final Report.[167] At the same time, the Swiss Federal Council issued a "declaration" that acknowledged that "together with other studies, those of the ICE [another name for the Bergier Commission] establish clear cases of negligence after the war with regard to the restitution of property. The Federal Council expresses its sincere regrets to all those people who suffered the consequences of this. It hopes the measures which have been taken in the last few years will contribute to rectify these errors and cases of negligence."[168]

The Bergier Commission sharply criticized Swiss banking practices and refugee policies. As to the banks, some of the more significant findings were that:

- Swiss banks cooperated with Nazi authorities in forcing account owners to transfer assets under duress. The "banks complied with the instructions of their German customers signed at times under duress, and transferred securities to the German banks indicated."[169]
- After the war, the "banks were able to use the amounts remaining in the [dormant] accounts and to earn income from them. They showed little interest in actively seeking accounts of Nazi victims, justifying their inaction with the confidentiality desired by their customers."[170]

- Although account holders or their heirs attempted to contact the banks after the war, they were provided incomplete or "misleading" answers. "Some banks gave a factually correct but misleading answer, namely that there was no longer any contact between the bank and the person in question. Others in addition referred to the statutory duty to keep files for ten years and stated that they were unable to provide information on the assets being sought – although relevant documents are still available in the archives today."[171]
- The banks' reluctance to locate heirless assets was clear during the 1950s, when the "big banks co-ordinated their response to heirs,"[172] and continued beyond the 1950s as well.
- The banks relied upon search fees and the reduction of account balances to deflect claimant inquiries.[173]

The Final Bergier Report was released in March 2002, well after many significant events had taken place in the lawsuit: the parties by then had agreed to settle the class action claims (1998) and had signed the Settlement Agreement (1999); the Court had issued its final approval of the settlement (2000); the Court of Appeals had upheld the settlement's approval (2001); and the claims processes were substantially under way. The Bergier Commission's findings were significant, and the Court took them into account in a 2004 opinion, emphasizing that "the Swiss banks' devotion to secrecy and their repeated acts of stonewalling were not based on principles — they were profit-driven…. As the Bergier Commission found, 'it is apparent that the claims of surviving Holocaust victims were usually rejected under the pretext of banking secrecy and a clear preference for continuity in private law. Over the many years of such rejections, a large number of accounts were reduced to zero or almost.' …. Where economics counseled against upholding secrecy, private law and property rights, however, the banks were quick to abandon their supposedly entrenched values."[174]

Of the Final Bergier Report, Ambassador Stuart Eizenstat observed:

> Perhaps even more historic were the shocking discoveries in Switzerland's own Bergier Commission report, which came out in March 2002 — revelations that went well beyond the findings in our 1997 Nazi gold report. No country before or since has commissioned such a critical examination of an important part of its own history as the Swiss did here.... Certainly the Swiss public has been bombarded with a whole new set of facts about the conduct of their government and their banks during and after World War II. The Bergier report went far beyond ours. It found multiple violations of Swiss neutrality by the acceptance of looted gold; the unregulated railway traffic, including Nazi war criminals in flight; the camouflaging of German business interests; and the use of some 11,000 forced laborers in Swiss-owned factories located in Nazi Germany. The Swiss Bank Corporation, whose merger with Union Bank of Switzerland was so controversial during our negotiations, was found to have violated its own country's laws by helping German firms trade in stolen securities…. Millions were returned to their German owners, the Bergier report confirmed, rather than to the Allies, as promised in its 1946 agreement with the United States, and the banks "obstructed the return of securities from Jews and inhabitants of occupied countries."[175]

The claims process arising from the settlement took into consideration the important findings of the Volcker Committee and the Bergier Commission. This resulted in the adoption of a number of inferences favorable to the Deposited Assets Class claimants. Presumptions were used to fill in the evidentiary gaps in the records. The court's administrative agent for the bank account claims — the Claims Resolution Tribunal in Zurich (CRT) — was authorized to presume that if evidence was missing, it was not the claimant, but the bank, that was at fault. Judge Korman instructed the CRT that it could apply the "adverse inference" principle to substitute for records that the banks had destroyed, a traditional remedy under U.S. law that presumes the destroyed evidence was unfavorable to the party responsible for its destruction.[176] The Settlement Fund in effect was now standing in the shoes of the bank defendants, which over a period of several decades had destroyed the evidence. The application of the adverse inference meant that as long as some record existed to show that a Holocaust victim had owned a Swiss bank account, the Settlement Fund would compensate a plausible claim even in the absence of data conclusively demonstrating the fate of the account.

Nijhoff 2012): "When the Swiss banks refused to cooperate with the Claims Resolution Tribunal, Judge Korman issued a scathing order explaining the application of adverse inferences against the Swiss banks. [He] did so based on 'decades of improper behavior by the Swiss banks.' The Swiss banks improperly authorized the forced transfer of money to the Nazis, had a policy of stonewalling when account holders or their heirs approached them for information, and systematically destroyed bank documents."

Thus, if the bank records did not show who closed an account, the CRT was permitted to presume that it was wrongfully closed. If the bank records did not show the amount in the account, the CRT was able to presume that the account had a designated average (presumptive) value. If the bank records did not show what type of account it was, or whether it was linked to other accounts, or whether it held securities, or whether it had been reported in a Nazi census, the Court directed the CRT to conduct its own research to make sure that nothing was missed and no legitimate claim remained unpaid. And where no documentary evidence could be found, if the claimant plausibly had indicated that a close relative had owned a Holocaust-era Swiss account, the claimant received a payment of $7,250 for this claim — a "plausible but undocumented award" ("PUA").

Beyond the Bergier Commission's findings about bank misconduct toward the Holocaust victims who had entrusted their assets to Swiss financial institutions, the Bergier Commission also had a harsh view of Swiss refugee policy. The Declaration accompanying the Final Bergier Report observed: "The Commission reminds us that Switzerland, in particular its political leaders, did not always respond to the humanitarian needs of the time. This is principally true of Swiss policy with regard to refugees. The fact that Switzerland offered shelter to more persecuted people than it turned away does not mitigate its responsibility towards those who were discriminated against as a result of the 'J' stamp, nor towards those whom it turned away and abandoned to unspeakable suffering, deportation and death."[177]

The Final Bergier Report noted that refugee policies were influenced by the anti-Semitism that had existed in Switzerland for many years before World War II:

> The aim to protect the country from "over-Jewification" ("Verjudung") had been growing in Switzerland since the First World War. This stance influenced naturalisation, which became increasingly restrictive. From 1916 onwards, files of candidates for naturalisation bore handwritten comments attesting the intention of making it difficult for Jews to gain Swiss citizenship. In 1919, the Federal Administration used a stamp in the form of the Star of David. Swiss civil servants used this system of stamping documents from 1936 onwards, and thus well before the introduction of the notorious stigmatisation [the "J"-stamp on German passports] in 1938.[178]

The Final Bergier Report also reaffirmed the earlier conclusions of the Bergier Interim Report on Refugees concerning restrictive Swiss policies toward Roma refugees:

> In practice, it was not only the various schemata that decided whether or not a particular refugee received asylum, but also social perceptions that overlaid the explicit regulations and were taken for granted to such an extent that they did not need to be expressed and are therefore rarely found in source materials. Nevertheless, they determined the practice of asylum policy as well as the fate of refugees. One such category was "Gypsies." A high-ranking customs official who remarked in 1936 that "beggars, vagabonds, Gypsies, etc." are "to be expelled immediately at the border", only confirmed routine police practice. A year earlier, the Police for Foreigners had complained to consulates that provided Roma and Sinti with transit visas for Switzerland that "the sight of the dirty passports and the photos of Gypsies pasted inside should" have been sufficient reason to deny permission to enter the country. One can conclude on the basis of such comments that "Gypsies" were considered a category of refugees to be rejected, although no directive explicitly named them as such.[179]

Victims of Hitler's regime were left with few options, in stark contrast to the more generous treatment Switzerland accorded even to actual Nazis:

> German claims pertaining to property law resulting from wartime camouflaging were … processed efficiently by the Swiss courts in the early 1950s. Even former Nazi perpetrators, who had argued over the division of the spoils, were able to air > their differences before Swiss courts. By contrast, the victims were consigned to the end of the queue for decades, so that numerous claims can now no longer be settled definitively.[180]

In summing up the impact of Switzerland's refugee policies, the Bergier Commission concluded that "the Swiss authorities were instrumental in helping the Nazi regime to attain its goals."[181]

The result of all of this scrutiny was that Switzerland "found itself battered by a few storms. A fair amount of damage was caused by the revelation that neutral Switzerland had behaved rather less well in the second world war than everybody had wanted to believe. It turned away too many Jewish would-be refugees at its borders; indeed [as of 2004], it ha[d] only just got around to pardoning those Swiss citizens who illegally helped Jews to enter the country during the Nazi period. Switzerland also bought great quantities of gold that Nazi Germany had looted from the occupied countries. And, after the war, anxious to preserve its banking secrecy in the face of money laundering charges, it did not look hard enough for money deposited in Swiss banks by Jews who died during the Holocaust. In defence of their wartime behaviour the Swiss pointed out, not unreasonably, that if they had antagonised the Nazis too much they might have been invaded too, which would have been worse for everyone. But their squeaky-clean image suffered, particularly in America."[182]

5. The Swiss Humanitarian Fund

Early on, when these "storms" that "battered" Switzerland[183] first began to brew, the SBA took some steps to address the claim that it had not responded adequately to the needs of Nazi victims. Thus, on February 26, 1997, the SBA announced the formation of the Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoa (the "Swiss Humanitarian Fund").[184] The Swiss

Humanitarian Fund was established "to support persons in need who were persecuted for reasons of their race, religion or political views or for other reasons, or otherwise were victims of the Holocaust/Shoa, as well as to support their descendants in need."[185]

The Swiss Humanitarian Fund originally was endowed with SFr. 100 million by the defendant Swiss banks — UBS, Credit Suisse and the Swiss Bank Corporation [186] — supplemented by SFr. 100 million contributed by the Swiss National Bank, SFr. 65 million contributed by other Swiss businesses, and an additional SFr. 8 million raised by appeals to the Swiss public. With interest, the Swiss Humanitarian Fund ultimately raised SFr. 294,892,293 (approximately $172,954,329 at the exchange rate in 2000).[187]

The Swiss Humanitarian Fund allocated 88% of its assets to benefit needy Jewish Holocaust victims, and the remaining 12% to benefit other Nazi victims, among them, Roma, Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexuals, persons with disabilities, political prisoners, and others.[188] Of the 88% allocated to Jewish victims, 35% was apportioned on a priority basis to the "double victims" of Central and Eastern Europe and the nations of the former Soviet Union, all of whom were presumed to be needy.[189] The Swiss Humanitarian Fund distributed SF 295 million to 312,000 Nazi victims worldwide.[190]

However, other Swiss efforts to assist Nazi victims were less successful. At approximately the same time that the Swiss Humanitarian Fund was established, in 1997, "the Swiss government announced that it would set up a $4.7 billion Swiss Foundation for Solidarity to aid victims of the Holocaust and other genocides. Yet the fund, which would come from a

6. The German and Austrian Slave Labor Lawsuits

While the litigation was pending against Swiss banks and other Swiss institutions, numerous additional lawsuits were filed in several United States courts against an array of German and Austrian companies, as well as an American company, arising out of the companies' use of and profit from slave labor during the World War II era (the "Slave Labor Lawsuits").[192] The first of the Slave Labor Lawsuits was a class action brought on March 8, 1998 in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey by plaintiff Elsa Iwanowa against Ford Motor Company, the American automobile manufacturer, and its German subsidiary, Ford Werke A.G. (the "Ford" suits).[193] Shortly thereafter, four more class action lawsuits were filed in the same federal court. These included two suits each against Degussa AG and Siemens AG, German manufacturing companies that were alleged to have used and profited from slave labor.[194]

The defendants moved to dismiss on a variety of grounds. They argued that (1) the court lacked jurisdiction to hear the cases; (2) there were alternative resolution mechanisms better

[191] CROWE at 358. Ambassador Eizenstat observed that Swiss right-wing politician Christoph Blocher "could not stomach this latest generosity. He accused the banks of admitting guilt when 'Switzerland had no reason to apologize for doing business with Nazi Germany in order to survive as a neutral country.' Blocher threatened to force a referendum on the Solidarity Fund and suggested using the revalued gold to increase Swiss old-age pensions. That brought the Solidarity Fund to an immediate halt. He also litigated his claims in the U.S. court system. On September 19, 1995, the United States and Germany entered into a settlement agreement providing payment both to Mr. Princz, for his incarceration in the concentration camp, and to ten other servicemen similarly situated who were to share a total of $2.1 million to be distributed at the discretion of the U.S. government. suited to resolve the disputes; (3) the United States court was an inconvenient forum; (4) plaintiffs' claims were barred by applicable statutes of limitations; (5) the complaints failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted; and (6) the claims were not justiciable because they raised political issues that could not properly be addressed by a court.[195]

In contrast to Judge Korman, who refrained from deciding the defendants' motions to dismiss in view of (and in encouragement of) the parties' settlement negotiations,[196] the courts in the Slave Labor Lawsuits did rule. On September 13, 1999, the respective courts granted the defendants' motions to dismiss.[197] In the Ford case, while rejecting defendants' jurisdictional arguments,[198] the court nevertheless found that most of plaintiffs' claims had been brought too late and were barred by statutes of limitations.[199] The court determined that plaintiffs' slave labor claims raised political issues beyond the court's purview, which instead should have been

So he refused to rule one way or another, leaving the plaintiffs' lawyers to stew about how we could possibly win the case without facts, and the Swiss to worry that Judge Korman might be on the verge of throwing a rock through their [banking] secrecy window. addressed by the political divisions of government, the Executive Branch and Congress. The court also concluded that abstention was appropriate because "principles of international comity dictate that a court not interfere with a foreign sovereign's pronouncement of its law," noting that "[t]he German Federal Government has taken the position that foreign citizens [such as Iwanowa] may not assert direct claims for war-time forced labor against private companies."[200]

As to the Degussa and Siemens cases, the New Jersey District Court dismissed those claims on the ground of nonjusticiability.[201]

> The critical issue, the resolution of which is dispositive of these cases, is whether in light of post World War II diplomatic history the plaintiff victims, and representatives of victims of the Nazi regime[,] can bring an action in this Court against private German corporations which participated in and profited from the atrocities committed against plaintiffs and those they seek to represent.[202]

The court ruled that the Degussa and Siemens class actions raised political and policy issues outside the judicial mandate. After analyzing the various reparations treaties negotiated between Germany and the Allied powers in the years following World War II,[203] the court observed that "[i]n effect, plaintiffs are inviting this court to try its hand at refashioning the reparations agreements [entered into by] the United States and other World War II combatants . . . ."[204] Concluding that "this is a task which the court does not have the judicial power to perform,"[205] the court dismissed the complaints.[206]

In upholding the Swiss Banks Settlement Agreement as fair, Judge Korman observed of the German slave labor lawsuits that some of their findings might have been applicable to certain claims asserted in the Swiss Banks cases. "I take no position regarding whether these [lawsuits] were correctly decided, or whether they would even apply here. Instead, I cite them as a reality check for those objectors who believe that strong moral claims are easily converted into successful legal causes of action."[207]

Following the dismissal of the German slave labor cases, the Federal Republic of Germany enacted legislation creating a Foundation entitled "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" ("German Foundation"). The legislation established a fund of approximately $5.2 billion to compensate those persons who performed slave or forced labor under the Nazi Regime, or who had claims to property looted by the Nazis. The legislation provided for the dismissal with prejudice of all Slave Labor Lawsuits (some of which had not been dismissed and some of which were pending on appeal at the time the legislation was enacted).[208]

> While I believe that both decisions would almost certainly have been reversed — they were opposed by lawyers in both the State and Justice Departments — Iwanowa and Burger-Fischer complicated the ongoing settlement negotiations…. Unlike Judge Korman, who sat on the legal issues in the Swiss case for a year and then fostered an excellent settlement, the two New Jersey federal judges insisted on dismissing the plaintiffs' complaints in the midst of the intensive settlement discussions that had been fostered by Secretary Eizenstat. If the judges had remained silent, the German slave labor settlement would have been much higher. I estimate that the two [rulings] cost the victims DM 5 billion. . . .
> Since the German corporate defendants adamantly rejected a Rule 23 settlement similar to the Swiss case (even though it would have provided them with an iron-clad preclusion defense) [i.e. further litigation would be barred by a settlement], the parties were forced to build a de facto class action without using an American court.

Ambassador Stuart E. Eizenstat noted that in the German slave labor cases, the defendants' "own lawyer … told our team that it was 'striking not just to Stu but to me that the German companies refused the surest route to legal peace, from class-action releases.' But the Germans feared that a traditional class-action settlement would be an admission of guilt that would only create a precedent for even more lawsuits. No amount of argument could convince them otherwise. We needed a hybrid solution." IMPERFECT JUSTICE at 257.

It was jointly funded by the German government and German industry. Between 2001 and 2007, the Foundation paid roughly 4.5 billion euros to nearly two million forced and slave laborers in almost one hundred countries. Once these payments were completed, the foundation became a grant-making institution through the establishment of a 'Remembrance and Future' fund. II. THE CLASS ACTION COMPLAINTS AGAINST SWISS BANKS AND THEIR RESOLUTION

A. The Litigation

On October 3, 1996, in the midst of the public scrutiny over Switzerland's role during and after the Holocaust, the first of several complaints was filed against Swiss banks. Lead Settlement Counsel Neuborne has described the "procedural nightmare" that arose from "four overlapping complaints with multiple named-plaintiffs, each purporting to represent the same class. Several plaintiffs were American citizens. Several were citizens of various foreign countries. Each claimed ownership of a Swiss bank account. Each claimed to be a knight-errant suing on behalf of all owners of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts. Each sued the three largest Swiss banks, Union Bank of Switzerland [UBS], Swiss Bank Corporation [SBC] and Credit Suisse. (Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation merged during the litigation to create UBS, narrowing the defendants to two). No problem, so far, except that nobody had any idea which Swiss banks the claimed accounts were in."[209]

Socialist régime, youth exchange, social justice, remembrance of the threat posed by totalitarian systems and despotism, and international cooperation in humanitarian endeavors.'" Letter from Ambassador Douglas Davidson, Special Envoy for Holocaust Issues, to Shari C. Reig, December 24, 2013. The Foundation law provides that the United States government is to name two members to the Board of Trustees. One is a representative of the United States government. The other is a lawyer to be named by the Government of the United States of America. In 2013, the United States Department of State appointed Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig to serve as the lawyer named to the Board by the United States, and in 2016 reappointed her to a four-year term.

[209] Neuborne, Litigating the Holocaust, at 20.

Holocaust survivor Gisella Weisshaus filed the first class action lawsuit against UBS and SBC in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York.[210] Mrs. Weisshaus filed an amended complaint on January 24, 1997, adding three new representative plaintiffs and Credit Suisse, the SBA, and the Bank of International Settlements ("BIS") as joint defendants. The Weisshaus Amended Complaint alleged that defendants conspired in failing to identify and return assets deposited in the banks by plaintiffs or their ancestors from 1933 to 1945 as a safeguard from the Nazis, and that defendants converted these assets for their own use.[211] The Weisshaus Amended Complaint also alleged that the banks profited by knowingly serving as a depository for property looted by the Nazis.[212] The plaintiffs asserted six causes of action: breach of contract, accounting, breach of fiduciary duty, conversion, conspiracy, and unjust enrichment.[213]

On October 21, 1996, Holocaust survivor Jacob Friedman and four other named plaintiffs filed another class action lawsuit in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York against the same three Swiss banks — UBS, SBC, and Credit Suisse — as joint defendants, and named the SBA as a non-defendant co-conspirator.[214] The Friedman Complaint alleged that the defendant banks conspired and profited from laundering Nazi assets, from knowingly and/or recklessly accepting Nazi looted assets, from knowingly and/or recklessly accepting profits generated by the Nazi use of slave labor, and from intentionally concealing and preventing the recovery of assets deposited in the banks by Nazi victims.[215] The Friedman Complaint specified three separate classes of plaintiffs: "Rightful Owners of Nazi Regime Looted Assets and/or Their Heirs," "Slave Laborers and/or Their Heirs," and "Certain Swiss Bank Depositors and/or Their Heirs."[216] The stated causes of action were Conspiracy to Violate and/or Complicity in Violations of International Law, Breach of Fiduciary Duty, Breach of

Special Duty, Breach of Contract, Conversion, Unjust Enrichment, Negligence, Violations of Swiss Federal Banking Law, Violations of Swiss Commercial Code of Obligations, Conspiracy, Fraud, and Fraudulent Concealment.[217]

On January 29, 1997, the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities ("World Council") filed a third class action lawsuit in the federal district court for the Eastern District of New York, also naming UBS, SBC, and Credit Suisse as joint defendants and the SBA as a non-defendant co-conspirator.[218] The World Council's allegations concerning deposited assets, looted assets and slave labor mirrored those of the Friedman Complaint.[219] The plaintiff subclasses and the causes of action asserted in the World Council action were similar to those of the Friedman action. However, the World Council action contained an additional subclass, "Rightful Owners of Nazi Regime Communal Assets and/or Their Heirs,"[220] and did not allege violations of Swiss banking laws or codes of obligation.[221]

On March 7, 1997, the Weisshaus, Friedman and World Council lawsuits were consolidated for pretrial purposes under the caption In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation. On July 30, 1997, in the midst of extensive motion practice, the plaintiffs amended their complaints, primarily to consolidate the plaintiff subclasses and to cure certain jurisdictional defects. On June 29, 1998, plaintiffs' counsel filed another class action lawsuit on behalf of Nazi victims against the Swiss National Bank in federal district court in Washington, D.C.[222] This lawsuit alleged that the bank knowingly had accepted looted assets, primarily stolen gold, from Nazi Germany.[223]

One day later, on June 30, 1998, the same plaintiffs' counsel filed another class action lawsuit on behalf of different plaintiffs against the same defendant banks — SBC, Credit Suisse, and UBS — in state court in San Francisco, California.[224] The California plaintiffs did not assert any allegations regarding deposited assets or dormant accounts, but alleged that the banks profited from "knowingly accepting for deposit and concealing the existence of slave labor profits and assets looted by the Nazis."[225] Plaintiffs stated only one cause of action: violation of the California Unfair Competition Act.[226] They alleged that the banks' trafficking and/or concealment of the looted and slave labor assets constituted "unlawful, unfair and/or fraudulent business and/or practices" prohibited by the Act.[227]

B. The Motions to Dismiss or Stay Proceedings

On May 15, 1997, the defendant banks responded to plaintiffs' complaints by filing several motions to dismiss or, in the alternative, to stay (i.e., postpone) the proceedings. Plaintiffs filed papers in opposition to defendants' motions on June 16, 1997, and defendants countered with reply papers on July 9, 1997. The motions raised many procedural and substantive legal issues (a number of which subsequently were cited in the German Slave Labor Lawsuits). The Swiss defendants' procedural arguments included the following:

Abstention: Defendants asserted that plaintiffs' claims could be resolved without resort to litigation, through superior, cooperative alternative mechanisms, such as the claims process being conducted by ICEP.[228] Defendants urged the Court to abstain from deciding the merits of plaintiffs' claims or, alternatively, to stay the proceedings until ICEP's work was completed to avoid "[1] interfering with Swiss sovereign interests, [2] encroaching on the conduct of U.S.

foreign policy, and [3] impeding superior alternative processes for resolving Holocaust-related claims."[229]

In response, plaintiffs characterized defendants' abstention argument as an improper attempt to control the process by which Holocaust-related claims would be compensated. Plaintiffs emphasized the futility of the efforts already made, for more than 50 years, to obtain redress outside of the courts.[230]

Standing: Defendants argued that plaintiffs lacked standing to sue because they could not link or trace any profits or revenue from the looted assets or slave labor of an individual plaintiff to any individual defendant Swiss bank.[231] Defendants similarly asserted that plaintiffs could not tie the damages they sought on the looted assets and slave labor claims to any specific plaintiff's injury.[232]

Plaintiffs responded that defendants' standing argument was premature and that discovery might enable them to prove individual links.[233] Additionally, plaintiffs argued, equity would permit theories of group entitlement and collective liability to prevent the banks' unjust enrichment.[234]

Diversity Jurisdiction: Defendants argued that the complaints should be dismissed for lack of diversity jurisdiction due to the absence of complete diversity (difference) of citizenship between the parties. Defendants pointed out that the various complaints included both alien or foreign plaintiffs and alien defendants as parties.[235]

Plaintiffs cured this jurisdictional defect by filing amended complaints, one with all named plaintiffs as United States citizens,[236] and one with all named plaintiffs as aliens, with federal jurisdiction claimed under the Alien Tort Claims Act.[237]

Federal Question Jurisdiction: The parties disputed whether claims sounding in customary international law arose under federal common law and thus conferred federal question jurisdiction.[238]

Jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA): The parties disputed whether the ATCA could confer federal jurisdiction. The ATCA grants original jurisdiction to federal courts over "any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States."[239] While defendants maintained that plaintiffs were not all aliens and that the claims were not purely tort-based, they principally argued that allegations of the banks' commercial activities, even if accepted as true, did not rise to the level of a violation of the law of nations.[240]

Plaintiffs responded by claiming that the Swiss banks knowingly financed the Nazi war effort, knowingly engaged in transactions with the Nazis that furthered their criminal activities, and knowingly accepted assets that were looted and that resulted from slave labor — all of which constituted violations of recognized international law principles.[241]

Forum Non Conveniens: Defendants argued that the complaints should be dismissed on grounds of forum non conveniens (inconvenient court). They claimed that Switzerland was a more convenient and appropriate forum to adjudicate plaintiffs' claims, arguing that, among other things, the conduct at issue occurred in Switzerland, most of the evidence remained there, and Swiss law applied to the majority of the claims asserted.[242] Defendants further claimed that Switzerland retained a strong national interest in the dispute, while litigation in the United States would create enormous and unnecessary administrative burdens.[243]

In response, plaintiffs contended that much of the relevant evidence was not located in Switzerland, but could be found in the USHMM and throughout Europe.[244] Moreover, plaintiffs argued that litigating the claims in Switzerland would be a practical impossibility due to Switzerland's refusal to recognize class action lawsuits.[245]

In addition to procedural arguments, defendants also raised numerous substantive grounds for dismissal, including plaintiffs' purported failure to state causes of action for the three basic claims asserted — those relating to dormant accounts, looted assets and slave labor.

With respect to the dormant account claims, defendants argued that those claims failed because most plaintiffs were unable to allege or prove that a specific account belonging to them was held by a specific defendant bank. Many decades had passed since the deposits were made and most of the relevant records had been lost or destroyed, or the original depositor no longer was alive to testify.[246] Defendants contended that the plaintiffs' dormant accounts claims therefore had to be dismissed due to a lack of evidence.[247]

Professor Neuborne, in his 2013 manuscript, Litigating the Holocaust (at 22), reflected on what he described as the weakness of the defendants' forum non conveniens argument: "By telling Judge Korman that the case would almost certainly be dismissed in a Swiss court, the banks shot their forum non conveniens defense in the foot. In order to invoke forum non conveniens, there must be a fair chance that the case can go forward in the foreign court. Once the banks told Judge Korman that the Swiss courts would dismiss any transferred case, I jumped on the mistake, and we never heard much any more about forum non conveniens."

[246] See Neuborne 1997 Mem. at 15-16. The defendants did not explain, however, that the documents were missing because the banks had destroyed so many of them.

[247] Reply Mem. of Law in Support of Defendants' Partial Motion to Dismiss Common-Law Claims for Failure to State a Claim, at 11-12 (July 9, 1997).

Plaintiffs responded that discovery might cure any such defects,[248] and that even if they could not link specific accounts to specific banks, defendants still could be held liable collectively under theories of joint and several liability.[249] Plaintiffs argued that evidence of the banks' concerted actions to obstruct plaintiffs' tracing of their accounts would provide a sound and compelling equitable basis from which to find the banks collectively liable.[250]

Plaintiffs alternatively asserted a claim for several liability under the "market share" doctrine, contending that each defendant bank could be held liable in proportion to the share of deposits it held.[251] Plaintiffs acknowledged that use of the market share doctrine in this case would be novel, but alleged that any decision resulting in the banks' retention of these deposits would further perpetuate the unjust enrichment of the banks at the expense of the Nazi victims who were the rightful owners of the funds.[252]

With respect to looted assets and slave labor claims, defendants argued that plaintiffs' inability to link or trace any profits generated from the assets or labor of a particular plaintiff to a particular defendant was a fatal defect.[253] Once again, plaintiffs argued that discovery might reveal such links and that, alternatively, group entitlement and collective liability theories were proper to prevent the banks' unjust enrichment.[254]

Defendants' final substantive argument was that plaintiffs' reliance on international customary law to support their looted assets and slave labor claims was inappropriate.[255] The banks asserted that their conduct did not violate international human rights norms.[256] They further stated that private corporations generally are not subject to liability under customary international law and that, in any event, private commercial transactions with Nazis by banks in neutral countries such as Switzerland did not violate customary international law.[257]

The parties sharply contested this issue. Defendants cited the Nuremberg trial of Karl Rasche, chairman of the Dresdner Bank, and his acquittal for all wrongdoing for his actions as a banker.[258] Defendants contended that under the Rasche decision, the act of providing basic commercial banking services (such as the exchange of cash or credit) did not violate customary international law even where the bank was fully aware that its customer was committing war crimes.[259] Plaintiffs asserted that although Rasche was acquitted for ordinary commercial banking transactions, he was convicted in the Nuremberg trial for knowingly trafficking in looted assets and assisting Nazi war crimes.[260]

Professor Neuborne acknowledged in his 2013 reflections on the lawsuit that although "the customary international law claims were serious,… they were far from sure things. The Circuits had split on the Alien Tort Statute. Some courts were refusing to enforce customary international law claims in the absence of unambiguous Congressional authorization. No one had yet imposed customary international law on a corporation. And, apart from the equivocal [Dresdner] bank case, I couldn't find a case where a bank's provision of financial services was deemed aiding and abetting the Nazis." Neuborne, Litigating the Holocaust, at 25.

Professor Neuborne noted that during one hearing of almost ten hours, conducted "more like a law school seminar than a structured oral argument," Judge Korman appeared to recognize the legal merits of many of the claims (at least with respect to the bank accounts) but "appeared dead set against the customary international law arguments because he didn't think he had power to enforce what he scathingly called 'a kind of world common law' without explicit authorization from Congress. Try as I might, I couldn't get Korman to view the 1789 Alien Tort statute as such an authorization." Id. at 26.

C. The Settlement Agreement

On August 1, 1997, the District Court heard oral arguments on the motions to dismiss. As reported in The New York Times: "Batteries of lawyers representing Swiss Banks and Jewish groups faced off … over whether a class-action lawsuit accusing the banks of retaining the assets of Holocaust victims should proceed. Judge Edward R. Korman made no ruling, but his questions and comments led lawyers representing more than 18,000 Jews taking part in the suit to predict the judge would allow crucial portions of it to proceed."[261]

Judge Korman reserved decision on the motions for over one year, while settlement negotiations intensified. Then-Assistant Secretary of State Eizenstat was called upon to serve as a mediator and other public officials also offered to assist in the settlement process.[262]

In May 1998, Credit Suisse agreed to settle separately with Estelle Sapir, a dormant account plaintiff whose claims had been highly publicized.[263] Classwide negotiations, however, Professor Neuborne further observed: It turns out that we were both wrong about the Alien Tort Statute. Five years after the Swiss case settled, the Supreme Court finally held in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain that the 1789 statute was a Congressional authorization to enforce a small slice of customary international law [CIL] against behavior so universally reviled by the international community that it is analogous to piracy. I don't think that I could have shoehorned the Swiss banks' immoral financial assistance to the Nazis into the narrow vision of CIL recognized in Sosa, even under an aiding and abetting theory. Indeed, the Second Circuit has even refused, erroneously I believe, to impose CIL damage on a corporation." Id. at 26 (citing Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 621 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2010)).

In April 2013, in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 133 S. Ct. 1659 (2013), the United States Supreme Court "further limited plaintiffs' ability to bring claims against companies for actions that occur on foreign soil, upholding the dismissal of a suit that accused Royal Dutch Shell PLC of aiding in human rights abuses." Ambassador Eizenstat subsequently observed that his "bitter experience with the Swiss negotiations, in which the Swiss government refused to be a negotiating partner, taught me a lesson that I never forgot in joining the German, Austrian and French talks. I would never again risk the prestige of the U.S. government in trying to settle class-action lawsuits against foreign companies, unless their governments were willing to become directly engaged. Otherwise, I would be left once more to the caprice of unruly private interests, without the broad view that governments bring to the table…. Fortunately, the governments of Germany, Austria, and France, in contrast to that of Switzerland, recognized that the reputation of their private companies reflected on their nations' reputations." once again stalled. At this point, various state and local officials threatened a series of sanctions against the Swiss banks in the event that an agreement could not be reached.[264]

By then, Judge Korman had taken an active role in facilitating a settlement, convening long, intensive negotiating sessions in chambers.[265] On August 12, 1998, the parties reached an agreement in principle to settle the lawsuits. In exchange for a payment of $1.25 billion originally to be paid in four equal installments,[266] the agreement required a broad release of virtually all Holocaust-related claims against virtually all Swiss business and governmental entities, starting with Switzerland itself.[267]

The parties did not formally execute the Settlement Agreement, however, until January 26, 1999. This delay was due in large part to disagreements among counsel in defining who should be eligible for compensation.[268] While it was generally agreed that targets of systematic Nazi oppression on grounds of race, religion, and politics should benefit from the settlement,[269]

[264] On July 3, 1998, New York State Comptroller H. Carl McCall and New York City Comptroller Alan Hevesi announced that if a settlement was not reached by September 1, 1998, they would prohibit Swiss banks and investment firms from selling state and city debt and would stop any future short-term investment deposits with the Swiss banks. If a settlement was not reached by November 1, 1998, the comptrollers would instruct private investment managers for the state and city to stop trading through Swiss firms. It appeared that other states, including California, were likely to impose similar sanctions. See John J. Goldman, Pressure Rises for Holocaust Fund Pact, L.A. TIMES, July 3, 1998, at A31.

[266] The first two installments of $250 million and $333 million were paid into an escrow account by the defendant banks on November 23, 1998 and November 23, 1999, respectively. The remaining installments of $333 million and $334 million each were to be paid on November 23, 2000 and November 23, 2001, respectively. Settlement Agreement, Section 5.1. Pursuant to Amendment No. 2 (discussed below), the parties agreed to accelerate the fourth installment payment by one year. As true for many other elements of the case, even after settlement, the escrow fund became the subject of a dispute and was resolved only after further litigation.

Critics have noted that "the Swiss government and its central bank" were "not willing to be part of this compromise, but they were willing to reap its benefits. To this very day, neither the Swiss government nor its central bank is willing to take any moral or legal responsibility for the fact that during the Second World War, they traded in looted gold with Nazi Germany. In distancing themselves from the settlement with the Swiss commercial banks, the Swiss government and the SNB [Swiss National Bank] cited the provision in the [1946] Washington Accord where the Allies stated they would make no further demands on Switzerland and its central bank regarding gold acquisitions during the war." the specification of such groups required further negotiation. The Settlement Agreement ultimately designated as beneficiaries "Victim[s] or Target[s] of Nazi Persecution," defined as any persons or entities "persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi regime because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped."[270] To be eligible for compensation under the Settlement Agreement, a party would have to fall within one of five Settlement Classes: the Deposited Assets Class, the Looted Assets Class, Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, or the Refugee Class.[271]

When the class action litigation against Swiss entities first began, the fact that Swiss industry used slave labor during World War II was not widely known and was not the basis of the original claims. It was the companies themselves that expressed concern about their possible liability for Holocaust-era use of slave labor. Therefore, "Slave Labor Class II" was added to the Settlement Agreement at the behest of the defendants, not the claimants. The class was devised because of the defendants' insistence upon an "all-Switzerland" release as a condition to the settlement. Similarly, the refugee claims were included only at the end of the process, in the Settlement Agreement, largely at the instance of the Settling Defendants who were aware that several former refugees had brought lawsuits in Switzerland. While those proceedings did not yield favorable decisions from Swiss courts, they did result in payments recognizing the "moral" bases of the claims.[272]

Except for Slave Labor Class II, every claimant had to have been a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution," or an heir — a broad opening that threatened to render any payments virtually insignificant, given that there were millions of potential class members who could be categorized as "heirs."[273]

The agreement did not specify precisely how the $1.25 billion would be allocated and distributed among the Settlement Classes. Rather, in accordance with the recommendations of the plaintiffs' Executive Committee, the parties (in Section 7.1 of the Settlement Agreement) deferred to the Court to appoint a Special Master to formulate a plan of allocation and distribution.

By Order dated March 30, 1999, the Court preliminarily approved the Settlement Agreement and provisionally certified the five Settlement Classes. Following the Plaintiffs' Executive Committee's unanimous endorsement,[274] Judge Korman appointed Judah Gribetz as Special Master by Order dated March 31, 1999,[275] thus designating Mr. Gribetz "to oversee the drafting of a plan for the distribution of the Swiss settlement, the largest single pool of funds for Holocaust victims since Germany agreed to reparations nearly 50 years ago." [276] The appointment was "deemed made as of December 15, 1998, the date the parties agreed to his appointment and the date he began to perform informally the duties of Special Master."[277] The March 31, 1999 Order directed Special Master Gribetz to develop a proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of the settlement fund, subject to Court approval. The proposal was to provide for the fair and equitable distribution of the settlement fund and would include a recommendation for "where residual funds, if any, remaining after distribution to eligible members of the Settlement Classes (as defined in the Settlement Agreement) shall be distributed."[278]

D. The Notice Plan

Plaintiffs' class counsel devised a Notice Plan to provide members of the Settlement Classes with notice of the certification of the Settlement Classes, the terms of the Settlement Agreement, their rights with respect to the proposed settlement, and the deadline for submitting exclusion requests and objections.[279] The Court adopted the Notice Plan on May 10, 1999, finding it "the best notice practicable under the unique circumstances of this case, taking into account the geographic dispersion of the class, the size of the Settlement Fund, and other relevant factors."[280]

No lists of class members were available for a simple direct mail notice program. Instead, the Notice Plan involved the coordination of several different components, including direct mail, worldwide publication, public relations ("earned media"), the internet, and grass roots community outreach.[281] The Notice Plan provided for:

- placement of the Court-approved Notice in paid publications, including 371 appearances in mainstream newspapers and 622 appearances in Jewish publications, placed in 40 countries;
- press efforts that resulted in additional coverage in at least 552 news articles, and 34 countries;

To accomplish this task, the March 31, 1999 Order, paralleling Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, expressly authorized the Special Master to "conduct hearings and to interview or otherwise communicate with members of the Settlement Classes," to "travel domestically or abroad to conduct such hearings or interviews" and to "discuss any aspect of the allocation and distribution issues." Id. ¶ 4.

- an extensive community outreach program;
- a direct mail program, including more than 1.7 million Notice packages sent to potential Class members in 137 countries;
- a voice response system that fielded almost 500,000 calls; and
- an internet notice effort which resulted (at the time) in over 316,000 "hits" on the Court-ordered website.[282]

This massive notice program resulted in the return of almost 600,000 surveys — "Initial Questionnaires" ("IQs") — to the Notice Plan administrators, from potential class members throughout the world.[283] As Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne has described it, this response was "astounding," given that in the typical class action litigation, a "response rate of 3% is deemed high." Further, there were "fewer than 300 opt-outs [i.e. requests for exclusion from the settlement], many of which were subsequently rescinded."[284]

Assessing the notice program, the Court found that it had been "the most comprehensive, effective and successful in the history of class action litigation."[285] The "net effect of the notice activities was that extraordinarily large numbers of all potential Class member groups were notified, based on a scientific examination."[286] The Court later observed that "even one of the unsuccessful objectors [to certain aspects of the Court's programs] acknowledged that the 'notification process in this case was hailed as the most ambitious effort ever to notify beneficiaries of a legal settlement.'"[287]

E. Amendment No 2 to the Settlement Agreement

Following implementation of the Notice Plan, the Court held a Fairness Hearing on November 29, 1999 in New York. The Court conducted a supplemental fairness hearing in Israel on December 14, 1999. The parties agreed to modifications to the Settlement Agreement in response to certain objections and comments made at the Fairness Hearings. Specifically, some objected that the broad scope of the releases might pose an obstacle to the recovery of artworks and other identifiable items of property looted by the Nazis and in the possession of a Swiss releasee.[288] The defendant banks agreed to modify the original agreement to assure that persons would be able to seek assistance in recovering looted artwork from releasees without any serious impediment created by the Settlement Agreement.[289]

Others objected to the inclusion of certain insurers as "Releasees."[290] The objections related to the effectiveness of notice as to claims against released Swiss insurers, and the appropriateness of releasing the insurers, in the absence of a mechanism to pay valid Holocaust-related insurance claims as part of the distribution of the Settlement Fund.[291] The modifications in response to these objections involved the "de facto creation of a sixth class of beneficiaries who would be entitled to file claims against the participating insurance carriers by virtue of (i) those carriers' infusion of an additional $50 million in cash to the settlement fund and (ii) the agreed upon allocation of $50 million of the existing settlement fund to pay such insurance claims."[292]

290 The original Settlement Agreement provided for releases to a number of unidentified non-party Swiss insurance companies, defined broadly to include any insurance company where at least 25 percent of the outstanding stock was owned by a Swiss company. Id. at 160.

292 Id. at 164-65. The $100 million originally earmarked for insurance claims subsequently was reduced to $50 million, with $25 million each to be provided by, respectively, the Settlement Fund and the defendants. The modifications also created a mechanism, set forth in Article 4 of Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement, to evaluate and pay Holocaust-related insurance claims.

Most significantly, in response to concerns about the ability to administer the Deposited Assets Class distribution process — including questions about whether the process could be fair if the defendant banks (which controlled much of the information) did not cooperate — the Court imposed a number of further requirements in addition to those enumerated in the Settlement Agreement. These included the requirement of publication of account owner names, consolidation of databases, and cooperation with the administrative process. In short, "[f]rom the beginning, … Judge Korman was quite explicit about his intentions to carefully supervise the process."[293] As Judge Korman observed in considering whether the settlement was fair:

> On March 30, 2000, after an inordinately long and unexplained delay of four months following the publication of the Volcker Report, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") authorized publication of relevant information relating to approximately 26,000 [subsequently reduced to 21,000] of the accounts referred to in the Volcker Report that were identified as having a "probable" link to Holocaust victims . . . . No authorization was given by the SFBC for the publication of information relating to the approximately 28,000 [reduced to 15,000] remaining accounts identified in the Volcker Report as "possibly" related to Holocaust victims. Moreover, unlike earlier SFBC rulings concerning publication of information relevant to Holocaust-related accounts, the SFBC merely "authorized" publication of much of the relevant information, but did not mandate complete publication. Perhaps even more disturbing was the failure of the SFBC to mandate the creation of a central database of 4.1 million accounts that were opened in Switzerland between 1933-45. In sum, the SFBC, by its actions, has made it much more difficult to carry out the mandate of the Volcker Committee that "victims who have been long denied justice by circumstances beyond their control — often poor and now aged — deserve every reasonable assistance in establishing a claim." . . . .
> [I have been advised] that the defendant banks, acting pursuant to the SFBC's authorization, have agreed to cooperate in assembling information concerning their portion of the 26,000 [later reduced to 21,000] "probable" accounts referred to in the SFBC's March 30 order in order to permit expeditious publication of names and other identifying information associated with those accounts . . . . [The defendant banks also] have agreed to create a centralized electronic database relating to their share of the 54,000 [later reduced to 36,000] accounts referred to in the Volcker Report [and have agreed to certain other access provisions]. . . .
> Nevertheless, the failure of the SFBC to mandate compliance with the recommendations of the Volcker Committee, coupled with the unwillingness of [293] Alford, The Claims Resolution Tribunal at 584.

> the private or cantonal banks that are non-party releasees to voluntarily cooperate in permitting publication of information relating to some or all of their accounts that may be included within the 54,000 [later 36,000] accounts referred to in the Volcker Report, have created substantial impediments to administration ….
> [M]y hope is that the Swiss Confederation, if not the SFBC, will take the steps necessary to compel the cantonal and private banks to comply with the Volcker Committee's recommendations to the same extent as the defendant banks have agreed to comply. Nevertheless, their failure to do so does not justify disapproving the settlement with the defendant banks. They have pledged "their good faith cooperation with the implementation of the settlement." Memorandum to File of Burt Neuborne, Esq. and Roger Witten, Esq. ... This is a pledge that reflects their legal obligation. It is one to which I intend to hold them.[294]

These important obligations impacted the timing and complexity of the settlement's administration, but also ensured that the greatest number of potential claimants would be reached and their claims fairly resolved.

F. The Final Approval Order

Judge Korman granted final approval to the Settlement Agreement on July 26, 2000, observing that the agreement was reached after "lengthy, well-informed and arm's length negotiations by competent and dedicated counsel who provided loyal and effective legal representation to all parties."[295] The adequacy and reasonableness of the settlement were weighed against the "practical alternative to the settlement in the real world … prolonged, complex and difficult litigation, in which plaintiffs' chance of success as a class was uncertain."[296] Although "in a perfectly just world, plaintiffs should have received a far greater sum, in the real world, a recovery of $1.25 billion in return for broad releases was the best that dedicated and competent counsel could achieve under the circumstances of this case."[297]

The defendant banks were directed to advise the Court within seven business days whether they intended to adhere to the as-yet unexecuted Amendment No. 2 to the Settlement Agreement. If the banks did not do so, the Court would enter a final judgment approving the original Settlement Agreement.[298] On August 4, 2000, defendants advised that they intended to execute Amendment No. 2[299] and, thereafter, the Court entered final judgment granting approval of the amended Settlement Agreement.

III. POST SETTLEMENT PROCEEDINGS

The Settlement was only the first step in moving forward on the distribution of the $1.25 billion fund. Various judicial proceedings, including litigation of a number of important issues, continued for years.

A. Appeals of the Court's Order Approving the Settlement as Fair

On September 7, 2000, a Notice of Appeal was filed from the August 9, 2000 Final Order and Judgment. Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, no distributions from the Settlement Fund could be made until the "Settlement Date" had been reached; i.e., the date upon which all appeals from the Final Order and Judgment had been resolved. The pendency of the appeal needed to be taken into consideration in connection with establishing filing deadlines and claims processing protocols. The appeal subsequently was withdrawn, and on May 30, 2001, the Settlement Agreement became final and distributions could proceed.

B. Submission and Approval of the Proposed Distribution Plan

Special Master Gribetz filed the Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds on September 11, 2000. The proposal (the Distribution Plan) was adopted in its entirety on November 22, 2000.[300] The approximately 900-page Distribution Plan set forth the recommendations, and respective rationales, for allocation of the Settlement Fund among the five classes and five "Victim or Target" groups designated in the Settlement Agreement.[301]

For the Deposited Assets Class, the Distribution Plan allocated up to $800 million to repay the claims of those who owned bank accounts and other assets deposited in Swiss financial institutions. The allocation of two-thirds of the Settlement Fund to these claims was based upon the priority accorded to the bank accounts under the Settlement Agreement and basic principles of U.S. law, as well as the results of the Volcker Committee's three-year investigation of Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. The Volcker Committee identified at least 54,000 accounts, subsequently reduced to 36,000, "probably" or "possibly" belonging to Nazi victims or their heirs. Calculating known and estimated account values of these 36,000 accounts — compiled in an "Accounts History Database" ("AHD") — the auditors determined the value of these accounts to be between $642 million and $1.36 billion. Although the midpoint of that range was approximately $1 billion, the Distribution Plan conservatively recommended setting aside a lower amount of up to $800 million for the Deposited Assets Class, given the passage of so many decades since the Holocaust, and the likelihood that many account owners and heirs would not or could not file claims.

This mean[t] in practice that all procedures and guidelines concerning claims processing [were] subject to the prior approval of the Court. It also mean[t] that all claims decisions taken by the organizations [were] mere 'recommendations' which only bec[a]me 'decisions' once they ha[d] received the blessing of the Court. The latter thus ha[d] the power to reject or change the individual determinations made by the organizations." Peter Van der Auweraert, Holocaust Reparation Claims Fifty Years After: The Swiss Banks Litigation, 71 NORDIC J. INT'L L. 557, 581 (2002). At the time of his writing in 2002, Mr. Van Der Auweraert was serving as IOM's Legal Officer for its Swiss Banks claims processing programs, known by IOM as "HVAP," or the Holocaust Victim Assets Programme. He also was a visiting professor of law at the University of Turku in Finland.

The Distribution Plan provided for Deposited Assets claims to be administered on the Court's behalf by the CRT in Zurich ("CRT-II"), which already had been processing claims against Swiss bank accounts prior to the finalization of the settlement ("CRT-I"). The CRT later was assisted by the New York-based Swiss Deposited Assets Program ("SDAP"). Under the Distribution Plan and the subsequently-adopted Rules of the Claims Resolution Process ("CRT Rules"), bank accounts were to be adjusted for interest and fees and repaid in full using the known value of the account. If the actual value was unavailable, the accounts were to be paid using the estimated "average" ("presumptive") value based upon the type of account, such as savings account, demand deposit, custody account (holding securities), and so forth. Most of the presumptive values subsequently were increased, reflecting new valuation data that became available as a result of the Court's ongoing insistence upon the banks' cooperation with the claims process. The Court also adopted the Special Masters' suggestion to award payments of $5,000 (later increased to $7,250) for claimants who plausibly owned, or were heirs to, Swiss bank accounts for which documentation did not exist because of the banks' destruction of account records.

For Slave Labor Class I, applicable to those who performed slave labor for German and other companies that transacted their profits through Swiss entities, the Distribution Plan provided for payments of $1,000 each (later increased to $1,450) to surviving slave laborers, or to their heirs if the former slave laborer died on or after February 16, 1999. The Plan determined that such payments to all surviving slave laborers were warranted because historical research demonstrated that virtually all major slave labor-using entities had banking and other financial relationships with Switzerland. Thus, all proceeds of slave labor could be presumed to have been transacted through Switzerland.

In the interest of efficiency and to minimize survivor confusion, the Plan provided for the same administrative agencies and processing mechanisms as utilized by the German Foundation. This was the $5.2 billion foundation created on July 17, 2000, partly in response to class action litigation in the United States arising from the claims of uncompensated Jewish and non-Jewish victims who performed slave labor for German industrial and governmental enterprises during the Nazi era. Following the lead of the German Foundation, which had designated the Claims Conference and the IOM to process the claims of, respectively, Jewish and non-Jewish former slave laborers, the Court adopted the Special Masters' recommendation and appointed the Claims Conference and IOM to perform the same functions on behalf of Slave Labor Class I.

The Refugee Class, applicable to those denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, or admitted into Switzerland but abused or mistreated, followed a similar distribution mechanism. The Claims Conference was to process the claims of Jewish claimants and the IOM was to process the claims of Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled claimants. Surviving refugees (or the heirs of refugees who died on or after February 16, 1999) originally were to receive $2,500 if they were denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, while those admitted but mistreated were to receive $500. Those payments later were increased, respectively, to $3,625 and $725.

Under the Settlement Agreement, Slave Labor Class II, applicable to those who performed slave labor for Swiss entities, was the one class that was not limited to the five "Victim or Target" groups but, rather, was open to all Nazi victims. The Distribution Plan provided for payments of $1,000 (subsequently increased to $1,450) to former slave laborers or the heirs of those who died on or after February 16, 1999. All Slave Labor Class II claims were processed by the IOM.

For the Looted Assets Class, applicable to those whose assets were looted by the Nazis and disposed of or transacted through Switzerland or Swiss entities, the Court agreed with the Special Masters' observation that the size of the Looted Assets Class, coupled with the impossibility of determining whether specific property was transacted through a Swiss entity, rendered individualized administration of the class impracticable. The looting was simply too massive. Indeed, in a separate proceeding arising from "implementation of a [2001] fund to compensate Austrian Jewish victims of the Nazi regime for Holocaust-related property deprivations," the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit observed: "The severity of property expropriations by the Nazi regime cannot be overstated. We are reminded of the words of Judah Gribetz, the court-appointed Special Master in a separate Holocaust reparations case: '[T]here is scarcely a victim of the Nazis who was not looted, and on nearly an incomprehensible scale.'"[302]

All Nazi victims could be presumed to have been victims of Nazi looting, the proceeds of which may have been — but could not be proven to have been — transacted through Switzerland.[303] Accordingly, it was appropriate to adopt a "cy pres" remedy[304] to assist those who had been looted by the Nazis and who continued to suffer the most severe economic loss. The Special Masters recommended that rather than distributing individual, but probably negligible, payments to every single "victim or target," the neediest class members should benefit from humanitarian aid programs providing food, medicine, shelter and similar assistance. The Distribution Plan initially allocated $100 million — and, ultimately, a total of approximately $256 million — over a ten-year period, later increased to 15 years. The payments were distributed with the understanding that this humanitarian aid would augment, but not replace, existing assistance programs on behalf of needy Jewish survivors that already were being funded by communal sources, as well as through certain governmental programs. These programs were to be implemented, managed and/or monitored by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee ("JDC") and the Claims Conference. The Court also would fund similar programs for needy Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual and disabled survivors, to be implemented and monitored by the IOM.[305]

In a separate negotiation, and distinct from the Distribution Plan, plaintiffs and defendants established a claims resolution process for certain Holocaust-era Insurance Claims involving two named Swiss insurers, to be administered by CRT-II but directed in considerable measure by the insurers. The payment of the insurance claims process was partially funded from the Settlement Fund and partially funded by the participating insurance companies.

Finally, on behalf of all class members, the Distribution Plan provided for the creation of a $10 million Victim List Project (originally described as the "Victim List Foundation"), ultimately increased to $14.5 million, to memorialize all Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, those who survived and those who perished.

As this distribution process drew to its conclusion, Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne reflected on the efforts of the Special Masters, who at the time of Neuborne's writing had "devoted [many] years of [their professional] li[ves] to constructing a parallel legal universe . . ."[306]

In this "parallel" legal world:

> Holocaust-era bank account claims could be justly resolved despite the passage of a half-century, and the Swiss banks' destruction of the historical record…. [A]n institution in Zurich, the Claims Resolution Tribunal (the "CRT II"), [was designated] to adjudicate bank account claims as an arm of the Brooklyn federal court, replete with an Israeli-designed computer program that read 100,000 bank account claims in multiple languages [relating to over 415,000 possible account owners], including Hebrew and Cyrillic, and matched the claims against the surviving records of 36,000 Swiss bank records from the 1930's and 40's identified by the Volcker audit as probable or possible Holocaust-era accounts, which were written in an archaic dialect of banking German. When a claim matched with an account, CRT officials investigated the match to assure that the true owner had been identified. [The process incorporated] elaborate Evidence rules and rebuttable presumptions designed to govern disputes over the ownership, payment, and size of a given account, and … sophisticated burden of proof rules [were] calculated to recognize the passage of time and to take account of the destruction of the original records. [The Court incorporated] [r]ebuttable presumptions made necessary by Switzerland's reprehensible behavior in having destroyed the historical record…. [For example] if a Swiss bank account was closed during the Nazi era without a record of who actually had received the > proceeds, it was fair to presume that the account had not been paid to its true owner. [A] process [was created] enabling payments to 12,500 persons with "plausible but undocumented claims" to reflect the fact that Swiss destruction of all traces of 2.8 million accounts made it impossible to verify their plausible claims. With the help of dozens of dedicated CRT staffers [some 280 in total over the years] working out of a Zurich office building led by Mary Carter, a fiercely dedicated American lawyer, and Dov Rubenstein, a Cambridge-trained Israeli lawyer and ex-fighter pilot, the CRT presided over the resolution of more than 100,000 bank account claims, resulting in payments of [almost $720] million to thousands of bank account class members throughout the world. The CRT memorialized every award in a written opinion that is publicly available on a web site maintained by the settlement. The thousands of CRT opinions chronicling the claims, with the claimants' names redacted to respect their privacy, constitute a priceless addition to the historical record.

> In addition, relying on non-governmental organizations like the International Organization [for] Migration (IOM), headquartered in Geneva [and the] Claims Conference, headquartered in New York, [the process established] investigative mechanisms to identify approximately two hundred thousand former slave laborers and refugees, and to pay them a total of $300 million.
> Finally, [the Distribution Plan] organized a consortium of aid organizations, charitable institutions and social workers and distributed [almost $256] million for the care of hundreds of thousands of the poorest survivors throughout the world, including thousands of Sinti-Roma. Over the past decade, [the Court and its agents], and the virtual legal world they built, distributed 100% of the $1.25 billion settlement fund [ultimately almost $1.285 billion] to 452,000 [ultimately over 458,400] Holocaust victims or their heirs throughout the world - a remarkable achievement.[307]

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit described these efforts, undertaken in careful coordination by the Court, Lead Settlement Counsel and the Special Master, as "exemplary."[308]

[307] Neuborne, Litigating the Holocaust, at 41-42. More than the $1.25 billion settlement — a total of almost $1.285 billion — was distributed to over 458,400 Holocaust victims and certain heirs.

[308] In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 424 F.3d 132, 149 n.15 (2d Cir. 2005) ("the careful consideration that the District Court, the Special Master, and the Lead Settlement Counsel have accorded to every step in the allocation and distribution of this historic settlement has been exemplary").

C. Appeals of the Court's Order Adopting the Distribution Plan

After the Court adopted the Special Masters' recommendations, six appeals were filed from the Court's order approving the Distribution Plan. Four of the six appeals shortly were withdrawn. Of the two remaining appellants, one filed a brief on the merits and, on July 19, 2001, argued his case before the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. That appeal challenged the Court's appointment of the Claims Conference to assist with administration of the distribution process; questioned the allocation of approximately two-thirds of the settlement fund to the Deposited Assets Class; and contested the decision to utilize cy pres principles to administer the Looted Assets Class.

As to the second appeal, challenging the Claims Conference as an administrative agent, the Court of Appeals, in an opinion issued one week after oral argument on July 26, 2001, noted that the "Claims Conference was chosen because of its lengthy experience with similar programs and because it had already been chosen to process" German Foundation claims. The "efficacy of having one organization process the claims of individuals entitled to recover from both programs cannot be gainsaid."[309]

As to the allocation of up to $800 million to the Deposited Assets Class, the Distribution Plan, like the Settlement Agreement itself, had placed "priority upon returning to their rightful owners 'the sums that Swiss banks have been holding for them for more than half a century.'" Judge Korman had deemed that priority to be "appropriate" in his November 22, 2000 decision adopting the Distribution Plan in its entirety.[310] The Court of Appeals likewise recognized the

The parties to the Settlement Agreement … accord[ed] the 'Deposited Assets Class' priority among the five settlement classes. The remainder of the Settlement Fund is to be distributed among the other four settlement classes") (citing, e.g., Settlement Agreement, Sections 5.2, 5.3; Amendment No. 2 to Settlement Agreement, at 3-7; Memorandum to the File, Aug. 9, 2000, ¶ D).

preeminence of the Deposited Assets claims, confirming that the allocation was proper because the > existence and estimated value of the claimed deposit accounts was established by extensive forensic accounting …. [T]hese claims are based on well-established legal principles, have the ability of being proved with concrete documentation, and are readily valuated in terms of time and inflation. By contrast, the claims of the other four classes are based on novel and untested legal theories of liability, would have been very difficult to prove at trial, and will be very difficult to accurately valuate. Any allocation of a settlement of this magnitude and comprising such different types of claims must be based, at least in part, on the comparative strengths and weaknesses of the asserted legal claims.[311]

The strength of the Deposited Assets Class claims was reaffirmed on numerous occasions over the duration of the claims process. In a November 4, 2002 decision addressing certain plaintiffs' attorneys' fees, Judge Korman pointed out that the Deposited Assets Class claims were and remained the core of the lawsuit:

> The heart of this case and the only cause of action capable of surviving a motion to dismiss turned on the failure of Swiss banks to honor their contractual and fiduciary duties to their depositors. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, 14 Fed. Appx. 132, 135 (2d Cir. 2001). The other claims against the Swiss banks, while not without a moral basis, were not sustainable, id. ….[312]

In 2004, in response to certain objections regarding aspects of the Looted Assets Class allocation, Judge Korman reiterated that "of all the claims asserted against the Swiss Banks, only the claims of the Deposited Assets Class have any legal merit. The other claims could not have withstood a motion to dismiss."[313] The issue was not whether the other claims (for injuries relating to slave labor, looting and refugee attempts) had moral validity, but, rather, that the deficiencies of those claims under United States law were "a reality check for those … who believe that strong moral claims are easily converted into successful legal causes of action."[314]

D. Implementation of the Distribution Plan - Establishing the Claims Processes

As discussed in detail in the chapters that follow, nearly 1,113,000 claims were received, and over 458,000 awards were approved. To that end, a wide variety of administrative and policy issues had to be considered. To oversee this process, the Court, Special Masters and claims administrators variously:

- approved claim forms, claims procedures, and appellate processes for the Deposited Assets, Slave Labor, and Refugee Classes;
- appointed Special Masters Volcker and Bradfield to supervise the Deposited Assets Class distribution process and the CRT, and subsequently appointed Dr. Helen B. Junz to serve as an additional CRT Special Master;[315] assets claims rested on a solid legal claim beyond unjust enrichment. They often never stated a cause of action at all'." Id. at 42 n.291 (citing "[t]elephone interview with Judge Edward Korman (Apr. 23, 2009)"). According to the author, "Judge Korman said he 'always though that these [deposited assets claims] were the most meritorious.'" Id. at 42 n.292.

315 The Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) was based in Zurich because of the need for access to bank documents that under Swiss law had to remain in Switzerland. It served essentially as an arm of the Court, led by its Special Masters, including Helen Junz, who also had been a member of the Bergier Commission. As Judge Korman said of Dr. Junz in a Memorandum & Order of November 29, 2006 relating to amendment of one of the rules for processing Deposited Assets Class claims: "Prior to her [April 13, 2004] appointment [by the Court] Dr. Junz, who is an economist, had a distinguished career as a national and international public servant. She served in senior positions at the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System of the United States, at the Economic Council of the President in the White House; as Deputy Assistant Secretary at the Department of the Treasury and subsequently at the International Monetary Fund. Her involvement with the analysis of Holocaust era asset questions came in 1997 when Paul Volcker asked her to produce a study of the wealth of the Jewish population in Europe at the eve of the Nazi era to provide a touchstone against which he and the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ('ICEP'), which he chaired, could assess the results of their audit of Swiss banks. The study was published as a book entitled, WHERE DID ALL THE MONEY GO? THE PRE-NAZI ERA WEALTH OF EUROPEAN JEWRY (Staempfli Publishers Ltd. 2002). Subsequently she guided the economic and financial research for the U.S. Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Era Assets, served as a member of the Independent Commission of Experts Switzerland - Second World War (the Bergier Commission); advised the van Kemenade Commission (Dutch commission) on aspects of Jewish-owned wealth in the Netherlands; produced, in collaboration with her co-authors, a study for the Austrian Historical Commission and was a fellow at the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum." Memorandum & Order at 1-2, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 29, 2006).

Dr. Junz replaced CRT Special Master Paul Volcker when he was asked to lead an unrelated United Nations investigation. In addition, throughout the process, Michael Bradfield (with important assistance from attorney Jaimie Taff, who previously had worked at the CRT) also served on the Court's behalf as CRT Special Master. Mr. Bradfield had been counsel to the Volcker Committee and supervised the audit firms in their investigation of Swiss accounts. The CRT staff was led throughout the claims process by the organization's Secretaries

- extended the appointment of Special Master Gribetz, and also appointed Shari C. Reig as Deputy Special Master, to assist with the Deposited Assets Class process and oversee distributions to the two Slave Labor, Refugee and Looted Assets Classes, as well as under the Insurance program and the Victim List Project, and;
- authorized hearings on and approved the proposed CRT rules, and supervised the February 5, 2001 publication of a list of 21,000 Swiss bank accounts determined by the Volcker Committee "probably" to belong to Holocaust victims;
- adjusted the payment mechanisms following assessment of preliminary claims data to provide for one-time payments in full to Deposited Assets recipients as well as to former slave laborers and refugees, rather than the originally anticipated two installment payments;
- authorized payments to class members on a "rolling" basis in a series of implementation orders beginning in July, 2001;
- authorized distributions from the Settlement Fund to certain of the class representatives "whose efforts materially aided the plaintiff class;"[316]
- reiterated the necessity for Swiss entities seeking releases under "Slave Labor Class II" (arising from slave labor for a Swiss entity performed by any Nazi victim, not just those within the five specified "victim or target groups") to identify themselves to the Court. It was only the companies, not the former slave laborers, who were in possession of such information. The "self-identification" requirement was challenged by the defendants and ultimately litigated before the Court of Appeals, which upheld the District Court's determination;
- extended filing deadlines for all classes in recognition that often elderly claimants might have been confused by the variety of parallel Holocaust compensation programs and initially were unaware of the need to file claims;
- authorized the expansion of the claims process to incorporate materials other than formal claim forms, such as Initial Questionnaires and claim forms filed with other entities or programs, recognizing that many future claims relating to Switzerland's Holocaust-era activities would be barred if not included within this process;
- adopted several adjustments in the method for calculating Deposited Assets Class awards to incorporate new data revealed during the claims process, including information relating to accounts that victims were forced to report to the Nazis; the deduction of fees from account balances; and the average values for accounts for which no valuation data was available in the bank records;

General, Mary Carter and Dov Rubinstein. The CRT also received crucial assistance from the New-York based Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP), led by Elena Vournas and Valerie Fischer. The analysis and resolution of so many bank account claims and the repayment of nearly $720 million to Holocaust victims and heirs would have been impossible without this extraordinarily dedicated group of people, and so many others involved with the CRT and SDAP programs.

316 See Order dated December 4, 2002; see also n.32 infra.

- formulated and instructed the CRT to incorporate a number of evidentiary presumptions in reviewing claims based upon the banks' destruction of records and the lack of information concerning the fate of many claimed accounts;
- approved a negotiated settlement with Swiss banks and banking authorities enabling administrative functions and certain other claims processing activities of the CRT in Zurich to be performed in New York by the "Swiss Deposited Assets Program;"
- authorized "Plausible Undocumented Awards" (PUAs) in the amount of $7,500 to be issued to Deposited Assets Class claimants who had plausibly demonstrated that one or more of their relatives had owned a Holocaust-era Swiss account, in recognition that the lack of documentation was due to the banks' destruction of data;
- authorized 45% increases in awards for members of all classes; and
- considered and ruled upon a variety of challenges to different elements of the claims process, particularly relating to the allocation and administration of the Looted Assets Class cy pres programs assisting the neediest Nazi victims.

E. Challenges to the Distribution Process

Although the case had settled and the claims processes theoretically should have proceeded without further litigation, various parties nevertheless continued to file legal challenges. As Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne has described it, there is a "vast swamp of reported cases involving the Swiss bank litigation."[317] All of these disputes (and others not reflected in reported decisions) arose after the lawsuits had settled:

1. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d 139 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (the District Court issued a comprehensive opinion describing the Swiss banks litigation and upholding the fairness of the $1.25 billion settlement);

[318] In addition, there was post-settlement litigation concerning the legal fees sought by plaintiffs' counsel, as well as by an attorney representing a group of U.S. survivors, including: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 270 F. Supp. 2d 313 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) (denying risk multiplier for plaintiffs' attorneys' fees); In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 311 F. Many of the post-settlement disputes were related to the Court's consideration of proposals to increase the amounts allocated to various class members. The Court's initial decision in 2002 to increase awards to various classes by 45% did not meet with resistance. That decision did, however, lay the groundwork for future supplements to class members, and these later allocation decisions were sometimes challenged.

Thus, in 2002, taking advantage of unexpected additional income generated by a tax exemption on the Settlement Fund as well as interest income,[319] the Court increased by 45% the payments under Slave Labor Class I, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class. Following [319] The tax refund was the result of discussions among the Court, Special Masters, Settlement Fund accountant and plaintiffs' class counsel, who observed that interest on the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund was subject to taxation, and perhaps so too might be distributions to claimants. The matter was brought to the attention of members of the United States Congress, resulting in a provision of the 2001 Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act, Section 803, entitled: "No Federal Income Tax on Restitution Received by Victims of the Nazi Regime or their Heirs or Estates." The law exempted from taxation the interest earned on the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund, the fund established under ICHEIC, and similar Holocaust compensation funds See, e.g., In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 270 F. Supp. 2d 313, 325 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) ("After Special Master Judah Gribetz called attention to the diminution of the Settlement Fund by taxes on earned interest as well as the taxation of benefits awarded to the members of the classes," a successful effort was made "to persuade Congress to adopt legislation exempting from taxation interest earned by the Settlement Fund and payments to its beneficiaries").

In addition to refunding to the Settlement Fund the taxes that already had been paid on interest earned, Section 803 — initiated largely by those involved with creating and overseeing the Swiss Banks Settlement Fund — resulted in overall savings to the Settlement Fund of approximately $25 million in taxes, the sum that would have been due had the exemption not been enacted. These savings were passed along to class members as distributions from the Settlement Fund. The tax law also exempted from taxation the individual payments that were made from the Swiss Banks Settlement and other Holocaust compensation funds, benefiting many thousands of U.S. citizens by ensuring that such payments were not to be reported as taxable income. See, e.g., In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 528 F. Supp. 2d 109, 112 (E.D.N.Y. 2007) (Block, J.) (noting that the "Congressional legislation making the settlement fund tax exempt" resulted in a "potential savings of 25 million dollars").

resolution of post-settlement litigation relating to Slave Labor Class II, the Court on June 22, 2004 authorized a 45% increase to members of that class as well.[320] The Court further determined that the excess funds allocated to members of the Looted Assets Class ($45 million at that time) were to be distributed in accordance with the same criteria and mechanisms that had governed the initial $100 million allocation; i.e., through humanitarian assistance programs administered by the JDC, Claims Conference and the IOM.

In August, 2003, the Court requested the Special Masters to consider whether additional excess funds existed to permit a second supplemental distribution to class members, without jeopardizing the rights of any person under the Distribution Plan. Based upon examination of the then-most recent distribution statistics and projections, as well as investment data concerning the Settlement Fund, it appeared that $60 million in additional excess funds was available.[321] Unlike the first distribution of excess funds in 2002 (which allocated the additional funds among several classes), the Special Masters, upon consultation with the Court, recommended allocating the additional $60 million wholly to the Looted Assets Class, for the benefit of needy survivors. As with the prior allocations, the Special Masters recommended that such funds should be used only to augment, and not replace, existing funds the organizations already received from other sources. The Court adopted this recommendation by order dated November 17, 2003, thus more than doubling the Looted Assets Class allocation from $100 million to $205 million as of 2004.

[320] These increases were available for distribution to class members even though, as Judge Korman pointed out in his 2010 decision adjusting presumptive values and PUA amounts, the "economic recession with which this century began, the economic crisis which ensued from the 9/11 terrorist attack in 2001, and the global economic crisis, which began in 2007, have resulted in interest rates that are at historic lows." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 731 F. Supp. 2d 279, 291 (E.D.N.Y. 2010).

[321] The excess funds were attributable to interest income accruing on the Settlement Fund "as well as the defendant banks' transfer to the fund of approximately $5.2 million, pursuant to Judge Block's determination on April 11, 2003 that the banks owed compound interest on the original Escrow Fund." See Letter from Judah Gribetz to Hon. Edward R. Korman (Sept. 11, 2003). The issue was called to the Special Masters' attention by the Settlement Fund accountants, Eisner LLP (now Eisner Amper) ("Eisner"). Eisner pointed out in December 2001 that under Section 2.2 of the Escrow Agreement, the determination of compound interest at LIBOR appeared to be required. The timing of compounding was not specified but if LIBOR was compounded on a daily, weekly or monthly basis, the Defendant Banks would be required to make additional payments of over $4 million (as of that date). The dispute was litigated and, as a result, the banks were required to pay additional interest of $5.2 million. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 256 F. Supp. 2d 150, 155 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (although the Escrow Agreement contained certain ambiguous language, "extrinsic evidence" including the "acts and conduct of the banks decisively inform the Court that the parties intended that the Escrow Fund was to earn compound interest" and not simple interest).

In addition to seeking the Special Masters' views on allocation of excess funds, in August, 2003, the Court also requested the Special Masters to consider whether residual funds — from those amounts initially allocated to members of the five plaintiff classes — might remain unclaimed at the close of the administration period. If so, the Court asked for recommendations concerning the ultimate distribution of such residual funds.

In April 2004, the Court accepted for consideration the Special Masters' proposal to allocate all further residual funds to the neediest survivors, in accordance with three main priorities: first, food and winter relief to those most in need of such assistance (mostly in the former Soviet Union); second, home health care, medicines and medical equipment for those whose needs for such services were unmet by governmental or other assistance programs; and third, case management, mental health care and assistance for support groups.

However, the preliminary assessment that approximately $200 million in residual funds remained proved to be premature.[322] CRT Special Master Helen Junz in the meantime had completed a reanalysis of the amounts to which owners (or heirs) of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts might be entitled. She came to the conclusion that there might be little in residual funds after appropriate payments were made to the Deposited Assets Class.

Many of the Deposited Assets Class awards had been based on the ICEP auditors' assessment of "presumptive" or "average" values for a particular type of account (e.g., safe deposit, demand deposit, custody account and so forth). Presumptive values were used in substitution for actual account values, as in many cases the records reflecting actual values had been destroyed by the banks. After studying the available data, including information provided to the CRT by the banks only after the initial presumptive values had been adopted and the claims process was well under way, Special Master Junz concluded that the presumptive values for the most part had been significantly underestimated. She notified Judge Korman that based upon her study of actual values for accounts that had been awarded, as well as for other accounts to which the CRT had access, it was evident that most of the bank account awards needed to be increased. Given the availability of new and more accurate information, and in light of the priority of the Deposited Assets claims, the appropriate course was to correct the account values, in most cases upward. The auditor who oversaw the Volcker Committee investigation advised the Court that he, too, would have made use of this additional information had it been available at the time of the original review. That upward adjustment meant that the Court needed to authorize retroactive increases to claimants who had already been paid, while increasing payments on forthcoming CRT awards.

Special Master Junz filed her recommendation on March 21, 2006 and filed supplemental reports thereafter. However, because the amount of funds available for a residual allocation to the Looted Assets Class would decrease substantially by adopting Special Master Junz' proposal, certain objectors questioned the proposed adjustment in payments for the bank accounts. After considerable litigation, the Court adopted Special Master Junz' recommendations on June 16, 2010,[323] thus paving the way for substantial additional payments to be issued to members of the Deposited Assets Class. In total, the Court processes repaid nearly $720 million to Holocaust victims and heirs whose accounts had not been returned by Swiss banks.

As the claims program for bank accounts drew to a close in late 2012, and it was clear that some amount of residual funds would remain from the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class, the Court requested a final recommendation as to the use of those funds. On March 22, 2013, Special Master Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Reig advised that approximately $54.5 million in residual funds remained. They proposed that $4.5 million of this amount should be allocated to research and archiving programs operated by Yad Vashem and the USHMM, as part of what had proven to be the successful Victim List Project, thus ensuring that all Court-funded programs would benefit from the same 45% increase that had been authorized for the other classes. The remaining $50 million, it was suggested, should be allocated to programs serving the needy, thus bringing the Looted Assets Class allocation to approximately $256 million, from the original $100 million. The Court adopted these recommendations on May 13, 2013.[324] Objections similar to those previously raised in connection with the Looted

Assets Class programs were filed in connection with the allocation of residual funds. The Court found these objections to be without merit.[325]

IV. THE IMPACT OF THE SWISS BANKS SETTLEMENT

A decade after the Settlement, some were expressing reservations that had been voiced as early as the 1950s during the discussions of the first Holocaust compensation agreement, the Luxembourg Agreements negotiated by the Claims Conference and other members of the organized Jewish community. The concern was that "endless talk of restitution payments 'cheapened the memory of the Holocaust,' and turned the 'biggest mass murder in history into an economic issue.'"[326]

What sometimes was overlooked was that the Holocaust litigation instituted in the 1990s, beginning with the Swiss Banks Settlement, was responding to the financial needs of many survivors, as well as to a distinct aspect of the Holocaust: the rampant and uncompensated looting of Nazi victims. The Swiss Banks Settlement and subsequent proceedings resulted in payments to hundreds of thousands of non-Jewish Nazi victims, many of whom never had previously received payments of any kind for their stolen property and their unpaid labor.[327] In addition, as noted previously, scholars such as Professor Michael Bazyler have observed that the Swiss Banks settlement paved the way for several new Holocaust compensation programs, including the considerably larger German slave and forced labor program. The "Swiss banks settlement was … 'the mother of all Holocaust restitution settlements. If the litigation had failed, there would have been no momentum to proceed further with the other claims,' for insurance, art and slave labor compensation."[328] Lead Settlement Counsel Neuborne noted that "[f]rankly, no one expected the Swiss bank case to settle for $1.25 billion. The success of the litigation … [led to new cases] ... filed against European insurance companies, Austrian banks, German banks, the French National Railway system, and even the United States government for failing to safeguard a so-called 'Hungarian Gold Train' bearing Nazi loot. But the bulk of the new Holocaust-era litigation centered on the massive use of slave and forced labor by German companies during WW II."[329]

The German Foundation acknowledged as much, observing in its 2017 publication reflecting on the slave and forced labor program that the main impetus for that compensation process was the litigation in the United States. These lawsuits had begun in 1998 with "a wave of so-called class action lawsuits against those German companies operative in the US" — cases which were filed in the aftermath of the Swiss Banks litigation — "that had been involved in one way or another in abuses and exploitation of forced laborers during the Nazi period... For German companies, these lawsuits not only meant that they could eventually lose the cases and face very large financial obligations, they also had to spend significant sums on legal fees and, probably even more importantly, they got negative publicity in the media... Therefore, these 329 Neuborne, Toward Common Procedures, at 15. On the other hand, as noted by Ambassador Eizenstat, although lawsuits were filed against a variety of European entities including Swiss banks, German manufacturers, and Austrian insurers, only the litigation against French banks yielded a clear victory for plaintiffs on the legal merits. Judge Sterling Johnson of the Eastern District of New York "shocked the French banking community by refusing to dismiss the American lawsuits …. [It was] the first time in all the Holocaust litigations that a U.S. judge had permitted a case to go forward to trial by denying a motion to dismiss." EIZENSTAT, IMPERFECT JUSTICE, at 320-321. court proceedings had an important impact on the economic performance of the involved German companies in the US."[330]

It is also noteworthy that, taking all of the recent settlements into consideration, "[m]ost of the beneficiaries of the restitution money are non-Jewish wartime survivors or their heirs. For example, 80 percent of the recipients of the DM 10 billion German slave labor settlement money are elderly Slavs from eastern Europe forced to work for Nazi Germany."[331]

In addition, the settlements were negotiated on behalf of survivors around the world, not only for those in the United States, and the payments often made a significant difference to those living in other countries. Dr. Otto Graf Lambsdorff, who as a representative of the German government was extensively involved with the negotiation and creation of the German Foundation, observed: "... [A] price? We knew how difficult that was. The other side and I were absolutely relieved and delighted that all the people around the table came to a result. Whether this is a just result or an unjust result, nobody can say that. I do not know it. But to say that money is not so important, do not take it too lightly here in New York, in the United States. To a survivor who is living here in, hopefully, well-to-do or reasonably satisfactory conditions, DM 15,000 [the amount designated for slave laborers under the German Foundation] is not too much. For a survivor in the Ukraine or Belarus, it is a fortune."[332]

Some commentators, such as Holocaust scholar Michael Marrus, have been supportive of compensation efforts generally, but have expressed concern in this particular case that the behavior of the Swiss banks "reflects a universal 'banking culture,'" as evidenced by the apparent failure of "Israeli banks" to "behave[] any better with their own Holocaust victims['] assets than the Swiss did." Professor Marrus feared that "'[h]istorical claims … generally cannot be based upon the remedial paradigm of individual perpetrator, individual victim, and proven quantifiable losses….'"[333] Even with its supposed limitations, though, Marrus, like many other observers, also considered the Swiss Banks Settlement a "major achievement" and the largest "on a human rights issue ever to be heard in a civil court," with "[h]istoric wrongs … acknowledged."[334] The compensation movement of the late 1990s "gave voice to a fundamental human need. 'If a person has suffered tremendously, he wants it acknowledged by a government, court, tribunal or other institution. Victims around the world are no longer happy with diplomatic apologies between nations only, as was the case after World War I,'" and thus the Swiss Banks Settlement and others "gave Holocaust survivors 'a measure of justice.'"[335]

Similarly, many critics of the general concept of Holocaust compensation nevertheless agreed that the property claims that were at the heart of the Swiss Banks lawsuit did demand redress, no matter how many decades had passed. Thus, columnist Charles Krauthammer, who was concerned about the impact of restitution "on the memory of victims," also believed that "[i]ndividual victims who had their savings or property or art stolen should be allowed to seek restitution even at this late date."[336] The Economist opined that "since it is hard to decouple claims for monetary and for moral compensation, it is hard to shrug off the faintly shabby air that hangs over the Holocaust claims," but nevertheless acknowledged that if not for the "persistent efforts in the first place to seek financial reparation, to bang time and again on the doors of Swiss banks, demanding access to secret archives, it is unlikely that the dormant accounts would ever have been discovered. It is also unlikely that the renewed efforts to delve more broadly into a painful history would have taken place."[337] Dr. Yael Danieli, a clinical psychologist specializing in treatment of Holocaust victims, has observed as to the financial aspects of compensation: "The money concretises for the victim the confirmation of responsibility, wrongfulness, he is not guilty, and somebody cares about it. It is at least a token. It does have a meaning. Just a letter of apology doesn't have the same meaning and even if it is a token it adds. In our system of justice, of government, when damage occurred, money is paid."[338]

Apologies — and restitution — have not been limited to the European nations where the Holocaust happened. Professor Bazyler has noted that Israel has not been immune from the impact of the Holocaust litigation. The "initial accusations that the Swiss banks failed to return monies … led to inquiries about whether banks in other countries might also be holding such pre-war and wartime dormant accounts. One surprising answer: Israel…. In January 2000, Bank Leumi, Israel's largest bank … admitted to holding approximately 13,000 dormant accounts, many of which are believed to have belonged to victims of Nazi persecution."[339] Following initial resistance, Bank Leumi (successor to the Holocaust-era Anglo-Palestine Bank) was "[e]mbarrassed into following the model adopted by the Swiss banks and other European corporations" and "created a claims settlement process by which survivors and heirs entitled to these funds would be eligible to receive them." Significantly, the "Bank Leumi episode illustrates an important legacy of the Swiss campaign. Restitution claims made by Holocaust survivors — or for that matter any other historical claims for financial wrongs — can no longer be ignored by those accused of benefitting from those wrongs. Such accusations are now taken seriously."[340]

Nor has the restitution movement been limited to the Holocaust. The Swiss Banks case and those that followed to some extent "opened the door to lawsuits" concerning other human rights abuses, "jump-start[ing] a wave of litigation by American POWs and civilians with claims against Japanese firms that used slave labor during the Second World War; heirs of victims of the Armenian genocide; and the fight for restitution by the descendants of African-American slaves."[341] The human rights litigation that followed the Swiss Banks Settlement, however, did not generally produce the same successful results.[342]

Beyond their impact upon individual victims, the Holocaust lawsuits in general, and the Swiss Banks Settlement in particular, helped to expand the historical record. Thus, in one week in December of 1999, Switzerland received not one but two major reports concerning its wartime behavior, the Volcker Report and the Bergier Refugee Report (eventually followed in 2002 by the Final Bergier Report). The Economist noted: "The Swiss did not embark on this self-examination entirely voluntarily. Much of the impetus came from the unyielding pressure of Jewish groups which, over the years, refused to take No for an answer from the Swiss banks. The banks, in turn, hid behind secrecy laws. It is also true that until quite recently the Swiss government itself handled the clamour to investigate the various charges clumsily and 342 The plaintiffs in the German slave labor cases did not prevail in the U.S. courts, but their lawsuits contributed to a political climate resulting in the establishment of the German Foundation. Similarly, claims arising from the Armenian genocide went forward as a result of a California statute specifically enacted to permit California courts "to hear cases based on Armenian genocide life insurance policies," resulting in a "$20 million dollar settlement." On the other hand, the Holocaust litigation "has not produced a flood of decisions favoring victims of historical wrongs, and the litigation effort is best made as part of a larger social movement for justice, to enhance the prospects of a favorable outcome." Ratner & Becker, The Legacy of Holocaust Class Action Suits, at 353. For example, "victims of Japanese industry's slave labor" during World War II, including former U.S. POWs, "filed over two dozen" ultimately unsuccessful "lawsuits against the corporations that had exploited them during the war." United States District Judge Vaughn Walker dismissed the claims based on the 1951 Treaty of Peace between Japan and the U.S. and its allies. Michael J. Supp. 2d 1027 (N.D. Ill. 2004), in which "descendants of slaves sought reparations from banks, insurance companies, and other corporations that profited from the institution of slavery," STEPHENS ET AL., INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS LITIGATION IN U.S. COURTS, at 544, the district court dismissed the claims for lack of standing (carving out a narrow exception for individuals suing in a representative capacity for their ancestors' estates), statute of limitations, political question, and failure to state a claim.

Moreover, the United States Supreme Court has cast doubt upon the viability of claims by foreign nationals for human rights abuses committed outside the U.S. by corporate entities. See Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 133 S. Ct. 1659 (2013).

insensitively. Nonetheless, that this exercise has taken place at all is ground for some Swiss credit. Many other countries have passed through inglorious episodes this century and, even after prodding, have chosen not to look back with such thoroughness…. With mixed motives, no doubt, Switzerland is now confronting its past. To do so is far from easy."[343]

Professor Leora Bilsky has observed that "[o]nly by turning to the American class action did jurists find a way to hold corporations accountable for their involvement in the Nazi crimes, due to such factors as the group structure of the claim and the change in the role of the judge."[344] She viewed the Swiss Banks Settlement and its implementation as a means of collecting "new and important information," and praised the emphasis the distribution process placed not just upon payments, but upon history. "[I]n order to distribute the global settlement amount, the court in the Swiss case relied on historical research but also encouraged the production of data, through victim questionnaires, the distribution plan and the award process. Questionnaires were sent to approximately one million survivors and their families, seeking to allow potential class members to express support or opposition to the settlement, as well as to gather information to assist the court in designing a fair scheme of allocation of the settlement funds. In the view of Professor Neuborne, one of the counsels for the plaintiffs, a central reason for bringing the cases was 'to speak to history - to build a historical record that could never be denied.'"[345]

As Professor Bilsky pointed out, the settlement process enabled the Court to prod the banks to release information that otherwise would not have been made public due to Swiss banking secrecy rules.

These views differ from those of Professor Marrus, who considered the Holocaust litigation to be of "limited impact historically." MARRUS, SOME MEASURE OF JUSTICE, at 117.

> Judge Edward R. Korman, who was in charge of the Swiss banks case, refused to formally order discovery to allow the plaintiffs' accounting experts to inspect the banks' records, fearing that such an order would have forced Swiss banks to commit a criminal act in their country. Instead, he pressured the defendants to reveal some information, by chastising the banks for failing to publish their lists of dormant accounts, and by refusing to validate the settlement as fair according to the law until access to information required for a fair claims procedure was secured. In other words, since the transnational aspects of the case obstructed the reliance on formal rules of discovery, settlement allowed the parties to reach a type of discovery that was much broader than the one entailed by Swiss law, but restricted in American terms…. [T]he judge's far-reaching procedural powers to supervise settlement negotiations and condition the approval of the settlement agreement enabled him to pressure the banks into overriding their secrecy policy and revealing at least some valuable information.[346]

The distribution plan likewise yielded extensive historical data.

> ….[T]he Special Master[s] appointed by the court in the Swiss banks litigation prepared a distribution plan which relied on, and in turn contributed to, the historical archive. While the plan provides an extensive review of historical research, relying on numerous sources, including primary sources, in order to determine the feasibility of holding an individualized claims process, it also reveals previously unpublished data. For example, in order to administer the distribution to the class of victims of slave labor who had worked for German entities owning assets in Swiss entities, the Special Master[s] established a list of German entities owning assets held in a Swiss company.
> In addition, the settlement, and in particular the possibility of obtaining a legal release from future claims, provided incentives for Swiss corporations to self-identify as having used slave labor during World War II and contribute historical information in a manner reminiscent of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). . . . Because of a lack of information, the court asked that companies seeking release from claims identify themselves and provide information, such as the names of slave laborers used by them. Several companies, including Nestlé, provided lists of thousands of individuals who had worked for them during the war and may have performed slave labor. These examples show how the legal process, while heavily reliant on existing historical research, can also contribute to historical research.[347]

Further, the litigation prodded reluctant governments, initially Switzerland but ultimately others, to explore their own Holocaust-era histories. For the Swiss, the self-examination was particularly difficult, so many decades after the Holocaust, because this kind of review had not been undertaken before. As the Chairman of the Bergier Commission, Jean-François Bergier, observed:

> Any effective reworking of the history of Switzerland's part in the Second World War must be based on two mutually complementary and interactive approaches. One is analytical: a highly detailed critical summarising of the facts and circumstances revealed by source material…. The other is the synthesis approach, identifying the most significant facts and placing them in their chronological and thematic context. It is this aspect that has been insufficiently addressed in Switzerland in the past, and that, no doubt, is what has made us so vulnerable…. From September 1939 to May 1945 was only five-and-a-half years, but the explanation for those years is to be found by placing them in the context of a longer period, extending both backwards and forwards in time. The tribulations we are now experiencing, whose knock-on effect is spreading from one country after another, clearly show that the chapter is far from closed. In a way, viewed from a very long distance, the Second World War was only one critical moment in a story that began before 1914 and seems not to have finished yet.[348]

Historian David Cesarani has analyzed the "unfinished business" of the Holocaust, noting that "Swiss banks and German corporations, insurance firms, the art market and even railways were soon the subject of industrial-scale historical research by specially commissioned teams under the leadership of established scholars. The resulting studies transformed the historical landscape. As Götz Aly concluded in Hitler's Beneficiaries (2005), the transfer of wealth from Looking to the German Foundation, the result is that we do pay money to individuals, to persons. Of course, it starts with a number of plaintiffs, a class, but at the very end the result of these class action lawsuits, or negotiations … is giving money to individualized people…. Second, … restitution enhances the memory…. [T]he debate, the memory, the dealing with Holocaust affairs in Germany became more and more lively. Companies are looking into their archives. Companies have asked academics, professors, to write reports, to find out what has happened within the companies").

Jews to Germans widened the circle of complicity to almost every German citizen," and a "similar dynamic extended across Europe."[349]

This self-examination and resulting expansion of knowledge was prompted to a considerable extent by the "Swiss model," which is "now the prototype used by both other European governments and private corporations when confronted with accusations about their wartime role. After a half-century of silence, the full historical record is only now coming out about how German, Austrian, French, British and even American companies profited from the Holocaust. The historical black hole of how commerce was conducted in Europe between 1933-45 is finally being filled in by Holocaust historians who … are now much in demand to staff the historical commissions being created by governments and private companies to research and issue reports about their financial dealings with the Nazis."[350] The companies have sought the input of Holocaust historians. For example, Deutsche Bank asked Harold James to examine the bank's role during the Nazi era; Allianz turned to Gerald Feldman; Degussa commissioned Peter Hayes; Bertelsmann engaged Saul Friedlander; and General Motors (for its German subsidiary Opel) sought out Henry Ashby Turner.[351]

The distribution mechanism for the core claims — the Deposited Assets Class — have left a unique legacy.[352] Professor Bilsky has concluded that the CRT process has expanded historical knowledge both by providing "sufficient incentives for the banks and the Swiss government to begin a serious audit and release some information," even if incomplete, and by

"contribut[ing] short personal histories to the historical 'archive' through the elaborate individualized claims programs established for the claims related to bank accounts."[353]

As Professor Alford, who participated in the CRT-I process, has observed, the CRT "is among the most unusual international tribunals in history…. The establishment of a hybrid process that is both international and domestic is a testament to the creativity of all involved — the governments, the private litigants, and the adjudicators. All of those involved in the [CRT] helped write one of the final chapters of the Holocaust."[354]

Thousands of individual decisions issued under the Court's authority are published on the internet (at www.swissbankclaims.com), and approximately 200 of these cases are described in the chapter included as part of this Final Report: "Summaries of Selected Deposited Assets Class Decisions." These decisions describe in detail who the victims were, what happened to them during the Holocaust, the post-war efforts to reclaim their assets, and what became of those assets. As counsel to the Volcker Committee and CRT Special Master Michael Bradfield has noted, "the [CRT] cases make you realize that these are not statistics or just pieces of paper, but real people are involved. Reading the decisions in these cases is for me like standing in the Holocaust Museum in Washington or in Yad Vashem in Jerusalem."[355] It is difficult to imagine a process more oriented toward preserving individualized histories than the CRT's.

As to more general knowledge of the Holocaust, Professor Bilsky took particular note of the Court's 2004 decision on the banks' behavior, describing it as an "exceptional instance of historical determination by the judge in the THL [transnational Holocaust restitution lawsuits]":

S-257, S-267 to -268 (2001). The CRT decisions, as well as summaries of the experiences of slave laborers and refugees, are all intended to individualize victims and to research and then preserve their unique histories. Thus, while one observer has stated that the "problem with the Holocaust restitution initiatives was that there were inadequate provisions for historical or moral justice," nor was "priority placed on establishing historical truth," THANE ROSENBAUM, THE MYTH OF MORAL JUSTICE: WHY OUR LEGAL SYSTEM FAILS TO DO WHAT'S RIGHT 75-76 (HarperCollins Publishers 2004), the Swiss Banks Settlement claims process did seek to emphasize "historical truth" at every turn.

> Visibly exasperated by what he deemed "a series of frivolous and offensive objections to the distribution process," Judge Korman upheld the [CRT] rules, after an extensive discussion and analysis of the Bergier Report's findings. In doing so, the judge expressly sought to set the historical record straight, and in addition assigned moral responsibility to the defendants for historic wrongdoing during the Nazi era and after the war, as well as for the present-day denial of responsibility . . .[356]

However, as Professor Bilsky has noted, it may be that "only legal experts can find this decision hidden among a long list of legal documents, even though it is published on a public website."[357]

It is not only the Court's opinions that are not widely known. Switzerland's own committee of experts — its Bergier Commission — revealed new information and expressed critical views about many aspects of Swiss wartime behavior, but the Commission's 2002 final report and its numerous related studies went largely unnoticed in Switzerland and elsewhere. As the Swiss historian, Prof. Dr. Regula Ludi, observed in 2004:

> The public response to the outcome of Switzerland's most ambitious historical investigation has been disappointing. The media barely took notice of the ICE's [Bergier Commission's] final results. Compared to the late 1990s — when Nazi era- related issues made the headlines over months, newspapers were inundated by letters to the editor, and no week passed without talk shows or documentaries on television — the subject does not attract public attention anymore. Obviously the general interest in the wartime history has waned. So, in the end, the question remains: how has the memory crisis affected Swiss society and the political meaning of historical representations in the longer run?[358]

Professor Ludi likewise noted in 2005 that the "final output of five years of intensive historical research in early 2002 has barely attracted any attention, let alone any more substantial reactions. This is perhaps surprising considering the nervous responses both media and public had shown to every single disclosure just a few years earlier. Obviously, the Swiss public is tired of reckoning with the past and considers the Nazi era a closed chapter."[359]

The Bergier Report also attracted some negative comment in Switzerland. As noted by Swiss historian Dr. François Wisard, Head of History Unit, Federal Department of Foreign Affairs of the Swiss Confederation, there were members of the Swiss public who immediately sought to repudiate the Report. A "group of citizens" asked the Swiss government to "comment thoroughly" and "adopt a critical view" of the Bergier Report. "The government refused to draft such a comment about the report. It might have been surprising should the government have tasked the Commission with examining a long list of topics and then to have eventually questioned its findings once the report was published."[360]

Even for experts and professional historians the massive output is difficult to read, and for the average citizen it is a closed book. While an effort was made to summarize the most important results in the final report, it still makes difficult reading for the interested layman. So far, efforts to popularize the Bergier Commission's reassessment of history and publish it in a more readable form have not come to fruition. Apart from some new history textbooks based on the commission's findings, its insights have not been widely disseminated and so have failed to make an impact on society." In addition, "by 2001, when [the Bergier Commission] started to publish its results, the U.S. and Jewish pressure on Switzerland was already a thing of the past. Business as usual prevailed, and almost nobody in the political parties, parliament, or the public wanted to rock the boat or even hear about replacing the old narrative with a new one. After all, the whole exercise was merely about fending off outside pressure …. Being viewed, then, as imposed by external elements, the reassessment of the past has barely left traces. While the new and revised narrative established by the Bergier Commission has become the official history of Switzerland during World War II, it has had little impact outside of academia. With the settlement between the major Swiss banks and Jewish claimants, most of the Swiss considered the matter resolved and moved on. Switzerland's wartime record has ceased to be a matter of public debate and interest." See also Bernhard C. Schär and Vera Sperisen, Switzerland and the Holocaust: teaching contested history, 42 J. CURRICULUM STUD. 649, 657 (2010) (reviewing a Swiss textbook on the Bergier Commission and the Swiss role during the Nazi era, the authors noted that the textbook "presents itself as an instrument that lives up to the task of joining the group of other democratic, civilized, European nations that have (supposedly) already gone through [the] painful process" of "catharsis with regard to the nation's share of responsibility for the Holocaust." However, the "need for national catharsis is, of course, contested in Switzerland. In the national conservative view of the nation's war history, Switzerland's degree of responsibility for the Holocaust is insignificant, and therefore there is no need for catharsis").

Although there is not necessarily widespread knowledge of the trove of historically significant information that has been unearthed as a result of the Swiss Banks litigation and other Holocaust-related claims, the findings still remain. They are there for any interested party, historian or otherwise, to examine.

Professor Neuborne, who served as Lead Settlement Counsel to the plaintiff class in the Swiss Banks case and was one of the chief litigators in the German slave labor cases, offered his own reflections as an active participant in the two proceedings. As the Swiss Banks settlement distribution process was winding down, he took stock of what the Swiss and German lawsuits had accomplished and concluded that each had been a success:

> The very fact that institutions of great power were forced to negotiate with the victims on terms of formal equality and to publically pay huge sums to them in settlement of the victims' claims reinforced a sense of individual dignity that is not enhanced by tutelary actions by governments on behalf of victims. Based on my conversations, many victims welcomed the opportunity to seek redress in their own names, as opposed to being treated as wards of the state. It is the difference between demanding justice, and asking for charity. It is, moreover, inaccurate to claim that the Holocaust litigation may have muddied the moral record by allowing the defendants to exit without a formal finding of guilt, or an apology. In the first place, the German settlement included a moving apology by President Rau to hundreds of survivors. The Swiss settlement did not include a formal apology, but publicity about the litigation forced the Swiss government to appoint the Bergier Commission, which finally chronicled Switzerland's WW II mistreatment of refugees and the banking industry's post-war failure to deal fairly with Holocaust-related accounts. The Volcker audit provided incontrovertible evidence of large numbers of unpaid Holocaust-era accounts and disclosed the extent of Swiss destruction of the historical record. The litigation resulted in the opening of numerous corporate archives to historians, dramatically expanding the available historical record. The Swiss settlement funded the Victim[] List Project, the effort to remember each victim by name. The painstaking claims processes in both the Swiss and German settlements generated vast amounts of information about the lives and losses of individual victims. And, the very existence of the litigation stimulated a new wave of research and writing about the Holocaust. Finally, the basic purpose of the litigation was not to stimulate moral consideration of the Holocaust, or to supplement the historical record. It was an > effort to provide a modicum of compensation to as many individual victims as possible, while stripping aiders and abettors of as much of their ill gotten gains as possible. That project would, of course, have been enhanced by legal victories that clarified the law and called the defendants names. But, in the end, the success of the project should be measured, in my view, by the delivery of substantial compensation to victims and the disgorgement of significant sums by wrongdoers – on that level, it was a remarkable success. I call it some measure of compensation, but no attempt at justice.[361]

organizations, and individual victims to come together to design deliberative forums and establish innovative mechanisms to resolve decades-old disputes, all the while enhancing historical knowledge.").

Professor Neuborne's thoughtful reflection might be disputed in only one respect: the claims processes, particularly those established for owners of Swiss bank accounts, made every attempt to deliver justice, with significant results. If justice — at least on a material level, if certainly not on a moral level — could not be fully meted out, that was because so many decades had passed and so many documents had been destroyed. But it was not for lack of trying.

The chapters that follow describe the effort to deliver some degree of material justice to each of the five settlement classes and each of the five victim groups under the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement.

XI. CONCLUSION: SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE DEPOSITED ASSETS CLASS CLAIMS 287

I. INTRODUCTION: THE FATE OF HOLOCAUST VICTIMS AND THEIR SWISS ACCOUNTS

For decades, Nazi victims and their families were told that if they were seeking property taken from them during the Holocaust, Swiss banks were not the place to look. The banks said that they had never held these accounts; or had there ever been such accounts, they were no longer in existence; or if any accounts still remained, there were only a small number, of minimal value; or whatever records might once have existed no longer were kept; or the person asking could receive no further information without documents proving who the account owner was, how that person was related, and how that person died (even if at the hands of the Nazis). And so account owners and their heirs were turned away time and time again. But they did not forget and they did not give up, and finally, in the late 1990s, they found a forum to pursue their lost bank assets: the United States judicial system.

In 1996 and 1997, class action lawsuits were filed in several United States federal courts against Swiss banks and other Swiss entities, alleging that financial institutions in Switzerland collaborated with and aided the Nazi regime, by knowingly retaining and concealing assets of Holocaust victims, and by accepting and laundering illegally obtained Nazi loot and profits of slave labor. All of the cases were consolidated in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York ("the Court"). The lawsuits were litigated by a team of leading U.S. class action attorneys. Judge Edward R. Korman, before whom the litigation was pending, actively encouraged the parties to settle the lawsuits, and with his assistance, the parties reached a settlement in principle for $1.25 billion in August 1998, which they finalized in January 1999. The Court-appointed Special Masters proposed and the Court adopted a Distribution Plan, which ultimately resulted in the payment of nearly $1.285 billion — more than the $1.25 billion settlement amount — to over 458,400 Holocaust victims and their heirs, including nearly $720 million to owners of Swiss bank accounts.[1] The chapter that follows describes the process by which Holocaust victims and their heirs were able, after decades, to obtain some measure of restitution of their property.

The following three examples (and dozens of other summaries below, as well as the accompanying chapter of this Final Report, "Summaries of Selected Deposited Assets Class Decisions") stand for the thousands of cases in which Holocaust survivors or their heirs sought to recover their Swiss-held assets, and for the countless other cases in which no one remained to ask.

Hedwig Bendix was born in 1895 in Berlin. She later moved to Czechoslovakia, where she lived with her daughter and her husband, who owned a business (Julius Bendix & Söhne). The three family members were deported to the Lodz Ghetto. They perished either in Lodz or in Theresienstadt.

On November 23, 1945, Hedwig Bendix' son wrote to his parents' Swiss bank to inquire about their assets, emphasizing that his mother and father had been killed in a concentration camp during World War II. The bank replied on December 4, 1945, stating that the Bendixes "have no relations with the Bank." After a Zurich attorney followed up, the bank on December 7, 1945 clarified its earlier statement, this time admitting that the Bendixes had been bank customers, but stating that they "no longer had any business relations with the Bank." Two years later, responding to a third letter seeking information about Mr. and Mrs. Bendix, the bank replied on November 5, 1947 that "'no assets are deposited with our head-office.'"

These statements by the bank were incomplete. Bank documents made available to the Court decades later, in connection with the Deposited Assets Class claims process under the Swiss Banks Settlement, showed that Hedwig Bendix indeed had owned accounts at the bank. On February 20, 1939, the bank had received a letter via Berlin, with instructions about one of these accounts. The bank closed that account one week later, on February 28, 1939, and transferred it to Nazi Germany's Central Bank, the Reichsbank. Hedwig Bendix also owned two additional accounts at the same bank, one of which was closed on July 29, 1939, and the other in 1945. No other records remained in the bank files concerning these accounts. These records undoubtedly were among the millions destroyed by the Swiss banks in the decades following the Holocaust.

In light of the bank's disingenuous response to repeated inquiries on behalf of the Bendix family — denying a customer relationship, even while the bank continued to hold documents showing not only that the Bendixes had owned accounts, but that the bank had transferred at least one of these accounts to the Nazis — the Court authorized the value of all of the Bendix accounts (worth SF 183,780 or approximately $132,215.83) to be awarded to the claimant, Hedwig Bendix's niece.[2]

Grete Koretz-Lang was born in 1899. She was married to an attorney, Dr. Ernest Koretz. They had a daughter, Susan Koretz, who was born in 1933. Grete Koretz-Lang's father was Angelus Simon, and her mother was Rosa Simon-Lang. The family lived in Karlsbad, Czechoslovakia. Angelus Simon died before the Second World War. The rest of the family perished in the Holocaust.

After the war, family representatives repeatedly inquired with the Swiss bank believed to have held assets owned by one or more of the five family members who had died. On June 14, 1946, a bank employee made a handwritten note indicating that at least one member of the family had, indeed, held an account at that bank. It was of unknown type and it was held in U.S. dollars ("$147.--"). However, half a year later, on December 30, 1946, the bank wrote that "as far as our investigations show, no assets are deposited with the Zurich Office of our bank." The family's representative followed up with several more inquiries, including one written on

For any given award based upon a documented Swiss bank account, the recipient(s) could have received a number of different types of awards (discussed in greater detail infra): initial award, award amendment, presumptive value adjustment award, and appeal award. While only the initial awards and, where applicable, award amendments, are available on the CRT website, every award was approved by and docketed with the Court. Award amounts referenced in this Final Report reflect the total award amounts, taking into consideration all payments made in connection with a particular award. In most instances, the total award amount is actually greater than the amounts shown on the individual awards published on the CRT website, primarily due to "presumptive value increases" (discussed below) that were authorized by the Court after the initial awards (and in some instances, amendments) were issued.

November 22, 1949, during that representative's visit to Zurich. A bank employee wrote at the bottom of this letter: "'the matter has already been investigated, and [the representative] has been informed both verbally and in writing that no assets [currently] exist with us.'"

On August 4, 1950, the bank noted in an internal memorandum that Angelus Simon of Prague had died, and that if he held any assets, they should be blocked (i.e. made inaccessible to the account owner).[3] The following week, on August 10, 1950, the bank's legal department wrote an internal memorandum. It stated: "'[o]n the occasion of any further visit from [the family's representative] of New York in relation to the assets of Angelus Simon, Rosa Simon, Grete Simon, or Ernst Koretz, please simply tell him verbally the following (do not confirm in writing): 'There are no assets in the names of the four mentioned individuals in our branch [of the Bank], as far as our investigations can tell.' [He] will not likely request further investigations regarding assets that may have existed earlier. If that does happen, we will have to deny his request on the basis of basic considerations.'" (Emphasis in original.) Thus, by this memorandum, the bank's legal department was explicitly advising bank employees to deny the existence of current assets that one or more of these Holocaust victims might have owned. In the unlikely event that an inquiry was made about assets the family might have owned in the past, that request, too, should be deflected.

The next month, by letter dated September 14, 1950, a relative of the account owners again reached out to the bank. The relative, who lived in New York, explained that the account owners had lived in Karlsbad, but had later moved to Prague. They all died "'as a result of the war.'" The relative stated that he had documents indicating that the individuals had died, and that he was their legal heir. The bank carefully followed the August 10, 1950 advice of its legal department. In a September 19, 1950 letter, the bank advised that that according to its investigations, there were "'currently no assets in the names of the referenced individuals in our branch of the Bank.'"

[3] CRT decisions generally capitalized the word "Bank" to refer to the particular Swiss bank at which the account at issue was held. That format is adopted here for direct quotations from the CRT decisions, but other references to "bank" or "banks" are not capitalized herein unless otherwise specifically noted. Similarly, although CRT decisions generally capitalized the terms "Claimant" and "Account Owner," that format is adopted here only for direct quotations from CRT decisions; otherwise, lower-case format is used.

However, this statement was incomplete and misleading. The documentation made available through the Deposited Assets Class claims process demonstrated that at least one member of the family had owned at least one account at the bank, a fact that the bank repeatedly failed to disclose. The Court thus awarded this account (SF 49,375, or approximately $42,935) to the family's remaining heir.[4]

Bertha Siegal was born in 1906 in Volochisk, Ukraine. She lived in Ukraine, where she was an educator until 1941. She had briefly lived in Switzerland in the 1920s. When the Nazis invaded Ukraine in the summer of 1941, Bertha Siegal and her two children (one of whom was the claimant) tried to escape. They were seized and detained in the Stanislavchik Ghetto. Bertha Siegal died in Vinitsa, Ukraine in 1957.

The bank records made available through the claims process showed that Bertha Siegal, who resided in Acquarossa Terme, Switzerland, held an account of unknown type. The account had been transferred to a suspense account on or before December 20, 1948. The bank records included a February 19, 1964 memorandum addressed to the bank's Legal Department, referring to a 1962 survey. The survey represented an early, but incomplete, effort by Swiss banking authorities to address the inquiries they were receiving from Holocaust victims and heirs who were trying to locate their deposits in Swiss banks.[5] The memorandum referenced a telephone conversation held earlier that day. It "enclose[d] a list of accounts held at the Bank which had balances under 100.00 Swiss Francs. The memorandum 'request[ed] [the Legal Department] to inform them which of the persons listed could be considered to be a Jew, so that we, in such cases, can close those accounts off the books.'" The account therefore was not returned to its owner or her heirs. Rather, the bank closed the account to fees and charges on the day it wrote the memo to its attorneys, February 19, 1964. Decades later, the Court authorized an award to Bertha Siegal's son.[6]

5 By Federal Decree of December 20, 1962, the Swiss Federal Council obliged all individuals, legal entities, and associations to report any Swiss-based assets whose last-known owners were foreign nationals or stateless persons of whom nothing had been heard since May 9, 1945 and who were known or presumed to have been victims of racial, religious, or political persecution. See www.swissbankclaims.com (Glossary) ("1962 Survey").

The process by which these, and thousands of other, Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts finally were returned to their rightful heirs, after being wrongfully withheld for decades, is described in this chapter.

The Deposited Assets Class claims program undertook the painstaking task of analyzing claims to hundreds of thousands of accounts believed to have been owned by victims of Nazi persecution. The claims process succeeded in returning nearly $720 million to many thousands of heirs. The task was enormous, unprecedented and difficult. Worldwide in scope, the program was the first opportunity for Nazi victims and their heirs to have their claims to Holocaust-era Swiss accounts resolved by an independent body. More than 104,000 claims, relating to over 415,000 possible account owners, were submitted to the Court for consideration.

Previously, efforts to access accounts and account records had been made directly through the Swiss banks and related Swiss institutions, with limited success and frequent obstruction by the banks. The written decisions issued by the Zurich-based Claims Resolution Tribunal (the "CRT"), the Court-supervised administrative body that oversaw the claims process, illustrate the lengths to which the Nazis went to strip their victims of all they had. These decisions also reveal that Swiss banks played a role in that effort. The cases demonstrate that Swiss banks failed to protect depositors from Nazi efforts to confiscate assets. The banks, in many instances, were directly involved in transferring to the Nazis assets that had been confiscated from persecutees under duress. There was also an intentional - and at times coordinated - effort by the Swiss banks to prevent access to accounts by their owners or rightful heirs of the owners in the post-War period.

From "the most famous account holder on the [CRT's] docket"[7] — Sigmund Freud — to more typical families trying to shield what they could, victims and targets of Nazi persecution turned to Swiss banks before the war, believing them to be safe havens for their vulnerable assets. That trust often was misplaced. The claims and supporting documentation submitted by Holocaust victims or their heirs allowed Claimed Account Owners ("CAO") to be matched to Swiss bank accounts and their account owners ("AO"); to learn the fate of these account owners; and to reach a reasonable conclusion about what happened to their assets.

[7] Roger P. Alford, The Claims Resolution Tribunal, in THE RULES, PRACTICE, AND JURISPRUDENCE OF INTERNATIONAL COURTS AND TRIBUNALS 575, 588 (Chiara Giorgetti ed., Martinus Nijhoff 2012). Alford observed (at 588) that setting aside the fame of the account owner, the Freud claim was quite "typical" of the claims considered and resolved by the CRT. "[M]any of the issues arising in the case [were] identical to hundreds of other claims: the sparse information in the bank's records, the absence of evidence regarding the value of the accounts, the circumstances surrounding its closure, the presumptions the [CRT] applied as to the appropriate division of the award among heirs, and the [CRT's] efforts to undertake independent research to resolve the claim." Id.

When the litigation process began, and even after the case settled, some doubted that these assets could be restored. The Court, and the agencies and individuals who assisted the Court, were confronted with many obstacles. The investigation of the banks, led by former United States Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker (the "Volcker Committee" or "ICEP" - Independent Committee of Eminent Persons), was one of the largest, most complex, most extensive, and most historically significant forensic accounting audits ever conducted. The Volcker Committee's work revealed that 6.8 million Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts had existed in the 1933-1945 period (the "Relevant Period").[8] Records for 2.7 million of those accounts had been totally destroyed. There was incomplete data for many of the remaining 4.1 million accounts.[9] Of these 4.1 million accounts, the Volcker Committee auditors excluded what were characterized as "domestic" (Swiss address) accounts as well as savings accounts, leaving approximately 2.25 million accounts, of which approximately 353,000 were reviewed through audit procedures. The vast majority of accounts thus were excluded from the audit.[10]

[8] In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d 139, 151 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). Because the Volcker Committee's work is widely known as the "Volcker audit," that term is generally used here, although from a technical point of view, the auditors conducted an "investigation" as opposed to an "audit."

[9] Such destruction continued even after a Swiss Federal Decree issued in 1996, which directed that all documents from the Holocaust era be maintained. In a well-known example from 1997, a security guard at the Union Bank of Switzerland ("UBS") rescued documents awaiting destruction in the bank's shredder room. The information to be destroyed included minutes of the Federal Bank (Eidgenössische Bank), which went bankrupt in 1945 when its German business collapsed, and whose important records had been taken into possession by UBS. The bank took action against the security guard for breach of bank security. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d 301, 316 (E.D.N.Y. 2004).

OF EMINENT PERSONS, REPORT ON DORMANT ACCOUNTS OF VICTIMS OF NAZI PERSECUTION IN SWISS BANKS (1999) ("VOLCKER REPORT"), Annex 4, Table 4. See also VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 4, ¶ 12 ("By comparing databases containing approximately 5.5 million names of victims and claimants to the 2.25 million accounts in the accounts databases subject to matching, the auditors identified 280,157 matched accounts"); the auditors also analyzed another 76,491 unmatched accounts (for a total of 353,396), because "the circumstances of their opening and of their subsequent disposition indicated a probable or possible relationship to victims of Nazi persecution," such as bank records showing a "concentration camp

Of the accounts audited, approximately 54,000 — later reduced to 36,138 — were deemed "probably" or "possibly" belonging to Holocaust victims. Under the claims process, Swiss banking authorities generally limited access only to these 36,138 accounts (the "Accounts History Database" or "AHD"). Through the research of the CRT into archives and other sources, the AHD was expanded, so that eventually it consisted of 37,954 accounts.

Because of the equitable concerns presented by the fact that heirs had been deprived of access to bank information for more than sixty years; the notice requirements of American class action law; and the finality of the class action settlement, access to and publication of account owner names was paramount. The claims administrators and the Court, however, were hindered by restrictions imposed by Swiss banks and banking authorities:

- The Swiss banking authorities failed to authorize compliance with the Volcker Committee's December 6, 1999 recommendation to create a centralized database ("Total Accounts Database") of all 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records still exist, of the approximately 6.8 million for which records had once existed, but had since been destroyed.
- Only 21,000 account owner names were published (in February 2001), augmented only after post-settlement litigation by the publication of an additional approximately 3,000 names (in January 2005). The total number of names published was therefore only approximately two-thirds of the 36,000-account original AHD, and only a very small fraction of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which Swiss bank records still existed.[11]
- The CRT was restricted in its ability to examine auditor and banking records, even for the 36,000 accounts in the original AHD. Swiss banking authorities required the Court to employ a "Data Librarian" who reviewed and often redacted information from each bank record (for example, where the record indicated names of other individuals not specifically known to have been related to the account owner), before it was provided to the CRT for analysis.

address or a notation that the account owner had died in a concentration camp." VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 4, ¶ 15.

[11] In a June 11, 1997 letter to the editor of the New York Times, Volcker wrote: "The aim of the audit is to insure that all dormant accounts of persecuted persons from that period be identified. Because those accounts may have been opened in Swiss names, it seems appropriate to go beyond publication of accounts that are thought to be related to Holocaust victims to publication of all dormant accounts." Paul A. Volcker, Letter to the Editor, Swiss Haven't Found New Holocaust Funds, N.Y. TIMES, June 15, 1997, http://www.nytimes.com/1997/06/15/opinion/l-swiss-haven-t-found-new-holocaust-funds-638048.html.

- The defendant banks initially were reluctant to cooperate with the CRT's requests for "voluntary assistance" to help supplement the record, so as to enable the CRT to assess all available facts before reviewing each claim.

Despite these obstacles, the CRT examined every one of the 104,000 claims — filed by 119,526 individual claimants — to over 415,000 possible accounts, and by its efforts helped to return almost $720 million to bank account owners and their heirs.

Following the Court's directives, the CRT's approach favored the claimants. If evidence was missing, it was not the claimant, but the Swiss bank, that was presumed to have been the party at fault. If the bank records did not show who closed an account, the Court presumed it was wrongfully closed, and the claimant was paid. If the bank records did not show the amount of the account, the Court did not presume the balance was "zero" — for what depositor would have kept a "zero-balance" account when fees were charged for holding the account? Rather, it was assumed that the account had held assets that could be determined, at least at a pre-designated average (presumptive) value, and so the claimant was paid. If the bank records did not show what type of account it was, or whether it was linked to other accounts, or whether it held securities, or whether it had been reported in a Nazi census,[12] the Court directed the CRT to conduct its own research to make sure that no evidence was missed. And in the worst case situation, where no documentation could be found, despite the CRT's best efforts to locate records either from the ICEP audit, or after pressing the banks to provide "voluntary assistance" on a case-by-case basis, or from archives or other non-bank sources, the Court still made sure the claimant was not penalized by the lack of records. If the claimant plausibly indicated that a close relative had owned a Holocaust-era Swiss account, the Court authorized that person to receive $7,250 for a "plausible but undocumented award" ("PUA").

[12] For example, by decree on April 26, 1938, the Nazi Regime required Jews residing within Austria who held assets above a specified level to submit a census form registering their assets. The records of the Austrian State Archives (Archive of the Republic, Finance) contain the individual asset registration files, which, where available, were used by the CRT as a tool, both to enhance matching efforts, and to provide additional information about any assets identified by the asset holder that were held in a Swiss bank.

A. The Scope of the Claims Process

Of the 119,526 individuals who submitted claims, 104,140 filed their own claims with the CRT, and the other 15,386 were co-claimants expressly included on a claim form filed by a family member.

The 104,140 claims were comprised of several categories:

- 32,925 were designated formally as Deposited Assets "claim forms" in connection with the initial publication of names in 2001;
- 2,003 were designated formally as Deposited Assets "claim forms" in connection with the publication of additional names in 2005 following post-settlement litigation with the banks;
- 62,766 of the approximately 600,000 Initial Questionnaires ("IQs") filed in 1999 and 2000 (and some thereafter), in connection with the original outreach and notification of settlement undertaken by plaintiffs' counsel, were authorized by the Court to serve as CRT claim forms;[13]
- 4,609 claims were accepted that had been filed, but not compensated, in connection with the Swiss banks' 1997 publication of account owner names (a process separate from that under the Settlement Fund);
- 1,769 claim forms had been filed over the years with the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO),[14] and subsequently were accepted into the CRT process; and

[13] In connection with the notice program, a six-page document seeking background information, an "Initial Questionnaire," was circulated to class members. More than 600,000 individuals returned their completed Initial Questionnaires. Analysis of these 600,000 IQs revealed that 62,766 contained information sufficient to identify the potential claimant and the potential account owner, and therefore could serve as claim forms with respect to Deposited Assets. The remainder of the IQs (some 538,000) did not indicate the existence of Swiss bank accounts, but were focused upon other Holocaust-era losses covered by the settlement, such as slave labor, looted assets and refugee claims.

[14] The New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) was created in 1997, in response to the difficulties that had been faced, and were being raised anew, by Holocaust victims and heirs who sought to recover bank accounts and other assets. "Since 1997 the Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) has advocated on behalf of Holocaust victims and their heirs, seeking the just and orderly return of assets to their original owners. In fulfilling this mission, the HCPO has facilitated the restitution of over $157 million in bank accounts, insurance policies, and other material losses and the resolution of cases involving more than 56 works of art. The HCPO works as a bridge between claimants and the various international compensation organizations and/or the current holder(s) of the asset be it a bank account, insurance policy or artwork. Claimants pay no fee for the HCPO's services, nor does the HCPO take a percentage of the value of the assets recovered." See N. Y. State Dep't of Fin. Servs., HOLOCAUST CLAIMS PROCESSING OFFICE, http://www.dfs.ny.gov/consumer/holocaust/hcpoindex.htm (accessed Jan. 16, 2014). See also Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds ("Distribution Plan"), In re Holocaust Victims Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2000), Vol. I, at 58-59 n.154, available at www.swissbankclaims.com (Chronology) (describing HCPO).

- 68 claim forms were generated during the claims process that began in 2000, as a result of appeals by individuals challenging awards that had been issued to family members or others.

Thus, there were approximately 41,000 claim forms, and 63,000 Initial Questionnaires, considered in the claims process.

In many instances, the claimants would list one, two, three or more family members believed to have owned an account. But at the same time, the claimant also would provide information about other relatives — aunts, uncles, grandparents, cousins — while not specifically claiming the accounts that these other individuals might have owned. However, the CRT understood that the passage of time, the loss of records, and the disruption in family relationships wrought by the Holocaust might have rendered a claimant unable to pinpoint who in his or her family had held a Swiss bank account. Accordingly, it was the CRT's policy to analyze each and every name mentioned in a claim form, whether a claimant formally had named that person as a potential account owner or not.

The true magnitude of the program overseen by the Court can be understood only by considering the total number of potential account owners for whom the CRT searched. While the number of claimants and represented parties (119,526) is a very substantial figure in itself, the number of Holocaust victims for whom the CRT tried to locate accounts was nearly three times higher: 415,453. In other words, the CRT analyzed claims on a case-by-case basis for 415,453 separate individuals who explicitly or implicitly were believed to have deposited assets with Swiss banks during the Holocaust era.

The New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), in assisting claimants seeking restitution of insurance policies (among many other responsibilities), encountered a similar situation. While substantially fewer insurance claimants were involved as compared with the CRT process, the HCPO observed that the program had expanded considerably from the original number of submissions, due to the complexities of processing property claims:

The vast majority of claimants who received CRT awards represented themselves in the process, as the Court had intended. The claim form and all other aspects of the claims program made it clear that it was not necessary for a claimant to obtain legal or other representation in order for his or her claim to be carefully analyzed. A total of 15% of the awarded claimants had some kind of representation, whereas 85% did not.

> Overall, the HCPO has handled in excess of 13,000 inquiries [concerning Holocaust-era assets]. Of these, nearly half have been insurance related inquiries from 35 countries and 48 states and the District of Columbia. These inquiries have generated over 2,300 claims from 24 countries and 43 states and the District of Columbia…. While there are over 2,300 claimants, this actually means that we have claims naming more than 3,400 potential insurance policyholders and an excess of 5,300 policies. This is because in many instances, the claimant could be the sole survivor of a sizable family and therefore submitted applications naming several relatives as the insured individual, including their parents, grandparents, aunt, uncles, siblings, and cousins. In addition, individuals may have had multiple policies. Many of the HCPO's cases refer to more than one policy.[15]

In the CRT's case, every effort was made to err on the side of over-inclusiveness by incorporating tens of thousands of informal claims, and by examining hundreds of thousands of potential account owners. This slowed and complicated the claims process. Every one of the 415,453 potential account owner names provided by claimants had to be entered for "matching" against the 37,954 accounts contained in the AHD. When the pool of potential account owners (415,453) was "matched" against the pool of known accounts (37,954), over 1.5 million matches were generated. Every match — 1.5 million — needed to be examined by a member of the CRT staff. Although some portion of the matches could be discarded as merely "technical" (i.e., matches that arose only because the matching program was designed to be especially broad, but which on their face were invalid; for example, the first and middle names were the same but the last name was entirely different), most of the matches required detailed and individualized analysis. In many instances, the bank records were sparse, containing little more than an owner's name and perhaps city or only country of residence. Because many names were common, numerous (sometimes dozens or more) matches often were generated to the same account. Each match had to be analyzed to determine which claimant, if any, was the proper heir to the account.

B. A Summary of the Awards

A total of more than $726.2 million in awards were authorized for Deposited Assets Class members, of which nearly $720 million was paid out, of the up to $800 million allocated for Deposited Assets Class claims from the $1.25 billion Settlement Fund.[16] These funds were repaid through three mechanisms (1) $615.5 million was repaid for accounts for which documentation had been located, either from bank records, archives or other sources provided by the claimants, or by the CRT through supplemental research;[17] (2) the Settlement Agreement provided that the Settlement Fund would cover the payments made under the CRT-I process (pre-dating the Settlement), for accounts that had been owned by Holocaust victims, which totaled approximately $18.2 million;[18] and (3) $86.1 million was paid for "Plausible Document Awards" ("PUAs") based upon plausible claims for which no documentation could be located as a result of the banks' decades of destruction of records.

[15] Holocaust Claims Processing Office, N.Y. State Dep't of Fin. Serv., The Insurance Industry and the Economies of Central and Eastern Europe, 1918-1945 107 (Oct. 2011), originally available at http://www.dfs.ny.gov/consumer/holocaust/hcpor111031.pdf.

Of the Deposited Assets awards, 46% were issued to individuals who resided in the United States at the time they were paid. These U.S. residents, who lived in all 50 states, received a total of $327,369,822. Most lived in the following 11 states (using rounded figures): New York (32%); California (15%); Florida (9%); New Jersey (7%); Massachusetts (5%); Pennsylvania (5%); Maryland (4%); Michigan (3%); Texas (3%); Connecticut (2%); and Illinois (2%).

Approximately 11% of the awarded claimants lived in Israel, and they received $80,247,838. After the United States and Israel, the countries in which the largest number of claimants lived (using rounded figures) were Canada (7%); Great Britain (7%); France (5%); Australia (3%); Austria (3%); Germany (3%); the Czech Republic (2%); Switzerland (2%); [16] The amount authorized, $726,272,177, exceeded the amount actually paid to claimants ($719,745,337). See Distribution Statistics, available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/New%20Docs/Distribution%20Stats.pdf. This was due to the following: (1) some approved claimants could not be located despite extensive efforts to obtain their contact information; (2) some approved claimants passed away and no eligible heirs could be located; (3) in a few instances, approved claimants refused to accept payment and/or refused to complete documentation required before funds could be transferred; and/or (4) in a limited number of cases, as more fully discussed infra, certain approved Deposited Assets Class awards were withdrawn by Court order as a result of information that came to the attention of the CRT after the awards had been approved. In all instances, any funds authorized but unpaid were either applied to authorized but unfunded awards of the same class, or returned to the Settlement Fund for reauthorization and distribution to other class members.

[17] A total of $615.5 million ultimately was paid, for the reasons cited above.

[18] As more fully discussed below, the "CRT-I" process was initiated while the litigation was still pending, but before the case had settled, and thus was distinct from the later claims process that operated under the authority of the Court, "CRT-II." The CRT-I process involved adversarial proceedings adjudicated by one or more international arbitrators.

Hungary (1%); Argentina (1%) and Italy (1%). Approximately 0.1% lived in the former Soviet Union (FSU). In total, they lived in 70 different countries.

The tables that follow provide further information about the geographic dispersal of Deposited Assets award recipients.

With respect to the documented awards issued under the CRT-II process, 5,248 claimants received 2,950 awards, which addressed 4,716 Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. Many of the awards returned more than one account to a claimant, and many of the awards resolved multiple claims in a single decision (i.e., a single award was issued to more than one claimant). The average value of each account authorized for payment was $116,602.[19] Because awards typically contained more than one account (on average, 1.6), the average value of each CRT award authorized was higher: $185,263.[20]

The average age of the claimants at the time their awards were issued was 72, providing stark evidence of just how long family members had to wait for their assets to be returned, and further indicating that the recipients were, by and large, closely related to the Holocaust victims who had owned the accounts.

With respect to the awarded accounts, the CRT categorized accounts as "outliers" and "non-outliers." Outliers represented a relatively small number of accounts (40) and were characterized as such, primarily because of their extremely high values, well above the averages for most other awarded accounts. The non-outlier accounts consisted of the remaining 4,676 accounts awarded for which documentation had been identified.

Of the awarded non-outlier accounts, the bank records and other documentation demonstrated that:

- 195 of these accounts had been transferred outright to Nazi authorities;
- 312 were transferred to a suspense account, a grouping of open and dormant accounts, and another 29 were transferred to a suspense account and subsequently closed;
- 137 were transferred to a fund or so-called special account designated by the bank in question;
- 62 were closed to bank fees;
- 116 were closed to the banks' profit and loss statements; and
- 251 remained open and dormant.

[19] The average value of accounts paid was $115,889.

[20] The average value of awards paid was $184,130.

For the remaining 3,603 non-outlier accounts awarded, most had been closed, although the circumstances under which the closures occurred were not clear from the documentation. It was the actions of the banks, not the claimants (and certainly not the account owners), that caused the records of the banks to have been destroyed. Given the historical circumstances indicating that Holocaust victims were meticulously stripped of their assets, absent evidence to the contrary, it was presumed that accounts closed under unknown circumstances had not been returned to their rightful owners, and therefore should be awarded to the claimants. The Court authorized the application of a standard presumption under U.S. law, the adverse inference. The burden of proof essentially would be shifted away from the claimant, to compensate for the banks' massive destruction of records that otherwise might have proven the fate of the account and/or its value. The Settlement Fund in effect was now standing in the shoes of the bank defendants. The application of the adverse inference meant that as long there was documentary evidence that a claimant or relative had owned a Swiss bank account, the Settlement Fund would compensate a plausible claim, even where the records conclusively demonstrating what had happened to the account had been destroyed. There was enough known about what often happened to these bank accounts to warrant the presumption that the particular account owner — like so many Nazi victims — had not been able to retrieve her assets.

The total number of individual Holocaust victims for whom the CRT was able to locate account documentation and award their Swiss accounts (sometimes referred to as "Account Owners" or "AOs") was 3,696.[21] The majority of these 3,696 account owners — some 79% — suffered directly at the hands of the Nazis.

Over 23% (856) died in a concentration or slave labor camp, or a ghetto. Of those victims, the majority were killed in one of the following locations: Auschwitz (286); Thereisenstadt (131); Lodz (25); Dachau (22); Riga (16); Gurs (14); Mauthausen (14); Bergen Belsen (13); Buchenwald (13); or Treblinka (10). Another 3.5% survived slave labor or other incarceration in a camp or ghetto, and an additional 1.5% were imprisoned in a camp or ghetto and thereafter fled or went into hiding. Approximately 3.5% survived by hiding. Approximately [21] The "3,696" number refers to the number of people who owned accounts that were awarded; this is in contrast to the "4,716" figure noted earlier, which refers to the number of accounts awarded. The latter number is higher, because one account owner could have held several accounts.

6% were otherwise killed by the Nazis. Approximately 1.4% committed suicide in a desperate effort to avoid being caught by the Nazis. About 5.4% died of natural causes during the War, and 1.2% died before the War (in which case their immediate heirs, who normally would have inherited the account, were themselves Nazi victims if living under control of the Third Reich, and so they too could not have accessed the accounts). Over 33% (1,206) were forced to flee. Of these individuals, approximately 32.5% fled to the United States; 13% to the United Kingdom; 11.1% to Palestine (Israel); and 10.4% initially to Switzerland, and generally thereafter to another nation. Nine percent (9%) of the account owners survived the Nazis in some other manner. The fate of approximately 7% is unknown.

With the exception of Slave Labor Class II, awards under the Settlement Agreement could be issued only on behalf of "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution;" i.e., those who were or were believed to be Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled. Of the 3,696 account owners (or their heirs) who received awards, the vast majority — over 96% — were Jewish. Of the remainder, 1% were not Jewish, but had a Jewish spouse; an additional 1.4% held a joint account with a Jewish account owner; and 0.3% were believed to be Jewish. Thus, 3,662 of the 3,696 account owners (99%) were or were believed to be Jewish, or targeted for being Jewish. There were 13 account owners who were known or believed to be homosexual (4 of whom were also Jewish). Seven (7) account owners were Romani. Five (5) account owners were disabled (one of whom was also Jewish). Five (5) account owners were Jehovah's Witnesses. Four (4) account owners were presumed to fall within one of the five victim or target groups based upon information provided by claimants and other available documentation.

Of the 3,696 owners of accounts for whom the CRT located documentation, more than one-half (51%) had originally resided in Germany (29.4%) or Austria (21.6%) during 1933 to 1945 (defined as the "Relevant Period" under the Settlement Agreement). Another 6.5% lived in Romania; 6.2% in Czechoslovakia; 5.4% in Hungary; and 4.6% in Poland.

For the 3,696 account owners, the CRT was able to locate and recommend awards to 4,243 heirs. Over 30% of these awards were made to the children of the account owners, and another 2.4% to the child's surviving spouse. Approximately 20.5% of the awards were issued to the grandchildren of the account owners (and .5% to the grandchild's surviving spouse); and approximately 2.4% to the account owner's great-grandchild. Approximately 16% of the awards were made to the niece or nephew of the account owner, and approximately 10% to the account owner's great-niece or great-nephew. Nearly 3.6% of the awards were made to the actual surviving account owner. Approximately 1.6% of the awards were issued to the account owner's spouse. Approximately 2.3% of the awards were made to the account owner's sibling(s).

II. THE BASIS FOR THE AWARDS: A UNITED STATES COURT ADDRESSES DECADES OF BANK MISCONDUCT IN EUROPE

Many decades after and thousands of miles away from the continent where the Holocaust took place, the United States judicial system determined that it was appropriate to hold business entities operating in the U.S. accountable for violating their duties to those whom had entrusted their assets for safekeeping. As Professor Michael Bazyler, who has written extensively on the "Holocaust restitution movement" of the late 1990s, has observed: "The Holocaust did not occur in the United States, but in Europe. Most Holocaust survivors reside outside of the United States. It is the United States legal system, however, that has taken the lead in delivering some measure of long-overdue justice to aging Holocaust survivors."[22]

A. The Behavior of the Swiss Banks Analyzed by the American Judicial System

Judge Korman, who oversaw these proceedings, reflected on the role of the American legal system in a 2006 "Law Day" speech before the New York Federal Bar Council.[23]

REDBOOK 2006-2007, at 315 ("Korman, 2006 Federal Bar Council Address"). Judge Korman, who received the Learned Hand Medal at that ceremony, subsequently adapted this speech as the introduction to a book by Professor Leonard Orland analyzing in detail the Swiss Banks Settlement and distribution process. See Hon. Edward R. Korman, Introduction to LEONARD ORLAND, A FINAL ACCOUNTING: HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS AND SWISS BANKS xix (Carolina Academic Press 2010) (ORLAND, A FINAL ACCOUNTING). Judge Korman noted in this book that his "introduction derives from my remarks delivered on the occasion of the award of the Federal Bar Council's Learned Hand Medal for Excellence in Federal Jurisprudence, May 1, 2006." Id. at xix n.1.

> My involvement in [the Swiss Banks Holocaust] case has revealed to me sad truths about the discordance between law and morality, between law and justice, between law and liberty…. My experience with [that] case forced me to confront the use by the Nazis of the law and the courts to deprive Holocaust victims of their dignity, their property and indeed, their very lives. It also enlightened me about the role of the Swiss banks, sometimes acting pursuant to Swiss law and sometimes in violation of it, as their willing accomplices.[24]

Judge Korman noted that it became apparent, only after the case had settled, that the Swiss banking industry had engaged in two types of misconduct. The first type of misconduct was what drove the lawsuits and led to the settlement, and it related to accounts that had remained open, and had not been returned to their rightful owners. The second type of misconduct involved something else. It related to closed accounts, many of which had been closed out by Swiss banks in cooperation with Nazi authorities who had placed the account owners under duress. The victims were forced to turn over their Swiss bank accounts and other assets to the Reich.

> My initial understanding of the case was that the dispute centered on accounts that were opened in Swiss Banks before World War II and which became dormant during the war mainly because the owners of the assets of the accounts were murdered by the Nazis.
>
> After the war, Holocaust survivors and their heirs sought to claim the funds deposited in Switzerland. The Swiss banks imposed insurmountable barriers. They destroyed documents and stonewalled heirs of account holders. Swiss law provided both the incentive and the mechanism for this misconduct. Swiss law had no requirement for escheat which would have required banks to turn unclaimed accounts to the state. Without an escheat law, Swiss banks were permitted to keep any assets as long as the money remained in the dormant bank accounts. Swiss law required banks to maintain records for only ten years. Even though the banks knew the importance of maintaining those documents to assist in the processing of Holocaust-related claims, they relied on Swiss law to justify their wholesale document destruction policy. Using Swiss law, the banks also applied charges to these accounts, frequently depleting them to zero.
>
> So much we knew when the case settled. The case appeared to involve misconduct by Swiss Banks after World War II. What we did not have was a clear understanding of the misconduct of the Swiss Banks prior to and during the War.

[24] Korman, 2006 Federal Bar Council Address, at 316-17.

> [O]ne Holocaust victim's case … highlights that behavior as it does the misuse of law by the Nazis and the Swiss to justify their illegal and immoral behavior… Some brief background is necessary.
> Of the $1.25 billion settlement of the case against the Swiss banks, $800 million was set aside to pay claims for deposited assets. To avoid a distribution process in which the amount set aside was simply divided among every person who filed a claim, we established a Claims Resolution Tribunal [CRT] which operate[d] out of Zurich, Switzerland. This Tribunal receive[d], researche[d] and meticulously processe[d] claims in a way that result[ed] in awards that bear some relationship to the amounts deposited.[25]

Judge Korman went on to discuss one example of the Swiss banks' wrongful behavior:

> [During the course of the claims process,] I approved a $22 million award that had been recommended by the [CRT]. The award went to the survivors of an Austrian Jewish family, who, along with others, owned most of the outstanding shares of the largest sugar refining company in Austria. I refer to it here as ÖZAG, the acronym of its Austrian name.[26]

The same family later prevailed in its claim against the Austrian government seeking return of the celebrated painting, "Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer" by Gustav Klimt, a struggle highlighted in the 2015 film "Woman in Gold." The movie tells the "incredible story of Maria Altmann, a Jewish refugee who is forced to flee Vienna during World War II. Decades later, determined to salvage some dignity from her past, Maria has taken on a mission to reclaim a painting the Nazis stole from her family: the famous [Woman] in Gold, a portrait of her beloved Aunt Adele. Partnering with an inexperienced but determined young lawyer [the attorney E. Randol Schoenberg, who also assisted Ms. Altmann and family members with their claims to Swiss bank accounts], Maria embarks on an epic journey for justice 60 years in the making." See http://trailers.apple.com/trailers/weinstein/womaningold/. See also Patricia Cohen, The Story Behind 'Woman in Gold': Nazi Art Thieves and One Painting's Return, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 30, 2015. The portrait "is a dazzling, shimmering, gold-flecked masterpiece — 'the ideal emblem of opulence,' as one observer put it — eventually purchased in 2006 by Ronald Lauder for the Neue Galerie in New York for $135 million, said at the time to be the highest price ever paid for a work of art." MICHAEL R. MARRUS, SOME MEASURE OF JUSTICE: THE HOLOCAUST ERA RESTITUTION CAMPAIGN OF THE 1990's 51 (Univ. of Wis. Press 2009).

As described in the CRT award [In re Account of Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG Syndicate, or ÖZAG], shortly before Nazi Germany sent its troops into Austria and incorporated it as part of the German Reich, the members of the families that owned most of the shares of ÖZAG, which were publicly traded, entered into a Syndicate Agreement with a Swiss Bank. This agreement was designed to protect the family interest from forced transfer to a designee of the Nazis, a practice known as "Aryanization" that was already taking place in Germany.[27]

Under this Syndicate Agreement, the Jewish owners of more than 50 percent of ÖZAG's shares transferred them to the bank's name. They instructed the bank

[27] Aryanization has been described as follows: "As early as 1933, Jewish businessmen were being made to sell their companies. During the first few years, however, the firms were mostly left in peace by the authorities. The owners were free to decide to whom they would sell and the selling price was agreed between the two parties. Even if they were based at the time on the agreement of both parties, such take-overs cannot be termed 'fair deals' without closer investigation. The contracts were not drawn up on a legal basis and under free-market conditions. Instead, the situation was one in which the Jewish businessmen were under great pressure to sell. Furthermore, in view of the currency and tax restrictions it was difficult to use the income from the sale... From the middle of 1936 on, sales contracts had to be submitted to … regional economic advisors ... Towards the end of 1937, pressure on large firms in particular increased, and from 1938 on take-overs had to be approved by the authorities. At this stage it was possible to sell a firm only at a price well below its real value. Economic persecution turned a new corner after the annexation of Austria … in March 1938, when within a few weeks thousands of Austrian companies were 'Aryanised' or liquidated. This 'uncontrolled Aryanisation' was followed by state regulation and an organized 'Aryanisation' which manifested the state's economic interest. The authorities imposed an 'Aryanisation tax' … and tried to ensure as great a margin as possible between the amount paid to the vendor and the actual sale price, the difference being paid into the state coffers." FINAL REPORT OF THE INDEPENDENT COMMISSION OF EXPERTS SWITZERLAND-SECOND WORLD WAR 322-23 (Pendo Verlag GmbH 2002) (available at https://www.uek.ch/en/schlussbericht/synthesis/ueke.pdf) (also known as the Bergier Commission after its chair, and hereinafter cited as "BERGIER FINAL REPORT"). As more fully described below, the Bergier Commission was established by the Swiss Parliament on December 13, 1996 to examine the period prior to, during and immediately after the Second World War. One of its members, who was subsequently appointed as a CRT Special Master, was Dr. Helen B. Junz. The reference to "Final" Report is intended to distinguish the 2002 report from earlier interim studies that the Bergier Commission had released relating to refugees and gold transactions.

that the shares subject to the Syndicate Agreement could not be sold or transferred without the consent of the bank. Moreover, the Syndicate Agreement explicitly provided that the bank could not give its consent to such sales or transfers without the unanimous agreement of the beneficial owners. The clear objective was to set up a barrier to enforced sale or confiscation that depended almost entirely on the mutual expectation, embodied in their Syndicate Agreement with the bank, that the bank would not cooperate with, or give in to, the Nazis.

Within days of the Anschluss,[28] the worst fears of the Jewish ÖZAG shareholders were realized. Criminal tax proceedings against the company, supported by an audit report drafted by a self-proclaimed anti-Semite and Nazi party member, were commenced … by Nazi functionaries. The objective was to drive down the price of ÖZAG shares in order to enable a distress sale at a fraction of true value to a hand-picked Nazi "purchaser" with close ties to the Nazi party.

Sadly, the Bank did not live up to the expectations of the ÖZAG shareholders or to its fiduciary commitments. Instead, the Bank actively cooperated with the forced sale of their ÖZAG shares by transferring those shares held by the bank to the designated Nazi "purchaser" at a small fraction of their value. This was done without obtaining the unanimous consent of the Syndicate Agreement participants. By transferring a controlling interest in ÖZAG through this sale, the bank enabled the Nazis to acquire the remaining shares at a fraction of their true value.

While the $22 million award in the ÖZAG case was unique in its size, it is merely a striking example of the widespread betrayal of Jewish clients by Swiss banks. Having marketed themselves to the Jews of Europe as a safe haven for their property, Swiss banks repeatedly turned Jewish-owned property over to Nazis in order to curry favor with them. They did this either in violation of their contractual obligations or by honoring requests to transfer to the Nazis money and property entrusted to them with full knowledge that the written requests were coerced–both of which violated Swiss law.[29]

The explanation for their conduct was provided by Paul Rossy, the chief executive officer of the Swiss National Bank. Rossy told a forum of economic leaders in July, 1940 that

The Nazis, who already had the factory itself, wanted to ensure that the forced transfer had the veneer of "legality" by ensuring that the company's shares were also transferred in accordance with "law."

> [t]he world, and naturally our country as well, is confronted with totally new conditions to which it must become accustomed… [O]ur country will have to consciously seek its place in this new world and endeavor to play an active role in it. In no case should we limit ourselves to passive adaptation alone.

> The ÖZAG award is also striking in that no record of the rise and fall of the ÖZAG Syndicate was found in the bank's records. Rather, the documents upon which this award and others are based were submitted by the claimant and/or obtained as a result of research by the staff of the [CRT] from archival sources. We will never know how many other examples of betrayal were buried in the records of the 2.7 million accounts the banks concede they have destroyed completely or how many would have been found in the remaining accounts for which only fragmentary records survive.

> The ÖZAG case is also significant, because it reflects the strategies used by Nazis to seize control of Jewish property, ranging from outright theft to sophisticated distress sales orchestrated by compliant tax officials and faithless banks, all disguised by the veneer of "law."[30]

Judge Korman suggested in his speech to members of the federal bar that he was highlighting the Nazi-era misuse of law, because of its stark contrast to the American legal system celebrated on "Law Day":

> Sadly, law, but not the spirit of liberty, was the hallmark of both the Swiss and the Nazis during the Holocaust Era. Fortunately, we live in a nation that sees law as the foundation of liberty, and liberty as the foundation of law. This is what sets us apart from the culture that gave birth to Nazi Germany and other tyrannies.[31]

It is this unique American system — law, liberty and morality — that enabled these claims, after so many decades, finally to be heard and to be compensated.

B. Historical and Legal Bases of the Deposited Assets Class Claims

The Settlement Agreement created five classes of compensable claims: Deposited Assets, Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, the Refugee Class, and the Looted Assets Class.

Under United States law, not all class action claims are to be treated equally. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit confirmed in this very case that "[a]ny allocation of a settlement of this magnitude and comprising such different types of claims must be based, at least in part, on the comparative strengths and weaknesses of the asserted legal claims."[32]

Judge Korman reaffirmed the strength of the Deposited Assets Class claims on numerous occasions over the duration of the claims process. He noted that the "heart of this case" and indeed "the only cause of action capable of surviving a motion to dismiss turned on the failure of Swiss banks to honor their contractual and fiduciary duties to their depositors."[33] In a later decision, he reiterated that "of all the claims asserted against the Swiss Banks, only the claims of the Deposited Assets Class have any legal merit. The other claims could not have withstood a motion to dismiss."[34] The issue was not whether the other claims (for injuries relating to slave labor, looting and refugee status) had moral validity, but rather that the deficiencies of those claims under United States law were a "reality check for those … who believe that strong moral claims are easily converted into successful legal causes of action."[35]

THE DEPOSITED ASSETS CLASS CLAIMS PROCESS

In devising the allocation and distribution recommendations, it was crucial to recognize that of all of the several categories of classes and claims, including for slave labor and refugee status, the Deposited Assets Class claims were unique. They were the claims with the greatest substantive merit under United States law; the focus of public pressure; and the very foundation of the lawsuits that had followed decades of unsuccessful efforts by Holocaust victims to recover their assets from Swiss banks.

The first attempts to retrieve bank accounts deposited in Switzerland by victims of the Holocaust began just after the War, and continued unsuccessfully over the years. Periodically, the Swiss banks would conduct internal "surveys" to find "dormant" Holocaust victim accounts. These surveys produced just a few hundred accounts.

As summarized by the Court in a decision detailing the many "[d]ecades of improper behavior by the Swiss banks," the banks' strategy of deflection began immediately after the War in response to queries by claimants. The banks "also employed this strategy in the face of broad-based efforts to uncover assets of Nazi victims,"[36] such as in the 1950s. Thus:

> "[T]he banks and their Association lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of … so called 'heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated the … controversy of the last 30 years."[37] Indeed, in order to thwart such legislation, the SBA [Swiss Bankers Association] encouraged Swiss banks to underreport the number of such accounts in a 1956 survey. "'A meager result from the survey,' "it said, "'will doubtless contribute to the resolution of this matter [the proposed legislation] in our favor.'"[38] The banks adhered to the SBA's recommendation: "For instance, Swiss Bank Corporation (Schweizerischer Bankverein, SBV) indicated in 1956 that it could not state 'with certainty' that it had such accounts but there were 13 cases (with a total value of 82,000 francs) where this was probable."[39] Given what the Volcker Committee was able to find 40 years later, these estimates were clearly nothing more than a lie.[40]

Although there was renewed interest in the Holocaust accounts issue in the early 1960s, the results were similarly fruitless.

> When external pressure forced Switzerland in 1962 to adopt the Registration Decree, which was "meant to provide a genuine solution [to] the problem that had remained unresolved throughout the 1950s," the banks again put forth "concerted resistance." [BERGIER FINAL REPORT] at 451. This time the banks did not vigorously resist the law's passage; rather, they completely frustrated its implementation. Pursuant to the Registration Decree, banks were obliged to "report any assets whose last-known owners were foreign nationals or stateless persons of whom nothing had been heard since 9 May 1945 and who were known or presumed to have been victims of racial, religious or political persecution." Id. at 452. "A total of 46 banks reported 739 accounts containing a sum total of 6,194,000 francs." Id. at 453. They declined to report accounts of people who died after May 9, 1945 (even where one customer had died in the Dachau concentration camp on May 13, 1945), accounts held in the name of a trustee, and accounts where the account holder's name was arguably not Jewish. Id. at 454. "In short, a whole raft of measures was adopted with the aim of deliberately minimising the results of the investigation." Id. And again, this raft of measures was not adopted by isolated banks in isolated situations — it was a collective decision to deceive by the Swiss Banking Association that delayed justice in some cases for several decades, but in most cases indefinitely.[41]

Dr. Helen B. Junz is an economist who served as an expert for the Volcker Committee and the Bergier Commission, both of which investigated Holocaust-era assets in Switzerland (as discussed below). Judge Korman later appointed her as one of the Court's CRT Special Masters.[42] Dr. Junz has summarized the failed attempts to recover these accounts as follows:

[41] Id. (quoting BERGIER FINAL REPORT).

[42] As Judge Korman said of Dr. Junz: "Prior to her [April 13, 2004] appointment [by the Court] Dr. Junz, who is an economist, had a distinguished career as a national and international public servant. She served in senior positions at the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System of the United States, at the Economic Council of the President in the White House; as Deputy Assistant Secretary at the Department of the Treasury and subsequently at the International Monetary Fund. Her involvement with the analysis of Holocaust era asset questions came in 1997 when Paul Volcker asked her to produce a study of the wealth of the Jewish population in Europe at the eve of the Nazi era to provide a touchstone against which he and the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ('ICEP'), which he chaired, could assess the results of their audit of Swiss banks. The study was published as a book entitled, WHERE DID ALL THE MONEY GO? THE PRE-NAZI ERA WEALTH OF EUROPEAN JEWRY (Staempfli Publishers Ltd. 2002). Subsequently she guided the economic and financial research for the U.S. Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Era Assets, served as a member of the Independent Commission of Experts Switzerland - Second World War (the Bergier Commission); advised the van Kemenade Commission (Dutch commission) on aspects of Jewish-owned wealth in the Netherlands; produced, in collaboration with her co-authors, a study for the Austrian Historical Commission and was a fellow at the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum." See Memorandum & Order at 1-2, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 29, 2006).

> From 1945 through 1962, the Swiss banking community, mainly responding to outside pressure, made a number of efforts to identify what assets that had belonged to victims of Nazi persecution still remained on their books. In every case they came up with insignificant results, but each time they reported higher numbers than before. The most serious of these attempts, the 1962 survey, though yielding seven times the amount the banks had reported six years earlier, still came up with only a paltry SF 6.2 million. This survey, for the first time, also covered non-bank asset managers. They reported unclaimed assets of a further SF 3.6 million, i.e. more than half the banks' purported holdings. A partial return of these funds to heirs and other designated purposes appeared to end the matter, at least as far as the banks were concerned.
> It was, therefore, not surprising that the Swiss banking community in 1995, when persistent publicity regarding the amounts of victims' assets in their possession forced a response, once again fell back on a self-assessment survey. This time they identified SF 37.8 million worth of assets belonging to foreign depositors who had not been heard from since May 9, 1945, and assumed this would put the matter to rest as the earlier surveys had done. But 1995 proved not to be business as usual.[43]

The year 1995 "proved not to be business as usual," because the inquiries from Holocaust victims and heirs did not go away. This time, they were receiving considerable media attention, resulting in mounting pressure on the banks. Journalist Peter Gumbel's analysis appeared on the front page of The Wall Street Journal on June 21, 1995.[44] Gumbel stated that "[f]or 50 years, since the end of the war, [Swiss] banks … have cast a dismissive blanket of silence over the question of what they did with accounts opened by Jews and others who were then persecuted, and often murdered, by the Nazis."[45]

Beginning in 1996, "Jewish organizations, led by the World Jewish Congress, succeeded in pressing Swiss banks and financial institutions to uncover dormant accounts and heirless assets of Holocaust victims."[46] Thus, a new investigation of Swiss accounts was undertaken

All of their efforts, however, had been rebuffed by the Swiss Bankers Association, which fiercely defended the banking secrecy following Switzerland's agreement to relax its bank secrecy rules, led by Paul Volcker, former Chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board.

The commission was known as the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons ("ICEP") or the Volcker Committee.[47] It had two main objectives: to "identify accounts in Swiss banks of victims of Nazi persecution that have lain dormant since World War II or have otherwise not been made available to those victims or their heirs" and "to assess the treatment of the accounts of victims of Nazi persecution by Swiss banks."[48]

At the outset of the Volcker investigation, the Swiss banks pledged their cooperation and support. At a December 1996 hearing before the Committee on Banking and Financial Services of the United States House of Representatives, for example, Dr. Georg Krayer, Chairman of the SBA, stated that:

> First, the SBA, its members and the Swiss bank supervisors are committed to providing their full support and cooperation to the [ICEP] audit and abiding by its results…. Second, the auditors will have full access to all relevant information. Third, because of this access, the audit findings will represent the best attainable results and therefore must be accepted as conclusive by all responsible parties.[49]

Consistent with Dr. Krayer's statement, on January 22, 1997, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission (the "SFBC") declared the Volcker audits as "official special audits" under the Swiss Banking Act of 1934 and the Swiss Banking Ordinance of 1972.[50] This declaration empowered the SFBC to compel the banks' cooperation with the Volcker investigation, and that would have been put at risk in the event of a diligent investigation. At the same time, surviving relatives of Holocaust victims searched the banks for their properties. They often failed because of the requirements financial institutions imposed on them to prove their claims to the inheritance. More than once it happened that Jewish claimants were asked for death certificates of relatives murdered at Auschwitz. Moreover, for many years neither Jewish organizations nor individual claimants received any support from the Swiss government").

47 The SBA, World Jewish Restitution Organization, and World Jewish Congress entered into a Memorandum of Understanding on May 2, 1996 establishing ICEP.

ensured that the auditors would have "full and unfettered access" to relevant bank files, including customer files protected by bank secrecy legislation.[51]

On December 6, 1999, the Volcker Committee released its final report. Its research showed that some 6.8 million Swiss bank accounts were open or opened during the relevant period of 1933-1945. Of these, the banks had destroyed documents relating to approximately 2.7 million accounts. Despite this massive document destruction, records still remained for approximately 4.1 million Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. The auditors conducted research on approximately 353,000 of these 4.1 million accounts.[52] The Volcker Committee determined that of the 300,000 accounts investigated, a total of 53,886 had a "probable" or "possible" relationship to victims of Nazi persecution.[53] These 53,886 accounts were to constitute the Accounts History Database, or "AHD." The Volcker Committee further recommended that approximately 25,000 of these AHD accounts should be published. The Volcker Committee concluded that the value of the accounts in the AHD was approximately $643 million to $1.36 billion, including interest. The Volcker Committee recommended that all of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records continued to exist should be consolidated into a "Total Accounts Database" (TAD) for use in a claims process.[54]

Although the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) had advised the United States Congress at a December 11, 1996 hearing that "the SBA, its members and the Swiss bank supervisors" were "committed to providing their full support and cooperation to the [Volcker] audit and

"It is important ... that the Swiss Federal Banking Commission, ... should promptly authorize consolidation of the existing, but scattered, audited work papers and databases relating to all of the 4.1 million accounts opened from the 1933 to [1945] period in Swiss banks, and to arrange to put all of those databases in a central archive so that they can be used conveniently in a claims resolution process." *Restitution on Holocaust Assets: Hearing Before the H. abiding by its results,"[55] representatives of the Swiss banking system appeared to back away from that earlier statement once the Volcker Committee issued its findings. On the same date of the Volcker Report, December 6, 1999, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") announced that it, alone, was solely responsible for decisions on publishing further lists of accounts. The SFBC added that it would conduct additional analysis before reaching a decision on the Volcker recommendations.[56]

Several months later, in March 2000, the SFBC announced that it had authorized the Swiss banks to "publish [26,000] accounts that are deemed by the Volcker Committee to have a probability of being related to victims of the Holocaust" and to create a central database containing 54,000 accounts which "the Volcker Committee considers to be probably or possibly related to Holocaust victims."

The SFBC's decision to authorize only approximately 26,000 accounts for publication was based upon the Volcker Committee's assessment that those were the accounts that "probably" related to Holocaust victims, while the remaining accounts not authorized for publication were "possibly" related to victims.[57] The number of accounts recommended for publication subsequently was reduced to 21,000, while the number of accounts recommended for inclusion in the "central database" (the AHD) was reduced from 54,000 to 36,000 accounts, a reduction later challenged on the basis of information disclosed during the claims process.[58]

57 SFBC Press Release, 30 March 2000, 16.30.

58 The Court explained the reduction from 54,000 to 26,000 as follows: "…[T]he conservative estimate [of the Volcker auditors] was met with surprise and disfavor by the SBA [Swiss Bankers Association] and the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ('SFBC'). The SBA and SFBC thus turned to the same auditors the Volcker Committee had employed and asked them to further 'scrub' the accounts the auditors had identified. The banks came forward with additional information from bank records and asked the auditors to once again eliminate from the list accounts that were opened after 1945, accounts that had closing dates before the dates of occupation, accounts with any activity after 1945, and duplicate accounts from the list of probable and possible accounts." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F. Supp. 2d 59, 80 (E.D.N.Y. 2004). However, this

The SFBC declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to create a Total Accounts Database ("TAD") for all of the 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss banks in the relevant 1933-1945 period.[59]

It was against this backdrop that the U.S. class action lawsuits were litigated.[60] When Judge Korman approved the Settlement Agreement on July 26, 2000, finding that it was the better alternative to litigation, he made it clear that his approval was not without reservation, given the relatively limited number of bank accounts that would be made available to the claims process and the access restrictions that had been placed upon them. Therefore, the Court intended to closely monitor the banks' compliance with their good faith duty to cooperate with the claims process:

> On March 30, 2000, after an inordinately long and unexplained delay of four months following the publication of the Volcker Report, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") authorized publication of relevant information relating to approximately 26,000 [subsequently reduced to 21,000] of the accounts referred to in the Volcker Report that were identified as having a "probable" link to Holocaust victims. No authorization was given by the SFBC for the publication of information relating to the approximately 28,000 [reduced to 15,000] remaining accounts identified in the Volcker Report as 'possibly' related to Holocaust victims. Moreover, unlike earlier SFBC rulings concerning publication of information relevant to Holocaust-related accounts, the SFBC merely "authorized" publication of much of the relevant information, but did not mandate complete publication. Perhaps even more disturbing was the failure of the SFBC to mandate the creation of a central database of 4.1 million accounts that were opened in Switzerland between 1933-45. In sum, the SFBC, by its actions, has made it much more difficult to carry out the mandate of the Volcker Committee that "victims who have been long denied justice by circumstances beyond their control — often poor and now aged — deserve every reasonable assistance in establishing a claim."

reduction was challenged in post-settlement litigation, after the CRT made it clear that the evidence it was reviewing during the claims process refuted many of the bases for eliminating accounts during scrubbing. For example, Holocaust victims made use of addresses in Switzerland and in other non-Axis countries to avoid Nazi scrutiny. Additionally, post-1945 activity could have been the result of inquiries by family members of victims, and thus it was appropriate to give the CRT access to such accounts.

Nevertheless, their failure to do so does not justify disapproving the settlement with the defendant banks. They have pledged "their good faith cooperation with the implementation of the settlement." This is a pledge that reflects their legal obligation. It is one to which I intend to hold them.[61]

In addition to the Volcker investigation that provided much of the backdrop to the Settlement Agreement (and the conditions the Court attached to its approval), a second major inquiry was under way at approximately the same time as the Volcker audit: that of the Bergier Commission.

The Bergier Commission was established by the Swiss Parliament on December 13, 1996 to "'examine the period prior to, during, and immediately after the Second World War.'"[62] On March 22, 2002, the Bergier Commission issued its final report as well as a number of detailed studies. The Bergier Commission concluded that Swiss banks had permitted account owners to transfer their accounts to Nazi entities, although the banks should have suspected that the owners were acting under duress. These were considered "forced transfers."

In the words of Switzerland's historical experts:

> Although assets transferred to the Third Reich were left out of the inventory of unclaimed assets of Nazi victims in Swiss banks, they were nevertheless part of the restitution claims. Investigators filed some of these claims against Swiss banks while others were supposed to be filed in Germany under reparations legislation (Wiedergutmachungsgesetzgebung). However, they were always dependent on receiving information from the banks about the way accounts were surrendered. Some banks gave a factually correct but misleading answer, namely that there was no longer any contact between the bank and the person in question. Others in addition referred to the statutory duty to keep files for ten years and stated that they were unable to provide information on the assets being sought — although relevant documents are still available in the archives today. Although in some cases the banks did inform claimants that the assets had been paid out, they neglected to provide key details, i.e., who gave the instruction and who received the payment. At the end of the 1960s, the Zurich head Office of Swiss Bank Corporation portrayed the attitude that prevailed among Swiss banks in a "highly confidential" letter, as follows:
> > "In our experience, there was a very great risk that the requests for information at that time only seemed to be made in connection with German reparations procedures, but were actually to be used to hold us liable for any transfer performed back then. It was asserted time and again that transfer instructions received from Jewish customers at that time had been issued under duress and were therefore noncommittal for the customers or their legal successors."[63]

The Bergier Commission also condemned the banks' post-War failure to adequately survey dormant accounts or to make a serious attempt to locate heirs of unclaimed accounts.

Despite the Bergier Commission's criticism of the Swiss banks' treatment of Holocaust-era accounts, the defendant banks continued to object to elements of the distribution process, although under the terms of the Settlement Agreement they had no standing to do so. In response, the Court issued a forceful opinion summarizing the entire history of the Swiss banks' treatment of Holocaust-era accounts, and the obstacles that, for decades, had prevented the victims and heirs from finding and retrieving their accounts.[64] Thus, the Court explained:

[63] BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 443-444. This banker thus was describing the concerns about "double liability" — that not only would Germany be liable for forced transfers, but so too would be the Swiss banks — that permeated much of the banks' communications with Holocaust victims and their heirs.

> What compels me to write is that over the past year-and-a-half, the bank defendants have filed a series of frivolous and offensive objections to the distribution process .... These objections bring to mind the theory that, "if you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it." The "Big Lie" for the Swiss banks is that during the Nazi era and in its wake, the banks never engaged in substantial wrongdoing.[65]

Drawing upon the Bergier Commission's findings, Judge Korman described how the banks had cooperated with one another to avoid customer inquiries after the War. He summarized the banks' history of document destruction and their determination to advise customers that Swiss banks were not obligated to maintain documents for more than ten years, even when the documents at issue still existed, and even when the banks knew that Holocaust victims were asking for them.

> After the war, many surviving account holders or their heirs approached the banks seeking information about accounts, often with valid legal claims. The banks, which had improperly transferred the funds in the accounts to the Nazis, were afraid that they would be called to account for the breach of their fiduciary duties. See, e.g., Albers v. Credit Suisse, 188 Misc. 229, 234, 67 N.Y.S.2d 239, 244 (N.Y. City Ct. 1946) (holding Credit Suisse liable for transferring a client's assets to a German bank pursuant to the client's orders because "above all it knew that the plaintiff was not likely of his free will to transfer property of his located in Switzerland to a bank in German territory controlled by the German government"). Equally important, the problem was not disappearing. "Although assets transferred to the Third Reich were left out of the inventory of unclaimed assets of Nazi victims in Swiss banks, they were nevertheless part of the restitution claims" that had been filed against the banks. In sum, former account holders and their heirs were complaining, and access to records could have shown their claims to be legitimate.[66]

The banks "received a direct economic benefit from their silence," because in contrast to the law of the United States and other nations, during and after the Holocaust, dormant assets in Switzerland remained with the banks.[67] In response to questions from account owners or their heirs, the "Swiss banks stonewalled as a matter of course. Because claimants typically lacked information as to the exact location or nature of the items deposited, the banks could routinely 'entrench themselves behind banking secrecy' and cite the claimant's inability to sufficiently document a legal entitlement as a reason to deny payment."[68] If "claimants had precise information, the banks turned to still more deceitful tactics. 'A situation was reached where even death certificates were being demanded for people who had been killed in the [concentration] camps,'" when of course "no such documents were issued."[69]

The banks' "devotion to secrecy and their repeated acts of stonewalling were not based on principles — they were profit-driven…. As the Bergier Commission found, 'it is apparent that the claims of surviving Holocaust victims were usually rejected under the pretext of banking secrecy and a clear preference for continuity in private law. Over the many years of such rejections, a large number of accounts were reduced to zero or almost.' Where economics counseled against upholding secrecy, private law and property rights, however, the banks were quick to abandon their supposedly entrenched values."[70]

There was a "particularly telling example of profits being placed over 'banking secrecy'" — the "secret post-war deals reached by the Swiss with Poland and Hungary to loot unclaimed accounts belonging to Holocaust Victims."[71]

According to Swiss historians Peter Hug and Marc Perrenoud, Switzerland entered into compensation arrangements of a similar nature with several Central and Eastern European nations: Bulgaria (November 26, 1954); Yugoslavia (September 27, 1948, revised June 3, 1959); Poland (June 25, 1949, revised

"[T]he primary aim of [these deals] was to favour Swiss interests in the wake of nationalisation of assets in Poland and Hungary." Bergier [Final] Report, at 450. The Bergier Commission was conservative when it wrote that this was "the primary aim" of the deals. What actually happened was that money was taken from dormant accounts of murdered Polish and Hungarian citizens and transferred to Swiss citizens to ameliorate the claims these citizens were raising against the Polish and Hungarian governments after their assets had been nationalized. And yet, "[t]he agreement[s] got no or very little publicity. It was therefore virtually impossible even for heirs living abroad to assert their claims." Id. at 451. Gerhard Weinberg, an eminent historian of the Nazi era, explained the deal with Poland as follows:

> [I]n 1949 the Swiss government signed a secret agreement with the Communist government of Poland under which the Swiss government with the agreement of the regime in Warsaw located the accounts in Swiss financial institutions of those Polish citizens who had been murdered and who either had no heirs or whose heirs had been stonewalled. The proceeds of this looting operation were then paid over to Swiss citizens who had claims on Poland arising out of the nationalization and/or confiscation of their property in Communist Poland.

The deal with Hungary was similar in operation. See Special Master's Proposed Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds, G-32 n. 94 … (citing Gerhard L. Weinberg, "German Wartime Plans and Policies Regarding Neutral Nations," statement before American Historical Association, January 10, 1998) …. While the "primary aim" of "favour[ing] Swiss interests" through these deals is clear, it is hard to imagine what secondary aim there could have been.

What is most striking about these secret agreements is that, as the Bergier Commission pointed out, "[s]urprisingly, it was now apparently possible to conduct an internal investigation so that a list of dormant accounts relating to these countries could be drawn up." Bergier [Final] Report, at 450. Indeed, "[n]either private property rights nor banking secrecy had been a barrier to the release of these assets." Id. at 451. Dr. Weinberg explained:

> [A]ccounts which previously have been announced in diplomatic negotiations as either not existing or incapable of being located, and which have been withheld from the heirs either for those reasons or because the heirs cannot produce documents acceptable to the financial institutions, can suddenly be identified, their contents removed, and legal title to the assets transferred to Swiss citizens whose claims against Poland or Hungary might hinder future profitable Swiss trade with those countries.[72]

The banks refused to provide information to these customers or their heirs, while the same banks during the Holocaust era had cooperated with the Nazi regime, and later reached deals with Communist nations. Columnist and author Thomas Friedman of the New York Times observed of this arrangement: "In 1949, when the Swiss were still stiffing the Allies, they did allow the Polish Government to recover assets in Swiss banks of heirless Poles murdered by the Nazis. Why? So the Poles could use the cash to pay back the Swiss for money they lost when Poland nationalized a few Swiss companies during the war. Can you believe that?"[73]

Several years after his 1997 testimony before Congress, Professor Weinberg reflected on the Bergier Commission's 2002 Final Report, including its findings concerning the Swiss deals with Poland and Hungary:

"Certainly those Germans fleeing to Switzerland at the end of the war to escape possible trial for war crimes found a far more friendly reception than any prior group of refugees. There is here an extraordinary similarity to the treatment of the accounts of Holocaust victims as described in the chapter on property rights in the postwar world. The same banks that pretended that the accounts could not be found, did not exist, or had nothing in them any more could easily find accounts when they wished to, so that the contents could be stolen and transferred to special accounts to pay Swiss citizens with claims against the postwar Communist governments of Poland and Hungary. The silly assertion that this operation was no big deal for the banks ignores the reality that it was indeed a big deal for the Holocaust survivors whose accounts had been stolen. The diligent researchers of the [Bergier C]ommission evidently did not find a single banker who refused to steal from his bank's clients." Gerhard L. Weinberg, Book Review, 38 CENT. EUR. The Court authorized a number of awards to heirs of accounts that had been turned over to Poland, Hungary and Romania.

[73] Thomas Friedman, Cynical, Immoral, Neutral, N.Y. TIMES, May 22, 1997, http://www.nytimes.com/1997/05/22/opinion/cynical-immoral-neutral.html.

This pattern of avoiding customer inquiries (at least when raised by Holocaust victims or heirs) continued for many years. At some point, the banks decided to act together to divert questions by Nazi victims:

> "In May 1954, the legal representatives of the big banks co-ordinated their response to heirs so that the banks would have at their disposal a concerted mechanism for deflecting any kind of enquiry. They agreed not to provide further information on transactions dating back more than ten years under any circumstances, and to refer to the statutory obligation to keep files for only ten years, even if their records would have allowed them to provide the information."[74]

Nor did the Swiss banks stonewall "only in response to individual claimants." Rather, they "also employed this strategy in the face of broad-based efforts to uncover assets of Nazi victims. [As the Volcker Committee concluded, the] 'banks and their Association lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of such so called 'heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated … the controversy of the last 30 years.'"[75]

The refusal to provide information by stonewalling "was generally an effective way for the Swiss banks to insulate themselves from liability and benefit economically," as Judge Korman pointed out. "[S]till more successful" was the banks' "wholesale destruction of records."[76] While the "Swiss banks generally complied with Swiss law on record keeping," this was "precisely the ruse. The Swiss Code of Obligations requires only that banks keep correspondence and accounting records for a period of ten years, regardless of whether an account is open or closed. Volcker Report, Annex 7, ¶ 3. If the banks could stonewall for ten years, then they could 'legally' destroy the very documents which might answer claimants' questions. This is exactly what they did. Banks 'regularly and systematically' destroyed material that was ten years old. See Volcker Report, Annex 7, ¶ 11. In some banks, the document destruction was annual, in some it was semi-annual, and in some it was simply intermittent. But it happened across the board. And thus the banks destroyed countless records that might have been critical in explaining their Nazi era actions with respect to accounts once held by Nazi victims. The destruction was part of the banks' ordinary course of business, and it was massive…. [T]he banks made no effort to save relevant documents, despite the fact that they knew Nazi victims and their representatives were clamoring for them."[77]

Where account records did survive, if the accounts were large enough, the banks "would often 'manage the assets in the interest of customers about whom no further information was available.'"[78] The banks "use[d] these accounts to generate substantial commissions and fees, and records would persist. In the case of small dormant accounts, however, the banks devised ways to eliminate the accounts altogether, and then eliminate all record of them. For instance, the banks would continue to charge activity fees on dormant, non-interest bearing accounts, and when claimants would request that the bank perform a search for their account, the bank would charge high search fees." The banks also would "open[] safes and sell[] assets to pay for the cost of hiring the safe."[79] According to the Bergier Commission, as a result of the "'deduction of such fees, unclaimed accounts, deposits and safe-deposit boxes could also disappear in the space of a few decades'" and "the 'dormant account' itself became 'dormant.' In other words, not only did the banks not have any information on the customers concerned, but researchers were also no longer able to obtain documents on these accounts at the bank during the period in question."[80]

Judge Korman stressed that the failure of the Swiss banking system to assist Holocaust victims and heirs still continued to be a concern. He described the restrictions that had been imposed by Swiss banks and banking authorities upon the claims process, and explained that it had only been with reluctance that he had approved the settlement under these conditions, as limited access to records was better than no access at all:

The 21,000 accounts identified as probably belonging to Nazi victims were published on the Internet on February 5, 2001 with the endorsement of the SFBC [Swiss Federal Banking Commission]. The rest were not. Instead, a single Accounts History Database ("AHD") was created containing all the information related to the 36,000 accounts deemed probably or possibly belonging to Nazi victims after the scrubbing process [a process resulting in fewer AHD accounts than had been described by the Volcker Committee in its December 1999 report]. For the remaining 4.1 million accounts, we have not one database, but many. The Volcker Committee's audit "by its nature" resulted in the creation of databases of the 4.1 million accounts found at various banks. These databases were never compiled into a single database — at present, there are over 50 databases containing the accounts. As the Volcker Committee recognized in its report, "these databases are scattered among individual Swiss banks and are not now freely available for examination…

The AHD and the TAD are administered through what has been termed the Data Librarian. The role of the Data Librarian (an accountant who is appointed by and reports to [the CRT Special Masters] and the SFBC) was created in an effort to make the information available to the CRT while "assuring compliance with Swiss laws on data privacy and confidentiality, and the rules on data confidentiality established by the SFBC in its decisions of March 30, 2000." CRT-II Rules, Appendix A. Essentially, if the CRT is able to match the name of a claimant to a name on an account in the AHD though computer searches, the Data Librarian will provide the CRT with whatever relevant information exists for the account. For accounts in the TAD, the CRT has more limited access. For example, with respect to accounts that bear a Swiss address and for small savings accounts (accounts excluded from name-matching by the Volcker Committee), the Data Librarian will only perform a name-matching analysis of accounts in the TAD after being provided with "credible evidence" that the specific account sought is likely to have belonged to a Nazi victim who used a Swiss address.

Before turning to the specifics of the current debate over the level of access, I address a particularly frivolous argument for the status quo that the banks have repeatedly put forth. The banks argue that the decision to provide the current level of access to the account records was not made by the banks or even by the Swiss government, but by the Volcker Committee...

I was personally apprised by the Volcker Committee of the negotiation process that led to its recommendations. The Volcker Committee, while independent, was constrained by the fact that it was seeking to make recommendations that would be followed. At the outset of its discussions with the Volcker Committee, the [SFBC] was only willing to agree to permit the publication of fewer than 5,000 accounts. The banks themselves also sought limited disclosure .... Had the banks and the SFBC remained in steadfast opposition, the successes of the Volcker Committee would have become meaningless; without access to accounts, justice could not be rendered. Thus, a compromise was brokered.... The fact that the Volcker Committee made this measured recommendation in the face of such > pressure in order to get the banks and the SFBC to go along does not eliminate the banks' active role in limiting the CRT's subsequent access to accounts. Nor does the fact that, for pragmatic reasons, I approved the settlement even though it involved less than full publication.[81]

In a later writing, Judge Korman corrected a misimpression that had been expressed in some quarters: that the Swiss banks' behavior in connection with their Holocaust-era accounts was supposedly appropriate, and the $1.25 billion settlement was not justified. [82]

For example, an article in Commentary had contended that "'the offending behavior [by Swiss banks] was evidently limited to a relatively small number of banks and is not of recent vintage.'" The article further stated that the "Volcker Committee has revealed 'the suspect nature of a good number of the claims for compensation that have been streaming in ever since this issue was highlighted in the 1990's."[83] Judge Korman pointed out that "[e]ach of these statements is the result of a misreading of historical accounts or of a premature rush to judgment, and each serves to whitewash decades of improper behavior by Swiss banks." The Volcker Committee findings could not be read in the abstract, but needed to be viewed in connection with the later "final report of the Bergier Commission, which employed historians, researchers and economists to examine the role of Switzerland and its financial center during the Nazi era." The "Volcker Committee's findings should not be ignored — indeed, when read in context actually

Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg also questioned the $1.25 billion settlement. Professor Hilberg noted in an interview that he had been requested early in the process to offer his recommendations about allocation and distribution of the Settlement Fund. He did not do so. He explained his reasons as follows: "My objection to the whole idea of testifying to the court, was that the total sum, in my opinion, already at that point was too great. And the conditions under which that sum was achieved, was the sort of pressure, the sort of threat, that I cannot approve of. It was not a freely negotiated agreement, it was not an agreement about facts, it was a kind of surrender by the Swiss banks who faced boycott and all sorts of sanctions were they not to agree, therefore I declined to testify." "Professor Raul Hilberg on Slave Laborers and Swiss Banks": Interview by David Ridgen, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with Professor Raul Hilberg, in Burlington, Vt. (Apr. 22, 2002). However, the Volcker and Bergier investigations made clear that the Swiss banks had failed in their handling of accounts owned by Holocaust victims and heirs.

reveal a great deal more than [the Commentary piece] suggest[ed] — but more reliance should be placed on the historical conclusions of the Bergier Commission."[84]

The Bergier Report made clear that Swiss banking secrecy laws were central to the banks' misconduct. These laws were not enacted to protect Jewish assets, "as acknowledged by a member of the Swiss Federal Banking Commission." The banking secrecy laws were inextricably tied to Switzerland's lack of an escheat provision, which allowed the banks to "profit from their greed. Indeed, if the Swiss secrecy laws and the lack of an escheat provision opened the door to fiduciary violations, it was the greed of Swiss banks that drove them through."[85]

This "'Swiss banking secrecy' is not some holy grail that stands apart from financial motives." Rather, it "was a concerted policy decision to which the Swiss banks referred when it

[84] Korman, Rewriting the Holocaust History of the Swiss Banks, at 116-17. That the Volcker Committee had itself made the case that the banks had acted inappropriately is evident from Professor Roger Alford's description of the "dozens of … questionable activities" highlighted in the Volcker Committee's (ICEP) Report. Roger P. Alford, The Claims Resolution Tribunal and Holocaust Claims Against Swiss Banks, 20 BERKELEY J. INT'L L. 250, 258 (2002). Professor Alford, who is also Associate Dean of Notre Dame Law School as well as a Deputy Assistant Attorney General in the U.S. Department of Justice, served as the Senior Legal Advisor for CRT-I (a bank-controlled claims process that operated prior to the Settlement Agreement). Professor Alford, who has written and taught extensively about the Holocaust restitution process, described some examples, drawn from the ICEP Report and from his own experiences at CRT-I, of the banks' "questionable activities":

"In some cases, bank documents establish that significant fees were charged for maintaining or closing accounts. While the Volcker [Committee] has estimated that normal bank fees for fifty years should total approximately 665 Swiss Francs, in Case 2012 [under CRT-I], a bank charged 6,212 Swiss Francs in fees, leaving only 9.60 Swiss Francs in the account. In other cases, if the account was previously closed because of excessive bank fees, the banks informed inquiring claimants that there was no such open account at the time the claim was made, without revealing that an account had existed and was now closed because of bank fees." Alford at 258.

Further, Alford observed, "Swiss banks engaged in dozens of other questionable activities. Such activities included collecting fees and charges owed for the use of safe deposit boxes by opening the boxes and selling the jewelry and other valuables to cover prior unpaid and future rental charges. In some cases jewelry was sold to pay for 'unpaid' rental costs for a number of years into the future. In other instances, Swiss banks deliberately narrowed their scope of inquiry to protect the assets in an account. For example, if a victim's account was held in Basel and years later an heir sought information at the Zurich branch about the existence of the account, the bank would review the records, discover that the account was held in the Basel branch, and inform the heir that there was no account at this branch held by a person with that name. Occasionally, an account holder held two or more accounts with a bank, a current account and a securities account. The bank would reveal the existence of one of the accounts and pay this out to the account holder's heirs, but not reveal the existence of the other account. Dormant accounts were also often ripe for embezzlement because no account holder would notice erratic behavior in an account. In 1990, one account at large private bank contained a value of 65,850 Swiss Francs, but by the end of 1994 it held only 557 Swiss Francs. The account was reported in 1997 as still having a balance of only 557 Swiss Francs." Id. at 258-59.

benefitted them (attracting depositors in the 1930's and turning away claimants in the postwar period) and which the Swiss banks abandoned when it harmed them (in their deals with Poland and Hungary)."[86] Further, the problem not only was that the banks had made "'no systematic effort … to resolve a glaring scandal,'" but that they had "actively covered it up." The banks "time and time again violated their fiduciary duty to account holders and destroyed documentation to cover up their tracks. Whatever their motives and whatever their moral culpability, their actions gave rise to legal liability. This is the central premise of the class action litigation against the Swiss banks and it rests on a strong foundation." The claims had "nothing to do with the morality of Swiss behavior during the war." The claims were based squarely on solid legal footing: the banks' flagrant violation of their fiduciary and contractual duties to their account holders.[87]

This, then, was the background to the Deposited Assets Class, some of which was known at the outset of the distribution process, but much of which was not revealed until after the claims process began, when the Bergier Commission issued its findings. Still other aspects of the banks' treatment of its depositors did not become known until well into the analytical process of examining the more than 104,000 individual claims for over 415,000 possible account owners.

Even with the massive document destruction outlined by the Court, millions of Holocaust-era records did continue to exist. It was still possible to locate and return accounts to specific Holocaust victims and heirs. Further, the underlying causes of action were quite straightforward and did not require application of novel or untested legal theories. Plaintiffs merely were asserting claims for simple breach of contract and unjust enrichment.

The Special Masters' distribution recommendations in 2000 therefore placed greatest emphasis upon establishing an individualized review process for Deposited Assets Class claims, a recommendation that Judge Korman adopted and the Court of Appeals upheld in 2001, when it confirmed that it was appropriate to prioritize the Deposited Assets claims:

> The existence and estimated value of the claimed deposit accounts was established by extensive forensic accounting…. [T]hese claims are based on well-established legal principles, have the ability of being proved with concrete documentation, and are readily valuated in terms of time and inflation. By contrast, the claims of the other four classes are based on novel and untested legal theories of liability, would have been very difficult to prove at trial, and will be very difficult to accurately valuate.[88]

A number of scholars and other observers who have reflected upon the distribution process have concluded that an individualized program for bank account claims was the proper approach, even with the benefit of hindsight revealing that the process was long and complex.

For example, writing several years after the claims process had begun, Professor Katrina Wyman explored the settlement and distribution programs in depth from the perspectives of various philosophical theories of justice. With respect to the claims for four of the five classes, she indicated – as had the Court in numerous published decisions – that whatever their moral legitimacy, many of the claims (e.g., for slave labor, looting and refugee status) were legally questionable.[89] The deposited assets claims, however, had strong factual and legal underpinnings, and the individualized claims process was intended to restore as nearly as possible what had been taken. Thus, as Professor Wyman observed:

> The payments come as close as is possible more than sixty years after World War II to remedying the wrongful withholding of the accounts, whether redress is understood as the restoration of equality or the repair of wrongful losses. The Swiss banks program has devoted considerable time and resources to calculating payments individually in respect of bank account claims. The program's objective has been to pay successful claimants the value of their – or their forebears' – accounts, adjusted for inflation. This objective has been met only imperfectly, due to the banks' destruction of records in the decades after the war and uneven cooperation from the banks in administering the claims process. But even the presumptions that have been employed to compensate for the disappearance of documentary evidence have been calculated, and are being scrutinized, with care. Overall, then, there is a strong basis for justifying as

> The banks' withholding of bank accounts after the war clearly constitutes a violation of a protected interest for which rectification is due. By withholding the accounts, the banks improperly converted the funds for the banks' own use….
> The payments for the bank account claims also come very close to Nozick's first-best conception of rectification. Under that conception, rectification involves transferring holdings to the persons who would have held them had there been no violation of the principles of justice in acquisition and/or transfer…. [T]he payment of bank accounts follows a highly individualized process in which claimants are matched to bank accounts. In turn, successful claimants receive payments based on estimates of the value of the accounts they are claiming, adjusted for inflation. In other words, the claims resolution process strives to the greatest extent possible to pay out what the banks withheld.[91]

Professor Leora Bilsky of Tel-Aviv University has observed that the individualized claims process for the Deposited Assets Class expanded the historical record:

> [T]he distribution stage contributed short personal histories to the historical "archive" through the elaborate individualized claims programs established for the claims related to bank accounts. The Special Master appointed by the court to oversee the distribution directed that a Claims Resolution Tribunal be set up in Zurich, under the direct supervision of the Brooklyn court, to adjudicate the more than 100,000 claims for bank accounts that followed the posting of 35,000 names on the internet.[92] The tribunal resolved more than 100,000 claims, memorializing every award in a written opinion, now publicly available on a website. Each award contains information provided by the claimant, including the name of the account owners, a personal story consisting of information regarding the owners followed by a brief explanation of family ties, and in some cases a description of the family's whereabouts during the war.[93]

92 The number of names authorized for publication by Swiss banking authorities was somewhat lower than the number cited by Bilsky. Approximately 24,000 accounts in total were authorized for publication (in 2001 and then in 2005), of the 36,000 accounts made available to the claims process through the AHD as supplemented by additional accounts located by the CRT through independent research.

In a review of the lawsuit and settlement, financial journalist John Authers, who covered the case and co-authored a book on the 1990s Holocaust restitution process,[94] recapped the principles underlying the Deposited Assets Class claims process. Authers suggested that the decision to treat each such claim on its individual merits was the proper one:

> [W]hat exactly would "justice" for the Holocaust survivors mean? The WJC's [World Jewish Congress's] "moral and material restitution" formula seemed to suggest that "moral" and "material" were separate things. The banks were supposed to make a moral gesture, and then show they meant it by backing it up with cash. But many claimants took deep offence at this. They bridled at any notion of charity or moral gestures: this money was theirs, and had been for half a century. "This is not charity from the Swiss," protested an ag[]ing Estelle Sapir, who had months earlier been paid money by Credit Suisse. "My father deposited money there. It's my money."
> For them, the moral victory that many perceived was not at all clear-cut. And over the following decade, the "material" portion of the equation – getting the Swiss banks' money to its rightful owners – would also prove much easier said than done.[95]
>
> [H]ad the lawsuit ever come to court, the people with the strongest legal cases for recompense were those with claims on accounts…. [I]n 2000, Korman decided they should be allocated $800m[illion] of the settlement. Almost nobody who had been involved in the investigations, on either the Swiss or the Jewish sides, thought it would be possible to find claimants for anything like this amount of money. That aroused resentment among other claimants.

Professor Paul Dubinsky has pointed out that "[n]othwithstanding [the] communal aspects of the cases, at the remedy stage the balance tipped in favor of the individual rather than the group. The many thousands of individual claims that had been zipped up into a class action complaint were, at the remedy stage, unzipped into many thousands of individual claims again. There were no legal claims advanced on behalf of the large collective. The complaints did not seek damages on behalf of the 'Jewish People' or the 'Jewish community of Romania.' They could not. No credible legal theory could be mustered for why such a collective entity is a proper plaintiff in a U.S. court." Paul R. Dubinsky, Justice for the Collective: The Limits of the Human Rights Class Action, 102 MICH. L. REV. 1152, 1176 (2004). Other "restitution movements," such as that on behalf of descendants of African-American slaves or victims of South African apartheid, "sometimes seem to misunderstand or ignore this aspect of the Holocaust cases when they view them as precedent for group-oriented remedies. They are not. Relief for individuals is what triumphed. The losses suffered by the whole were not recognized." Id. at 1179-80.

> And there was a further problem. For these people, "rough justice" was not an option. If it was possible to establish with some precision exactly what a bank owed to an individual, then the US legal appeals process would surely find that this should be done. That in turn meant that this money could not be paid out easily to charity cases, for fear that it would run out while people with strong legal claims against the banks still remained unpaid.[96]

The Deposited Assets Class distribution process, which as Authers noted rested upon the effort "to establish with some precision exactly what a bank owed to an individual,"[97] is described in the pages that follow.

III. ESTABLISHING THE PARAMETERS OF THE CLAIMS PROCESS

A. Determining the Amount to Allocate to the Deposited Assets Class

The Distribution Plan adopted by the Court allocated up to $800 million of the $1.25 billion settlement for the Deposited Assets Class. That amount was based largely upon the Volcker (ICEP) audit. As the Court has observed, the "Volcker Committee conducted what is likely the most extensive audit in history, employing five of the largest accounting firms in the world at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars to defendants [i.e. Swiss banks]."[98]

To understand the distribution recommendation, some further background on the ICEP audit is needed.

1. The ICEP Audit and Report

The ICEP audit involved more than 250 Swiss banks and 4.1 million accounts audited by five audit firms employed by the Volcker Committee (the "ICEP Auditors"): Price Waterhouse, which became Price Waterhouse Coopers after merging with Coopers & Lybrand in 1998

("PWC"), Coopers & Lybrand, KPMG, Deloitte and Touche and Arthur Andersen ("AA").[99] These 4.1 million accounts formed the TAD, to which, unlike the AHD, the CRT did not generally have access. PWC and Arthur Andersen together reviewed accounts contained in more than 140 Swiss banks, including the former Schweizerischer Bankverein, also known as the Swiss Banking Corporation ("SBC"), and Credit Suisse Group ("CSG").[100] KPMG reviewed accounts contained in the Schweizerische Bankgesellschaft, also known as the Union Bank of Switzerland ("UBS").[101]

The ICEP audit focused on 1) whether an account was open in the period 1933-1945; 2) whether it "probably" or "possibly" belonged to a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution; and 3) the account's disposition and, to a lesser account, its value. The ICEP auditors categorized these accounts, excluding from review those indicating permanent residence of an account owner in Switzerland, low-value savings accounts, properly closed accounts, and foreign accounts previously published by the Swiss in 1997.

ICEP ultimately identified an initial group of approximately 54,000 "probable" or "possible" Holocaust victim accounts, which the auditors categorized as follows:

Category 1: Matched to a name on a victim list;[102] account holder did not reside in Switzerland; evidence of persecution or account inactivity; and account was open, dormant, suspended, closed to profit, closed by fees, paid to the Nazis or closed unknown to whom.

Category 2: Did not match to a name on a victim list; account holder resided in the Axis or an Axis-occupied country; evidence of persecution or account inactivity; account was open, dormant, suspended, closed to profit, closed for fees or paid to Nazis.

Category 3: Matched to a name on a victim list; account holder resided in the Axis or an Axis-Occupied country; no evidence of persecution or account inactivity; account closed unknown to whom.

99 ICEP Auditors investigated 254 Swiss banks that existed in 1945, which, at the time of the ICEP audit, had been incorporated into 59 banks.

100 PWC reviewed SBC records and AA reviewed UBS records.

101 Schweizerische Bankgesellschaft was renamed "UBS" in 1997 and in 1998 merged with the SBC to form the "new" UBS.

102 This referred to the matching of account owner names to names appearing on victims' lists, including then-available lists from Yad Vashem and other sources. VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 4, ¶¶ 7-12.

Category 4: Did not match to a name on a victim list; account holder was of unknown country of residence; evidence of persecution or account inactivity; the account was open, dormant, suspended, closed to profit, closed to fees, paid to Nazis or closed unknown by whom.[103]

All accounts contained in Categories 1-4 shared common characteristics, including that all accounts were open or opened during the Relevant Period 1933-1945; there was no evidence of post-War activity; and there was no evidence that the account was paid to the account owner or his or her heirs.

After categorization, the group of approximately 54,000 accounts was "scrubbed" to remove duplicate accounts, accounts opened after 1945 (although initially believed to have been opened during 1933-1945), accounts indicating activity after 1945, and accounts closed before the date of occupation of the account owner's country of residence. As a result, the pool of accounts decreased to just over 36,000, which were included in the AHD.[104] The 21,000 "probable" Holocaust victim accounts published in February 2001 included all Category 1 and Category 2 accounts, and certain accounts in Category 3 that were more likely to have belonged to Holocaust victims (so-called "Category 3A" accounts, which had "unique or almost unique matches indicat[ing] a significantly higher probability that the relationship of these accounts to victims [was] not simply a coincidence of common names but [were] genuine matches between account holders and victims of Nazi persecution").[105]

a. Review of Accounts by the Audit Firms

The audit firms were not presented with a complete account file for each account they identified during the ICEP audit. Rather, the various pieces of information and documentation needed to establish the history of a given account were contained in different archives, which required assembly by the audit firms into one single file based on financial statements. The audit firms used various sources of information to achieve this goal. Internal sources were found in the relevant Swiss bank's archives, and external sources were obtained from publicly available information, such as documents relating to various asset freezes during the Relevant Period.[106]

The audit firms initially were directed by the Volcker Committee to focus on general identification of account owners from Axis-controlled countries, to isolate the pool of accounts held by probable or possible Holocaust victims. The audit firms placed less focus on the specific details of those accounts. Accordingly, reports prepared by the audit firms pertaining to specific accounts (the "Audit Report") contained general account and account owner information, but often lacked specific information such as exact addresses, other names associated with the account, transaction dates and account values.

ICEP auditors and CRT lawyers reviewed data pertaining to six different types of accounts:

- Custody Account: Also known as a "depot" or securities account. The bank held the account owner's property, usually consisting of securities (i.e., stocks or bonds). Custody accounts bore interest.
- Demand Deposit Account: Also known as a "current account." A cash account providing instant access to funds (similar to a checking account in the present day). Demand deposit accounts were held for liquidity, rather than for investment. These accounts collected minimal or no interest.
- Passbook/Savings Account: A savings account in which a passbook had to be presented upon withdrawal of assets. Savings accounts with values under 250 Swiss Francs or unknown values were excluded by ICEP. The terms "passbook account" and "savings account" were used interchangeably.
- Safe Deposit Box Account: Customers rented boxes for a fee, with two keys associated with the box, one for the customer and one for the bank. The bank could force the account open to obtain the fees.

[106] Banks prepared documents as a result of various asset freezes, including the 1941 freeze of foreign assets held in the United States, in accordance with the Trading With the Enemy Act; the freeze of German assets in 1945; and the freeze of Romanian assets in 1948. Swiss banks also prepared reports pursuant to a Federal Decree of 1962, in which banks were directed to provide information about assets belonging to foreigners or stateless persons persecuted because of race, religion or political opinion. Evidence of Swiss accounts that were frozen in accordance with such "freezes" were considered by the ICEP auditors pursuant to the ICEP audit. However, in many cases, these accounts were not included among the approximately 36,000 accounts that were identified as probably or possibly belonging to Victims of Nazi Persecution, either because there was no evidence that these account owners were Victims of Nazi Persecution, or because the account owners were able to access the accounts and receive the proceeds. However, in other instances, the CRT determined as a result of the claims review process that some of the "frozen" accounts should have been published. Post-Settlement litigation focused on the need to include such accounts as part of a subsequent publication (see infra).

- "Other" Account: These were known as Bürge, Festgeldkonto, Pfandbestellung or Depositenkonto accounts.
- Unknown Type of Account: This category was used by the ICEP auditors if they were unable to definitively determine the type of account at issue. However, through the "voluntary assistance" process, the CRT often was able to discern the account type upon thorough analysis of the account records.[107]

b. Categories Established by the Individual Audit Firms

With respect to Price Waterhouse Coopers ("PWC"), that firm used various sources of information in the course of its investigation of the SBC. These sources included printouts of records available from the electronic databases prepared by SBC, the most common of which were:

- ELA: The result of a search previously undertaken by the bank in its archives in 1997, outside the scope of the ICEP audit. This database consisted of scanned images of bank documents.
- CLOSED 1 and CLOSED 2: Electronic files prepared by the bank that included foreign or domestic accounts closed during the Relevant Period and accounts where the account owner was presumed to have been Jewish. This database did not contain scanned bank documents.
- SUSPLIST: List of suspended or collective accounts identified by the bank.

PWC could not always verify the information contained in the electronic printouts by comparing that data with the documents used to establish the report itself. In such cases, PWC included a memorandum in the account file, which was later presented to the CRT for analysis in the claims review process. PWC indicated in those memos that the bank had not provided PWC with the relevant account records upon which the database report was based, and that the CRT should request those files from the bank.

The PWC Account Reports contained various information including the ICEP category to which the account at issue had been classified, as well as customer account information. Such customer information included:

[107] "Voluntary assistance" provided by the banks resulted not only in reclassification of individual account types, but reconsideration of many individual account balances. This ultimately led to a reassessment of many of the overall presumptive values that had been assigned by the auditors.

- Account Identification Number: Each account received its own number, even if the same account owner held multiple accounts. This was not the same number as an account number assigned by the bank itself during the Relevant Period, but an internal "tracking" number for purposes of the claims process. Where PWC or the CRT determined that two different account IDs were the same account, the two account IDs were consolidated into a single account.
- Account Type: Accounts were classified either as a Custody Account, Demand Deposit Account, Savings/Passbook Account, Safe Deposit Box Account or Unknown Account Type.
- Balance on Account (in Swiss Francs): Although PWC reviewed account records for indication of value, CRT staff carefully reviewed the underlying bank documents to provide confirmation – or revision – of the value information indicated by the audit firms.
- Account Status: Accounts were open, suspended or closed. If there was no evidence that the account was still open or had been transferred to a suspense account due to inactivity, the account was presumed closed.

Arthur Andersen ("AA") performed the audit of the Credit Suisse Group ("CSG"), which was formed as a result of the Schweizerische Kreditanstalt ("SKA") acquiring 22 banks and a trust company. The major banks acquired by CSG were Bank Leu and the Schweizerische Volksbank. The majority of the accounts audited by AA that were published in February 2001 were held at the SKA.

Account reports prepared by AA generally contained the name of the account owner and his or her domicile, the ICEP category to which the account had been assigned, and a disposition report summarizing the audit findings regarding the account owner and account. The information reflected in the disposition report was taken from several sources, including internal CSG archives; external sources; and sources prepared by AA. Some disposition reports contained the image of a "bomb," indicating that an image of either a document or electronic information should have been displayed, but the underlying data file containing the image was corrupt. AA indicated that the file could be made available by CSG upon request, and the CRT did request the underlying bank documents in many instances. The basic bank record included in the majority of files prepared by AA was a customer account card from the SKA. The front of the card contained information about the account owner; the type of account or accounts held at the bank by the account owner; and whether the accounts had been closed. The back of the card contained additional information about the accounts, including closure dates.

2. Valuing the Deposited Assets Claims in Light of the Volcker Audit

In assessing the potential value of the Deposited Assets Class claims in the context of the $1.25 billion settlement, the Special Masters took into consideration the four different account categories that the Volcker Report had referenced. "Category 1" was comprised of 3,191 accounts. These were accounts "that remain open and dormant, were placed in suspense accounts, or closed after some period of dormancy, and matched exactly or almost exactly with names of known Holocaust victims or claimants."[108] Of the Category 1 accounts, 70% had known values.[109]

"Category 2" consisted of "7,280 accounts that do not meet the exact or near-exact name matching test, but nonetheless have other characteristics that suggest that there may be a probable or possible relationship between the account holders and victims of Nazi persecution — Relevant Period accounts of people who were resident in an Axis or Axis-occupied country during that Period, that were either inactive for at least 10 years after 1945 or, in some cases, identified by the bank as the account of a victim, or otherwise met certain criteria."[110] Of the Category 2 accounts, 80% had known values.[111]

After establishing 1945 values by "adding back bank fees and subtracting interest payments before the known valuation date," and adding the compound interest earnings to determine current values , i.e. multiplying 1945 values by 10, "corresponding to long-term Swiss interest rates over that period," the "total fair current value of Category 1 and 2 accounts so calculated would be SF 411 million using the mean value of known accounts values, or less if the median value (SF 271 million) is used."[112] As calculated in the Distribution Plan (September 11, 2000) at the then-prevailing exchange rate (U.S. $1.00 = SF 1.7754), the value of the Category 1 and 2 accounts would have been approximately $231.5 million using the mean, and $152.6 million using the median.[113]

Significantly, however, the bulk of the AHD was concentrated not in "Categories 1 and 2," but in "Category 3." Category 3 consisted of "a much larger number of closed accounts — 30,692 — open in the Relevant Period by residents of Axis or Axis-occupied countries, matched exactly or almost exactly to names of victims," which "were closed (except for Germany) during or subsequent to the year of Axis occupation of the country of residence of the account holder or after the war. These characteristics are indicators of a probable or possible relationship of these accounts to victims." The Volcker Report noted that "these accounts have no direct evidence of an extended period of dormancy, or of unauthorized closure, important elements of the presumption that there was a relationship to a victim." However, the Volcker Report also pointed out that "14,716 of these accounts have unique name matches or have confirming factors," and a total of "15,980" had "unique or almost unique matches." These name matches therefore indicated "a significantly higher probability that the relationship of these accounts to victims is not simply a coincidence of common names but are genuine matches between account holders and victims of Nazi persecution."[114]

Weighing against these indications that the Category 3 accounts belonged to Nazi victims, however, was the relative lack of other data about these accounts, including their values. Thus, when the audit was conducted, it appeared that only 11 percent of the Category 3 accounts had known values. A "large portion of the funds" seemed to be "clustered in relatively few custody accounts." For these reasons, the Volcker Committee auditors concluded that "no reliable projection of current values properly due victims for Category 3 was feasible."[115] Nevertheless, some members of the Volcker Committee "point[ed] out that by a mechanical projection of the average values for Categories 1 and 2 over the larger number of Category 3 accounts, a present value ranging between SF 827 million and SF 1.9 billion could be calculated depending upon use of median or mean values. Given the significantly greater uncertainty attached to Category 3 accounts in light of their closed account character, that range of values for this Category would in all likelihood very substantially exceed awards to victims ultimately determined in a claims resolution process."[116] Based on the exchange rates prevailing as of the date the proposed Distribution Plan was filed, September 11, 2000, these Category 3 accounts were valued at between approximately $465.8 million and $1.07 billion.[117]

"Category 4," according to the Volcker Report, consisted of "12,723 nominally foreign accounts opened in the Relevant Period that could not be matched to victim names and lacked evidence of a residence by an account holder in an Axis or Axis-occupied country during the Relevant Period. Some 8,400 suspended, unknown and savings type accounts in this Category come from Swiss Volksbank (now a part of Credit Suisse Group) and Banque Cantonale Neuchâteloise. Although these banks had a predominantly domestic retail business during the Relevant Period, they also had many contacts with foreigners. All of the accounts in this Category were considered as having a sufficiently possible relationship to Holocaust victims to warrant their inclusion in Category 4."[118] In Category 4, 98% of the accounts had known values. The estimated value of all Category 4 accounts was SF 4.2 million,[119] or approximately $23.7 million as of the date of the Distribution Plan.[120]

Thus, including the estimate of the Category 3 account values proposed by some members of the Volcker Committee, and based on the exchange rates in effect in September 2000, the total value of all four categories of AHD accounts was between $642 million and $1.36 billion. Although the midpoint of that range was approximately $1 billion, the Distribution Plan conservatively recommended that a lower amount, up to $800 million, should be set aside for the Deposited Assets Class.

As the Court has observed, "[t]he significance of the report of the Volcker Committee, which included three members appointed by the Swiss Bankers Association, is that it provided legal and moral legitimacy to the claims asserted here on behalf of the members of the Deposited Assets Class. The findings suggest that the value of deposited assets held by the Swiss banks could exceed the $1.25 billion settlement amount."[121] The Court further noted that "it is only the successful campaign that the Swiss banks waged to prevent disclosure before records were destroyed, Volcker Report ¶¶ 41(b), 48, that gave rise to the legal and practical impediments to the successful litigation of this case by the vast majority of individuals to whom money is justly due."[122]

In 2003, the CRT reexamined the AHD valuation data. Although the AHD by then had been reduced from 54,000 to 36,000 accounts, at the multiplier of 12 then used to bring the accounts up to present-day values,[123] and at the then-prevailing exchange rate of US $1 = SF 1.35, the CRT estimated the value of these 36,000 accounts to be approximately $1.63 billion. This amount was considerably higher than the $1.36 billion "high-end" estimate of the ICEP auditors, even though it was based upon an Account History Database that had been reduced after the audit by the "scrubbing" of some 18,000 accounts. The CRT's 2003 inquiry confirmed what the Volcker Committee and the Court had said: the value of the accounts in the AHD, alone, could be significantly higher than the Settlement Fund amount of $1.25 billion.[124]

Yet it was unlikely that all of the victims or heirs would be located, or that sufficient records existed to ensure that all victim accounts would be successfully claimed. Therefore, the Distribution Plan recommended capping the amount available to the Deposited Assets Class at [123] The economist Henry Kaufman chaired a "Panel on Interest, Fees and Other Charges" for the Volcker Committee. The panel prepared a report in 1998 that adopted a "multiplier" — a current value adjustment factor of ten — to be applied to any awards to be issued by the CRT (at that time, CRT-I), to bring 1945 values to current values. This factor was calculated by determining the compounded nominal value of a long term Swiss Federal Government bond ("CNV") over the period from 1939 to 1998. The precise value in 1998 was 10.18, which was rounded to ten. Under the oversight of Paul Volcker and ICEP's attorney Michael Bradfield, both of whom subsequently were appointed as CRT Special Masters, the "Kaufman Factor" multiplier was increased several times during the claims process to ensure an appropriate current value of the account.

$800 million. The remaining $425 million would be available for distribution to surviving members of the other classes: Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class, as well as for insurance claims and the Victim List Project.

Based upon the strength of the claims, and the fact that, despite the banks' massive document destruction, records did still exist for many accounts, the Distribution Plan recommended that the Deposited Assets Class claims should be assessed individually, by reviewing the existing bank records as well as claim forms, archival records, and a wide variety of other sources. Every effort would be made to determine and return to claimants the actual value of their deposits (multiplied by interest).

If the actual account value was unavailable, then the auditors' estimates of average account values for similar types of accounts would be used. To fill the gap posed by incomplete bank records — which may have documented the existence of an account, but in many instances contained no information about the account's value — the Court authorized awards to be made at designated "average" amounts based on the type of account. These average amounts ("presumptive values") were assigned by the Volcker Committee auditors after the Distribution Plan had been approved on November 22, 2000 and the claims process was under way. The presumptive values were included in the proposed CRT Rules recommended to the Court on February 1, 2001 by CRT Special Masters Paul Volcker and Michael Bradfield,[125] and adopted by the Court on February 5, 2001.[126]

The presumptive values were based on the best data available as of early 2001, and they varied depending on the type of the account: savings; demand deposit; custody; safe deposit box; account of unknown type; and "other" account type (i.e., an account not falling into the above categories). The presumptive value for a savings account was calculated at a 1945 value of SF [125] By Order of December 8, 2000, Judge Korman appointed Paul Volcker and Michael Bradfield, former Chairman and Counsel, respectively, of ICEP, as CRT Special Masters. In April 2004, upon notification by CRT Special Master Paul Volcker of his commitment to lead the investigation of the United Nations' oil-for-food program, Special Master Bradfield assumed responsibility for the CRT appeals process, while Dr. Helen Junz was appointed to serve as CRT Special Master.

[126] The CRT Rules were divided into three separate sections concerning the procedures for the publication of accounts; the manner in which the information sources available for the analysis of a claim would be used; and the rules of procedure to be applied by the CRT. See CRT, Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process (As Amended) ("CRT Rules"), available at http://www.crt-ii.org/_pdf/governing_rules_en.pdf.

830; for a demand deposit account, SF 2,140; for a custody account, SF 13,000; for a safe deposit box, SF 1,240; for an account of unknown type, SF 3,950; and for other accounts, SF 2,200. A multiplier was utilized to bring these amounts to current values.[127]

The question that remained, however, was how to minimize the administrative burdens and compensate for the lack of records, while still ensuring that only plausible bank account claims were paid. The resolution of that issue is addressed below.

IV. ESTABLISHING A CLAIMS ADMINISTRATION PROCESS

A. CRT-I versus CRT-II

With the amount available for distribution established (up to $800 million of the $1.25 billion settlement), the next objective was to arrange a claims process. The obvious agency was the CRT, which already was operating in Zurich. The CRT initially was established in 1997 to arbitrate claims to 5,570 dormant accounts in Swiss banks that were published by the SFBC in June 1997 and October 1997, prior to the completion of the ICEP audit.[128] That process was known as "CRT-I."[129] The adjudication of those pre-settlement claims took the form of arbitral proceedings. The claimants and the individual banks where the dormant accounts were located were the parties to the proceeding, and awards issued by CRT-I were mainly paid by the banks. Many of the 5,570 published accounts turned out to have been owned by individuals who were not victims of the Holocaust. These payments were the banks' responsibility alone. By agreement of the parties, payments made under this process for accounts owned by victims ($18 million) were deducted from the $1.25 billion settlement.

[127] See CRT Rules, Article 31 and infra.

[128] On June 25, 1997, Kurt Hauri, Chairman of the SBA, and Paul Volcker, Chairman of ICEP, announced an agreement among the Swiss Bankers Association, Swiss Federal Banking Commission and ICEP to establish a Claims Resolution Process for dormant accounts in Swiss banks dating from prior to the end of the Second World War. A circular letter issued by the Swiss Federal Banking Commission to Swiss banks required the banks to report the accounts of residents and non-residents of Switzerland that had been dormant since 1945, with publication of the names and other information on the accounts set for July 23, 1997 and October 20, 1997.

[129] Going forward, all references to the "CRT" in this report, unless otherwise noted, refer to the CRT-II (Court-supervised) process.

CRT-I proceedings were conducted by an international staff, including a panel of arbitrators from Switzerland, the U.S., Israel and elsewhere. Because of CRT-I's expertise in evaluating Holocaust-era deposited assets claims, the Court requested that it continue its work on behalf of the Settlement Fund. That process — "CRT-II" — is the subject of the remainder of this report. The CRT-II process diverged significantly from that under CRT-I, primarily because the CRT now would become an administrative body. Operating under the authority of a U.S. court, CRT-II was intended to review claims and assist claimants to the greatest extent possible, rather than to serve as an adjudicative body deciding between essentially adverse parties (the banks and Holocaust victims and their heirs).

Ultimately, CRT-I adjudicated over 9,000 claims to the accounts published in 1997. The work of CRT-I involving these accounts was completed in the spring of 2001. Because the CRT-I process was essentially winding down at the same time that CRT-II's work was beginning, there was some confusion about the differences between the two programs. Thus, when CRT-I reported its results — that approximately $10 million had been distributed up to that point, mostly for accounts that had not belonged to victims of the Holocaust — some seized on this amount to contend that the issue of Holocaust accounts was a "myth."[130]

This claim evidenced a misunderstanding of the CRT's work. The two processes (CRT-I and CRT-II) were distinct. The CRT-II process involved different claimants (more than 104,000 as opposed to 10,000); more accounts (36,138 in the original post-scrubbing AHD, supplemented by additional accounts located by CRT-II, plus the theoretical (if in reality essentially inaccessible) availability of the 4.1 million TAD accounts — versus 5,570 accounts in CRT-I); and different administrative and substantive rules.[131]

[131] For CRT-II, the Court eliminated the various distinctions between types of judges and, ultimately, eliminated the role of "CRT judge" in its entirety. CRT staff attorneys (rather than Senior Claims Judges and Resident

As described by Professor Roger Alford, who served as Senior Legal Adviser for CRT-I, the "procedure established for resolution of claims to accounts published in 1997" was an "exceptional, even unique procedure in international arbitration."[132] CRT-I was a "mass arbitration tribunal" that resolved claims in "'a judicial case-by-case manner rather than through an administrative procedure using predetermined criteria,'" and "[a]s originally established, its jurisdiction was over accounts opened by non-Swiss nationals or residents that had been dormant since May 9, 1945, which were subsequently made public by the Swiss Bankers Association in 1997."[133] Professor Alford observed:

> The Tribunal [CRT-I] received almost 10,000 claims to the 5,570 accounts published in 1997. The Tribunal had three distinct procedures for resolving these original claims. The "initial screening" procedure was a process designed to protect the banks' obligation of confidentiality to account holders. This process established whether a claimant had submitted any information on his or her entitlement to the assets in the dormant account or whether it was otherwise apparent that he or she was not entitled to the account...
> If the bank or the Tribunal determined that the claimant should receive the information contained in the bank documents, the claims were subsequently submitted for consideration under either a "fast track procedure" or an "ordinary procedure." The "fast track" procedure was applied when a bank believed that the claimants were entitled to the assets in the account and requested the Tribunal to render an award or confirm a settlement agreement reached between the banks and the claimants. Subject to confirmation that the request conformed with the claims resolution process, the Tribunal generally granted such requests. Of particular concern to the Tribunal was a finding that there were no other possible heirs that could be adversely affected by an award to a claimant and that there was no information before the Tribunal that might render its plausibility suspect.

Claims Judges) were given responsibility for drafting decisions, which were reviewed by the Court-appointed Special Masters and then submitted to the Court for approval. CRT staff attorneys were hired based upon academic and personal credentials, as well as on their commitment to the objectives of the claims process. CRT staff attorneys represented the front line of claim and bank analysis and review. Accordingly, it was appropriate to delegate the decision-drafting process to CRT staff attorneys in the interests of efficiency. See, e.g., Letter from Special Master Bradfield to Judge Korman concerning changes in staffing and amendment of CRT rules to permit "Staff Attorneys" to "certify draft claims decisions" for "approval by the Court" (June 11, 2002).

> All claims not resolved by the fast track procedure were resolved by the ordinary procedure. This process involved a full review of the claims and all available evidence in an expedited procedure. Recognizing the difficulty of establishing a claim given the destruction of documents and the passage of time, the burden of proof required [was] that it [was] "plausible in light of all the circumstances" that the claimant [was] entitled [to] the claimed account. Because these claims presented the most difficult and interesting legal issues, they were resolved by a panel of three arbitrators under procedures not unlike traditional international arbitration.
> Most awards [were] rendered for claims to accounts held by persons who were not identified as victims or targets of Nazi persecution. According to a Final Report of the Claims Resolution Tribunal published on September 30, 2001, the Tribunal had rendered 49 million Swiss Francs in awards to claimants to "non-Victim" accounts, while only 16 million Swiss Francs had been awarded to claimants of Victim accounts.[134]

Reports discussing the results of the CRT's work failed to note the difference between CRT-I, which was ending, and CRT-II, which had just begun. This narrative thus missed the basic fact that CRT-I was created to analyze entirely different accounts, was open to different claimants, had different operating procedures, was managed largely by different staff, and was an arbitral process. Thus, inaccurate headlines appeared, such as one that stated, "Swiss Holocaust cash revealed to be a myth," and claiming that "[m]ost dormant Swiss bank accounts thought to have belonged to Holocaust survivors were opened by wealthy, non-Jewish people who then forgot about their money... A 17-member tribunal based in Zurich was set up in 1997 to investigate the identities of 5,500 foreign accounts and 10,000 Swiss accounts that have lain dormant since the end of the Second World War." Of approximately "10,000 claims... [o]nly 200 accounts — containing £6.9 million - could be traced to Holocaust victims."[135] This assertion was inaccurate in light of the over 104,000 claims for more than 415,000 possible account owners that the Court received, and the nearly $720 million returned to over 5,248 individuals for 4,716 accounts.

135 Adam Sage & Roger Boyes, Swiss Holocaust cash revealed to be myth, TIMES OF LONDON, Oct. 13, 2001. These accounts, apparently relying in part upon a press release signed by Prof. Dr. Hans Michael Riemer, a Swiss professor and legal expert who consulted on CRT-I, did not reference that portion of the press release referring to the CRT's "new task" of "assisting U.S. Judge Korman and his Special Masters…in distributing a portion of the Global Settlement Fund established as a result of the class action litigation between the class action Plaintiffs and the major Swiss banks." Dr. Riemer's reference to the new list of "approximately 21,000 dormant and closed accounts of account owners," published on February 5, 2001, also was overlooked. The press release itself failed to mention the additional 15,000 accounts that were also part of the original 36,000-account AHD, but which Swiss banking authorities did not authorize for publication.

Notwithstanding the misunderstanding about the nature of CRT-I, the organization was the obvious choice for assisting the Court in the next phase of claims review. The Zurich-based staff that comprised CRT-I already had experience in reviewing Swiss bank account records, and many staff members had worked with Holocaust survivors. However, Swiss law generally prohibited entities on Swiss territory from acting on behalf of a foreign state, and therefore special permission was needed before CRT-II could assume claims processing duties on the Court's behalf. The CRT had to make this request, since that was the only way to obtain access to bank files on behalf of the Court. If CRT-II simply began to process claims on behalf of the United States District Court, that act would be considered a criminal offence under Swiss law.

On January 19, 2001, the Swiss Federal Department of Justice and Police (SFDJP) granted the requested permission, taking pains to make clear that the lack of authorization would have violated Swiss law.

> According to Art. 271, section 1 of the Swiss Penal Code of 21 December 1937, anyone who, without authorization, undertakes the actions that fall within the competence of a Swiss authority or official on Swiss territory on behalf of a foreign state is committing a criminal offence...[136]

The SFDJP determined that "[u]pholding Swiss interests and maintaining banking secrecy would be easier if all the activities concerned were carried out by an institution domiciled in Switzerland. The fact that judicial assistance negotiations are being conducted by

However, the same inaccurate description was repeated in 2008, long after the CRT-II process was under way. By that point, over $469 million (of eventually nearly $720 million) had been repaid to bank account owners, as publicly reported at www.swissbankclaims.com ("Swiss Banks Settlement Fund Distribution Statistics as of December 31, 2007"). However, in Cuckoo for Switzerland, AEI confused CRT-I with CRT-II: "There was a scandal over the application of the country's bank-secrecy laws in the 1990s…The issue was a public relations fiasco for the country, and resulted in a settlement of nearly $1.3 billion in 1998. But in 2001, after an exhaustive four-year investigation, the Claims Resolution Tribunal…released its findings on a list of 5,570 foreign accounts…Only about 200 accounts could be traced to Holocaust victims; claimants were awarded $11 million." the commissioners of a US trial court in another country accords with the US conception of legal proceedings and is permissible in Switzerland in accordance with international agreements (citation omitted)."[137] The SFDJP further noted that:

> ...The [CRT] will not be carrying out a task that would otherwise be handled by a Swiss court or other Swiss authority by way of providing judicial assistance. However, Swiss interests, and especially the protection of banking secrecy, are served if an institution domiciled in Switzerland carries out the activities described above. This access to confidential customer data at the banks was made possible by the Federal Banking Commission [in connection with the ICEP Audit of the Volcker Committee]. In order to ensure that banking secrecy was respected, the ICEP auditors were, however, forbidden from forwarding confidential information to the ICEP. Confidential documents and information were not allowed to leave Switzerland...

The SFDJP reiterated that only limited rights were being granted:

> It should be noted that the authorization to be issued is not a blank check, but is limited to the clearly defined and limited briefs, as they are known today, of the [CRT], the Special Masters, and their assistants...Apart from decisions about the claims that are to be satisfied from the Settlement money, neither the [CRT] nor its supervisory bodies will have any authority to encroach on the rights and interests of persons living in Switzerland. The cooperation of the banks, which will consist of providing the [CRT] with information, is voluntary and subject to Swiss law.
> [Based on the foregoing, the CRT] is being issued with the authorization to carry out its brief independently, without coercion of persons in Switzerland and in accordance with the distribution plan of 11 September 2000 and with the Rules of Procedure that are based on this plan.[138]

Once the decision was made to establish an individualized claims process using the CRT, and upon securing Swiss permission (albeit restricted by banking secrecy provisions), the next step was to create the claims process. It needed to be transparent; encourage participation by all possible claimants; and ease the way toward reclaiming accounts that had been held for decades by Swiss banks. It also needed to ensure that only the most qualified and committed lawyers and other personnel were entrusted with the important task of examining bank accounts and returning them to Holocaust victims and their heirs — a process that was guided by two dedicated individuals who led the organization throughout its tenure: its Secretaries General, Mary Carter and Dov Rubinstein.[139]

For any of that to take place, however, the CRT could not operate with one hand tied behind its back.[140] The CRT needed access to all of the information that existed about Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, whether the banks provided it willingly, or needed to be prodded by the Court. This proved to be a controversial process that continued long after the settlement was signed and the claims process was under way.

B. Preparing for the Review of Claims: Ensuring Access to Information

To compensate for the many restrictions upon the Swiss bank data to be made available to the claims process, the parties negotiated and the Court approved certain agreements to help define the "good faith cooperation" required of the banks under the Settlement Agreement. Thus, in a "Memorandum to the File" executed in connection with the Court's approval of the Settlement Agreement, the parties specified that:

- "The defendant banks will continue to cooperate with respect to establishment of a consolidated electronic database concerning the approximately 46,000 accounts referred to in the ICEP report [originally 54,000, and subsequently reduced to 46,000 and then 36,000]...The defendant banks will provide reasonable access by claims personnel to the consolidated database and to ICEP audit files prepared in connection with such accounts."[141]
- "If a Class Member who does not appear on the list of approximately [36,000] or on other previously published lists makes a deposited asset claim, and if claims personnel find that the Class Member has provided a reasoned and satisfactory basis for a conclusion that his or her account may be under the name of a person with a Swiss address, then the ICEP auditors' database for the relevant bank will be searched (beyond the bank's share of the approximately [36,000]) for potential matches for these persons. The bank may opt to conduct the database search itself under the

If there are name matches, then the existing ICEP electronic and hard-copy files will be searched for further information, e.g., to confirm the match, to ascertain the amount that may have been in the account, etc. The bank may opt to conduct the search itself under the supervision of the ICEP auditors or to have the ICEP auditors conduct the search; under either option, the Settlement Fund shall pay for the auditors' activities. The defendant banks will not be obligated to search beyond these existing ICEP files, but they will consider in a spirit of cooperation requests for further assistance in any particular cases where there is a reasonably strong likelihood that further assistance would provide probative information and where the costs of such further assistance do not outweigh the potential benefits."[142]

In addition, Article 6 of the CRT Rules provided that "[w]hen necessary to obtain information to resolve claims to Accounts that is unavailable to the CRT under Articles 1-5, the CRT may seek the voluntary assistance of banks that may have information in their files on such an Account."

However, the claims process revealed that reliance upon the "voluntary assistance" procedures alone was not sufficient to ensure access to bank records. During the course of their work, CRT staff members learned that the banks had more data than had been made available to the CRT at the outset of the process. The CRT notified the Court that this information was crucial to a fair process. The Special Masters also advised the Court that "'[l]ack of full access to existing documentation and the unavailability of other data has interfered with the claims process'" and, as a result, payments had "'moved more slowly than any of the parties concerned' would have preferred."[143] Shortly thereafter, the banks agreed to a process to review certain specific claims against the Total Accounts Database, but many concerns remained unresolved.[144] Thus, in 2004, Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Burt Neuborne filed a motion seeking further cooperation from the banks. Specifically, Professor Neuborne advised that CRT officials had informed him "that increased access to six sources of information currently in the possession of the defendant banks is necessary for the fair and just administration of the deposited assets claims program."[145]

First, the CRT strongly recommended that a fair claims process required "publication of information concerning approximately 15,000 Swiss bank accounts that were found by [the ICEP auditors] to be 'possibly' owned by Holocaust victims, but that have not yet been publicly identified," in contrast to the 21,000 accounts that Swiss banking authorities had authorized for publication in 2001. While these 15,000 accounts had been placed into a so-called "black box," so that a claimant who happened to name one of those accounts was entitled to have the account matched to his/her family members, the CRT had found that "a statistically significant difference" had "arisen between the 'match rate' of claims for accounts that have been publicly identified, and accounts…that have not been publicly identified...Not surprisingly, in the absence of targeted public notification of an account's existence, it is now apparent that members of the deposited assets class will not file claims to the account's ownership."[146]

Second, the CRT urged publication or republication of information concerning several thousand unclaimed Swiss bank accounts that had been "previously identified in earlier audits and investigations as potentially owned by Holocaust victims" including in "1945, 1952, 1959, 1962, and 1997."[147]

Third, the CRT sought publication of "information concerning Swiss bank accounts owned by Holocaust victims residing in Poland and Hungary that were seized subsequent to WWII by the communist governments of Poland and Hungary." These were the accounts that

Professor Neuborne pointed out that although some of the data sought by the CRT had been excluded from the claims process because of decisions made by the ICEP auditors, "no criticism of the ICEP audit is intended. Its function was to determine whether a significant number of unredeemed Holocaust-era accounts remained in Swiss banks. It performed that function brilliantly. Given the limitations of time and resources, the auditors could not have been expected to produce a definitive list of Holocaust-era accounts. Choosing to apply categorical disqualifications in settings where a relatively small proportion of the disqualified accounts might be owned by Holocaust victims may well have made good sense. It almost certainly resulted, however, in the unwitting exclusion of many Holocaust victim-owned accounts from the audit's final list of 'probable' and 'possible' accounts ultimately listed on the AHD." See Memorandum of Law in Support of Motion Seeking Additional Information 14, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. were the subject of "international agreements between Switzerland, Poland and Hungary," which were "used to satisfy claims by Swiss nationals against the governments of Poland and Hungary" or were retained by those governments.[148] While some lists of those accounts had been published in Poland and Hungary, the publications were not connected with the Court-authorized settlement, and notice had been neither widespread nor effective.[149]

Fourth, the CRT recommended restoration of accounts that had been "scrubbed" from the original 54,000-account AHD, reducing it to 36,000 accounts. When the AHD was established, "ICEP auditors, in an understandable effort to save money and time, categorically disqualified from significant aspects of the auditing process" a number of types of accounts: those with Swiss addresses or with addresses in areas outside Axis control; accounts closed prior to Axis invasion or occupation; and accounts indicating post-1945 activity. However, in the CRT's experience, "many Holocaust victim-owned accounts utilized" addresses in Switzerland and in other non-Axis countries "to avoid Nazi scrutiny. Similarly, experience has taught that many Holocaust victim-owned accounts were involuntarily transferred to Nazi banks prior to actual Axis-control of an area," in a variety of instances including where the account owner was "forced to transfer assets to ransom family members residing in Nazi-controlled areas." Additionally, "post-1945 activity does not negate Holocaust victim-ownership," based on information the CRT had seen as a result of its claims processing activities.[150] To the contrary, "much post-1945 activity reflected efforts by family members to recover a Holocaust-era account, or consisted of efforts to plunder the accounts by faithless persons…While the banks assert that mere post-1945 requests for information did not disqualify an account, an ongoing [CRT] investigation … indicates that accounts categorically excluded because of post-1945 activity were, in fact, owned by victims of the Holocaust who died in a Nazi concentration camp, rendering it impossible for the true owner to have engaged in the post-1945 activity."[151]

Fifth, the CRT reiterated its request for unrestricted access to the approximately 4.1 million accounts in the Total Accounts Database (TAD).

Sixth, the CRT sought access to all bank documentation relating to a matched account. After the CRT "determine[d] that a name match exist[ed] between a claimant and a Holocaust-era account listed on the AHD," it was sometimes "impossible to determine the validity of the claim without inspecting surviving bank records relating to the matched account that fall outside the period from 1933-45." Therefore, the CRT requested the ability to review all bank records relating to a matched account, "regardless of the date of the document."[152]

In addition to seeking access to a wider category of bank records, the CRT also had determined that many aspects of the claims process would operate more efficiently "in New York, rather than in Zurich, in order to permit substantial savings in cost and personnel efficiency." Professor Neuborne advised that the CRT would continue to "assure respect for Swiss law" wherever located.[153]

Professor Neuborne explained that these requests were not unexpected, and were within the spirit of the original agreement as amended. He noted that it was anticipated even when the parties agreed to the Settlement, and the Court approved the agreement, that there might be a need to revisit the restrictions placed upon the CRT claims process.[154]

In the interest of avoiding protracted litigation and enabling the claims process to move forward, the dispute over access to documents was resolved by agreement, the "Second Memorandum to File," dated June 10, 2004 and approved by the Court on June 15, 2004.[155] Under the terms of the Second Memorandum to File:

- The banks agreed to "support the establishment of [a] New York City facility" to perform certain designated tasks — the matching and review of claims, using the ICEP audit file prepared in connection with the account in question — "on the condition that the Court and the CRT [] adopt confidentiality measures satisfactory to the competent Swiss authorities." This provision was subject to "explicit prior approval from the Swiss Federal Banking Commission" (SFBC), a request that the banks agreed to support in good faith. The SFBC ultimately did grant approval on July 26, 2004.[156]

- The banks agreed to support publication, on the internet only, of the approximately 3,000 account names (of the 15,000 AHD names not previously published) that had matched exactly or nearly exactly to victims' lists, but had been excluded from the 2001 publication.
- The banks also agreed to "support the republication," on the internet only, of specific accounts "that were the subject of previous efforts by the Swiss government to identify potentially relevant Swiss bank accounts from the World War II era": accounts that had been identified under the 1962 survey and that Switzerland had published on the internet in 1998, and "Polish and Hungarian accounts from the World War II era (as published by the Polish and Hungarian Governments), which were the subject of international agreements," if the accounts were not already included in the AHD.
- The banks agreed to modify the restrictions concerning the search of the TADs using a "reasonable matching protocol" and a sampling procedure. "[E]xisting voluntary cooperation in resolving particular claims in accordance with Section B.3 of the August 9, 2000 Memorandum to File is not precluded, however," i.e., the CRT could continue to request that the banks provide the underlying bank records in connection with particular accounts, as opposed to the ICEP audit records, and the banks would take these requests under advisement.[157]

The banks stressed the importance of "finality, and, accordingly, Settling Plaintiffs and the [CRT represented that they would] not seek or support further requests to Settling Defendants for any actions in connection with the Settlement of distribution of settlement funds," nor would they "seek or support any requests to Other Swiss Banks or the Swiss Bankers Association for any actions in connection with the Settlement or distribution of settlement funds, save for requests for voluntary cooperation in resolving particular claims."[158]

The renewed dispute about access to bank records in 2003-2004 attracted a certain amount of press coverage, which had diminished once the Distribution Plan had been approved in 2000. As the Special Masters noted:

> Largely impelled by Judge Korman's intense scrutiny of the banks' behavior during and after the Holocaust era, and in some instances continuing to date, > many of the issues which first brought about this lawsuit are back on the table. They certainly are back in the public eye.[159]

The dispute's resolution likewise was reported in the press:

> After years of acrimony, Swiss banks have agreed to release records of thousands of World War II-era accounts that may belong to victims of the Nazis.
>
> A lawyer for Nazi victims who sued the banks said the agreement could allow the victims or their descendants to obtain hundreds of millions of dollars in unclaimed funds. The banks' refusal to release the records had angered Holocaust survivors and infuriated a federal judge overseeing the case.
> If Swiss banking authorities approve the agreement, Credit Suisse and UBS AG will publish the names of 3,000 accounts opened during the Nazi era. They will open databases of Nazi-era accounts for comparison with a list of thousands hoping to recover family assets from Swiss banks.[160]

The New York-based Jewish Week took note of the agreement, as well as the new adaptations to the CRT's claims-matching program, and observed that these revisions could result in distribution of much of the up to $800 million that had been allocated to the Deposited Assets Class:

> A new computer program to improve the chances of matching Swiss bank claims against dormant Holocaust-era accounts, plus a tentative agreement by Swiss banks to release the names of 5,000 more dormant bank account holders, may result in the return of up to $800 million to their rightful owners.

In addition to the post-settlement litigation that resulted in publication of additional names, creation of a New York office to assist the CRT, and the possibility of access to certain accounts in the TAD, the CRT also continued to press for the right to examine not only the ICEP audit files created for the "AHD" accounts, but the underlying bank records themselves.

Article 6 of the CRT Rules provided for "Voluntary Assistance From Banks": "When necessary to obtain information to resolve claims to Accounts that is unavailable to the CRT under Articles 1-5, the CRT may seek the voluntary assistance of banks that may have information in their files on such an Account." Taking its lead from the Court's ruling that approval of the Settlement Agreement was conditioned upon the banks' cooperation with the claims process, the CRT sought the banks' aid in connection with hundreds of claims and thousands of accounts. The documents requested from the banks often contained information useful to the claims process, such as data that would help to determine the identity of the account owner (for example, through a street address not specified in the AHD file); the existence of other unreported accounts in addition to those reported by the auditors; and the value of the account (for example, through a listing of the securities held in a custody account).

Early in the process, one of the two defendant banks, UBS, began to discuss with the CRT the procedures that would be followed by the CRT, UBS, and its ICEP auditor (Price Waterhouse Coopers) for requesting and obtaining "voluntary assistance." The CRT began regularly forwarding to UBS lists of accounts for which additional information was requested. Typically, UBS representatives would review the list, gather any available information, and then meet with CRT staff to discuss the results. Additional relevant documents were delivered to the CRT through the Data Librarian. CRT and UBS representatives continued to meet to discuss various accounts for which the CRT sought additional background information, yielding additional information for nearly 2,000 accounts. During this period, UBS, and in particular its counsel Britta Delmas, provided the CRT with considerable assistance. The claims process as well as the claimants benefitted greatly from Ms. Delmas' diligence and dedication.

In addition to helping the CRT assess whether a claimant was entitled to a particular account, the amount of the account, and whether other accounts existed that had not been reported, the "voluntary assistance" procedure also was intended by the CRT for another purpose. It was a means to ensure that there would not be questions raised after the fact about awards that had been authorized and paid based upon information that was solely within the banks' files (and which had not been provided to the CRT either as part of the ICEP audit or thereafter).

The records provided by the bank were added to the respective CRT account dossiers and were utilized to draft decisions. Under the terms of the "Data Librarian Rules" governing the CRT's ability to operate in Switzerland, the Data Librarian was responsible for removing any account owner information from documents transmitted to the CRT not directly concerned with the account owner or account at issue. In many cases, the documents provided to the CRT regarding a particular account owner consisted of lists — e.g. a list of accounts/account owners that had been transferred to a collective suspense account. Although the information in these lists likely would have been informative and useful to the claims process, the other account owner names were required to be redacted by the Data Librarian because of Swiss banking secrecy laws, which prevented the transmission of account owner information deemed by banking authorities as not germane to the claims process. Once the Data Librarian had reviewed and redacted the so-called "extraneous" account information, he transmitted the physical files to the CRT.[162]

Upon review of the new documentation, or upon the declaration from UBS that no additional documentation was available, the CRT would finalize its review and issue a recommendation to the Court.

[162] Additional information about the responsibilities of the Data Librarian is contained in Appendix A to the CRT Rules ("Data Librarian Rules").

As to defendant bank Credit Suisse, the CRT became aware that little additional information was available for accounts held in that bank, other than custody accounts. The CRT thus focused its efforts on receiving as much data as possible about these accounts. Overall, the CRT conveyed to Credit Suisse 15 "request lists" encompassing approximately 504 accounts. As with UBS, the documents submitted to the CRT from Credit Suisse archives were first submitted to the Data Librarian for redaction of account owner information that the banking authorities considered not germane to the individual claim. These redacted files subsequently were added to the physical claim files and the electronic claim processing system of the CRT ("CPS").

This "voluntary assistance" process proved crucial to the claims program. It resulted in the discovery of additional accounts that could be awarded, as well as increases in payments to a number of claimants. The Court described the process in a Memorandum & Order addressing the CRT's first successful effort to obtain supplemental information from Credit Suisse:

> Late last year it became apparent that one of the two Settl[ing] Defendants, Credit Suisse, would provide a significant amount of specific additional account information that had neither been recorded by the ICEP auditors nor had been previously disclosed in the course of so-called "voluntary assistance." Such voluntary assistance is an integral part of the banks' pledge to cooperate with the implementation of the Settlement Agreement...
> The CRT accordingly has sought voluntary assistance relating to hundreds of claimed accounts and has received regular input from one of the defendant banks [UBS] for several years. But until 2007 little had been achieved in several years of ongoing discussion between the CRT and Credit Suisse about the need for voluntary assistance for a large and growing number of cases. In 2007, however, after the CRT had submitted an updated list of accounts for which it had requested additional information, the tenor of the discussions became more promising. Finally, in November 2007, the CRT received additional documentation for a priority list of 29 yet to be awarded Custody accounts. This additional information proved to contain not only information about the identity of the account owner, but also detailed documentation on the portfolios held in these 29 accounts as well as their disposition history. The significance of this documentation for the account award process is self-evident. In view of the importance of the additional information found in this sample, and the emphasis this Court has placed on restoring to account owners or their heirs the proper value of the assets they had been deprived of, it was deemed only appropriate that the CRT would, even at this late stage in the process, revisit claims that had been considered closed following the award of the accounts in question.

> The CRT thus pressed for the delivery of additional information for a list of 322 Custody accounts…, which consisted largely of already awarded accounts, most of which, in the absence of any information on their content, had been awarded at presumptive value. Credit Suisse eventually provided documentation containing new information for 257 of the requested 322 Custody accounts, part of which was received in February 2008, while the bulk of it came in April.
> The CRT has since begun revisiting the previously awarded custody accounts for which new information is available. The CRT now recommends the adjustment of 10 awards previously approved by the Court prior to the receipt of this additional information [for a total of approximately $18 million]. Additional amendments will be forthcoming as the CRT's analysis of the records proceeds.[163]

As CRT Special Master Junz explained, the Credit Suisse materials were extremely useful to the CRT, but this diligence in tracking down all available documentation did not come without a cost. The new materials imposed a considerable burden upon the CRT's staff as they endeavored to analyze the more than 104,000 claims:

> To put the significance of the receipt of the new information in better context, it should be considered that it was delivered in the form of over 2,000 copies of individual deposit documents, which had to be organized and transcribed to make them usable. These documents in turn were found to contain over [1,609] entries for individual securities, coins and precious metals... To ascertain the amendment and award values of these accounts and to estimate potential total payments from the Settlement Fund associated with this new portfolio and asset disposition information, these 1,609 … assets had to be valued. This means that market values had to be found for these assets and the quality of the securities among them determined (whether they were in default or not) as of the disposition date of the asset, if known; then these valuations as well as the disposition information had to be analyzed and merged into the award process databases. A truly daunting endeavour, especially as it had to be accomplished within a short time without loss of accuracy.[164]

June 30, 2008) (footnote omitted).

[164] Report of Special Master Junz to Judge Edward R. Korman, October 10, 2008, at 4 ("Junz October 10, 2008 Report"). SDAP, too, was required to devote staff and other resources to assist in investigating the data from Credit Suisse and its impact upon the Deposited Assets Class payments. The new information from Credit Suisse related to 1,438 securities, and the security issuers were domiciled in 26 different countries. The CRT and the Special Masters requested SDAP's assistance in obtaining prices for these securities, as close as possible to the date upon which the account owner lost control over the account. SDAP gathered this information from a wide variety of public and private institutions in New York City over the course of several months.

The new information enabled the CRT to identify account owners more accurately, leading either to a conclusive positive identification resulting in an award, or a "match disconfirmation" resulting in a claim denial. The examination of these additional records further led to the discovery of more accounts that could be awarded, and improved the assessment of the value of securities held in custody accounts.

Most significantly, the "voluntary assistance" process originally envisioned by the Court in approving the Settlement Agreement contributed materially to the reconsideration and the resulting upward adjustment of many of the awards. These awards had been issued using the "presumptive values" that had been established by the ICEP auditors before the claims process was under way, so that accounts for which valuation information had been destroyed were assessed not at "zero," but rather at the average values of the accounts for which information still existed (depending upon the type of account it was, e.g., safe deposit, custody account, demand deposit and so forth). It became clear, as the claims process progressed, that the original presumptive values were too low.[165] As a result, the Court was able to authorize additional awards and improve the valuation base beyond what would have been the case if the CRT had relied solely upon the audit files presented to it at the outset of the claims process. These improvements are discussed in greater detail below.

C. The CRT-II Claims Process - Principles

1. Transparency

Extensive information about the claims process was available from at least three separate venues. First, two websites containing information concerning the CRT (as well as the overall settlement process) were maintained and updated regularly: www.crt-ii.org, and www.swissbankclaims.com.[166] Each site could be accessed through the other. Statistics on the number of claims received and paid were available on each website. The awards, and many of the substantive denial decisions (as opposed to technical denials; see below), were published on the internet. Thus, interested persons could review these decisions and become familiar with the presumptions, rules, guidelines and other practices governing the CRT process. Holocaust historian Michael R. Marrus noted: "Particularly useful on the subject of the Swiss banks is the official Web site of the Swiss Banks Settlement: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, …. available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/..."[167]

[166] The www.swissbankclaims.com site was established at the outset of the Settlement under the supervision of plaintiffs' counsel, who had employed an outside vendor, Poorman-Douglas (subsequently, Epiq Systems), to

Second, many documents, decisions, and other materials produced or received by the CRT or the Special Masters were docketed with the Court, and therefore made available for public scrutiny.

Third, extensive information about the CRT process, including statistics on claims processing, obstacles presented and overcome, and much other information was presented in several major filings which received considerable public attention. These included the Special Masters' Interim Report;[168] the Special Masters' April 2004 Recommendations; numerous court filings by Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne concerning the lack of access to certain information as a result of actions by the defendant banks and Swiss banking authorities; the Court's opinion discussing the banks' behavior during and after the Holocaust era; and the various filings of the Special Masters related to, and the Court's decision adopting, a proposal to increase presumptive values for many accounts for which no valuation information as a result of new information gleaned from the CRT's scrutiny of bank records in connection with the claims process.

Because the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, claim forms, and related materials promised claimants confidentiality, claimants' names were redacted from the decisions unless they waived confidentiality. Their names, addresses, and other relevant identifying information are known to and were filed with the Court under seal.

labor lawsuits and subsequent negotiations. He subsequently became a professor of law at the University of California's Hastings Law School. In comparing the Swiss Banks settlement to "Executive Branch" Holocaust-related settlements (such as the agreement resulting in the German Foundation, the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims ("ICHEIC"), and other programs[169]), he observed that the transparency of the Swiss Banks Settlement was a unique advantage of a Court-supervised process:

> [B]ecause of reporting requirements, settlements effected through the Judicial Branch are more likely to be the subject of continuing scrutiny by class members and the public. For example, in the Swiss Banks case, we have continuously updated the court with reports that are filed and a matter of public record regarding the provision of different phases of notice. Similarly, the special masters have filed reports with the court regarding the status of their efforts during the implementation phase. While the Executive Branch settlements have certain reporting requirements built into them, the reporting has generally been less detailed, and the reports are not as easily accessed by members of the general public or victim classes.[170]

2. Preparation

A "transparent" process could not take place without the widespread publication of account owner names. Although Swiss banking authorities restricted publication to only 24,000 of the 36,000 accounts in the AHD, it was imperative to publicize these names — and the fact that claims also could be filed for other accounts (including those not authorized for publication) — as widely as possible. Thus, the accounts of "probable" victims (i.e. the 21,000 names) were published on the internet on February 5, 2001, as directed by the Court's Order of December 8, 2000, as amended (the "2001 List"). The 2001 List could be easily searched and downloaded by potential claimants and service organizations by name, city and country.[171] After the Second Memorandum to the File was signed, approximately 3,000 additional names were published on January 13, 2005 (the "2005 List").

At the same time, the transparency of the legal process has not been without its drawbacks, mainly relating to the time-consuming requirements imposed by a court-sanctioned process. As Holocaust compensation expert Marilyn Henry observed:

> The processes themselves have different virtues and drawbacks. The Swiss settlement was subject to formal procedural rules governing all class-action lawsuits filed in American federal courts. Those rules guarantee a substantial amount of transparency in the process, provide opportunities for the potential beneficiaries to comment on the settlement terms, and appear to be a bulwark against political pressure. However, these rules also significantly lengthen the amount of time between a settlement and the actual distribution of the funds. The demographics of the claimants also extended the time involved in the Swiss case: legal materials had to be translated into dozens of languages and sent to potential claimants who lived in dozens of countries. The German foundation could distribute funds at an accelerated pace, but it is not governed by established rules. Instead, it is run by a board representing victims, nine governments, and German industry, and they must thrash out competing interests.

In preparing for this publication, the Court, Special Masters and CRT arranged for the following steps to be undertaken:

- Compiling account lists from each of the Swiss banks by the ICEP audit firms and aggregating those data into a single database that had been reviewed to eliminate errors in name spellings and the like;
- Loading those data onto websites where the accounts lists were to be published and testing that the data could be readily searched and downloaded;
- Preparing, translating and formatting claim forms and instructions and a considerable number of related explanatory documents into the five official CRT languages (English, Hebrew, French, German and Spanish).[172] The Deposited Assets claim form, often the first communication between the claimant and the CRT, was created in consultation with the Court and with the input of survivor assistance organizations, with the goal of eliciting the maximum amount of information by asking straightforward questions of the claimant;
- Preparing "Frequently Asked Questions" to be posted on the CRT website and on the settlement's general website. Claimants were provided with contact information not only for the CRT, but for survivor assistance programs around the world. CRT attorneys proactively contacted claimants if additional information was needed to fully treat their claims;
- Coordinating a worldwide network of voluntary agencies to assist claimants in the submission of their claims;
- Drafting and obtaining comments on the CRT Rules; and 171 The official list of names of the account owners of the 21,000 "probable or possible" accounts could be found on the internet on the official website of the SBA at www.dormantaccounts.ch. In addition, the list also was published on the website of the CRT at www.crt-ii.org, as well as the website for the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, www.swissbankclaims.com.

172 The Deposited Assets Class claims forms and information sheets for both the 2001 and 2005 Lists, as well as the Initial Questionnaire, other claim forms, and similar documents are included together as an Exhibit to this Final Report.

- Assembling a package of documents in five languages to send to approximately 82,000 members of the Holocaust Victim Assets class who had indicated in Initial Questionnaires that they intended to assert a Deposited Assets claim.

3. Assisting Claimants

The CRT-II process was global, but the largest percentage of claims originated in the United States (35.5%), with claimants from Israel and Hungary making up the second and third largest groups (at 27.32% and 7.28%, respectively). The CRT had five official working languages: English, Hebrew, French, German and Spanish. All Swiss Deposited Assets claim forms were required to be submitted in one of these languages. CRT staff members were fluent in a number of languages, including Russian, Czechoslovakian, Polish and Hungarian, which enabled translation of supporting documentation where necessary. The CRT, which had the status of an association under Swiss law (the "Independent Claims Resolution Foundation"), employed approximately 70 staff members at the height of its operations, and approximately 280 staff in total over the years.

The CRT established a Call Center prior to publication of the 2001 List.[173] The Call Center, staffed with individuals who spoke the five official CRT languages as well as others, was dedicated solely to the task of responding on a daily basis to thousands of inquiries. At its peak, the Call Center employed approximately 20 individuals. CRT staff made every effort to reply to messages within 24 hours. After publication of the 2005 List, an additional call center was established in New York to help claimants file and submit claims resulting from the new list. By the end of September 2005, the New York call center had received more than 3,500 related phone calls and over 1,500 emails.

Examples of the concerns to which the Call Center responded in writing and telephone are as follows:

- Confirming receipt of a claim: Under the Court's directives, the CRT accepted a variety of claim documents, including formal CRT claim forms submitted in response [173] The CRT-II Call Center was a continuation of the CRT-I Call Center, which was previously established with the same toll-free, country-specific numbers later used by CRT-II.

to the 2001 and 2005 Lists; Initial Questionnaires; claim forms submitted to the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office ("HCPO"); and claim forms submitted prior to the Swiss Banks Settlement as part of the CRT-I, ICEP and ATAG Ernst & Young claims process;[174]

- Updating the claimant on the status of his/her claim upon thorough review of the history of the claim, including analysis of drafted decisions, related claims, past correspondence, and other background matters. Call Center staff also explained the significance of certain decisions and, where necessary, arranged for their translation;
- Responding to inquiries concerning claims to Holocaust-era Swiss insurance policies, a program that the CRT administered along with the Deposited Assets Class program;[175]
- Determining whether a claimant sought to supplement the record, or, rather, to provide new information, concerning a particular account owner (the CRT's advice varied depending upon that assessment); and
- Responding to inquiries about Holocaust restitution programs other than the CRT's, including the programs established by the Court with respect to claims under Slave Labor Class I, Slave Labor Class II, the Refugee Class and the Looted Assets Class of the Settlement Agreement. CRT staff also responded to questions about other programs not administered by the Court, including those for non-Swiss insurance, looted art, German slave labor, and other restitution programs.

Call Center staff members were trained to be especially mindful of the sensitive nature of the CRT's work and the experiences of the claimants (both survivors of the Holocaust and their relatives). In cases of elderly or ill claimants, the Call Center prioritized those requests whenever possible.

The CRT also received tens of thousands of written inquiries. Nearly 24,000 inquiries sought a status update on a claim or an appeal; nearly 11,000 sought to supplement their files with additional documents; over 5,000 claimants provided the CRT with a death notification and 2,600 submitted testamentary materials; over 3,500 sought to file a new claim; over 3,000 posed a question after receiving a decision; over 3,000 filed paperwork on power of attorney matters; and another 36,000 inquiries were related to other matters.

[174] The broadening of the types of documents that could be considered as formal "claims" substantially increased the scope of the CRT's work but was deemed necessary to ensure that Holocaust victims and their heirs could participate fully in the Settlement Fund distribution process. For further discussion, see infra.

[175] See chapter entitled "The Insurance Claims Process."

CRT staff extensively communicated with claimants by postal and electronic mail; conducted more than 13,000 telephone conversations with claimants or their representatives; and in some 27 cases, at the request of the claimants, met with them personally at the CRT offices in Zurich. These meetings, as stressed in the claims materials, were not required and generally were discouraged to spare claimants the time and expense of travel.

4. Analyzing the Claims

All Deposited Assets claims were reviewed by a large team working at the offices of the CRT in Zurich, and at SDAP in New York. At the inception of the program, the Zurich office was wholly responsible for all claims processing activities, mirroring its role under CRT-I. With over 104,000 claims, it became clear that the scope of the work would challenge the capacity of the Zurich office, and there were considerable expenses associated with the Swiss requirement that the CRT operate in Switzerland. In consultation with the Court and the Special Masters, Lead Settlement Counsel successfully pressed for Swiss authorities to permit some operations to occur outside the country. The obvious location was New York, where the Court and many of its administrative agents were located.

Rather than creating a new, free-standing entity, Special Master Bradfield entered into a "services agreement" with the Claims Conference, which had decades of experience in processing Holocaust-related claims, and which was already serving as one of the Court's administrative agents for three other settlement classes (Looted Assets; Slave Labor I and Refugees). The Claims Conference established a Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP), expertly led by attorney Elena Vournas, Chen Yurista, Valerie Fischer, and many other dedicated staff members. SDAP was to provide offices and administrative assistance to the Court and the CRT in connection with claims processing activities for the Deposited Assets Class.

The CRT and SDAP employed a multinational staff with wide-ranging language capabilities. The staff consisted of attorneys, paralegals, researchers and administrative assistants. During the initial phase of the program, while negotiations continued with Swiss banking authorities concerning SDAP's ability to access bank records and other materials, SDAP assisted the CRT with reviewing, translating and entering data into the then-existing claims processing system ("CAS", or the "Claims Adjudication System"). In addition, SDAP also began the initial phase of the program that became the "Plausible Undocumented Award" (PUA) process — the issuance of awards for claims that were plausible, but for which documentary evidence did not exist, largely due to the banks' destruction of millions of account records. In anticipation of this program, SDAP assisted the Court and Special Masters in analyzing and formulating the criteria for evaluating claims under the PUA process, worked with IT developers to create a database, and began to analyze claims. SDAP later was tasked with processing awards, and issuing thousands of payments to claimants around the world.

Following the resolution of ongoing litigation with Swiss banks, the New York facility was established and maintained in a secure, closed working environment. In August 2004, upon completion of the secure connection between the New York (SDAP) and Zurich offices, safeguards were set in place to ensure that the information transmitted from the Zurich facility could not be transmitted elsewhere, downloaded, stored or printed at the New York facility, with the exception of allowing the printing of awards and correspondence, as long as no confidential information from the Zurich office could be printed.

SDAP instituted procedures and computer protocols to ensure protection of data confidentiality. All SDAP staff members, and all staff members of the Claims Conference who had potential access to SDAP facilities, signed two confidentiality agreements in which they agreed to comply with all relevant provisions, including Swiss law governing confidentiality and privacy. Representatives of the Swiss banks regularly inspected the SDAP facility to confirm that proper security measures were in place.

5. Processing the Claim Forms

Claimants were directed to send their completed claim forms to the Claims Registration Office in New York, where the claims were assigned an individual number and were entered into a database.

As an initial matter, the CRT sought to determine some basic information about the claimant: where he or she lived, and the relative or other individual for whom he or she was claiming. Of the 119,526 claimants and represented parties, the vast majority lived in one of five countries at the time they filed their claim forms: the United States (almost 36%); Israel (over 27%); Hungary (over 7%); Canada (almost 6%); and Germany (4%). Together, these individuals constituted nearly 80% of the claimants. Those from the United States, Canada and Israel alone comprised over 68% of all claimants.

Of the 104,140 claimants, over one-quarter (28%) sought return of their parents' accounts.[176] An additional 9% sought return of accounts belonging to their grandparents. Approximately 8% were nieces, nephews and/or cousins of persons were believed to have owned Swiss bank accounts. Over 7% sought return of their own accounts. Another 1% sought return of accounts belonging to a spouse.

However, a very large group of claimants — over 46% (48,147 individuals) — fell into a category that substantially complicated the CRT's ability to analyze their claims. These claimants either did not specify their relationship with the individual believed to own an account (the "Claimed Account Owner" or "CAO"); did not have a family connection to the Claimed Account Owner; or were only very distantly related to the Claimed Account Owner. Thus, of the 104,140 claimants, nearly half of their claims were particularly difficult to analyze even from the very outset. Because the claimant's relationship to the account owner was unclear, the claimant's entitlement to the account likewise was unclear, complicating the CRT's ability to interpret the often only minimally informative records made available by the Swiss banks.

Many of these 48,147 claimants were brought into the claims process because of the Court's determination to take a generous approach by authorizing the review of sometimes sparsely-worded Initial Questionnaires ("IQs") — informational surveys that were solicited and returned before the Settlement Agreement was approved or the claims process had been established — that appeared to reference Swiss bank accounts. While some individuals within this group may have believed that their IQs served as claims (despite warnings to the contrary on the IQs themselves), others had never intended to file a Deposited Assets claim.[177]

[176] Another 15,386 individuals were recorded as "represented parties," bringing the total number of claimants to 119,526.

[177] The decision to analyze the IQs is discussed more fully below.

If the 48,147 claimants who did not clearly specify the relationship to a potential account owner are excluded from 104,140 claimants, then a total of 55,993 individuals filed claims in which the CRT was able to determine the relationship to the Claimed Account Owner (generally the depositors themselves, their spouses, children, grandchildren, nieces, nephews or cousins). Of those 55,993 claimants, approximately one-third (18,096) were approved by the Court for payment.

The process by which these determinations were reached is described below.

6. The Matching Process

The first step in reviewing the 415,453 possible account owner names provided by the over 119,000 claimants and represented parties was to "match" these names to the database available to the CRT, the "AHD." The AHD ultimately consisted of 37,954 names (after supplementation of the original 36,000 through additional accounts the CRT was able to locate in archives and from other sources). This resulted in 1,523,153 matches.

The CRT employed the so-called "Daitch-Mokotow" and "Soundex" matching protocols. These systems were intended to be over-inclusive, but also resulted in a large number of "technical" matches, i.e., matches that the computer program deemed valid at a very basic level but which clearly were not proper. To correct this "overmatching" tendency, SDAP engaged in a process known as "cluster busting," reviewing all matches before the claim progressed to further review by the CRT staff in Zurich.[178] Depending upon the frequency with which the claimed name appeared in the AHD (i.e., how many account owners had the same name), the extent to which the claimed name may have been relatively common (i.e., the equivalent of "John Smith"), and the similarity of spellings and phonetics contained in the relevant names, there were sometimes hundreds of "matches" to a single account. Accordingly, the computer-generated matches were first subjected to a preliminary review to remove any pairings generated on a purely technical basis.[179] Following that initial review, files for substantive evaluation were prepared for CRT attorneys by support staff. These files included the relevant bank account record(s), along with all viable claims potentially matching to that account.

[178] Although the match review process took place throughout the claims process, the bulk of the work of analyzing the over 1.5 million matches was completed between 2004 and 2006, during which time 1,250,147 or 82% of all matches were reviewed.

As a general rule, CRT staff identified both "confirming" and "disconfirming" factors supporting or disproving a match. Strong reasons for confirming a match included identification of unpublished information, such as addresses, names of other persons associated with the account at issue, or matching signatures. Examples of strong disconfirming factors included different maiden names, or the fact that the account was opened before the birth or after the death of the Claimed Account Owner. Many cases required further analysis and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, application of certain presumptions approved by the Court (and sometimes codified in the CRT Rules) to aid in reaching determinations. These presumptions, discussed below, were crucial in compensating at least in part for the unfairness presented by a documentary record that had been partly or nearly entirely destroyed.

To further assist in the matching effort, the published 2001 and 2005 Lists generally contained only a portion of the account owner information available in the bank records. In many cases, the Lists published only the account owner's name, and in some cases the country or city of residence of the account owner. To the extent that there was other information available in the bank files, the CRT was able to compare unpublished data in the bank records with statements in the claim forms to assess whether a claimant had identified unpublished information, an important factor in assessing the validity of the claim.

The CRT also confirmed whether the claimed account was within the CRT's jurisdiction. Specifically, accounts closed prior to the Nazi era (defined in the Settlement Agreement as the "Relevant Period," 1933-1945), were not within the CRT's purview.

Once the CRT determined that an award was proper, the amount of the award needed to be calculated. Where the account's value was available from the bank's records, the award was based upon that sum, adjusted for fees and interest. If the value of an account was unknown, the CRT relied on the results of the ICEP audit as to the average value of the same or similar type of account during the time period from 1933 to 1945.[180] As more fully discussed below, the method of valuing accounts of unknown value was revisited as a result of information revealed during the claims process.

In addition to calculating the amount of an award, the CRT determined how the account proceeds were to be divided among the claimants, if there was more than one, including any party the claimant(s) may have represented. Many cases involved complex distributions, in accordance either with the distribution method outlined in Article 23 of the CRT Rules or, where inheritance documentation was available, in accordance with a chain of wills.[181]

[180] Article 29 of the Rules provided: "For an Account for which an Award is made under Article 22, but the amount in the Account is unavailable from bank records or the amount in the Account (1945 value) is less than the amount set forth below, the amount in the Account (1945 value) is to be determined from the following schedule, in absence of plausible evidence to the contrary." CRT Rules, Article 29. The account values according to Article 29 were as follows: Custody Account: SF 13,000; Demand Deposit Account: SF 2,140; Savings/Passbook Account: SF 830; Safe Deposit Box Account: SF 1,240; Other Type of Account: SF 2,200; and Unknown Account Type: SF 3,950. These amounts, but one, subsequently were increased in June 2010.

[181] Article 23(1) of the Rules guided allocation of funds in the absence of a will or other relevant inheritance documents pertaining to the account owner: a) if the account owner's spouse, but no descendants of the account owner, had submitted a claim, the account owner's spouse was entitled to the full award amount; b) if the account owner's spouse and descendants submitted a claim, the spouse was to receive one-half of the account and any descendants who had submitted a claim were to receive the other half in equal shares by representation; c) if the account owner's spouse had not submitted a claim, the award was to be made in favor of any descendants of the account owner who submitted a claim, in equal shares by representation; d) if neither the account owner's spouse nor any descendants of the account owner had submitted a claim, the award was to be in favor of any descendants of the account owner's parents who had submitted a claim, in equal shares by representation; e) if neither the account owner's spouse nor any descendants of the account owner's parents had submitted a claim, the award was to be in favor of any descendants of the account owner's grandparents who had submitted a claim, in equal shares by representation; f) if a child of the account owner was deceased, that child's spouse but none of that child's descendants had submitted a claim, that child's spouse was considered a child of the account owner; g) if none of the persons entitled to an award pursuant to Article 23(1)(a-f) had submitted a claim, the CRT was authorized to make an award to any relative of the account owner, whether by blood or by marriage, who had submitted a claim, consistent with principles of fairness and equity.

In cases involving a will or other inheritance documents, the CRT Rules provided as follows: a) if a claimant submitted the account owner's will or other inheritance documents pertaining to the account owner, the award was to provide for distribution among any beneficiaries named in the will or other inheritance documents who had submitted a claim; b) if none of the named beneficiaries had filed a claim, the CRT was authorized to make an award to any claimant who had submitted an unbroken chain of wills or other inheritance documents, starting with the will of, or other inheritance documents pertaining to, the account owner; c) if a claimant based a claim of entitlement on a chain of inheritance but had not submitted an unbroken chain of wills or other inheritance documents, the CRT was to use the general principles of distribution established in Article 23(1) to make allowance for any missing links in the chain, consistent with principles of fairness and equity. See CRT Rules, Article 23.

As has been observed in a work prepared under the auspices of the Permanent Court of Arbitration Steering Committee on International Mass Claims, INTERNATIONAL MASS CLAIMS PROCESSES: LEGAL AND PRACTICAL PERSPECTIVES (Howard M. Holtzmann & Edda Kristjánsdóttir eds., Oxford Univ. Press 2007)

Once the CRT drafted an award for submission to the Special Masters, the Special Masters reviewed the award, in some instances requesting additional information or determining that a different outcome was warranted than that proposed by the CRT. "This review, in addition to detailed provisions on claims admissibility criteria, matching of claims and accounts, criteria for making awards, and presumption to be applied to certain classes of claims, assist[ed] in maintaining consistency among different claims reviewers."[182]

Once an award was finally recommended to the Court, and the Court reviewed and if applicable approved the award, SDAP was authorized to pay the award proceeds out of the Settlement Fund. The payment process itself was complicated, involving communication with claimants and relatives around the world to ensure that the appropriate documents were submitted and the appropriate wire transfer information provided.[183]

Claimants were required to sign an acknowledgement form (the "Acknowledgement Form") prior to receiving payment of an award, which released any further claim to the awarded accounts. The Acknowledgement Form also obligated payees to share the award amount received with any other heirs of the account owner who came forward after the award was issued, ("INTERNATIONAL MASS CLAIMS PROCESSES"): "The inheritance regime set forth in the [CRT's] Governing Rules, approved by the United States federal district court overseeing the class action … is generally recognized as fair, and establishing such a regime was designed to expedite the decision of some claims by eliminating the need for ascertaining and applying the particular national laws applicable to the claimants." Id. at 113. The authors noted that broader "questions may arise as to whether it is appropriate for a court in the United States to adopt rules that supersede national laws that would otherwise govern inheritance of individuals, particularly where the claimants have not lived in the United States and the distribution of their estates would be governed by national laws having different provisions." Id. That question, however, would be appear to be addressed at least in this case by the claimant's agreement to participate in (rather than opting out of) the U.S.-based class action settlement.

The German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future," which separately reviewed slave labor and other claims, reached the same result as the CRT, imposing a self-contained set of inheritance rules. "This system was not uncontested since it meant disappointing persons who were heirs according to their respective national inheritance law including those who were designated as a beneficiary in the will of the deceased person. However, given the large number of beneficiaries, the system avoided the challenge of having to establish first, which national inheritance law applied, and then who was an heir under such national inheritance law. It would have been very difficult, time consuming, and costly … to identify and then apply different national inheritance laws..." and who would have been entitled to participate in the award in accordance with the entitlement provisions set forth in Article 23 of the Rules.[184]

7. The Claim Form

The name of the claimant's relative, his or her biographical data, and any other relatives identified by the claimant were entered into the CRT's database by CRT support staff. To further ensure accuracy and thoroughness with regard to the information entered, CRT attorneys conducted "Data Integrity" ("DI"), which sought to correct any previous data entry errors in the Zurich database, the "Claims Processing System" or "CPS." The DI process also was intended to add any missing information to the database, most importantly names of relatives that had not been previously entered into the system. The purpose was to gather correctly spelled names to match against the 36,000 account owner names that the Volcker Committee had identified as probably or possibly belonging to Victims or Targets of Nazi persecution (as augmented by additional accounts located by the CRT from archival and other sources).[185]

At the Data Integrity stage, claim information was compared with the entries in the database to ensure accuracy of names, including all name spellings, nicknames and/or name variations; inclusion of the names and name variations of any relatives identified in the claim; and any biographical data associated with a Claimed Account Owner and their relatives. In addition, SDAP staff transliterated thousands of names from Hebrew to Latin fonts.

184 The Acknowledgment Forms were especially important in responding to untimely claims; see infra.

185 The SDAP staff assigned to this project consisted of 7 Supervisors and 20 claims analysts, working in day and evening shifts in order to complete the project in a timely manner. SDAP staff performed Data Integrity (and with respect to all of the IQs and ICEP claim forms, original data entry) on a total of 48,867 forms, which included more than 35,000 IQs, 2,300 ICEP forms, 9,625 claim forms from the 2001 List and an additional 1,942 claim forms from the 2005 List. In addition, SDAP also scanned and organized 7,600 ICEP files for upload into the CRT-Zurich database.

a. Information Elicited by the Claim Form

The claim form sought the following data:

i. Information about the Claimant

- Claimant's personal information such as date and place of birth, parents' names and contact information.
- Alternate contact information, in the event the claims process was unable to contact the claimant. In the absence of a separate power of attorney form granting authority of the person identified as the alternate contact to represent the claimant in the claims process, the alternate contact did not have any right to receive information about the claimant's claim, but was simply a conduit for facilitating communication with the claimant. An alternate contact could also act with power of attorney for the claimant upon submission of the requisite form.
- Names of any family members represented by the claimant, along with submission of a completed and signed power of attorney from each of the named parties.
- Names of any other family members submitting separate claims. This provided an opportunity for the CRT to "link" related claims for purposes of including all entitled parties in a decision. The CRT encouraged inclusion of all entitled family members to a particular account, whether by representation of one family member on behalf of themselves and others, or submission by each family member of a separate claim form. Exclusion of known family members from an award was often the subject of late claims to awarded accounts and was addressed in the appeals process.

ii. Information about the Claimant's Relative

- Name of the account claimed, with a requirement that separate claims be submitted for each account owner. Claimants were prompted to indicate whether the owner of the claimed account: 1) held an account published on the 2001 [and later the 2005] List; 2) was identified as a power of attorney holder for an account, but believed by the claimant to have been the account owner; or 3) held an account that was not published on the 2001 or 2005 List.
- Name of a company that held an account, if the account was in the name of such company. Claims to company-held accounts were required to establish ownership rights of the claimant's relative ("Claimed Account Owner" or "CAO") to the company at issue.
- Name of the beneficial owner of an account, for cases involving claims that an account was opened in the name of one person, who held the account on behalf of another.

- General information on the CAO, such as dates of birth and death; any addresses associated with the CAO; whether the CAO ever resided in Switzerland (temporarily or permanently); and the extent to which the CAO maintained any personal or professional connections to Switzerland.
- Whether the CAO was a Holocaust victim. A claim involving a CAO who was not a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution" — Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or disabled — was inadmissible under the Settlement Agreement.
- The CAO's circumstances during the Second World War. Details regarding the experience of the CAO during the Relevant Period provided key information to assist in match review (such as dates during which the CAO was present in a particular country). This information also enabled the CRT to chronicle the fate of CAOs, as well as that of their assets, in published decisions.
- The claimant's relationship to the CAO, with supporting documentation (if available, in light of the facts and circumstances of each particular case).
- Names of the CAO's spouse, children and parents, as well as a family tree containing information about other branches of the CAO's family.
- In cases involving a claim of beneficial ownership, or a claim not based on a relationship (such as a company account owner), information establishing the beneficial ownership or entitlement to funds owned by a company account owner.

8. Account Review in Practice

The first files CRT attorneys reviewed generally contained an Audit Report summarizing the findings of the ICEP auditor with regard to the account at issue; bank documents related to a particular account or set of accounts belonging to the same account owner or account owners (often obtained through "voluntary assistance" initiated at the behest of the CRT); and the claim forms for "matches" generated by the CRT's database. The Audit Report reflected certain key information noted by the ICEP auditors, including whether the account at issue was captured in audit Categories 1-4 and if so, which category; whether the account had been published; the number of accounts associated with the account owner; and the type of additional information, if any, that had been published along with the account owner's name.

CRT attorneys examined the bank records to determine the accuracy of the information identified by the ICEP auditors. In some cases, the audit firm may have omitted certain information in its report, such as the name of an additional account holder or power of attorney holder (who may or may not have been related to the account owner). In cases where a joint account owner or power of attorney holder was identified, that name was added to the AHD for matching purposes in the claims process.[186] In this manner, other matching claims were linked with the original matched claim in an attempt to capture all claims from the same family.[187]

a. Match Confirmation

Key information considered by the CRT in an effort to confirm or disconfirm claim "matches" included:

- Gender: The CRT evaluated whether the account owner and the claimant's relative were the same gender, based upon information in the bank records and claim form, and based also upon gender concepts generally in effect at the time the bank and other records would have been created, as well as the gender expressed by the claimants. Although the names of the two persons may have been identical or substantially similar, certain names may have been gender neutral or masculine or feminine in one language and the opposite in another. Alternatively, some accounts contained only the first name initial of the account owner, which preliminarily matched to the same first name initial of the claimant's relative, even though, upon further evaluation, it was clear that these were two people of different genders.[188] For example, the bank records may have identified gender as follows: "Herr," "Frau," "Fräulein," "Monsieur," "Madame," "Mademoiselle", etc. Where the bank records did not specify the gender of the account owner, but the name itself appeared to be a possible basis for a conclusion as to gender, the CRT took into consideration the fact that many names were not gender-specific and evaluated the claim accordingly.[189]

[186] Under Swiss law, a power of attorney holder did not hold ownership rights to an account. Accordingly, a claimant with a confirmed match to a power of attorney holder, but not the account owner, would not have been entitled to the proceeds of the account at issue.

[187] Claims may have been submitted to the same or related accounts by various branches of a family tree. By adding information about additional account owners, and conducting thorough Data Integrity, the CRT was able to match these claims to each other, and through those matches include other entitled heirs in an award distribution.

[188] See In re Account of J. Wagner, involving a claim to an account held by a man named Jechiel Wagner, whereas the bank records indicated that the account owner was a woman and included information regarding the account owner's maiden name.

[189] For example, the name "Andrea" is typically recognized in English as a female name, but it is a male name in Italian. Similarly, "Laurence" is usually considered in English to be a male name, but is a female name in French.

- Technical name match: The names involved were so different that, considering the names alone, it was clear that the account owner and the claimant's relative were not the same person.[190]

- Alternate name: Derivative names were considered "alternate names" and not considered a technical match. For example, the names Miriam, Miri, Mary and Maria may have referred to the same person. In such cases, the CRT evaluated several factors including the countries of origin of the account owner and the claimant's relative; the part of Switzerland where the account was opened (i.e., French, German or Italian speaking); and information provided by the claimant regarding any alternate names of the claimant's relative, to determine whether an alternate name might have been used in the bank records.

- Maiden and married names: There could be clear evidence of the account owner's maiden name in the bank records, which contrasted with the maiden name of the Claimed Account Owner. The CRT evaluated preliminary conclusions reached with regard to maiden versus married names, as in some cases, the maiden and married names of Claimed Account Owners remained the same (perhaps due to marriages within the family).

- Marital status: The account owner's title may have provided information regarding marital status. For example, an account owner identified in the bank records as Frau or Madame or Mme indicated, in accordance with custom during the Relevant Period, that that person's last name was her married name, or that she was an older, unmarried woman. Similarly, the title Fräulein, Mademoiselle, or Mlle indicated that the account owner was unmarried and, most likely, in her early twenties or younger. Such information was a useful tool to aid in disconfirming matches. In the foregoing example, a young, unmarried woman would not have been ascribed a title reserved for a married or mature woman. Similarly, the CRT considered whether the claimant's relative's maiden name, rather than her married name, matched to an account owner's married name.

- Age: The CRT evaluated information in the bank records regarding the account owner's age (where available), as compared with the age of the claimant's relative. Examples of such cases included information leading to a conclusion that: 1) the relative had not been born at the time the account was opened; 2) the relative had passed away by the time the account at issue was opened; or 3) the relative was a young child when the account was opened, and there was no indication in the bank records that the account was opened by an adult on behalf of the child. In some cases, a discrepancy in age could be deduced from information in the bank records about the account owner's profession or title (e.g., "Dr." and "Prof").[191] In other cases, the account owner's birth date appeared in the bank records, which could be compared with the date of birth of the claimant's relative as provided by the claimant or other sources.[192]

[190] For example, the last names "Smith" and "Smithson" are not the same, but the computer matching system may have generated a match based upon the root name "Smith."

[191] For example: the bank records may have indicated that the account owner used a "Prof." title, but the Claimed Account Owner was only eight years old at the time the account was opened, and so obviously could not have been a professor.

- Profession: In certain cases, the bank records revealed information about the account owner's profession, either via a professional title or notation in the record. The CRT considered such information in an effort to confirm or disconfirm a match. For example, the bank records may have indicated that the account owner used a "Dr." title, whereas the Claimed Account Owner did not have an educational background providing for use of a "Dr." title.[193]

- Country of residence: The bank records indicated that the account owner resided in a country to which the claimant's relative did not have a plausible connection. CRT attorneys were aware that certain regions in Europe had a history of border changes during the Relevant Period, and kept this in mind when evaluating the match. Identification by a claimant of an unpublished country of residence listed in the bank records provided support for a match to the account, along with other factors.

- City of residence: The CRT evaluated matches of account owners and claimant relatives who had identical or similar names, but resided in different cities of residence within the same country. In evaluating such matches, the CRT considered several factors, including the distance between the two cities of residence; whether the claimant's relative resided in a small city or town; whether the account owner's city of residence was the closest large city to the relative's smaller town of residence; and whether the relative maintained any significant connection to the account owner's city of residence that would provide for a plausible conclusion that the relative would have used that city of residence, rather than his or her own, when opening a bank account. Such reasons may have included close family members or business in a particular city.

- Nationality: An account owner's nationality was not often listed, although nationality could be deduced to a certain extent from an indication of an account owner's city or [192] Claimants did not always have information regarding their relatives' dates of birth, particularly for more distant relatives such as great-grandparents and cousins. In certain cases, the CRT often could corroborate information provided by the claimant against data contained in external sources, including the then-available information in the Yad Vashem Database of Holocaust Victims, to identify the relative and identify a birth date and perhaps other biographical information. Yad Vashem has since considerably expanded its victims' database, with the assistance of funds provided under the Victim List Project created as part of the Distribution Plan under the Settlement Agreement, so that there are now over 4.5 million names in the database. For more information, see chapter entitled, "The Victim List Project."

[193] See In re Account of M. Natheim, in which the CRT concluded that the claimant had plausibly identified the account owner. The CRT noted that the claimant's relative's first name initial and last name matched the published first name initial and last name of the account owner. The CRT also noted that the relative's city and country of residence matched the published city and country of residence of the account owner, and that the claimant had identified the account owner's doctor title and city of residence in the United States, both of which were unpublished. The CRT also noted that the claimant had indicated that his relative had provided a street address only two kilometers from the address indicated in the bank records, and that it was plausible to conclude that the address not identified by the claimant was his relative's work address. The claimant submitted copies of his relative's letterhead, which indicated that Dr. jur. Netheim was an attorney, and that his office was located in the city of residence of the account owner.

country of residence. CRT attorneys were aware that a target of Nazi persecution could have recorded a country of residence different from his or her actual domicile for purposes of concealing a connection with an account. The CRT also was aware that the Nazi regime dispossessed Jews of German citizenship as part of the Nuremburg Laws. Accordingly, the CRT considered whether a claimant's relative who resided in a country other than the country or city identified in the bank records could have had a plausible reason for identifying the account owner's city or country of residence. Such reasons may have included close family or business connections to the country of residence identified in the bank records.

- Address: The CRT considered whether the bank records contained any unpublished information regarding an address of an account owner, and whether a claimant had identified such unpublished information. In general, identification by a claimant of an unpublished address provided support for a definite match to the account.

- Other names: The CRT evaluated whether the claimant identified any other names associated with the account, whether those names had been published, identification by the claimant of the relationship between the account owner and any other persons associated with the account, and any other unpublished information regarding other names on the account identified by the claimant.

- Beneficiary: In cases involving a claim that a relative was the beneficiary of an account held in the name of a published account owner, the CRT considered whether the bank records contained any information establishing that the account was held on behalf of the claimant's relative.

- Opening Date: All accounts identified by the ICEP auditors and captured in the TAD, as well as the AHD, were open or opened at some point during the Relevant Period 1933-1945. While not every account included specific information regarding the date on which an account was opened (or closed), all relevant accounts had some indication of existence during that time period, including the appearance of the account in a particular bank database or identification of the account on a suspended accounts list. Many accounts did include information with regard to dates of opening and/or closing, upon which the CRT relied in drawing several conclusions.

  An account opening date, where available, was compared with biographical information about a claimant's relative. If an opening date occurred after the death of the relative, or at a time when that person would have been a child (without evidence of an account opened on behalf of a child), such information indicated that the claimant's relative was not the same person identified in the bank files. Similarly, an opening date associated with a particular country to which the claimant's relative did not have any connection at the time of opening also indicated that the "match" was not valid. Alternatively, an opening date at a time when the relative was clearly resident in the country or city at issue in the bank records, while perhaps not on its own sufficient to confirm a match, nevertheless provided a basis for further investigation of the match.

There were 1,504,392 "negative" matches, of which approximately 44% (664,669) were "technical" matches; i.e., matches that arose only because the matching program was designed to be especially broad, but which on their face were invalid (for example, the first and middle names were the same, but the last name was entirely different). For the remaining 839,723 of these "negative matches," the matches ultimately were "disconfirmed;" i.e., it was determined that the account could not be awarded to the claimant.

Not all of the accounts in the AHD generated matches, despite the fact that the CRT located and ran over 415,000 names against the AHD. The AHD consisted of 37,954 accounts, 36,138 of which were made available as a result of the ICEP audit and the remaining 1,816 due to the CRT's continuing research and its insistence upon further disclosure of accounts by the banks. Of these 37,954 accounts, 30,420 matched to one or more of the 415,453 names of potential accounts owners, but 7,534 did not match to any names at all. Therefore, these 7,534 accounts — nearly one-fifth of the entire account database available to the CRT — had no possibility of ever being awarded. No one had claimed them; no one had named these account owners as relatives; there was not even a "technical" match to be analyzed. In most cases, these accounts went unclaimed because entire families had been destroyed by the Nazi regime and there were no heirs left at all.[194] In a few other instances, the heirs were aware that the account owner already had received the proceeds of the account(s) at issue; they knew that they were not entitled to payment, and did not file a claim.

b. Efforts to Expand Scope of Matching to TAD

The AHD represented just a fraction of the TAD. Accounts were excluded from the TAD for a variety of reasons, including that they appeared to be domestic (Swiss) accounts or were small savings accounts. ICEP Chairman Paul Volcker had observed that the decision to exclude accounts from the AHD were based upon "'convenient shorthand descriptions [(i.e., "relevant" or "irrelevant" accounts and "probable" or "possible" relationships to Holocaust victims)], perhaps too cryptic in light of lawyers determination to split hairs, [which] cannot contradict the [194] The number of accounts awarded (4,716) was approximately 16% of the number of accounts that were claimed (30,420). This was the inevitable result of the passage of decades and the destruction of so many bank documents, even with the CRT's application of legal and evidentiary presumptions intended to benefit the claimants (see below).

uncontestable fact that the exclusion of millions of small savings accounts and Swiss address accounts from the ICEP analysis in the interest of speedy and manageable results does not, and cannot, mean that none of those accounts were Holocaust related. To the extent that such accounts can be practically and expeditiously identified, which is what the test experiment suggests is entirely feasible, the effort should be done to put this matter to rest.'"[195]

The Settlement Agreement and the CRT Rules provided for matching to the TAD under certain designated circumstances, largely controlled by the banks. After extensive negotiation, the parties agreed to a test program to determine the usefulness of additional matching to the TAD at certain Swiss banks. The preliminary test of the TAD (the "TAD Test") was carried out in 2004, with the cooperation of UBS, which made available the data in the archive for the Swiss Banking Corporation (SBC), which had merged into UBS. In addition, UBS authorized CRT staff members to conduct and analyze the TAD review, as opposed to insisting upon the more complex mechanism set forth in the Second Memorandum to File which would have required former ICEP auditors to return to Zurich for this exercise. As true for its participation in the "voluntary assistance" process, UBS's assistance under the guidance of attorney Britta Delmas enabled the TAD review and the claims process to progress more efficiently.

The TAD review involved two aspects: the test matching and research of 483 claimed account owner names to the TAD, and the researching of 1,905 accounts matching HCPO claims that had been matched to the TAD in 2000 to determine whether these matched accounts were likely to result in an award. A total of 2,052 matched accounts were reviewed as part of the test at UBS. All of these accounts had a match to either one of the 483 selected names or to a name in a HCPO claim. Those matches were analyzed, resulting in the conclusion that only 3% were likely awards, 14% were possible awards, and 83% were unlikely to be awarded.

However, the CRT was unable to gain a definitive estimate of the awardable accounts that might be available from the TAD, because the procedure became more complicated with the effort to match accounts held by Credit Suisse. Although the CRT engaged in extensive discussions with Credit Suisse, a significant obstacle was presented by that bank's insistence upon engaging an independent audit firm to conduct match review and testing (as opposed to allowing CRT staff to conduct this work, as had UBS). In addition, an agreement could not be reached concerning whether a claimant needed to match a name exactly or whether spelling variations would be considered; the relevant period of the accounts at issue; or the ultimate arbiter of a plausible match. As to the latter, Credit Suisse indicated that the outside auditor, rather than the CRT, would make such a determination, using different standards than those applied by the CRT in the general review process. The CRT therefore was unable to assess the overall likelihood of locating awardable accounts in the TAD, as many TAD accounts were held by Credit Suisse and adequate testing could not be undertaken.

V. THE APPLICATION OF PRESUMPTIONS TO FILL IN THE EVIDENTIARY GAPS

The CRT sought to analyze whatever data was available in the claim forms, the audit files and the bank records, erring in favor of the claimant wherever possible. Nevertheless, many gaps in the evidentiary record still remained, most commonly when the CRT was called upon to determine who (if anyone) had received the proceeds of an account, particularly where it was closed.[196] However, millions of account records had been destroyed, including, in many cases, documents that would have contained crucial pieces of information: the date and circumstances of the account's closure. U.S. law helped to fill this gap.

A. United States Law

The Court did not allow the destruction of account records to impede the claims process. The CRT was authorized to incorporate legal and evidentiary presumptions, just as in any litigation marred by the lack of documents.

[196] These are the "Category 3 accounts" noted in the ICEP audit.

In the treatise Reparations for Victims of Genocide, War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity,[197] Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig described the complexity of administering the claims process, and the significance of the Court's decision to treat the bank account claims as typical of other claims under American law involving destruction of evidence:

> Given the passage of more than sixty years since the Holocaust, the fading of memories, and the destruction of documents, it was imperative to find a way to simplify the claims processes while still establishing limits so that only those with plausible claims would be compensated. In the absence of that element of plausibility, the Settlement Fund would be depleted and those whose property was taken as a result of the Holocaust would have lost whatever small satisfaction they might have obtained from finally seeing their specific injuries recognised in some tangible form. Yet if the evidentiary bar was raised too high, virtually no one could prove a claim. Thus, it was important to strike a balance by favouring the claimant while requiring that certain minimum levels of proof be met, depending upon the class and the nature of the claim….
> [T]here had been massive and often deliberate destruction of bank records relating to Holocaust-era accounts. There are no records for 2.7 million accounts — over one-third of the deposits — and the account records that do remain sometimes are sparse. Nevertheless, millions of records continue to exist. In many cases, these records are sufficient to show that an account had been open or opened during the Holocaust era; who owned the account; and how much it had been worth. What often [was] missing [was] the record that would show whether the account had been closed, and if so, by whom. As the Volcker Committee and the Bergier Commission had indicated, it was not surprising that this kind of information often was unavailable, since presumably it would have confirmed in many instances that the banks had permitted Holocaust victims to turn over their accounts to Nazi Germany under duress, or that the banks had taken the accounts into their own profits after the War.[198]

Despite these obstacles, "[t]he solution to this dilemma actually was quite straightforward. It required only that the Court apply a fundamental evidentiary principle under United States law, … that of 'spoliation.' The theory of spoliation posits that a party who has caused the destruction of documents, and who knew or should have known that the documents would be relevant to litigation, should be held responsible for this destruction. An 'adverse inference' may be taken against that party. It may be presumed that the evidence destroyed would have been unfavourable to the person causing its destruction."[199]

In accordance with spoliation principles, the CRT was authorized to incorporate within the claims processing rules certain "Presumptions Relating to Claims to Certain Closed Accounts."[200] Unless there was "evidence to the contrary," where data was missing, the CRT would presume that neither the account owners nor their heirs had received the proceeds of an account. The burden of proof essentially would be shifted away from the claimant, to compensate for the banks' massive destruction of records that otherwise might have proven the fate of the account.

> "It is a well-established and long-standing principle of law that a party's intentional destruction of evidence relevant to proof of an issue at trial can support an inference that the evidence would have been unfavorable to the party responsible for its destruction." Kronisch v. United States, 150 F.3d 112, 126 (2d Cir. 1998). "[A]n adverse inference should serve the function, insofar as possible, of restoring the prejudiced party to the same position he would have been in absent the wrongful destruction of evidence by the opposing party." Id. While these presumptions can of course never return account holders to the position they would have been in were it not for decades of bank stonewalling and document destruction, they can help to balance the equities."[201]

The American legal treatise, Handbook of Federal Civil Discovery and Disclosure, subsequently incorporated this description of the adverse inference into its discussion of "spoliation," relying in its 2010 edition upon the above language from In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d 301 (E.D.N.Y. 2004). Judge Korman's analysis of the impact of intentional document destruction thus was incorporated in support of the principle that negligent document destruction might have the same ramifications: the "preferred sanction in the event of negligent destruction of evidence is the 'spoliation inference' — the drawing of an adverse inference based on matters probably contained within the destroyed evidence. In its strictest form, the 'spoliation inference' establishes prima facie the elements of the injured party's claim that cannot be proven without the missing evidence."[202]

The Court authorized the CRT to employ basic U.S. legal principles allowing presumptions to take the place of documentary evidence that had been destroyed. Thus, based on the adverse inference, the CRT was instructed to assume, in the absence of documentary evidence from the bank files or other sources, that "the account owner did not receive the proceeds, but, rather, that the bank took the account into its own profits, permitted the account owner to withdraw the funds and turn them over to the Nazis under duress, or that the bank otherwise closed the account improperly."[203]

This approach was in contrast to other restitution programs, which often failed to consider the difficulties confronting claimants who did not have documentary proof due to the destruction and chaos of the Holocaust. For example, as recounted in one CRT award, In re Accounts of Franziska Rosenstern, the German restitution courts (which had heard cases closer in time and place to the Holocaust) found the lack of documents dispositive, and ruled against the Holocaust victim claimant and heirs. In the Franziska Rosenstern case, the account owner's daughter, the mother of the eventual claimant before the CRT, had sought recompense in 1964 for her own mother's securities. She had filed an application with the Restitution Tribunal of the Regional Court of Berlin. The Berlin tribunal rejected the claim, finding that Franziska Rosenstern did not prove that she had been under duress, and did not show that she had lost control of her assets. As described by the CRT, the Berlin tribunal stated in 1964 that "the person seeking restitution must prove that the assets were confiscated by the Reich." It concluded that although "'the claimant maintains that the securities made their way to Berlin, this is obviously only an assumption. But assumptions do not suffice to meet the burden of proof required according to § 5 of the Federal Law of Restitution.'"

The CRT, applying the Court's rules, reached a different conclusion. Notably, in contrast to the Berlin tribunal, under U.S. law the CRT could rely upon "assumptions" to "meet the burden of proof" where the documents had been destroyed by the party obligated to maintain them. The CRT noted that "the Berlin Restitution Tribunal ignored not only the historical reality of the systematic expropriation of Jewish-owned assets at the hands of the Nazi authorities, but also the concrete evidence in the form of [a] note [from authorities], … which confirmed that the Account Owner's assets were confiscated by Gestapo order dated 1 May 1942 and that the Account Owner was deported shortly thereafter. In denying her restitution claim because no records existed to support the assets' confiscation by Nazi authorities, the [Berlin] Tribunal punished the Account Owner's daughter for the Reich's – and by extension, the Bank's – spoliation of evidence." The account owner had perished in Theresienstadt, and so she could not have reclaimed her Swiss accounts. The Court thus approved an award of $1,279,523.15. This was the value of the securities owned by Franziska Rosenstern. The Swiss bank to which these assets had been entrusted evidently instead had turned over this account and its holdings to the Nazis.

In an opinion piece in the newspaper, the Forward, Judge Korman elaborated upon the need to fill in the gaps in the evidentiary record. The principles governing the CRT's approach to every claim "appropriately established a very relaxed standard of proof. These rules are intended to compensate for the Swiss banks' systematic destruction of Holocaust-era account records. They reflect information gained from the CRT's examination of the remaining bank files, European archives and claimant information. We have left no stone unturned in our effort to return Swiss bank accounts to their rightful owners."[204] Thus:

> To compensate for the destruction of bank files, I authorized the CRT to apply an "adverse inference." If bank records show that an account existed but do not show what happened to it — such as who closed it and received the proceeds — the CRT presumes the account was closed improperly and pays the claim. (Sometimes there is evidence to the contrary, as where the account is closed before Nazi occupation...) We have studied many other Holocaust compensation programs, from the 1950s to the present. We are unaware of another program that applies such a generous presumption to make up for the lack of documentation.

[204] Edward R. Korman, The Swiss Bank Claims Process is Both Just and Thorough, FORWARD, Aug. 29, 2007, available at https://forward.com/opinion/11503/the-swiss-bank-claims-process-is-both-just-and-tho-00397/ (internal quotation marks omitted).

This was not the only way that the Court used traditional American legal principles to assist victims' families in their otherwise uphill battle to prove a claim where records might have been destroyed. As described by Judge Korman in the Forward, there were many other such examples (each of which is discussed in greater detail in the pages that follow):

> We use the earliest historically accurate date when determining when the Nazis began seizing Jewish property. This is an important date, because it permits the application of the adverse inference. For example, in Germany, we presume confiscations began when Hitler acceded to power on January 30, 1933. To our knowledge, most claims processes use a later date of 1936 or 1937. For Hungary, we use the earlier alliance date of November 1940, rather than the occupation date of March 1944…
>
> For the many accounts for which account owner information is limited because so many records have been destroyed, there are often several plausible claimants: sometimes two, sometimes five or more. They all show a plausible connection to the account owner because all that is known from the bank records is the owner's name, and perhaps country. There are many claims processes that likely would reject all of the claims because there is no way to determine which claimant was related to the account owner. (For example, the account owner could be listed in the bank files as "Isaac Meyer" from "Austria," and five unrelated claimants may show that they had a relative named Isaac Meyer from Austria.) We have chosen the opposite tack. Rather than denying all of the competing claims, we award all of them, dividing the account among the claimants pro rata.
>
> Where there are no bank records documenting the existence of an account, the CRT tries to locate evidence from some other source, such as Austrian and German census archives. For example, after Nazi occupation in 1938, the Austrians required Jews to complete a detailed census form listing their assets. Some 60,000 were filed. The CRT has made numerous awards to claimants who listed Swiss accounts on the census forms, although the bank records themselves may have been destroyed or are otherwise unavailable to the claims process. Whether based on the bank files, archives or other documentation, these awards are not inconsequential — they average $135,000.[205]
> Many claimants plausibly have shown that a family member owned a Swiss account, but the bank records have not been located. Once again, in an effort to ensure that claimants do not bear the burden of the banks' destruction of documents, I have authorized the CRT to make payments to those with "plausible undocumented claims" in the amount of $5,000 each [subsequently increased to $7,250]. These are not "humanitarian" payments … but awards based on the CRT's assessment of specific criteria, including the nature of the account owner's > relationship to Switzerland, the family's postwar attempts to access the funds, and other factors that I described in a February 17, 2006 decision.

>
> The CRT applies average, or presumptive, values calculated by the auditors who acted on behalf of former Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul Volcker, who led the investigation of Swiss banks in the late 1990s. CRT Special Master Helen Junz, an economist who in connection with the Volcker investigation studied and reported on the wealth of the Jewish population in Europe on the eve of the Holocaust, has since reexamined these account values in light of information learned from the claims process. She has recommended a considerable increase in the presumptive values, which … would result in millions of dollars in additional payments to those who already have received awards as well as to those whose claims remain to be paid.
>
> Many CRT accounts do contain value information. However, when the actual value is lower than the average [presumptive] value, the claimant receives the higher amount; we assume that the account may have been eroded below presumptive value by fees and other charges. Since unlike in most countries, unclaimed accounts in Switzerland escheat to the banks and not the state, the banks had an interest in continuing to charge fees against these assets.
>
> Many Holocaust victims owned custody accounts containing bonds. In almost all cases, we pay the higher of market or nominal value as of the date the account was closed. This reflects our assumption that the account owner was forced to turn over the account to the Nazis and could not control her investment decisions.
> We have opened the process to as many claimants as possible, even though every new claim must be matched against all other claims and bank accounts to ensure that the proper owner is paid. To that end, I permitted the CRT to analyze some [63,000] — of more than 600,000 — [Initial Q]uestionnaires, in addition to the approximately 35,000 [ultimately 41,000] claim forms sent to the CRT. The questionnaires were submitted early in this case, even before I approved the settlement, as part of a broad informational survey of Nazi victims and heirs. However sparse many of the questionnaires may be, we have made every effort to match them to Swiss accounts as well as to analyze them as "plausible undocumented claims," and we have made many payments as a result. Similarly, although late claims slow the review process for those who submitted timely applications, I have authorized several extensions of the filing deadline to ensure that claimants have been given every opportunity to participate in this settlement.

The incorporation of so many rules favorable to claimants prolonged the claims process. The alternative, however, would have been worse:

> We are well aware that this process has not been "expeditious," ... This effort to fill in the glaring gaps in the Swiss bank records is unfortunately difficult, and it takes time.

It would have been more expeditious to deny many claims, given the paucity of the bank documentation. But to assist those whose claims against Swiss banks have been ignored for too long, we chose another approach: conducting extensive research, and sorting through sometimes dozens of competing claims and complicated family relationships. The process has been — and will continue to be — thorough and just.[206]

B. The Historical Basis for the Application of American Legal Presumptions to the Claims Process

The Court's decision to permit the CRT to "fill in the blanks" in the documentary record by employing presumptions did not arise in a vacuum. The presumptions were based upon historical realities, some of which were known at the outset of the claims process, and some of which became evident as the Court, the Special Masters and the CRT studied the documents that were still available despite the massive destruction of bank files.

Edward R. Korman to New York State Banking Superintendent 5 (Feb. 1, 2006) (citing In re Accounts of Otto and Maria Fuchs) ("The CRT's work could certainly be completed more quickly if it were to limit its search to the person identified by the claimant as the account owner. However, we have concluded that, after a 60 year hiatus and a determined effort on the part of Swiss banking authorities to limit access to accounts, claimants are best served only after painstaking analysis not only of the specific account that the individual may have claimed, but of even accounts potentially owned. Experience has shown us that this additional research is of significant benefit to the claimants… To take but one example, in late 2002, the CRT recommended and I approved an award of nearly $5 million, in which the claimant had sought only her father's account. The CRT did locate one account that had been owned by the claimant's father. Of far more significance, however, the CRT also discovered several additional accounts holding substantial assets belonging to the claimant's aunt, who had been killed in a concentration camp and who had no heirs other than the claimant and the relative she represented. The claimant had not claimed the aunt's accounts. Were it not for the CRT's protocols, which require that staff members review all potentially related account owners for whom information is available in the [AHD], the claimant would have never known about, much less received, her aunt's substantial assets — some of which clearly belonged to the claimant's father, based upon information in the bank files").

Professor Michael Bazyler has observed that the distribution of Deposited Assets Class funds "proved to be an extremely difficult task... [T]he Swiss banks destroyed millions of records relating to these Holocaust-era accounts ... To make the process fair to the claimants, given the lack of documentation, Judge Korman provided for lenient standards of proof. For example, if an account record showed it was closed after the owner's country came under Nazi occupation or became an ally of Nazi Germany, the claims examiners in Zurich presumed that the account was closed improperly by the Swiss banks — either it was turned over to the Nazis or the banks took over the funds. The claimant would then be awarded the present value of the recorded amount with interest." Michael J. Bazyler, Unfinished Justice: A Conversation with Michael Bazyler, REFORM JUDAISM MAG., Spring 2008, at 79, 80.

The Court's decision to utilize presumptions to assist Holocaust victims also was not without precedent. During the same time period in which the Court, Special Masters and CRT were analyzing over 104,000 claims to Swiss assets, the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" was assessing an enormous number of applications from around the world for different Holocaust compensation programs the Foundation had established in 2000, including for slave labor, medical experimentation, property losses and other injuries. The principal legal adviser to the Foundation explained that the German Foundation had incorporated presumptions, so that claimants could receive individual attention while not being penalized for a lack of information decades after the Holocaust:

> On a broader scale, the standard of credibility permits broad presumptions based on historical experience that apply to a larger number of applications. Ample use has been made of such presumptions under the German law. For instance, it is presumed that all persons who were detained in a concentration camp or a ghetto were forced to work. Therefore, every applicant who can show that he or she was detained in one of these places does not need to provide any independent proof with regard to forced labor. Similarly, with persons who could establish that they were deported from their home state in Eastern Europe to the German Reich or occupied territory, it is presumed that they were forced to work. This presumption is based on the historical knowledge that this was the typical fate suffered by deportees from Eastern Europe. Moreover, the credibility approach permits schematic acceptance of certain documents as sufficient proof of a certain element and thereby guarantees a high output of decisions.
> Moreover, it may even be doubted that relaxed standards of proof decrease accuracy. Given the time that has elapsed since the events, it may be regarded as a rule rather than the exception that applicants do not have any documentation about their fate at the time in question…. To insist on documentation as the standard of proof required for eligibility, therefore, would mean that an important number of actual victims would not qualify for a positive decision. Therefore, even if the likelihood of historically accurate positive decisions may be better if documents are required, the probability of historically false rejections would be higher. In the particular context of the Foundation, which addresses situations of more than five decades ago, the percentage of decisions that do not coincide with the historical truth is therefore probably lower with the use of a relaxed standard of proof.[207]

[207] Roland Bank, Processing of Claims for Slave and Forced Labor: Expediency versus Accuracy? in HOLOCAUST RESTITUTION: PERSPECTIVES ON THE LITIGATION AND ITS LEGACY 190, 193-94 (Michael J. Bazyler & Roger P. Alford eds., N. Y. Univ. Press 2006).

In the German Foundation's 2017 publication reviewing the forced labor program, the Foundation again stressed the importance of implementing evidentiary rules that were not overly burdensome, under the circumstances of the Holocaust. "It would be meaningless to establish elaborate eligibility criteria when they are difficult to prove or at least to be made credible... Generally, the German forced labor compensation program provided for a relaxed standard of proof because it was conscious of the fact that much time had elapsed since the historical events and that the type of injustices which the program addressed were difficult to prove. Moreover, the long time since the events also implied that the survivors had a very advanced age. Against this background, it was a matter of fairness not to rely on documentary evidence or public records only and that applicants were allowed to support eligibility with a variety of evidentiary means, including credible statements."[208]

This rationale was equally if not more applicable in the Swiss Banks case, where documents had not been simply misplaced with the passage of time, but destroyed by those responsible for preserving them. To penalize claimants for the lack of documents "would mean that an important number of actual victims [or heirs] would not qualify for a positive decision."[209]

Where documents did still exist, they revealed much about the reasons so many accounts had been recorded as "closed," and the looting that had impacted the value of the accounts that remained open. This historical evidence warranted the presumption that the banks destroyed documents because of some uncomfortable facts: the banks had enabled the Nazis to force their victims to turn over their Swiss accounts (and in some instances, the banks themselves had reported the accounts to Nazi authorities); confiscations had begun at the earliest possible date, upon the occupation by or alliance of a nation with the Third Reich; the banks had failed to return accounts entrusted to them by refugees forced to deposit their assets if they were fortunate enough to be granted asylum in Switzerland; the banks complied with the Swiss government's agreements to turn over Holocaust victim accounts to Communist governments as part of post-

War deals favoring Swiss nationals; the banks did not adequately respond to account owners and heirs after the War; and the banks charged fees against accounts, and in some instances took the accounts into their own profits.

Presumptions based upon these historical facts also enabled the CRT to determine account values where the bank records did not show them. Absent documentation to the contrary, the CRT generally presumed that account values had been underreported by account owners in an often fruitless effort to shield at least some of their assets from the Nazis; that the banks had not added interest to victims' accounts, although the banks did subtract fees; and, ultimately, that the account values originally assigned at the outset of the claims process had significantly underestimated the true worth of the accounts, resulting in substantial additional payments to many claimants.

Examples of the types of cases analyzed by the CRT, and the historical evidence that these cases yielded — warranting application of broader presumptions concerning the fate and value of the accounts where complete documentation of the accounts did not exist — are discussed below.

C. The Presumption That the Account Owner Did Not Receive the Proceeds of His or Her Swiss Assets

1. Forced Transfers

One of the defining elements of the Swiss banks' behavior during the Holocaust era, as described by Judge Korman (relying heavily upon the findings of Switzerland's own Bergier Commission), was the banks' willingness to routinely facilitate transfers by Holocaust victims that were made under duress. These were known as "forced transfers." The Court directed the CRT to assume that where bank records were lacking (mainly because the banks had destroyed them), it was plausible that the records would have shown that the bank in question had cooperated with Nazi authorities in transferring the victims' funds out of a supposedly secure Swiss bank account.

The banks destroyed these documents because among other things, they were concerned after the War that they might be held accountable for activities that even the banks' own legal experts had counseled against.

> Swiss banks proved less of a safe haven than many of their customers had hoped. While not every Swiss bank acted in the same way on every occasion, the Bergier Commission's findings reveal that in general the banks placed their own perceived economic self-interest ahead of their customers as a matter of policy. The most glaring example of this was the practice of engaging in questionable account transfers during the Nazi era. Time and time again, banks completed transfer orders which they knew were requested only because of Nazi persecution, and which they suspected were not in their customers' best interest. An example that reflects the concerted policy of the Swiss banks is described by the Bergier Commission as follows:
> > After overrunning Poland in September 1939, the new ruling [Nazi] power endeavoured to acquire Polish assets deposited in Switzerland. As early as 20 November 1939, the Polish bank Lodzer Industrieller GmbH asked Credit Suisse to transfer assets deposited with it to an account at the German Reichsbank in Berlin. The bank saw a fundamental problem in this procedure and asked its legal affairs department to examine the matter. The latter recommended not complying with the request since the customer's signature had most likely been obtained under duress by the occupying authorities. A further reason for refusing the request was that it had come from Berlin and contained incorrect information about the amount deposited with Credit Suisse. The legal affairs department also pointed out that for Poland, German foreign exchange regulations represented a war measure taken by an occupying force and that Switzerland had not yet recognized the new political situation. Managing Director Peter Vieli subsequently discussed the issue with Rudolf Speich, his counterpart at the Swiss Bank Corporation. The latter contacted the Reichsbank, which agreed that in view of the unclear constitutional situation in Poland, Swiss banks were not obliged to comply with requests from German administrators…. Nevertheless, according to a file note 'the directors of the Reichsbank and Dr. Speich were of the opinion that duly signed requests from customers for their assets held in Switzerland to be transferred to an account with the Reichsbank must be executed since absolutely no justification could be found for not doing so.' Although there were legal and moral objections to transferring the funds, the consideration that they 'still had important interests in Germany, and should avoid friction and unpleasantness whenever possible' prevailed at CS [Credit Suisse]. They complied with the request and opted for the principle of carrying out legally signed orders even when they were not received directly from customers, but via the Reichsbank in Berlin. Their comportment in Poland was in this respect > typical of how the banks dealt with the assets of Nazi victims: as a rule, they complied with transfer orders from foreign customers without properly checking whether the signatures they bore had been obtained under duress by the Nazi authorities and whether the orders were in fact in the customer's interest.[210]

Significantly, the "two major banks in this example (Credit Suisse and Swiss Banking Corporation) consulted with one another and together decided to disregard the legal advice of Credit Suisse's legal department. It is possible to imagine situations where a bank's decision to order a forced transfer would have been morally justified as a way to protect a client's life, but that was clearly not the case for these banks. These banks did not decide to order forced transfers because they thought it would serve their clients well — they did so to 'avoid friction and unpleasantness' with their business interests in Germany. Unpleasantness for their clients was not even a consideration."[211]

The question was "'not whether [the Swiss banking industry] should or could have maintained its [business contacts with Nazi powers], but rather how far these activities went: in other words, where the line should have been drawn between unavoidable concessions and intentional collaboration.' Bergier [Final] Report, at 497. The banks drew a line quite near intentional collaboration. They made a collective decision that long-term economics counseled in favor of authorizing transfers to Germany, and, as [Bergier Commission member and, later, CRT Special Master] Helen Junz explains, '[t]he focus on Germany as a desirable business partner persisted beyond the period when Swiss business believed in a Nazi victory as there was a widespread conviction that the German economy would either survive or quickly regenerate after the war.' Junz, at 3. This policy constituted a clear violation of the banks' fiduciary duty to their account holders — individuals who were being persecuted daily."[212]

[212] Id. In a different paper, Dr. Junz observed that the banks' cooperation with Nazi authorities took on additional significance in light of the banks' post-War behavior. She noted that there is "ample evidence showing that clients' accounts were also released to the Nazi authorities — either directly to the Reichsbank, or indirectly into frozen accounts at financial institutions designated by the Nazi regime. To what extent does the release of such accounts to Berlin — directly or indirectly — indicate the sacrifice of the interests of one set of clients, to more 'interesting' ones who were more powerful or offered better business prospects, or both? Should one consider such actions based on 'business logic' as enrichment? The answer is not clear, as many circumstances

Although the "dearth of records makes it difficult to determine the overall impact of improper transfers by the Swiss banks during the Nazi era," as the Court noted, the Bergier Final Report provided some estimates:

> The Bergier Commission cited as an "example" that, between 1933 and 1939, Credit Suisse transferred about 8 million francs worth of securities to the Deutsche Bank; the Zurich office of the Swiss Banking Corporation transferred over 6 million francs worth of securities in accordance with the 1936 German Law on Compulsory Deposits; and the Swiss Banking Corporation sold 8 million francs worth of securities on behalf of German customers who were likely forced to transfer the proceeds to German banks. Bergier [Final] Report, at 275. These transfers alone total 22 million francs. Assuming conservatively that these francs were measured in 1945 and using the CRT's 2003 multiplier of 12 and an exchange rate of 1.35 Swiss francs to the dollar, this sum, undoubtedly a small fraction of the total forced transfers by Swiss banks during the war, would correspond to over $195 million today.[213]

The Court further observed:

> Perhaps more significantly, forced transfers continued throughout the duration of the war even though the Swiss courts recognized that they were illegal under Swiss law. [Bergier Final Report] at 276 (finding that when opponents of forced transfers had been "able to take legal action in Switzerland, the requests made by the [Nazi authorities] were rejected by the judges and the blocked assets were deposited with the court."). The Bergier Commission member Helen Junz explained that, "[a]lthough there are documented cases where banks acted to safeguard clients' assets — by moving them to numbered accounts or into other-named accounts — current evidence shows that the cases in which accounts were released predominated." Junz, at 2 (emphasis added). She also notes that independent researchers Barbara Bonhage, Hanspeter Lussy, and Marc Perrenoud "estimate that in this way the major banks released some SF 200 million worth of surrounding the closing of victims' accounts by Swiss banks remain ambiguous. But the question of the balance between cooperation with the Nazi authorities and action in the genuine interest of the client loses some of the benefit of the doubt when seen in relation to the post-war treatment of victims and their assets. The recurrent theme that runs like a red thread through thousands of pages of analysis is, indeed, that of a 'business logic first' attitude. The consequence was at best myopia, and more often than not blindness, with respect to the property rights of persecutees of the Nazi regime…. The Swiss authorities explained this behavior, in part, by the perceived threat to the continued independence of a 'small, neutral country encircled by the Axis powers.' But there was no change in attitude after the end of the war, especially not once Allied pressure diminished with the advent of the Cold War. Restitution did not fit in with new business strategies, particularly in the financial sector. The much vaunted Bank Secrecy Act of 1934, which in many instances had not been able to protect victims' assets, was cited to bar access to information on those accounts that had remained in Switzerland." > deposits and securities to the German banks and/or the Reichsbank." Id. (citing UEK [Bergier Commission] study, no. 15, Nachrichtenlose Vermögen bei Schweizer Banken). Again using the CRT's conservative conversion rate, this sum would equal over $1.7 billion today.[214]

In other words, the value of the forced transfers alone ($1.7 billion) exceeded the $1.25 billion Settlement Amount.

Forced transfers were not inevitable. Rather, "the banks had a choice. They could have chosen to adhere to their fiduciary obligation and refused to honor transfers requested under duress. They could have frozen customer assets or otherwise blocked transfers as a matter of policy. Their failure to do so is revealing."[215]

As described in a study prepared for the Bergier Commission:

> "An effective protection of customers' assets might have only been possible through a general blockage/freeze. Because public opinion would have likely welcomed a freeze of German and Austrian assets in 1933 and 1938, respectively, and because [Swiss] courts hindered the forced transfers when they were called in to decide such cases, it is very hard to understand today why Swiss politicians and banks did not vehemently take steps against the implementation of the German laws forcing the repatriation of foreign-held assets — either through a freeze or through some other effective intervention."[216]

Bergier Commission historians Peter Hug and Marc Perrenoud observed that, by contrast, Switzerland did freeze assets of other European nations as early as 1940 (the occupied nations of France, Denmark, Norway, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands). Other freezes were

At the end of February 1939, the [German] Ministry of Economic Affairs realized that a provisional administrator would invariably lose any case that went to a Swiss court. For this reason it was thought better to avoid further court cases for the time being in order to prevent a negative impression…. In October 1942 the issue was discussed once again. The judiciary in the neutral countries, namely Switzerland and Sweden, reacted more unfavourably towards the provisional administrators than ever. At the same time this strengthened the position of the rightful owners provided they had access to a Swiss court of law and their persecutors did not resort to other types of pressure — for example by imprisoning relatives — in order to force a settlement out of court").

effectuated in 1941 (Yugoslavia, Greece and the USSR), 1943 (Italy), and 1944 (Croatia, Slovakia and Hungary). One of the purposes of a freeze, as the Swiss historians noted, was "to prevent transfers of funds or property from taking place which could be the subject of dispute later."[217] Nevertheless, when it came to Germany, an asset freeze "was fiercely resisted," and "although certain people had been advocating this move since the 1930s," no decision was taken until the war was nearly over, in February 1945, and even then only "implemented later."[218]

Switzerland's decision not to freeze German assets but to instead permit "repatriation" of accounts and other assets to Germany can be understood "when one considers the premium banks placed on 'avoid[ing] friction and unpleasantness' with their interests in Nazi Germany. This also explains their willingness to accede to forced transfers even though 'the banks during the Nazi period had considerable leeway in determining their response to the Nazi authorities' demand that they cooperate in making their foreign clients comply with Nazi laws and regulations.'"[219]

With this extensive historical background (as explored by the Bergier Commission and reexamined by the Court), it was appropriate for the CRT to incorporate the presumption that where account records had been destroyed, the bank was presumed to have effectuated a forced transfer. In many instances, there was enough evidence to demonstrate that it was not just plausible, but likely, that the banks had been complicit in enabling transfers to be made to the Nazis by customers who were acting under duress.

a. Transfers by owners under personal duress

Two relatively recent examples involving restitution efforts by the heirs of renowned art collectors demonstrate this point. The bank records likely would have revealed that the banks cooperated with the Nazis' demand that the owners turn over their accounts. Since these individuals were meticulously stripped of everything else that they owned, it is highly doubtful that the Nazis would have missed the victims' Swiss bank accounts. The logical inference is that the bank records, had they not been destroyed, would have revealed that the accounts were closed under duress, and transferred to the Nazis. In applying the adverse inference to fill in the gaps in the banks' evidentiary record, the CRT was able to level the playing field for the victims' heirs.

A Wall Street Journal article, "What the Nazis Stole,"[220] recounted the background to the 2015 memoir, "The Orpheus Clock," by Simon Goodman. Goodman learned that his father's parents, who he had been told "died in the war," had been Jewish. They had "'once been enormously wealthy.'" Simon Goodman's grandfather, Fritz Gutmann, "had founded and long been [one of] the leading lights of one of Germany's major financial institutions, the Dresdner Bank. Generation after generation of Gutmanns had flourished in imperial and Weimar Germany, very much a part of the nation's establishment. They not only amassed great wealth and magnificent artwork and objets d'art but rubbed shoulders with the top echelon of society. All that changed after 1933, when the Nazis seized the bank and the assets of the family members in Berlin."[221]

Fritz Gutmann resided in Amsterdam, where he was a "pillar of Dutch commerce and society," heading up the Dresdner Bank in the Netherlands, "with a townhouse in Amsterdam and a country estate."[222] With the onset of Nazism, the Dutch affiliate of the bank was aryanized and it "cut its ties with Fritz Gutmann, who went on to form his own company." By May 1943, despite assurances of protection by "no less a Nazi official than Heinrich Himmler," Fritz Gutmann and his wife Louise "felt threatened enough to buy tickets on a train that they thought would be taking them to safety in Italy…. The train turned out to be destined for the Theresienstadt concentration camp." Fritz Gutmann was "beaten to death with clubs or garroted with wire," while Louise Gutmann was killed in Auschwitz. "Meanwhile, the Gutmanns' property and possessions in the Netherlands were confiscated by the Third Reich."[223]

Simon Goodman learned that his father, Bernard, had "embarked on an effort to reclaim the family's birthright" after the war, but "his endeavors met with rebuffs and dead ends…. His effort to get back the family's Dutch estate was met with stonewalling from bureaucrats in liberated Holland." He unsuccessfully sought to "reclaim the Gutmann clan's artworks, running from Old Masters by Frans Hals and Botticelli to Impressionist masterpieces by Degas and Renoir. The family's peerless silver collection – including an ornate 16th-century clock with depictions from the underworld of classical myth – had also gone missing."[224]

As the Wall Street Journal observed, while the "root of such dispersal and loss was of course the original Nazi looting," it was followed by "all manner of opportunistic theft," including "unscrupulous collectors, the heads of willfully blind institutions and Allied officials who, though responsible for returning stolen property to its rightful owners after the war, directed it elsewhere."[225]

The Swiss bank to which Fritz Gutmann entrusted his accounts must be added to that list of opportunists. In In re Accounts of Fritz Gutmann, in which the Court approved an award of $233,910.34, the claimant advised the CRT that his grandfather, Fritz Gutmann had been a banker for Dresdner Bank in Amsterdam, and that he later had founded his own company, Firma F. B. Gutmann, running it from 1933 until 1942. As later described in Simon Goodman's book and by the Wall Street Journal, the CRT noted that the claimant had "stated that in 1943, his grandparents received permission to emigrate to Italy via Berlin, but when they arrived in Berlin, they were detained and deported to Theresienstadt," where Fritz Gutmann perished.[226] The claimant also provided the CRT with "documents relating to his grandfather's art collection," building a collection" that had "not escaped" notice by Hermann Göring." Shortly after the Nazi occupation of the Netherlands, the CRT was told, "important parts of the collection, which had been stored with an art dealer in Amsterdam, were sold directly to Göring's agents, other works found their way to Germany via a German art dealer; and some pieces, which had been sent to 'safety' in France were found and looted there after the German invasion. Much of the collection was recovered by the Dutch authorities after the War and, after lengthy proceedings, finally was restituted to the Gutmann heirs in 2002."[227]

As to Fritz Gutmann's Swiss accounts, the bank records that remained revealed that he had held a demand deposit account and a custody account, both opened on May 11, 1922. These records did not show the accounts' value, nor their date(s) of closure. But Fritz Gutmann's art collection had been looted or transferred to Nazi agents under duress, and the Gutmanns were killed in concentration camps. Despite the missing information in the bank files, the logical conclusion was that like his art collection, Fritz Gutmann's Swiss accounts, too, were turned over to the Nazis.

The same can be said for the Cassirer family, whose heirs have been mired in a dispute seeking return of the famous Pissarro painting, "Rue Saint-Honoré, Après-midi, Effet de Pluie," held by the Thyssen-Bornemisza Museum in Madrid. [228]

[227] In re Accounts of Fritz Gutmann. The CRT files contain a partial copy of the recommendation of the Dutch Advisory Committee on Assessment of Restitution Applications. The recommendation, issued on March 25, 2002, noted that the committee had "asked itself the question how one should deal with the fact that certain facts can no longer be traced, that certain data have been lost or have not been retrieved, or that for other reasons it is impossible to prove certain facts. With respect to this question the committee holds the opinion that where the difficulties that have arisen are due or partly due to the passing of time, the risk therefor must lie with the government, except for special circumstances." Further, the Committee noted that there were "sufficient indications to warrant the presumption" that many of the Gutmanns' works of art "were sold involuntarily." Interestingly, this 2002 characterization bears a striking similarity to the adverse inference presumption that guided CRT-II since its 2000 inception.

Julius Cassirer, a member of a wealthy and prominent German family[229], and the father of three children – Friedrich (Fritz), Bruno and Elise (Liesel) — purchased the painting in 1900 directly from Pissarro. He left the painting to his son Fritz, a musician and conductor, who was married to Lilly. "Pictures from the 1930s show the beautiful Pissarro painting in the living room of the Cassirers' residence in Munich."[230]

When the Nazis rose to power, Lilly Cassirer, by then a widow remarried to the physician and professor Otto Neubauer, fled Germany by making a "simple swap."[231] She traded the Pissarro for her freedom, and her husband's.[232] "A Nazi-appointed appraiser forced her to sell 'Rue Saint-Honoré, Après-Midi, Effet de Pluie' for 900 Reichsmark — about $360 at the time and much less than its worth. But when the couple fled Munich in 1939, they could not take the funds, which had been paid into a blocked bank account."[233] While the "postwar German government voided the sale, [Lilly Cassirer] Neubauer, a member of the prominent German Jewish Cassirer family of intellectuals, publishers and businessmen, never recovered the Pissarro. It was sold multiple times. In 1993, the Spanish government paid $350 million for the collection of Swiss industrialist and Nazi supporter Baron Hans Heinrich Thyssen-Bornemisza; today, the collection is in the renovated Villahermosa Palace in Madrid, now called the Thyssen-Bornemisza Museum. Among the works in the baron's possession — the second-largest private collection in the world — was the Pissarro."[234]

After several years of unsuccessful negotiations, in 2005, the heirs of Lilly Cassirer sued the Madrid museum, as well as Spain. In 2015, the District Court for the Central District of California ruled in favor of the museum, finding that Spanish law governed the dispute. The law of Spain did not require the museum to turn the painting over to Lilly Cassirer's heirs. The court in that case observed that "[a]though the Foundation [Museum] has now prevailed in this prolonged and bitterly contested litigation, the Court recommends that, before the next phase of litigation commences in the Ninth Circuit, the Foundation pause, reflect, and consider whether it would be appropriate to work towards a mutually-agreeable resolution of this action, in light of Spain's acceptance of the Washington Conference Principles and the Terezin Declaration, and, specifically, its commitment to achieve 'just and fair solutions' for victims of Nazi persecution."[235] As of the date of this Final Report on the Swiss Banks Settlement distribution process, the litigation continues.

The "Washington Conference Principles" referenced by the Court are the December 3, 1998 "Washington Conference Principles on Nazi-Confiscated Art," a declaration endorsed by 44 nations after an international conference in Washington, D.C. The participating nations recognized that if "the pre-War owners of art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted, or their heirs, can be identified, steps should be taken expeditiously to achieve a just and fair resolution, recognizing that this may vary according to the facts and circumstances surrounding a specific case." Washington Conference Principles on Nazi-Confiscated Art ¶ 8, U.S. DEPT. The Declaration calls, among other things, to strengthen and sustain previous efforts, notably those by the Washington Conference to ensure just and fair solutions regarding cultural property, including Judaica which was looted or displaced during or as a result of the Holocaust (Shoah). In regard to Looted Art, the Declaration calls for the recognition that restitution cannot be accomplished without the knowledge of potentially looted art and cultural property. With the Cassirer family in their sights, the Nazis also targeted Lilly's brother-in-law, Bruno – and his Swiss bank account. Bruno Cassirer, who like his brother Fritz and sister Elise, was born in Breslau, was an art dealer and publisher. As described by the CRT in In re Account of Bruno Cassirer, he founded the publishing company Bruno Cassirer Verlag in Berlin. With his wife Else and his children, Bruno Cassirer fled Germany to England in 1938, where he lived until his death in 1941.

The few Swiss bank records that remained and that were made available to the CRT were sparse. These documents showed only that Bruno Cassirer was the account owner, and that his wife Else was the power of attorney holder, of a numbered custody account. The bank records further showed that the Cassirers lived in Berlin. The Volcker Committee auditors were able to determine their street address as Granitzerplatz 1. The account was closed on September 10, 1936. The records did not show who closed the account, or its value. The CRT awarded the account to the claimants, the grandchildren and other heirs of Bruno and Else Cassirer (in the amount of $215,185.95). The CRT explained that Bruno Cassirer had fled Germany in 1938. When the account was closed in 1936, he was still living in Germany and would not have been able to retain ownership of the proceeds, given the Nazis' "campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of the Jewish population." Although the Swiss banks had destroyed the records that would have demonstrated precisely what happened to the account, Bruno Cassirer – like his sister-in-law Lilly,[236] and like so many other victims – were targeted by the Nazis, and their assets were ransacked. It was not likely that the Nazis had missed these victims' Swiss accounts.

[236] Another Cassirer family member, Ernst, a cousin of Julius Cassirer, likewise lost his Swiss bank account. In In re Accounts of Ernst Cassirer, the CRT recounted how the prominent German philosopher Ernst Cassirer was forced to flee Germany in 1933. Ernst Cassirer, who had lectured at the university in Hamburg until 1933, taught first at Oxford in the United Kingdom (1933 to 1935), and then at Göteborg University in Sweden, becoming a Swedish citizen in 1936. He left Europe for the United States in 1941, holding positions at Columbia, and then at Yale, until his death in 1945. The bank records available to the CRT showed that the account owner was Prof. Ernst Cassirer, who resided in Hamburg, Germany, and in Zurich, Switzerland. He held a numbered custody account that was opened on July 31, 1930 and closed on March 18, 1933, as well as a numbered safe deposit box that was opened on March 18, 1933 and closed on August 19, 1936. Because the custody account was closed on the same date that the safe deposit box was opened, the CRT presumed that Ernst Cassirer was able to retrieve the contents of the custody account. However, as to the safe deposit box, although Ernst Cassirer was living in England in 1936 when the account was closed, the CRT presumed that the account owner, like many others, "may have had relatives remaining in his country of origin" – as indeed he did. He "may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts to ensure their safety." The CRT thus awarded Ernst Cassirer's grandchildren the presumptive value of the safe deposit box ($31,379.39).

Similarly, in another case involving a forced transfer, In re Accounts of Arthur Albers, the CRT had an opportunity to revisit the claims of a Nazi victim who had been held in a concentration camp at the time his account was transferred out of the Swiss bank. The account owner had first sought redress in a New York court (the City Court) in 1946, just after the Holocaust, and several decades before the 2000 Settlement Agreement. The lawsuit, Albers v. Credit Suisse, which the Court cited in its 2004 opinion on the banks' behavior, and which was also noted in the CRT Rules,[237] explicitly recognized that Swiss banks should not have complied with Holocaust-era transfer orders that they knew or should have known were made under duress.

According to the City Court decision, in June 1938, one of the Swiss banks in question ("Bank I," as characterized in the CRT's decision) was contacted by a Dr. Fleischmann, a Zurich resident, concerning Mr. Albers' custody account, which held bonds. Dr. Fleischmann advised the bank that the bonds should be delivered only to Mr. Albers in person, since he was imprisoned by the Nazis, his business had been confiscated, and he had been forced to forfeit the remainder of his property to secure his release. The City Court observed that Bank I had made a notation in its records that the account should be blocked, and that any attempt to close the account should be submitted first to Dr. Koellreuter, a bank employee who was in communication with Dr. Fleischmann.

Mr. Albers was imprisoned in Buchenwald from September 1938 until April 1939. While there, he was forced to sign various papers, including a letter in which he directed Bank I to transfer bonds from his account to the account of the Nazi-controlled Österreichische Creditanstalt. The New York City Court decision explained that Mr. Albers signed the letter without knowing its contents, and without being permitted to read it. This letter was then sent on to the Swiss bank (Bank I). After the transfer, Bank I purported to write a letter to Mr. Albers confirming that it had executed his transfer order. The bank, however, did not send this letter to Mr. Albers (whom the bank knew was not likely to receive the letter, given that he was then in Nazi custody). The bank instead kept the letter in its own files.

[237] Albers v. Credit Suisse, 188 Misc. 229, 67 N.Y.S.2d 239 (N.Y. City Ct. 1946), cited in 319 F. Supp. 2d at 308 and in CRT Rules, Article 28(j) n.5.

Bank I's legal department prepared a memorandum, which stated that Mr. Albers' bonds were transferred before Dr. Koellreuter or Dr. Fleischmann had been consulted, and that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds were credited to the Österreichische Creditanstalt's account at Chase City Bank in New York. The memoranda, while noting that Dr. Fleischmann did not hold power of attorney over the account, asserted that Dr. Fleischmann approved the transfer after the fact, but that Dr. Fleischmann subsequently denied having given his approval.

The City Court concluded that Bank I had acted in disregard of its obligations to its customer, Arthur Albers. The letter that Arthur Albers had signed purporting to authorize the transfer was of no validity, considering that Mr. Albers was being held in Buchenwald when he signed it.

> The plaintiff's letter authorizing the transfer was, of course, void considering the circumstances in which it was signed. But if that were all before the defendant [Credit Suisse] it could act upon the letter with impunity; it would be putting too strict an obligation upon it, too onerous a burden, to ask it to go behind every letter of authorization that it received. But if it knew the circumstances in which the letter was written it could not rely upon it without being remiss in the duty it owed the plaintiff; and it did know those circumstances. It knew the general state of affairs in Germany and in the adjacent countries that had been forcibly seized by the German Government. It knew of the destruction of life, of the torture and the confiscation of property visited upon numberless people for no reason other than their religion. It knew that the plaintiff was one of those persons. The letter which it had received in June of 1938 through an intermediary of the plaintiff informed it precisely of the plaintiff's status. It had no communication from the plaintiff, or from anyone acting in his behalf, from June, 1938 until it received the letter of January, 1939.... The fact that it [the bank] made no inquiry concerning his whereabouts or his existence is an indication of its intention to rely only upon the formalism of the letter and to ignore all other circumstances.[238]

When the CRT process commenced, Mr. Albers' grandchildren and great-grandchildren filed claims seeking full restitution of the accounts.

The CRT decision explored some of the same facts that had been cited in the 1946 New York City Court decision, and expanded the analysis with data derived from Swiss bank files that had not been available to the City Court. These bank files indicated that Mr. Albers held a custody account and a demand deposit account at Bank I, as well as two custody accounts and one demand deposit account at a second Swiss bank ("Bank II"). The records from Bank I, including memoranda from Bank I's legal department (from 1942 and 1944), indicated that Mr. Albers opened the custody account on December 29, 1937, into which he deposited 7% Yugoslavian Government 1962 bonds with a nominal value of $5,000.00. The custody account held at Bank I was closed sometime between January 20 and 29, 1939, and the demand deposit account held at Bank I was closed on January 31, 1940.

Bank II's records included documents relating to three surveys of assets the Swiss banks had conducted after the War: (1) the 1945 freeze of assets held in Switzerland by nationals of Germany and the territories incorporated into the Third Reich; (2) the 1959 internal survey of accounts whose owners had had no contact with the respective banks since the 1930s; and (3) the survey of dormant accounts ordered by a Swiss Federal Decree of December 20, 1962 (the "1962 Survey"), which required the registration of assets belonging to foreigners or stateless persons who were victims of racial, religious, or political persecution.[239] Under Article 6 of the CRT Rules, the CRT requested the "voluntary assistance" of Bank II to obtain additional information about the account owner's assets. Bank II subsequently provided the CRT with more documents, including customer cards and a list of accounts dated September 29, 1980.

The additional records provided by Bank II indicated that the bank's last contact with Mr. Albers was sometime before August 31, 1939. These records also showed that more than one bank was involved — not just the first bank discussed in the City Court decision, but the second bank, which held two custody accounts and one demand deposit account owned by Mr. Albers. These records indicated that the custody accounts were closed on May 7, 1938 and February 16, 1939, respectively. The value of the custody accounts on the dates of their respective closures was unknown. The demand deposit account, which was opened on August 8, 1938, was frozen in the 1945 Freeze, at which time it had a balance of 987.50 Swiss Francs ("SF"). The records indicated that the account was unfrozen in June 1955, with a balance of SF 954.50, and that on September 7, 1959 its balance was SF 911.00.

According to Bank II's records, the demand deposit account was considered for the 1962 Survey but was never registered. The records did not indicate why the account was excluded. The most recent balance for the demand deposit account in Bank II's records was SF 801.00 as of December 12, 1963. Bank II's records indicated that the account was closed in 1982, at which time the amount in the account was unknown.

The CRT, through its own research, located a file in the Austrian State Archive pertaining to Mr. Albers, pursuant to a Nazi decree issued in April 1938 requiring all Jews to register their assets (the "1938 Census").[240] The records indicated that Mr. Albers was arrested by the Gestapo on April 21, 1938 and imprisoned in a concentration camp on April 29, 1938. Mr. Albers' Census form was dated August 8, 1938, and signed by Felix Kozar, a Nazi-appointed kommissarischer Verwalter (administrator). These records showed that the Gestapo seized Mr. Albers' assets and liquidated his business. According to Kozar, prior to his imprisonment, Mr. Albers owned real estate worth 228,670.00 Reichsmark ("RM"), business interests worth RM 522,566.39, and miscellaneous assets, including accounts and securities at banks in Vienna, Paris, and Zurich, worth RM 82,503.90.

The 1938 Census records established that Mr. Albers held two custody accounts, one each at Bank I and Bank II. The records indicated that each custody account contained 7% Yugoslavian Government bonds with a nominal value of US $5,000.00. The bonds at each bank carried a market value of RM 5,779.00 as of April 27, 1938 and RM 5,833.00 as of December 31, 1938. These records also indicated that on November 21, 1938, a flight tax (Reichsfluchtsteuer) of RM 218,464.00 was assessed against Mr. Albers.[241] According to a notation in the 1938 Census records, by December 31, 1938, all of Mr. Albers' known foreign securities, except for the Yugoslavian bonds at Bank I and Bank II, had been transferred to the Nazi-controlled Österreichische Creditanstalt in Austria. Finally, the 1938 Census records contained a letter from the Vienna Finance Ministry to another Nazi official, dated May 4, 1939, stating that the Finance Ministry did not object to the emigration of the account owner, his wife, and grandchildren, since the account owner's entire fortune had been confiscated as of October 25, 1938.

[240] By decree of April 26, 1938, the Nazi Regime required all Jews who resided within the Reich, or who were nationals of the Reich, including Austria (as well as Germany), and who held assets above a specified level, to register all assets as of 27 April 1938. The records for the 1938 Census for Austria are currently housed in the Austrian State Archive (Archive of the Republic, Finance). See http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Glossary.aspx ("Austrian Census").

In October 1939, after Arthur Albers had fled Nazi occupation, he informed the bank of his new London address and instructed the bank to sell his bonds. The bank responded that the bonds already had been sold for the benefit of the Creditanstalt. The CRT noted that on "16 December 1939, the account owner, who was reportedly [according to the bank records] astonished to learn that his account had been closed, demanded compensation from [the bank], and ordered his remaining account there, a demand deposit account, to be closed immediately" and the SF 1,000 proceeds to be transferred to Arthur Albers' representative in Zurich. The bank complied with this order.

With respect to Bank I (which had been the subject of the 1946 City Court proceeding), the CRT award recognized that Mr. Albers himself had closed one of his accounts from London, after learning that the bank had transferred a different account to the Creditanstalt. The CRT therefore did not award that account. However, the other account had been turned over to the Nazis, and the CRT award compensated the Albers family for the difference between the amount received as a result of the 1946 City Court lawsuit, and the market value of the bonds actually held at the bank. The three other accounts (located at Bank II), newly revealed through the CRT process (including the "voluntary assistance" mechanism), were awarded as well. Two of those accounts were closed while Arthur Albers had been imprisoned, and so while he was under Nazi [241] The Nazis levied a substantial tax, the so-called "flight tax," upon those able to flee or who were believed to be intending to flee. As described in the BERGIER FINAL REPORT, beginning in 1938, "many special taxes and levies were introduced such as the so-called 'Sühneleistung' (atonement fine) instituted after the pogrom in November 1938 [Kristallnacht] and the Reichsfluchtsteuer (emigration tax), which [was] extended [to be] levied on people who were likely to emigrate. To avoid the high penalties and meet the financial burden, many Jews and others who were persecuted had to withdraw their assets and securities from Switzerland." BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 274.

duress. The third account at Bank II had been closed in 1982, long after Mr. Albers had died, with no record indicating that the accounts had been paid to Mr. Albers' heirs. The CRT awarded this account as well. The total amount awarded was SF 615,884.38 ($500,634.16).[242]

In another example of accounts transferred by Swiss banks to Nazi authorities while the owners clearly were under Nazi duress, the Court approved an award in In re Account of Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG Syndicate ("ÖZAG").[243] The ÖZAG award, totaling approximately $22 million (SF 26,450,993.36) based on the exchange rate prevailing at the time the decision was issued, was the largest award authorized by the Court. In addition to its size and its unique facts (as described by Judge Korman in his 2006 Law Day speech, supra), the award also was noteworthy in that the claimant was Maria Altmann, who went on to prevail against the Austrian government based on a claim for looted art. Following several years of litigation, including proceedings before the United States Supreme Court, Ms. Altmann in 2006 finally was able to reclaim her family's paintings, including the celebrated "Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer" by Gustav Klimt. Her story was recounted in the 2015 film, "Woman in Gold."

The CRT observed that despite the family's extensive efforts to protect its assets, the Swiss bank had ignored its legal and fiduciary commitments. Rather than following its customers' directives, the bank "actively cooperated with the forced sale" of the ÖZAG shares, transferring the bank-held shares to a "designated Nazi 'purchaser' at a small fraction of the shares' value, without obtaining the unanimous consent" of the Altmann family and other shareholders as required under the complex agreement the family had put in place.

Transfers under duress were not limited to the most prominent families with the largest Swiss bank accounts. Rather, the CRT's research demonstrated that victims across a variety of social and geographic spectrums were forced to turn over their assets to the Nazis, with the cooperation of Swiss banks.

[242] Because records concerning the actual account values had been destroyed, the accounts were awarded at their respective presumptive values. For more information concerning the calculation and readjustment of presumptive values, see infra.

[243] The award subsequently was published in a law journal, International Legal Materials. See Claims Resolution Tribunal (CRT) for Swiss Bank Account cases: In re Holocaust Assets Litigation, Case No. CV96-4849, 44 INT'L LEGAL MATERIALS 1307 (2005).

For example, in In re Accounts of Paul Kolisch, Estella Kolisch, and Gertrude Eveline Shapiro, the claimant was the husband of account owner Gertrude Eveline Shapiro and the son-in-law of account owners Paul and Estella Kolisch. Paul Kolisch, who was Jewish, lived in Vienna, where he published several newspapers. After his newspaper publishing business was aryanized and his home was confiscated, Paul Kolisch was imprisoned in the Dachau concentration camp, where he was tortured. He was then sent to Buchenwald, where he was killed in December 1939.

The claimant submitted correspondence between account owner Estella Kolisch (Paul's wife) and the bank. Mrs. Kolisch authorized the bank to transfer her accounts to the Nazis to obtain her husband's release. The bank complied with this request, which was made under duress. A custody account and a demand deposit account were transferred to a Nazi-controlled bank on June 16, 1938. The CRT also found that a second bank had held other Kolisch accounts (a demand deposit account and a safe deposit box), and awarded these accounts as well, presuming that these too had been transferred under duress. The total amount awarded to the claimant for all four accounts (including subsequent adjustments, see infra) was SF 766,811 ($523,297.55).

In In re Accounts of Dr. Robert Blum, the claimant was the grandchild of the account owner. Dr. Blum, who was a Jewish attorney in Germany, was imprisoned several times in the Dachau concentration camp, the last time for three weeks in November 1938. In 1939, Dr. Blum fled from Germany to São Paolo, where he died in September 1941. The bank records included a power of attorney form, signed while Dr. Blum was in Dachau, which gave Dr. Blum's wife the ability to make bank declarations and dispose of the couples' assets. The Volcker Committee auditors themselves concluded when they reviewed this account, well before the CRT process started, that the two accounts held by Dr. Blum were paid to the Nazis. The CRT agreed with this conclusion. Because the bank records did not indicate the amounts transferred, the award was calculated using presumptive values (i.e., average values, based upon data obtained from those accounts that did still have records indicating the amount of assets they had held). The total amount awarded for the two accounts was SF 281,517.50 ($209,755.96).

In In re Account of Leo Fürst, the claimant was the account owner's nephew. The account owner lived in Austria and was the director of a petrol company. He was arrested by the Gestapo several days after the Nazis invaded Austria, and was subsequently imprisoned from March 19, 1938 to May 1938 in the Rossauerlände jail in Vienna. In June 1938, Mr. Fürst fled Austria to Nice, France, where he died on January 20, 1941.

The claimant provided his uncle's death certificate, a 1938 report by the Gestapo on his uncle, and correspondence with the Nazi authorities concerning his uncle's assets and "flight tax." The bank records indicated that Mr. Fürst held a custody account that was closed on March 30, 1939, and a demand deposit account that was closed one day later, on March 31, 1939. The correspondence with Nazi authorities identified an account of unknown type with a May 30, 1938 value of SF 1,318.00. As Mr. Fürst had reported his account of unknown type to the Nazi authorities, the CRT presumed that the Nazis had contacted the bank, which then turned the account over. In addition, since the bank records did not show that the custody and demand deposit accounts were paid to their owner, the owner fled Austria in 1938, and the Nazi authorities were informed that the account owner held at least one Swiss bank account, the CRT concluded that it was plausible that the Nazis had learned about, and the banks had turned over, all of Mr. Fürst's Swiss accounts. The CRT awarded the three accounts at their presumptive values, and the claimant received SF 338,462.50 ($281,633.23).

In In re Accounts of Alfred Wolff, the account owner was the claimant's father. He was a medical doctor in Berlin. He was arrested by the Nazis in 1934, and died on December 13, 1935. The bank records indicated that he had owned a safe deposit box that was closed on May 26, 1934, as well as a demand deposit account closed a few days later on May 31, 1934. The CRT noted that Mr. Wolff had been arrested in 1934, "the same year in which his Swiss account[s] [were] closed, exposing him to the coerced disclosure and confiscation of his assets including those located abroad."[244] The account owner's son was awarded SF 64,597.50 ($49,471.54).

[244] These cases and hundreds of others are summarized in the chapter of this Final Report entitled "Summaries of Selected Deposited Assets Class Decisions." Since the inception of the distribution process, the CRT decisions have been and will remain available on the internet (see http://www.swissbankclaims.com/DepositedAssets.aspx; http://www.crt-ii.org/_awards/index.phtm).

b. Transfers of accounts reported by the banks to the Nazis

i. Bank Lists

In some cases, the CRT had evidence showing that the account had been part of a list that the bank had compiled, in preparation for transferring its customers' assets to Nazi authorities.

Thus, in In re Accounts of Albert Gerngross, Paul Gerngross, Martha Gerngross, and A. Gerngross A.G., the claimant was the estate of the niece of account owner Albert Gerngross. The bank records demonstrated that the depositor's accounts had been reviewed by the bank as early as March 17, 1938, just four days after the Anschluss. The bank stated in an internal notice that it "would soon complete a list of over 1,000 custody accounts belonging to Austrian citizens." The bank records for these accounts also included "a list of custody accounts belonging to customers residing in Austria which were transferred to Austrian or German banks in 1938."

Account Owners Albert and Paul Gerngross were brothers, and account owner Martha Gerngross was married to Paul Gerngross. All of the account owners resided in Vienna. They were shareholders in their business, A. Gerngross A.G., one of the largest department stores in Vienna then, and now.

In 1939, after the Anschluss, Albert Gerngross fled to Switzerland. Martha and Paul Gerngross fled first to England and then to Uruguay, where they remained until returning to Austria after the end of the Second World War. Before fleeing Austria, the account owners were forced to submit census forms registering their assets in accordance with the Nazi Regime's decree of April 26, 1938. These records indicated that Paul and Martha Gerngross had savings and bank assets worth approximately 270,000.00 Reichsmark, including SF 84.61 held in a demand deposit account by Paul Gerngross at the Swiss bank.

The bank's records indicated that the account owners held five accounts. Albert Gerngross held a custody account and a demand deposit account; Paul and Martha Gerngross held one custody account each; and A. Gerngross A.G. held an account of unknown type. Albert Gerngross's custody account was transferred on April 14, 1938 to the Nazi-controlled Öesterreichische Creditanstalt-Wiener Bankverein in Vienna, with a balance of SF 47,000.00. Paul and Martha Gerngross's custody accounts were transferred to the Länderbank Wien A.G. in Vienna on August 16, 1938, with respective balances of SF 16,500.00 and SF 1,900.00. The Volcker Committee auditors determined that the three custody accounts had been paid to the Nazi authorities. The CRT agreed with the auditors' conclusion, and recommended that the accounts be awarded to the claimant.

In addition, the CRT considered Albert Gerngross's demand deposit account and A. Gerngross A.G.'s account of unknown type, which were presumed to have been closed on an unknown date. Given that the account owners had other accounts that were paid to the Nazi authorities, and there was no evidence in the bank's records that the account owners or their heirs had closed these two accounts and received the proceeds themselves, the CRT concluded that it was plausible that the proceeds of these two accounts likewise were not paid to the account owners or their heirs. The 1938 Census records also showed that account owner Paul Gerngross held a demand deposit account not mentioned in the bank's records, and the CRT concluded that this account, too, had been paid to the Nazi authorities. The total amount awarded, after adjustment for present-day values, was SF 1,179,262.70 ($896,775.78).

Similarly, in In re Accounts of Walter Herzog, the bank records included correspondence between its main branch and its Zurich branch, describing preparation of lists of account owners pursuant to the Foreign Assets Law of Austria. The bank decided not only to turn over the account to the Nazis, but to charge the owner for the transfer. As the CRT observed, a bank letter reflected that "the Bank's General Director agree[d] to the Zurich branch's suggestion to charge their clients a transfer fee, in addition to the usual securities charge, of ½% - 1% of the total value of the securities transferred to a German Devisenbank."[245] The claimant was awarded SF 250,375.00 ($170,736.54).

In In re Account of Annemarie Gallia-Boschan, the account owner owned a cognac and beer factory in Vienna, "R. Marty Comp." The family was wealthy, owning a house in Vienna and a summer house on the River Danube.

The bank's records indicated that Annemarie Gallia-Boschan held a custody account in an unknown amount, closed on an unknown date. She also owned two demand deposit accounts, one in the amount of SF 627 as of December 31, 1937, which was closed on October 22, 1938;

[245] See also, e.g., In re Accounts of Georg Müller and Ernst Müller (the bank records consisted of various documents including "a letter from the Bank dated 17 March 1938, describing how it would soon complete a list of over 1,000 custody accounts belonging to Austrian citizens, pursuant to the Foreign Assets Law of Austria;" the Court authorized an award of SF 922,884 ($663,945.32)); In re Account of Robert and Marie Blumka (the bank records consisted of, among other documents, "an excerpt from a list of accounts that were transferred to German or Austrian banks;" the Court authorized an award of SF 281,517.50 ($205,267.10)); and In re Account of Nelly Steiner (referring to the same list; the Court authorized an award of SF 242,375.00 ($152,449.83)).

the other of unknown amount, which was closed on December 14, 1938. The claimants (who were grand-nieces from different branches of the family) provided the CRT with the 1938 Census form Mrs. Gallia-Boschan had been forced to submit, in which she declared that she owned securities at the Swiss bank valued at RM 193,826. Later, Mrs. Gallia-Boschan updated her Census submission with an August 15, 1939 letter to the Vienna Asset office. In that letter, she advised that with some exceptions as listed, she had sold all of the foreign securities at the bank, "'in part voluntarily in the 'Special Securities Sale,' and in part under the orders of the Asset Office in Vienna.'" She stated that as to the securities list of "exceptions," their value as "'per the orders of the Foreign Currency Office (Devisenstelle) in Vienna, [had] been transferred to the account of the Länderbank Wien" held at the Swiss bank. She stated that she held other assets at the bank, the value of which was SF 1,467.50. She also noted that she and her husband had a total wealth of RM 1,321,374.80, and that they had been obliged to pay a "flight tax" of RM 393,911 RM.

The 1938 Census records showed that Mrs. Gallia-Boschan had liquidated her custody account and sold some securities. The proceeds had been transferred to the Nazi-controlled Länderbank Wien in Vienna. Her remaining securities were transferred to the account of the Länderbank Wien at the bank in Switzerland. The CRT noted that the facts of this case were "similar to other cases before the CRT, in which, after the Anschluss, Austrian citizens who are Jewish report their assets to the 1938 Census, and subsequently, their accounts were closed unknown to whom or were transferred to Nazi-controlled banks."[246] The claimant was awarded SF 4,099,120.32 ($3,129,099.48), representing the present value of the accounts as declared on the 1938 Census form (SF 341,593.36).

[246] See also, e.g., In re Account of Gerson Ginsberg; In re Account of Robert Schwarzkopf; and In re Accounts of Salomon Meisels and Albert Meisels (awarding accounts reported in the 1938 Census, where there was no evidence rebutting the presumption that such accounts had been turned over by the Swiss banks to Nazi authorities).

ii. August Dörflinger

Although examples abound of accounts reported to the Nazi authorities by Swiss banks, among the more egregious transfers were those that were assisted by a Swiss bank employee, August Dörflinger.

August Dörflinger was suspected of having betrayed 85 account relationships to Nazi authorities, as set forth in a December 2, 1942 protocol contained in the bank files, entitled "Existing Accounts and Depots" (Bestehende Konti & Depots). The protocol, which was created during a meeting among a prosecutor, a bank representative, policemen, and Dörflinger, indicated that Dörflinger was accused of acting as a spy for the Nazis and violating bank secrecy laws. Swiss authorities charged Dörflinger with reporting 74 account holders to the authorities in Nazi Germany, a charge to which he admitted. Nine additional relationships were suspected of having been betrayed, and an additional two also were suspected of being associated with Dörflinger. The total 1942 value of these 85 accounts was nearly SF 1.6 million, or nearly SF 20 million when adjusted to present-day values (at the multiplier of 12.5).

Thus, for example, in In re Accounts of Samuel Stiebel, the account owner was a Jewish physician living in Germany. He was informed by Nazi authorities in 1933 that he would be arrested if he continued to treat Communists and Jews. With his family, he managed to flee first to Switzerland and then to Palestine. The CRT explained:

> [The bank records contain] excerpts from the transcript of the interrogation of a Bank employee, August Dörflinger, conducted by the State Prosecutor of Basel on 2 December 1942, and a letter dated 15 February 1950 to the Bank written by August Dörflinger while he was in prison.
> August Dörflinger, a convicted German spy, reported two of the Account Owner's accounts to the Nazi authorities. This document shows that as of 2 December 1942, the Account Owner held a demand deposit account with a balance of 1,240.00 Swiss Francs, and a savings account, numbered 50352, with a balance of 734.00 Swiss Francs, and that the Account Owner's accounts were … closed after having been reported to the Nazis. The [ICEP auditors] determined that these accounts had been paid to the Nazi authorities as they had been reported to the Nazis by an employee of the Bank.

As the CRT explained in the Stiebel decision, it was "noted in a Department of State Report [the May 1997 Eizenstat Report][247] … [that] 'as U.S. officials received reports that in the early 1930s the Germans had placed French-speaking Nazis in leading Swiss banks, they grew increasingly concerned that Nazi elements may have infiltrated the Swiss banking system.' The Nazi Germans were even so brazen as to take out newspaper ads offering rewards to those who came forward with information on Jewish depositors." The claimant in this case received an award of SF 96,887.50 ($79,125.89).

Similarly, in In re Accounts of Felix David, the account owner owned a hardware store in Breslau, Germany (now Wrocław, Poland), and later moved to Berlin. He and other family members were forced to perform slave labor in Berlin. They later were transported to Theresienstadt, where they perished. The bank records indicated that August Dörflinger reported Mr. David's three accounts (two demand deposit accounts and one custody account) to Nazi authorities prior to December 1942. The bank records indicated that the custody account had a value of SF 48,000 as of December 1942, and the two demand accounts had a combined value of SF 660.05 as of that same date. The accounts were blocked in the 1945 freeze. The custody account was closed on October 15, 1959, one demand deposit account was closed on January 31, 1960, and the other demand deposit account was closed on an unknown date. The claimant, the wife of Mr. David's nephew, received SF 657,425.00 ($509,832.95).[248]

In 1942, the State Prosecutor of Basel investigated and prosecuted Dörflinger for his crimes, as his breach of banking secrecy was flagrant, and his arrest was made possible partly [248] Other examples of awards of accounts that had been reported by the spy Dörflinger include In re Accounts of Marcus Manasse (account owner was a physician from Berlin who held a demand deposit account transferred in 1974 to a suspense account, and an account of unknown type included on the list of 85 accounts reported by Dörflinger; Court authorized an award of SF 81,270.00 ($54,912.16); In re Account of Alfred M. Schwarzschild (Alfred Schwarzschild, an artist born in Frankfurt who later lived in Munich, had difficulty selling his art beginning in 1933 and fled to England in 1936, his wife and children following him in 1938. His account appeared on the Dörflinger list, which indicated that as of December 2, 1942, the account held a balance of SF 2,943.50; Court authorized an award of SF 49,375.00 ($40,568.85)); and In re Account of Charlotte Amsterdam (Mrs. Amsterdam's husband had been a high-ranking bank executive and the Amsterdams were believed by the claimant, their nephew, to have perished in the Warsaw Ghetto; Charlotte Amsterdam's account of unknown type was reported by Dörflinger to Nazi authorities; claimants received an award of SF 49,375.00 ($41,843.22)).

with the help of other Swiss bank personnel. In September 1943, a Swiss military court sentenced Dörflinger to life imprisonment for economic and military espionage, including for disclosing details of 74 Swiss accounts, and for passing on military secrets.[249]

Although the Swiss banks cooperated with Dörflinger's prosecution in the 1940s, they were less forthcoming several decades later, when the CRT sought a more complete record of the spy's activities. As described by the CRT, although asked to do so, the banks did not provide the CRT with "the full text of the Dörflinger interrogation or the list of the other 82 Account Owners who apparently incurred the same deposit confiscations as suffered by the Account Owner in this case as a result of the information provided to Nazi authorities by Dörflinger." A "full accounting by the banks of the role played by spies, the names of the persons who they identified, and their impact on the accounts of Nazi victims, would [have been] of very substantial value to the CRT in fulfilling its mandate to return the deposits in Swiss banks to these victims or their heirs."[250] Nevertheless, "Swiss banking authorities [did] not provide[] the CRT with the full 'Dörflinger list'" but instead provided information only in response to particular claims. "Of course, without publication of [the unclaimed] account names and full access to bank records, it [was] difficult for a victim or heir to file a claim, and it [was] difficult for the CRT to pay it."[251]

c. Transfers presumed to have been made under duress

Because of the patterns revealed by the Volcker and Bergier Reports, as well as in many of the account files made available to the CRT, the CRT concluded that it was appropriate to presume that an account owner was acting under duress even if, at the time of the transfer, he or she appeared to have been living "in safety" outside the territory controlled by Nazi authorities. The CRT reasoned and the Court concurred that because looting was so rampant and took so many forms, the account owner may have been responding to Nazi threats made against other family members (or assets) still under Nazi control.

Thus, in In re Accounts of Emil Taub, the CRT observed that although the accounts were closed when Emil Taub was outside Nazi territory, there was no indication in the bank records as to whom the accounts were closed. The CRT noted that the account owner may have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over accounts to ensure the safety of relatives who remained behind. Further, the 1938 Census records "indicate[d] that the Nazi authorities blocked the proceeds of the sale of the Account Owner's house" and "inquired regarding any remaining assets that he held following his flight to Palestine." Swiss bank accounts owned by Mr. Taub may have been among these assets. The claimant received an award of SF 271,125.00 ($230,228.52).

Similarly, in In re Accounts of Otto Simon and Josef Simon, the claimant sought the accounts of her father (Dr. Josef Simon), an attorney and director of the Anker Versicherung insurance company in Vienna, and her grandfather (Otto Simon), a professor of mathematics. The claimant's father was arrested and imprisoned for "allegedly conducting activities for the then illegal Social Democratic Party" in 1937, and he fled from Austria to Denmark that same year. Her father acquired Danish visas for his parents and other relatives, and they fled Austria in the autumn of 1938.

The bank records showed that Professor Otto Simon held one custody account and one demand deposit account, which were closed on March 31, 1938. The CRT also located 1938 Census records filed by Professor Simon. Dr. Josef Simon held a custody account which was opened on April 2, 1938 (at an address "care of Pastor Th. Povlsen, in Holte," Denmark). The account was closed on May 9, 1938. The CRT awarded all of the accounts to the claimant. As to her grandfather's accounts, these were closed after the Anschluss, while Professor Simon was still living in Vienna, at a time when the Nazis had "begun a major effort to confiscate the assets of the Jewish population of Austria." As to her father's account, it was closed when the owner was "outside Nazi-dominated territory," but "given that the Bank's records do not indicate to whom the account was closed, that Account Owner Josef Simon fled his country of origin due to Nazi persecution, that [he] may have had relatives remaining in his country of origin and that he may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts to ensure their safety, that [he] and his heirs would not have been able to obtain information about his account after the Second World War from the Bank, even for the stated purpose of obtaining indemnification from the German authorities, due to the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries by account owners because of the banks' concern regarding double liability, … the CRT conclude[d] that it is plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to Account Owner Josef Simon." The claimant, with other family members, was awarded SF 549,462.50 ($438,203.45).[252]

In cases where there was no direct evidence that the account owner was under duress, but the circumstances indicated that the owner had never received his or her accounts — for example, because he or she had perished in the Holocaust — the adverse inference similarly applied, and the CRT recommended an award.

Thus, in In re Accounts of Rose Herz, Margarethe Cohen and Max Seeler-Herrmann, the claimant was the daughter of account owner Rose Herz, who was the sister of account owner Max Seeler-Herrmann. Account owner Margarethe Cohen was the niece of Rose Herz and Max Seeler-Herrmann. In 1938, Rose Herz fled Germany for Palestine, where she died on September 22, 1970 (in Haifa, Israel). Account owner Max Seeler-Herrmann resided in Berlin, where he owned a company named Seeler & Cohn. In 1938, Max Seeler-Herrmann and his wife were deported. They perished in the Holocaust. Margarethe Cohen resided in Germany, but managed to survive the Holocaust and died in the 1980s.

The bank's records indicated that the account owners held four accounts. Each owner held a custody account, and Rose Herz also owned an account of unknown type. Rose Herz's custody account was opened in 1931 and closed on September 16, 1937, and her account of unknown type was closed on an unknown date. Max Seeler-Herrmann's custody account was closed on September 16, 1937. Margarethe Cohen's custody account was opened in 1931 and closed on June 26, 1936.

With respect to the three custody accounts, the CRT noted that in 1933, the Nazi regime embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of its Jewish nationals through the enforcement of flight tax and other confiscatory measures, including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks. Rose Herz had remained in Germany until 1938, while her custody account was closed in 1937. There was no evidence that she or an authorized party received the proceeds of either her custody account or her account of unknown type. Account owner Max Seeler-Herrmann remained in Germany until being deported. He subsequently was murdered. Margarethe Cohen remained in Germany throughout the War. The CRT concluded that the account owners would not have been able to repatriate their accounts to Germany during this time without confiscation of the account proceeds by the Nazis. The claimant was awarded SF 809,025.00 ($636,100.40) for the four accounts.

The CRT awarded a demand deposit account (closed on April 20, 1934) and a custody account (closed on December 21, 1936), finding that although both accounts were closed when the claimant was outside Nazi-occupied territory, the claimant's family nevertheless had fled from Germany and may have had relatives who remained behind. "[H]er parents may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over [her] accounts to ensure their safety").

Similarly, in In re Account of Kurt Alexander, the claimant identified the account owner as his brother, who had lived in Berlin and had been killed in Auschwitz with most members of the family. The bank records indicated that Kurt Alexander of Berlin had owned a demand deposit account opened on June 30, 1933 and closed on June 20, 1936. The CRT awarded the presumptive (average) value of a demand deposit account (SF 28,712.50 ($25,505.83)), observing that "after coming to power in 1933, the Nazi regime" had "embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of the Jewish population through the enforcement of discriminatory tax — and other confiscatory measures, including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks; … there is no evidence that the Account Owner fled Germany prior to his death in a concentration camp." He "would not have been able to repatriate his account to Germany without losing ultimate control over its proceeds."[253]

d. Refugee Accounts

Forced transfers took a unique form in the case of refugees. As the Swiss historian Jacques Picard has noted, those who were accepted into Switzerland as refugees often were asked to turn over assets to pay for their upkeep. "Since refugees in Switzerland were subject to a general employment prohibition and the transfer of funds from abroad was extremely difficult, they could support themselves only if they had assets in Switzerland. The short-term residence [253] See also, e.g., In re Account of Otto Rothschild (account was closed in 1933; account owner, a German cattle dealer, perished in Auschwitz; award of SF 75,150.00 ($63,444.12)); In re Account of David Geschmay (account was closed in 1934; account owner, a Czech manufacturer who also held German citizenship, perished in Theresienstadt; award of SF 37,575.00 ($30,545.38)).

permits for refugees entering Switzerland during the 1930s which were issued by cantonal authorities often demanded collateral and pledges of payment."[254]

Confiscations by Swiss authorities continued pursuant to a March 12, 1943 decree of the Swiss Federal Council providing that assets of refugees who entered the country after August 1, 1942 were to be placed in a Swiss bank and managed by Swiss police authorities. These funds were not always returned. As the Bergier Final Report observed:

> Even before this date, however, asylum seekers had been forced to hand over their assets, with dubious legal justification; in this sense, the Decree of March 1943 provided a legal basis for a procedure which was already being carried out in practice, but at the same time had proved to be problematic. On the one hand, confiscated assets disappeared, and on the other it can be shown from a list drawn up by the territorial command in Geneva, that in at least ten cases refugees whose modest assets had been confiscated in the reception camp were subsequently deported without their money having been handed back to them.
>
> The official management scheme involved cash, which was deposited on current accounts, as well as valuables, for which deposit facilities were created. At the end of September 1943, the SVB [Swiss Volksbank] was already managing as many as 2,500 accounts containing an estimated total amount of 800,000 francs, as well as 800 deposit facilities. By December 1944, the number of accounts had increased considerably: there were "around 7,300 accounts [and] approximately 2,100 deposit facilities" as well as 250 accounts in frozen dollars...
>
> As a rule refugees were handed back their assets upon leaving Switzerland. It must be said, however, that in the meantime most of the balances had decreased considerably. Apart from the repayment for their keep, this can also be explained by the high administrative fees levied by the bank. In addition, the authorities had exonerated the bank from paying the refugees interest on their current accounts. A particularly severe measure from the refugees' point of view was that the Police

> Division was authorised to sell pieces of confiscated jewellery [sic] if necessary (including even family heirlooms) without obtaining the owner's permission.[255]

The CRT case of In re Accounts of Mario Calfon exemplifies the findings of the Bergier Commission. In Calfon, the claimant's father, the account owner, was in the jewelry and weaving industries in Milan. Mario Calfon and his wife and one daughter escaped to Switzerland in 1943, while two other daughters went into hiding in Italy. While in Switzerland, Mario Calfon's jewelry was confiscated by Swiss authorities pursuant to the March 12, 1943 decree of the Swiss Federal Council providing that assets of refugees who entered the country after August 1, 1942 were to be placed in a Swiss bank and managed by Swiss police authorities. Mario Calfon was forced to work in refugee camps near Lugano, and he and his wife were hospitalized while in Switzerland.

The bank records, which were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were provided to the CRT by the claimant, included a letter from the chief of the Police Division to the management of the refugee camp "Majestic," with a copy to the bank. The letter instructed the camp's managers to order Mario Calfon to sell assets in his custody account to cover the sum of SF 539.17, which Mrs. Calfon had incurred because of her hospitalization in early 1944. Mario Calfon wrote to the bank requesting that the gold jewelry in his account not be sold. Although the bank initially granted that request, it later demanded that Mr. Calfon sell his jewelry to pay off his debt. Instead, Mr. Calfon was able to reach an agreement on October 3, 1944 whereby another individual acted as his guarantor in the event that the debt was not repaid within one year. On October 4, 1944, the Police Division sent an invoice to Mario Calfon debiting his demand deposit account for his cost of living at the refugee camps (SF 1,289.50) as well as his wife's hospitalization costs (SF 202.20). On October 13, 1944, the Police Division informed Mario Calfon that another SF 50 was debited as a fee for searching for his children, while SF 100 was blocked to cover additional costs that might arise.

Mario Calfon wrote several additional letters between 1945 and 1957, after he had returned to Florence. He repeatedly raised the matter of his deposited jewelry, and objected to the fact that he had been charged for his cost of living at the refugee camps, while not being reimbursed for the work he had performed there. He also noted that the medical expenses incurred in Switzerland were caused by forced labor in the refugee camps.

Although the bank informed the Police Division by letter of March 11, 1947 that it had returned Mario Calfon's assets to him and had closed his custody account, the bank records indicated that these assets were not, in fact, returned. Rather, they were used to cover the debt allegedly owed by Mario Calfon, despite his express instructions to the bank not to dispose of the gold jewelry. The records show that the custody account was closed sometime before March 11, 1947 and do not show the fate of the jewelry deposited in this account, but the jewelry was not in the account, nor had it been returned. As to the demand deposit account, the bank records do not indicate when the account was closed.

The CRT awarded Mario Calfon's daughter the presumptive value of the custody and demand deposit accounts (SF 289,087.50 ($238,915.29)), observing that the bank's assessment of the value of the jewelry in the custody account was not reliable. The CRT noted that Mario Calfon, as true for other refugees in Switzerland "whose assets were placed in accounts at the bank by the Swiss authorities generally could not freely dispose over their accounts." A "number of refugee accounts could not be retrieved by account owners" and "complaints of refugees mostly concerned the fact that their deposit assets were not returned."

Similarly, in In re Account of Minia Nussenbaum, the claimant, who was herself the account owner, was interned in slave labor camps in France and, subsequently, in a refugee camp in Charmilles, Switzerland. Upon her arrival at the camp, her money (2,650 French Francs) was confiscated and deposited by Swiss authorities at the bank. Records from 1998 indicate that the bank responded to Minia Nussenbaum's request to search for her accounts by explaining that her French Francs had been converted to SF 41.05, from which SF 15.20 was deducted for "pocket money," SF 3.45 was deducted for bank fees, and the remaining SF 22.50 was transferred to the refugee camp. The bank stated that it had no further obligations to the owner as of 1944. The CRT decision noted that her "transfer certificate from the refugee camp … does not show any payments to [her] and was not countersigned by the Bank," and "owners of refugee accounts generally could not freely dispose over their accounts." Nor was there evidence that the owner had been able to retrieve the accounts after the war. Minia Nussenbaum thus received a CRT award of SF 49,375.00 ($45,717.59).

2. Use of Early Occupation and Alliance Dates

In addition to authorizing the CRT to presume that records were destroyed to conceal the banks' participation in forced transfers, the Court also permitted the CRT to presume that such transfers commenced at the earliest historically appropriate date, whether the date of Hitler's accession on January 30, 1933 (in the case of Germany); Italy's 1936 alliance with Germany; Austria's 1938 incorporation into the Third Reich (the Anschluss); or various other dates applicable to the particular countries.

Thus, with respect to Germany, by Order of April 25, 2003, the Court adopted "Appendix C" to the CRT Rules, which incorporated the presumption that "in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it shall be presumed by CRT-II that German account owners and their heirs did not receive the benefit of any of their Swiss accounts closed on or after January 30, 1933."

> This decision at the outset of the claims process in 2003, recognizing that in Germany, the Holocaust began as soon as Hitler took power in January 1933, essentially anticipated two 2016 federal statutes concerning the date upon which Holocaust confiscations in Germany began. As the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia pointed out in a July 10, 2018 decision, Philipp v. Federal Republic of Germany and Stiftung Preussischer Kulturbesitz: "[I]n two statutes dealing with Nazi-era art-looting claims, Congress has expressly found that the Holocaust began in 1933. In the first statute – the very section of the FSIA [Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act] at issue here – Congress provided jurisdictional immunity for certain art exhibition activities, 28 U.S.C. § 1605(h), but created an exception for art taken during the 'Nazi[] era,' defined as beginning in January 1933, id. § 1605(h)(2)(A)."[256] The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia was here referring to the Foreign Cultural Exchange Jurisdictional Immunity Clarification Act of December 16, 2016. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia noted that in the second statute, the HEAR Act (the Holocaust Expropriated Art Recovery Act of 2016), "Congress again defined January 1933 as the beginning of the Nazi era [citation omitted]."[257]

Appendix C was based upon the CRT's study of the Bergier Final Report and its companion study on dormant accounts,[258] which "clarified that Nazi expropriation of the Swiss bank accounts of Jewish and other targets of Nazi persecution commenced as early as 1933, shortly after Hitler's rise to power. The Bergier Commission further reported that Swiss banking practices enabled these expropriations to occur."

Appendix C also noted that the CRT's observations from its own analysis of bank records and claims had indicated a "dramatic increase in [account] closure[s] following the enactment of the Law on Treason against the German Economy on 12 June 1933." The Bergier Commission pointed out that the Law on Treason had forced "'very many German customers [to give] Swiss banks instructions to turn over their accounts and securities to the Reichsbank.'"[259] As of April 2003, when the Court adopted Appendix C, the CRT had "identified 1,583 accounts of German account owners closed between 1933 and 1936 that may match to the names of account owners set forth on claim forms. Of these, some 830, or 52.4%, were closed in 1933." There was a "dramatic increase in closure following the enactment of the Law on Treason against the German Economy on 12 June 1933."[260] In February 1933, 37 accounts were closed; 43 were closed in March; 38 in April; 61 in May; 32 from June 1-11 (i.e. just before the Law on Treason was enacted); and 82 from June 12-30. However, in the weeks after the June 12, 1933 law was enacted, closures increased, with 117 in July and 162 in August. The closures then dropped down again, to 70 in September; 58 in October; 68 in November; and 62 in December.[261]

The CRT also examined all 1,243 accounts in the AHD closed in 1933 (whether those accounts matched to claims or not). The same pattern appeared. In the first few months of 1933, account closures ranged from 48 (February) through 83 (May). In July, however, 182 accounts were closed; 252 in August; and 111 in September. In other words, as noted in Appendix C, the number of accounts closed in the "four and one-half months after June 12" increased by 257.2 percent over account closures in 1933 up to that date.

In sum, "[o]f the 1,243 total German-domiciled accounts identified in the AHD as having been closed in 1933, 946, or 76.1 percent, were closed after June 12, 1933," while for the "830 matched accounts closed in 1933, 619, or 74.6 percent, were closed after June 12," evidencing that the closures were related to the Nazi regime's enactment of its harsh expropriation law.

In addition, as noted by the Bergier Commission and discussed in Appendix C, German-instigated spying in Swiss banks had begun as early as 1931, "[i]mmediately after the introduction of foreign exchange controls," with German "financial and customs authorities" attempting "through bank espionage in Switzerland" to "obtain information about German clients."[262]

There are a number of examples of the forced transfer of Swiss accounts as early as 1933, some cited in Appendix C, and others discovered later during the claims process. These include the cases of In re Account of Auguste and Aaron Levis (the bank records contained a July 28, 1933 letter from one of the account owners asking for her safe deposit box to be closed because she was being forced to transfer the contents to the Reichsbank; an award was made in the amount of SF 290,830.00($216,980.51)); In re Account of Hedwig Bendix (the owner held four accounts, one of which was closed on September 20, 1934; the bank records revealed that some of the owner's assets had been transferred to the Reichsbank, and the owner was killed in Lodz; an award was made of SF 183,780.00 ($132,215.83)); and In re Account of Karl Stein (the bank records showed that the account owner's savings/passbook account was on a list of Swiss bank accounts transferred to the German Government's account at the Reichsbank; the list was "three pages long" and indicated that as of December 8, 1933, assets totaling SF 195,900.75 had been transferred to the Reichsbank, including Mr. Stein's account; an award was made of SF 27,855.00 ($20,039.57)).

[262] Id. at 6 (quoting Bergier Dormant Accounts Study at 105-126). The Volcker Committee had noted the same phenomenon. "In 1932, advertisements appeared in a Swiss newspaper offering loans to Swiss bank employees; they were part of a scheme to purchase information from the employees regarding the names of Germans who held accounts in Swiss banks in exchange for a commission based on the total account value. One employee of a large commercial bank, who was arrested with the bank's assistance, was convicted by Swiss authorities for espionage activities, in part, for providing account details of Germans owning Swiss bank accounts to the Nazis. At the time of his arrest, funds from 10 of the 74 accounts that he had disclosed to the Nazis had already been transferred to Germany." VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 5, ¶ 23. The CRT awarded several accounts that had been reported by this bank spy, August Dörflinger.

Appendix C noted that expropriations continued throughout the 1930s, prior to the Anschluss and the September 1, 1939 start of World War II. One notable example of how expropriation became institutionalized was the Seventh Implementation Order to the Law of Foreign Exchange Control of November 19, 1936. The law required German owners of foreign securities to deposit their securities with a German bank. The original deadline for such transfers was December 4, 1936. Swiss bank correspondence dated February 16, 1937 indicated that in the period between the effective date (November 19, 1936) through January 31, 1937, securities from 291 customer custody accounts in the amount of SF 6,266,7609 were transferred to various banks in Germany.[263]

The determination not to penalize claimants for the banks' document destruction was not, however, intended to ignore historical realities. When it became clear that in some instances, the CRT had been applying too early an "occupation," or "relevant date," the CRT recommended and the Court approved an adjustment of the claims processing rules — an example of the application of liberal but historically valid presumptions.

Thus, Article 28 of the CRT Rules originally had provided that an account would be presumed to have been closed inappropriately, absent evidence to the contrary, if the date of closure was after "'the imposition of Swiss visa requirements on January 20, 1939.'"[264] It was understood at the inception of the claims process that Switzerland's tightening of its entry laws — which had a significant impact upon those seeking refugee status (as discussed in the chapter of this Final Report regarding the Refugee Class) — also had restricted the ability of depositors to access their accounts. However, after her appointment as CRT Special Master, Dr. Helen Junz pointed out that "the imposition of additional Swiss visa requirements on 'emigrants' on January 20, 1939 [was] not relevant to whether it may be presumed that an owner did, or did not, receive the proceeds of his or her account…. '[T]hough in certain circumstances entry even for short-term stays may have been impeded at times, this does not mean that thereby access to, and full management of, assets held in Swiss banks by account owners who were Nazi persecutees was circumscribed. This was so because such management did not require the physical presence of the account owner in Switzerland.'"[265]

Instead, there were "various means by which, prior to the date upon which the account owner's country was occupied by or allied with Nazi Germany, the owner could have accessed his or her account." If he or she was not a resident of the Reich, he or she "could have traveled to Switzerland under restrictions that were not notably different from those already in effect prior to the imposition of additional visa requirements on January 20, 1939." If unwilling or unable to enter Switzerland, the account owner could have used a courier, mail, telephone, wire or a third person. There also were other "'more sophisticated means to furnish and then manage their accounts from a distance, so that physical presence was not necessary and difficulty of entry does not come into play;'" for example, "'over/under invoicing.'" While in many instances, the account owner may have perished in the Holocaust, his or her "ultimately tragic fate once his/her country fell under the sway of the Reich does not mean that he or she could not have accessed the account before that time."[266]

Based upon Dr. Junz's analysis, the Court reconsidered the Swiss visa issue. Summarizing the rationale underlying the various claims processing rules, the Court observed that the "purpose of Article 28 [of the CRT Rules] is to provide the CRT with general guidelines to help streamline the processing of claims, particularly where crucial documentation has been destroyed. Specifically, Article 28 is intended to offer guidance to the CRT in analyzing claims to accounts for which enough documentation remains to show that the account existed during the Holocaust era, but the documents that would demonstrate whether the owner received the proceeds have been destroyed. I already have explained that under these circumstances, and absent other evidence to the contrary — a proviso also included in Article 28 — it is appropriate to draw an adverse inference in favor of the claimant, who should not be held responsible for the banks' destruction of documentation. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Lit[ig]., 319 F. Supp. 2d 301 (E.D.N.Y. 2004). As Article 28 makes clear, one important element in determining whether the adverse inference applies or, instead, whether there is evidence to the contrary, is the date upon which the account was closed."[267]

As factually supported by information analyzed during the claims process, it was clear that Swiss visa requirements did not interfere with an account owner's ability to access his or her property from outside that country. This constituted "evidence to the contrary," such that the adverse inference presumption should not normally apply in such cases. Article 28 of the CRT Rules thus was amended. The account would be presumed to have been closed improperly, where, among other factors:

> the account was closed and the Account records show evidence of persecution, or the Account was closed after the date of occupation by or incorporation into the Reich or the date of alliance with the Reich of the country of residence of the Account Owner or Beneficial Owner, and before 1945 or the year in which the Swiss authorities' freeze of Accounts from the country of residence of the Account Owner or Beneficial Owner was lifted (whichever is later)."[268]

The Court authorized the CRT to adopt the following dates of occupation, incorporation or alliance "to establish deemed dates of loss of control over financial assets":

[267] Id. at 8.

[268] *Id.*at 9 (citing and amending CRT Rules, Article 28(a), and noting that the remainder of Article 28 was unchanged). Judge Korman referred to Special Master Junz's observation that the amendment "formalize[d] the policy that ha[d] been in place for several years," and while it was "an unfortunate oversight that Article 28 was not previously amended to eliminate the reference to Swiss visa requirements," there had been no "practical impact upon the claims process." It was "extremely unlikely that any claimant has modified or limited the information he or she provided to the CRT… because of Article 28's inclusion of a reference to Swiss visa requirements. It is also extremely unlikely that the CRT did not seek to amplify such information if it appeared to be incomplete and/or insufficient to perform the exhaustive analysis underlying any decision regarding proper closure of an account by the account owner, and thus whether or not the account is awardable under the Settlement Agreement." In an abundance of caution, however, Judge Korman "instructed the CRT to re-examine the 33 or so decisions that I have been made aware as having been issued to date in which accounts were denied because they were closed prior to the date upon which the owner's country of residence was occupied by or entered into an alliance with Nazi Germany, but on or after the imposition of additional Swiss visa requirements on 'emigrants' on January 20, 1939." Id. at 9-11.

Chief among them was that transactions after 1933 were presumed to have been involuntary. This is the concept of Entziehungsvermutung, or the presumption of confiscation, which meant that any sale between 1933 and 1945 was considered to be of dubious validity").

A different Holocaust compensation program, the ICHEIC process for insurance claims, utilized somewhat later dates than did the CRT. According to Schedule 1 of ICHEIC's "Holocaust Era Insurance Claims Processing Guide, First Edition - June 22, 2003," in Germany, payments to blocked accounts were presumed to have taken place during the period 1933-1939, but the date upon which ICHEIC presumed that insurance proceeds were confiscated was not until 1940. This was seven years after the CRT's presumed confiscation date of 1933.

[270] For Italy: See, e.g., In re Account of Natan Fraenkel ("The CRT notes that Italy formed an alliance with Germany on 25 October 1936, and therefore it is considered that from this date there existed the possibility of oppression. By contrast, ICHEIC presumed that confiscations in Italy began in 1943.

The latter date was "before the annexation of the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia by Nazi Germany in September 1938," and therefore the CRT presumed that the account owner "had access to the account until the date of its closure and received the proceeds of this account herself").

[273] For Czechoslovakia (Bohemia and Moravia): See, e.g., In re Account of Gallus & Wolf (the account owner was a Prague company aryanized in February 1941 and whose owner was deported to Theresienstadt and later perished in Majdanek. The company's Swiss account, of unknown type, had existed as of at least March 25, 1939, "which is ten days after the 15 March 1939 Nazi invasion of Czechoslovakia," and the "Decree of 21 June 1939 on Jewish Assets issued by the German Reich's Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia would have obliged the owner of the Account Owner to register all foreign assets, including the account at issue here").

3. Post-War Agreements Between Switzerland and Communist Countries

Although Nazi Germany ceased to exist after the War, the defeat of the Third Reich did not mean that depositors' accounts held in Swiss banks were returned to them. There was a particularly telling example of the ease with which "banking secrecy" could be breached when convenient: the post-war deals negotiated between the Swiss and Polish governments, and later with Hungary, in which dormant accounts belonging to Holocaust victims were turned over to the Communist governments. The historian Gerhard Weinberg in his congressional testimony noted how these arrangements had attracted little, if any, attention. Thus, for example, the New York Times did report on one of the deals, but only on page 26 of the newspaper. Although Jewish groups protested the arrangement, their objections failed to derail the plan.[281]

279 For Bulgaria: See, e.g., USHMM, Axis Alliance (Bulgaria initially "resist[ed] German pressure," but after Germany "offered Greek territory in Thrace and exempted it from participation in the invasion of the Soviet Union, Bulgaria joined the Axis on March 1, 1941").

280 For Yugoslavia: See, e.g., USHMM, Axis Alliance ("When the Germans agreed to settle for Yugoslav neutrality in the war against Greece, without demanding transit rights for Axis troops, Yugoslavia reluctantly joined the Axis on March 25, 1941").

281 As described in the December 7, 1949 edition of the New York Times: "The Swiss Government has agreed to turn over to the Polish Government funds placed in Swiss banks and other institutions by Polish Jews who died heirless during World War II. The agreement, the implementation of which is being strongly objected to by international Jewish organizations and the Swiss Jewish community, is contained in letters exchanged June 25, 1949, when the Polish-Swiss trade agreement was signed…. In objecting to the Swiss decision, to give the heirless property of Polish victims of Nazi concentration camps to the Polish Government, Jewish organizations cite the Allied declaration of June, 1946, that such property should go to an international body (the International Refugee Organization, which was then in the planning stage) for use in resettling refugees belonging to groups to which dead owners had belonged…. The Jewish groups fear that a precedent will be set by the Polish agreement that will apply to all heirless property in Switzerland. They also have told Swiss authorities that turning over heirless property to a Communist Government does nothing to enhance the country's carefully nurtured reputation as a safe haven for capital of all kinds. The Swiss say the only precedent involved is that under the Polish agreement instead of the automatic application of the law of 1891. The Swiss will permit claims to be filed up to five years from ratification of the agreement by persons claiming to be heirs. This, the Swiss maintain, gives Jewish organizations more than they would normally get under Swiss law. The upshot is that if the Swiss Parliament ratifies the accord [which it did], the funds, whatever their size, will be used to settle claims of Swiss owners of property nationalized in Poland instead of for the benefit of refugees under care of the International Refugee Organization." Michael L. Hoffman, Swiss Will Turn Over to Warsaw Property of Heirless Polish Jews, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 7, 1949, at 26.

In the view of the Bergier Commission, the "'primary aim of [these deals] was to favour Swiss interests in the wake of nationalisation of assets in Poland and Hungary.'" However, as the Court noted in its opinion on the banks' behavior, the "Bergier Commission was conservative when it wrote that this was 'the primary aim' of the deals. What actually happened was that money was taken from dormant accounts of murdered Polish and Hungarian citizens and transferred to Swiss citizens to ameliorate the claims these citizens were raising against the Polish and Hungarian governments after their assets had been nationalized…. What is most striking about these secret agreements is that, as the Bergier Commission pointed out, '[s]urprisingly, it was now apparently possible to conduct an internal investigation so that a list of dormant accounts relating to these countries could be drawn up.' Indeed, '[n]either private property rights nor banking secrecy had been a barrier to the release of these assets.'"[282]

These accounts were the subject of post-settlement litigation. As a result of this litigation, the banks agreed to permit the CRT in 2005 to publish certain Polish and Hungarian accounts that, decades earlier, had been published but not widely disseminated by the then-Communist governments of Poland and Hungary. The CRT was able to recommend a number of awards in connection with these accounts, as well as for accounts that had been turned over to Romania under similar arrangements.

a. Poland

One example of the Swiss-Polish agreement is the case of In re Account of Oswei Epstein. Records of the account were not available in the Swiss bank files provided to the CRT, but later were located in files maintained by the Swiss Federal Archives (SFA), as well as those held by the Polish Ministry of Finance.

The account owner, Oswei Epstein, was a wood exporter who died in 1937 in Danzig. His wife, who would have been the heir to the account, died in the Pinsk ghetto.

In connection with the 1962 Survey, records held by the SFA indicated that Oswei Epstein owned a demand deposit account valued at SF 794 as of February 3, 1964. On [282] In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d at 313 (citations omitted).

December 27, 1965, a custodian was appointed to the account, and on May 1, 1970, the proceeds were transferred to the Heirless Assets Fund in Bern (at which time the account balance was SF 660). On August 15, 1975, this sum was transferred to the Polish National Bank. Similarly, in "the publication entitled Nasze finanse, published by the Press Office of the Polish Ministry of Finance, number 25, dated February 1998, there [was] information concerning the assets of Oswei Epstein…. These records indicate that the Account Owner held an account with a balance of SF 794.00, of which SF 134.00 was taken as bank fees." The records showed that the balance of SF 660 was transferred to the Polish National Bank on August 15, 1975.[283] Since the account was not returned to the owner, the Court authorized an award to the heirs in the amount of SF 26,750.00 ($21,747.97).

In another case, In re Accounts of Erna Zimet-Achselrad, the claimant received an award of SF 289,087.50 ($235,131.30), representing the presumptive value of the two accounts her great-aunt had owned. Both accounts had been transferred first, to the Swiss Heirless Assets Fund, and later, on August 15, 1975, to the Polish National Bank. As early as 1964, the claimant's mother had sought to locate her aunt's accounts. The CRT pointed out the difficulties that the claimant's mother had "encountered in establishing her rights to her aunt's account," which "seem to have been in line with the general circumstances referred to in Peter Hug and Marc Perrenoud, In der Schweiz liegende Vermögenswerte von Nazi-Opfern und Entschädigungsabkommen mit Oststaaten, Bundesarchiv Dossier 4, Bern, 13 December 1996/January 1997":

> The conditions laid down by the Swiss authorities represented a veritable Catch-22: with regard to account owners from behind the Iron Curtain, no search was undertaken, nor were account owner names publicized, in order to protect these persons from their own governments' pressure to then transfer these funds; for heirs of account owners, who in the meantime had moved to the West, the general procedure of first proving that the disappearance of the account owners was such that death could legally be assumed (Verschollenheitsverfahren) and then providing the necessary inheritance documentation was virtually impossible. All this helps to explain why the ultimate amount transferred to Poland by Swiss authorities, SF 463,954.55, was about equal to the approximately SF 500,000.00

[283] The claimants, the grandchildren of Oswei Epstein, were awarded SF 26,750, representing the presumptive value of a demand deposit account (since the recorded balance was lower than average [presumptive] value). Following the Court's adjustment of presumptive values upon the recommendation of Special Master Junz, the claimants received an additional SF 1,962.50 ($1,621.90).

that had been registered in 1962 as dormant accounts belonging to Polish account owners considered victims of Nazi persecution.[284]

This transfer took place even though Swiss authorities were aware that Erna Zimet-Achselrad's niece had been trying to recover her aunt's accounts since 1964. More than ten years later, though, the bank, at the direction of the Swiss government, turned over those assets to Poland in 1975 as part of the deal to compensate Swiss citizens for confiscations under communism.

b. Hungary

Under the Swiss-Hungarian Compensation Agreement of March 26, 1973, Switzerland gave assurances in a confidential side protocol that it would compensate Hungary with SF 325,000 for the transfer to the Unclaimed Assets Fund of unclaimed assets belonging to Hungarian nationals presumed to be deceased. Hungarian counterclaims amounting to SF 400,000 were offset directly against the sum compensating dispossessed Swiss property owners, which amounted to SF 1.8 million. The two governments made public only the net compensation of SF 1.4 million. On February 19, 1975, on instructions from the Federal Justice Department, the Federal Financial Administration transferred SF 325,000.00 from the Unclaimed Assets Fund to the account kept by the Political Department to the Hungarian government.[285]

An example of this arrangement is the case of In re Account of Eugen Halasz. The account owner lived in Budapest with his family, where he was forced to hide from the Nazis. He died in Budapest in June 1949. In 1997, Eugen Halasz's grandson (the claimant) discovered the name "Eugen Halasz" on a published list of "heirless" Hungarian accounts that had been held in Swiss banks and transferred to the Hungarian government. Eugen Halasz's name also was included in a report created by the Swiss Task Force for the Assets of Nazi Victims.

The bank records made available to the CRT showed that Eugen Halasz's name had been included on a January 27, 1997 list of 33 unclaimed accounts of Hungarian nationals who had vanished. He had owned an account of unknown type with a balance of SF 842.30 in September 1963, when it was reported as part of the 1962 Survey. The bank transferred the assets to the Swiss government, which then transferred the money to the Hungarian government on February 19, 1975 as part of the general settlement of claims with Hungary. Since the account had been turned over to the Hungarian government rather than repaid to its owner, the CRT awarded the account (of unknown type) at its presumptive value (SF 47,400.00 ($34,852.94)).

[285] See In re Account of Eugen Halasz.

Likewise, in In re Account of Sigmund Fichmann, the account owner had worked as a sales representative for a Swiss textile wholesaler. He died in Budapest in 1951. His account was reported in the 1962 Survey. Following prolonged litigation based on the efforts of the CRT to obtain access to additional bank records and accounts, the account was published as part of the 2005 List. It was then claimed by Sigmund Fischmann's niece and great-nephew.

The bank records indicated that Mr. Fichmann, a Hungarian national and textiles salesman, had not been heard from since the 1944 occupation of Budapest. In January 1964, a businessman in Zurich, Gottfried Schaerer, registered assets totaling SF 1,992.65 with the Swiss Federal Department of Justice. According to Mr. Schaerer, this represented a balance that he owed to Mr. Fichmann. In response to Mr. Schaerer's query as to where he could deposit the assets, the Swiss Federal Department of Justice advised in February 1964 that the assets should be transferred to an account administered by Swiss authorities, and Mr. Schaerer did so. In December 1966, the city of Zurich's custodial authorities named a custodian for the assets. The bank records do not indicate the ultimate disposition of the assets.

Documents provided by the claimants indicated that the account had been published at least once prior to the 2005 List; it was originally published in connection with the 1997 "list that was given to the Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs." At that time, Sigmund Fichmann's niece had "disput[ed] the validity of the inter-state agreement of 1972 on both the Hungarian and Swiss sides, and requested details about the account and payment of the assets to the Hungarian state."

Several years later, in October 2004 (three years after the CRT claims process had been under way), Sigmund Fichmann's great-nephew inquired after this account with the Contact Office for the Search of Dormant Accounts Administered by Swiss Banks. The Contact Office responded: "'Unfortunately we are not in possession of the information concerning the account of Mr. Fichmann. As far as the possibility of a claim for compensation is concerned, you should consult with a lawyer specializing in international law.'" Assessing this 2004 response, the CRT observed: "It is not clear why the Contact Office did not have access to the files of the assets registered pursuant to the 1962 Survey …, why it was not aware of (or did not draw attention to) the account's apparent inclusion in the 1972 transfer of assets from Switzerland to Hungary, or why it simply did not refer [the claimant] to the CRT." In light of the bank's failure to provide information, and given that Mr. Fichmann had died in Budapest in 1951, and so was behind the Iron Curtain and could not have had his funds repatriated to him, Mr. Fichmann's heirs received an award of SF 49,375.00 ($40,805.79).

c. Romania

Switzerland entered into a similar arrangement with Romania:

> [A]s in the case of expropriated property compensation agreements with Poland and Hungary, the Swiss Government, which is a Release[e] under the Settlement, may have used [Swiss accounts] as leverage to obtain compensation for the property of Swiss citizens expropriated by the Romanian Government by agreeing to assist that Government in locating the dormant account of the deceased Account Owner. A direct agreement to transfer unclaimed assets was apparently not part of the Romanian agreement due to an international outcry against the Swiss Government agreements with Poland and Hungary in 1950, which did provide for such transfers.[286]

In In re Accounts of Ionica Weiss, the CRT explained that Mrs. Weiss had lived with her husband Geza, an optician, and their children, in Oradea and later in Nagyvarad. On June 3, 1944, Ionica and Geza Weiss were deported to Auschwitz. They were gassed upon arrival. One of their children moved to France after the War; the other (the claimant) lived in Romania until 1960, when she emigrated to Israel.

The bank records indicated that Ionica Weiss of Romania held an account of unknown type, valued at SF 62,000 on August 20, 1948. The account was included on a list of Swiss bank accounts "that were registered by Romanian citizens who were compelled by the Romanian Communist Regime to report their foreign assets, or by the Regime itself when it determined that its citizens owned assets held in Swiss banks." The August 20, 1948 date upon which the account was valued, as set forth in the CRT decision, was "recognized by the CRT as that of the Swiss Government's Freeze of Romanian Assets."

The CRT awarded the account (SF 744,720.00 ($496,480.00)) to account owner Ionica Weiss's daughter, who had filed an Initial Questionnaire, but not a claim form. The CRT observed that "the account belonged to a Romanian citizen and was still open as of 1948, which was four years after the Account Owner died in Auschwitz, and therefore may have been subject to the Freeze of Romanian Assets in August 1948." The CRT noted that the Freeze was lifted in 1950. Approximately "one year later, in August 1951, Switzerland and Romania entered into an agreement on compensation for Swiss property that had been nationalized by Romania's communist regime. As part of that arrangement, the Swiss Government agreed to assist the Romanian Government in finding the dormant account assets of deceased Romanian nationals and residents in Swiss banks."

Similarly, in In re Account of Avram Weinbaum, the account owner, a businessman, fled from Romania to Palestine in 1941, where he died in 1943. Mr. Weinbaum owned a numbered account. The bank records did not indicate the type, the date it was closed, or to whom it was paid. The CRT observed that while it could not "determine with certainty who received the proceeds of the account," it was "plausible that neither the Account Owner nor his heirs received the proceeds. The account belonged to a Romanian citizen, was still open as of 1945, which was two years after the Account Owner died, and therefore may have been subject to the Freeze of Romanian Assets in August 1948 …." Once the freeze was lifted in 1950, and Switzerland and Romania entered into their 1951 agreement, Mr. Weinbaum's account then "would have been subject to transfer to the Romanian Government under this arrangement. As the Account Owner died in 1943, he could not have closed the account and received the proceeds after the Freeze was lifted in 1950." In addition, it "would have been extremely difficult and dangerous for [Mr. Weinbaum's heirs] to access the account after the Second World War because they lived in Communist Eastern Europe." In any event, there was "no evidence in the bank records of any such access." Accordingly, Mr. Weinbaum's nephew, the claimant, received SF 45,425.00 ($29,620.89).

4. Post-War Stonewalling

After the War, the banks not only continued to participate in the Swiss government's decision to transfer accounts away from their rightful owners (in the case of the deals with Communist nations), but also sought to obscure the record of their wartime cooperation with forced transfers initiated by, and made to, Nazi authorities. The Court took note of this "stonewalling,"[287] and instructed the CRT that this was another basis for applying the adverse inference.[288]

Thus, in the case of In re Accounts of Angelus Simon, Rosa Simon-Lang, Grete Koretz-Lang, Ernst Koretz, and Susan Koretz, the ICEP auditors reported the existence of an account "based upon repeated inquiries to the Bank from a Mr. Frank Lang and his legal representative [Paul Weiden, a New York attorney] regarding assets that had potentially been held at the Bank by his relatives," the five account owners listed in the title of the award. In their report, the auditors referenced a handwritten note apparently made by a bank employee on June 14, 1946, which appeared to indicate that at least one owner held an account of unknown type in U.S. dollars ("$147.--").

[288] Some observers in Switzerland have taken issue with the adverse inference evidentiary principle. Swiss historian Prof. Dr. Thomas Maissen has written: "Document destruction, even though legal after ten years according to Swiss law, became for [Judge Korman] the 'most contentious subject': if a party destroyed relevant evidence, the law assumed that this would have been harmful to the destroyer. Thus the onus of proof was reversed so that a former account in a Swiss bank became a possible victim's account if the contrary was not positively evident. Therefore, the Swiss banking system of the Nazi era (and thereafter) had to be criminalized as a whole and transformed into a conspiracy built up to rob European Jews and then to cover the tracks. Such a plot cannot be excluded, but it is quite improbable and not supported by existing documentation and the research of the Bergier and the Volcker Commissions although they did not spare the banks from criticism for misbehavior, criminal acts and stonewalling against clients…. There are good reasons to distinguish between the historian's and the judge's task and why the latter should not be held responsible for establishing historical truth in order to adjudicate individual cases." Thomas Maissen, Republican and Liberal Values in Coping with the Memory of World War II: The Swiss Holocaust Assets in a Transnational Perspective, in THE LIBERAL-REPUBLICAN QUANDARY IN ISRAEL, EUROPE, AND THE UNITED STATES: EARLY MODERN THOUGHT MEETS CURRENT AFFAIRS 231, 243-244 (Thomas Maissen & Fania Oz-Salzberger eds., Academic Studies Press 2012) (citing Edward R. Korman, Rewriting the Holocaust History of the Swiss Banks: A Growing Scandal, in HOLOCAUST RESTITUTION: PERSPECTIVES ON THE LITIGATION AND ITS LEGACY 115, 127-29 (Michael J. Bazyler & Roger P. Alford eds., N.Y. Univ. Press 2006)).

Whatever the perception in Switzerland, however, as Judge Korman has observed, if the case ever had gone to trial in the U.S., the Swiss bank defendants would have been confronted with these basic American rules relating to spoliation of evidence. At trial, they likely would have faced the same adverse inference that the CRT applied.

Six months later, in a letter dated December 30, 1946, the bank wrote to Mr. Weiden, then in Zurich. The bank advised that in connection with Mr. Weiden's recent visit to the bank, "'we would inform you that, as far as our investigations show, no assets are deposited with the Zurich Office of our bank" in the names of the five account owners. Mr. Weiden responded a month later on January 28, 1947, noting that at the time of his visit, "[y]ou [the bank] told me that a thorough investigation in the matter had resulted in only very little money being found. However, you were to confirm this in writing. May be that your letter was misplaced by the hotel, or by the post." In response, on February 5, 1947, the bank forwarded Mr. Weiden another copy of its December 30, 1946 letter.

Mr. Weiden wrote to the bank again on November 22, 1949. He stated that he was again in Zurich, and that he believed that "'a not-insubstantial account existed at your Bank [in the account owners'] names.'" A handwritten note at the bottom of Mr. Weiden's letter, apparently written by a bank employee, stated: "'the matter has already been investigated, and Mr. Weiden has been informed both verbally and in writing that no assets [currently] exist with us.'" [Brackets in original bank note.]

Subsequently, in an internal memorandum dated August 4, 1950, the bank stated that Angelus Simon of Prague had died, and if he held any assets, they should be blocked. No assets were reported. The following week, on August 10, 1950, the bank's legal department wrote in an internal memorandum: "'[o]n the occasion of any further visit … in relation to the assets of Angelus Simon, Rosa Simon, or Grete Simon, Ernst Koretz, please simply tell him verbally the following (do not confirm in writing): 'There are no assets in the names of the four mentioned individuals in our branch [of the Bank], as far as our investigations can tell.' Mr. Lang will not likely request further investigations regarding assets that may have existed earlier. If that does happen, we will have to deny his request on the basis of basic considerations.'"[289]

Thus, by this memorandum, the bank's legal department explicitly advised bank employees that if they were asked about the account owners' assets, they should deny that any existed, as no such assets were currently held at the bank. In the unlikely event that an inquiry was made about past assets, that request, too, should be deflected, by relying upon "basic considerations," i.e. the rule requiring documents to be held only for ten years.

The next month, by letter dated September 14, 1950, the bank was contacted by a relative of the account owners. The relative (who lived in New York) explained that the account owners had lived in Karlsbad but had later moved to Prague, and that they all died "'as a result of the war.'" The relative advised that he had legal documents indicating that the individuals had died, and that he was their legal heir. The bank responded a few days later, on September 19, 1950, using the terminology that had been provided by the legal department. The bank stated that according to its investigations following the heir's last visit, there were "'currently no assets in the names of the referenced individuals in our branch of the Bank.'"[290]

Notwithstanding the bank's repeated denials of the existence of any accounts (or at least, "currently existing" accounts), the Volcker Committee auditors concluded otherwise. As described by the CRT, "based upon the handwritten note made by a Bank employee on the letter from Mr. Weiden dated 14 June 1946, the auditors reported the existence of an account of unknown type, denominated in United States Dollars … held by at least one of the individuals about whom information had been sought in the repeated inquiries to the Bank."

Given the evidence in the bank documents, and the fact that the account owners all had died in the Holocaust, the CRT awarded an account of unknown type at presumptive value (SF 49,375.00 ($42,934.78)). As the CRT observed:

> The Bank's records indicate that a Bank employee made a handwritten notation on the 14 June 1946 letter received from the representative of one of the Account Owners' heirs that indicates that assets totaling US $147.00 were held or had been held at the Bank under at least one of the Account Owners' names. According to the letter from Mr. Weiden dated 28 January 1947 contained in the Bank's records, this information was confirmed verbally by the Bank to Mr. Weiden during his visit to the Bank in Zurich in approximately December 1946. The records further indicate, however, that by 1950, the Bank refused to provide any further information to the heirs regarding these assets; that the Legal Department recommended that no information regarding this account be given in writing; that the Bank specify in all future correspondence with the heirs that there were no assets existing at the present time only and only at the main branch of the Bank; > that the bank surmised that the heirs were unlikely to inquire about whether assets belonging to the Account Owners had previously existed at the Bank; and that if they did so inquire, such inquiries should be declined.[291]

The case of In re Accounts of Rudolf Goldmann and Hedy Hock is similar. Rudolf Goldmann was an engineer in Vienna, and the deputy minister in the Finance Ministry. Hedy Hock was the sister of Dr. Goldmann's first wife. After his retirement from the Finance Ministry in 1936, Dr. Goldmann began to work for the Vienna Jewish Community. Dr. Goldmann and his second wife fled to Belgium in 1941. They were captured in July 1943 and deported to Auschwitz, where they perished.

In 1946, Dr. Goldmann's son, who provided proof that he was his father's heir, wrote to the bank requesting information about his father as well as other relatives, including Hedy Hock. The bank replied in a December 1946 letter that "due to Swiss legal requirements, it would only be able to respond to his request after he presented documents authenticated by the relevant Swiss consulate," since the son at that time resided in Haifa. The bank also demanded advance payment of a search fee of at least SF 40.00. In 1948, the London office of the bank, on behalf of Dr. Goldmann's cousin, requested information about any accounts owned by Rudolf Goldmann or Hedy Hock. The Zurich branch of the bank advised the London office that it was not holding any assets belonging to either individual.

Notwithstanding the bank's denials, the bank records made available to the CRT showed that Hedy Hock of Vienna indeed had held several accounts: a custody account, a demand deposit account, and a time deposit account. The custody account was closed on August 16, 1938, and the other two accounts were closed no later than that date. The records further showed that Dr. Rudolf Goldmann was given full power of attorney for Hedy Hock on November 29, 1934. In addition, the 1938 Census records for Hedy Hock showed that she owned an account at the bank's Zurich branch with a balance of SF 11,205. Dr. Goldmann perished in Auschwitz, while Hedy Hock had died in Austria in 1941. Thus, they "could not have repatriated the assets in her custody account, which was closed on 16 August 1938, without losing ultimate control over their proceeds."

[291] Id. at 7.

In light of these facts, the CRT awarded the claimant — the grandson of Dr. Goldmann and the great-nephew of Hedy Hock — the demand deposit account owned by Dr. Goldmann, and the custody and time accounts owned by Hedy Hock, for a total of SF 478,525.00 ($416,741.63). The CRT observed that the account owners' heirs previously had "attempted to obtain information about the accounts, but were turned away by the Bank, even though the records clearly still existed and were ultimately identified during the ICEP investigation." The CRT referred to the Court's opinion describing the banks' stonewalling of Holocaust owners and heirs, "particularly those that were the subject of forced transfers or transfers ordered under duress." The CRT observed that this case "provides yet another example of the typical method Swiss banks used to deflect inquiries made by heirs of Jewish victims whose assets had been transferred, under duress, into the Reich."

In In re Accounts of Adolf Denes and Elisabeth Denes-Deutsch, the account owners were married and lived with their daughter in Oradea, Romania. Adolf Denes was a banker, and manager of the English-Hungarian Bank in Oradea. The entire family was killed in Auschwitz. The bank records showed that Adolf and Elisabeth Denes held a demand deposit account, and that they had used the fictive name "W. Aden" and the password "Silos." The account was transferred to a suspense account in September 1965. It was closed to fees in 1966. The last contact the bank had with the account owners was before the end of World War II. The account was reported in the 1962 Survey, and subsequently was reported in November 1965 to the Cantonal Guardianship Authority of Zurich.

In awarding the Denes accounts (at a total of SF 27,642.50 ($19,210.94)), the CRT noted that the account owners' heirs had been pursuing these assets for decades. Two claims to the account had been submitted to the Swiss Justice Department, including one in August 1965 by a relative who lived in Tel Aviv, Josef Deutsch, who was the claimant's husband, and the brother of Elisabeth Denes-Deutsch. The Swiss Justice Department had instructed Josef Deutsch to withhold any evidence and documentation relating to his claim until he was expressly requested to hand it in. In 1966, the bank closed the account to fees, notwithstanding Mr. Deutch's inquiry, only one year earlier, about his sister's account. Correspondence from 1968 indicates that Mr. Deutsch never was requested to present evidence relating to his claim, but he was advised of the account closure. Given the bank's behavior, the CRT recommended that Mr. Deutsch's widow receive compensation.

In In re Account of Dr. Julius Homburger, the claimant, who originally filed her claim with the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), was the daughter of the account owner. Account owner Dr. Julius Homburger resided in Frankfurt, where he was a physician. Dr. Homburger and his family escaped Nazi Germany via Switzerland in 1935, from where they fled to Palestine. Dr. Homburger died in Haifa, Israel in 1950. After the Second World War, the claimant unsuccessfully attempted to locate accounts belonging to her parents, and later contacted the Swiss Bankers Association in 1989 and 1996. The claimant also made an inquiry in 1989 with the Swiss Consulate in Montreal.

The account owner's wife (the claimant's mother) also contacted the Bank in 1987 inquiring about any accounts belonging to her husband or herself, but was unsuccessful. In responding to the claimant's inquiries, the bank stated that because records were kept only for ten years and subsequently shredded, an investigation would be fruitless. The bank further explained that in order to search all its branches, it required death certificates, letters testamentary or letters of administration, and a check for SF 2,000.00. The claimant advised the CRT that she had provided the bank with a notarized power of attorney from her mother, and had given evidence that her father had died some 40 years previously. The bank then restated its ten-year document retention policy, and emphasized that the claimant had not proved her right to inquire about possible accounts of her parents.

The CRT examination revealed, however, that the bank records did contain information about these account owners, notwithstanding the ten-year document retention rule cited by the bank. In fact, Julius Homburger held an account of unknown type, which was opened on September 19, 1935 and closed on March 19, 1936. Given that the bank had withheld information about the account in response to inquiries made by Mr. Homburger's family, and given that there was no evidence in the bank's records that Mr. Homburger or his heirs closed the account and received the proceeds, the CRT concluded that it was plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to the rightful owners. The claimant was awarded SF 47,400.00 ($34,347.83).

Heirs seeking information from Swiss banks about the Levi family had no better success. In two decisions, In re Accounts of Sara (Särle) Levi, Martha Baldauf and Ilse Lebrecht and In re Accounts of Sara (Särle) Levi, Martha Baldauf and Ilse Lebrecht, the CRT described the years of stonewalling the family had encountered.[292] Berthold Wolf, a German attorney representing the heirs of Martha Baldauf (who had been killed in the Holocaust in 1940) first contacted the Swiss bank by letter of October 28, 1958. He asked about accounts owned by Ilse Lebrecht and Martha Baldauf, and he stated that these probably had been forcibly repatriated to the Reich. Among the handwritten notations a bank employee wrote on this October 28, 1958 letter was the question: "'Can information be given?'" On November 10, 1958, the bank responded that "as a general principle, the Bank could not provide any information about account activities that took place over ten years ago, because its files are destroyed after this period of time."

On December 22, 1958, Berthold Wolf replied, stating that the bank previously had provided information helpful to a different branch of the family. He suggested that "the Bank's research might also be made easier if he [Wolf] assured them that no claims against the Bank could be brought on the basis of its information." A handwritten note, evidently by a bank employee, refers to the existence of a custody account numbered 52260. A different notation on the bank records again asked, "'Can we tell how the custody account was closed?'" On December 31, 1958, the bank told Berthold Wolf that based on renewed research, it had no documents that would allow it to determine whether assets belonging to Martha Baldauf had been handed over to Nazi authorities.

In awarding Sara Levi's custody account to her daughter-in-law, the CRT observed that "in the course of its correspondence with Mr. Wolf, the Bank repeatedly asserted that it could provide no information about any activities that occurred more than ten years ago, in spite of the fact that the various notations on the letters clearly indicate that the bank did indeed have information about the accounts in question and in spite of the fact that the actual records still exist (and were forwarded to the HCPO and CRT [by the bank]). The presumption that the Bank was withholding or misstating account information in response to Mr. Wolf's inquiries because of its concerns regarding double liability was implicitly addressed in Mr. Wolf's letter of 22

December 1958, when he assured the Bank that no action against it could be brought on the basis of any information it might provide."[293]

After deducting restitution that Sara Levi's son (the claimant's husband) had received from the German government for the securities in 1961 — an amount equivalent to SF 29,047.42 — the CRT awarded the balance of the custody account, SF 206,108.57 (multiplied by 12.5, for a total of SF 2,939,449.88 ($2,389,796)).[294]

In In re Account of Lina Froehlich, the bank records included a May 14, 1948 letter to the bank from the account owner's son, Hermann Froehlich, requesting information about accounts in the names of his mother, father, and sister. In his letter, the account owner's son explained that his mother, Lina Froehlich, had been deported to the Piasky concentration camp. She was presumed to have died there. The account owner's son included a copy of his father's death certificate. He noted that his mother's death certificate would be officially issued the following day, as would his parents' will. The bank responded that it only provided information to heirs after they had officially proven themselves to be the legitimate heirs of the account owners. The bank also advised the son that the persons he had named had no connection to the bank, and possessed no assets at the bank. However, the bank records reviewed by the CRT indicated that Lina Froehlich had, indeed, held an account of unknown type at the bank, which had been closed on December 31, 1933. The ICEP auditors presumed that the account had been paid to the Nazi authorities. The total amount awarded for this account was SF 47,400.00 ($33,058.45).

The banks' deflection of customer inquiries is perhaps most evident in the decision to demand death certificates, often from the heirs of account owners who had perished in the Holocaust.[295] This request was made (and complied with) in the case described above, In re Account of Lina Froehlich. Similarly, in In re Accounts of Acatiu Nemeth, in February 1974, a [293] In re Accounts of Sara (Särle) Levi, Martha Baldauf and Ilse Lebrecht at 14.

[294] The CRT subsequently recommended and the Court authorized another award as well as an award amendment for the account owner, for a total of SF 4,621,869.51/$3,880,321.78.

[295] Although this assertion — that the banks demanded death certificates for those killed by the Nazis — was cited in many publications released during the height of the public scrutiny of the banks' activities in the late 1990s, the Distribution Plan of September 11, 2000 did not refer to the death certificate issue because direct evidentiary support for this contention was not then available. However, in the course of analyzing bank files and other documentation, there was clear evidence showing that the banks had required relatives to produce proof of the death of depositors who had perished in the Holocaust.

cousin of the eventual CRT claimant contacted the bank. This individual advised that his cousin (the account owner's son) was unable to contact the bank directly because he lived in Romania, behind the Iron Curtain. The cousin asked what documents were necessary to claim the account. The bank replied by demanding various types of evidence, including records proving that Acatiu Nemeth was deceased. However, as the CRT decision explains, by March 1941 the bank already knew that its client was deceased, since its files as of that date reflected that the account was held by the "Estate" of Acatiu Nemeth. The account owner's son received SF 99,259.50/$80,047.98.

In In re Account of Ascher Bank, the account owners, Ascher Bank and his wife, both presumably died in the Holocaust, as Mrs. Bank's sister, the claimant, did not hear from them again after 1940. The files made available to the CRT showed that after the Holocaust, the claimant wrote to the Cantonal Guardianship several times. Correspondence dated January 12, 1966, August 30, 1966 and October 24, 1967 indicates that the Cantonal Guardianship asked for additional documentation, including a death certificate for Mr. Bank, and a last will and testament. As the CRT observed, despite the fact that "the Account Owner's heir contacted the Registration Office and claimed the account" as early as 1966, the Swiss authorities nevertheless paid the supposedly "unclaimed" account to the Polish National Bank ten years later, on August 15, 1975.

In In re Account of Otto Strakosch, in 1950, according to "Bank I's" records, an American lawyer representing the administrator of Mr. Strakosch's estate (who had been appointed by the New York Surrogate's Court) contacted Bank I. As described by the CRT, the bank responded by stating "that it did not recognize the rights of an appointed administrator to a customer's account as being legally valid, because the Account Owner was not an American resident." That same year, the administrator "replied to Bank I in a letter in which he claimed that he and his sister were the legal heirs of the Account Owner, according to the Account Owner's will. In response, Bank I stated that it could provide no information because it had no proof that they were the legal heirs, and it did not keep customer records for more than ten years. In addition, Bank I would require a death certificate of the Account Owner." Based on the records that actually did still exist, notwithstanding the bank's effort to deflect the earlier inquiry by citing the ten-year document retention rule, the claimant received SF 1,020,995.46 ($712,226.10) through the Court's claims process.

5. Accounts Closed by Post-War Assessment of Fees and Other Charges

The banks generally did not provide information to their clients or the heirs about accounts transferred to the Nazis under duress. The banks also tended to avoid responding to inquiries about other accounts, including those still open after the Holocaust (whether closed at some point after 1946, or remaining open as of the date of the CRT analysis). This was particularly so, where it was profitable for the banks to continue to hold these assets. Swiss banks gained financially simply by the fact that Switzerland had no escheat law.[296]

> After the war, Holocaust survivors and their heirs sought to claim the funds deposited in Switzerland. The Swiss banks imposed insurmountable barriers. They destroyed documents and stonewalled heirs of account holders. Swiss law provided both the incentive and the mechanism for this misconduct. Swiss law had no requirement for escheat which would have required banks to turn unclaimed accounts to the state. Without an escheat law, Swiss banks were permitted to keep any assets as long as the money remained in the dormant bank accounts. Swiss law required banks to maintain records for only ten years. Even though the banks knew the importance of maintaining those documents to assist in the processing of Holocaust-related claims, they relied on Swiss law to justify their wholesale document destruction policy. Using Swiss law, the banks also applied charges to these accounts, frequently depleting them to zero.[297]

The CRT recommended, and the Court authorized, many awards evidencing this type of behavior.

Thus, in In re Account of Erwin and Babette Koblitz, the account owners lived in Bielsko, Poland, with their daughter, the claimant. Erwin Koblitz was the Prokurist (authorized representative) of a company, and Babette Koblitz was a housewife. They both perished in 1942. The Koblitz' daughter had made a claim to her parents' accounts after World War II and had received a quantity of British gold coins during the late 1990s.

The bank records showed that Erwin and Babette Koblitz held at least one account, opened in May 1934. Documents received following the CRT's request for "voluntary assistance" demonstrated that the Koblitzes owned more than one account at the bank, and that these were registered in May 1940 under the British Trading with the Enemy Act of 1939. Specifically, the Koblitzes owned one custody account containing 150 British gold sovereigns, and one demand deposit account. The latter account held a negative balance of 8.15.5 Pound Sterling ("£") as of May 1942, which over the decades was further reduced by fees and charges, including maintenance fees for the separate custody account. As of April 1977, the account had reached a negative balance of £ 230.40. Both accounts (the demand deposit and custody accounts) were closed in March 1980 and transferred to a suspense account at the bank for dormant assets.

In determining that the account owners' daughter was entitled to an award, the CRT observed that although she had received from the bank British gold sovereigns during the 1990s, there were no records indicating whether the account had held any other assets. It was "plausible that the full proceeds of the custody account were not paid to the Account Owners or their heirs." The claimant was awarded the presumptive value of the custody account, minus the value of the gold coins previously returned (i.e. SF 5,767.50), resulting in an award of SF 7,232.50 (thereafter multiplied by 12.5, for a total of SF 90,406.25 ($73,501.02)). As to the demand deposit account, it had been suspended, at which time it had held a negative balance. This was due partly to the fact that the bank had continued to charge fees against the account, including fees for the separate custody account.[298] That account was awarded at its presumptive value (SF 216,993.75 ($177,759.31).

In In re Account of Bedrich Spielmann, the account owner, the claimants' great-uncle, was an attorney or businessman who lived in Germany and Austro-Hungary. He perished in a concentration camp. He owned a safe deposit box that was "considered for registration in the 1962 survey of assets held in Switzerland by foreigners or stateless persons who were or who were believed to have been victims of racial, religious or political persecution, conducted by Swiss banks pursuant to a Federal decree in 1962." However, the account was never reported in the 1962 Survey because the bank had determined that Mr. Spielmann — who died in a concentration camp — had not been persecuted by the Nazis. The safe deposit box was emptied on May 19, 1964. The bank deemed its contents to be valueless. The CRT disagreed. It was "implausible that an account owner would hold a safe deposit box for the purpose of depositing valueless objects. In this regard, the CRT notes that an account owner would have been charged SF 500.00 in fees from 1 January 1945 to 19 May 1964." The claimant was awarded SF 37,575.00 ($31,840.29).

[298] See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d at 315-16 (describing one bank's decision to charge fees against an account, leading to a negative balance, as "seemingly inexplicable." However, this was "easily understood once one recognizes that the client also had a safe at the bank." The safe contained gold, which was used to offset the fees on the other account).

In re Accounts of August (Auguste) Hirsch is similar. The decision followed ongoing litigation with the banks stemming from the CRT's effort to obtain access to additional Holocaust-era documents and accounts. The CRT determined from files in the Swiss Federal Archives (SFA) that account owner August Hirsch owned at least one other account, in addition to the one that had been reported at the inception of the claims process. In connection with the 1962 Survey, the bank reported that it had not had contact with the account owner since before 1945. On January 21, 1946, the bank had sent a letter to August Hirsch's last known address, which "was returned to the bank with a note marked 'deported and missing' (deportiert & verschollen)." The records indicated that August Hirsch held an account numbered V 13080, which had a balance of SF 52 as of September 1, 1963.

The CRT awarded this newly-disclosed account to the niece of August Hirsch (SF 10,750.00/$8,415.39). The CRT observed that August Hirsch had died in a concentration camp, and that the account subsequently had been registered in the 1962 Survey. In addition, the bank evidently was aware, as of 1946, that its customer had been deported and was missing, but there is no indication that it took any steps to locate its customer's heirs.

In the case of In re Account of Nelly Fleischmann, the bank in 1956 had asserted to Ludwig Fleischmann, the claimant's father (and husband of Nelly Fleischmann), that "it no longer possessed files from 1938." But the CRT claims process demonstrated that bank records did exist. These records showed that Nelly Fleischmann of Bayreuth held a custody account numbered 43500, which had been opened on May 31, 1931 and closed on January 10, 1939. Although the bank files contained evidence of an account held in Nelly Fleischmann's name, there was "no indication that the bank informed the Claimant's father that this account" existed, which the CRT noted was misleading.[299] The claimant was awarded SF 316,512.50 ($205,461.19).

In In re Account of Abraham Schlagmann, the claimant was the great-nephew of the account owner, who owned a factory that manufactured women's undergarments. The account owner was never heard from again after the Second World War. Abraham Schlagmann had held a demand deposit account that was last accessed on August 11, 1939. The account held a balance of SF 2,439.50 when it was transferred to a collective account on or before October 23, 1962. The records indicate that the bank closed the account on or before August 11, 1988. After adjusting the balance to reflect standardized bank fees taken against the account, the CRT awarded the claimant SF 30,090.00 ($20,194.63).

In In re Account of Pierre Seligmann and Adèle Seligmann, the claimant was the niece of the account owners, who hid in southwestern France during the German occupation. Pierre Seligmann died in 1970 and Adèle Seligmann died in 1963, both in Paris. The bank records indicated that the Seligmanns had held three accounts: two demand deposit accounts and a custody account. One of the demand deposit accounts and the custody account were closed on January 1, 1949, which would have been a bank holiday. The remaining demand deposit account was closed to profit and loss on March 1, 1953, with a remaining balance of SF 6.70. The claimant was awarded SF 309,160.00 ($226,159.62), based upon the presumptive values for each of the three respective accounts.

In In re Account of Ernst Handel, the claimant was the nephew of the account owner, who was married and resided in Vienna, Austria. Ernst Handel's brother-in-law, the claimant's father, managed a factory called Kawe Prima Fabrica Romana, for which he traveled to Switzerland for business. Around 1939, the claimant's father sent his two sisters, one of whom was the account owner's wife, to Shanghai, China, to save them from Nazi persecution. Ernst Handel and his wife, who never had any children, eventually fled to the United States, while Ernst Handel's brother-in-law went to Palestine in 1940.

[299] Denying the existence of such documents was part of the banks' strategy in "stonewalling" Holocaust victims and their heirs in an attempt to avoid double liability for the banks' role in facilitating forced transfers. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d at 308.

The bank records indicated that Ernst Handel of Vienna, Austria, held a custody account numbered 22488 that was opened on May 26, 1939, into which SF 3,000.00 was transferred from the Zurich branch to the Geneva branch on May 20, 1939. Ernst Handel also held a demand deposit account that was opened on May 26, 1939. The bank's records indicated that the bank closed both accounts to fees on December 1, 1949, on which date the demand deposit account had a negative balance of SF 141.90. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that the account owner did not receive the proceeds of the accounts. The claimant was awarded SF 286,538.33 ($238,247.64).

In many instances, the CRT did not have to apply an adverse inference presumption to determine what had become of the account. The account remained open, and so clearly it had not been returned to the Holocaust victim or her heirs.

In the case of In re Account of John Simon, for example, the claimant was the account owner. Mr. Simon explained that he had been a travel agent in Bucharest. He was conscripted into a forced labor battalion in Hungary and Ukraine. After Mr. Simon was released from the forced labor battalion, he returned home to find that all of his possessions had been stolen. The bank records indicated that Mr. Simon had held a savings/passbook account that remained open and dormant. It held a balance of SF 0.68 as of September 26, 2001. After increasing the account balance to reflect standardized bank fees, Holocaust survivor John Simon was awarded SF 12,726.24 ($8,598.81).

In In re Accounts of André Isaac Meyer and Marcelle Meyer, the claimant was the daughter of the account owners. In 1940, the Nazis forced André Meyer out of his company. In 1942, they confiscated his home. After the Meyers and their children fled to unoccupied France, their son, the claimant's brother, fought with the Resistance forces. He was killed in combat in January 1945. André Meyer died in 1986 and Marcelle Meyer died in 1964, both in Paris. The bank records indicated that the account owners held three accounts: a demand deposit account and a custody account that were closed on unknown dates, and a demand deposit account that remained open and dormant. On April 21, 1975, the open and dormant demand deposit account had a balance of SF 1,046.00. The claimant received an award of SF 990,006.74 ($712,445.09).

In In re Account of Hedwig Hauser, the claimant claimed her own account. Hedwig Hauser was born in 1915 near Znaim, Czechoslovakia. In the 1930s, Hedwig Hauser's mother told her that she had opened an account, into which she deposited 30,000.00 Czech Crowns for her daughter's benefit. The claimant fled Czechoslovakia immediately after the Nazi occupation in 1939. She tried to flee on a refugee ship bound for Palestine, but it was intercepted by British forces and redirected to Mauritius, where she was detained until 1945. Both of her parents perished in Treblinka. The bank records indicated that Hedwig Hauser held a savings account, numbered 2153. The account was transferred to a collective account for dormant assets on September 4, 1985 and therefore had not been returned to the account owner. She received a CRT award of SF 10,335.00 ($8,030.85).

6. Accounts Located by the CRT

The adverse inference presumption was applicable not only to fill in evidentiary gaps caused by the banks' destruction of records, but also in those cases where records evidencing the account had been found by the claimant or by the CRT through its own research. These records from non-bank sources often revealed bank misconduct of the very sort that might have contributed to the banks' destruction of the records in the first place.

The case of In re Account of Wilhelmine Schoenholz is instructive. Wilhelmine Schoenholz lived in Germany for 35 years. She owned a corset and lingerie shop. She had been a purveyor to the court of the Queen of Wurttemberg, the Grand Duchess of Hesse, and the last Russian Tsarina. She was wealthy and independent, and until 1932, traveled regularly to Switzerland. After the Nazis' rise to power, she was forced out of her home and ordered to move into her shop. She was relocated several times, as was her shop. In 1942, she was deported to Theresienstadt and presumably died there, as she was never heard from again after World War II.

Archival documents provided to the CRT by the claimants indicated that Wilhelmine Schoenholz owned a Swiss bank account valued at SF 165,000. In the "Jewish file" (Judenkarte) created by Nazi authorities, numbered 9722, the cover page included the notation "über 165,000 Schweizerfranken" ("over 165,000 Swiss Francs"). The file also included an undated document wherein Wilhelmine Schoenholz applied for a "Sicherungskonto" (security account) and stated that she was 77 years of age, very poor, and living on social welfare. The file indicated that this application was denied on the basis of her Swiss bank account. The file also contained a notation that "measures" were being taken regarding the matter. The "measures" presumably involved the confiscation of Mrs. Schoenholz' Swiss account. A document dated October 2, 1942 indicated that Wilhelmine Schoenholz had been "evacuated," and that the security order was completed and would be noted on her "Judenkarte." Given that she was targeted so completely by the Nazis, Ms. Schoenholz was not in a position to retrieve her Swiss account before she perished in the Holocaust. Ms. Schoenholz's heir, her grandson's wife, received an award of SF 1,980,000.00 ($1,488,721.80).

Similarly, in In re Account of Kleiderfabrik Josef Schneider, the CRT recommended and the Court authorized an award, despite the absence of any bank records demonstrating the existence of the account. The banks appeared to have destroyed the relevant files, but the claimant was able to provide documentary evidence of a different sort. Holocaust-era letterhead from the company, Kleiderfabrik Josef Schneider, showed that it was a business located at Aberlestrasse 1 in Munich, which had an account of unknown type at a named Swiss bank. The CRT noted that it had "previously awarded accounts to Claimants when the ICEP Investigation failed to locate an account belonging to their relative (an account not included in the Account History Database, the Account Dossiers, and the Total Accounts Database). The evidence submitted by these Claimants falls into very limited categories. Article 17 of the [CRT] Rules lists certain categories of evidence that the CRT has used to justify an award when an account is not identified in the ICEP Investigation. These categories include Austrian State Archives Records and other government records, records of the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office, and any other historical and factual material available to the CRT. Examples of facially reliable evidence submitted by Claimants include actual bank documents, documents submitted to an official governmental agency, and official letterhead indicating a connection to a Swiss bank." The claimant was awarded SF 49,375.00 ($40,471.31).[300]

D. Presumptions Relating to the Value of an Account

The Court permitted the CRT to use presumptions to fill in the gaps in the evidentiary record not only to determine what happened to the account, but also to assess its value. These presumptions included the following: accounts recorded as below average (presumptive) value may have been looted and therefore should be awarded at average value; Holocaust victims who were forced to report their assets in Nazi census forms may have underreported the value of these assets; and banks did not award interest, but did deduct fees for carrying accounts. The CRT took all of these presumptions into consideration in assessing the amount of an award.

At the same time, the CRT also conducted detailed research to find actual account values, including by engaging in ongoing efforts to obtain additional information from the banks well after the class action litigation had settled and the claims process was under way. This process had a significant impact upon individual claimants, and also upon the entire class as a whole. The new account valuation data revealed that the presumptive values that had been originally assigned by the ICEP auditors, which were drawn from then-available information about accounts that did still have valuation data in the files, were too low. The evidence was reevaluated and the Court authorized an upward adjustment of presumptive values, resulting in additional payments of almost $100 million to thousands of Holocaust victims and heirs.

The following principles were incorporated into the claims process, enabling the CRT to more accurately assess values for Holocaust victim bank accounts.

1. Application of A Multiplier to Approximate the Account's Current Value

Claimants benefited from the application of a multiplier designed to take into consideration the interest income that would have normally accrued on their accounts. The Court determined that interest should be credited from 1939 through the date of the award.

In connection with the work of the Volcker Committee, the economist Henry Kaufman chaired a "Panel on Interest, Fees and Other Charges." The panel prepared a report in 1998 which adopted a current value adjustment factor of ten to be applied to any awards to be issued by the CRT (at that time, CRT-I), to bring 1945 values to current values. This factor was calculated by determining the compounded nominal value of a long term Swiss Federal Government bond ("CNV") over the period from 1939 to 1998. The precise value in 1998 was 10.18, which was rounded to ten.

When CRT-II began, the Kaufman Panel was able to calculate the CNV to the year 2000, but was not able to make this calculation for subsequent years because the Swiss National Bank discontinued the data series on which the calculation was based.[301] However, under the oversight of then-CRT Special Master Paul Volcker, former Chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board and head of ICEP, the "Kaufman Factor" multiplier was increased several times during the claims process to ensure an appropriate current value of the accounts. Thus, in 2000, the CNV was 10.89. Beginning in November 2001, when CRT-II began issuing Awards, the multiplier was established at 11.5 by rounding the 2000 CNV up to the nearest whole number, and by adding a growth element of 0.50 based on additional interest income in that year.

CRT Special Master Michael Bradfield later recommended that, "[u]sing the same methodology based on the growth of the CNV in past years, it is proposed to increase the [multiplier] to 12.5 times from its present level of 12 times…. [which takes] into account the passage of time [and] fairly increases the amount of the payments to Awardees to provide a level of earnings that would have been available to prudent investors if they had had dominion over their funds."[302] The proposal to increase the multiplier to 12.5 was adopted by Order dated August 25, 2003. The multiplier remained at that amount thereafter.[303]

303 The Court also monitored the exchange rates over the course of the claims process, and authorized a change in policy to ensure that claimants, and the Settlement Fund as a whole, were treated equitably regardless of the date upon which an award was authorized. Payments from the Settlement Fund to Deposited Assets Class awardees had to be made in U.S. Dollars, which required a conversion of Swiss Francs, the currency in which the Swiss banks reported the value of accounts of Holocaust victims, into U.S. Dollars. The 1945 Swiss Franc value, brought to current values by the multiplier, thus was converted into U.S. Dollars at the market exchange rate prevailing at the time the Court approved the relevant award.

This method was chosen for its simplicity and operational feasibility. However, over the course of the claims process and as global economic conditions changed, the appreciation of the Swiss Franc-U.S. Dollar market rate rendered this methodology unsuitable, as it was resulting in smaller benefits to those claimants receiving awards at the beginning of the claims process and greater benefits to those who received later awards. In response, the Court requested CRT Special Masters Bradfield and Junz to review the exchange rate methodology and to make recommendations. The Special Masters analyzed the data and observed that by August 2007 the US dollar

2. Adjustment of Low Value Accounts to Presumptive Value

"Presumptive values" were assigned to accounts for which valuation data had been destroyed and values were unknown. The "presumptive values" were determined by the ICEP auditors after assessing the valuation information that still remained for many accounts, and assigning averages based upon the category of account (e.g., safe deposit, custody account, demand deposit, and so forth).

The Court authorized the CRT to apply these presumptive values to accounts whose 1945 values were known, but were still less than the average 1945 value of an account of similar type. The higher "presumptive" value was to be used in place of the lower recorded account value, in the absence of plausible evidence to the contrary.[304]

The Court's order followed the recommendation of CRT Special Masters Volcker and Bradfield, who noted that the "ICEP and Bergier Reports reveal that the Swiss banks and their employees took advantage of the accounts of victims of Nazi persecution — including by charging excessive fees to the accounts and by taking account balances for their own use. Both Reports state that the banks levied fees, special charges, and commissions against such accounts, invested them in the bank's own notes, and suspended interest payments on accounts. The Bergier Report adds that banks wanted the dormant accounts to disappear and that they made decisions to manage them in the best interest of the bank. Staff Study No. 15 of the Bergier exchange rate had declined to Fr.1.20 to the US dollar, a fall of 29% in 80 months. The decline continued from August 2007 to August 2011, over which period the value of the dollar declined another 26% to Swiss Francs 0.78 to 1.00 US Dollar. In the entire period of 128 months reviewed by the CRT Special Masters, the value of the US dollar in terms of Swiss Francs declined by 54%. The Special Masters thus recommended that a fixed rate of US$ 1 = SF. 1.21 be applied to further Swiss Franc-based payments, which reflected the average daily exchange rate for the whole period of the claims process. The Court adopted this recommendation by order dated September 28, 2011.

304 See Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. May 28, 2002). The May 28, 2002 Order also authorized the CRT to (1) issue awards to sons-in-law and daughters-in-law of account owners, as well as other relatives not part of the account owner's immediate family; and (2) issue payments in full to claimants to accounts of known value. The latter amendment was approved at a time when the CRT was required to issue only partial payments of awards, with the expectation that supplemental payments would be authorized when all claims had been filed, and the full scope of potential awards assessed. Subsequently, the Court adopted Special Master Bradfield's recommendation of February 25, 2003 that all "Certified Awards shall be paid in full" (see CRT Rules, Article 31(3)). By Order of March 18, 2003, the Court provided for payment in full to all claimants who previously had received only partial payment under earlier versions of the CRT Rules.

Commission indicates that it was the intent of the banks to rid themselves of the nuisance of dormant accounts."[305]

As the claims process progressed, CRT Special Masters Volcker and Bradfield observed that "many awards [were] drafted involving low value accounts." They noted that "it seemed illogical that the account owner would have bothered to deposit such a paltry sum into a Swiss bank account." The ICEP and Bergier Reports both "support[ed] the conclusion that many of the accounts of victims of Nazi persecution were depleted by the banks and their employees through fees and otherwise." The CRT Special Masters "recommended that the current Article 35 account values be extended to certain accounts with low values." However, if there was "other plausible information concerning the value of the account," the CRT would have the discretion to "award an amount higher or lower than the average value."[306]

Of the 4,090 presumptive value accounts awarded, 1,168 were low-value accounts which were increased (or "bumped up," in the vernacular of the CRT) to presumptive value.[307]

3. Presumption of Underreporting in the 1938 Census

The CRT was authorized to presume that Holocaust victims who reported their Swiss accounts in the 1938 Census had reason to try to hide their assets, by underreporting the values of their accounts.[308]

At the inception of the claims process, where specific information on the value of assets held in Swiss banks was available from the 1938 Census returns, the CRT had taken this census [307] Of the 4,675 awarded accounts (excluding outliers), 4,090 were awarded at presumptive value (87.5%) and 585 at known value (12.5%). Many of these presumptive value accounts later were adjusted upward, as discussed infra.

[308] See Memorandum & Order Approving 15 Award Amendments Certified by the Claims Resolution Tribunal Pursuant to Article 31(2) of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process and Authorizing Payment from the Settlement Fund, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 21, 2004) ("Order of October 21, 2004"). The fact that the account had been reported to the Nazis also almost always led the CRT to conclude, absent evidence to the contrary, that the Nazis had forced the account owner to turn over his Swiss assets — or that the Nazis had bypassed the account owner and gone straight to the bank, which transferred the accounts as requested by the Nazi authorities.

information as the proper basis for determining award amounts in cases where bank records contained no information on account values, or where the bank information cited lower values than those the account owners had declared to the Nazi authorities. Thus, where the account owner had declared a value lower than the presumptive values under the CRT Rules, this lower value was awarded. However, in 2004, CRT Special Master Junz recommended that the Court amend that practice. She found that there was evidence that Holocaust victims tended not to declare all the assets in the 1938 Census, or had undervalued them, to try to safeguard some of their wealth. The Court approved Special Master Junz's proposal that account valuations, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, were to be at least equal to presumptive values (or higher if the census declaration reflected a higher amount). This new rule generally resulted in higher payments to claimants. As to earlier decisions, the CRT recommended and the Court approved retroactive adjustments where warranted, both in the 2004 Order itself and subsequently.[309]

Thus, in In re Account of Hedwig Ullmann, the ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Hedwig Ullmann during the Holocaust era, and so there was no record of the account in the "Accounts History Database" (AHD) made available to the CRT at the outset of the claims process. However, the CRT located the account owner's 1938 Census form. This document indicated that Hedwig Ullmann owned an account at the Basel branch of a Swiss bank. The CRT awarded Hedwig Ullmann's account to her children and grandchildren at presumptive value (SF 260,375.00 ($245,029.85)), because the value of the securities recorded in the 1938 Census form was lower than presumptive value. The CRT observed that this case was "similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which Jewish residents and/or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census, and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich."

In In re Account of Robert Schwarzkopf, records from the 1938 Census included a report filed by the Vienna police regarding a search of the office and apartment of Robert and Selma Schwarzkopf. As described by the CRT, the search "was carried out by the police on 12 March Jan. 19, 2010) (adopting award amendments increasing the amounts of earlier decisions which had not incorporated the principle set forth in the October 21, 2004 Order) ("Order of January 19, 2010").

1938, for assets to be reported. Among the items discovered in the search were … Swiss Franc-denominated City of Vienna bonds with a par value of 18,000.00 Swiss Francs, which were confiscated by the police." The CRT awarded Robert Schwarzkopf's son an account of unknown type at presumptive value (SF 47,400.00 ($32,465.75)). The CRT observed that "coincident with the Anschluss on March 12, 1938, the Nazis initiated a concerted plan to seize and confiscate the wealth of Austrian Jews. In pursuance of this plan, the search of the Account Owner's office and apartment took place on 12 March 1938, together with the seizure of his financial assets. His Swiss account was closed 18 days later on 30 March 1938."

In a number of cases, the presumption of underreporting was applied where the victim had filed a 1938 Census form, but had not listed his or her Swiss accounts in that document. However, bank records revealed during the claims process indicated that an account had existed. For example, in In re Account of Hanna Hartmann, the CRT awarded Hanna Hartmann's niece three Swiss accounts at their respective presumptive values. Although Hanna Hartmann had not specifically disclosed her Swiss accounts in the 1938 Census, the bank records demonstrated that she had, in fact, owned such accounts. The "facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which, after the Anschluss, Jewish Austrian citizens are arrested, searched, or report their assets in the 1938 Census, and, beginning immediately thereafter, and in many cases within the same year, their accounts are transferred to Nazi-controlled banks or closed unknown to whom. In the present case, the Account Owner was deported from Vienna and killed, and the existence of any account in her name was denied by Swiss authorities in 1967 and as late as 1997."

Significantly, several years after Hanna Hartmann's accounts were awarded to her heirs, using the presumptive values the ICEP auditors had assessed at the inception of the claims process (resulting in an award of SF 474,949.38 ($414,184.37)), the "voluntary assistance" process yielded new information. The bank "made available to the CRT additional information" about the securities held in a custody account owned by Hanna Hartmann. She had not listed these assets in her 1938 Census, nor had they been disclosed in the first set of bank records provided to the CRT. The new information included detailed documentation on the portfolios held in the account, and confirmed that the values applied for the original award were similar to the actual values of the securities contained in the account.

Similarly, in In re Account of Beger & Röckel, the account owner was a printing factory in Munich owned by Wilhelm Marx. He was born in 1875 in Nördlingen, Germany. In addition to Beger & Röckel, Wilhelm Marx also owned another printing factory, Graphia - Kunstanstalt und Drukerei. With other members of his family, including his son-in-law, Hans Archenhold, Wilhelm Marx was arrested and imprisoned in Dachau in November 1938. His businesses were confiscated by the Nazis. The Beger & Röckel printing plant was converted to build Messerschmitt fighter planes.[310]

After his release from Dachau, Wilhelm Marx and other members of his family fled from Germany to England in March 1939, and then to the United States in early 1940. Hans Archenhold, who had been a "creative force" at his father-in-law's company, Beger & Röckel, "walked into [the Hallmark greeting card offices in Kansas City] without an appointment and asked for a job." He was hired, and he instituted new practices at the factory enabling Hallmark to "shift to a more efficient, mechanized system to meet the growing demand for greeting cards." He "kept Hallmark on the leading edge as American printing technology began to outpace Europe's."[311]

In connection with their audit of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, the ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Beger & Röckel. The account presumably was among the millions for which records were destroyed by the banks in the post-Holocaust era. Nevertheless, the CRT located evidence of the account by examining the 1938 Census records. These documents indicated that Wilhelm Marx owned Beger & Röckel as well as Graphia, and that aryanization proceedings against the companies began before November 12, 1938, and concluded on February 15, 1939. Two days later, on February 17, 1939, the companies were sold for RM 243,024.07. Wilhelm Marx was credited with RM 146,640.07 (as compared to the RM 339,827 value of the companies that he had reported in his 1938 Census declaration). Although the aryanization price was much lower than the amount that Wilhelm Marx had estimated the companies were worth, and he was credited (on paper) with an amount still lower, none of these estimates mattered, because he was allowed to receive virtually nothing at all from the forced sale. Rather, on March 21, 1939, tax authorities blocked his assets. They allowed him to withdraw only up to RM 1,500 monthly, to pay for his living expenses and official charges. The blocking order stated that the subjects were "non-Aryan," and that "recent experience" had shown that "non-Aryans, after the sale of their businesses, would attempt to evade the foreign exchange regulations and move the liquid assets they had received abroad."

The 1938 Census records also contained evidence of his Swiss account. Specifically, a December 10, 193[8] letter was "written on the company's letterhead" to the Munich Tax Office. The letter stated that Wilhelm Marx's partners guaranteed payment of any flight tax that would be due if Mr. Marx were to leave the country. The letterhead indicated that the company owned business accounts in Munich, Vienna, and St. Gallen, Switzerland.

The CRT awarded the claimants, the great-grandson and grand-children of Wilhelm Marx (one of whom was also the daughter of Hans Archenhold), the presumptive value of an account of unknown type (SF 49,375.00 ($39,500.00)). The CRT observed that Wilhelm Marx had been imprisoned in Dachau and his assets had been aryanized. It was not likely that he had received his Swiss bank accounts, given that his other assets were seized.[312]

4. Adjustment of Account Values for Interest and Fees

At the beginning of the claims process, the CRT had "routinely ma[de] adjustments to add back fees charged to the account and to deduct interest accruals" back to 1945. That practice was intended to "protect the Settlement Fund from making awards that would have resulted in double counting of interest in the post-1945 period: once by the bank crediting an account with interest and then again through the CRT's application of the compound interest factor," i.e., the multiplier, which increased by increments from 10 to 12.5 during the claims process.[313]

[312] The same individuals also received an additional award of SF 289,087.50 ($242,891.70) for the published accounts of Wilhelm Marx. The CRT noted that the bank records indicated that Wilhelm Marx of Munich owned a demand deposit account as well as a custody account, both of which had been opened on October 12, 1930 and closed on July 14, 1933. The decision stated: "Given that after coming to power in 1933, the Nazi regime embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of the Jewish population through the enforcement of discriminatory tax and other confiscatory measures, including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks; that the Account Owner remained in Germany until 1940, and would not have been able to repatriate his accounts to Germany without losing ultimate control over its proceeds; that the Account Owner's assets were confiscated by the Nazi regime; that there is no record of the payment of the Account Owner's accounts to him; that the Account Owner and his heirs would not have been able to obtain information about his accounts after the Second World War from the Bank due to the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries by account owners because of the banks' concern regarding double liability; given the application of Presumptions (h) and (j), as provided in Article 28 of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended … the CRT concludes that it is plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to the Account Owner …."

Special Master Junz proposed that the Court "amend this practice because, while there is ample evidence in the bank records that fees continued to be charged over the life of an account — even to a point where the asset value of the account turned negative and the bank started charging interest on the balance due — there is virtually no evidence in the bank records of accounts actually being credited with accrued interest." In other words, the banks charged fees, but did not pay interest. The Court thus authorized the CRT "to suspend deduction of interest accruals when determining account valuation absent bank documentation showing interest actually having been credited to the account over the period in question."[314]

5. Reclassification of "Depositenkonten" (Time Deposit Accounts)

At the outset of the claims process, accounts designated in the bank records as "time deposits" ("Depositenkonten") were treated by the CRT as accounts of "other" type. In accordance with Article 29 of the Rules, such accounts were assigned a presumptive value of SF 2,200.00 (later increased to SF 3,900). During the course of the claims process, Special Master Junz advised the CRT that the more appropriate classification for this type of account was as an account of "unknown" type, which had a higher presumptive value of SF 3,950.00.[315] The Court approved several amendments to reclassify time deposit accounts previously awarded as accounts of "other" type as accounts of unknown type, and to make the appropriate adjustments in the presumptive values, resulting in additional awards of SF 153,125.

6. Amendment of Awards

The valuation presumptions, which were adopted at various points as the claims process progressed and as new information became available, had to be applied equitably to all claimants, not just to those whose claims were reviewed after the rules were changed.

Thus, the CRT periodically submitted requests to the Court seeking authorization of amendments to awards previously issued, such as where new accounts were discovered belonging to the claimant, or new data about the account's value had been revealed.[316] As the claims process drew to a close, the CRT reexamined many of the awards previously issued and filed with the Court a so-called "mega-amendment" request, seeking the Court's approval of some 52 amendments of previously issued awards. This ensured that payments to those claimants reflected presumptions adopted after their awards were issued, including rules relating to underreporting of accounts reported in the 1938 Census; equalization of known "low-value" accounts to presumptive values; and the like. By order dated January 19, 2010, the Court approved this request, authorizing additional payments in the amount of SF 431,386.

E. Reassessment of Presumptions Based Upon New Evidence Located by the CRT During the Claims Process

The use of presumptions allowed the CRT to fill in evidentiary gaps and to recommend awards to the Court. The claims process also was improved by the Court's insistence that the banks cooperate — pursuant to the "good faith duty" the Court had spelled out in approving the Settlement in July 2000 — and the CRT's continuing demand for greater access to records that had not been made available at the outset of the claims process. Thus, the CRT continually sought as much information as the banks were willing to provide. The result was that the CRT often received new data that revealed that there were more accounts, and that many accounts had higher values, than had been understood at the outset of the claims process. This new data enabled the CRT to recommend and the Court to issue additional awards, and at greater amounts.

On the other hand, on occasion, the new data sometimes revealed that accounts already awarded should not have been paid, or should have been paid at lower amounts. Adjustments were made in those cases as well.

The discussion that follows sets forth two such examples of how new data enabled the CRT to recalculate many awards and to issue additional payments: (1) by revaluing many bonds and securities; and (2) by reassessing the presumptive values the auditors had assigned at the beginning of the claims process. Further, the following discussion also demonstrates that (3) where newly produced data revealed that certain payments had been made in error, the CRT attempted to recoup any such overpayments.

1. Adjustment of Bond Values

As the CRT insisted upon, and obtained, more and more information about the accounts from the banks and other sources, it became clear that there was a wealth of previously undisclosed data about many of the accounts, particularly custody accounts. Due to this new data, the CRT often was able to determine precisely which equities and bonds Holocaust victims had held in their accounts.

Following consultations among the Court, the Special Masters and the CRT Secretaries General, guidelines were promulgated to be applied to future awards, as well as to awards previously issued to determine which, if any, awarded accounts should receive additional payments. Similarly, the review considered whether any awarded accounts had been overpaid.[317]

These guidelines noted as the "basic premise" that the "basis for valuation of securities, i.e. equities and bonds, is their market value as of the date that the Account Owner can be deemed to have lost control of his/her portfolio." The "relevant dates for market quotations" were either "the date of closure of the account, if that date falls within the relevant period [1933-

317 See Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, i.e. Equities and Bonds, circulated to the CRT by Special Master Helen B. Junz ("Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities").

1945]," or "where no closure date is available, or where the date of closure falls outside the relevant period, the date utilized by the CRT in determining when the account owner's country of residence or citizenship came under Nazi occupation or control in other ways (e.g., date of formal alliance with the Axis)."

The guidelines referred to various "sources registering market values during the relevant period," beginning with the "CRT's existing database of market quotations, i.e., market values that already have been awarded based upon certified quotes from the 1938 Census, bank documentation, claimant documentation, or previous CRT research;" Swiss exchanges such as the "Zurich Kursblatt, the Bourse de Genève or the Bourse de Bâle (the Geneva and Basel exchanges), or other Swiss exchanges;" the financial press including the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, the Financial Times, the London Times, and the Frankfurter Allgemeine; and stock exchange handbooks and annual yearbooks such as the Compass Series (for Central and Eastern European countries) and Moody's Manuals.

The Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities established that for equities, awards should be issued based upon their "market value, as equities are traded either without a face value, or with a notional face value that bears no relationship to the value of the security."

As to bonds, the Guidelines provided that

> [A]s a general rule, the nominal value of bonds not in default shall be awarded if the market value was below the nominal value on the date the account owner is deemed to have lost control over the account. The CRT presumes that the account owner, if able to decide freely, could have opted to hold the respective bond[s] to maturity to avoid a capital loss. The market value of the bonds shall be awarded if that value was above the nominal value on the date the account owner is deemed to have lost control over the account. Short-term paper, a type of security, is valued at its nominal value. Stocks are valued at market value.[318]

For bonds in default at the time that the account owner was deemed to have lost control over the account:

> "[T]he award valuation should be the market value on or as close as possible to the relevant date," as it would be "presumed that the Account Owner chose to purchase and/or hold a high-risk security in his/her portfolio." Therefore, the "Account Owner's ability to manage the portfolio would not have enhanced his/her capability to obtain nominal value during or immediately after the relevant period.[319]

2. Adjustment of Presumptive Values

"Presumptive values," or average values, were utilized by the CRT to determine the amount of an award for a particular Holocaust-era Swiss bank account, where bank records containing the actual valuation data no longer existed.

To fill the gap posed by incomplete bank records, which may have documented the existence of an account but contained no information about the account's value, the Court authorized awards to be made at designated "average" amounts based on the type of account. These average amounts — or "presumptive values" — were assigned by the Volcker Committee auditors after the Distribution Plan had been approved on November 22, 2000 but quite early in the claims process. The presumptive values were included in the proposed CRT Rules recommended to the Court on February 1, 2001 by CRT Special Masters Paul Volcker and Michael Bradfield, and adopted by the Court on February 5, 2001. The presumptive values were thus based on the best data available as of early 2001. The amounts varied depending on the type of the account: savings; demand deposit; custody; safe deposit box; account of unknown type; and other (accounts not falling into the above categories). The presumptive value for a savings account was calculated at a 1945 value of SF 830; for a demand deposit account, SF 2,140; for a custody account, SF 13,000; for a safe deposit box, SF 1,240; for an account of unknown type, SF 3,950; and for other accounts, SF 2,200. A multiplier ranging from 10 at the outset to 12.5 by the end of the claims process was applied to bring these amounts to current values.

[319] See Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities.

After her appointment, CRT Special Master Helen Junz began to monitor the validity of the original presumptive values against the actual values revealed in the claims process experience. She determined that there was a disparity between these amounts. She then worked with the CRT to conduct an extensive study, which revealed that the average value of a Swiss bank account owned by a Holocaust victim was significantly higher than the amounts that were estimated at the inception of the claims program. Based on her analysis, she recommended that the Court adjust the presumptive values.[320] Special Master Junz's projections indicated that the total amount payable to the Deposited Assets Class could be $812.7 million, which would exceed the up to $800 million allocated to that class by over $12 million.[321]

Special Master Junz explained that the presumptive values recommended by the ICEP auditors did not reflect several important facts revealed only later, as a result of years of analysis of data revealed during the claims process.

One important factor was that the ICEP auditors, who were under time constraints and were focusing upon victim status rather than account amounts, sometimes reported that the accounts they reviewed were of unknown value. The CRT, however, was reviewing the bank records for different purposes, on a more individualized basis in response to particular claims. With this scrutiny, the CRT in many instances was able to determine the account's value. This was generally due to the insistence that the CRT be given access to the bank records underlying the auditors' report of the account. In fact, "more than one half of the accounts awarded under 320 CRT Special Master Junz filed several reports underlying her eventual presumptive value recommendations. See Special Master Junz's initial report of March 21, 2006 ("Junz Presumptive Value Memorandum of March 21, 2006"), updated at the request of the Court on May 14, 2007 ("Junz Updated Memorandum of May 14, 2007"), supplemented on July 15, 2007 ("Junz Supplemental Memorandum of July 15, 2007") and updated again on October 10, 2008 ("Junz October 10, 2008 Report"). The Court asked the Special Masters to place Special Master Junz's recommendation in the context of the Settlement Agreement and the Distribution Plan. See Judah Gribetz & Shari C. Reig, CRT Special Master Junz's Proposal for Adjustment of Deposited Assets Class Presumptive Values in the Context of the Settlement Agreement and the Distribution Plan, Dec. 19, 2008 ("December 19, 2008 Presumptive Values Contextual Analysis"); Judah Gribetz & Shari C. 321 See Junz October 10, 2008 Report at 15-16. Special Master Junz's calculation was based on the then-prevailing exchange rate of US$ 1 = SF 1.10. However, she explained that "given the large swings in the exchange rate of the US dollar vis-à-vis the Swiss franc over the past year, and the important effect of a change of even a few basis points on the total amounts," she also had calculated the "overall total at exchange rates of US$ 1 = SF 1.05 and US$ 1 = SF 1.15 as well." As of December 17, 2008, the exchange rate was US$ 1 = SF 1.10, which was the central rate used in Special Master Junz's calculations.

CRT II that were reported in the original AHD as having no known balance were found by the CRT in the course of its award determination to have values after all."[322] Special Master Junz's recommendations took this information into consideration.

Further, the CRT also located additional accounts that were not reported at the outset of the claims process. Their values impacted the averages. Thus, of the 4,676 accounts awarded (excluding the 40 "outliers"), 3,603 accounts, or 77% of the total, were contained in the original AHD provided by the ICEP auditors to the CRT at the outset of the claims process. However, an additional 1,071 accounts, in two different categories, had not been included in the ICEP database, and neither the accounts nor their values had been considered by the ICEP auditors.

One category of such accounts was considered to consist of "sub-accounts." These were 498 additional accounts that were located by CRT staff members in the course of examining the bank records underlying the accounts reported by the ICEP auditors. A sub-account was linked to the "main" account — the account that the ICEP auditors had reported — but the sub-account nevertheless was distinct, with its own value, and separately awardable.[323]

In addition to these sub-accounts, the CRT also located another 573 accounts in a second category. These accounts were derived from three types of sources: the CRT's extensive surveys of European archives; its continuing request for access to Swiss bank accounts that were not in the AHD (which led to post-settlement litigation and the publication of additional account owner names); and its ongoing review of other potential sources of account documentation, such as claimant records.[324]

Therefore, the CRT was able to locate and award a total of 1,071 accounts beyond the 3,604 accounts contained within the AHD originally reported by the ICEP auditors at the outset of the claims process. Of the 4,676 non-outlier accounts awarded, the CRT located nearly one-fourth — 23%.[325] These accounts, however, had not been taken into consideration when the 323 The 498 sub-accounts that the CRT located produced another SF 51,676,705.90 in awards.

324 Some of these accounts ultimately were published in 2005 following ongoing litigation with the banks. The value of the awards paid to claimants for these 573 other accounts totaled SF 104,358,825.33.

325 That translated into an additional SF 156,035,531 in awards to heirs of Holocaust victims.

ICEP auditors analyzed account information, and the assessment of presumptive values was incomplete without including this large pool of data.

The CRT's insistence upon examining not only the ICEP materials but also the underlying bank records also enabled the CRT to reassess or in some cases determine the type of account that was at issue: custody, savings, demand deposit, safe deposit, other, or unknown. By discovering the true nature of the account, the CRT often was able to increase the amounts that could be awarded to claimants, particularly where the CRT learned that an account characterized by the auditors as of "unknown" type actually was a custody account, since custody accounts were of especially high average value.

All of this new information was taken into consideration by Special Master Junz and by the CRT in reassessing and recommending an adjustment of presumptive values. Thus, Special Master Junz advised the Court that shortly after her appointment as CRT Special Master on April 14, 2004,[326] she had "started monitoring th[e] relationship" between "the award amounts that the Court has approved under CRT-II on accounts for which the value of the account balance was known ('known value accounts') and those awarded at presumptive value in the light of the experience gained thus far."[327] Special Master Junz noted a disparity in these values and cited several reasons for this variance.[328]

[326] Michael Bradfield acted as CRT Special Master from the inception of the CRT until April 2004, at which time Mr. Bradfield assumed responsibility for the CRT appeals process.

[328] Her observations amplified an issue earlier called to the attention of the Court and Special Master Gribetz. At least two class members had responded to the Court's request for proposals for the use of residual funds, if any, remaining from the $800 million allocated to bank accounts, by contending that it was premature to focus upon "residual funds," when it was clear that many accounts were being undervalued. These class members observed that awards paid for accounts with valuation documentation (known value accounts) were significantly higher than awards for accounts for which valuation documentation had been destroyed (unknown value accounts), thus calling into question the presumptive values then in use. As noted by one of the individuals who brought the valuation issue to the Court's attention: "'[T]he average value of all the accounts where the documentation relating to value has not been destroyed is much higher than the average value of all the accounts where the documentation has been destroyed." Junz Presumptive Value Memorandum of March 21, 2006, at 1 n.2 (citing Letter from Tim Schwarz to the Court and to Special Master Gribetz (Jan. 30, 2004)); see also Letter from E. Randol Schoenberg to the Court and to Special Master Gribetz (Jan. 15, 2004). Mr. Schoenberg assisted Mrs. Altmann in presenting her claims to the CRT, resulting in the nearly $22 million ÖZAG award, and also represented her in her ultimately successful claims against Austria seeking restitution of her family's looted art, including paintings by Gustav Klimt.

The most significant factor impacting the valuation of accounts of unknown value, according to Special Master Junz, was that the ICEP auditors had excluded "Category 3" accounts from their determination of presumptive values.[329]

In their investigation of Holocaust-era Swiss accounts, the ICEP auditors had divided into four categories the accounts deemed "probably" or "possibly" to have been owned by Holocaust victims. According to the Volcker Report, these categories were "ranked on the basis of various characteristics by degree of probability of their owners having been victims of Nazi persecution."[330] The auditors then studied the accounts for which valuation data still existed. Because such a high percentage of accounts in Categories 1 and 2 had known values (70% of "Category 1" accounts and 80% of "Category 2" accounts), the auditors considered these data sufficiently reliable for determining the average value by account type. These average values, by account type, then were used as "proxy" or presumptive values for accounts of unknown value.

The auditors did not use the value information for known value Category 3 accounts because at the time of the audit, the data were "deemed to be statistically unreliable."[331] Category 3 accounts were determined by the auditors to have been closed. However, due to the destruction of bank records, it was unknown who closed the accounts, or whether they were closed properly. Only 11% of these accounts had known values, and these known values were deemed to be "clustered" in a relatively small number of custody accounts.[332] Nevertheless, Category 3 accounts constituted a very high percentage of all accounts in the AHD. Of the original approximately 54,000 AHD accounts (i.e. pre-"scrubbing"), more than half (57%) — 30,792 — were "Category 3" accounts. The auditors' exclusion of "Category 3" data became even more questionable when the CRT received extensive information from one of the two defendant banks, Credit Suisse. The new data was provided to the CRT quite late in the claims process, and only after earlier unsuccessful efforts to obtain such information from the bank. The Credit Suisse materials revealed actual account values for 239 custody accounts, virtually all of which were "Category 3" accounts previously considered to be of unknown value. The majority of these accounts had been awarded, and at their presumptive values. However, after review of the bank records, nearly all of those awards were able to be adjusted — mostly upward — to their actual (known) values, through amendments approved by the Court.

This new data impacted the presumptive value estimates across all of the auditing categories.[333] Significantly, custody accounts constituted approximately 30% of the accounts awarded in the claims process. Further, custody accounts also constituted approximately 70% of the value of all CRT awards. The ICEP auditors issued their presumptive value recommendations for custody accounts based upon their assessment of the average value of the 397 known-value custody accounts that were available at the time of the audit. The Credit Suisse information more than doubled that number, bringing the number of known-value custody accounts in the CRT database up to 892. CRT Special Master Junz pointed out that the addition of so much new and relevant valuation data warranted recalculation of custody account values, as well as values for other types of accounts.

Special Master Junz additionally observed that the auditors had a "difference[] in focus"[334] as compared with the CRT. Specifically, Special Master Junz stated that "the focus of the audit was on the discovery of the relevant accounts, and the recording of balance values and type of account information, though important, was not the primary objective, especially given the prevailing time and expenditure constraints."[335] Thus, whereas the auditors were concentrating upon whether an account probably or possibly had belonged to a Nazi victim, the CRT scrutinized the bank files to resolve a variety of other questions, including the type of the account, and its value. However, "more than one half of the accounts awarded under CRT II that were reported in the original AHD as having no known balance were found by the CRT in the course of its award determination to have values after all."[336]

In "many cases this value information was actually available in the bank files, in others it involved obtaining price quotations for listed assets and in yet others value information came from outside sources. The values thus obtained notably tended to average above the corresponding ICEP proxy values by significant margins. This was especially so for accounts in Category 2 and for custody accounts across the board, including those in Categories 1 and 2. These differences point to the auditors having missed a considerable number of relatively high balance values in the two Categories on which they based their determination of proxy values. This, in turn also did much to moot the auditors' objection to the inclusion of Category 3 in the proxy value determination, which rested on their opinion that high value custody accounts were clustered in that Category."[337]

[337] Junz October 10, 2008 Report at 7. The claims process, which revealed how significant the Category 3 (closed) accounts really were, also demonstrated that certain observers who questioned the settlement may not have been in the best position to assess the facts. They had reached premature conclusions, and were not keeping track of the detailed data that were being revealed over the years as a result of the CRT's ongoing research.

For example, Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg stated that "the Swiss banks did not owe the money, that even though survivors were beneficiaries of the funds that were distributed, they came, when all is said and done, from places that were not obligated to pay that money." See Raul Hilberg and Avi Shlaim: Speak out in defense of the Holocaust scholarship of Norman Finkelstein, DEMOCRACY NOW, May 9, 2007, http://hnn.us/roundup/entries/38707.html. This critique rested upon what Hilberg termed his "surmise" about what had happened to the closed accounts, which were a significant part of the claims process and represented a considerable portion of the awarded accounts. In Hilberg's view, these closed accounts "had existed, but they were no more. The simplest surmise was that a large portion of them must have been emptied out by their owners after the war. The people who could do just that were prewar refugees from the Reich-Protektorat area, as well as wartime residents of France, Hungary, or Romania who had never been deported — two groups whose numbers in this context must have been significant."). RAUL HILBERG, THE DESTRUCTION OF THE EUROPEAN JEWS 1281 (Yale Univ. Press 3d ed. 2003). Professor Hilberg's view was not borne out by the facts revealed during the claims process. Many of the closed accounts had not been "emptied out by their owners after the war," id.; many of their owners had not survived the Holocaust at all. Rather, the accounts were closed under duress and paid to the Nazis, or, after the Holocaust, the banks took these accounts into their own profits and closed them out. The accounts were not returned to the account owners or their heirs.

Similarly, Professor Hilberg described what he considered to be "justified claims," but this did not take into consideration the high value accounts that were looted down to a balance of zero. Hilberg stated that as to the "unclaimed accounts that were still open the count was really very low, some tens of millions of Swiss francs which translates into $20-25 million U.S., depending upon which exchange rate is chosen, multiplied by 10 to account for interest due, and that would be about $250 million or so, in that vicinity, current dollars U.S., not 1 billion, 250 million. And I would suggest and predict that one day, when they will look back and somebody will [write] his doctoral dissertation or her doctoral dissertation about that subject, the conclusion will be that the actual number of justified claims is much smaller than had been presupposed." "Professor Raul Hilberg on Slave Laborers and Swiss Banks": Interview by David Ridgen, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with Professor Raul Hilberg, in Burlington, Vt. (Apr. 22, 2002). However, this assessment was not accurate. The data revealed through the claims process showed just the opposite: the number and value of "justified claims" was considerably higher "than had been presupposed." Id. Professor Hilberg, whose groundbreaking research and writings on the Holocaust have been an indispensable source of information to the Special Masters, passed

Special Master Junz advised the Court that the claims process demonstrated that the original decision to exclude the known Category 3 account values from the presumptive value calculations was flawed for two reasons. First, many of the "Category 3" accounts were indeed owned by victims of the Holocaust, as the claims process revealed, contrary to what had been surmised by the ICEP auditors. Second, rather than the known value accounts in Category 3 missing a large number of low-value accounts, and thus being improperly skewed toward high-values, the opposite appeared to have been true. Average known values of accounts of Category 1 and 2 turned out not to be too different from average known values for Category 3 accounts. Thus, the auditors appeared to have not considered a large number of high-value accounts, and so the estimates may have been improperly skewed toward accounts with low values.

Based upon her research, CRT Special Master Junz recommended that the Court adjust the presumptive values to reflect the new data. If the Court adopted the proposed adjustment at 100% of the recommended amounts, this would entail the following changes:

- For savings accounts, for which the original presumptive value for accounts of unknown value was SF 830 (using 1945 values, and prior to application of the multiplier), the presumptive value would have increased to SF 900. Applying the multiplier of 12.5, and at the then-prevailing exchange rate of US $1 = SF 1.10, the value of an awarded account would have increased from $9,432 to $10,227.[338]
- For demand deposits, for which the original presumptive value for accounts of unknown value was SF 2,140, the presumptive value would have increased to SF 2,500 (i.e., from $24,318 to $28,409).
- For custody accounts, for which the original presumptive value for accounts of unknown value was SF 13,000, the presumptive value would have increased to SF 31,000 (i.e., from $147,727 to $352,273).
- For safe deposit boxes, for which the original presumptive value for accounts of unknown value was SF 1,240, the presumptive value would have increased to SF 5,300 (i.e., from $14,091 to $60,227).
- For accounts of unknown type, for which the original 1945 presumptive value was SF 3,950, Special Master Junz proposed no adjustment (thus, the dollar amount would remain at $44,886).

away in 2007, and unfortunately he did not have the opportunity to study the CRT claims process in detail or upon its completion.

[338] See Junz October 10, 2008 Report at 13 (Tables 4a and 4b).

- For "other" accounts (i.e., those which did not fall within one of the above categories), for which the 1945 presumptive value for accounts of unknown value was SF 2,200, the presumptive value would increase to SF 3,900 (i.e., from $25,000 to $44,318).

In total, an additional $264.5 million in award amendments would have been required to adjust presumptive values at 100% of the proposed amount. At that rate, Special Master Junz estimated that "the grand total of past and future payments [would equal] US$ 812.7 million,"[339] an amount that was higher than the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class under the Distribution Plan.

The auditor who led the original ICEP work that established the original presumptive values, Frank Hydoski, considered Special Master Junz's analysis to be appropriate. He advised the Court that a reanalysis of the presumptive values in light of the new information disclosed during the claims process was advisable.

> In short, it seems to me that it would be a sound undertaking to: (1) add new information to the data used originally to calculate the average balances; (2) recalculate the average balance amounts; and (3) adjust presumptive values, if there are material changes.
> It is clear from the data provided in Dr. Junz's original letter and the two updates that the CRT has in fact gathered considerable additional information of a kind and quality that should be taken into account in these statistical calculations. I would add that such data would have been used in the 1999 calculations [leading to the current presumptive values] had it been available.[340]

CRT Special Master Michael Bradfield held a similar view. He not only had assisted the Court since the inception of the claims process, "working initially to develop the rules and procedures" of the CRT claims process, but he also had been counsel to and "de facto staff director" of the Volcker Committee. "Among other areas of responsibility, [he] supervised the work of the audit firms in connection with their investigation of Swiss bank accounts. Based on this experience, [he was] fully familiar with the work of the five major audit firms retained by ICEP to carry out its investigation, and with the purposes and results of the ICEP investigation."[341] Given the new data located by the CRT as a result of its analysis of claims and accounts, Special Master Bradfield advised that:

> It would be clearly inconsistent with the Settlement Agreement not to utilize the important information that has been revealed as a result of the CRP [Claims Resolution Process], especially information about account values. As Mr. Hydoski, who led the original effort to estimate account values, stated "such data would have been used in the 1999 calculations had it been available." Accordingly, I support Dr. Junz's recommendation on the use of the additional information available from the CRP to establish the Article 29 presumptive values to be used for the determination of awards where account valuation information is missing from Swiss bank records.[342]

As Special Master Bradfield suggested, integrating valuation information obtained in the course of claims processing did not impinge upon the findings of the Volcker Committee. Rather, the opposite was true: the Volcker Report had explicitly anticipated that as a result of the claims process, meaningful data about account values would be revealed after the audit had been completed.

> [T]he [Volcker] Committee has developed approaches toward approximating fair current values for individual accounts in situations where the book values are known. The Committee, with the support of the banks, believes that these approaches provide a reasonable and fair basis for making awards to identified Holocaust victims in a manner that takes account of the fact that these funds were unavailable to victims or their heirs for decades. But this approach cannot reasonably be aggregated over accounts where neither the book value nor a legitimate claimant, or both, can now be identified. Such a determination of the overall total must await the outcome of the claims resolution process.[343]

Thus, the updated values reflected the auditors' original intention to incorporate data revealed during the claims process; took into account the impact of "scrubbing" the database from approximately 54,000 accounts (a database upon which the auditors based their presumptive value recommendations) down to 36,000 accounts (a database which contained 18,000 fewer accounts, whose average values differed from the original 54,000); and gave appropriate weight to data concerning accounts closed "unknown to whom" ("Category 3 accounts"), which the claims process revealed did belong to Holocaust victims.[344]

Some obervers questioned these presumptive value adjustment recommendations. They believed that CRT Special Master Junz had not accurately analyzed the data, and they considered that it was more appropriate to allocate all remaining funds to needy survivors through the Looted Assets Class, rather than adjusting presumptive values for the Deposited Assets Class.

While offering ample opportunity for these concerns to be heard, the Court "emphasize[d] one point to those parties. Special Master Junz's recommendation, if adopted, would not alter the plan of allocation which has been adopted. The proposal simply involves a change in calculating the value of certain accounts to more accurately reflect their true value. The amount available for distribution to the Deposited [Assets] Class will not exceed the eight hundred million dollars … originally allocated to the class."[345]

The issues concerning the presumptive value recommendations are discussed in greater detail below. They illuminate some of the unanticipated developments in the case that resulted in delays, and for some survivors, perhaps additional distress.

By order dated June 16, 2010, the Court adopted Special Master Junz's recommendations. As an initial matter, the "Volcker Committee specifically had anticipated that the processing of individual claims and the study of the related bank records would yield data that would be incorporated into the claims process, including data concerning account values."[346] Special Master Bradfield, "who supervised the audit and, with Mr. Volcker, also developed the initial CRT Rules and procedures," shared that view. "Dr. Junz's conclusions — and her methodology as well — are far more accurate than the original presumptive values calculated by the ICEP auditors because she has taken into consideration several fundamental circumstances affecting the database from which presumptive values have been calculated. These factors have been described at great length both by Dr. Junz and in the related reports submitted by Special Master Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Reig."

Anticipating that the presumptive values would be adjusted, the CRT's Zurich and New York offices had been directed in advance "to begin preparing the calculations, claimant notification materials, and other documentation necessary to issue a presumptive value increase to the several thousand individuals eligible to receive such adjustments." While necessary and appropriate to ensure that Nazi victims and heirs received as near as possible the value of their stolen assets, the adjustment process also would be complex. It would require "detailed, case-by-case analysis of each award — often including several different account types divided among several different claimants and/or groups of claimants (not all of whom are related)." Thus, it was "imperative that this work commence well in advance of a formal decision on the presumptive value recommendations so as not to prolong the anticipated wind-down of the Deposited Assets Class claims process."[347]

The presumptive value increase, if adopted at "100% of the recommended amount," would have "required approximately $230 million, a sum that was not available under the Distribution Plan since it would have exceeded [by more than $12 million] the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class."

Based upon the "projected costs, and the fact that Dr. Junz'[s] data are reliable and certainly far more accurate than the information provided at the outset of the claims process, but because of the destruction of millions of bank records, the precise averages for accounts with unknown balances never can be determined with exactitude," the Court authorized the CRT to calculate the anticipated increases based upon a $100 million adjustment. "This represented 43.5% of the $230 million needed to pay the recommended adjustment at the full amount, a sum comparable to the 45% increases authorized several years ago for the other four classes."[348]

[347] Id. at 285. The Court authorized 1,860 presumptive value adjustment awards, a process that was conducted through the submission of adjustment recommendations in 27 "batches," which were issued beginning with the first of several orders issued on June 30, 2010 and completed by order dated April 26, 2012.

[348] Id. at 286. By the end of the claims process, virtually all allocations (and thus all payments) had been increased by 45%, a process first initiated in 2002 when it became clear that the Settlement Fund had benefitted from the accrual of unanticipated interest, as well as the enactment of a U.S. law in 2001 which expressly exempted taxes

This adjustment also enabled the Court to "authorize a similar 45% increase in payments to those members of the Deposited Assets Class who have received awards of $5,000 each for plausible but undocumented claims [PUAs]. As is true for those with documented claims, these Holocaust victims and heirs have been adversely affected by the destruction of millions of bank records. There is a significant disparity between the PUA amount of $5,000, versus the current average value of an award based upon bank records and other documentation, approximately $149,000," an amount which would "increase once the presumptive values are adjusted upward."[349] Thus, each PUA recipient ultimately received a total payment of $7,250.

The Court's observation that the presumptive value adjustment process would be complicated, but would also confer significant benefits upon owners of many Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, was borne out. From a practical standpoint, the authorization of "bump-up" presumptive value payments to many of the same individuals who already had received an award posed significant administrative challenges. CRT staff members in Zurich were required to review each and every award previously issued, as well as those pending, to determine which recipients were entitled to which additional amounts. Because the amounts awarded varied depending on the type of account; the claimant's relation to the account owner; the number of recipients; the existence of prior payments possibly needing adjustment; and myriad other factors, the analysis was not "mechanical." It was not possible for the CRT simply to program a computer and run the numbers. Rather, each case required individualized review, and it was for that reason that the CRT was directed to begin this examination even while issues relating to Special Master Junz's proposal were still under review.

Supp. 2d 313, 325 (E.D.N.Y. 2002) ("After Special Master Judah Gribetz called attention to the diminution of the Settlement Fund by taxes on earned interest as well as the taxation of benefits awarded to the members of the classes," a successful effort was made "to persuade Congress to adopt legislation exempting from taxation interest earned by the Settlement Fund and payments to its beneficiaries").

349 Id. The average value of authorized awards at the close of the claims process was $185,263. The average value of awards paid was $184,130, reflecting that some awarded claimants or heirs could not be physically located after their awards were approved.

The case of Paul Friedmann and Elsa Friedmann provides an example of the complex process undertaken to ensure that account owners would receive individualized attention and proper compensation for their stolen property.[350] In a communication with a representative of the Holocaust Claims Processing Office, CRT Secretary General Mary Carter expressed her appreciation to the HCPO for calling to the CRT's attention a presumptive value adjustment in the Friedmann case that the CRT had not initially recommended. Ms. Carter explained how the case had worked its way through the CRT system, through several rounds of amendments, adjustments, and additional awards. The purpose of this complex process was to ensure that the Friedmanns' son (the claimant) received the benefit of all of the presumptions that had been adopted in favor of CRT claimants. Thus, as Ms. Carter explained:

> In the original award, which was approved in Batch 42 on 20 May 2004, we awarded one of Elsa's custody accounts at known value based upon value information contained in the bank records and in her 1938 Census declaration. Her other two custody accounts were awarded at presumptive value. Paul's two accounts (one custody, one demand deposit) were awarded at known value based upon the values he declared in his Census declaration (there was no corroborating value information in a bank record though).
> In the October 2004 amendment, Paul's two accounts were bumped up to presumptive value, based upon an Order of the Court that noted that account owners often underreported values in their Census declarations, and that, absent corroborating evidence regarding the account value, for example, value information contained in records from the bank, such accounts would be awarded at presumptive value. Elsa's known value custody account was not bumped up, because there was corroborating value evidence in the bank records.
>
> In the December 2004 amendment, we corrected a minor error in the October 2004 amendment amount that affected the calculation of the October 2004 amendment amount.
>
> In Batch 193, which was approved on 19 January 2010, we amended the known value of Elsa's custody account, because the previous known value was based upon the market values of three bonds in her account that were of good quality. For such bonds, we award the nominal value if the market value is below nominal value. The amendment thus increased the known value of this custody account, but it was still awarded at known value, because the bank record with the value information substantially corroborated the known value amount.

---

[350] In re Accounts of Paul Friedmann and Elsa Friedmann.

> In summary, after the original award and three amendments, we awarded four custody accounts and one demand deposit account. All but one of Elsa's custody accounts were awarded at presumptive value.
>
> The [presumptive value] adjustment decision, however, addresses only four accounts (three custody and one demand deposit). One of the custody accounts included in the bump up was properly not bumped up because it was awarded at known value. However, the adjustment decision failed to include one of Elsa's custody accounts that was awarded at presumptive value.
> We are drafting an amendment to the adjustment to correct this issue ….[351]

As a result of the Court's decision that it was proper to reassess whether Holocaust victims and heirs had received adequate compensation for their Swiss bank accounts, an additional $97 million was awarded for presumptive value adjustments, and another $28 million for increases to Plausible Undocumented Awards.

3. Recoupment of Overpayments

The effort to obtain "voluntary assistance" from the banks to develop the clearest possible picture for each claimed account sometimes resulted in information that was not favorable to the claim. In some cases, often years after the original award had been issued based upon the documentation then available to the CRT, the defendant bank subsequently provided the CRT with additional records indicating that the account had been overpaid, or should not have been paid at all, because the owner or an heir had received the proceeds. In such cases, if the account turned out to be eligible for an upward adjustment due to an amendment or supplemental payment, the CRT would deduct the overpayment.[352] Where that was not possible, the Court did not require the CRT to seek an actual repayment from the claimant, because the claimant was not at fault. He or she did not know of the overpayment, and likely had already spent it or otherwise earmarked it. Rather, it was the lack of a complete record at the outset of the claims process that caused the miscalculation.

For example, in In re Account of Oskar Kraus, the account was a custody account for which no valuation information was available at the time the award was made, and so the custody account was awarded at the then-prevailing presumptive value. The bank later provided the CRT with information showing that Mr. Kraus had held ten different securities in his custody account. The actual value of these securities was somewhat lower than the amount that had been awarded (i.e. lower than presumptive value). On the other hand, Mr. Kraus also had owned a demand deposit account, which the CRT had awarded based upon the actual amount in the account. Subsequently, the Court authorized the CRT to presume that, absent evidence to the contrary, accounts with known values that were lower than presumptive value might have been looted or reduced by fees. These accounts were to be awarded at the higher presumptive value. Oskar Kraus's demand deposit account was slated for an upward adjustment. Therefore, the CRT made two calculations: the amount due for the increase in the demand deposit account, and the amount overpaid for the custody account. After these two adjustments, the CRT determined that the original award (SF 716,197.20 ($555,191.63)) had been overpaid by SF 1,757.68 (using 1945 values). The CRT observed that the award had been "based upon information available to the CRT at the time. Accordingly, the CRT does not seek outright repayment of the overpayment from the Claimant. However, because the original … Award was overpaid, no further amount is awarded in this Award Amendment. Moreover, the overpayment amount shall be deducted from any award amendment that may be forthcoming."[353]

The Court's June 16, 2010 order authorizing upward adjustment of presumptive values also permitted the CRT to recoup any overpayments that might have been made, by offsetting that amount from any presumptive value adjustment due to a claimant, whether in the same award or in a different award for another account or account owner.[354]

353 In re Account of Oskar Kraus.

354 In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 731 F. Supp. 2d at 291. Subsequently, the Court approved certain "recoupments" in connection with the presumptive value adjustments. See, e.g., Memorandum & Order Approving Set 16: 27 Adjustments Certified by the Claims Resolution Tribunal Pursuant to Article 31(2) of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 09-160 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 23, 2010) ("In virtually all of these 27 decisions, the post-award information provided by the Banks to the CRT demonstrates that the original award was inappropriate because (1) the account owner identified in the bank records was not the same individual as the claimant's relative; (2) the account was closed prior to 1933 (in the case of Germany) or, in the case of other nations, prior to the date that the account owner's country of residence was occupied by or entered into an alliance with Nazi Germany; or (3) the account owner clearly received the proceeds of the account. In all 27 Certified Adjustments…, the CRT does not seek outright repayment of funds that were awarded based on the incomplete information available to the CRT at the time the original award was made. However, in these cases, given that the additional information has shown that all or a

VI. OTHER POLICIES AND PROCEDURES FAVORING CLAIMANTS

In addition to adopting an array of substantive rules intended to compensate for the banks' destruction of records by substituting historically appropriate presumptions where documentary evidence no longer existed, the Court also instructed the CRT to incorporate a variety of procedural mechanisms to assist class members. Among these were the Court's decision to authorize payment of "Plausible Undocumented Awards;" to permit multiple plausible but unrelated claimants to share an award on a pro rata basis; to allow informal "Initial Questionnaires" to substitute for claim forms; and to authorize several extensions of the filing deadlines to ensure that no claimant was excluded from the process for technical reasons.

A. Payment of "Plausible Undocumented Awards ('PUAs')"

1. Rationale

Under Article 22(3) of the CRT Rules approved by the Court, the CRT had authority to recommend an award "in a case in which the Claimant plausibly establishes a right to an Account that falls within the CRT's jurisdiction but which, for whatever reasons, was not identified during the ICEP Investigation and therefore cannot be subject to Matching and/or Research."[355]

From the outset of the claims process, there was always an emphasis upon obtaining unfettered access to as much of the documentary evidence as possible. Accordingly, the Court, Special Masters and CRT pressed Swiss banking authorities for additional publication of account owner names and additional production of bank records.

Nevertheless, despite these efforts, the banks' destruction of records for nearly 2.8 million Holocaust-era accounts had left an "'unfillable gap' that [could] never be known or analyzed for their relationship to victims of Nazi Persecution."[356] Furthermore, "of the remaining 4 million Holocaust-era Swiss accounts for which records still exist, Swiss banking authorities generally have limited the CRT's access only to those in the 'Account History Database' ('AHD'), consisting of approximately 36,000 accounts. Of these 36,000 accounts, Swiss authorities have permitted publication of only approximately 24,000 (21,000 in 2001, and 3,000 in 2005)."[357]

Thus, "for many thousands of claimants, there [were] no existing documents that would prove that they or their family members owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts." To assist these individuals, the Court "directed the CRT to commence an analysis of all of the Deposited Assets claims to determine whether an award should be recommended even in the absence of bank records or other documentation proving the existence of an account."[358]

There was precedent for awards based upon testimonial but not documentary evidence, both under the Court's distribution process relating to other classes, and in other areas of Holocaust restitution.

> As pointed out by the Special Master[s], in similar circumstances, the Court has recognized the propriety of approving awards to claimants who have provided plausible but undocumented evidence that they performed slave labor for a German entity that transacted its profits through Switzerland (Slave Labor Class I) or for a Swiss company (Slave Labor Class II), or were refugees who were expelled from or mistreated in Switzerland (Refugee Class). While the claims of the overwhelming majority of former slave laborers and many of the refugees have been demonstrated through documentary evidence, including archival records obtained from German and Swiss governmental and private entities, it is clear that the claimants' testimonial evidence also must be taken into consideration because the underlying documentation has been destroyed.
> [Further, a] similar program was under way in connection with the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims ('ICHEIC'), which under its

356 Memorandum & Order Approving 105 Plausible Undocumented Awards [PUAs] Certified by the Claims resolution Tribunal (Swiss Deposited Assets Program) Pursuant to Article 31(2) of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process and Authorizing Payment from the Settlement Fund 3, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. "8A2" program has made payments of $1,000.00 to claimants for whom insurance policies could not be located.[359]

Thus, while the "effort to obtain access to additional bank records and to permit publication of additional Holocaust-era account owner names" continued, a "parallel effort[]" was taking place during which "protocols were developed for reviewing the plausibility of undocumented Deposited Assets claims."[360] Because it was anticipated that there would be a new claims filing period following publication of additional names (i.e. the 2005 List), the plan to issue awards for claims without documentary evidence was not publicly announced for some time. Specifically, "the decision was made to permit the new claims period to run [in connection with the 2005 List] to ensure that certain unscrupulous individuals did not take advantage of the new filing period to submit spurious claims [for Plausible Undocumented Awards] that could have relied heavily upon information set forth in claim forms filed in connection with the 2001 publication."[361] Once the claims filing deadline for the 2005 List expired, the PUA process could be publicly announced — as it was, with the Court's Order of February 17, 2006 — and awards could be made. Each PUA was to be in the amount of $5,000 per recipient, an amount subsequently increased to $7,250 by Order of June 16, 2010.

2. The PUA Review Process

The New York-based Swiss Deposited Assets Program (SDAP) was tasked with responsibility for reviewing all of the more than 104,000 claims to determine those which were plausible, based upon testimonial and other circumstantial evidence of an account. To that end, SDAP developed an analytical framework to ensure that seemingly subjective information would be assessed critically, and in accordance with a set of objective criteria.

First, SDAP determined whether the claims met the admissibility criteria as described in Article 18 of the CRT Rules. Thus, each claimant was required to plausibly demonstrate that his or her relative (the Claimed Account Owner or "CAO") was a "victim or target of Nazi persecution," as defined under the Settlement Agreement.

Second, eligibility for awards was limited to those family members most likely to have personal knowledge of the existence of a Swiss bank account, as well as to those likely to be the most direct heirs to the account. Awards were recommended only for those persons in the "circle of heirs": the children, spouse, parents, siblings or grandchildren of the Claimed Account Owner.

Third, each claimant was eligible for one PUA and one payment only, regardless of the number of relatives he or she believed had owned Swiss bank accounts (the Claimed Account Owners).

Fourth, claims were assessed according to the amount and detail of biographical information that the claimant had supplied in connection with the Claimed Account Owner. The greatest weight was given to claims in which the claimant indicated that the CAO had a specific connection to Switzerland, showing the opportunity to open and maintain a bank account and increasing the likelihood that the account existed. Considerable weight also was given to claims in which the claimant indicated that the search for the family's Holocaust-era Swiss accounts had been undertaken prior to 1997, when the Swiss bank account issue and the resulting litigation became highly publicized.[362]

Finally, SDAP prioritized claims based upon the age of the claimants, awarding the eldest first.

A "scoring system" was presented to and approved by the Special Masters and the Court, and technology teams thereafter created and tested the database. The teams consisted of SDAP attorneys as well as computer technicians employed by the Claims Conference (for the SDAP side of the project), the CRT, and outside advisers engaged by SDAP on behalf of the Court (Forensic Risk Alliance or "FRA"). SDAP staff navigated through a controlled scoring system by answering questions with a Yes/No answer, which would result in "scoring" of the claims with a particular number. Claims given a "passing" score contained enough information to plausibly demonstrate that there had been a Swiss Holocaust account; that the claimant had given adequate biographical information about the Claimed Account Owner; and that the claimant indicated that the Claimed Account Owner had a specific connection to Switzerland during the Relevant Period.[363]

Once the database was created, tested and approved, the claims review process began in earnest. SDAP employed five staff attorneys, five supervisors, approximately 25-30 claims analysts during a day shift, and approximately 25 claims analysts during an evening shift. As with other facets of the program, the language capabilities of the staff were diverse, since the claim forms were originally distributed in English, Hebrew, German, French and Russian, and the Initial Questionnaires (IQs) were in multiple languages (including English, Hebrew, German, Hungarian, Russian, French, Spanish, Polish, Portuguese, Czech, Romanian, Dutch, Slovakian, Serbo-Croatian, Italian, Latvian, Greek, Bulgarian, Danish, Yiddish and Ukrainian).

There were several levels of review of all claims (including IQs). The claim initially was reviewed by a claims analyst, based on his/her language capabilities, then by a supervisor, and then by a staff attorney. All passing claims were re-evaluated by a staff attorney to ensure that the claim was indeed eligible for an award. Similarly, many claims that did not "pass" initial review were re-evaluated to ensure that all relevant information had been taken into account. As true for CRT staff, SDAP staff members were advised to adhere to three principal precepts: (1) "If in doubt, make all decisions in favor of the claimant;" (2) "Make sure to read every word on every page of the Claim Form, IQ, and attachments. It has happened that a key phrase was found on page 17 of the attachments, changing the claim from one that is denied to one that receives an

[363] A similar process was utilized in reviewing so-called "humanitarian" claims in the ICHEIC process (which, like SDAP, also operated at the offices of the Claims Conference). See INTERNATIONAL MASS CLAIMS PROCESSES at 35 ("The term 'humanitarian' is used in this context to describe claims that insurance companies had no legal obligation to pay because of absence of evidence sufficient to prove that the policy ever existed. Thus, in recognition of the widespread destruction of documents during and after World War II, a special 'Point Scoring System' was developed to award 'points' to the unnamed and unmatched claims based on anecdotal information on the claim form about the alleged existence of a Holocaust era insurance policy"). ICHEIC "humanitarian" payments were issued in the amount of $1,000 (as compared with the $7,250 awarded for Swiss Banks Settlement PUAs). As true for PUAs, "[o]nly one award was granted per successful claimant …, regardless of the number of claims submitted or the number of policies alleged to have existed." Id. at 72. In both processes, further, the scoring system, review process and assessment of claims were subject to outside supervision. In the case of PUAs, there was ongoing management and direct review by the Special Masters acting on behalf of the Court. For ICHEIC payments, a "delegate from the Senior Counselor's office [of ICHEIC] came to the … processing facility in New York to observe claims review procedures and conduct sample reviews of scored claims." Id. at 198.

award….;" and (3) "Review each claim as if it was your first one today, as if it was your grandmother's….."[364]

In analyzing the claims, SDAP staff members drew upon their historical knowledge and archival research, and also adhered to a variety of guidelines to ensure that all claims were evaluated consistently and were based upon equitable and objective criteria. As a preliminary matter, each claim first was assessed to ensure that the Claimed Account Owner was a class member: someone targeted for persecution because he or she was believed to be Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or disabled. SDAP staff also considered the nature of the information the claimant had provided about the Claimed Account Owner: his or her full name; business or occupation (including type, size, and location); professional title if any; community position if relevant (such as "head of the local merchant association"); pre-War address (including street address if available); post-War residence; place of birth; date of birth; date of death; nationality; and experiences during the Holocaust era.

The depositor's contacts with Switzerland also were considered, such as whether the claimant's relative owned assets belonging to a Swiss entity (such as stocks or bonds); had business dealings with a Swiss entity, or had international dealings, in which case a business relationship with a Swiss entity would be presumed; had a secondary residence in Switzerland or used a Swiss address whether in actuality or as a pretext; had a child enrolled in a Swiss school; had a relative living in Switzerland; and/or traveled to Switzerland.

SDAP staff also reviewed the claimant materials to determine whether the claimant had been able to provide information about the bank account, such as the name of the Swiss bank in which the account owner was believed to have deposited his or her assets; the bank's location; the type of account; whether it was numbered (i.e. under password); the name of the account officer; the use of an intermediary in opening the account, whether in Switzerland or through a local branch or post office; the amount of the deposit; and/or whether the claimant had witnessed the opening of the account, the making of deposits or the review of bank documents.

364 See SDAP Plausible Undocumented Awards Claim Evaluation Guidelines at 2 (emphasis in original).

In total, by the end of 2005 — after the filing period for the 2005 List had expired but prior to the Court's February 17, 2006 announcement of the new PUA process — SDAP had evaluated virtually all of the approximately 104,000 claims in the database.

3. Secondary Review: Ensuring That All Plausible Claims Were Compensated

In 2007, SDAP conducted a strategic re-review of particular failing claims: those with newly-added claimant correspondence, those whose score was on the borderline, and a review of the relationship component of all borderline claims falling outside the "circle of heirs." In addition, the Special Masters and the Court recommended reanalysis of claims filed by individuals who, themselves, were Nazi victims. Often such claimants, who typically were elderly, had not understood that in addition to describing their own experiences during the Holocaust, the claim forms had sought to elicit the biographical details of relatives believed to have owned the account. SDAP staff also reexamined IQs with strong "connections" to Switzerland, but that were missing adequate biographical information (as was typical of IQs). In total, in the 2007 project, SDAP re-reviewed approximately 30,000 individual failing claims.

Additionally, SDAP re-reviewed every claim in which the primary claimant also represented family members (co-claimants), to identify and award all claimant family members who would be eligible for a PUA. If a power of attorney form was found in the claimant's file, indicating that the claimant was representing a family member, that family member would then be considered a co-claimant. If the co-claimant met all other PUA eligibility criteria, an award recommendation was submitted to the Court. If there was no power of attorney form attached to the claim form, but there was a clear intention by the claimant to represent an eligible family member, an SDAP staff member would then contact the claimant and solicit a power of attorney form so that the eligible family member also would receive a PUA.

In many instances, SDAP was contacted by claimants who did not receive a PUA but whose relative — who had filed a claim form or IQ — had received a PUA, based upon information provided for the same claimed relative's account. For example, several cousins might have submitted separate claims for the account of their grandfather, but only one of the cousins may have "passed" under the scoring system, and received an award. In these cases, SDAP joined the "failing" claims to the "passing" claims, and recommended an award for the "failing" claimant(s) based upon the information provided by the relative whose claim had "passed" PUA review.

There were multiple levels of review of each batch to ensure uniformity of the submissions, from supervisors to staff attorneys. Furthermore, each submission was reviewed and approved by the Special Masters, who would receive a scoring sheet and all claim forms, IQs and a summary of relevant claimant correspondence. As extra layer of consistency, the Special Masters also reviewed a portion of the underlying claims and documentation for every PUA batch submitted to the Court.

4. Increase in PUA Payments

In the same 2010 order in which it authorized an increase in presumptive values for documented accounts, the Court also authorized an increase of $2,250 for awards based upon testimonial and other documents (PUAs). This amount represented a 45% increase in the PUA amount, and thus maintained symmetry between the Deposited Assets Class and the other four classes, all of which had already received 45% increases. As true for those with documented claims, PUA recipients had been adversely affected by the destruction of millions of bank records. The Court found that while it was impossible to determine with certainty the true value of an award premised upon an account for which all records had been obliterated, there was no doubt that many PUA recipients had received far less than the payments that would have been made, had their account documents not been destroyed by the Swiss banks. Those with plausible but undocumented Deposited Assets claims thus were entitled to receive the same 45% increase accorded to members of the other four classes, whose legal claims were weaker.

B. Awarding Documented Accounts on a Pro Rata Basis to Unrelated but Equally Plausible Claimants ("Multiple Plausible Matches" or "MPMs")

There were many accounts for which account owner information was limited because so many records were destroyed. As a result, there often were several plausible claimants to the same account: sometimes two, sometimes five or more. All showed "a plausible connection to the account owner because all that [was] known from the bank records [was] the owner's name, and perhaps country."[365] As an example, the account owner could have been listed in the bank files as "Isaac Meyer" from "Austria," and five unrelated claimants might have shown that they had a relative named Isaac Meyer who had a connection to Austria at some point during the period 1933-1945.

The Court considered various approaches to this issue, including denying all of the competing claims because there was no way to determine which claimant actually (as opposed to plausibly) was related to the account owner. The Court rejected that approach as one that would penalize claimants for the banks' destruction of account records. Rather than turning away all of the competing plausible claims, the Court concluded that it was appropriate to award all of them, dividing the proceeds of the account on a pro rata basis.

Thus, for example, in In re Account of Emil Kaufmann, the bank records consisted of "an excerpt from a collective account ledger and printouts from the Bank's database." The records indicated that Emil Kaufmann owned a savings/passbook account numbered 4523, which was transferred on April 6, 1970 to a collective account, at which date it reportedly held SF 0.20. The CRT located 1938 Census records concerning an individual named Emil Kaufmann, which indicated that he was a bank official and a childless widower. However, the bank records did not contain any identifying information about Emil Kaufmann other than his name, and so it was not possible for the CRT to determine whether the person identified in the 1938 Census records was the same person named in the bank records.

Four different and unrelated individuals claimed the account. The first claimant stated that Emil Kaufmann was her great-uncle, who had been a lawyer in Germany. He perished in Auschwitz. The second claimant stated that Emil Kaufmann was his father, who lived in what is now Slovakia and who managed a granary. He fled to the mountains and joined the partisans after the Nazis murdered his first wife and daughter. He remarried after the Holocaust. The third claimant, named Emil Kaufmann, stated that he himself was the account owner. He was born in Romania and his father owned a jewelry store. He was deported to Birkenau, and immigrated to Palestine after the war. The fourth claimant stated that Emil Kaufmann was his cousin, a director of the Wiener Bankverein. He fled to the United States in 1939 or 1940 after the Nazis had confiscated his assets. As the bank records contained only the account owner's name, and the date on which the account was transferred to a collective account, the CRT determined that all four claims were plausible. Accordingly, each claimant received one-quarter of the total award.

Of the 2,950 awards, 236 (8%) were MPMs, and these were awarded to a total of 867 claimants. Of these MPM awards, 131 involved two competing claimants or sets of claimants; 62 involved three competing claimants or sets of claimants; 29 involved four competing claimants or sets of claimants; 13 involved five competing claimants or sets of claimants, and 1 involved six competing claimants or sets of claimants.

In general, where more than five claimants or groups of claimants plausibly asserted claims to the same account, the Court adopted the CRT's recommendation to treat these cases in a different manner. They were not to be divided up as "MPMs," but rather were referred to the alternative "Plausible Undocumented Award" process. If the appropriate criteria were satisfied, each claimant was eligible for an award of $7,250. The Court explained the rationale as follows:

> As the number of unrelated claimants or groups of claimants increases …, the probability that any one of those claimants' relatives is the actual account owner, as well as the amount of the award, is reduced.
> One option to treat such accounts would be to deny all claimants whose relatives' names matched to the names of the account owners and recommend no payment on the basis of these accounts. However, as the CRT has observed, this option would be unfair, as the impossibility of making an identity determination is due entirely to the destruction of account owner information in the bank records. The CRT therefore recommends that in … cases in which six or more claimants or groups of claimants plausibly have identified the account owner, rather than dividing the account on a pro rata basis, the claims instead be considered for Plausible Undocumented Awards ("PUAs"). In my February 17, 2006 Memorandum and Order approving the first set of PUAs, I explained that such awards attempted to compensate for the burdens imposed upon claimants due to the massive destruction of Swiss bank records relating to Holocaust-era accounts. Here too, the inability to definitively identify the account owner is due to the destruction of records by the Swiss banks. At the same time, it would be inappropriate to award the account on a pro rata basis among so many competing claimants, when the likelihood of the account belonging to any one of the claimants' relatives is no more than 17% for six or more competing claims.

> Obviously as the number of such claims increases, the likelihood of ownership — and the share of the award — is even further diminished.[366]

Utilizing this procedure, the Court approved the CRT's recommendation to deny 362 claims because in each case, six or more claimants or groups of claimants plausibly had identified the account owner as a relative. All 362 claims were referred to the PUA process "in accordance with the criteria established for the issuance of a PUA (including requirements concerning the degree of relationship between the claimant and the claimed account owner; the ineligibility for a claimant to receive more than one PUA; and other criteria)."[367] Upon review, a total of 134 of these claims subsequently were approved for PUAs.[368]

In some instances where the Court authorized multiple unrelated claimants to share an award on a pro rata basis, other less plausible claims also had been filed to the same accounts. In such cases, the CRT observed that there was "very little information" about the account owner, and recommended that such claims be denied. As the CRT explained: "[T]he CRT considers such factors as an account owner's city or country of residence, profession, nationality, and/or names of family members. Since such information about the account owner is not available in this case, the CRT considers other, more detailed and nuanced factors. Such factors include, but are not limited to, whether a claimant identified an exact spelling of the account owner's name; whether the claimant was able to provide documentation linking his or her surname to that of the account owner, thereby demonstrating a familial relationship to a person with the same name as the account owner; whether a claimant identified the account owner's name prior to its publication, or despite the fact that the name was never published; and/or whether the fate of the claimant's relative is consistent with the disposition of the claimed account. Based upon these considerations, matches between this account and less plausible claims were disconfirmed, and those claims were excluded from this decision."[369]

C. Prioritizing Certain Claims

At the inception of the process, when the CRT had only preliminary estimates of the number of claims that would be filed and the total amount that would be paid, awards issued to claimants under the age of 75 were paid in three installments of 30%, 35% and 35%. This was intended to ensure that sufficient funds would be available from the up to $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class to pay all claims at least on a pro rata basis, until it could be determined whether the awards all could be paid in full.

Even so, priority was given to the review of claims submitted by elderly claimants. Further, claimants who were aged 75 or older always received the full amount of their award in one payment. That payment method was later amended to provide for payment in full of all awards, regardless of age. Payment of accounts for which the CRT determined the actual value always were issued in full.

D. Incorporation of Initial Questionnaires and CRT-I Claim Forms into the Claims Process

1. Rationale

Shortly after the Settlement Agreement was executed, and during the period in which the Court was analyzing the agreement to ensure that it was fair and warranted approval, plaintiffs' class counsel established a "notice" program to inform Holocaust victims and heirs of the proposed settlement. As part of the notice program, interested persons were asked to submit "Initial Questionnaires" ("IQs"). These documents were designed to provide background information about the scope of the class, but were not intended to serve as actual claim forms.

> However, it became clear as the claims process moved forward that at least with respect to claims for Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, many individuals believed they had already "applied" to the CRT program by submitting an IQ. Therefore, they never filed CRT claim forms. After surveying the data that had > been provided in the IQs, the Court by order of July 30, 2001 directed that those IQs with sufficient information should be treated as claim forms: Prior to my approval of the Settlement Agreement and before the inception of the claims process, class members were invited to submit IQs [Initial Questionnaires] which were "for information purposes only, to let us know the address at which we can mail you future notices regarding any claims process, and to give us information about your particular circumstances." Class members were advised that "completion of this questionnaire does not entitle you to any Settlement funds." See Initial Questionnaire. Nevertheless, in recognition that "many Respondents erroneously understood that the IQ is a claim form and that no other claim form had to be submitted to qualify for a Deposited Assets award … to assure that Class Members with Deposited Assets claims are not precluded by technical procedural requirements from having fairly and timely presented claims fairly adjudicated," I ordered those IQs which can be processed as claim forms to be treated as timely claims. See Order Concerning Use of Initial Questionnaire Responses as Claim Forms in the Claims Resolution Process for Deposited Assets (July 30, 2001). Thus, although the IQs generally contained less information than the Deposited Assets Class claim forms, approximately 70,000 other class members…have been deemed to have filed a timely claim and have been given the opportunity to supplement their IQs with additional documentation.[370]

In a later decision, the scope of the documentation that would be permitted to serve as Deposited Assets Class claim forms was again expanded: specifically, "those claims filed subsequent to the publication of account owner names in July and October, 1997, prior to the completion of the [ICEP audit]."[371]

Before the CRT process that operated under the Court's authority — CRT-II — there had been a previous process, CRT-I. That program had adjudicated approximately 9,000 claims to 5,570 mostly non-Holocaust victim accounts published in 1997. "Although many claimants who filed claims to unpublished accounts subsequently filed claims with the CRT II in connection with the publication of an additional list of account owner names on February 1, 2001, the CRT

[370] Order at 1-2, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 10, 2008). Of approximately 600,000 Initial Questionnaires, a review process led by the HCPO, with the help of volunteer law students and others acting under the Court's supervision, indicated that approximately 70,000 of these IQs contained information relating to a possible Deposited Assets Class claim. These 70,000 IQs were deemed "claim forms" for CRT review. Subsequently, to make certain that the correct IQs had been characterized as Deposited Assets Claims, SDAP reviewed a random sample of some 51,000 forms that were flagged as "Non Deposited-Assets Claims." SDAP's review confirmed that the original review had been appropriate. There was only a small margin of error, 1.2% of all IQs reviewed, found to include some information relating to a possible Deposited Assets Class claim.

[371] Order Concerning Use of ICEP Claims as Claim Forms in the Claims Resolution Process for Deposited Assets at 1, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 30, 2004).

II has identified approximately 4,610 claims for which no corresponding CRT II claim form was filed pursuant to the February 1, 2001 publication. These 4,610 claims were submitted to CRT I, ATAG Ernst & Young [one of the ICEP auditors], and ICEP."[372]

Many of these claims contained "sufficient detail to constitute a claim for Deposited Assets," and "many claimants believed erroneously that the previous claim was sufficient for claiming under the Settlement Agreement and that no other claim form needed to be submitted" under the Court's process. Thus, "to assure that no Class Member with Deposited Assets claims is precluded by technical procedural requirements from having fairly and timely presented claims fairly adjudicated," the Court approved Special Master Junz's proposal that the 4,610 "CRT I" claims be treated as timely CRT II claim forms.[373]

2. The Impact of the IQs Upon the Claims Process: Over 1.5 Million Matches Analyzed by the CRT; Acceptance of Additional Competing Claims

The inclusion of IQs and CRT-I claim forms had an immediate impact upon claims processing activities. With the expansion of the pool of claims from approximately 32,000 (the number of formal claim forms filed with the CRT), to over 104,000 (due to the acceptance of IQs and CRT-I claims), the scope of the CRT's task took on a new dimension. The CRT now was charged with comparing over 104,000 claims, and more than 415,000 account owner names provided in these 104,000 claims, against 37,954 names in the AHD. The result was that approximately 1.5 million matches were generated that needed to be individually reviewed.

The first issue was a practical one. The CRT had been using a program known as the "Claims Adjudication System," or "CAS." This system worked well for the approximately 32,000 formal CRT-II claim forms, but was not equipped to handle an infusion of another 70,000 claims when IQs and CRT-I forms were accepted into the process. Accordingly, the CRT was required to transition to a new program, the "Claims Processing System" ("CPS"). This required the CRT to halt some of its claims processing activities while the new system was installed.

Once CPS was operative, the 1.5 million matches needed to be analyzed. The matching process was time-consuming. Some of the matches could be eliminated fairly quickly by comparing only the matched names (and determining, for example, that the individuals were of different genders). The remaining matches, however, were manually reviewed to determine if the person in the bank records was the same person as the claimant's relative. Confirmed matches led to additional analysis by the CRT to determine who closed the account; when it was closed; and its value at the time of closure.

The decision to include IQs had another significant impact upon the claims process. It was only after the claims process was under way that it became clear that many individuals, including elderly survivors, had assumed that their IQs constituted formal claims, the impetus for including the 70,000 IQs with Deposited Assets information. However, by this point, matching already had taken place, and awards already were being issued. When entered into the CPS system, IQs (as well as claim forms) that had not been previously available sometimes matched to accounts that already had been awarded. In most instances, the Court authorized the CRT to award the newly-matched claimant the amount to which he or she was entitled, regardless of the fact that the account already had been awarded to one or more different claimants.

In In re Account of Ernst Moser, for example, the CPS program enabled the CRT to locate another potentially matching claim, which had been submitted as an IQ only. The "new" claimant was not related to the brother and sister who had received the original awards. Those awardees had identified the account owner as their father, an attorney who was forced to flee from Austria after the Anschluss. They had received an award of SF 125,500.00 ($100,400.00) for three accounts held at two Swiss banks. The "new" claimant identified the account owner as his father, a Berlin dentist who repeatedly had been turned away from the Swiss border. While this "new" claimant was not related to the two original recipients, his claim was equally plausible in light of the sparse data about the account owner that remained in the bank files. Had both claims been known to the CRT at the outset (i.e., the claim from the siblings whose father was an Austrian attorney, and the claim from the individual whose father was a Berlin dentist), the claims would have been treated as equally plausible ("MPMs"), and each would have received one-half of the value of the accounts. However, the CRT "[r]ecogniz[ed] that over two years [had] passed since [the original award] and that there is no indication that [the original recipients] were aware that another equally entitled person had filed a claim." Thus, the original claimants were not asked to return their payments. At the same time, the "new" claimant was awarded what would have been his share of the original award had his IQ been processed at the outset (SF 62,750 ($51,016.26)).

Likewise, in In re Account of Elsa Steiner, the CRT originally had awarded the account (of unknown type) to two unrelated claimants. Each received one-half the total award of SF 49,375.00 ($39,500.00). The first claimant identified Elsa Steiner as her sister, who had lived in Hungary with her children and husband, a furrier, and who had been killed in Auschwitz with her children. The second claimant identified herself as Elsa Steiner, one of three children of a hardware store owner in Horažďovice, Czechoslovakia. She stated that her father was killed in Auschwitz. Subsequently, the CPS system located a third plausible claimant, who indicated in her IQ that Elsa Steiner was her aunt, from Prague, who had perished in a concentration camp. Since the bank records showed only that the account was owned by someone named Elsa Steiner (without reference to her country of residence) and that it had been transferred to the bank's suspense account on December 14, 1987, all three claimants would have been deemed equally entitled to the account, had all of their claims been available at the outset of the match review analysis. Accordingly, the CRT recommended that the third claimant receive the share to which she would have been entitled, SF 16,458.33, had her claim been processed initially. As to the payments made to the two original awardees, the CRT observed that "more than three years have passed since the [original] award" and there was "no indication that" either claimant was aware that "another equally entitled person had filed a claim." Thus, the CRT did not seek "outright repayment of the overpayment" under the original award. However, anticipating the possible upward adjustment of presumptive values (as indeed occurred with the Court's order of June 16, 2010), the CRT noted that "the amount of overpayment shall be deducted from any award adjustment that may be forthcoming..."

The majority of the over 104,000 claim forms (62,766, or 60%) were IQs. The claims administrators did not originally expect the IQs to serve as claim forms, and perhaps neither did many of the claimants. Unlike Deposited Assets claim forms, the questions presented in the IQs did not focus solely on Swiss deposited assets, but also requested information related to other issues addressed by the settlement process as a whole, such as slave labor, refugee status and looted assets. Accordingly, many IQ claimants provided detailed information about one category of claim, with less information about others. Many of those who had completed IQs may never have intended to claim a Swiss bank account. However, those IQs with information about bank accounts subsequently were deemed to be claim forms, in the interests of equity, because the person filling out the IQ had given some type of indication that a relative might have owned a Swiss bank account.

Of the claims receiving awards, nearly 75% resulted from a formal CRT claim filed in connection with the 2001 publication. Another 4% of the awards arose from CRT claim forms filed in connection with the 2005 publication. Therefore, a total of 79% of the awards were generated by formal claim forms filed in response to the 2001 and 2005 Lists. Another 5% of awards were associated with claim forms filed with the HCPO, and 2% were associated with claim forms filed in connection with the 1997 pre-Settlement publication. Thus, 86% of the awards were the result of formal claim forms, whether filed specifically via the CRT process, or through the HCPO or ICEP programs. Far fewer awards — under 14% — were generated by Initial Questionnaires. This disparity is not surprising, given that the Initial Questionnaires had not been designed or designated as claim forms; had not been intended to capture the same type of detailed information; and had not been expected to be treated as claim forms.

Another way to consider this data is that the inclusion of approximately 63,000 IQs as claims, along with the 41,000 formal claim forms (for a total of 104,000 claims) lowered the award ratio for the Deposited Assets Class. If the 41,000 claim forms alone are considered, then more than one-third of these claims received awards.[374]

3. The Outcome: the IQs and CRT-I Claim Forms Yield Additional Awards

The IQs ultimately did not result in a very large number of additional awards. The desire to leave no stone unturned, by including the IQs as claim forms, required considerable resources and prolonged the CRT process. Nevertheless, many of these awards were substantial, and all of them certainly were significant to their recipients.

[374] A total of 15,251 awards were made: 2,950 awards for documented accounts, and 12,301 for PUAs (http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents/Distribution%20Stats.pdf). Because awards generally were paid to more than one claimant, the number of recipients of these 2,950 awards was considerably higher (5,248). Id.

One such example is the case of In re Account of Jules Roos N.V. The claimants (the daughter of Jules Roos, and her nephew, Jules Roos' grandson), had filed an Initial Questionnaire but not a claim form. Jules Roos N.V. was an Amsterdam bank wholly owned by Jules Roos of Amsterdam. In August 1939, anticipating Nazi persecution, Jules Roos abandoned his business and home and fled to Montreal. He died in 1968 in Lima, Peru. The Swiss bank records showed that the Amsterdam bank Jules Roos N.V. held a custody account that was closed on April 30, 1940, as well as a second account of unknown type, which was closed as of July 28, 1942. Jules Roos N.V. was aryanized, after which its accounts became a subject of some discussion within the Swiss bank. As described by the CRT, "[a]ccording to a letter from the Account Owner to the Bank, dated 4 May 1942, Jules Roos N.V. was placed under a Nazi administrator, Herr (Mr.) Heinrich G. Fousek, by order of the Reichskommissar … for the occupied Dutch territories."

In recommending that the account of unknown type be awarded to the claimants,[375] the CRT observed that "the account remained open after the closure of the custody account and was still open as of 3 June 1942. The CRT notes that at this time, Jules Roos N.V. was under the authority of a Nazi-appointed administrator and that, although the Bank did not fully recognize the right of this administrator to dispose over the account, it had agreed internally to honor the requests of the administrator to dispose of the account since the account had a low balance of SF 15.00." Since the administrator, not the account owner, received the proceeds of the account, the bank owner's daughter was awarded SF 49,375.00 ($40,805.79).

Similarly, in In re Account of Monika Hofmann, the claimant (who was also the account owner, and who had filed only an IQ) was born in Germany. Her father was Romani, and he had opened a Swiss bank account in his daughter's name. He owned a five-stage puppet theater until 1934, when Nazis looted the theater. He was a forced laborer for the German military between 1944 and 1945. The bank records showed that the account owner, Monika Hofmann, held an [375] The custody account was not awarded because it was closed prior to the Nazi invasion of the Netherlands and the account owner was presumed to have received the proceeds.

account of unknown type. On November 10, 1976, it held SF 65.05, and it was transferred to a suspense account. The account remained in the bank's suspense account. Because the reported value of the account was lower than presumptive value, the CRT applied the presumption that the reported value likely reflected looting of the account or imposition of fees, and the claimant received the presumptive value of the account.[376]

E. Multiple Extensions of Filing Deadlines and Review of Late Claims

At the outset of the claims process, CRT Special Masters Volcker and Bradfield recommended, and the Court adopted, a filing deadline of August 5, 2001. That deadline was extended to August 31, 2001.[377] Thereafter, the filing deadline was extended for all claims "filed before January 1, 2003, that include a reason for their tardiness … provided that there is no prejudice to a timely claimant (unless the late claimant is the Account Owner)."[378]

Subsequently, the deadline was extended again. The Court noted that "for the period January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2004, the CRT has identified and received to date an additional 645 late claims to deposited assets and 18 late claims to insurance policies…." The Court found that "it would be inequitable to exclude late claims filed by persons who are more entitled to the proceeds of the claimed account than timely claimants," but also "recognizes the need for expeditious review of accounts, the necessity for an equitable balance in the treatment of timely and late claims, and the urgency for finality of decisions." The Court thus "distinguishe[d] between late claims to accounts not yet awarded, and those to awarded accounts." Whereas late claims to unawarded accounts "would not adversely impact the claims resolution process, the acceptance of late claims to awarded accounts would hinder this review and could lead to an endless revisiting of decisions that would unnecessarily extend" the process. Further, "where an award has been made, payment of the late claim operates to the prejudice of the Settlement Fund, because it means double payment of the same account which the CRT may not be able to recoup from the timely filed claimant. Indeed, if such recoupment was possible it would involve needless expense and effort."[379]

378 Memorandum & Order at 3, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 8, 2003) (noting that "the determination that excusable neglect exists in this case for claims filed by December 31, 2002, takes into account that most of the claimants to accounts created more than 60 years ago are necessarily elderly, with many having suffered the trauma of the Holocaust, giving credibility to claims of misunderstood deadlines, failure to obtain claim forms, lack of knowledge of the claims process, and serious illness or death of family members").

Thus, the Court ordered that the deadline be extended to December 31, 2004 for claims to unawarded accounts. As to late claims to accounts that already had been awarded, those were to be "treated in the appeals process, which is to enforce stringent requirements for the consideration of such claims on a case by case basis." Such appeals were to take into consideration whether the late claimant was the account owner, or his/her spouse, or child; provided an "unusually compelling reason for failing to comply with the filing deadlines;" and demonstrated "by clear and convincing evidence that the claimed account was awarded erroneously."[380]

Even claims filed well past all deadlines often were still reviewed by the CRT. Thus, as Judge Korman wrote to one claimant who sought to file claims in 2009:

> [Y]our claim was submitted even after all of the extended deadlines had expired. The rationale for a claims deadline is "the need for expeditious review of accounts, the necessity for an equitable balance in the treatment of timely and late claims, and the urgency for finality of decisions and of the claims resolution process itself." See CRT letter of February 23, 2009, at page 2. Nevertheless, "to ensure that no Class Member with a Deposited Assets claim is precluded by technical procedural requirements from having his or her claim fairly adjudicated, [I] asked the CRT to examine late claims upon receipt to determine whether the claimant has definitely identified an account belonging to his or her relative." While this examination does not include the advanced computerized name matching protocols adopted for timely claims, even for late claims such as yours, "a manual search [was] conducted to determine whether the names of the person identified in the late claim are included in the" bank account data made available to the CRT. "If so, the information about the person/s identified in the claim form is compared to the information about the account owner/s contained in the bank records to > determine whether the claimant has definitely identified the account owner/s as his/her relative/s."[381]

Therefore, "as the CRT explained in its February 23, 2009 letter, although your claim was not 'formally admitted into the claims resolution process,' your claim nevertheless 'was carefully reviewed so that procedural requirements do not prevent the return of Holocaust-era assets to their rightful heirs.' However, an award was not warranted because 'either the information in your late claim did not demonstrate that your relative was the owner of the account you claimed, or the [records available to the CRT do] not contain any accounts belonging to persons with the names of your relatives.'"[382]

In the case of claims to accounts that had been awarded to timely claimants, the late claimant often was referred to the original award recipient, so that the parties could determine amongst themselves whether the late claimant was entitled to any share of the award. A pre-condition to receiving an award, as required under the terms of the Settlement Agreement, was the recipient's obligation to sign an Acknowledgment Form. An early version of the Acknowledgment Form did not include explicit confirmation that the recipient would share the award amount with other entitled heirs. When the claims process gained more experience, it became clear that despite the massive worldwide publication of the Settlement and claims process, and the incorporation of tens of thousands of "informal" claims by utilizing the Initial Questionnaires, not all family members were aware of the fact that other relatives had claimed an account. Further, sometimes family members attempted to intentionally exclude other heirs from sharing award payments. [383]

[381] See Letter from Hon. Edward R. Korman to Mr. K (Nov. 17, 2009).

[382] Id. Judge Korman noted that the claimant had been successful in his attempt to recover other Holocaust-era Swiss accounts: "[I]n connection with your timely-filed CRT claim to the account of … your cousin's mother, you received an award in February 2005 in the amount of SF 26,750."

[383] This was addressed in some detail in the Decision on Appeal in In re Account of Alexander Conitzer, which Judge Korman approved on April 6, 2007 (see also Memorandum & Order Authorizing Approval of 9 Decisions on Appeal, April 5, 2007). The Conitzer Decision on Appeal noted:

> "It has been asserted that a claimant is not obliged to inform the CRT of the existence of other known equally or better entitled related heirs of the account owner, and that, therefore, the absence of such notification should have no impact on the decision as to the validity of the appeal in this case. Article 24 of the CRT Rules has been cited as the basis for this assertion. This Article provides that 'The rights of individuals to an Account who have not submitted claims to the CRT will, as a general rule, not be considered under the Claims Resolution Process authorized by these rules.'

The CRT therefore made explicit the implicit obligation that family members were required to share their awards with relatives of equal entitlement, and to transfer the entire award to relatives better entitled to the account. Prior to receiving payment, each award recipient was required to sign an Acknowledgment Form stating in part that:

> In consideration of the payment, I undertake and agree that in the event that one or more other heirs of the account owner, known or unknown, entitled under Article 23 of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended, (the "Rules") make(s) a claim to this account or accounts, or otherwise seek(s) payment or compensation therewith, I shall share the payment with, or in the event that pursuant to the principles of distribution in Article 23 I am so required, I shall transfer the payment to, such other entitled heir(s), in the absence of another mutually agreed basis, irrespective as to whether the heir(s) was/were identified in the information provided to the CRT.

For example, in In re Account of Beger & Röckel, over five years after the award was approved, additional claimants seeking a share of the award, distant cousins of the original

However, in considering this matter, it is important to bear in mind that the basic objective of the Claims Resolution Process, initiated by the Settlement Agreement, is to restore to Holocaust victim account owners or their heirs, the funds and/or property that were improperly withheld from them if the account owners had accounts in Swiss banks during the 1933-1945 period. It was never the intention that the Claims Resolution Process should become the vehicle for intra-family discord, greed and avarice, or to authorize a first come first served winner take all lottery in which known heirs could be deliberately excluded from sharing in awards simply because another family member filed first or because known heirs were deliberately excluded from claim forms filed by their relatives. Article 24 was thus not intended to facilitate these objectives in the rare cases in which they occur.

Instead, Article 24 was included in the Rules because it was recognized that there could be some cases in which the devastation, loss, and dispersion of families resulting from the Holocaust might make the Claims Resolution Process difficult to operate effectively if the burden of finding all entitled family members should be placed on claimants or the CRT before awards could be disbursed to claimants once the deadline for filing claims had passed. When it became clear from operating experience that the provisions of Article 24 could be abused to provide a basis for excluding known heirs from participating in the division of family assets, the Court moved promptly to make an already implicit obligation explicit by requiring all claimants receiving awards to agree to share their award with all eligible heirs recognized as such by the CRT Rules at the time the award was made or subsequently. Similarly, the principle of assuring the ability of all known heirs to share in awards was the basic rationale in the Friedl case [citing Decision on Appeal: In re Account of Rudolf Friedl, approved by the Court on April 11, 2005] where all known heirs as specified in the will of the account owner were authorized to participate in an award that was mistakenly awarded to lesser entitled claimants even though these heirs had not filed claim forms.

In the case before the Court, there was "clear and persuasive evidence that the Claimants knew of the existence of the Appellant and deliberately withheld this information from the Court …. [I]t is unfair and unjust to exclude the Appellant from sharing the award in this case. Similarly, awarded claimants who deliberately did not provide the Court with the information that it needed to properly decide the distribution of an award to the known heirs of the account owner are required to return to the Settlement Fund the amounts that they received in excess of the amounts to which they are properly entitled." See also Decision on Appeal, In re Accounts of Dr. Simon Gutmann; Decision on Appeal, In re Account of Helene Rudnicki (both approved by Memorandum & Order Authorizing Approval of 9 Decisions on Appeal, April 5, 2007).

recipients, contacted the CRT. They stated that their grandfather was co-owner of the firm Beger & Röckel. The CRT advised the claimants that they had not filed a timely claim, nor did their late claim qualify for consideration under the terms of the Court's December 30, 2004 order. The claimants were not the account owners, spouse or children of the account owners; they did not provide an "unusually compelling reason for failing to comply with the filing deadlines;" and they did not demonstrate "by clear and convincing evidence that the claimed account was awarded erroneously." However, the CRT advised the claimants that if they had filed timely claims — and if they had shown that their grandfather had owned one-half of the firm — they would have been entitled to one-half of the award. Accordingly, the late claimants were provided with copies of the Acknowledgment Forms that their cousins had signed, in which (as true for all awardees) the recipients had agreed to share or transfer the payment to relatives equally or better entitled to the award. They were advised to attempt to "reach an agreement [outside the CRT process] about the distribution of the award amount and any potential award amount adjustment in the future."[384]

In some cases, claims arrived far too late to be considered at all. Beginning in 2009, claimants were advised that no additional claims could be filed.[385] The CRT received a number of inquiries from late claimants after January 1, 2009, all of whom were notified that the deadline had expired. The CRT also was aware of other individuals who did not attempt to file claims after that date, because they understood that the claims would be untimely. It would have been inequitable for later claimants to receive special consideration. In light of the massive worldwide notice of the settlement in 1999, and after many years of activity during which every

The utilization of presumptions and the effort to move the process along in a few instances resulted in the realization that the CRT had issued an award to the wrong claimant, as in the case of the account owner Hans Leipziger.

The case was publicized by the Forward — "Fund Pays Heirs of Wrong 'Hans Leipziger'" — which noted that "as in any large financial distribution, there also have been many difficult and messy decisions in the attempt to enact justice 70 years after the fact."[386] The newspaper quoted CRT Special Master Bradfield's observation that "'[w]e were under great pressure to make decisions before survivors died.'" Tens of thousands of claims had been filed (ultimately reaching over 104,000, for more than 119,000 claimants and more than 415,000 possible account owners) and a number of families "could not tell whether a name on the list of account holders was their relative" and therefore "decided to take a shot at putting in for some of the Swiss payout."[387] It was not surprising that some mistakes were made in determining who owned which account, particularly given the banks' destruction of records crucial to recreating the account's history.

In the case of the Hans Leipziger account, the originally awarded claimant "had inadvertently and innocently identified the wrong Hans Leipziger." He had identified and presented documentation demonstrating that his relative had the same name as the account owner, Hans Leipziger, and that Mr. Leipziger had died in the Gross-Rosen concentration camp. However, after the award was made, and after the filing deadline had expired, another claimant came forward with information about a different Hans Leipziger, which better matched the information in the bank files. As to the original claimant, Special Master Bradfield pointed out that that individual "'may have had the wrong person, but he wasn't trying to cheat anybody… I think it's a tough judgment to make — to say, "We're not going to let you keep the money".'" The decision "was made easier because [the second claimant] had not submitted the application for the other Hans Leipziger on time."[388]

F. The Process of Claims Review as Shown by Two CRT Awards: the Accounts of Else Israel and Elisabeth Magnus

The level of detail in which the CRT analyzed every claim, and considered every possible avenue of compensation — a process that required considerable time and expense — is exemplified by two CRT awards authorized by the Court: In re Account of Else Israel and In re Accounts of Elisabeth Magnus.

In the case of In re Account of Else Israel, the German account owner, Else Israel, and her husband adopted their daughter (the claimant's mother) at the age of five. In 1934, Else Israel's daughter fled to Palestine. The account owner, Else Israel, perished in Theresienstadt on August 17, 1942.

On October 8, 1949, the claimant's father, who had survived the Holocaust and was living in Riverdale, New York, wrote to the bank. The claimant provided the CRT with a copy of this letter. The claimant's father informed the bank that he had been recognized in a Berlin inheritance certificate as the legal representative for the claimant, who was Else Israel's granddaughter and sole heir. As the CRT explained, "[i]n his letter, [claimant's father] referred to a bank statement, which appears to be copied onto the bottom of his letter, that references a custody account, numbered 45914, which [claimant's father] identified as belonging to Else Israel." The letter listed five different types of bonds and specified their nominal values.

The bank replied on October 14, 1949. "In its reply, the Bank wrote that it usually did not respond to inquiries about accounts of clients who were deceased until the inquirer had demonstrated that he/she was the legitimate heir of the account owner;" however, the bank said that it would make an exception to spare the claimant's father unnecessary expense. The bank advised that Else Israel had not had a relationship with the bank since 1936. Since "Swiss law required the retention of correspondence with account owners for only ten years, it had already destroyed all its files that were dated prior to 1939."

The CRT pointed out that the bank files that it received in its analysis of this claim contained a copy of the claimant's father's letter. It differed from the claimant's version in one important respect, however. The bank's copy of this letter had "handwritten notations, mostly illegible, that appear to have been made by Bank employees and that appear to address the various securities listed in the statement. One of the notations appears to refer to a demand deposit account belonging to Else Israel that was closed ('saldiert') on 16 December 1936."

Thus, as the CRT noted, the bank's letter of October 14, 1949 — in which it had stated that no longer had files relating to the account — was "disingenuous at best." The internal notations on the bank's copy of the letter "clearly indicate, despite their illegibility, that the Bank had information pertaining to the disposition of these securities, and chose not to reveal it…." The year "cited by the Bank as the year during which its customer relationship with the Account Owner ended (1936) is the same year during which more stringent Nazi legislation requiring the repatriation of foreign-held securities became effective." The CRT observed that the bank's 1949 response to the claimant's father was "readily explained by [the banks'] concern for double liability."

In determining the amount of the award, there were several options. The easiest option would have been to assign the claimant a pro rata share of the amount allocated to the Deposited Assets Class, without regard to the number or nature of the accounts, or the facts surrounding the unreturned accounts. Another option would have been to determine the type of account, and award it at its presumptive value, without looking into what the account actually held. In the case of the demand deposit account, there was no remaining evidence indicating the account's actual value, and so the CRT awarded the presumptive value.

As to the custody account, however, the Court, the Special Masters and the CRT concluded that the more equitable process was to analyze precisely what securities were held in the account, and to then determine their value on a case-by-case basis. That was what the depositor would have expected when she entrusted those assets to the care of the Swiss bank.

Although the depositor perished in Theresienstadt, she (or her heirs) deserved no less from the claims process.

Thus, the CRT observed that the bank itself had considered the claimant's father's 1949 letter "sufficiently reliable to allow it to respond to [the] inquiry without requiring him to prove himself to be the rightful heir of the Account Owner." That list also was a "sufficiently reliable basis for the determination of the value of the custody account." The CRT traced each security back to its value on the date that the bank indicated the account had been closed, December 16, 1936. At that time, the account held:

- "4.5% Brazilian Loan 1888 bonds with a nominal value of £ 1,000.00, which was equivalent to 15,300.00 Swiss Francs … which were in default and which on 16 December 1936 were trading at 24 percent, putting their market value at SF 3,672.00." The CRT noted that the "default status of the bond" was "shown in Moody's Manual of Investments, American and Foreign Government Securities, Moody's Investor's Service, New York, 1940 ["Moody's"], p. 1715. The market value was obtained from the London Times, 17 December 1936."
- "5% United States of Brazil funding Bonds 1931, 40 years, English tranche, with a nominal value of £ 120.00, which was equivalent to SF 1,836.00, which were not in default at end December 1936." The "non-default status of the bond" was "shown in Moody's."
- "4% City of Kopenhagen of 1910 bonds with a nominal value of £ 300.00, which was equivalent to SF 4,590.00, and which were trading at 109.00 percent on 15 December 1936, putting their market value at SF 5,003.10." The "market value was obtained from the London Times, 16 December 1936." The CRT "used the quotation for the 1910 City of Copenhagen loan for the 1911 issue as well, as the two loans traded on the Geneva Stock Exchange under the same quotation since 2 January 1928. See Manuel des Valeurs Cotées à la Bourse de Genève, Édition 1937, note (a), Geneva: Societé de Banque Suisse, 1937, p. 46." The CRT "further note[d] that although the range of quotations for the two issues on the other Swiss exchanges was not identical, an average of the high and the low for the year results in the same price for both issues. See Schweizer Börsenhandbuch … für Banken und Kapitalisten, Zurich: Albert Mueller, 1937, 6th ed. (Ed. C. Kling), p. 84."
- "4% City of Kopenhagen of 1911 bonds with a nominal value of £ 700.00, which was equivalent to SF 10,710.00, and which were trading at 109 percent on 15 December 1936, putting their market value at SF 11,673.90." The "market value was obtained from the London Times 16 December 1936."
- "4% Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Comp. first & ref. mortgage gold bonds p. 1934 with a nominal value of US $5,000.00, which was equivalent to SF 15,300.00. The company had filed for reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act of > 1933 and the bonds, which were in default, were trading at 18.375 percent on 16 December 1936, putting their market value at SF 2,811.38." The status of the bond was "shown in Moody's Manual of Investments, American and Foreign: Railroad Securities, Moody's Investor Service, New York, 1940, p. 634. The market value was obtained from the New York Times, 17 December 1936, which also shows the company being in reorganization."

Under Special Master Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, "as a general rule, securities [were] awarded at market value, except that bonds not in default [were] awarded at their nominal value if their market value was below their nominal value on the date the account owner [was] deemed to have lost control over the account. In these cases the CRT presume[d] that the account owner, if able to decide freely, could have opted to hold the respective bond to maturity to avoid a capital loss." In the case of Else Israel's custody account, "the 4.5% Brazilian Loan 1888 bonds were in default, and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Comp. was in reorganization, which is similar in status to default." Pursuant to these Guidelines, "the CRT use[d] the market value of the two series of City of Copenhagen bonds, the 4.5% Brazilian Loan 1888 bonds, the 4% Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Comp. bonds, and the nominal value of the 5% United States of Brazil funding bonds 1931 to determine the award amount. The total 1945 value [was] therefore SF 24,996.38. The current value of this amount is determined by multiplying the historic value by a factor of 12.5" so that the "award amount for the custody account [was] SF 312,454.75."

The CRT sought and in 2008 received "voluntary assistance" from the bank, which produced additional documents relating to Else Israel's custody account. As a result of this new information, the CRT determined that it was necessary to revisit the 2006 decision. As typically the case when "voluntary assistance" was received, an adjustment was required in favor of the claimant.

The bank records produced in 2008 showed that every one of the five bonds that the claimant's father had listed in his 1949 letter to the bank had, in fact, been in Else Israel's custody account. One of the bonds had been sold in 1935, while four of the five were transferred on December 14, 1936 to another account at the bank, numbered 20184. The CRT observed that the bank's records "do not indicate who owned the account numbered 20184, into which some of these securities were transferred. Even if this account were owned by the Account Owner, the records do not indicate when the account was closed, or the disposition of the securities contained within." It was clear that "the Account Owner did not receive these securities or their proceeds."

The bank records further showed that in addition to the five bonds listed in the claimant's father's letter, Else Israel's custody account also had held one additional bond — 4.5% Brasilianische Anleihe von 1888 — which, like most of the other bonds in the account, had been transferred on December 14, 1936 to the numbered account, 20184. The total value of the securities held in the custody account was SF 25,124.18, rather than the SF 24,996.38 calculated in the previous decision based upon the five bonds listed in the claimant's father's letter. After applying the 12.5 multiplier, the CRT awarded an additional SF 1,597.50 to the account owner's grandchild, the claimant.

The total payment was significantly higher than the amount that would have been awarded had the process been more "streamlined" in an effort to avoid the difficulties presented by seeking to obtain actual values, which required decades-old bonds and securities to be priced. Instead of receiving SF 342,764.75 ($262,009.10), the claimant would have received the presumptive value of SF 162,500 (SF 13,000 for a custody account, multiplied by 12.5).

In the interest of speed, the Court also could have simply divided up the $800 million allocated to the Deposited Assets Class on a pro rata basis among the approximately 119,000 claimants. This would have resulted in payments of about $6,723 each, and would have moved the process along, but also would have had no relation to any given claimant's assets or to the behavior of the Swiss banks in that case. The Court also could have divided up the $1.25 billion settlement among the approximately 600,000 individuals who filed Initial Questionnaires. This would have resulted in payments of $1,333 each, but would have been disconnected from the historical facts. Since the Court chose to emphasize equity and historical accuracy (with the resulting additional administrative costs), not speed, however, Else Israel's heir was able to receive the present-day value of the assets that were actually deposited with the bank: $262,009.10.

The case of In re Accounts of Elisabeth Magnus was similarly complex, but also enabled one more Holocaust victim's story to be told, and her assets restored to her family. Account owner Elisabeth Magnus lived in Berlin. Her daughter (the claimant's mother) attended a Swiss boarding school. Elisabeth Magnus performed military service in Germany until Nazi authorities learned that she was Jewish. She was killed in Lodz in 1941. The claimant, Elisabeth Magnus's grandson, did not file a formal claim form with the CRT, but the Court authorized the CRT to deem his Initial Questionnaire as a claim form, and thus his claim was included in the process.

The bank records showed that Elisabeth Magnus owned a demand deposit account closed on April 30, 1934, and a custody account closed on December 28, 1936. There was no information about the value of the accounts, or who had closed them. The CRT took note of the presumptions of Appendix C of the CRT Rules, recognizing that Nazi confiscations in Germany began in 1933. Elisabeth Magnus had remained in Germany until her 1941 deportation to Lodz. Prior to her deportation, she "would not have been able to repatriate her accounts to Germany without losing ultimate control over their proceeds." After her deportation, she perished, and so would not have retrieved her accounts. Accordingly, in 2005, the CRT awarded the two accounts at their respective presumptive values (SF 2,140 and SF 13,000) as increased by the 12.5 multiplier, for a total of SF 189,250 ($164,565.22).

After the award was issued and the claimant was paid, the bank eventually located and made available to the CRT additional records. These related to the contents of the custody account owned by Elisabeth Magnus.

These new records demonstrated that Elisabeth Magnus had owned nine different types of securities. The CRT analyzed the data, and determined that the claimant was owed nearly SF 300,000 more than he had originally received, because the actual value of the assets in the custody account was considerably higher than the presumptive value.[389] Thus, applying Special Master Junz's Guidelines, the CRT concluded that Mrs. Magnus had owned the following securities at the time she lost control over the account, December 28, 1936, the date of the account's closure:

[389] This was not an unusual discovery. When Special Master Junz and the CRT examined account records that had not been available, or were not thoroughly analyzed at the time of the ICEP audit, the actual values typically were higher than the "presumptive" values. This is what led Special Master Junz to recommend and the Court to adopt an upward adjustment of most presumptive values.

- "4% Schweizerische Bundesbahnen von 1912/14 bonds with a face value of SF 5,000.00, which were transferred on 18 December 1936 to an account within the Bank, numbered 15200," likely an account of a German bank. At the time of the transfer, the bonds "were of good quality and were trading at 101.00%." Utilizing the Zürcher Kursblatt of December 31, 1936, the CRT determined that the bonds' market value was SF 5,050.00.
- "5% Argentine Government Port of the Capital (Buenos Aires) per 1. July 1949 bonds with a face value of £400.00. Since these bonds were cashed in on 9 July 1935, they will be valued at their face value of £ 400.00, which was equivalent to SF 6,032.00."
- "5% Schweizerische Bundesbahnen 4. Elektr. Anl. von 1924 bonds with a face value of SF 3,000.00. Since these bonds were cashed in on 15 April 1935, they will be valued at their face value of SF 3,000.00."
- "5% Schweizerische Bundesbahnen 5. Elektr. Anl. von 1925 bonds with a face value of SF 6,000.00. Since these bonds were cashed in on 24 July 1936, they will be valued at their face value of SF 6,000.00."
- "5.5% Internationale Anleihe des Deutschen Reiches von 1930, Schweizerische Tranche bonds with a face value of SF 3,000.00. These bonds were in default and were trading at 28.50% when they were transferred on 19 December 1937" to numbered account 15200 at the bank, and so were valued at their market value of SF 855.00. The CRT obtained the market value from the Zürcher Kursblatt of December 31, 1937.
- "6% Japanische Anleihe von 1924 per 10. Juli 1959 bonds with a face value of £ 400.00. These bonds were of good quality and were trading at 86.00% when they were transferred on 18 December 1936" to numbered account 15200 at the bank. The CRT obtained the market value from the Financial Times of December 19, 1936. Because the bonds were of good quality and their market values were below face value, the CRT used face value to determine that the bonds were worth SF 6,120 on the date of their transfer.
- "6% Rentenbons Compania Hispano-Americana de Electricidad. Madrid von 1920 bonds with a face value of $ MN 5,175.00. These bonds were of good quality and were trading at 64.50% when they were transferred on 19 December 1936" to numbered account 15200 at the bank. The CRT obtained the market value from the Zürcher Kursblatt of December 31, 1936. Because the bonds were of good quality and their market values were below face value, the CRT used face value to determine that the bonds were worth SF 4,370.29 on the date of their transfer.
- "6 Compania Hispano-Americana de Electricidad Madrid Aktien Serie D à Ptas. 100. - shares, which were trading at SF 300.00 each when transferred in 1936" to numbered account 1211 at the bank, "for a total market value of SF 1,800.00."
- "12 Compania Hispano-Americana de Electricidad Madrid Aktien Serie E à Ptas. 100. - shares, which were trading at SF 298.50 each when transferred in 1936" to numbered account 1211 at the bank, "for a total market value of SF 3,582.00."

Certain of these securities had been transferred into accounts respectively numbered 15200 and 1211, which "appear as the transfer destination for other, unrelated accounts held by apparently unrelated account owners." Two of the securities were held in London, and it was "common practice for most British-issued securities to remain physically in England, deposited in an English bank." However, the "the Bank in Switzerland was ultimately in control of the disposition of these assets." The records did not indicate when the accounts were closed, or the disposition of the securities. The account owner had perished in Lodz. Thus, the CRT concluded that the account owner did not receive her assets. The CRT's determination to obtain the complete record of the account, even after the claim had been paid, resulted in a significant additional award to a claimant who had not filed a formal claim form (and who might have been excluded from any recovery at all under other restitution programs). The claimant later benefited from the presumptive value recalculations, resulting a total award of SF 488,828.63 ($441,757.61).

Both the Else Israel and Elisabeth Magnus awards thus demonstrate the importance of the Court's decision to broaden the claims process to include as many participants as possible. These decisions also demonstrate the diligence with which the CRT tracked down as many facts as available about the accounts, including their value, often resulting in substantial benefit to the claimants. These efforts may have prolonged the claims process and made it more complex, but surely also made it more equitable — particularly so where, as in the Else Israel case and in so many others, the bank records demonstrate how unfairly the claimants and their relatives had been treated decades earlier, when their inquiries had been turned away.

VII. DENIALS OF CLAIMS

The determination to apply liberal rules favoring often elderly claimants for whom, through no fault of their own, a full documentary record often did not exist, was balanced by the equally important consideration of ensuring that erroneous claims were not paid. Issuing unfounded awards would diminish the historical record; cast doubt upon the merits of the claims that were awarded; and dilute the Settlement Fund, which had to be distributed among five classes of claimants who were also Holocaust victims.

Thus, although the CRT's objective was to identify claims for which awards could be issued, that process also meant that claims had to be denied when they did not match to the claimed accounts. The CRT researched 415,453 possible account owners who had been named during the claims process. A claimant could have received a number of different decisions, depending upon how many relatives he or she indicated might have owned a Swiss bank account. Each claimant may have "identif[ied] more than one family member who may have held an account. The CRT matche[d] all relevant names in claim forms against [the accounts in the AHD] and analyze[d] every match. As a result, one claim[ant] may receive an award to an account belonging to one family member, an identity denial to another account owned by a person with the same name as a different family member, and a rejection letter for yet another name in the claim form, informing the claimant that no accounts were found in the AHD belonging to that person. Therefore, each claim[ant] may have [had] more than one decision."[390] In addition, "one decision may encompass more than one claim, from the same or multiple claimants. For example, an award may join three claims filed by [a] … claimant with a claim filed by another … claimant. That award, then, would analyze four claims. Not all four claims, however, may be fully resolved by that single award, as other account owner names claimed by those claimants may receive denials or rejection letters." As a last complicating factor, "many claimants file more than one claim. Sometimes the claims identify different family members who may have owned an account; other times the claims identify the same family members."[391]

On a number of occasions, account denials were addressed in the context of an award. This usually occurred when the CRT determined that the account owner in question held several accounts. In such instances, the CRT might have concluded that one or more of the victim's accounts had not been returned to the rightful owner and thus should be awarded. However, one or more of the other accounts owned by the same person did not support an award, and the 390 For example, a claimant seeking accounts owned by his mother, father, and grandfather, respectively, could have received an award for his mother's account; an identity denial for his father's account, because his father shared the same name as the published account owner, but was not the same person (given that many names were common); and finally, a letter notifying him that his grandfather's name did not match to any account owners in the CRT's database, and the CRT could not find evidence in the available bank records that the grandfather had owned a Swiss account.

391 See Letter from Hon. Edward R. Korman to N. Y. State Banking Superintendent 3 (Feb. 1, 2006).

rationale for denying such accounts was discussed in the same decision recommending payment for a different account.[392]

For example, the CRT had the opportunity to review claims involving relatives of the legendary psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud, In re Accounts of Alexander Freud and Harry Freud.[393] The account owners, Sigmund Freud's brother and nephew, had owned an account of unknown type that was listed on a closing register for numbered accounts, and was transferred to London on September 10, 1938. The CRT concluded that the account was accessed by the account owners, who had fled to London by the time of the transfer, and so the claim to that account was denied. Alexander and Harry Freud, however, had held another account, a demand deposit account, which remained suspended — thus, they had not received it. That account was awarded at presumptive value (SF 28,712.50/$22,041.75).

Another example of a case involving multiple decisions, including both awards and denials, is that of In re Account of Robert Heller. The claimant in that case received an award of SF 10,750.00 ($9,828.27) for the account of her uncle, a Viennese doctor who had fled Austria after the Nazis confiscated his assets after the Anschluss. The bank records showed that Robert Heller of Vienna had held a custody account that was closed on February 18, 1925. He also owned a passbook/savings account that had not been reported during the ICEP audit, because of an audit policy that excluded savings accounts with a recorded value under SF 250. The CRT awarded the passbook/savings account, based upon the fact that the bank had failed to maintain the documentation for the account, and it was plausible that the account had been closed after the owner had fled Austria. However, the CRT did not award the custody account, since it had been closed in 1925, prior to the Nazis' ascension to power.

392 In total, 321 accounts were denied in the context of award decisions. Of these, the CRT determined that 251 of the accounts had been properly returned to the account owner(s); another 36 had been closed before the period in which the account owner's country of residence was occupied by or allied with Nazi Germany (and therefore was presumed to have been closed properly); and 27 were not "relevant period" accounts (i.e., they were accounts not opened or open during the period 1933-1945).

393 The CRT also awarded accounts that had belonged to Sigmund Freud himself; see infra.

A. "No Match Decisions"

The vast majority of names provided by claimants did not match to any of the 37,954 names in the AHD. In these cases, no other documents established the existence of a Holocaust-era Swiss bank account owned by the claimant's relative. For each of the more than 415,000 CAOs researched, the claimants needed to be notified when these names did not "match" to the AHD. The CRT thus provided such claimants with "No Match Findings" (also known as "No Match Letters"), which were decisions advising the claimant of family member names that had been researched but not found in the AHD.[394]

The CRT issued a total of 89,858 of these "No Match Letters." Because the CRT's first priority was to research and issue awards, the "No Match Letter" ("NML") process did not begin until several years after the review process began. The first batches of NMLs, approximately 21,600, were issued in 2006. In 2007, the CRT issued approximately 53,000 NMLs; approximately 14,000 in 2008; another 1,170 in 2009; and the last 22 in 2010.

As with other decisions, the "No Match Letter" denials were drafted and certified by the CRT, and then sent to SDAP for post-decision processing. This included submitting the batches to the Court for approval and mailing the decisions to the claimants. SDAP worked closely with the Zurich office to conduct a two-step initial testing of the NML module in the Zurich database to determine whether the initial query in the system was accurate, and whether the Data Integrity error rate (for example, the accuracy of the recorded claimant street address) was acceptable for purposes of mailing. SDAP also tested the bulk mailing system component of the module.

The decision to incorporate tens of thousands of relatively informal Initial Questionnaires into the claims process resulted in a substantial number of awards that otherwise would not have been made, but it also resulted in tens of thousands of claim denials and NMLs for claims that perhaps never were intended to have been filed with the CRT in the first place.

394 In some instances, a claimant was surprised to see that the CRT had investigated a relative's name that he or she had not formally claimed. Some claimants filed appeals on the ground that they had not claimed the accounts of the relatives listed in the "No Match Letters." These claimants appeared to be concerned that their claims to other relatives would not be investigated. In response to their appeals, they were assured that receiving an "NML" did not mean that their other claims to other accounts were closed.

Of the 89,681 claim forms that resulted in an NML, two-thirds (59,619) were based upon names included in the approximately 70,000 Initial Questionnaires brought into the process by the Court. The substantial percentage of "No Match Letters" arising from the Initial Questionnaires indicates that the determination to be over-inclusive did not come without a cost. The task increased exponentially with the decision to analyze tens of thousands of additional claims (and all of the possible account owner names mentioned in those IQs). Although not everyone who filed an IQ had intended to claim a bank account, the Court did not want to risk excluding anyone who mistakenly believed that he or she had filed a claim to a Swiss bank account by submitting an Initial Questionnaire.

B. Inadmissibility Decisions

The Settlement Agreement required that the person believed to have owned an account needed to be a member of one of the five "Victim or Target" groups: someone who was, or was believed to be, Jewish, Roma, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual or physically or mentally disabled. Failure to identify the account owner as a member of one or more of these five groups rendered a claim inadmissible for consideration. The CRT issued 2,288 "inadmissibility" decisions, which, as with awards and denials, were eligible for appeal. In certain cases, claimants filed multiple requests for review. Some of these went through repeated submissions and appeals.

In the case of Mr. M of Germany, for example, Mr. M. had filed three different claims with the CRT, including at least one that exceeded 100 pages. He received numerous responses from the CRT and the CRT Special Masters, which did not satisfy him. He continued to press his claims, including by directly contacting the Court.

The essential problem with Mr. M's claims was that they undermined the entire premise of the Settlement Agreement. Mr. M was seeking compensation on behalf of his parents, but his father had served Hitler. Thus, after rejecting these claims several times, both initially and on appeal, the CRT eventually succeeded in convincing Mr. M that a settlement on behalf of victims of the Nazis was not the proper place to seek recompense for someone who had aided the Nazis. In a letter of April 7, 2008, the CRT wrote:

> In your letter [of March 24, 2008], you inquire about the status of your claims to Swiss bank accounts belonging to your parents. As you are aware, your [three] claims … have been deemed inadmissible by the CRT. The CRT inadmissibility decisions approved by the Court … are final.
> The Court … has jurisdiction only over claims of Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution under the terms of the Settlement Agreement in the Holocaust Victim[] Assets class action litigation….
>
> In contrast, you indicate in your claims that your father, whose assets you are claiming, served as first lieutenant in a German flight squadron during World War II and received a medal of honor (Ritterkreuz zum Eiseren Kreuz mit Eichenlaub) from Hitler in 1944. You further indicate that your father worked with an SS agent from the German foreign ministry. The documents you submitted with your claims include a certificate for your father of "aryan" descent dated 2 January 1943. As a result, your father does not fall under the definition of a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution during the relevant period between 1933 and 1945.

Other inadmissibility decisions were based upon a claimant's assertion that he or she was entitled to the account, solely because the account owner on one of the publication lists had the same name as the claimant's relative. Such "same name" claims originally were intended under the CRT Rules to be deemed "inadmissible," and were not to be considered for further review. For reasons of equity, the CRT subsequently recommended that those claims be analyzed on substantive grounds:

> [A]ccording to Article 18 of the [CRT Rules], a claim is inadmissible if, among other reasons, the claim is based essentially on a statement that the claimant or his or her relative and the account owner have the same or similar last name, or the claimant has provided no relevant information and/or documentation regarding his or her relationship to the account owner. In each of these 45 cases, the claimant either has based his/her claim to the account essentially on the fact that his/her relative and the account owner have the same or similar last name, or has not provided sufficient information or documentation regarding his/her > relationship to the account owner, including documentation linking the claimant's name to that of the account owner. The CRT has deemed these claims admissible to ensure that no Class Member with a Deposited Assets claim is precluded by technical procedural requirements from having his or her claim fairly adjudicated. However, based upon the information provided in these [45] cases [at issue in Set 194], the CRT was unable to conclude that the claimants identified the account owner as their relatives.[396]

[395] Letter from Claims Resolution Tribunal to Mr. M. (Apr. 7, 2008). Similarly, the CRT spent some time on the claim and letters of Mr. J, who asked for an investigation of the Swiss accounts of his father, "killed in the chaos of war." Mr. J's father, however, was not a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution." Rather, according to his son, he "was killed as a [G]erman soldier and translator ([I]talian) to the staff by soldiers of the US Fifth Army … at the very end of the war." Letter from Claims Resolution Tribunal to Mr. J. (Apr. 8, 2008).

SDAP in New York worked closely with the Zurich office to prepare and finalize inadmissibility decisions. SDAP performed all post-decision processing, including submitting 2,288 Inadmissibility decisions to the Court in nine "Inadmissibility Batches." Once approved by the Court, SDAP then mailed the claimant packets and processed all returned mail.

C. Entitlement Denials

The CRT issued 60 "entitlement" denials to 158 accounts. An "entitlement" denial meant that the CRT had determined that the claimant was not "entitled" to the account(s), usually due to the lack of a family relationship between the claimant and the account owner.

Some specific examples of "entitlement denials" included those where the claimant was not related to the account owner and not otherwise eligible as an heir (such as under a will); was not as closely related as another claimant who had previously received an award for the same account (e.g. the account owner's niece would not be entitled to an award, if the owner's child previously had received an award for that account); the claimant had established a relationship only to the power of attorney holder, but not to the actual account owner[397]; and/or the claimant sought a corporate account, but did not show a family relationship with the owner of the corporation (e.g., the claimant's relative was employed by, but did not own, the company that owned the account).

396 See Memorandum & Order Approving Set 194: 216 Award Denials Certified by the Claims Resolution Tribunal Pursuant to Article 31(2) of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process at 1, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 12, 2010).

397 As explained in a number of CRT decisions, "under Swiss law, a power of attorney holder is not considered to be the owner of an account. After a Power of Attorney holder dies, his or her powers in an account no longer exist, and they do not pass to his or her heirs." See, e.g., In re Account of Gertrud Deutsch; In re Account of Paul Prager (Power of Attorney Holder); In re Accounts of Margarethe Schaller (Power of Attorney Holder Margarita Burg-Guenther); and In re Accounts of Michael Flörsheim, Irene Elisabeth Stern, and Martha Recha Flörsheim.

For example, in In re Accounts of Iwan Iwanow, the account owner was a chief engineer for Vlaikov & Co, in Sofia, Bulgaria. The claimant stated that his grandfather owned the company Vlaikov & Co., and that he had entrusted his employee, Iwan Iwanow, with SFr 96,000 to deposit in the company's account in Zurich. The claimant advised that his grandfather and other family members were persecuted during the Holocaust, and were unable to travel from Eastern Europe during the Communist era.

The CRT recommended that the claim be denied, and the Court adopted this recommendation. Although the bank records indicated that Iwan Iwanow did hold Swiss accounts closed after the War, there was no documentation indicating that the account was owned by a company or other legal entity; that it was opened on behalf of the claimant's grandfather or another individual other than Iwan Iwanow; or that Iwan Iwanow was related to the claimant's grandfather. In the absence of a family relationship between the claimant and the account owner, or a will or other testamentary document showing that the claimant's relative was a beneficiary of the account owner, the claimant was not entitled to the accounts.

In the case of In re Accounts of Martin Sachs and Hildegard Sachs, the bank records showed that the account owners lived in Hirschberg, Germany with their daughter. Martin Sachs and his brother co-owned a weaving mill. They were forced by the Nazis to sell their business in 1937. Hildegard Sachs passed away in 1931. Martin Sachs was arrested by the Gestapo several times, and committed suicide in prison in 1943. The CRT awarded the accounts to the daughter of the account owners, who provided documentation (including a birth certificate) demonstrating that her parents were Martin Sachs and Hildegard Sachs. She also provided evidence of her mother's maiden name, which had not been published, but which was recorded in the bank records. A different claimant submitted a claim form identifying Martin Sachs as her great-uncle. Since the CRT had received and awarded a claim from the account owners' daughter, the claim filed by the great-niece was denied. She was a more distant relative, and thus not entitled to any portion of the accounts.

D. Disposition Denials

A total of 167 denials were issued to 512 accounts on disposition grounds. In such cases, the CRT determined that the account owner or other authorized person acting on behalf of the account owner had received the proceeds. In the face of massive document destruction, the CRT generally presumed (absent evidence to the contrary) that a Holocaust-era account was closed improperly. Therefore, disposition denials were issued mainly for one of only two reasons: (1) there was documentation specifically demonstrating that the account owner(s) had received the account; or (2) the account was closed prior to the date that the account owner's country of residence was occupied by or had entered into an alliance with Nazi Germany.[398]

In many instances, "disposition denials" were issued where the documentary evidence left no doubt that the account owner had been actively involved in managing his/her Swiss assets during and/or after the War, thus rendering it highly unlikely that he/she had not received the proceeds of her account.

One such example was that of In re Account of Fanny Hatvany. Baroness Fanny Hatvany was born in 1868 in Budapest, Hungary and was married to Baron Hatvany, a leading industrialist. The Hatvanys had four children, although the claimant, the Hatvanys' great-grandson, advised the CRT in his claim form of only two of these children. Baron Hatvany died in 1913, leaving a large estate. Fanny Hatvany continued to live in Budapest until the Nazi occupation, at which time she went into hiding.

The claimant initially received a "No Match Decision" from the CRT because none of the claimed Swiss accounts had been included in the AHD. The claimant requested reconsideration, explaining that he was seeking restitution of assets which, as described by the CRT, allegedly were "held in an account numbered C.637 or 637 for Fanny Hatvany in the name of the [Geneva branch of a] French Bank in secondary depository institutions, including the Swiss Depository, in London, England." According to the claimant, who submitted a December 31, 1947 statement of assets, the account held 13 gold bars as well as various securities.

[398] As discussed elsewhere herein, the CRT used the earliest historically accurate dates of occupation or alliance.

After the War, the family and many of its individual members initiated an exhaustive effort to recover these assets. Only assets held in the U.K. (account 637) remained in issue as of 1947. The family sought to recover those assets in at least three different venues: (1) the CRT; (2) the Enemy Property Claims Assessment Panel (EPCAP), a program intended to "provide compensation to victims of Nazi persecution who had property in the United Kingdom which was confiscated by the British Government during the Second World War under UK legislation on trading with the enemy, and who have not had their property returned;" and (3) in litigation before Judge I. Leo Glasser in the Eastern District of New York, a proceeding wholly separate from the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement and the CRT process supervised by Judge Korman.

In the case before Judge Glasser, the claimants sought recovery of the gold bars that allegedly had not been returned, or in the alternative, the value of the bars. In response, the defendant banks produced evidence demonstrating conclusively that the four gold bars had been released to the family not long after the War. Specifically, the defendants produced a June 7, 1948 letter from the French bank holding the assets to the Swiss Depository, which as described by the CRT "informed the Swiss Depository, at the formal request of the French Bank's client, that the 4 bars of gold … were the property of [Ms. Hatvany], an American national who resided in New York." The French bank "requested that this gold be put at her disposition."

As a result of these documents produced during discovery, the claimants voluntarily dismissed with prejudice their lawsuit before Judge Glasser. The claimants then returned to EPCAP, and withdrew their claim for four of the thirteen gold bars. They acknowledged that the documentary evidence disproved their claim that the 13 gold bars still remained with the Swiss Depository. However, the claimants continued to prosecute the remainder of their claim before EPCAP (i.e. focusing on the 9 gold bars allegedly remaining with the British authorities). EPCAP rejected the claim in a June 2009 decision, and again on appeal in June 2010.

At some point during these extensive EPCAP proceedings, the claimant supplemented his CRT claim with hundreds of pages of new documents, contending that in addition to the gold, there also were securities in Fanny Hatvany's account that had not been returned.

The CRT recommended that the Court deny the claim in its entirety. With respect to the thirteen gold bars, the CRT noted that "neither the claimant nor his attorney had ever informed the CRT that they had received, in June 2007, the documents from the Swiss Depository that led them to withdraw their EPCAP claim for the four gold bars held on deposit in the French bank's name, nor did they provide these documents to the CRT, despite their repeated statements that they had" done so. As to the remaining 9 gold bars, the CRT rejected the claim for the same reasons cited by EPCAP, among them: Fanny Hatvany's American daughter had signed a May 5, 1948 declaration in the British Consulate in New York affirming that she had power of attorney for her mother and that she was free to dispose of the gold, and listing all 13 gold bars (not just 4) as her "actual property;" the family presumably had pursued and succeeded in obtaining the 9 gold bars, just as with the 4 for which the return was documented; and family correspondence about all of the gold bars had ceased at the time that the 4 bars were returned.

With respect to the securities in the account, the CRT explained that although the claimants had not mentioned all of them in their claim form, the Hatvanys had other children (four, and not two, as the claimants had implied). The Hatvanys' son, who had not been mentioned in the claim, had heirs, and these heirs had retained an interest in the account at the same time as the claimant. The account was actively managed all throughout the post-War period, as demonstrated by voluminous portfolio statements showing payments made from the account to the Hatvany son whom the claimants had failed to disclose to the CRT. The account's closure in 1980 coincided approximately with the death of this Hatvany son. Citing extensive precedent, the CRT noted that no awards had been issued in the face of such obvious post-War management of the account by an owner or heir.

The claimant appealed the CRT's denial of the claim. The appeal was rejected by order dated September 2, 2011, in which the CRT's decision was found "clearly correct and in accord with … CRT precedent." The claimants had advanced a "frivolous and disingenuous" procedural argument relating to subsequent proceedings in the EPCAP case.[399]

Other denials were issued on similar grounds; namely, that the documentation demonstrated that the account owner had actively managed his or her account after the Holocaust. For example, in In re Account of Alexander Politzer, the CRT noted that the bank had sent account statements to the account owner in Argentina in 1947; the account owner had confirmed the accuracy of the statements and had visited the bank in Zurich on November 21, 1949; and he had informed the bank of the death of the power of attorney holder and designated a new power of attorney holder on the same date. Therefore, the CRT determined that the account owner had maintained contact with the bank after the War and had received the proceeds of the claimed account.[400]

E. Identity Denials

Because the banks had destroyed so many relevant records, the CRT sought to recommend plausible awards even where the identification was not strong, as the claimants could not be faulted for the lack documents. For example, in In re Account of H. Schlegel, the match between the Claimed Account Owner and the actual account owner was indefinite, particularly since the bank records did not contain the account owner's first name, only the letter "H." However, the CRT determined that the match was plausible. The account had not been published; the claimant had filed a claim for an account owned by his father, "whose surname is the same as the Account Owner's unpublished surname" (taking into account that the name "Schlagel" was spelled in a variety of ways in various documents available to the CRT, including "Schlegel"); and the "Claimant was only five years old when his father perished, and therefore the Claimant would not necessarily have known of an account in his own name." In addition, there were no other claims to the account. Since the account was not returned to the owner — because it remained in the bank's suspense account — the CRT determined that the account plausibly belonged to the claimant, and awarded the account (SF 49,375 ($39,186.51)).

[400] See also, e.g., In re Accounts of Walter C. Wolff and Ellen Ruth Wolff (with regard to a demand deposit account, the customer card showed the account owner's residence in New York, where he moved in 1941; the account owner was in contact with the bank after his move; and the account was closed on December 31, 1945, months after the War had ended; thus, the CRT concluded that Mr. Wolff had closed the account himself); In re Accounts of Emil Weil (with regard to one account, the account owner was actively using it in April 1945, when he paid an invoice regarding the storage of his furniture in Switzerland; further, the claimant submitted a statement dated January 14, 1948, in which the bank informed the account owner of the securities in the account on that date, a time when the account owner already was residing in New York; since Mr. Weil was in contact with the bank after the war and again in 1948, the CRT determined that he had received the proceeds of this account); In re Accounts of Löw-Beer (the accounts at issue were actively managed after the War by the account owners and/or their heirs) .

However, in many instances, the CRT determined that the claimant's relative and the account owner named in the bank file were two different people. Many victims shared the same name, but that did not mean that they were the same person. For example, the claimant's relative was a woman, but the account owner reflected in the bank records was a man.

Where the CRT detected a discrepancy, it attempted to conduct additional research to determine if the discrepancy was sufficient to disqualify the match. Where the CRT was unable to confirm that the claimant's relative was the same person named in the bank files (the account owner), the CRT issued an "Identity Denial" decision. In total, 6,046 identity denials were issued. The most common bases for identity denials were as follows:

- Different Countries: The account owner resided in a country different from that named by the claimant as the Claimed Account Owner's country of residence.
  - For example, the claimant specified "Germany" whereas the bank records showed that the account owner resided in "France," and the Claimed Account Owner did not have a demonstrated connection to Germany for purposes of opening a Swiss bank account using an address in Germany.
  - The claimant identified one of the account owner's countries of residence, but failed to identify the account owner's other countries of residence.
- Different Cities: The account owner resided in a city different from the Claimed Account Owner's city of residence, as identified by the claimant, and the Claimed Account Owner did not have a plausible connection to the account owner's city of residence for purposed of opening a Swiss bank account:
  - The claimant specified (e.g.) "Berlin" whereas the bank records showed that the account owner resided in (e.g.) "Hamburg."
  - The claimant specified (e.g.) "Berlin" whereas the bank records showed that the account owner resided in a different city:

  ...and these cities were distant from one another (over 500 km apart)

  ...and these cities were not distant from one another (e.g., 150 km apart), however:

    - the city named by the claimant and the city appearing in the bank records both were small; thus, it was unlikely that the account owner would have named one such small city in the bank records although he lived in a different but similarly small city.
    - the city named by the claimant and the city appearing in the bank records both were large urban centers; thus, it was unlikely that the account owner would have named one such large city in the bank records although he lived in a different but similarly large city.

  - the city named by the claimant was large whereas the city appearing in the bank records was small; thus, it was unlikely that the account owner would have provided the name of the small city, and not the big city, for the bank records, given the desire to disguise identities.

- Marital Status: The claimant's relative had a different marital status than that identified in the bank records, based upon dates identified by the claimant and/or appearing in the bank file.
  - e.g., the claimant stated that his mother (the account owner) was married in 1930, but the account owner was only a child at that time and could not have been married.
  - e.g., the claimant stated that his mother was born in 1925, but the account owner is identified as "Frau [Mrs.] _____" and the account was opened in 1930 (i.e., at a time when the Claimed Account Owner, who would have been age 5, could not have been married nor addressed with a title of respect).
  - The claimant's relative was married to someone other than the person shown in the bank records as the owner's spouse.
  - The bank records showed that the account owner had a maiden name different from that provided by the claimant.
- Inconsistent Name: The first name provided by the claimant was different from the first name stated in the bank files. (Thus, for example, the name published in 2001 or 2005 may have been only the middle name, or only the first initial, but not the same name or initial as that provided by the claimant).
- Inconsistent Dates: The claimant stated that his relative was born, died, or was married in a year logically inconsistent with the facts shown in the bank files concerning the account owner.
  - e.g., the claimant's relative died prior to the date the account was opened.
  - e.g., the claimant's relative was born after the date the account was opened or closed.
- Inconsistent Professions: The claimant failed to identify the account owner's profession. This rationale was rarely if ever the sole basis for denial but rather often provided further evidence that the account owner and the claimant's relative were not the same person, in light of other inconsistencies.
  - The claimant stated that the relative's profession was one that was inconsistent with the title that appeared in the bank records.
    - For example, the bank files showed that the owner was a medical doctor, whereas the claimant stated that his relative owned a factory, without any indication that his relative may have had an entirely different occupation or different training.
- Failure to identify other persons named in the bank files: The claimant failed to identify the power of attorney holder (POA) although the POA appeared to be a close relative of the account owner. This rationale was rarely if ever the sole basis for a denial, but rather was cited as another example of inconsistencies between the person identified by the claimant and the actual account owner.

- The claimant failed to identify the Joint Account Owner, although the joint owner appeared to be a close relative of the account owner.
- The claimant identified only the POA and not the actual account owner (e.g., the claimant showed no relation to the account owner, either originally or on follow-up by the CRT). Under Swiss law, a power of attorney holder is not considered to be the owner of the account and the claimant has no legal rights to the account.

- Other Plausible Claimant: The CRT had awarded the account to a claimant who plausibly identified the account owner as his relative. This rationale was never the sole basis for a denial but was used to further support the conclusion that there were significant inconsistencies between the person identified by the claimant, and the person identified in the bank records.

Some claimants questioned identity denials, particularly those denials resting upon geographic disparities between the bank records and the information provided by the claimants. Those individuals stated that the Holocaust was a chaotic era; desperate victims of the Nazis moved around often and did not necessarily keep or want records from that time period, including of their residence; and the banks may not have recorded the residence accurately.

One such claimant wrote to the Court in 2010. In response, Judge Korman laid out the principles underlying the identity denials. The CRT applied generous presumptions favoring claimants to compensate for the destruction of records:

> [Y]ou expressed concern that the CRT issues non-identity denial decisions based solely on a "non-match of residence or town of birth" between the [C]laimed [A]ccount [O]wner and the account owner. Unfortunately, due to the massive destruction of bank documentation as described above, the account owner's residence often is the only identifying factor available in the bank records, aside from his or her name. Because it would be inappropriate to penalize a claimant who lacks documentation to definitively prove that his or her relative is the same person indicated in the bank files, the CRT considers a "match" to be plausible and an award to be appropriate where the claimant has identified that his/her relative has the same (or similar) name, and same (or similar) residence — even broadly, such as the same country — as the person described in the bank files, in the absence of other information disconfirming the match or other more plausible claims to the same account. You will find examples of such plausible matches in > many of the award decisions (published on the internet at www.swissbankclaims.com and www.crt-ii.org).[401]

The CRT was familiar with the chaotic circumstances of the Holocaust, in which Nazi victims may well have attempted to hide their true identities:

> Your statement that "account owners had an excellent reason to alter at least some of the identifying information on their accounts and to use an alternate address, and in particular a Swiss address, if they could" is well taken. In fact, I have made the same point:
> > Chairman Volcker has stated that "there will be some limited but significant number of Holocaust related accounts to be found among the millions of savings and Swiss address accounts that we arbitrarily excluded from our research." Letter of Chairman Volcker to Swiss Federal Banking Commission Chairman K. Hauri (Apr. 12, 2000), at 2. This is in part because many victims of Nazi terror may have opened Swiss bank accounts using a secondary residence address in Switzerland, or a false Swiss address designed to confuse the Nazis, or the Swiss address of a friend, business associate or lawyer…. This, [Chairman Volcker] explained, was the reason for the need [for Swiss banking authorities] to create a central database of 4.1 million accounts, including the Swiss address and small bank accounts.

I approved the Settlement Agreement as fair despite our concerns about the limited access to be accorded to Swiss bank records, determining that the $1.25 billion paid by the banks was preferable to protracted litigation in view of the uncertain legal basis for some of the claims, the lack of documentation, and the age of the survivors and other claimants.[402]

However, "even taking into consideration the banks' destruction of Holocaust-era documents and the incomplete information available to the claims process, not all claims can be compensated. There is a limited Settlement Fund; not one but five settlement classes; and hundreds of thousands of claimants." If an award based on a Deposited Assets Class claim was issued despite significant inconsistencies between the data in the bank records and the data provided by the claimant, the "cost of an erroneous CRT bank account award would be borne not by the Swiss banks, but by other Holocaust victims and their families with legitimate claims which require compensation."[403] Accordingly:

> The CRT thus has been obliged to reject many claims as inadequately proven, even under a generous definition of plausibility. Where a claimant has provided information that clearly contradicts the data in the Swiss bank files — such as specifying a different country or city than that shown in the bank records — and the claimant is unable to explain the discrepancy either through communications with CRT staff or on appeal, the claim must be denied so that other class members with more plausible claims can be compensated. This is especially so in the case of "identity denials," because many Holocaust victims had the same or similar name. Thus, for example, without more information, there is simply no plausible basis to conclude that the "Isaac Cohen" from Austria identified as a relative by a claimant is the same person as the "Isaac Cohen" from Hungary shown in the bank files.[404]

The decision to err on the side of over-inclusiveness, by including Initial Questionnaires as claim forms, had an impact upon denials. Although the IQs comprised nearly three-fourths of the claim forms, they constituted only a relatively small percentage of the "substantive" denials described above. Specifically, Initial Questionnaires comprised approximately 11% of disposition denials; 17% of entitlement denials; and 18% of identity denials. When the CRT recommended a denial of a claim set forth on an IQ, in most instances it was not because the account owner had received the proceeds, or because the claimant was not the proper heir. Rather, typically, IQs never matched to the AHD at all, and so there was nothing "substantive" to analyze or deny. Nevertheless, in an abundance of caution to avoid precluding possibly valid claims, the CRT analyzed the hundreds of thousands of matches the IQs generated, and issued tens of thousands of "No Match Letters," a process that added to the complexity of the program.

VIII. APPEALS

From the CRT's inception through April 2004, Special Master Bradfield (with Special Master Paul Volcker) oversaw the CRT. Special Master Bradfield subsequently became head of the CRT appeals process, working closely with former CRT staff attorney Jaimie Taff, who returned to the United States from Zurich after Special Master Bradfield engaged her to work with him on CRT appeals and other matters.[405] Commensurate with that transition, Dr. Helen Junz was appointed Special Master of the CRT.[406]

Claimants were provided 90 days to submit an appeal. All appeals were treated by Special Master Bradfield's office. As of 2006, "requests for reconsideration" based on the submission of relevant new evidence (as compared to a "plausible suggestion of error" as required for appeals) were addressed by Special Master Junz or, at the Court's direction in some instances, by the CRT.[407] All appeals were to be filed with the CRT, which in turn forwarded the "appeal" or the "request for reconsideration" to CRT Special Masters Bradfield or Junz, respectively, for processing and evaluation.[408]

A total of 3,558 appeals and requests for reconsideration were resolved. The CRT resolved 1,399 appeals. Special Master Junz resolved 253 appeals, and Judge Korman directly determined at least 5 appeals. A total of 31 decisions were reversed on appeal, resulting in authorization of $19,992,845.78 in additional awards.

As to Special Master Bradfield, between April 2004 and July 2012, the Office of Special Master Bradfield ("Special Master Bradfield's office" or the "SMO") resolved more than 1,850 appeals. Of these, 1,767 were denied (96%), 33 resulted in an award on appeal, 32 were remanded to the CRT and 14 were settled with the assistance of the SMO. In four cases, the appellants withdrew their appeal. In total, the SMO recommended awards on appeal totaling more than SF 10,000,000. In addition, the SMO facilitated settlements resulting in the recoupment of more than $3,500,000, which was either redistributed among claimants or returned to the Settlement Fund.

405 In addition to providing crucial support to Special Master Bradfield, Ms. Taff also greatly assisted in the preparation of this chapter by providing extensive information about the appeals process, as well as the mechanisms used by the CRT to assess claims.

406 At the Court's request, Special Master Judah Gribetz and Deputy Special Master Shari C. Reig also closely monitored the CRT claims process and participated in the analysis of all substantive CRT decisions prior to their submission to the Court.

407 See Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 14, 2006).

408 Special Master Bradfield also received important assistance from staff member Kristina Emminger.

A considerable number of claims involved complex and arcane issues, requiring analysis of many thousands of pages of materials. Some of this information was obtained from the bank files, but most was supplied by the claimants and/or located by the CRT through independent investigation. Many of the claimants whose claims were denied filed appeals. In some instances, it became clear in the course of analyzing the relevant materials that claimants occasionally had submitted only partial records, sometimes inadvertently, but other times, intentionally. The Court in several instances issued discovery orders requiring the claimants to provide all of the relevant documentation in their possession, and to make representations to the Court when documents could not be located. Some of these cases resulted in hearings, with involvement not only by the CRT and the Special Masters, but also by Lead Settlement Counsel Professor Neuborne.

In some instances, it became clear that although the claims raised on appeal were not compelling, they also were not frivolous, given the banks' destruction of records and the lack of a complete evidentiary record. In these few cases, the Court authorized the Lead Settlement Counsel to negotiate a settlement, with the settlement amount representing a fraction of the amount claimed. These appeals settlements enabled the CRT and the Court to turn to other claims, so as not to delay distribution of the remainder of the fund and the completion of the process.[409]

The work of Special Master Bradfield's office ("SMO") is representative of the manner in which CRT appeals were reviewed. That process is discussed in some detail below.

A. Types of Appeals

Upon receipt of an appeal, Special Master Bradfield's office assigned the case to one of six specific categories: 1) Award Amount; 2) Identification and Disposition Denials; 3) Division of Award Proceeds; 4) Inadmissibility; 5) "No Match" Decisions; and 6) Third Party Challenges.

1. Award Amount

The SMO resolved 60 appeals categorized as "Amount Appeals." This type of appeal generally involved a challenge to the application of "presumptive values;" an assertion of error with regard to the analysis of the relevant bank records and/or presumptions applied in the award; or the submission of relevant new information establishing that the value of the account was greater than the amount awarded.

With respect to appeals based upon presumptive values, appellants sometimes asserted that, despite the lack of bank records showing the actual value of the account, it was inappropriate to apply presumptive values. They claimed that their relative had been extremely wealthy, and that such wealth must have translated to a Swiss bank account greater in value than the amount awarded. In some cases, the appellant provided documentation establishing that the account owner was indeed wealthy. In other cases, the Appellant relied upon affidavits or other descriptions relating to the account owner's wealth, which — given the vast confiscation and/or total destruction by the Nazis of their victims' assets and personal belongings — may have been all that remained as evidence in support of the appeal. However, in the absence of documentation establishing the actual value of the Swiss bank account at issue, the SMO upheld the CRT's determination.

Thus, for example, in In re Accounts of Weiss & Hanak, the appellant had received an award (SF 53,500.00 ($42,460)) representing the average value of two demand deposit accounts.[410] On appeal, the appellant asserted that the presumptive values may have been appropriate for accounts held by individuals, but did not accurately reflect the average values of accounts held by businesses. The appellant also contended that the ICEP audit (which by its mandate was limited to Swiss accounts) should have extended its reach to other nations. The SMO concluded that Appellant had not provided any relevant new information demonstrating that the actual value of the accounts at issue was greater than the amount awarded, and denied the appeal.

In other cases, appellants had concerns about the number of accounts awarded, as compared with the number of accounts associated with a particular owner on the 2001 List. The CRT's effort to review the bank records underlying the accounts reported by the ICEP auditors in some instances revealed that the auditors had not considered all of the information that later became available to the CRT to review in more depth. The CRT's review of the underlying bank files usually resulted in outcomes favorable to the claimants. For example, the CRT often located information about new accounts, or about additional assets, other than those the auditors had reported, resulting in additional awards. However, in other instances, an auditor may have inadvertently characterized a power of attorney holder as an actual account owner, or had recorded (and caused the publication of) a higher number of accounts supposedly held by the account owner than were actually indicated in the Swiss bank records. In such cases, the CRT would make adjustments. Some claimants appealed these decisions, asserting that the CRT was bound to follow the 2001 or 2005 published lists. In the absence of new information on appeal establishing that the CRT's analysis was erroneous, the SMO upheld the CRT's conclusions, which were based upon all of the documentary data available at the time the claim was analyzed, rather than when the account was published.

For example, in In re Accounts of Margarete Golz-Spitzer, the appellant appealed the CRT's conclusion that her relative held two, rather than four, accounts at the bank, because four accounts had been published. Of the two accounts that existed, one was awarded to the appellant (SF 10,375.00 ($8,366.94)). The other had been closed in 1927, prior to the Holocaust era and thus outside the scope of the CRT's review.[411] The appellant asserted that the CRT had paid too few accounts, and that it also had not adequately analyzed the bank records pertaining to the account closed in 1927. The SMO concluded on appeal that although the 2001 List identified four accounts held by the account owner, the relevant bank records contained information regarding only two accounts, which were addressed in the award. The SMO also confirmed that the unawarded account had been closed prior to the relevant period, in 1927, and upheld the CRT's decision.

In some instances, the new information came from the claimants themselves. In rare cases, Nazi victims were able to retain documentation establishing the existence of their accounts, as well as the value of their holdings. These documents generally were provided to the CRT as part of the claim. However, in a few cases, the information was provided only on appeal, because the appellant mistakenly believed that the ICEP audit already had identified such information, precluding the need to submit it. In other cases, the appellant conducted additional research and was able to locate new information after his or her claim form had been submitted. In either instance, the SMO considered any new data.

For example, in In re Accounts of Fanny Margulies and Serafine Margulies, the appellant and her sister received an award representing the average value of one account of unknown type, and one custody account (SF 211,875.00 ($165,527.34)).[412] The appellant's mother had held an account of unknown type at the bank, whereas the appellant's maternal aunt had held a custody account. The appellant asserted on appeal that the account owners would have held the same type of account. The SMO agreed, noting that the account owners' father had opened both accounts on behalf of his daughters; the accounts were opened on the same day; and the account owners' father had acted as power of attorney over both accounts. Thus, the bank records pertaining to the account of unknown type must have been incomplete, for it was more likely that the father would have treated his daughters similarly. The SMO recommended and the Court authorized an additional award of SF 113,125.00 on appeal, representing the difference between a custody account and an account of unknown type.

2. Identity Denials

An identity denial was based upon the CRT's conclusion, following comprehensive review of the bank records and other data, that an account owner was not the claimant's relative, [412] The award subsequently was increased to SF 520,750.00 ($420,795.92) following the Court's June 2010 presumptive values order, which authorized upward adjustments for many previously-issued awards.

but a different person with the same or similar name as the claimant's relative. Such conclusions rested on several factors, such as that the account owner and the claimant's relative lived in different cities or countries of residence; that one was married while the other was not; or that the account had been opened after the claimant's relative had passed away.

If claimants believed there to be a plausible suggestion of error with regard to the CRT's conclusion, they were invited to produce that information on appeal. Thus, in the case of In re Account of Moritz Mayer, the CRT concluded that the claimant had failed to show a connection between his father and the city of residence recorded for the account owner, which was unpublished. On appeal, however, the appellant provided documentation demonstrating that his paternal uncle had resided in the account owner's city of residence. The appellant established that his uncle was a prominent businessman in that city. He would have had an opportunity to open a Swiss bank account on behalf of his brother, who, at the time, lived under Nazi occupation. The appellant received an award on appeal in the amount of SFr 204,750.00 ($191,355.14).[413]

Other appellants appealed disposition denials, seeking review of the CRT's conclusion that the account owner, or an authorized party acting on behalf of the account owner, had received the proceeds of the account. In some instances, this determination was based on the fact that the account had been closed prior to the date of Nazi occupation of, or alliance with, the account owner's country of residence.[414]

Thus, for example, in In re Accounts of Flore Heymann, Alexandre Heymann, Jeanne Weiler, Leon Weiler, Paul Metzger, and Lucy Metzger, the appellant appealed the conclusion that the owners had received the proceeds of their account prior to the Nazi occupation of France in May 1940. The appellant contended that although the Nazis did not occupy France until 1940, the population of Strasbourg, the account owners' city of residence, was evacuated in September 1939. Because the account owners would have been evacuated from Strasbourg, they would have been prevented from accessing their Swiss bank account. The SMO concluded that while 413 The award subsequently was increased to SF 326,662.50 ($292,109.28).

414 See supra, discussing Court's Memorandum & Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 29, 2006).

Strasbourg was evacuated in September 1939, this was still prior to the Nazi occupation of France, and was not carried out at the direction of the Nazi regime. There was no evidence that the account owners had not been able to retrieve their Swiss account. Accordingly, the SMO denied the appeal.

In certain cases, neither the ICEP audit nor the CRT had identified an account, but the claimant had provided information that he or she believed supported the existence of a Swiss bank account. Although the CRT did award accounts based upon evidence provided by the claimant, the evidence considered to be plausible in such instances fell into very limited categories. These categories included Austrian and German State Archives records; bank documents; documents submitted to an official governmental agency; and official letterhead indicating a connection to a Swiss bank.

Certain appeals were based upon the CRT's conclusion that the claimant's evidence did not plausibly show that his or relative owned a Swiss bank account. For example, in In re Accounts of Mozes Fleischmann, Mirjam Fleischmann, Olga Fleischmann and Juliska Veber, the appellant claimed account proceeds totaling US $2,840,000 based on accounts that he said were held by his parents and his paternal and maternal aunts, Olga Fleischmann and Juliska Veber, respectively. The CRT had deemed the evidence insufficient to support this assertion.

The appellant state that his parents, Mozes and Mirjam Fleischmann, resided in Budapest, Hungary from 1934 to 1944, where his father was one of the most important businessmen in the Hungarian wine industry. The appellant stated that his father owned several vineyards, wine cellars, and a distribution company. The appellant explained that in 1944, his family was moved into the International Ghetto, a group of 30 buildings rented in Budapest by the Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg to protect Hungarian Jews from being persecuted by the Nazis. According to the appellant, the entire family obtained special passes, known as Schutzpasses, which were to have afforded them protection.[415] However, his parents were captured by a Hungarian fascist squad and murdered in Budapest in November 1944. The appellant stated that both of his aunts also perished in the Holocaust.

[415] For more information about the Schutzpass, see chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Refugee Class Claims Process." Several Refugee Class awards, described in that chapter, relate to the Schutzpass.

In support of his original claim, the appellant submitted a photocopy of a small, folded handwritten note (the "Note") that he stated his father gave him in 1944. The Note indicated the name of a Swiss bank, as well as information pertaining to three accounts of unknown type held in Zurich: one opened in 1938 by Mozes and Mirjam Fleischmann containing US $965,000.00; one opened in 1940 by Mozes Fleischmann and his sister, Olga Fleischmann, which contained US $985,000.00; and one opened in 1940 by Mirjam Fleischmann and her sister, Juliska Veber, which contained US $890,000.00. The final line of the Note stated: "One day all this will be yours! Daddy." According to the appellant, the dates on the note referred to the years the accounts were opened. The appellant stated that he attempted, but failed, to retrieve the proceeds of the accounts in Switzerland in 1955 and 1977. He stated that the bank refused to give him any information regarding the accounts because he did not have the account numbers.

The CRT denied the claim, explaining that neither the ICEP auditors nor the CRT — despite an extensive search, and after "voluntary assistance" provided by the bank named in the Note — had been able to identify any of the accounts listed in the Note.

On appeal, the appellant asserted that records pertaining to the accounts could not be found because the Swiss bank at issue had destroyed millions of bank records after the War. The appellant submitted several documents, including results of testing by persons hired to authenticate the Note; statements by the appellant's representative chronicling the involvement of the appellant's father in the Hungarian wine industry and his father's connection to the Hungarian Royal Court; information pertaining to the Schutzpass issued to Mozes, Miriam and Mihaly (Michael) Fleischmann; and affidavits executed between 2003 and 2008 from persons claiming to be familiar with Mozes Fleischmann's involvement in the Hungarian wine industry in the 1940s.

Special Master Bradfield engaged several leading experts to date-test the original Note. None of the experts could pinpoint a year of manufacture for the paper. All of the experts acknowledged that it was possible, and even likely, that the paper was manufactured after the Second World War. One expert concluded that it was "very likely" that the Note dated from the post-1950s period. The SMO was unable to test the media used to write the Note, pencil, which the experts advised could not be date-tested. Because the text of the Note was printed in block letters, and the only handwriting sample attributed to the appellant's father was a signature contained in business records, it was not possible to accurately compare the handwriting on the Note with the signature attributed to the appellant's father.

Further, the appellant did not present any evidence demonstrating that his family had any involvement in the Hungarian wine industry. Such information could have included Hungarian property records, information from wine-related trade journals or business media, or excerpts from newspapers identifying the appellant's father (or any member of his family) as engaged in the Hungarian wine business.

The SMO's own efforts to identify the appellant's father's connection to the Hungarian wine industry included a request to the chief Hungarian archivist at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum ("USHMM"). The archivist did not identify any information demonstrating that the appellant's father was involved in the Hungarian wine industry. He did identify another Fleischmann family that figured prominently in the Hungarian wine industry. The appellant, however, was not related to that family. Rather, the research undertaken by the USHMM indicated that the appellant's father was a certified mechanical engineer, a "dealer of technical gadgets," and a manufacturer of passementerie, an ornament worn with traditional Hungarian clothing.

The SMO explained that statements without supporting documentation pertaining to a Claimed Account Owner's profession and wealth, as well as unsupported claims related to efforts to retrieve funds from Swiss banks, asserted only after the claims process had commenced (and only upon appeal) did not carry sufficient evidentiary weight. Accordingly, Special Master Bradfield denied the appeal.

The appellant then sought review by the Court, which confirmed that the appeal had been appropriately denied. The Court found that Special Master Bradfield had undertaken "extensive and comprehensive efforts … to authenticate the note" the appellant had provided, but the results were inconclusive.[416] However, even if the Special Master had determined the note to be authentic, and the claimant's father to have been involved with the Hungarian wine industry,

"this note in itself is insufficient to justify an award." The note, "even if authentic, remains an assertion by the [a]ppellant's father regarding the existence of Swiss bank accounts, for which no collaborating evidence has been found."[417] However, because the claim was "determined to contain sufficient information to warrant a Plausible Undocumented Award," the appellant was "entitled to receive a total payment of U.S. $7,250 for this PUA."[418]

3. Division

The SMO resolved 36 appeals involving a challenge to division of an award. Division appeals largely consisted of objections to the share of an award amount, as well as challenges to the determination that unrelated claimants plausibly had identified the account owner and thus were equally entitled to a pro rata share of the award through an "MPM" award.

As to division appeals, awards were distributed among various branches of an account owner's family tree, or among relatives within the same branch (i.e., siblings). Where the division was appealed, the SMO reviewed all relevant documentation establishing the relationships of the various awardees to the relevant account owner. The SMO also reviewed documentation related to a chain of wills, where relevant, to ensure that the award distribution was consistent with that information.

Thus, in In re Accounts of Stefan and Irene Adler, the award totaled SF 181,680.00 ($123,066.22) and represented one custody account and one demand deposit account, both of which were jointly held by the account owners.[419] The claimant was the second wife and widow of Stefan Adler. Irene Adler was his first wife. The CRT determined that the claimant was entitled to one-half of the total award. The remaining half was awarded to the niece and nephew of the other account owner, Irene Adler.

On appeal, the appellant asserted that she was entitled to three-quarters of the award rather than one-half. She claimed that the award erroneously had concluded that the accounts were jointly held, as she believed that her husband had used the accounts for his business. She also asserted that her husband's first wife, Irene Adler, had pre-deceased him, and "Roman Law" provided that the first wife's share should have been divided in equal shares between her husband (who later married the appellant), and Irene Adler's other heirs.

418 Id.

Following a review of the bank records, the SMO agreed with the CRT that the accounts were jointly held by the two spouses, rather than held as business accounts by Stefan Adler. The SMO also observed that the CRT Rules, not Roman Law, governed the proceedings. The CRT Rules provided that two joint account owners were to be treated as if they each owned one-half of the account, even if one pre-deceased the other. Accordingly, the fact that Stefan Adler had survived Irene Adler did not affect the joint ownership of the accounts. In addition, the descendants of Irene Adler's parents — the niece and nephew — were entitled to her share of the accounts.

There were also appeals based upon "Multiple Plausible Match" awards. The appellants generally contended that they had established a superior claim of relationship to an account owner than had other awardees. Thus, in In re Account of David Grünberg, the CRT awarded an account as an "MPM" to the appellant's brother, "Claimant G.," and to another unrelated claimant, "Claimant T." (the total award was for SF 49,375.00 ($40,471.31)). The CRT concluded that Claimant G. plausibly had identified himself as the account owner, while Claimant T. also had plausibly identified the account owner as her grandfather. The appellant, however, was not entitled to share in the award, because his brother, Claimant G., had a superior claim — he, himself, had owned the account. On appeal, the appellant asserted that as both he and his brother had identified the account owner, both should receive a share of the account. He also contended that despite the fact that only Claimant G.'s name appeared on the account, their father likely opened it on behalf of both sons.

The SMO concluded that there was no evidence that the account had been opened for both sons. There was no indication in the bank records that the appellant held any ownership interest or was affiliated in any way with the account at issue. Since the appellant failed to establish that the CRT had erred, his appeal was denied.

4. Inadmissibility

The SMO resolved 52 appeals involving an initial decision that a claim was not admissible. If an appellant successfully demonstrated that his or her relative was targeted as a member of one of the five victim classes, the SMO remanded the claim to the CRT for further analysis.

Thus, for example, in the case of Claimed Account Owner Jean-Marie Gattelet, the appellant contended that the Claimed Account Owner was Jewish, although the CRT had found no evidence to support such claim. However, on appeal, the appellant provided new documentation: a page from an undated personal military ID booklet, which indicated that the Claimed Account Owner was classified by French military doctors as Jewish. Accordingly, the SMO reversed the inadmissibility decision and remanded Appellant's claim to the CRT for review.

On the other hand, in the case of Claimed Account Owner Wilhelm Krüger, the appellant contended on appeal that she had been a victim of Nazi persecution because her parents conceived her to make a "superior German race." She stated that her victim status derived from her having been conceived in a "breeding program" in Nazi Germany. Because she was not a member of one of the five designated "victim or target" groups, her appeal was denied.

5. No Match Findings

The SMO resolved 1,342 appeals based upon the CRT's finding that no account could be located for any of the claimant's relatives. In the absence of bank records such as a bank statement, a deposit slip, or letter to the appellant from a relative mentioning the account, or some similar document that would provide a basis for further investigation, the appeal was denied.

In the case of Claimed Account Owners Otto Ignac Eisner & Eisner Tuchgrosshandel, the appellant claimed that her father, Otto Ignac Eisner, had a Swiss bank account that was closed in 1947 by another man named Otto Eisner. The appellant stated that since her father had died in 1942, he could not have closed his account in 1947. The appellant enclosed a letter from a Swiss bank dated January 9, 2001, which she believed established that her father had owned a Swiss bank account that was closed improperly in 1947.

The SMO informed the appellant that the 2001 letter indicated that an account held by a person named Otto Eisner was opened rather than closed in 1947. The Swiss bank had provided the appellant with a signature sample for Otto Eisner, and indicated that Otto Eisner had submitted a passport issued in Prague in 1947. The Swiss bank had informed the appellant that it had concluded that the account owner named Otto Eisner was not the same person as appellant's father, who was also named Otto Eisner and died in 1943.

The SMO did not comment on the bank's conclusion that the appellant's father and the account owner were not the same person, since the account opened in 1947 was outside the scope of the Relevant Period (which covered accounts opened or open during 1933-1945). However, as neither the ICEP auditors nor the CRT had located an account held by any of the appellant's relatives, the appeal was denied.[420]

6. Third Party Challenges (Late Claims)

The SMO resolved 109 late claims to accounts that had been previously awarded. The Court extended the CRT claims filing deadline several times, including by order of December 30, 2004, which provided that late claims to awarded accounts were eligible for consideration in the appeals process only if the late claim complied with three conditions: (1) the late claimant had to be either the account owner, the account owner's spouse or the account owner's child; (2) the late claimant must have provided an unusually compelling reason for failing to comply with the [420] Similarly, in the case of Claimed Account Owner Alice Homburger, the appellant contended that her mother, Alice Homburger, had owned a Swiss account. She submitted as proof a September 16, 1987 letter from her mother to Credit Suisse. In that letter, Alice Homburger stated that a sum of money had been deposited in her account in September 1935, that she could not remember the account number, and that she had been unable to access the account due to various foreign exchange restrictions in the former Palestine and Israel during and after the Second World War. The SMO informed the appellant that records identified by Credit Suisse indicated that Alice Homburger had opened an account on February 16, 1960 that was later closed on June 2, 1966. Those records also showed that the appellant's father had opened an account on September 19, 1935 that was subsequently closed on March 19, 1936, and the CRT had awarded that account. However, the bank records showed that the appellant's mother had opened and closed her account after the War, and therefore the CRT had no jurisdiction over the account.

filing deadlines; and (3) the late claimant must have demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that the claimed account had been awarded erroneously.

For those cases that were appealed, the SMO evaluated the relationship between the late claimant and account owner. A late claimant asserting a particular relationship to an account owner was required to document that he or she was the account owner, or that person's spouse or child. The SMO also considered whether the late claimant had provided an "unusually compelling reason" for failing to file a timely claim. Appellants offered various reasons for failing to file, ranging from a lack of knowledge of the claims process (rejected by the SMO, given the massive worldwide notification of the Settlement) to illness (generally accepted, with supporting medical records and correspondence from a physician). Finally, the SMO considered whether the late claimant had established with clear and convincing evidence that the account had been awarded erroneously.

The SMO sometimes directly contacted those who had received the original award and sought to reach a settlement among the parties, often members of the same family. Such efforts resulted in the redistribution and/or recoupment of several million dollars. In some cases, awardees readily returned overpaid funds for redistribution among other heirs of the account owner. In other cases, however, the original recipient objected to the inclusion of another claimant for various reasons including that the late claimant had not met the filing deadline; that the funds already had been spent; and/or that there was no obligation to include other family members in the claim.

Where the SMO was unable to reach a settlement, and the late claimant had fulfilled the criteria of the December 30, 2004 order, the SMO recommended an award. Where the late claimant did not fulfill the criteria of the order, the SMO in limited cases determined that a narrow exception could be made if the original awardee(s) had provided false or misleading information. Where the late claimant did not fulfill the criteria of the order, and also was not eligible for an exception to the order, the late claim was denied.

Later in the claims process, the SMO took into consideration the fact that many individuals would be receiving additional payments based upon presumptive value adjustments. The SMO determined that in such cases, the presumptive value increase could be paid in whole or in part to late claimants knowingly excluded from the process by the original recipients, even if the late claimants had not met the criteria of the Court's December 30, 2004 order.

Thus, for example, in the case of In re Accounts of Arthur Pollak, the original award had been paid in full to a grandchild of the account owner, for a total of SF 26,750.00 ($21,400.00). After the original award was issued, the claimant's siblings came forward as third parties, arguing that they were entitled to a share of the payment. Since the late claimants did not satisfy the terms of the December 30, 2004 order, the SMO determined that it was not appropriate to burden the Settlement Fund with a "double payment" by issuing an award to these individuals. However, the SMO also determined that the original recipient knowingly had excluded his siblings from his CRT claim. Had they been included (or had they submitted their own timely claims), the award would have been divided among the siblings. Each would have received $5,755.47.

Subsequently, the original claimant received a presumptive value adjustment of $1,621.90, so that his total award was $23,021.90. When the presumptive value award was issued, the SMO noted that the original recipient had been overpaid by $15,644.53. Therefore, the entire adjustment amount of $1,621.90 was to be distributed to the appellant and his other siblings. The SMO noted that these late claimants also were not precluded from initiating independent efforts, outside the CRT process, to obtain the full share of the award to which they were entitled.

B. Payment Issues on Appeal

Upon approving an award on appeal, the SMO initiated the payment process. While the majority of payments were made without issue, appellants in a few cases raised certain objections that prevented prompt payment. Some appellants requested a delay of payment until the resolution of their appeal, which was not a prerequisite for treatment of an appeal. Others objected to the submission of documentation required by the claims process prior to payment.

In one particularly complex case, the executors of two estates, E1 and E2, which were two of many payees of an award, expressed concerns that they were to be made responsible for any transfer of funds should other entitled heirs come forward. The executors of E1 and E2 indicated that the ultimate beneficiary of the estates was an Israeli children's hospital. Thus, in accordance with the relevant chain of wills, the executors of E1 and E2 would not be in a position to assume responsibility for the funds. The SMO worked extensively with representatives of the estates, the hospital, and the parent company of the hospital, which were located in several countries and whose interests were not always aligned, to resolve the matter.

IX. CHALLENGES TO THE DEPOSITED ASSETS CLASS PROCESS

The Deposited Assets Class claims process was complex for many reasons, including the Swiss banks' destruction of millions of bank records and the banking authorities' restriction of access to the files that did remain; the decision to err on the side of over-inclusiveness by incorporating tens of thousands of informal documents into the process as Deposited Assets claim forms (particularly the Initial Questionnaires), the majority of which did not support an award; the decision to investigate each and every relative named by a claimant to determine if that person owned a Swiss bank account, requiring the CRT to research more than 415,000 potential account owners and more than 1.5 million matches; the extension of filing deadlines and acceptance of late claims; the individualized treatment of particularly complex cases, including on appeal; and the conclusion that it was appropriate to review and update policies and guidelines in light of new facts that emerged from the claims process, often resulting in the upward adjustment and issuance of many additional payments (for example, by incorporating new presumptions concerning balances of accounts reported in the 1938 Census; accounts reported in the bank files as "low value;" and reconsidering and recalculating awards based upon presumptive values).

Despite efforts to continually reevaluate the claims process to ensure that participants were treated fairly, and adoption of presumptions generally favoring the claimants, there were some observers who thought the program could have been more generous. This concern was not surprising, given the many decades during which Holocaust victims and their heirs were turned away by Swiss banks. Their frustration, and their belief that even more could have been done for bank account owners, was understandable. Others implied the opposite: that the bank account process should not have been stressed as central to the settlement. Both viewpoints are discussed below.

A. Concerns About Timing and Amounts Awarded

Some felt that the distribution process did not award enough payments to enough claimants. Others believed that the process could have been speeded up significantly. These claims were reasonable but also might not have taken into account the lengthy history leading up to the claims process, and the extensive measures that were adopted to mitigate the effects of the banks' destruction of millions of records.

As the Court has pointed out, the "CRT's rules 'appropriately established a very relaxed standard of proof.' These rules are intended to compensate for the Swiss banks' systematic destruction of Holocaust-era account records. They reflect information gained from the CRT's examination of the remaining bank files, European archives and claimant information. We have left no stone unturned in our effort to return Swiss bank accounts to their rightful owners."

For example, the decision was made to search for accounts owned not only by relatives the claimants specifically named as possible account owners, but for all relatives mentioned by claimants, on the chance that one of these individuals also might have owned a Swiss bank account. That decision meant that the claims process was longer and more complex, but it also helped to broaden the search for account owners and heirs.

> The CRT's work could certainly be completed more quickly if it were to limit its search to the person identified by the claimant as the account owner. However, we have concluded that, after a 60 year hiatus and a determined effort on the part of Swiss banking authorities to limit access to accounts, claimants are best served only after painstaking analysis not only of the specific account that the individual may have claimed, but of even accounts potentially owned. Experience has shown us that this additional research is of significant benefit to the claimants…. To take but one example, in late 2002, the CRT recommended and I approved an award of nearly $5 million, in which the claimant had sought only her father's account. The CRT did locate one account that had been owned by the claimant's father. Of far more significance, however, the CRT also discovered several additional accounts holding substantial assets belonging to the claimant's aunt, who had been killed in a concentration camp and who had no heirs other than the claimant and the relative she represented. The claimant had not claimed the > aunt's accounts. Were it not for the CRT's protocols, which require that staff members review all potentially related account owners for whom information is available in the [AHD], the claimant would have never known about, much less received, her aunt's substantial assets — some of which clearly belonged to the claimant's father, based upon information in the bank files.[421]

The limitations imposed by the lack of a complete documentary record, and the restrictions the banks imposed on those records that did exist, are exemplified by the concerns raised by one claimant who was a vocal advocate in favor of Holocaust restitution in the media and before Congress. He expressed dissatisfaction with various Holocaust compensation programs, including that established for the Deposited Assets Class. He had never filed a formal claim form with the CRT, but he had filed an Initial Questionnaire (IQ). Since he was quite knowledgeable about Holocaust compensation programs, his failure to file a CRT claim form perhaps was intentional. Nevertheless, as true for thousands of others, the CRT erred on the side of caution by treating his IQ as a bank account claim.

Once his IQ had been thoroughly reviewed, he received a "No Match Letter." He was advised that despite an exhaustive search, including the matching of the names of 21 different family members against the 37,954 names in the AHD, the CRT was unable to locate documentation evidencing that any of his relatives had owned a Swiss bank account. After receiving this decision, he appealed, and supplemented the original record after communicating with archives in Europe. However, he was unable to provide any evidence of a Swiss account, and CRT Special Master Bradfield therefore upheld the CRT's decision on appeal.

The claimant then sought and received a ruling from the Court. He was again offered the opportunity to supplement the record. When he was unable to provide further documentation in support of his claim, the Court upheld Special Master Bradfield's denial of the appeal, pointing out that the materials that had been provided on appeal — "a document indicating that the Nazis apprehended [his] relatives while on route to Switzerland; photographs and letters demonstrating that [his] relatives traveled to Switzerland; … post-War estate tax records regarding [his] relatives' assets and pre-War wealth, … [and affidavits signed by] a sister of a housekeeper employed by [his] relatives during the Holocaust era" describing the family's wealth — "'do not have the same plausibility value of statements that are more or less contemporaneous with the 1933-1945 period, or made before the commencement of the Claims Resolution Process.'"[422]

While the claim did not satisfy these standards, the Court made clear that that claimant, and others like him, did have a remedy:

> I understand the position advanced by [the claimant] and thousands of other Holocaust victims and their heirs, that it would be inappropriate to penalize claimants for the lack of bank records or other documentary evidence….
> In recognition of the obstacles confronting many claimants due to the destruction of bank files, the inability to locate other credible documentation (such as archival records), and the passage of time, I authorized the payment of "Plausible Undocumented Awards." Deposited Assets Class claims that have been assessed in accordance with designated criteria and determined to be plausible receive payments of $5,000 each [increased by $2,250 by order of June 16, 2010]. In fact, in 2007 [he] received just such an award …. [His] case in fact is prototypical of many of the Plausible Undocumented Awards for which I have authorized compensation: the claims often discuss great family wealth; describe increasing persecution by the Nazis; recollect, sometimes (as here) through an affidavit of a family member or acquaintance funds that were deposited into a Swiss bank account; and explain the heirs' inability to access those assets from the banks after the War. While descriptive evidence of this nature does not substitute for bank records or archival documentation, it does warrant the recognition that the claimant may have been prohibited from locating such documentation of an account due to circumstances well beyond his or her control.[423]

In the meantime, the claimant had submitted a statement to the U.S. Congress.[424] This was at a time when his appeal of the CRT decision was pending, and while he had been given the opportunity to supplement his original submission, which consisted at that point only of his Initial Questionnaire. He sent a copy of his congressional statement to the Court. In this statement, he contended that "distribution bodies" — presumably including the CRT — applied "rules blatantly unfair to legitimate claimants." He stated that the Swiss Banks Settlement claims process would be improved by adhering to certain "standards."

In response, the Court observed that some of these recommended "'standards' simply paraphrase principles that I already have enunciated and adopted in overseeing the review of bank account claims," while others "are well-taken, but nevertheless untimely criticisms of decisions that class members and their representatives properly determined were necessary compromises to ensure that elderly Holocaust survivors and heirs would see some recompense in their lifetimes."[425]

> ... [A]s I noted in my [2000 and 2004] opinions, Paul Volcker, the former head of the Federal Reserve Board, who also led the investigation into the Swiss banks' treatment of Holocaust-era accounts, testified before Congress in 2000 to urge the Swiss banks to provide greater access to their accounts. In his statement to the Committee on Banking and Financial Services chaired by Congressman Leach, Mr. Volcker made it clear that the "SFBC [Swiss Federal Banking Commission] should promptly authorize consolidation of the existing but scattered auditor workpapers and databases (established during the [Volcker] investigation) relating to 4.1 million accounts open in the 1933-1945 period, and assembly … of them into a central archive that can be used in a claims resolution process." Although Mr. Volcker testified in February 2000, while the class action settlement still was under consideration and when interested parties still had the opportunity to influence the outcome, neither Congress, the media, nor potential class members joined Mr. Volcker's effort to improve access to bank documentation, and the Swiss banking authorities did not accede to Mr. Volcker's requests.
> Against this backdrop, we have made a strenuous effort throughout the claims process to ensure that claimants are not prejudiced by this lack of bank documentation. Thus, your first "standard" — that it is "disingenuous and unjust to subject Holocaust victims and their heirs to ordinary standards of proof, when Swiss banks failed to provide the rightful account owners with documentation in such a vast number of cases" — is a recitation of the adverse inference principle that I long ago adopted in favor of claimants confronted with minimal bank records.[426]

In addition, the adverse inference principle permitted the Court to authorize awards for plausible but undocumented claims (PUAs).

However, the claimant seemed to be suggesting that each of the more than 104,000 claims should have been "paid, and at some amount exceeding $5,000"[427] — for example, each of the more than 104,000 claims should have received $10,000. These payments alone "would total $1.05 billion of the $1.25 billion settlement." The claimant also had referred to "a variety of amounts seemingly available for compensation from the Swiss banks, ranging from '$25 billion' to '$114 billion' to '$4.5 trillion.'" These proposals, however, "do not exist in a vacuum;" "[w]e do not have $25 billion or more to repay bank depositors" since the case was settled for $1.25 billion, a settlement upheld on appeal, and intended to repay not only bank accounts but also claims based on looting, slave labor and refugee status. While the Court "share[d] [the claimant's] frustration with the amount of funds available for distribution," the "amount of the settlement reflected the judgment of some of the ablest class action lawyers in the United States, with which I agreed, that while, 'in a perfectly just world, plaintiffs should have received a far greater sum, in the real world, a recovery of $1.25 billion in return for broad releases was the best that dedicated and competent counsel could achieve under the circumstances of this case.'"[428]

In a retrospective, the financial journalist who had reported on the case for years, John Authers, noted that the claims process was slow, but that it produced important results. He used one of the CRT's more famous awards — to the heirs of Sigmund Freud — to illustrate his point.

> The business of matching each dormant account, opened more than 60 years earlier, would be an administrative nightmare. It would have to reach standards that would survive legal scrutiny in the US...
>
> The lawyers [at the CRT] were told by Korman to give the claimants the benefit of every possible doubt. The problem had been caused in part by the banks' destruction of documents, reasoned the judge, and that destruction must not get in the way of justice.
> Each [claimant] received a meticulous printed adjudication, laying out all the evidence. They make fascinating reading – none more so than the decision on the account of Sigmund Freud.[429]

Freud would die in London, aged 82, only days after the outbreak of the war in September 1939. His four sisters, trapped in Vienna, were less lucky: Maria and Pauline were killed in Treblinka; Rosa died in Auschwitz; and Adolfine died in Theresienstadt. There was never a more public case of the hounding of a Jewish depositor with the Swiss banks. But the records kept by the banks were nowhere near as clear. Investigators [at the CRT] found one document bearing the name of Sigmund Freud: a customer card, showing that he had held one custody account and two demand-deposit accounts, one of which was denominated in Dutch guilders. The address on the card matched Freud's. But the card also showed that all the accounts had been closed – the guilder-denominated account on June 30 1938 and the other two on July 31 and September 19. There were no details of the amounts in the accounts. Nor was it clear to whom the accounts had been paid.

When Anton Walter Freud [Sigmund Freud's grandson] came forward in 2001, it was easy to prove his relationship to his grandfather, and that Freud had been a victim of the Nazis. Walter Freud could even show that he had joined his grandfather in the flight from Vienna. Both of these steps would be much more difficult for other claimants. But it was unclear how much money Walter Freud was due. The published historical details of what had happened to Freud's assets after he left Austria were quite weak. But, the lawyers [at the CRT] reasoned, they could prove that the Nazis continued to hound Freud for his money, even in exile. And the date given for the closure of the guilder-denominated account was crucial. It showed that it had been closed 18 days before the Nazi currency office demanded that he turn it over. Further, Freud's correspondence made clear that he still thought he had control over the account weeks after it had in fact been closed.

On this basis, [the CRT] ruled it "plausible" that the accounts' proceeds had not been paid over to Freud or his heirs. This was enough, given the tribunal's deliberately relaxed standards of proof. The amount paid out was a work of total conjecture. The average held in custody accounts in 1945 as SFr 13,000, while deposit accounts had an average of SFr 2,140. So Freud's accounts were assumed to have been worth SFr 17,280 in 1945. Taking into account changes in interest rates and inflation over the intervening 60 years, it would by 2005 have been worth SFr 216,000 …. The court wrote a [check] for this amount. It was much more than a token, and it represented the conclusion to an all-out and honest attempt to settle the issue with justice.

If this was the fate of one of the most famous figures of the 20th century, the problems for other claimants can be easily imagined. Even the matching of names to accounts was much harder than expected. Jews used different languages and different alphabets in different countries across Europe. For example, the > archives at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem identify 1,398 variations on the name Isaac and 95 variations of the surname Berkowitz. The problem extends to place names: Yad Vashem's memorial has nine spellings of Bratislava, for example, including "Pressburg" in German. Specific software had to be written to aid the chance of finding matches.

>
> The [CRT] lawyers needed to look through birth certificates and marriage certificates dating back more than a century, and cross-refer to scanty evidence in bank archives for accounts that had ceased to exist decades earlier. This often caused painful delays that served to underscore the logic for hastily coming to a deal back in 1998. Walter Freud never saw his grandfather's stolen money repaid. He died, aged 82, a few months before the tribunal would finish work on his claim; his obituary was included as evidence in their adjudication of his claim.
> Many in Switzerland say the difficulties finding claimants for the material restitution undermine the apparent moral victory on those courthouse steps ten years ago. But such a charge does not withstand closer inspection. The slower processes designed to reveal the truth of what happened have finally ground to a conclusion….[430]

The human rights expert and Holocaust survivor Professor Thomas Buergenthal, who served as Vice Chairman of CRT-I, acknowledged that "'[p]eople get very impatient, but what would they want us to do? If we move faster, [we may] deny someone a valid claim, so we'd rather go slower."[431] The CRT-II process was guided by the same principle of providing all interested persons an opportunity to put forth their claims and have them carefully considered.

B. Concerns About Prioritizing Bank Account Claims

Some observers disagreed with the decision to place priority upon the Deposited Assets Class claims. Financial journalist John Authers explained the tension as follows:

> [H]ad the lawsuit ever come to court, the people with the strongest legal cases for recompense were those with claims on accounts…. [I]n 2000, [the Court] decided they should be allocated $800 m[illion] of the settlement. Almost nobody who had been involved in the investigations, on either the Swiss or the Jewish sides, thought it would be possible to find claimants for anything like this amount of money. That aroused resentment among other claimants.[432]

Some individuals in the U.S. suggested, not long after the claims process had started, that the Deposited Assets Class program needed to be completed. They stated that funds were being held in reserve pending the determination of claims to Swiss bank accounts. They believed that the Court should reallocate the sum reserved for the Deposited Assets Class:

> At the present time, this Court is in control of a substantial sum of money from the settlement of the Swiss Bank Class action, believed to be between $650 million and $700 million, in excess of the amounts earmarked and currently payable to claimants in the Deposited Assets Class, the Slave Labor Classes I and II, and the Refugee Class…
> [It is understood] that there are still bank account and insurance claims to be processed from the Settlement Funds.... Nevertheless, it would appear from the information available that a very significant number of the claims likely to be successful have already been approved by Special Master Bradfield and the Court. Similarly, it appears that a large number of the claims likely to yield high individual dollar payouts have also already been approved.[433]

The Court subsequently sought suggestions for the use of residual funds, if any, that might remain from the up to $800 million reserved for the Deposited Assets Class. In response, some stated that the CRT process was essentially concluded, and that all funds not yet distributed from the $800 million should be reallocated to the Looted Assets Class, through a process to be determined.[434]

The District Court, in a decision affirmed by the Second Circuit, held that the individualized process for the bank account claims was at the heart of the case, and needed to run its course.

> The $800 million that was set aside for individuals with claims against the Swiss Banks for deposited assets (of which approximately $650 million now remains) belongs to those survivors or their heirs. It was not set aside for, nor does it

This viewpoint underestimated how much the Court would be able to repay to depositors, and also did not anticipate some of the most significant bank account awards, including the multi-million-dollar award to the Bloch-Bauer family (Maria Altmann and her relatives), issued later. See, e.g., In re Account of Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG Syndicate; see also William Glaberson, For Betrayal by Swiss Bank and Nazis, $21 Million, N.Y. > belong to, the survivor community as [a] whole. This large sum was set aside in part because, of all the claims asserted against the Swiss Banks, only the claims of the Deposited Assets Class have any legal merit. The other claims could not have withstood a motion to dismiss. As the Second Circuit explained in affirming my decision:
>
> > [The Deposited Assets Class] claims are based on well-established legal principles, have the ability of being proved with concrete documentation, and are readily valuated in terms of time and inflation. By contrast, the claims of the other four classes are based on novel and untested theories of liability, would have been very difficult to prove at trial, and will be very difficult to accurately valuate.
> Under these circumstances, I have a legal and moral obligation to the Deposited Assets Class not to use the funds that belong to it for a cy pres distribution until I am certain that the claims to those funds will not exceed the amount set aside. The $800 million set aside already takes into the account the certainty that, due to the passage of time, the destruction of documents and the slaughter of millions, claims awarded will not equal the current value of accounts identified by the Volcker Committee as probably or possibly belonging to survivors. Indeed, it is a half billion dollars less than the present value of such accounts. Moreover, as I explained in my order of February 19, 2004, the accounts identified by the Volcker Committee as probably or possibly belonging to Nazi survivors understate significantly the number of accounts once belonging to survivors....[435]

The then-New York State Banking Superintendent shared a similar view. She pointed out in testimony at the Court's hearing on possible residual funds that substantial sums still needed to be returned to the bank account owners:

> Based on our experience, the Banking Department is aware of the difficulties encountered by those trying to research [bank] claims and that's what information has survived in the banks through often fragmentary information claimants can provide…. [T]he Banking Department's Holocaust [C]laims [P]rocessing [O]ffice [HCPO] has been working closely with the CRT office in an effort to expedite those claims to Swiss bank accounts. While only five percent of the CRT claims originated with our department, more than ten percent of the CRT's payments to date have been made to claimants who have worked with us.
>
> I say this to illustrate that I know whereof I speak. This is hard, exhausting and exhaustive work, as you know. We are clearly faced with a Herculean task. The overwhelming majority of claims remain unresolved. This is the main reason I would respectfully submit to you, Judge Korman, that before this court

> Until this has been achieved, there is no accurate means of determining just what may be left at so called residual funds. Moreover, I must confess that from where I sit, as difficult as it may be for those representing so many commendable projects here today, I rather hope that there be no funds left. That is, I sincerely hope that we can identify as many rightful owners of bank accounts as possible and extend awards to their heirs as quickly as possible. That is what I have always understood our priority to be.[436]

The bank account claims process sought to achieve the goals expressed by the New York State Banking Superintendent: to "identify as many rightful owners of bank accounts as possible and extend awards to their heirs as quickly as possible,"[437] and to value the accounts as accurately as possible.

The effort to ensure that owners of Swiss bank accounts were treated fairly also adhered to many of the standards recommended by many Holocaust survivors in connection with another kind of asset: insurance policies. In testimony before the United States Congress, certain survivors stated that lawsuits should be permitted to proceed against Holocaust-era insurers. They considered inadequate the multilateral agreements providing for insurance claims to be resolved through mechanisms established by the German Foundation and ICHEIC. They supported legislation that would oblige insurance companies doing business in the United States to publish names of possible Holocaust-era policyholders. The proposed legislation also would provide a right of action in court for Holocaust-related claims.[438]

Congress was advised that much work still remained to be done in the area of insurance. "Hundreds of thousands of relevant archive files were not reviewed [in the ICHEIC process]. Another significant failure is the incomplete examination of European archival records to locate files of Jews' asset declarations from the Gestapo which in many cases showed the name of the victims' insurance company and the value of the policy."[439] ICHEIC's evidentiary standards, which were said to have imposed heavy burdens of proof upon claimants, were questioned. It was stated that ICHEIC had routinely denied claims "by simply saying, even when a claimant believes he or she is a relative [of] a person named on the ICHEIC Web site, that 'the person named in your claim was not the same person.'"[440] ICHEIC also was said to have improperly rejected claims to insurance policies that were paid out under duress.[441]

Many of those who supported Holocaust-related insurance legislation believed there had been a "rush to judgment" to "close the books on restitution." When it appeared that the insurance claims process was to end, just as access was about to become available to an important Holocaust-era archive (the International Red Cross records at Bad Arolsen, Germany), some said that it was premature to shut down. "Now, with 16 miles of previously suppressed documents from the Nazi period being made public, isn't it time to halt the rush to judgment, the rush for 'closure,' and require the full, transparent accounting that we survivors are morally and legally entitled to move forward without any further impediments?"[442] Similarly, when a survivor was asked if he was concerned that it would take a long time to pursue insurance claims in federal court, he stated: "Not necessarily. At least we have a right to go to court, even if it takes 2 years, 3 years, or 5 years. If not us, our children or our grandchildren will be able to follow it up.... They've been taught what happened to us. They should follow it up if I'm not around."[443]

The extensive CRT process for Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts adopted the principles that many survivors believed were necessary to a fair claims program for Holocaust-era insurance policies. The CRT examined all available records, including archival documents, and continued to seek access to additional materials for as long as the claims process continued. Where documents did not exist, rather than assuming that the lack of a complete evidentiary record precluded the claim, the CRT favored the claimants. Following U.S. law, the CRT presumed that the documents that were destroyed would have demonstrated the merits of the claim, applying the adverse inference, and so the claimant generally received an award. The CRT also sought to locate all possible accounts to which a claimant might be entitled, whether explicitly claimed or not. Thus, the CRT matched the names of all relatives mentioned in claimant submissions — not just persons specifically believed to have held accounts — against the database of Swiss accounts. Where valid matches were found, claimants were paid.

Another example demonstrated that the CRT sought to incorporate procedures highlighted as being necessary to an equitable Holocaust compensation process. This related to the valuation of assets. By way of comparison, Congress was advised, in the case of Holocaust-era insurance policies, that those assets had been underpaid:

> [L]et me just tell you another fraction. The Germans and ICHEIC paid 10 cents on the dollar on the fair value. They paid at the same rate they were allowed to restitute policies [] after World War II. So when we hear that fair value was paid by German companies, that's not true. My question is, they paid $82 million when a conservative valuation would have been $550 million. Why should Germany today be paying Marshall Plan valuations?[444]

In contrast to the valuation standards said to be inadequate for insurance policies, the CRT claims process for bank accounts sought to repay accounts at their fair values. CRT Special Master Junz recommended that the Court increase presumptive values for Swiss bank accounts in order to more accurately estimate the real value of Swiss bank accounts. This would result in additional payments to the heirs of the account owners. Special Master Junz reached this recommendation because of the information gathered from the CRT's review of all documents that could possibly be made available. Thus, the CRT looked at not only the files prepared by the auditors, but also the underlying bank records. In many cases, the CRT also was able to obtain, following many requests to the defendant banks, additional materials in the bank files beyond the records collected during the ICEP audit. The significant information yielded through this "voluntary assistance" process, as well as through other measures such as research into European archives, demonstrated that the original presumptive values assigned by the auditors at the outset of the claims process were too low and that claimants had been underpaid. Special Master Junz proposed adjusting these values, which would result in additional payments to bank account claimants.

However, Special Master Junz's recommendation to increase payments to bank account heirs was questioned.[445] Some of those raising these concerns had challenged ICHEIC's rules and payments. The suggested that the valuation rules for the CRT did not have to be adjusted. They stated that the claims of needy class members (the Looted Assets Class) had "both moral and legal legitimacy, and their claims on the excess funds now at issue carry equal or greater weight than the claims of heirs of owners of accounts as to which no documentation exists establishing the amount of the claim."[446]

The State of Israel also questioned Special Master Junz's proposed adjustment for bank account awards, engaging an expert who stated that because "new account information not previously available to the ICEP came through a different data generating process than the original sample," the data were less reliable.[447] This view appeared to indicate that the CRT's effort to obtain "voluntary assistance" from the banks was not warranted, when actually it was in accordance with the Court's directives in approving the Settlement Agreement. The Court had made clear from the very outset that the banks' cooperation in good faith with the claims process was a condition to their obtaining releases under the Settlement.[448]

The State of Israel sought access to the data studied by Special Master Junz in analyzing presumptive values, seeking the materials supporting what it called the "sample" Special Master Junz had used.[449] Special Master Junz had not looked at a "sample," however; she had analyzed every account available to the CRT (i.e., the approximately 37,000-account "Account History Database").[450] The State of Israel also sought to review the accounts and samples analyzed by the Volcker Committee in calculating the original presumptive values, but this was not possible as "neither the CRT, nor Special Master Junz, nor the Court, had access to bank records for the original [pre-scrubbing] 54,000 accounts upon which the [original] presumptive values [were] based."[451]

Lead Settlement Counsel, Professor Neuborne, who responded to these concerns, observed that the State of Israel did "not claim – nor could it – that its representatives are more competent to make such determinations than are the individuals who have been studying Holocaust-era Swiss bank records and related materials for more than a decade."[452] The effort to "independently review[]" the bank records questioned the "reliability of the Special Master [Junz] on whose reputation and expertise the Court has relied (and indeed, so has the State of Israel in other contexts)."[453] Thus, "the State of Israel, as a member of ICHEIC, sought out Dr. Junz for her expertise in determining the average value of one type of Holocaust-era asset: insurance policies. It is difficult to understand how the State of Israel now can question Dr.

The late journalist Marilyn Henry observed, of the issues relating to the bank account claims process, that these concerns had not taken into consideration the principle that "victims are entitled to recover the property stolen from them." She commented:

> Repeat after me: bank accounts, bank accounts, bank accounts. In the mid-1990s, Jewish organizations and a handful of lawyers — some savvy, some less so — demanded the return of Nazi era Jewish accounts in Swiss banks. The accounts had become dormant because the Jewish depositors did not survive the Holocaust, or because crucial documents did not survive, leaving families unable to prove their rights to the accounts.
> . . . .
>
> [The District Court], whose decisions were upheld by a US appellate court, did a noble service to the needy.
> But this compassionate aid should not distort the essential purpose of the Swiss banks settlement. The lawsuit was a restitution case about bank accounts, bank accounts, bank accounts. It was a claim with legal and moral legitimacy. But when … more cash [was sought] for their own purposes, they did not simply stall the conclusion of the Swiss banks settlement. Instead, they ran roughshod over individual property rights and undermined the moral basis of every Jewish claim: that victims are entitled to recover the property stolen from them.[455]

For those accounts for which valuation information had been destroyed or appeared to be unavailable based upon the auditors' reports, two options were available: to deny the claimants any recovery even though the data was missing through no fault of their own, or, instead, to move forward with payments despite incomplete information. Other Holocaust-related claims programs have been more restrictive. ICHEIC, it was said, was unwilling to compensate

Holocaust victims and heirs (with the exception of $1,000 so-called "humanitarian" payments), absent a complete documentary record demonstrating precisely what the asset was worth, and where that asset ended up. Similar statements were made about the State of Israel's restitution program. Although there were many bank accounts opened in what was then Palestine by individuals who would become victims of the Nazis, Israeli banks appeared reluctant to return these assets to their owners or heirs.[456]

The Court, however, deemed a restrictive approach to be inappropriate to the circumstances of the Holocaust. The CRT thus incorporated principles and inferences that would favor owners and heirs of Swiss accounts, who had been deprived of their property for so long, and whose legal claim to compensation was beyond question.

X. COMPLETION OF THE CLAIMS PROCESS

With the final review of the last of the over 104,000 claims filed for Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, the Court ordered the CRT and SDAP to begin to wind down their work and to close their offices. To do so, a number of steps had to be taken.

A. Completion of All Payments

1. "Last Call Letters"

In the interest of ensuring that Holocaust survivors and/or heirs were given ample opportunity to receive their payments, the Court directed SDAP to contact those claimants who,

Bazyler, Unfinished Justice: A Conversation with Michael Bazyler, REFORM JUDAISM MAG., Spring 2008, at 79, 86, 103 ("One of the most powerful accusations against the Swiss banks — which ultimately led them to settle — was the banks' heartless strategy to stall until elderly claimants died, thereby minimizing their financial losses. Sadly, when the same accusation was made against Israeli banks and the government, they both continued to stall. It took an Israeli parliamentary commission created in 2000 four years to issue its report on the bank assets held by the government and the private banks, and another two years for the government to create a state corporation — the Company for Location and Restitution of Holocaust Victims Assets — responsible for collecting and distributing these assets to Holocaust victims"). See also Cam Simpson, Battle for Holocaust Assets Roils Israel, WALL ST. J., Nov. 12, 2008 ("The Israeli law sets up a process similar to the one in Europe. Verified heirs are supposed to get paid first, with needy Holocaust survivors getting the rest. But there's a crucial difference from the earlier settlements: The Company [established by the Israeli Parliament to handle claims] must target each institution over each asset that it allegedly held…. this gives the targeted institutions a chance to fight claims case-by-case....").

thus far, had not accepted their awards, or had not sent SDAP the documentation necessary to process payment. The Court authorized SDAP to initiate one final communication with those claimants. Individuals living within the United States were provided thirty (30) days, and individuals living outside the United States were provided sixty (60) days, from receipt of SDAP's letter, to resolve any outstanding payment issues and to provide SDAP with the necessary materials, including a signed Acknowledgment Form. Any payments that could not be processed within this time frame were to revert to the Settlement Fund for distribution to other class members.

In total, SDAP contacted 878 individuals who had not accepted their awards or provided documentation permitting payment: 36 who had failed to accept their original awards issued through the Zurich office (i.e. those based upon bank records or other documentary evidence); 133 who had not accepted their presumptive value increases; 317 who had not accepted their PUA payments (i.e. awards based upon plausible but undocumented evidence of an account); 388 who had not accepted their PUA increases (i.e. the additional $2,250 payment approved by the Court in June 2010); and 4 who had not accepted their payments upon approval of appeals by Special Master Bradfield.

2. Withdrawals

After SDAP had sent these letters to the claimants, and the 30/60 day deadlines had lapsed, a number of Deposited Assets Class awards still remained unpaid. Notwithstanding SDAP's ongoing attempts to resolve open issues, some claimants still declined to accept their awards and/or did not provide SDAP with the appropriate documentation. In other cases, claimants did not provide the CRT with updated contact information, and SDAP thus was unable to locate those individuals despite extensive efforts to trace their whereabouts over the course of several years. In these cases, SDAP conducted exhaustive searches to locate individuals who could not be found. SDAP first attempted to locate any alternate contact persons listed in the claim form(s) or IQ(s). Thereafter, SDAP conducted extensive internet inquiries on numerous search engines, in U.S. and country-specific government databases and search engines, country-specific local listings for each claimant, mailings to last known addresses, and inquiries into internal databases.

In certain instances, PUAs and their corresponding "PUA bump-ups" were withdrawn because the recipients, after being notified of the PUA, had become ineligible to receive such awards. Some PUA recipients previously had received a payment from CRT-I (the predecessor to the Court-supervised CRT-II) in connection with their ownership of one or more Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts. In other cases, some persons who received PUAs later received awards based upon the CRT's determination that bank records or other documentation demonstrated their ownership of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts. In a few cases, SDAP determined that PUA recipients had filed fraudulent or duplicate claims. These individuals were not eligible for payment, and the previously-authorized PUAs were withdrawn.

A total of 1,189 awards, primarily representing PUA awards, were withdrawn on December 13, 2012, and 4 awards were withdrawn on January 17, 2013. The corresponding funds ($5,258,787.84) reverted to the Settlement Fund for distribution to other class members.

B. Liquidation of the CRT and Archiving of CRT and Bank Records

As a condition to obtaining access to bank records, the CRT was obligated to operate in Switzerland and to comply with that nation's legal and administrative requirements in carrying out the distribution process (for example, in connection with human resources, accounting and other issues). Similarly, Swiss law also controlled the wind-down of CRT activities. Under Swiss law, the CRT was required to be formally liquidated by persons located in Switzerland. Thus, upon the Court's request, the CRT's Zurich-based outside counsel undertook to oversee this process:

> The [CRT], which under the Court's authority has been processing claims for Swiss bank accounts principally by heirs of those who perished in the Holocaust, has now concluded its work. The CRT, located in Zurich, Switzerland, operated as an association under Swiss law. Consequently, the affairs of the CRT cannot be concluded without a formal process of liquidation of the association under Swiss law. I appoint Andreas Casutt and Thomas Graf[f], who are members of a Swiss law firm that has represented the CRT over the ten years of its existence, to be the liquidators of the association and I have directed them to commence liquidation of the CRT in accordance with the procedures required by Swiss law.[457]

[457] Order, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., No. 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 9, 2012).

The CRT's liquidation was finalized in 2016.

In addition to winding down the CRT's administrative functions (e.g., leases, contracts, personnel obligations, and the like), an area of particular importance was the determination of rules to govern the archiving of CRT files, including documents relating to claims and to bank records. To ensure clarity for purposes of archiving, an order was issued specifying the different treatment to be accorded to different types of files, particularly distinguishing between bank records and other files:

> The purpose of this order and the accompanying amendment of the CRT Rules is to specify that certain files may be archived in either the United States or Switzerland, or in both places, as directed by this Court.
>
> Article 45 of the CRT Rules, "Archives," as it presently reads, states that "[a]fter the resolution of all Claims, all files of the CRT shall be archived in Switzerland according to guidelines approved by the SFBC [Swiss Federal Banking Committee]." As of January 1, 2009, the SFBC was merged into the Swiss Financial Market Supervisory Authority (FINMA). I now amend the CRT Rules to confirm that certain files of the CRT, an administrative agent of the United States court, may be archived outside Switzerland in a manner determined by this Court, without reference to guidelines approved by FINMA (previously the SFBC).
>
> . . . .
>
> [I]t is hereby ORDERED that Article 45 of the CRT Rules is amended to read as follows:
>
> > "Archives
> > After the resolution of all Claims, all claim files shall be archived in the United States and/or elsewhere, including Switzerland, as determined by the Court. All internal business files of the CRT shall be archived in the United States or Switzerland, as determined by the Court. All bank documentation obtained from Defendant Banks will be archived in a location to be determined following consultation with Swiss authorities, including, as appropriate, FINMA."[458]

Much of the archiving took place in the context of the Victim List Project, to ensure eventual access to materials of historical interest that have been produced and collected in the context of the Distribution Process. The Victim List Project, including the archiving of data, is described at length elsewhere in this report. In brief, however, under mechanisms negotiated by the Special Masters and the Director of the Victim List Project under the Court's authority:

- Documents relating to Deposited Assets claims and claimants were archived with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum; and
- Bank files were archived with the Swiss Federal Archives.

Both sets of materials are subject to data protection requirements and embargo periods in recognition of the privacy laws of the United States, Switzerland and other nations, as well as the confidentiality expectations of claimants.

XI. CONCLUSION: SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE DEPOSITED ASSETS CLASS CLAIMS

The Swiss Banks Settlement claims process overseen by the Court and Special Masters and administered by the CRT provided what historian Michael Marrus has called "some measure of justice" to Holocaust victims. However, it could have and should have been avoided entirely, had the banks responded promptly to the post-Holocaust pleas of their clients (and heirs) to open their files and their vaults. Instead, the banks repeatedly "insist[ed] that they ha[d] little such 'holocaust cash' and claim[ed] disingenuously that they ha[d] no interest in holding dormant accounts (even though they [could] use the cash lying in them)."[459] When the issue arose again in the mid-1990s, the banks' response was reflexive: "Following a brisk search [in 1995], they claimed to have found a trifling SFr39m ($32m) in such accounts, some of which may not even have Jewish links…. The holocaust issue ha[d] spooked the banks on and off for half a century. Shortly after 1945, they agreed to hand over to the allies $250m-worth of gold deposited by the Nazis, some of which had been plundered from Jews. Another search, in the early 1960s, which was prompted by Jewish pressure, produced a meagre SFr10m in cash, which went to Jewish charities."[460]

One journalist who spent a fair amount of time in Switzerland before the outcry over Holocaust assets, and who then followed the dispute for years, was Jane Kramer, the long-time European correspondent for The New Yorker.[461] Kramer noted in 1997 that the accusations that were being leveled against the Swiss were not new:

> People have been talking about the provenance of Switzerland's gold reserves, and about the Jewish money that disappeared in its banks, ever since the war ended — beginning with the Allies, who first demanded an accounting, and now, finally, with the Swiss themselves.[462]

Kramer placed the blame for these problems upon the banks.

> The Swiss are wildly successful bankers, and the problems they are having now come at least in part from their behaving like bankers. They are rigid, they are greedy, and they are legalistically inhumane. They do not disclose anything until the law makes them disclose it, or part with cash until the law makes them part with it, or spend time and money looking into the provenance of deposits made fifty or sixty years ago (or, for that matter, yesterday) until they are faced with lawsuits or bans or boycotts or the kind of political pressure they were faced with this year in America. The Swiss banking secrecy law was written to make them happy. The Swiss government existed to keep them happy — something it accomplished for years with what the bureaucrats in Bern refer to proudly as "our foreign policy of no foreign policy."[463]

As pointed out in the Volcker Report and by Judge Korman, confronted by "broad-based efforts to uncover assets of Nazi victims," the "'banks and their Association lobbied against legislation that would have required publication of the names of such so called 'heirless assets accounts,' legislation that if enacted and implemented, would have obviated … the controversy….'"[464]

However, by the late 1990s, the controversy had not been obviated, and also no longer could be avoided. Now the banks were under pressure not just from the victims, but from many in the financial community. As the Economist urged in 1996: "Now, half a century on, it is time for the banks to come clean and, if necessary, pay out."[465] The New York Times observed: "For decades the Swiss banking industry arrogantly thwarted inquiries about its role in the Nazi period, and effectively discouraged the relatives of Holocaust victims searching for long-dormant accounts. The Swiss stonewall has now broken down under intense pressure from Jewish organizations and the unearthing of documentary records that show the shameful extent of Swiss banking cooperation with the Nazis."[466]

Interest in these issues ran especially high after UBS was found in January 1997 to be shredding documents. The New York Times stated: "No one is making a better case that Swiss bankers may have looted the accounts of Jewish depositors who were killed in the Holocaust than the bankers themselves. For years the bankers coldly rebuffed inquiries from relatives of depositors, then resisted international efforts to investigate the matter. Now the Union Bank of Switzerland, the country's largest bank, has been caught shredding documents that might be relevant to several investigations belatedly opened in recent months …. There is no need for the current generation of Swiss bankers to shield the unseemly practices of their predecessors. Openness and cooperation now can help make up for past misdeeds, and the reimbursement of assets to those who have legitimate claims is only just."[467] In another editorial, the New York Times noted that the "search will not be easy and the amount of gold and other assets may prove smaller than imagined. But in a matter of historical accountability like this, monetary value is less important than honesty and openness. This is a reckoning long overdue."[468]

The "amount of gold and other assets," however, did not "prove smaller than imagined."[469] It was far larger. As a result, the banks seemed to revert to a familiar pattern of behavior. Initially, the banks had accepted a temporary waiver of banking secrecy to permit Paul Volcker and the major accounting firms he engaged to conduct their review, and had urged Judge Korman to dismiss the class action litigation on the grounds that the lawsuits would interfere with the important work of the Volcker audit,[470] which they pledged to support. At hearings before the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Banking and Financial Services on December 11, 1996, for example, the SBA's Chairman, Georg Krayer, had stated that "the SBA, its members and the Swiss bank supervisors are committed to providing their full support and cooperation to the [Volcker] audit and abiding by its results…. Second, the auditors will have full access to all relevant information. Third, because of this access, the audit findings will 470 Alfred Defago, the Swiss Ambassador to the U.S., wrote to Judge Korman that "the suit would violate Swiss sovereignty" and "hamper" Paul Volcker's inquiry. The "Government of Switzerland believes that the conduct of this litigation in the United States will interfere with the extensive ongoing and proposed efforts in Switzerland.… The most effective and just means for dealing with these matters are in Switzerland, not in a United States court." See David Rohde, Swiss Envoy Asks U.S. Judge To Dismiss a Suit Against Banks, N.Y. TIMES, July 30, 1997, http://www.nytimes.com/1997/07/30/world/swiss-envoy-asks-us-judge-to-dismiss-a-suit-against-banks.html.

The New York Times appeared to agree that the "discovery phase of the litigation, if concurrent with the audits, could make the bankers reluctant to cooperate with Mr. Volcker. The suit is justified but should await completion of the [Volcker] commission's work." The editorial noted that "[w]ith the banks still in a state of denial about their history, it is crucial that an unfettered inquiry be conducted" by the Volcker Committee, which "offers the best hope of determining what happened to the assets of Jews who mistakenly placed their money and their trust in Swiss banks as the Nazi terror engulfed Europe." Editorial, More Blundering by Swiss Banks, N.Y. TIMES, Aug. 3, 1997, http://www.nytimes.com/1997/08/03/opinion/more-blundering-by-swiss-banks.html.

represent the best attainable results and therefore must be accepted as conclusive by all responsible parties."[471]

That support for the Volcker audit, however, was less evident when the Volcker Committee issued its findings. On the same day that the Volcker Report was released (December 6, 1999) — which concluded that some 54,000 accounts probably or possibly belonged to Holocaust victims, an order of magnitude vastly higher than the banks previously had acknowledged in earlier surveys over the prior decades — the Swiss Federal Banking Commission ("SFBC") announced that it, alone, was solely responsible for decisions on publishing further lists of accounts. The SFBC added that it would conduct additional analysis before reaching a decision on the Volcker Committee recommendations.[472]

The SFBC declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to make available to the claims process all of the 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss banks in the relevant 1933-1945 period.[473] Instead, following a "scrubbing" process that reduced the 54,000 accounts to 36,000, with limited exceptions, the claims process was allowed access only to those 36,000 accounts. Only 21,000 accounts were published initially, augmented by another 3,000 following further litigation. The "failure of the SFBC to mandate compliance with the recommendations of the Volcker Committee, coupled with the unwillingness of the private or cantonal banks that are non-party releasees to voluntarily cooperate in permitting publication of information relating to some or all of their accounts that may be included within the 54,000 [later 36,000] accounts referred to in the Volcker Report, … created substantial impediments to administration."[474]

An attorney who represented the Swiss defendants before the Court, and later represented German entities in connection with the slave labor lawsuits, noted that the "good start the Swiss made toward resolution and reconciliation" later "foundered," followed by "a period of acrimony and stalemate."[475] His explanation was that the "Swiss populace, once convinced of the need to engage in national self-examination and restitution, came to feel strongly that Switzerland should devise and implement its own steps for addressing the questions that had arisen. Swiss citizens did not want the United States to dictate to their country, and they felt abused by what they saw as an unappreciative, unfair, and unremittingly anti-Swiss attitude emanating from America." When "Swiss public opinion moved toward a decidedly more nationalistic and less cooperative stance, the Swiss government retrenched from playing a leadership role in attempting to resolve the controversy and instead adopted the view that Switzerland's problems in the United States, relating to World War II, were something the Swiss banks, who did business there, had principal responsibility for resolving."[476]

On the other hand, the revelations about the banks were accepted by at least one important member of the Swiss banking community. Hans Baer, "[o]ne of the most powerful bankers in Switzerland and former head of the family bank Julius Baer," and an alternate member of the Volcker Committee, appointed by the SBA, was "deeply involved in the controversy." His 2008 memoirs "make[] plain his distress at what he discovered about the Swiss banking industry, in which he spent nearly a lifetime."[477] Baer credited Michael Bradfield with expanding the Volcker audit's scope, so that a process that began as a review of "open" and "dormant" account ultimately led to an examination of accounts that in some ways were even more troublesome: those that were closed, unknown to whom. Bradfield "dug more deeply into the dossiers, constantly increased the search criteria for the auditors, and expanded the framework of the investigation...Bradfield made these 'closed accounts' his pet project."[478] As a result, the value of the accounts was far greater than the amounts that had been reported in survey after survey in the decades before the Volcker audit.

> If you add the 36,000 accounts "closed, unknown by whom" and use an average base deposit of SFr 10,000, the billion-franc mark is crossed quickly, at least to the extent that the 23,000 accounts [i.e. the 21,000 published accounts] are considered, which were burdened for so long with closing and administrative charges that in the end nothing was left...
> [T]he auditors were denied the opportunity to examine closed accounts because the banks had plundered them. They, and all of us, came too late to the conclusion that the real scandal was not the dormant assets but the closed accounts. The cantonal banks, whose great political weight an outsider like [Paul] Volcker could not assess, had pressured the Swiss Federal Banking Commission to set a last deadline for the auditors to complete their work and in doing so had bought the idea that in the end, the whole truth would not come out. As a result, the cantonal banks — unlike all the other banks — were not required to publish accounts that "probably" should have been assigned to a Holocaust victim.[479]

The promise of transparency and adherence to the Volcker Committee's recommendations may have receded in the face of Swiss discomfort with Volcker's findings, which, as Baer noted, "crossed quickly" the "billion-franc mark" when all accounts were considered.[480] When the Volcker audit ended, Swiss banking authorities did not provide the kind of access and cooperation that had been envisioned when the audit had begun. The result was a claims process that had to operate, in effect, with one hand tied behind its back.

Even so, Holocaust victims who had waited so long were to be given every possible opportunity to find their lost Swiss bank accounts. For that reason, rather than limiting the process to the 33,000 formal claim forms, the Court expanded the program by accepting additional categories of claims, including tens of thousands of Initial Questionnaires that only [479] Id. at 450-51 (emphasis added). Under the nomenclature of the audit, these were known as the "Category 3" accounts. These were the same accounts that contributed substantially to Special Master Junz's reevaluation and recommended adjustment of account values, an undertaking supported by Special Master Bradfield and ICEP auditor Frank Hydoski.

[480] Id. See also In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 105 F. Supp. 2d at 153 (citing VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 4, ¶¶ 41-42 and n.23). As the Court observed, "[t]he significance of the report of the Volcker Committee, which included three members appointed by the Swiss Bankers Association, is that it provided legal and moral legitimacy to the claims asserted here on behalf of the members of the Deposited Assets Class. The findings suggest that the value of deposited assets held by the Swiss banks could exceed the $1.25 billion settlement amount." When the CRT reexamined the AHD valuation data (excluding any accounts that might have been in the 4.1 million-account TAD, to which the CRT did not have access except in limited cases), the value of just those 36,000 AHD accounts was estimated to be approximately $1.63 billion. See Special Masters' Interim Report, at 16 n.17, 34-35.

alluded to a possible Swiss account. Rather than restricting the search for assets to those who were specifically named as account owners, the Court authorized the CRT to look beyond those names and consider virtually any family member listed by the claimant as a possible account owner, resulting in over 415,000 names that needed to be analyzed. Rather than limiting the database of accounts to that set forth by Swiss banking authorities at the outset of the claims process, the Court encouraged the CRT to keep looking for other assets held in Swiss banks. Post-settlement litigation, archival research, and ongoing requests to the banks for additional data through the "voluntary assistance" process yielded additional data. More than 1.5 million "matches" of possible owners to accounts were generated by all of these efforts. These matches needed to be studied case by case, an analysis impacted and delayed by the absence of millions of records that had been destroyed by the banks. Rather than allowing this destruction of records to thwart victims' claims, however, the Court shifted the burden of proof to the banks, so that the lack of records was to be considered evidence that an account that had once had existed had been improperly turned over to the Nazis, or taken into profits.

Thus, what began in 1947 with an announcement from Swiss banks that they had (reluctantly) surveyed their holdings and had found only SF 482,000 in Holocaust-related assets,[481] ended up many decades later with a judicially-supervised process that found and returned nearly $720 million in bank accounts to Holocaust victims and their families.

* * * *

It is appropriate to close this chapter with the perspective of some of the individuals who have benefited from the Deposited Assets Class claims process, a program that sought to restitute property and make a record for history.

> It was the view of survivors like [Alice] Fischer [one of the first to call attention to the Swiss bank account issue] that triumphed. Rather than use the Swiss pay-out for a big charitable gesture, the US legal system had pulled the settlement towards a different version of justice. Banks could make good on their faults, and the often long-deceased owners of their accounts could receive the dignity they deserved, only if the court made every last attempt to make sure every surviving claimant received exactly their due. That meant more delays and more frustration, [481] See VOLCKER REPORT, Annex 5 ("Treatment of Dormant Accounts of Victims of Nazi Persecution"), ¶¶ 26-30.

but it was the closest to "justice" that the Holocaust's victims were likely to get.[482]

These are the words of some of the Nazi victims and heirs who received compensation through the Deposited Assets Class Program under the Swiss Banks Settlement:

- From Bratislava, Slovakia: "I would like to thank all of you, who undertook the task to force the [S]wiss banks to return the money, which did not belong to them!... Of course there are few luxuries I will be able to afford, please don't laugh I would like very much to have a bottle of my favorite perfume, ha ha! And also I will be able to walk into a book shop and buy all the books I would like to have…. I am living in a home for retired people …. [S]ince the day I got this letter, I am breaking my head what to do with the money, which I will not be able to spend anymore. I am not in the best health and therefor[e] I will have to act fast…. I am thinking about a project perhaps in some synagog[ue], which serve now as [c]ulture centers, open a library with all literature in English language, or upkeep of[] old [J]ewish cemeteries which are in bad shape."[483]
- From Surrey, United Kingdom: "… I would like to let you know how enormously I appreciate this settlement. In the first instant it enables me to go ahead with long delayed maintenance on my home, and to indulge in a few minor luxuries which make old age more cheerful. My main concern now is to find a suitable way to let some of the funds meet the acute needs of others who find themselves disadvantaged or whose life is exceedingly hard...I have been…fortunate of escaping the [H]olocaust and am appreciative of this every moment of my life. Not all members of my family have been in that favourable position. I feel gr[a]teful also to my father who had the foresight to stack away some funds and that these, even belatedly, are proving very useful and now help to defray the increasing costs of dependency on caring services."
- From New York, New York: "… Through the aid of my mother's uncle in Indianapolis, Ind. we were able to go to the Philippines to await our quota number for immigration to the USA. Unfortunately we ended up in the Japanese concentration camp in Manila, where my dad died of severe starvation eleven days after liberation. We had nothing…. All important papers, etc. had vanished…. When the Swiss matter came up, a dear friend of mine insisted I gather every shred I could find and apply. My parents were most honorable, and taught me to be the same. It was a very bad feeling to come with so minute amounts of information. Therefore I wish to take this opportunity to thank you in your trust in me and allowing me to have this money, which gives me back a little bit of my parents[´] identity and all that was lost… Thank you. I am honored to be believed."

[482] Authers, 2008 Financial Times article, at 28.

[483] These and other similar letters, with identifying data redacted to preserve claimant confidentiality, are available on the Court's docket.

- From Ramat-Gan, Israel: "During World War II I was in Auschwitz and fortunately managed to survive it until the war was ended. While in Auschwitz I got sick with Tuberculosis and after the war had to spend more than a year in a hospital to recover. In addition, [a] few years ago I had a [heart] surgery. Both events force me to take many medicines every day. The Money that I received from you helps me a lot in the payments for these medicines and for this I thank you!"

- From Versailles, France: "It is the first time I received something back from my father from his life in Rumania though I am 71 years old now. You must also know that I asked many lawyers up to now and spent a lot of money for having nothing. Thank you for your organization, thank you for not feeling being a thief by my claim, or only a [J]ew interes[t]ed by money as I was told. Continue to work like that, people feel better."

- From Novato, California: "I cannot thank you enough for the time and effort you have put into examining my claim. Since shortly after the war that has caused so much grief to so many, first my mother then I, tried to obtain some reparation from Germany, Switzerland and France for the many losses and pain she and I had endured. She died in 1964 without any success. When I finally had the courage to attempt some justifiable claims of my own, I undertook this difficult and heartrending project without expectations of success. It is emotionally draining to recall all the events one needs to submit to the eyes of strangers and I did it only without much hope after being told by multiple organizations that it was too late, the claims were closed or I did not have the documentation to back my statements. For these reasons I want to express my deep gratitude and appreciation to you, an organization with a heart and with the recognition that the very circumstances made it impossible to keep each and every supporting document. In the years since the war I have been destitute and homeless several times. It is a wonder that I still had as many documents as I did."

- From São Paulo, Brazil: "I have to thank you for the time and effort spent in driving this case to an end, being recognized in the mean time the rights of the successor. As a special remark, I have to mention that reading your summary I had a picture in front of my eyes of my family history. In good English. I would say that this was an unexpected fringe benefit, which deserves a special 'Thank You!'"

- From Vienna, Austria: "It is the first time I got something for my father, whom I missed so much when I was a little girl, and I always thought that he would come back after the war. My aunt, she went to England 1939, found me after the war (we had lost our flat) and she told me that my father was killed in 1943. In the years 1950-1965 my aunt…tried to get the money from Switzerland, but it was not possible… So thank you very, very, very much you really made a big present to me."

- From Haifa, Israel: "I read and re-read the 'CRT' report approved by Judge Edward R. Korman, the presiding judge in the Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, and was truly moved by the amazing … work you put into this specific claim. I truly appreciate the efforts you made in this matter. I will share this award with my family and enable them to improve on their living standards. I believe in giving whilst I am still alive and enjoy watching their happiness, once I am gone [it is] all theirs anyway so why wait till then, let them enjoy it now."

- From Vancouver, British Columbia: "We wanted to express our gratitude for your outstanding work that achieved our award, and all other awards, by contacting you - how best to create a fund for the benefit for all of you - as the best way to express our thanks. We were told that your rules strictly prohibit this, and that the best and only way to thank you is to write this letter. We would have much preferred to give you tangible evidence of how much we appreciate your dedicated time and effort that must have been involved in researching and then assembling the thousands of claims involved, resulting in awards such as ours. As it is, this letter must convey our thanks and admiration…What is evident is the meticulous and time consuming research that accomplished the composition of this award. All in all, our award reads like a labour of love on behalf of Holocaust victims, and not the work of a paid staff."

- [Residence not specified]: "Let me express my sincerest thanks…, mainly to all those who again worked out the detailed additional background information which I received together with this Award Amendment. I feel greatest esteem and respect to the whole matter. To the historic research around everything, what happened to my ancestors as well as to their destiny itself. This Amendment Award [shook] up again, what I shall never forget anyway. The whole matter keeps me mentally busy…In the (unexpected) case of the need for further contacts, please contact me as well as my mum … mentioned as Claimant. As she just has celebrated her 87th birthday, one never knows how things are going on. Thank you for your understanding!"

- [Residence not specified]: "Your research reads like a detective story and brings out more memories for me. Yes, … my uncle - I remember him well, he tried to persuade my mother and grandmother to emigrate, but like many people, they didn't want to leave what they knew and go into the unknown with nothing. Too bad! On his way to the U.S. he stopped in [our home] and we sat around the table and my grandmother brought out her diamonds, breaking them out of their settings, so that he could take them…. Yes, this award means so much to me, not only financially."

- From Manitou Springs, Colorado: "On behalf of my mother…who is now age 92 and has little comprehension about the claim on which I filed on her behalf, I would like to thank you…I am a professor of history with a specialty in Holocaust Studies and realize how little justice has been granted to Holocaust Victims. I am particularly pleased that the Swiss Banking System was forced to release the names of accounts which had lain dormant since 1945. The Swiss have always claimed 'neutrality' regarding their participation in World War II. Because of your efforts, it is now clear and documented that the banking system was not neutral and in fact can be seen in the light of an ally to National Socialism. More importantly the Swiss have proven themselves to follow a policy of obstructing justice by having to be forced by your tribunal to reveal the names which belong to those long dormant accounts...To die in a concentration camp represents death in absentia; to withhold funds which rightfully belong to those victims is to kill them all over again."

Journalist Marilyn Henry's assessment bears repeating here: "Repeat after me: bank accounts, bank accounts, bank accounts."[484] As she so aptly observed, the "lawsuit was a restitution case about bank accounts, bank accounts, bank accounts. It was a claim with legal and moral legitimacy" grounded in "individual property rights" and the most compelling "moral basis": "that victims are entitled to recover the property stolen from them."[485]

This chapter accompanies and supplements the section of the Final Report on the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement Distribution Process entitled "The Deposited Assets Class Claims Process." This addendum, entitled "Summaries of Selected Deposited Assets Class Decisions" sets forth detailed summaries of several hundred (of the several thousand) decisions approved by the Court in connection with claims to Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts. The decisions are available in their entirety on the Court's website for this settlement.[1]

I. AWARDS TO CLAIMANTS

A. ACCOUNTS PAID TO THE NAZIS

1. Accounts Transferred Under Duress

i. In re Accounts of Arthur Albers (SF 615,884.38)[2]

Arthur Albers was born in Czechoslovakia and later resided in Vienna, where he owned a large timber company. The claimant, who was Arthur Albers' great-granddaughter, advised the CRT that after the Anschluss[3], Mr. Albers was imprisoned in Buchenwald until he forfeited his entire fortune. This information also was recounted in a 1941 book by Bruno Heilig, Men Crucified, which the claimant submitted to the CRT. In that book, Mr. Albers was described as "one of the biggest Viennese timber merchants," whose release from the camp was conditioned upon "the surrender of his great business" to the Nazis.[4] The claimant also submitted a written statement from Mr. Albers' daughter, who stated that she had witnessed the Gestapo raid her parents' apartment in Vienna, at which time books and papers were confiscated. During the raid, the SS knocked Mr. Albers and an employee down a flight of stairs.

3 "Anschluss" is a "German word meaning connection or annexation that is used to refer to the takeover of Austria by Germany in March 1938...On March 13, 1938 German troops marched into Austria, and declared the country a part of the German Reich. The Anschluss was supported by many Austrians, among them Austrian Nazis, who saw it as a political, social, and cultural reunification with their brother country, Germany. Thousands turned out to greet Adolf Hitler, the native son who was returning to his homeland." Anschluss, YAD VASHEM, http://www.yadvashem.org/odot_pdf/Microsoft%20Word%20-%205740.pdf (last visited Aug. 3, 2015).

Mr. Albers later escaped via London to the United States, where he eventually established another timber business. In the U.S., Mr. Albers was one of the earliest Nazi victims to seek recourse from that nation's judicial system, in 1946 bringing suit against a Swiss bank in the City Court of New York. In that lawsuit, Albers v. Credit Suisse — subsequently cited by Judge Korman in this proceeding and incorporated within the CRT Rules[5] — Mr. Albers contended and the City Court agreed that the Swiss bank should not have complied with a Holocaust-era transfer order that the bank knew or should have known had been made under duress. The City Court pointed out that the bank "cannot escape the implication of its conduct – that it knew [Mr. Albers] was one of those persons who was not free to communicate with it, who was not free to use the mails for the conduct of his personal affairs or business affairs, and that it was useless for it to attempt to communicate with him [as evidenced by the fact that the Bank[6] wrote to Mr. Albers confirming that it had executed a transfer order to the Nazi-controlled bank Creditanstalt made while Mr. Albers was in a concentration camp; see infra]. And above all [the bank] knew that [Mr. Albers] was not likely of his free will to transfer property of his located in Switzerland to a bank in German territory controlled by the German Government."[7]

Decades later, in the claims review process under the Court's authority, the CRT revisited this case. The CRT located records relating to the accounts held at the bank that was the subject of the 1946 litigation. These documents indicated that Arthur Albers had owned a custody account numbered L59626, opened on December 29, 1937. The account contained bonds with a nominal value of $5,000. It was closed between January 20-29, 1939. In addition, Arthur Albers

5 Albers v. Credit Suisse, 188 Misc. 229, 67 N.Y.S.2d 239 (N.Y. City Ct. 1946), cited in In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F.Supp.2d 59, 66 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 19, 2004), amended 319 F. Supp. 2d 301, 308 (E.D.N.Y. June 1, 2004), and in the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended ("CRT Rules"), Article 28(j), note 5.

6 CRT decisions generally capitalized the word "Bank" to refer to the particular Swiss bank at which the account at issue was held. That format is adopted here for direct quotations from the CRT decisions, but other references to "bank" or "banks" are not capitalized herein unless otherwise specifically noted. Similarly, although CRT decisions generally capitalized the terms "Claimant" and "Account Owner," that format is adopted here only for direct quotations from CRT decisions; otherwise, lower-case format is used.

held a demand deposit account which was closed on January 31, 1940. The CRT reviewed bank memoranda and minutes from meetings of the bank's legal department, dated April 1942 and January 1944, which recounted most of the facts set forth in the 1946 New York City Court decision. These records also noted that the bonds were credited to the Österreichische Creditanstalt account at Chase City Bank in New York. As described by the CRT, in October 1939, ten months after executing the order from the Creditanstalt, Arthur Albers informed the bank of his new London address and instructed the bank to sell his bonds. The bank responded that the bonds already had been sold for the benefit of the Creditanstalt. The CRT observed that on "16 December 1939, the Account Owner, who was reportedly astonished to learn that his account had been closed, demanded compensation from [the bank], and ordered his remaining account there, a demand deposit account, to be closed immediately" and the SF 1,000 proceeds to be transferred to Arthur Albers' representative in Zurich. The bank complied with this demand.

As a result of the ICEP audit and the CRT investigation, including a request by the CRT to the banks for "voluntary assistance,"[8] the CRT also located evidence of other accounts held by Mr. Albers at a different Swiss bank; namely, two custody accounts and a demand deposit account. One of the two custody accounts was closed on May 7, 1938. The second custody account was opened on May 9, 1938 and closed on February 16, 1939. The demand deposit account (information about which was obtained from records relating to a 1962 Survey of Swiss accounts[9]) was opened on August 8, 1938. It was frozen in the 1945 Freeze[10], at which time it

[8] Under Article 6 of the CRT Rules, "Voluntary Assistance From Banks" is defined as follows: "When necessary to obtain information to resolve claims to Accounts that is unavailable to the CRT under Articles 1-5, the CRT may seek the voluntary assistance of banks that may have information in their files on such an Account."

[9] By Federal Decree of December 20, 1962, the Swiss Federal Council obliged all individuals, legal entities, and associations to report any Swiss-based assets whose last-known owners were foreign nationals or stateless persons of whom nothing had been heard since May 9, 1945 and who were known or presumed to have been victims of racial, religious, or political persecution. See Glossary: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., available at http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Glossary.aspx ("1962 Survey").

[10] See http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Glossary.aspx ("1945 Freeze"): "Pursuant to an accordance with a "decree of the Swiss Federal Council, all assets in Switzerland belonging to citizens of Germany and the territories incorporated into the Third Reich were frozen on February 16, 1945. A Swiss government ruling of May 29, 1945 required that all German assets in Switzerland had to be reported to the Swiss Compensation Office. The freeze was lifted pursuant to the agreements concluded between Switzerland and Western Germany and between Switzerland, USA, France and the United Kingdom in August 1952. These agreements entered into force on 19 March 1953."

held a balance of SF 987.50, and was unfrozen in June 1955. By September 7, 1959, the account held a balance of SF 911, and by December 12, 1963, it held SF 801. The account was closed in 1982.

Additionally, the CRT located Arthur Albers' 1938 Census,[11] which showed that he was arrested by the Gestapo on April 21, 1938 and imprisoned in a camp on April 29, 1938. The records indicated that his assets "were seized by the Gestapo and … his business was to be liquidated." His census form, dated August 8, 1938, was signed by Felix Kozar, a Nazi-appointed asset manager, who reported that Arthur Albers owned real estate, business interests, and accounts and securities in banks in Vienna, Paris and Zurich. The 1938 Census further indicated that Arthur Albers held a custody account at the first bank (the subject of the 1946 New York litigation), and a custody account at the second bank, each containing bonds with a nominal value of $5,000. By December 31, 1938, according to the Census, all of Arthur Albers' foreign securities except those held in Switzerland had been transferred to the Creditanstalt bank. A letter of May 4, 1939 contained in the Census file stated that the Finance Ministry did not object to the Albers' family emigration, since all of Arthur Albers' fortune had been confiscated as of October 25, 1938.

The CRT award compensated the Albers family for the difference between the amount received through the 1946 City Court lawsuit, and the market value of the bonds actually held at the bank. The award recognized that Mr. Albers himself, from London, had closed the demand deposit account at the same bank, when Mr. Albers learned that the bank had turned over the custody account to the Creditanstalt. The CRT therefore did not award that account. The three other accounts (located at a second bank) were awarded, however. The CRT observed that two of the accounts appeared to have been closed while Arthur Albers had been imprisoned, and thus under duress. The third account had been closed in 1982, long after his death, and so could not have been closed by Mr. Albers. Nor were there any bank records indicating that Mr. Albers'

[11] By decree of April 26, 1938, the Nazi Regime required all Jews who resided within the Reich, or who were nationals of the Reich, including Austria (as well as Germany), and who held assets above a specified level, to register all assets as of 27 April 1938. The records for the 1938 Census for Austria are currently housed in the Austrian State Archive (Archive of the Republic, Finance). See http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Glossary.aspx ("Austrian Census").

heirs had closed that account. Because the lack of bank records was due not to the claimants' behavior, but due to the banks' post-War destruction of records for millions of accounts, the CRT applied the "adverse inference" to award the three accounts at the second bank to the claimants at their presumptive values.[12]

ii. In re Account of Robert Anninger (SF 37,575.00)

Dr. Robert Anninger was born in 1909 in Vienna, where he owned the textile manufacturing company Spinnerei-Weberei Teesdorf AG. He also was entitled to receive annual profits from the company Wm. Abeles & Co., one-half of which was owned by his father. Dr. Anninger fled with his family (including his daughters, the claimants) to the United States in 1938, and died in Thurgau, Switzerland in 1971. His wife died in Massachusetts in 1985.

[12] On December 6, 1999, the Volcker Committee released its final report. Its research showed that some 6.8 million Swiss bank accounts were open or opened during the relevant period of 1933-1945. Of these, the banks had destroyed documents relating to approximately 2.7 million accounts. Despite this massive document destruction, records still remained for approximately 4.1 million Holocaust-era Swiss accounts. The auditors researched approximately 300,000 of these 4.1 million accounts. The Volcker Committee determined that of the 300,000 accounts investigated, a total of approximately 54,000 had a "probable" or "possible" relationship to victims of Nazi persecution. These accounts — subsequently reduced to 36,000 by a so-called "scrubbing" process — were to constitute the Accounts History Database ("AHD"); i.e., the database of accounts that would be made available to the CRT for use in the claims process. The Volcker Committee further recommended that approximately 21,000 of the 36,000 AHD accounts should be published. The remaining approximately 15,000 accounts were not to be published, but were to be available to the CRT for review in the event that a Holocaust victim or heir submitted a claim that appeared to match to an unpublished account. As to the bulk of the 4.1 million Holocaust-era accounts for which records continued to exist, but which were not included as part of the AHD, the Volcker Committee recommended that those remaining accounts should be consolidated into a "Total Accounts Database" (TAD) that also would be available for use in a claims process. Swiss banking authorities declined to adopt the Volcker Committee's recommendation to create a Total Accounts Database for all of the 4.1 million accounts that existed in Swiss Banks in the relevant 1933-1945 period. See Glossary ("Total Accounts Database [TAD]").

In response to the banks´ destruction of documentation, the Court authorized the CRT to take into consideration the "adverse inference" principle in assessing claims. "'It is a well-established and long-standing principle of law that a party's intentional destruction of evidence relevant to proof of an issue at trial can support an inference that the evidence would have been unfavorable to the party responsible for its destruction. Kronisch v. United States, 150 F.3d 112, 126 (2d Cir. 1998). '[A]n adverse inference should serve the function, insofar as possible, of restoring the prejudiced party to the same position he would have been in absent the wrongful destruction of evidence by the opposing party.' Id. While these presumptions can of course never return the account holders to the position they would have been in were it not for decades of bank stonewalling and document destruction, they can help to balance the equities." In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d 301, 317 (E.D.N.Y. 2004).

In 1939, the Nazi confiscation of the company Wm. Abeles & Co. ("Abeles") was the subject of litigation in New York. A New York cotton broker, M. Hohenberg & Co. ("Hohenberg"), brought an interpleader action in New York Supreme Court (the trial court level of the New York court system), seeking permission to pay into court the sum of $8,572. That was the amount owed by Hohenberg to Abeles, which by 1939 had been handed over by the Reich to a Nazi liquidator, Josef Schmied. In its decision, Anninger v. Hohenberg, 172 Misc. 1046, 18 N.Y.S.2d 499 (Sup. Ct. 1939), Justice William T. Collins observed that one of the owners of Abeles (identified in a December 8, 1939 New York Times article as Friedrich Unger[13]) had been imprisoned in Austria, and after he was ransomed for $34,000, he was able to escape to the United States.

The New York Supreme Court twice denied the motion for interpleader (including on reargument), observing that all that the liquidator could assert would be a "simulated claim to the funds." 18 N.Y.S.2d at 501. The Court condemned the liquidation as "sheer confiscation" and stated that

> …. To grant this motion would be an acknowledgment that the claim of the liquidator in Austria has a status here. Put differently, it would mean that our Courts will not only recognize but render assistance to the confiscatory, proscriptive policies of the German Reich. To this doctrine I am unwilling to subscribe. To be sure, we may be powerless to extend the jurisdiction of this Court to Austria, but when it is essayed to invoke our legal weapons to execute policies which are rejected here, we can and do refuse to lend our aid.

Id. at 500-501. On reargument, the Court added: "I cannot bring myself to lend assistance to what impresses me as a scheme of nefarious expropriation." Id. at 502.

Nearly six decades later, Dr. Anninger's daughters achieved another legal victory through the CRT process, receiving the proceeds of their father's Swiss bank account.[14] The bank records available to the CRT indicated that Dr. Robert Anninger "from Vienna" owned a safe deposit box that was opened on April 14, 1938 and closed on May 6, 1939. The CRT awarded the average value of a safe deposit box, observing that although the account was closed at a time when the account owner was outside Nazi-dominated territory, "the Bank's record does not indicate to whom the account was closed," and the "Account Owner may have had relatives remaining in his country of origin and … may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts to ensure their safety."

Subsequently, following the Court's June 16, 2010 approval of Special Master Junz's recommendation to increase presumptive values for most account types,[15] the claimants received an additional award of SF 22,075 ($18,244).[16]

iii. In re Account of Arthur Bauer (SF 47,400.00)

Arthur Bauer was born in 1909 in Erlangen, Germany, and worked in his family's real estate business. He was arrested in Munich during Kristallnacht ("Night of Broken Glass") in November 1938[17] and was imprisoned in Dachau. Upon his release, he fled to Switzerland and [15] See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 731 F. Supp. 2d 279 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). At the outset of the claims process, the Volcker Committee auditors provided the CRT with recommended "presumptive" or "average" values to apply in those cases where the banks had destroyed documentation that would have shown the actual account values. After years of study of underlying bank records and other evidence, CRT Special Master Junz recommended that most of the presumptive values be adjusted upward. The Court adopted this recommendation in 2010, authorizing retroactive payments for accounts previously awarded at the lower values, as well as adjusting awards going forward.

[16] Most of the decisions cited herein reflect this presumptive value increase in the total of the award as included next to the case name for each decision described in this summary. These presumptive value increases were calculated well after the initial decisions were released and published on the CRT website. The published decisions were not revised to reflect the presumptive value increases. Accordingly, the amount reflected in each published CRT decision (available at www.crt-ii.ch and www.swissbankclaims.com) generally is lower than the amount ultimately awarded. The presumptive value increases were authorized by the Court and each payment recommendation was docketed, but these adjustment decisions — as they were not substantive but rather reflected administrative recalculations —were not posted on the internet. They are, however, publicly available thorugh the Court docket. Furthermore, as part of the audit of CRT payments, on January 30, 2014, the Settlement Fund accountant, EisnerAmper LLP, filed several reports and charts, including a detailed report calculating and tabulating all payments made in connection with each and every CRT award (including original awards, amendments, presumptive value adjustments, and in some instances other adjustments as well). This chart is available on the Court docket (docket no. 4941). An additional report, detailing each and every payment to every Deposited Assets Class recipient, also is available but has been filed under seal as it contains the names of claimants (most of whom had requested and were granted confidentiality when they filed their claim forms). A second version of this same report, redacting recipient names, is available on the docket.

[17] "Kristallnacht, literally, 'Night of Crystal,' is often referred to as the 'Night of Broken Glass.' The name refers to the wave of violent anti-Jewish pogroms which took place on November 9 and 10, 1938, throughout remained there from March 1939 to June 1939, at which time he emigrated to the United States. He served in the United States Army from 1942 through 1945, and was married in Philadelphia in 1948.

In 1972, according to the claimant, Arthur Bauer's daughter, her father visited Switzerland and was informed by the bank that a search of the records to locate an account owned by his family members would not be possible without a death certificate. In 1996, in response to the family's request for information, the Contact Office for the Search of Dormant Accounts Administered by Swiss Banks advised that further data was needed, as well as payment of SF 300, before an investigation into Swiss bank accounts could be undertaken.

The bank records finally were made available for review years later, as part of the Court-supervised CRT claims process. These documents indicated that Arthur Bauer held an account of unknown type and value. The auditors presumed it was closed and found no evidence of activity after 1945. The CRT awarded the account at its presumptive value, observing that the "facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which account owners are interned in the Dachau concentration camp for a relatively short time, and then, near the time of their release, Swiss accounts held by the account owners are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to Nazi-controlled banks….[T]he CRT's precedent indicates that it is plausible in such situations that the account proceeds were paid to the Nazis." The CRT also pointed out that the bank had "rejected the Claimant's family's inquiry regarding accounts held by Arthur Bauer."[18]

Germany, annexed Austria, and in areas of the Sudetenland in Czechoslovakia recently occupied by German troops." See Holocaust Encyclopedia, U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM) ("Kristallnacht").

[18] The banks were concerned about "double liability": they previously had transferred the account to Nazi authorities, and did not want to have to pay the same amount to the actual account owners. As the Court pointed out in its 2004 opinion on the banks' behavior during and after the Holocaust era, concern for double liability motivated the banks' in "stonewalling" Holocaust victims and their heirs. See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 302 F.Supp.2d 59, amended and superseded on June 1, 2004, 319 F. iv. In re Account of Beger & Röckel (SF 49,375.00); In re Accounts of Wilhelm Marx (SF 289,087.50)

Beger & Röckel was a printing factory in Munich, owned by Wilhelm Marx, who was born in 1875 in Nördlingen, Germany. In addition to Beger & Röckel, Wilhelm Marx also owned another printing factory, Graphia - Kunstanstalt und Druckerei. With other members of his family, including his son-in-law, Hans Archenhold, Wilhelm Marx was arrested and imprisoned in Dachau in November 1938, and his businesses were confiscated by the Nazis. The Beger & Röckel printing plant was converted to build Messerschmitt fighter planes.[19]

After his release from Dachau, Wilhelm Marx and other members of his family fled from Germany to England in March 1939, and then to the United States in early 1940. Hans Archenhold, who had been a "creative force" at his father-in-law's company, Beger & Röckel, "walked into [the Hallmark greeting card offices in Kansas City] without an appointment and asked for a job." He was hired, and instituted new practices at the factory enabling Hallmark to "shift to a more efficient, mechanized system to meet the growing demand for greeting cards." He "kept Hallmark on the leading edge as American printing technology began to outpace Europe's."[20]

In connection with their audit of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, the ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Beger & Röckel, and thus the account was unpublished. The account presumably is among the millions for which records were destroyed by the banks in the post-Holocaust era.[21] Nevertheless, the CRT located evidence of the account by examining the 1938 Census. These records indicated that Wilhelm Marx owned Beger & Röckel as well as Graphia, and that aryanization[22] proceedings against the companies began before November 12, July 26, 2001), reissued as a published opinion on July 1, 2005, 413 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2005), citing Volcker Report's determination that of approximately 6.9 million Holocaust-era accounts, records for approximately 2.8 million had been destroyed by Swiss banks in the years following the Holocaust.

[22] "Aryanization" (Arisierung) refers to the "the transfer of Jewish-owned businesses to German ownership throughout Germany and German-occupied countries. The Aryanization process included two stages: from 1933–1938 the Jews were gradually removed from German economic life, termed by the Nazis as "voluntary"

1938 and concluded on February 15, 1939. As described by the CRT, on February 17, 1939, the companies were sold for RM 243,024.07, and Wilhelm Marx was credited with RM 146,640.07 (as compared to the higher RM 339,827 value of the companies that Wilhelm Marx had reported in his Census declaration). On March 21, 1939, tax authorities blocked these and other assets, allowing Wilhelm Marx to withdraw up to RM 1,500 monthly for living expenses and payment of official charges. The blocking order stated that the subjects were "non-Aryan" and that "recent experience" had shown that "non-Aryans, after the sale of their businesses, would attempt to evade the foreign exchange regulations and move the liquid assets they had received abroad."

As noted, the evidence of the Swiss account was contained in the 1938 Census; specifically, in a December 10, 193[8] letter "written on the company's letterhead" to the Munich Tax Office. The letter stated that Wilhelm Marx's partners guaranteed payment of any flight tax that would be due if Mr. Marx were to leave the country.[23] The letterhead indicated

During the first few years, however, the firms were mostly left in peace by the authorities. The owners were free to decide to whom they would sell and the selling price was agreed between the two parties. Even if they were based at the time on the agreement of both parties, such take-overs cannot be termed 'fair deals' without closer investigation. The contracts were not drawn up on a legal basis and under free-market conditions. Instead, the situation was one in which the Jewish businessmen were under great pressure to sell. Furthermore, in view of the currency and tax restrictions it was difficult to use the income from the sale... From the middle of 1936 on, sales contracts had to be submitted to … regional economic advisors... Towards the end of 1937, pressure on large firms in particular increased, and from 1938 on take-overs had to be approved by the authorities. At this stage it was possible to sell a firm only at a price well below its real value. Economic persecution turned a new corner after the annexation of Austria … in March 1938, when within a few weeks thousands of Austrian companies were 'Aryanised' or liquidated. This 'uncontrolled Aryanisation' was followed by state regulation and an organized 'Aryanisation' which manifested the state's economic interest. The authorities imposed an 'Aryanisation tax' … and tried to ensure as great a margin as possible between the amount paid to the vendor and the actual sale price, the difference being paid into the state coffers").

The Independent Commission of Experts Switzerland - Second World War was the commission assigned the task of investigating many aspects of Switzerland's activities during the Second World War. It is also known as the "Bergier Commission" after its chair, Jean-Françoise Bergier. Before her appointment as CRT Special Master, Dr. Helen Junz had been a member of the Bergier Commission.

[23] A substantial tax, the so-called "flight tax," was levied upon those able to flee Nazi Germany. As described in the BERGIER FINAL REPORT (at 274), beginning in 1938, "many special taxes and levies were introduced such as the so-called 'Sühneleistung' (atonement fine) instituted after the pogrom in November 1938 [Kristallnacht] and the Reichsfluchtsteuer (emigration tax), which were extended and already levied on people who were likely that the company owned business accounts in Munich, Vienna, Austria, and the St. Gallen, Switzerland branch of the bank in question.

The CRT awarded the claimants, the great-grandson and grand-children of Wilhelm Marx (one of whom also was the daughter of Hans Archenhold), the presumptive value of an account of unknown type. The CRT observed that Wilhelm Marx had been imprisoned in Dachau and his assets had been aryanized, and so it was plausible that the account had not been returned to its rightful owner.

The same individuals also received an additional award of SF 189,250 for the published accounts of Wilhelm Marx. The CRT noted that the bank records indicated that Wilhelm Marx of Munich owned a demand deposit account as well as a custody account, both of which had been opened on October 12, 1930 and closed on July 14, 1933. "Given that after coming to power in 1933, the Nazi regime embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of the Jewish population through the enforcement of discriminatory tax and other confiscatory measures, including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks; that the Account Owner remained in Germany until 1940, and would not have been able to repatriate his accounts to Germany without losing ultimate control over its proceeds; that the Account Owner's assets were confiscated by the Nazi regime; that there is no record of the payment of the Account Owner's accounts to him; that the Account Owner and his heirs would not have been able to obtain information about his accounts after the Second World War from the Bank due to the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries by account owners because of the banks' concern regarding double liability; given the application of Presumptions (h) and (j), as provided in Article 28 of the Rules Governing the Claims Resolution Process, as amended … the CRT concludes that it is plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to the Account Owner…."[24] to emigrate. To avoid the high penalties and meet the financial burden, many Jews and others who were persecuted had to withdraw their assets and securities from Switzerland."

[24] Over five years after the award was approved, additional claimants (who were distant cousins of the awardees) contacted the CRT contending that their grandfather was co-owner of the firm Beger & Röckel. They sought a share of the award. The CRT advised the claimants that they had not filed a timely claim, nor did their late claim qualify for consideration under the terms of the Court's December 30, 2004 order relating to late claims:

v. In re Accounts of Dr. Robert Blum (SF 281,517.50)

Dr. Robert Blum was born in 1883 in Frankenthal, Germany, where he practiced law. He was forced to shut down his legal practice and was interned in Dachau several times, including for three weeks in November 1938. He fled with his family to São Paulo, Brazil, where he died in 1941.

The bank records indicated that Robert Blum owned a custody account as well as a demand deposit account. Among the documents in the bank files was a power of attorney signed by Robert Blum while he was in Dachau. This document gave general power to his wife, Luise, to make bank declarations and conclude contracts relating to the receipt or disposal of the Blums' assets. Based upon this declaration, executed while the account owner was held at Dachau, the ICEP auditors determined that the accounts had been paid to Nazi authorities. The accounts were awarded to the claimants, Robert Blum's grandchildren, at their respective presumptive values.

vi. In re Account of Robert and Marie Blumka (SF 281,517.50)

Robert Blumka was born in Vienna in 1886. His wife, Marie Blumka, was born in 1898, also in Vienna. Robert Blumka was a bank manager in Vienna. In 1939, he was forced to flee with his family to England.

the claimants were not the account owners, spouse or children of the account owners; they did not provide an "unusually compelling reason for failing to comply with the filing deadlines;" and they did not demonstrate "by clear and convincing evidence that the claimed account was awarded erroneously." However, the claimants were further advised that had their claims been timely and had they shown that their grandfather in fact had owned one-half of the firm, they would have been entitled to one-half of the award. Accordingly, the late claimants were provided with copies of the Acknowledgment Forms that their cousins had signed, in which (as true for all awardees) the recipients had agreed to share or transfer the payment to relatives equally or better entitled to the award. The late claimants were advised to attempt to "reach an agreement [outside the CRT process] about the distribution of the award amount and any potential award amount adjustment in the future."

The CRT observed that the bank records included "an excerpt from a list of accounts that were transferred to German or Austrian banks." The list demonstrated that Robert Blumka owned a demand deposit account, and that he and his wife also jointly owned a custody account, both of which were transferred on April 7, 1938 to the Nazi-controlled bank Öesterreichische Kreditanstalt (i.e., transferred by the bank to the Nazis). The accounts were awarded at their presumptive values.

vii. In re Account of Dr. Hans Brück (SF 287,017.50)

Hans Brück was born in 1898 and lived in Vienna, where he was an attorney and secretary of the managing director of the factory Gerngross A.G.[25] After the Anschluss, he could no longer work as an attorney and was instead forced by the Nazis to assist in managing the factory. He and his family fled to Australia in November 1938.

The bank records indicated that Hans Brück's custody account was transferred in August 1938 to the Österreichische Kreditanstalt Bankverein, while his demand deposit account was closed after the Anschluss in April 1938. The ICEP auditors determined that both accounts had been paid to the Nazis. The CRT agreed, and awarded the demand deposit at presumptive value, while awarding the custody account based upon the amount reported in Mr. Brück's 1938 Census form.

Subsequently, in an amendment, the CRT increased the custody account award. The CRT noted that, in accordance with the principle adopted by court order of October 12, 2004 and incorporated into the CRT Rules, Nazi victims may have understated the assets in their 1938 Census forms. Accordingly, the balance reported in the Census was unreliable, absent evidence to the contrary, and so was increased.[26]

[25] In a separate decision, the Court also authorized an award and award amendment to the heirs of the owners of A. Gerngross A.G. See In re Accounts of Albert Gerngross, Paul Gerngross, Martha Gerngross, and A. Gerngross A.G., discussed elsewhere herein.

[26] Under the October 12, 2004 order, the Court adopted the presumption that those who reported their Swiss accounts in the 1938 Nazi Census had an incentive to underreport the actual values of these accounts.

viii. In re Accounts of Ernst Brücke and Dora Brücke-Teleky (SF 578,175.00)

Ernst Brücke was born in 1880 in Vienna and was married in 1930 to Dora Brücke-Teleky, who was his second wife. The claimant, the granddaughter of Ernst Brücke and his first wife, stated that her grandfather was a neurophysiologist and a prominent faculty member at the University of Innsbruck. Dora Brücke-Teleky was a well-known gynecologist. Ernst Brücke was classified as a Mischling (mixed Jewish blood) under the Nuremberg Laws, and Dora Brücke-Teleky was Jewish.

Accordingly, for all accounts reported in these Census forms with values below the presumptive values adopted by the CRT, awards were authorized to be made at the higher amount; i.e., the presumptive value. On January 7, 2005, the Court adopted the same presumption for accounts reported by the banks at values lower than the CRT's presumptive values. Both orders were intended to incorporate into the CRT process certain presumptions favoring claimants where, because of the banks' destruction of records, the account documents did not exist or were insufficient.

According to an article provided by the claimant,[27] and based upon the CRT's independent research, in 1916, Brücke "was appointed Professor and Chair of Physiology at the University of Innsbruck," where he "published well over 100 papers." He studied such fields as "binocular vision and visual illusions" and "comparative anatomy and physiology of organs innervated by the autonomic nervous system." His later focus was upon "the electrophysiology of nerve and muscle …, in particular the mechanisms of reflex excitability and inhibition."

In 1921, Brücke and a colleague at Harvard Medical School, Alexander Forbes, began a correspondence which eventually led to the rescue of Brücke and his wife from Nazi Europe. Forbes, a grandson of Ralph Waldo Emerson, like Brücke specialized in reflex physiology and nervous inhibition. Forbes and Brücke had met at a conference in Boston, Massachusetts, and spent time together in Innsbruck, Austria. "In April 1938, shortly after the [Anschluss], von Brücke was abruptly dismissed from his university position; the reason given by the new Nazi authorities for their action was that von Brücke's mother, née Milly Wittgenstein [the aunt of the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein], and his second wife, Dora Teleky, a well-known Viennese gynecologist, were of Jewish descent."[28]

When Forbes learned of these events, "he immediately began negotiations in his department and - unknown to von Brücke - organized a campaign among his American colleagues to collect funds to secure a research position for von Brücke at Harvard…. In October 1938, Harvard University agreed to provide a temporary position as a 'Research Associate' in the Department of Physiology. Forbes assumed a personal responsibility for funding von Brücke's salary; he also solicited contributions from other colleagues and organizations such as the Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced Foreign Medical Scientists in New York City."[29] After months of bureaucratic difficulties and negotiation, Brücke was allowed to leave Vienna via Switzerland, France, Belgium, and Britain. He arrived in the United States two weeks before World War II broke out, and his wife followed on September 15, 1939. He resumed his experimental work in Forbes's laboratory, and the two collaborated on several research papers. Brücke died unexpectedly in June 1941. Forbes continued to assist Dr. Teleky-Brücke after her husband's death, and after the War "sent food parcels to Austria to support von Brücke's children and their families."[30]

The bank records indicated that Professor Ernst Brücke owned a demand deposit account that was opened in 1930 and closed on an unknown date. As described by the CRT, the customer card related to the account "contains a note from 12 July 1938 that in future all deposits and transfers were to be reported by letter to the New York Trust Company in favor of the Österreichische Kreditanstalt in Vienna." Brücke also owned a custody account that was opened in 1930. According to the bank records, it was transferred on September 24, 1938 to the Oest. Creditanstalt-Wiener Bankverein.

[28] Seyfarth, at 49. The Wittgenstein family's separate claim to CRT accounts is discussed elsewhere herein.

[29] Id., at 49-50. Seyfarth noted that despite his prominence, Brücke's escape was by no means certain. In 1938, "émigré scientists from Austria trying to come to countries such as Great Britain or the United States were faced with an almost hopeless situation. Thousands had already been admitted from Germany, and the strict quotas imposed by the host countries made the placement of additional European refugees extremely difficult. Von Brücke's opportunities were further constrained by his relatively advanced age of 57…" Id., at 49.

[30] Seyfarth, at 53.

Dr. Teleky-Brücke owned a custody account that was opened in 1935 and "was labeled closed on 25 July 1938 after the funds were repatriated to Austria." A document in the bank files "entitled 'Closed custody accounts of Austrian clients, the market value of which is still to be calculated' indicates that the amount in the account as at 28 July 1938 was SF 16,640.00. This entry is accompanied by a handwritten note dated 30 May 1938 which states that the securities had been surrendered …, and another one dated 14 July 1938 which states that gold coins had been sent to the Main Office of the Reichsbank in Vienna on 14 July 1938."

In addition, as described by the CRT, an August 15, 1963 letter in the bank files "from the Bank's legal department entitled 'Estate of Dr. med. Dora von Brücke-Teleky' indicates that the last executor of the will, a Mr. Albert Hauser, had contacted the Bank, was accepted by the Bank, and was provided with full information about the balance of another, then still open, account owned by the late account owner …. The letter did not mention the custody account closed in 1938 and the ICEP audit concluded that, as the reason for closure was the repatriation of funds to Austria and it is not known whether Account Owner Brücke-Teleky or her heirs received restitution, this account remained reviewable."

The CRT also determined, based upon its examination of 1938 Census, that Dr. Brücke-Teleky owned an additional account at the bank, a demand deposit account with the reported value of SF 448. Dr. Brücke-Teleky noted in this Census form that her husband was Protestant and was a Mischling of the first or second degree.[31] As described by the CRT, the Census file "further contains a series of letters from late 1938 and early 1939 regarding certain foreign securities that Dr. Brücke-Teleky was expected to 'offer' to the Nazi authorities in Vienna." A January 10, 1939 investigation report in the file stated that Dr. Brücke-Teleky had departed for Milan in August 16, 1938, and that her former housekeeper, "who was still living in her former employer's apartment, showed the authorities the tax clearance that Dr. Brücke-Teleky had received from the fiscal authorities," which allowed for her departure. The 1938 Census files also contained a January 29, 1939 letter from Professor Brücke "in which he stated that in the past few years he had only occasionally seen his wife, with whom he had never shared a residence, and that therefore he did not know where she was currently residing."

[31] The CRT explained that an "Interior Ministry ruling on the Nuremberg Laws" provided that "a person descended from two Jewish grandparents, who neither adhered to the Jewish religion nor was married to a Jew from 15 September 1935 (the date the laws came into effect) was classified as a Mischling of the first degree. A Mischling of the second degree was a person with only one Jewish grandparent."

The CRT awarded the accounts to Professor Brücke's granddaughter and the cousins she was representing (a total of 12 individuals). All accounts were awarded at presumptive value, with the exception of the custody account reported at the value of SF 16,640 (an amount higher than the presumptive value then in effect). The CRT concluded that the accounts either had been turned over to the Nazis and/or that the presumptions under the CRT Rules warranted the conclusion that the account owners had not received the proceeds.

The CRT observed that although Professor Brücke's heirs had filed claims, Dr. Brücke-Teleky's heirs had not. Therefore, it was "consistent with the principles of fairness and equity to divide her accounts according to the same criteria" used for Ernst Brücke's accounts. The CRT determined that the claimant was entitled to 3/16 of the value of the accounts; two of her cousins each were entitled to 1/12 of the value; seven of her cousins each were entitled to 1/16 of the value; and one of her cousins was entitled to 5/24 of the value. Since one of the 12 claimants was the spouse of a claimant and thus a less direct heir of the Brückes, that individual was not entitled to a share of the award.

ix. In re Accounts of Martin Cohn (SF 1,966,773.88)

Dr. Martin Cohn was born in 1884 and was a dental surgeon in Berlin. His office was destroyed during Kristallnacht. He reopened it in 1940 in a different location in Berlin. Dr. Cohn also had inherited his father's share of a scrap metal company and thus held the title of "businessman." Dr. Cohn and his wife were deported to Auschwitz in March 1943, where they perished. One of his two daughters survived Theresienstadt, but died in 1947. His other daughter, the claimant, escaped to England on a Kindertransport.[32] She did not file a Swiss

[32] "Kindertransport (Children's Transport) was the informal name of a series of rescue efforts which brought thousands of refugee Jewish children to Great Britain from Nazi Germany between 1938 and 1940." Under the program, "British authorities agreed to allow an unspecified number of children under the age of 17 to enter Great Britain from Germany and German-annexed territories (that is, Austria and the Czech lands). Private citizens or organizations had to guarantee payment for each child's care, education, and eventual emigration

Banks claim form. Instead, the CRT accepted as a claim the documents she had filed with the New York State Banking Department's Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), and with ATAG Ernst & Young under an earlier claims process pre-dating the Settlement Agreement, as well as the Initial Questionnaire she had filed after the Settlement was announced.[33]

The bank records made available to the CRT as a result of the Court's claims processes indicated that Dr. Cohn owned six different accounts: a custody account opened on June 15, 1926 and closed on September 10, 1938; a custody account closed on October 1, 1938; a safe deposit box opened on February 27, 1931 and closed on April 28, 1933; and three demand deposit accounts, closed respectively on October 20, 1934, December 20, 1935 and January 10, 1939.

The bank records made available to the CRT also contained a letter from an "Advisor for Jewish immigrants," stating that Dr. Cohn was subject to proceedings by the Foreign Currency Division, and requesting the bank to provide a detailed list of the securities held by Dr. Cohn. The bank responded that the information could be disclosed to public authorities provided that it was in the account owner's interest, and requested further information about the proceedings. Notations in the bank records indicate that the bank received a letter of November 27, 1937, and so the "advisor's" request could be fulfilled. The bank records also contained an informal [33] "Initial Questionnaires" were informational documents solicited from claimants after the litigation settled. By order of July 30, 2001, the Court provided that Initial Questionnaires containing information sufficient to support a Deposited Assets claim were to be incorporated into the CRT claims process, to help minimize confusion among claimants who might not have understood that they were required to file separate claim forms in addition to Initial Questionnaires. By Order dated December 30, 2004, the Court similarly authorized the CRT to treat as timely any claims on behalf of "victims or targets of Nazi persecution" that were filed with entities authorized to treat these claims prior to the Settlement Agreement: ICEP, Ernst & Young (one of the ICEP auditors), and CRT-I.

The background to CRT-I is as follows. The CRT was established in 1997 and its original mission was to arbitrate claims to 5,570 dormant accounts in Swiss banks that were published in 1997, prior to the completion of the ICEP audit in 1999. That arbitration process is now referred to as CRT-I. The accounts adjudicated by CRT-I dated from 1933 to 1945 and remained open and dormant. Those accounts were owned both by Victims of Nazi persecution, and by non-Nazi victims. Ultimately, CRT-I adjudicated over 9,000 claims to accounts published in 1997. The work of CRT-I was completed in the spring of 2001. See Glossary ("CRT-I").

decision by the bank's legal department, and an internal memorandum listing the securities in one of Dr. Cohn's custody accounts.

The CRT awarded all six accounts, observing that the Volcker Committee (ICEP) auditors had concluded that the Nazis had confiscated the custody account. It was plausible that the other accounts also had been confiscated as well, in light of the fact that the banks had destroyed many of the account documents, warranting application of the adverse inference presumption. Since Dr. Cohn had been killed in Auschwitz, he could not have retrieved the accounts himself.

Subsequently, following the CRT's ongoing requests to the banks for additional documentation through of the "voluntary assistance" process negotiated as part of the Court's approval of the settlement, Credit Suisse provided the CRT with more records in 2008, several years after the award had been issued. As a result, the CRT was able to evaluate the type and value of securities held in one of Dr. Cohn's custody accounts. This information had not been available in the bank records provided at the outset of the claims process.[34] These documents showed that the account had held twenty different securities, including shares in AEG, IG Farben, and other major corporations. Based on the new data, the CRT was able to determine that the actual value of the securities at the time they were confiscated was SF 127,835.57, an amount significantly greater than the SF 9,856.50 that was reflected in the records available to the CRT when the award was originally authorized. After deducting the SF 9,856.50 that had been awarded, and applying the 12.5 multiplier,[35] the award was increased by SF 1,474,738.38 to reflect the actual value of the custody account.

[34] See Order of June 30, 2008, authorizing amendments that had been derived from valuation information provided by defendant bank Credit Suisse, following several years of effort by the CRT to obtain additional documentation concerning Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts.

[35] In connection with the work of the Volcker Committee, the economist Henry Kaufman chaired a "Panel on Interest, Fees and Other Charges." The panel prepared a report in 1998 which adopted a "multiplier" — a current value adjustment factor of ten — to be applied to any awards to be issued by the CRT (at that time, CRT-I), to bring 1945 values to current values. This factor was calculated by determining the compounded nominal value of a long term Swiss Federal Government bond ("CNV") over the period from 1939 to 1998. The precise value in 1998 was 10.18, which was rounded to ten. Under the oversight of then-CRT Special Master Paul Volcker, former Chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board and head of ICEP, and Special Master Michael Bradfield, the "Kaufman Factor" multiplier was increased several times during the claims process to ensure an appropriate current value of the accounts.

x. In re Accounts of Dr. Heinrich Fink (SF 305,275.00)

Heinrich Fink was born in approximately 1914 in Radoschau Upper Silesia, Germany, and later lived in Breslau. He was killed in Auschwitz.

The bank records showed that Heinrich Fink was a doctor of medicine ("Dr. med.") and that he held a custody account as well as an account of unknown type. Internal bank correspondence referred to the Seventh Implementation Order to the Law of Foreign Exchange Control of November 19, 1936, which required German owners of foreign securities to deposit their securities with a German bank or, for holdings outside Germany, into an account of a German bank in that location. The original deadline for such transfers was December 4, 1936. Bank correspondence dated February 16, 1937 indicated that in the period between the effective date of November 19, 1936 through January 31, 1937, securities from 291 customer custody accounts in the amount of SF 6,266,7609 were transferred to various banks in Germany.

The records showed that securities in the amount of SF 5,000 were transferred on December 14, 1936 from Dr. Fink's custody account to the Dresdner Bank in Berlin, a Nazi-controlled bank.

The custody account was awarded to the claimant, Dr. Fink's niece (who had filed her claim through the HCPO), based on the transfer of the account to a Nazi bank. The second account, of unknown type, was awarded in reliance upon the adverse inference and other presumptions under the CRT Rules. Since the original award had been based upon the actual value reported in the account, an amount below presumptive value, an additional award subsequently was authorized to bring the amount up to presumptive value.

xi. In re Account of David Israel Frischer (SF 47,902.25)

David Israel Frischer was born in 1876 in Poland, and later moved to Vienna, where he owned a company called David Frischer Papiergrosshandlung. He died in Vienna in 1940, and his wife was deported to Theresienstadt and later to Auschwitz, where she perished in 1945.

The ICEP auditors did not report any bank records for David Frischer. However, the CRT determined through additional research that David Frischer owned a Swiss bank account. He had filed a 1938 Census form which he amended — presumably under duress — by letter dated July 18, 1938, to include a declaration of an account in Zurich in the amount of SF 2,945.50. He stated:

> …. [I] request to excuse the oversight due to my being an old and forgetful man who did not have any intention to withhold this asset, which is already evident from the fact that I timely registered this deposit with the main office of the Reichsbank and offered it for purchase.

The account was awarded to David Frischer's daughter, the claimant (who had filed an Initial Questionnaire and an HCPO claim, although not a claim form). She herself had been unaware that her father had amended his 1938 Census form to include his Swiss account.[36]

Subsequently, following the Court's Order authorizing the CRT to increase to presumptive value any accounts reported in the 1938 Census at amounts lower than presumptive value, the CRT awarded the claimant an additional SF 12,556.25.

xii. In re Accounts of Leo Fürst (SF 338,462.50)

Leo Fürst was born in 1873 in Austria. He was a director of petrol companies. Shortly after the Anschluss, he was arrested by the Gestapo and was imprisoned for several weeks in the Rossauerländ jail in Vienna. He fled Austria for Nice after June 24, 1938, and lived in Nice until his death there in 1941.

[36] See, e.g., William Glaberson, Settling Accounts, But Not Minds; Holocaust Survivors Relive Past In Case Against Swiss Banks, NY TIMES, Nov. 13, 2002, at B1 (describing several CRT awards, including that for Mr. Frischer's account).

The claimant, the nephew of Leo Fürst, submitted with his claim form correspondence between his uncle and Nazi authorities in Vienna concerning the required "flight tax."[37] In a letter dated May 30, 1938, Leo Fürst stated that he owned an account at a bank in Zurich, worth SF 1,318. He subsequently reported in a June 21, 1938 letter that the account now carried a balance of SF 715, and that it had not been confiscated. The letter also indicated that as of January 1, 1938, Leo Fürst's total assets were 112,571 Reichsmark, and that he owned five different securities, including Swiss Federal Railway bonds 1899/1902; Austrian Federal International Bonds 1930; and City of Vienna Bonds 1931, as well as two other bonds. Leo Fürst's letter made it clear that the bonds were denominated in Swiss Francs, but gave no indication where they were held.

The claimant also provided a copy of a June 24, 1997 letter from a Swiss law firm that had been hired to pursue the search for Leo Fürst's assets in Switzerland. The firm reported that the bank had advised that it had failed to locate any information regarding Leo Fürst's accounts.

The CRT explained that, contrary to the bank's statement to the Swiss law firm in 1997, records concerning Leo Fürst's accounts did indeed exist, and the Volcker Committee auditors had located them. In fact, Mr. Fürst owned a custody account closed on March 30, 1939, and a demand deposit account opened on November 10, 1929 and closed on March 31, 1939. The CRT observed that the case was "similar to other cases … in which, after the Anschluss, Austrian citizens who are Jewish report their assets in the 1938 Census and, subsequently, their accounts are closed and are transferred to Nazi-controlled authorities."

[37] As stated by Gerald D. Feldman, Confiscation of Jewish Assets, and the Holocaust, in CONFISCATION OF JEWISH PROPERTY IN EUROPE, 1933-1945: NEW SOURCES AND PERSPECTIVES-SYMPOSIUM PROCEEDINGS 1,4 (USHMM 2003): "De-emancipation of the Jews had to be done 'legally,' which explains both the distortion of existing laws to exploit the Jews as well as the incredible proliferation of laws, decrees, and regulations concerning them. The Reich 'Flight Tax,' for example, was created by the Brüning regime in 1931 to prevent capital flight from Germany; it did so by forcing emigrants to pay twenty-five percent of their assets. Although it had nothing to do with Jews as a group, its 1934 revision reducing the assets and income thresholds at which such taxation began was deliberately designed to soak the Jews, who had become Germany's leading emigrants, and was justified by the allegation that they 'owed' the state for not having to pay German taxes in the future. Similarly, the system of foreign exchange controls became a powerful tool for limiting the amounts of money Jews could take out of the country. Increasingly, Jews seeking to get out had to monetize their assets and often place their money in blocked accounts to guarantee that the various taxes and impositions… would be paid. Thus Jews cashed in their insurance policies and then used the money to pay their taxes and the cost of emigration."

The CRT awarded the presumptive value for a custody account and demand deposit account. As to the account of unknown type reported by Leo Fürst in his May 30, 1938 letter, the CRT awarded the SF 1,318 noted in that letter (applying the multiplier to all three accounts). Subsequently, the CRT amended the latter account to increase the award by SF 32,900, representing the difference between the SF 1,318 and the SF 3,950 presumptive value for an account of unknown type, in accordance with Article 29 of the CRT Rules authorizing accounts of lower than presumptive value to be paid at presumptive value.

Several years after issuing the initial award, the CRT amended the initial decision to reflect new information that had been provided to the CRT by one of the banks through the "voluntary assistance" process. The CRT explained that the new information showed that Leo Fürst had held a custody account with six different securities, all of which had been sold in late 1938 and 1939, after Mr. Fürst had fled Austria for Nice. As described by the CRT, "this portfolio, with one exception, is identical to that listed in Leo Fürst's letter to the Flight Tax Authorities, dated 21 June 1938, as securities denominated in Swiss francs, without however specifying the location of these securities." The exception related to one type of bond that was exchanged on March 21, 1938 and later sold in two lots. "Any other differences between the portfolio values shown in … Leo Fürst's correspondence" and those provided in the newly-received bank records, the market values of which the CRT calculated through independent research, "stem from the difference in valuation dates: 1 January 1938 for the former and the post-Anschluss transaction dates as given in the Bank information for the latter."

Since the supplemental bank records now demonstrated that Leo Fürst's custody account actually was worth SF 17,365, or SF 4,365 more than the presumptive value of SF 13,000 that had been awarded in the initial decision, the CRT awarded Leo Fürst's nephew the difference, adjusted by the 12.5 multiplier to SF 54,562.50.

xiii. In re Accounts of Albert Gerngross, Paul Gerngross, Martha Gerngross, and A. Gerngross A.G. (SF 1,179,262.70)

Albert Gerngross was born in 1874. He was unmarried and lived in Vienna, where he and his brother, Paul Gerngross, born in 1880, were owners and board members of the large department store A. Gerngross A.G.[38]

[38] The Gerngross family's assets were described by the Bergier Commission: "The case of Albert Gerngross, a businessman who had obtained Swiss nationality in the 1920s, shows the different ways in which assets were dealt with. Gerngross and his brother, who was Austrian, owned a house in Vienna. While the brother's half of the house was expropriated without compensation, Albert Gerngross was allowed to keep his half of the property. He was, however, forced to sell the 34,153 shares he held in A. Gerngross AG, one of the city's leading department stores, to the Creditanstalt." BERGIER FINAL REPORT at 340. See also Brigitte Hamann, Hitler's Vienna - A dictator's apprenticeship: Jews in Vienna, PORGES.NET, available at http://www.porges.net/JewsinVienna/1HistoricalBackground.html ("There were spectacular success stories in trade and economy, such as that of department store king Alfred Gerngross, which after his death in 1908 was told everywhere. Having emigrated from Frankfurt to Vienna with his brother in 1881, he opened up a fabric store, then bought one house after the other on Vienna's largest business street, Mariahilfer Strasse, and built a huge department store. He left his eight children a fortune of more than four million kronen.").

Paul Gerngross was married to Martha Gerngross, born in 1885. In 1939, Albert Gerngross fled to Switzerland, where he died in 1969. Paul and Martha Gerngross fled to England in 1939, and later to Uruguay, where they remained until the end of World War II. They then returned to Austria. Paul Gerngross died in Vienna in 1954.[39]

The bank records demonstrated that the Gerngross accounts were reviewed by the bank as early as March 17, 1938, just after the Anschluss, when the bank stated in an internal notice that it "would soon complete a list of over 1,000 custody accounts belonging to Austrian citizens." The bank records for these accounts also included "a list of custody accounts belonging to customers residing in Austria which were transferred to Austrian or German banks in 1938."

These records showed that Albert Gerngross owned a custody account that was transferred in April 14, 1938 to the Oesterreichische Creditanstalt Wiener Bankverein in Vienna, with a balance of SF 47,000. The account was closed on April 30, 1938. Further, Paul Gerngross and Martha Gerngross each owned a custody account. Both accounts were transferred on August 16, 1938 to the Länderbank Wien A.G., at which time the accounts respectively held balances of SF 16,500 and SF 1,900. The accounts were closed on September 6, 1939. The ICEP auditors concluded that all three of these accounts had been paid to Nazi authorities.

The bank records also showed that the company A. Gerngross A.G. held an account of unknown type. In addition, the 1938 Census for Paul and Martha Gerngross showed that among their many assets (including real estate, stocks and bonds, and bank accounts), Paul Gerngross owned a demand deposit account at the bank with a reported value of SF 84.61. The 1938 Census also demonstrated that the Gerngrosses were forced to pay a total of 740,999 Reichsmark in atonement tax (Judenvermögensabgabe), and flight tax (Reichsfluchtsteuer) of RM 152,875. Albert Gerngross' 1938 Census form showed that he had fled to Switzerland in 1939.[40]

The CRT awarded all of the accounts to the claimants, the nieces and nephew of the Gerngrosses, concluding that the three custody accounts were turned over to the Nazis. Moreover, there was no evidence that the account owners had received the proceeds of the other two accounts (the account of unknown type and the demand deposit account).[41]

Subsequently, the CRT amended the award insofar as the original decision had calculated Martha Gerngross' custody account based upon its reported value. The CRT determined that the account was to be awarded at SF 13,000 (the presumptive value then in effect) rather than the SF 1,900 reported in the bank files. In addition, the CRT also increased the award for Paul Gerngross' demand deposit account reported in the 1938 Census, noting that "as evidenced in a number of cases, … Paul Gerngross may not have declared all his assets, or he may have understated their value, in the belief that this might help him safeguard some of them."

[40] Several individuals were listed in the bank records as having power of attorney over these accounts, including Robert Gerngross, who resided at the same address as Albert Gerngross. Robert Gerngross and his wife were included on Transport No. 17, which "left the Aspang train station in Vienna on April 9th, 1942 for Izbica in the General Government. The transport consisted of 1000 Jews (346 of them older than 61 years); among them was the owner of a well-known department store, Robert Israel Gerngross and his wife." See http://db.yadvashem.org/deportation/transportDetails. The Yad Vashem essay explains that prior to deportation, the victims who were shipped on transports such as No. 17 (including the Gerngrosses) were forced by the "staff of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna" to declare their property. "Then they had to sign a document confirming that they transferred everything to the state. They were also forced to hand over all valuables and cash to the representatives of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration. The Jewish property was sold by the Gestapo after the transport left." As to Transport No. 17, "most of them were sent to the Belzec extermination camp, where they were murdered in the gas chambers. Of all 1000 Jews that went to Izbica with transport no. 17, not a single person survived the Holocaust." Id.

xiv. In re Account of Wilhelm Gewitsch (SF 49,375.00)

Wilhelm Gewitsch was born and lived in Vienna. He and his wife had one child, who was born in 1883. Mrs. Gewitsch perished in Theresienstadt in September 1942, and the Gewitschs' daughter was deported to Minsk, where she perished in August 1942. As to account owner Wilhelm Gewitsch (the claimant's great-grandfather), his fate was unknown.

The bank records demonstrated that the account of Wilhelm Gewitsch was transferred to the Reichsbank Berlin on February 14 of an unspecified year, and the account was closed on that same date. The CRT awarded the account (of unknown type) at presumptive value, based on the fact that it was closed and transferred to the Reichsbank. Although it was not clear if the account owner was a Nazi victim, his wife and child, his immediate heirs, who would have been entitled to receive the account, were killed by the Nazis.

xv. In re Account of Walter Herzog (SF 250,375.00)

Walter Herzog was born in 1887 in Krefeld, Germany. He lived in Krefeld until 1939, where he owned a silk tie company, Wilms & Herzog. On December 10, 1941, he was deported to the ghetto in Riga, Lithuania. In 1943, Walter Herzog was sent to Buchenwald, where he died in 1945.

The bank records made available to the CRT as part of the Court's claims process showed that Walter Herzog owned a custody account, which held SF 20,000 on January 28, 1937, at which time the bank evidently transferred the account to the Nazi-controlled Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft in Berlin. Among other documents, the bank records included a list of accounts that were transferred to German banks in 1936 and 1937, pursuant to Germany's Seventh Ordinance regarding implementation of the Foreign Exchange Control Law (effective November 19, 1936) as well as the First Announcement regarding the Custody of

The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names is one of the most significant achievements of the Court-funded Victim List Project, with the creation of a vast online platform of millions of Nazi victim names. In addition to containing archival data, the Central Database also contains Pages of Testimony, often containing photographs (such as for account owner Walter Herzog, as shown above). As described by Yad Vashem:

"Pages of Testimony are special forms designed by Yad Vashem to restore the personal identities and to record the brief life stories of the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices. Submitted by survivors, remaining family members or friends in commemoration of Jews murdered in the Holocaust, these one-page forms, containing the names, biographical details and, when available, photographs, of each individual victim are essentially symbolic 'tombstones.' Since its inception Yad Vashem has worked tirelessly to fulfill our moral imperative to remember every single victim as a human being, and not merely a number...In addition to Pages of Testimony, The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names contains names from varied archival sources, bringing the total number of individual victims registered to four and half million." See http://www.yadvashem.org/archive/hall-of-names/pages-of-testimony.html.

Foreign Securities (effective November 20, 1936). The bank records contained a letter from the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft informing the bank that all custody accounts containing foreign securities noted on the German Stock Exchange should be transferred to a Devisenbank, a German bank entitled to deal with foreign currency, and advising that the services of the Deutsche Bank were at the Swiss bank's disposal.

The Swiss bank records also included correspondence between its main branch and its Zurich branch describing preparation of lists of account owners subject to the law. The CRT observed that in one letter, "the Bank's General Director agree[d] to the Zurich branch's suggestion to charge their clients a transfer fee, in addition to the usual securities charge, of ½% - 1% of the total value of the securities transferred to a German Devisenbank." In other words, for clients who were forced to turn over their accounts to the Nazis, the bank decided to charge its customers additional fees for the bank's services in arranging this transfer.

Based on these documents and the fact that the account was paid to the Nazis, the CRT awarded the account at its actual value (after application of the multiplier of 12 then in effect) to the claimant, the granddaughter of Walter Herzog.

xvi. In re Accounts of Hermine Marie Hordliczka (SF 57,999.13)

Hermine Hordliczka was born in 1875 in Vienna. She and her husband had one daughter who died in Vienna in 1932, at the age of 27. Hermine Hordliczka fled Vienna for Paris in 1939, hoping to emigrate to São Paulo, Brazil, but she died in Paris on April 23, 1939.

Hermine Hordliczka's accounts were not reported by the ICEP auditors. However, they were located by the CRT in connection with the CRT's review of 1938 Census. In her 1938 Census, Hermine Hordliczka reported three Swiss accounts: two demand deposit accounts and one custody account holding three different securities. Along with her Census declaration, she also submitted an August 2, 1938 letter to the Office in the Austrian Ministry for Economics and Labor charged with registering and administering Jewish-owned property

(Vermögensverkehrsstelle or VVSt.), stating that she had only reported her assets because she was not yet in possession of her certificate of Aryan origin. On August 30, 1938, she wrote another letter stating that she had received copies of her mother's and maternal grandparents' baptism certificates, showing them to be Catholic and "Aryan."

However, the VVSt. responded that it considered Hermine Hordliczka to be Jewish. On November 8, 1938, the VVSt. wrote to Hermine Hordliczka, by then in Paris, demanding that she turn over foreign securities by December 17, 1938. The 1938 Census also contained a December 14, 1938 protocol stating that Hermine Hordliczka's apartment had been sealed, and that all of her remaining property of value had been confiscated.

On December 20, 1938, the VVSt. advised the Reichsbank as well as the Austrian office for state pensions that Hermine Hordliczka was considered to be Jewish. A criminal investigation had been opened based on her failure to turn over foreign securities. The CRT observed that on August 17, 1938, "the VVSt. renewed the criminal complaint related to Hermine Hordliczka, indicating that although she provided documents, including baptismal certificates, which showed that her mother and her maternal grandparents were Catholic by confession, their names showed that they were certainly of the 'Jewish race.'"

The CRT awarded to the claimant (Hermine Hordliczka's great-niece) the two demand deposit accounts at presumptive value. The CRT also awarded the custody account at the market value for the securities as reported in the 1938 Census (an amount higher than presumptive value). The CRT observed that the case was similar to others "in which Jewish residents and/or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census, and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich."

xvii. In re Account of Journalisten- und Schriftstellerverein Concordia (SF 582,990.98)

The claimant was an entity, the Presseclub Concordia, Vereinigung Österreichischer Journalisten und Schriftsteller, an independent organization of journalists and writers in Vienna.

Prior to the Anschluss, it had been a primarily Jewish group. The organization held an unpublished Swiss account under the name Journalisten- und Schriftstellerverein Concordia.

The CRT determined from its independent research, including examination of the work of the Austrian Historians' Commission, that the Journalisten- und Schriftstellerverein Concordia was formed in 1859. On March 17, 1938, its assets, including its headquarters, were ordered seized by Nazi authorities. One month later, an individual named Walter Petwaidic was appointed by Nazi officials as the new leader of the organization. He withdrew membership from 243 members of the group (i.e., the Jewish members). The remaining members consisted of 77 non-Jewish individuals.

The CRT observed that "Petwaidic was successful in securing for the Reich the organization's assets held in custody accounts at banks in Austria, but he encountered some resistance in obtaining the assets held by the organization in a custody account at the Zurich branch of the [Swiss bank in question]." The bank advised Petwaidic in a July 1938 letter "that it was unable to recognize Petwaidic's rights to the organization's account without a resolution made at a general meeting of the organization and indicating Petwaidic's rights to access the Swiss account. On 5 August 1938, the Commissioner for Suspensions issued an order that all of the organization's assets be seized, 'in particular all cash and securities contained in custody account number 56269 at the Zurich branch of [the bank]...Furthermore, on 30 September 1938, a brief general meeting of the newly-aryanized organization was held, with the purpose of formally electing new leadership that could then be recognized by the [bank] as having rights to access the organization's account at their bank."

After the War, "the organization was reconstituted under its original name, and it applied for restitution of its assets from the Austrian government." A restitution settlement agreement was reached on June 28, 1956, indicating that the organization's account at the Zurich bank was still open with a 1956 value of SF 5,888.65.

The bank records, which were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were obtained by the organization and provided to the CRT, indicated that the organization's custody account held ten different bonds. Most had been sold or transferred out of the account on December 24, 1938, after the group had been "aryanized." The CRT noted that after the Anschluss, Nazi authorities had submitted "several requests to the Bank for the transfer back to the organization of the securities contained in the account," and "the Bank was suspicious enough of this request to require a resolution of the organization indicating that the parties requesting the funds from the Bank were entitled to access the account."

The CRT awarded the bonds to the present-day organization (the claimant) at the higher of market or nominal value after conducting independent research as to the bonds' values, applying Special Master Junz' Guidelines for Valuation of Securities[43], and subtracting the 1956 restitution settlement from the total. The CRT also observed that one type of bond held in the account had been sold on March 12, 1938, but that since "the research that [the CRT conducted] indicates that the Account Owner's assets first began to be seized on 17 March 1938," the "Account Owner would have received the proceeds of these bonds," and so the CRT did not award their value.

xviii. In re Accounts of Bertha Kaufmann, Hedwig Landesmann, and Hermine Hirsch (SF 797,234.50)

Bertha Kaufmann, her sister Hedwig Landesmann, and their mother Hermine Hirsch, all were born and lived in Vienna. The claimant, New York attorney Robert M. Kaufmann, was the son of Bertha Kaufmann and the nephew and grandson, respectively, of Hedwig Landesmann and Hermine Hirsch. Robert Kaufmann was sent to England on a Kindertransport in December 1938. His sister followed in January 1939. Their father was imprisoned in Dachau and fled to England in May 1939. Bertha Kaufmann, Hedwig Landesmann and her husband, and Hermine Hirsch followed a few months later, in August 1939. In 1940, the Kaufmanns moved to the United States, while the Landesmanns and Hermine Hirsch remained in Cambridge, England.

[43] See, e.g., In re Accounts of Ernst Eisner (amendment) at 3 ("According to the Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, circulated to the CRT by Special Master Helen B. Junz, as a general rule, the face value of bonds not in default shall be awarded if the market value was below the face value on the date the account owner is deemed to have lost control over the account. The CRT presumes that the account owner, if able to decide freely, could have opted to hold the respective bond[s] to maturity to avoid a capital loss. The market value of the bonds shall be awarded if that value was above the face value on the date the account owner is deemed to have lost control over the account.").

Hedwig Landesmann's husband was confined to an institution in England, where he died. Hedwig Landesmann committed suicide in England in 1945. Her daughter, Hermine Hirsch (the claimant's grandmother) moved to the United States, where she died in the early 1950s. Bertha Kaufmann, the claimant's mother, died in the United States in 1984.

The bank records made available as part of the claims process showed that the account owners held four accounts. An account opening card for one account, owned jointly by Bertha Kaufmann and Hedwig Landesmann, contained a notation that the account was closed on August 22, 1938. According to a list of custody accounts closed in 1938, "the assets totaling 4,500.00 Swiss Francs in that account were transferred … to an undisclosed bank … pursuant to the Austrian legislation restricting foreign currency transactions." Bertha Kaufmann's 1938 Census form indicated that she held a joint custody account with Hedwig Landesmann at the bank, valued at SF 4,214. On August 31, 1938, Hedwig Landesmann opened a custody account (the second account) and instructed the bank to hold all correspondence. That account was closed on January 21, 1939.

The third and fourth accounts were owned by Hermine Hirsch. One of the accounts was a custody account opened by July 10, 1931, which held SF 5,400 as of August 22, 1938, when it was transferred to an undisclosed bank pursuant to Austrian foreign currency regulations. The account was closed on November 23, 1939. Hermine Hirsch's 1938 Census declaration indicated that she owned securities at the Swiss bank valued at SF 5,566. The fourth account was a demand deposit, opened by July 10, 1931 and closed on November 23, 1939.

The CRT awarded all four accounts to the claimant, pointing out that two of the accounts had been reported in the 1938 Census. Since these accounts "were transferred to an undisclosed bank" pursuant to the Reich's legislation "restricting foreign currency transactions," and absent evidence to the contrary, it was plausible that the Swiss bank that held the accounts assisted in arranging "a coerced transfer" to the Nazis, as was often the case in similar circumstances. Given the fate of those two accounts, the CRT presumed that the family members similarly did not receive the proceeds of the other two accounts, since the bank had destroyed all records that would have enabled the CRT to determine precisely what happened to the Kaufmann accounts. The destruction of documents warranted an adverse inference that the Swiss bank had permitted the accounts to be turned over to the Nazis under duress, particularly since one family member had been imprisoned in Dachau, and given that the family sought (and was able) to flee from Germany.

In determining the amount of the award, the CRT observed that the two custody accounts were reported at values lower than presumptive value, but that since the reported amounts in the bank files and the 1938 Census were similar, the CRT concluded that these amounts (SF 4,500 and SF 5,566, respectively) represented the actual value of the accounts. The other two accounts were awarded at presumptive value, for a total award of SF 302,472.

Mr. Kaufmann described his reaction to this award in a 2002 article in The New York Times:

> In his Manhattan office, Robert M. Kaufmann thumbed a fresh photocopy of a list his father compiled in 1938 to comply with Nazi laws requiring Jews to itemize their property. Among the possessions in his family's Vienna apartment, his father told officials 64 years ago, were two baskets, 42 soupspoons and a 10-by-13-foot carpet.
>
> "This has brought back so many memories," said Mr. Kaufmann, who is now 72 and a prominent New York lawyer. The details on the form he first saw this summer, he said recently, brought back images of a life long ago, before his family came to the United States as refugees in 1939. He could picture, he said, the apartment he last saw as a 9-year-old, with its big Viennese stove where he had once slyly warmed a thermometer to avoid school.
>
>
> Mr. Kaufman's journey through memories of long-ago Vienna began when a distant relative told him that she had noticed the names of his deceased mother, grandmother and a maternal aunt on a published list of people who had once held Swiss accounts. He was astonished, he said. Though he had heard of the Holocaust lawsuit, he had no idea that it had anything to do with him.
>
> "Sixty years and suddenly this appears," he said. "I think I had tears in my eyes all that day."
>
> Mr. Kaufman, a partner at the Proskauer Rose law firm in Manhattan and a former president of the City Bar Association, began gathering documents. He sketched out the family tree. Death certificates had to be pulled out of files. In the stark terms of many of the claims, he described the trauma of those times. He and, > later, his older sister, he wrote, had been sent to England on the rescue trains known as the Kindertransport. He was 9 when he traveled alone in December 1938.

>
> His mother joined them in 1939 with his father, he wrote, 'who had first been arrested and sent to Dachau because he was Jewish.'
>
> The toll on Mr. Kaufman's family continued even after their escapes. Although his uncle and aunt, the younger sister his mother had fussed over, also made it to England, his uncle was placed in a psychiatric institution where he later died. In 1945, his aunt committed suicide by walking in front of a London bus.
>
> The … employees of the tribunal in Zurich compare the information provided by claimants with unpublished bank records and government filings. When a tribunal lawyer sent Mr. Kaufman that Jewish property [C]ensus form from 1938, his parents' handwriting and the detailed catalog of their holdings down to their saltshakers, transported him.
> "I was picturing our apartment in Vienna," he said. "I hadn't thought of it in 30 or 40 years."[44]

In a letter filed with the Court, Mr. Kaufman advised that he had created the Robert M. Kaufman Fund No. 2 at the New York Community Trust, partly with funds received from the Swiss Banks Settlement (as well as with funds from an Italian Holocaust-era insurance policy and from Austrian reparations). As of the date of the letter, Mr. Kaufman had made grants of more than $340,000 to a variety of charities, including the Visiting Nurse Service of New York; New York Lawyers for the Public Interest; the Refugee and Immigrant Fund; Resources for Children with Special Needs; the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; the Israel Heart Fund; Legal Momentum; the Kindertransport Association; and New York University School of Medicine in support of the Bellevue/NYU Program for Survivors of Torture.

Subsequently, the CRT amended the award to take into account the presumption that the amounts reported in the 1938 Census were not necessarily reliable, in that victims tended to underreport their assets. The claimant accordingly was awarded an additional SF 106,250, representing the difference between the presumptive value of two custody accounts and the amount that had been awarded.

In three awards and one award amendment, the claimant, the granddaughter of the renowned journalists Luise Kautsky and Karl Kautsky, and her cousins, were compensated for a number of Holocaust-era Swiss accounts owned by their grandparents and other relatives.

Luise Kautsky (née Ronsperger) was born in 1864 in Vienna, and was married to Karl Kautsky (born in 1854 in Prague). They had three sons, including Benedikt Kautsky, all of whom were born in Stuttgart. Conducting its own research on the Kautskys, the CRT explained in the Hantsch award that

> Luise Kautsky, née Ronsperger (1864-1944) was a journalist and translator, an intimate of Rosa Luxemburg, and a contributor to the feminist periodical "Gleichheit" ("Equality")...Additionally, Luise Kautsky co-authored several works with her husband…, who was a founder of the German Socialist Party journal "Die Neue Zeit" and the author of numerous works on socialist theory, > including "Die materialistische Geschichtsauffassung" ("The Materialist Conception of History")...An acquaintance of both Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, [Mr.] Kautsky later sharply criticized Communism in his books "Demokratie und Diktatur" ("Democracy and Dictatorship") and "Terrorismus und Kommunismus" ("Terrorism and Communism"), to which Leon Trotsky replied in the polemic "Terrorismus und Kommunismus: Anti Kautsky" ("Terrorism and Communism: Anti-Kautsky") and V. I. Lenin attacked in "Die Diktatur des Proletariats und der Renegat Kautsky" ("The Dictatorship of the Proletariat and the Renegade Kautsky")…. Before being transported to Auschwitz, where she perished on 8 December 1944, Luise Kautsky arranged for the transfer of the couple's personal papers to the International Institute of Social History in Amsterdam. This archive contains approximately 15,000 letters sent by 3,000 persons, copies of the Kautskys' own letters, manuscripts of published and unpublished texts, and files of family members [including] letters from [redacted] to Bruno Hantsch and Marianne Hantsch, née Ronsperger; from Bruno Hantsch to Luise Kautsky; from Marianne Ronsperger to other members of the Kautsky family; and from Luise Kautsky to [redacted].

Luise and Karl Kautsky fled from Vienna to Amsterdam in 1938, where Karl Kautsky died shortly after, on October 17, 1938. Following the Nazis' occupation of the Netherlands in 1940, Luise Kautsky was deported to Auschwitz, where she perished in 1944.

[45] In the New Yorker, journalist Elizabeth Kolbert described "Stolpersteine" as follows: "When I looked into it, I learned that the Stolpersteine were a public art project, the work of a German painter named Gunter Demnig, who lives in Cologne. In contrast to most memorials, which aim to command attention, Stolpersteine are understated—literally underfoot. Each one consists of a block of concrete onto which a plain brass plaque has been affixed. The block, which is about the size of a Rubik's Cube, is embedded in the sidewalk, or inserted among the cobblestones, so that the plaque's surface lies flush with the ground. Every plaque is stamped by

The Kautskys' son Benedikt was deported first to Dachau (as reflected on his 1938 Census form) and later to Buchenwald, and then Auschwitz. He died in Vienna in 1960. Charlotte Kautsky, who was married to one of the Kautskys' other two sons and was the claimant's aunt, fled to the U.S. from Austria shortly after the Anschluss. She died in California. Luise Kautsky had a niece, Marianne Hantsch, née Ronsperger, who was married to Bruno Hantsch.

In the Kautsky award, the CRT determined that the bank records indicated that the accounts owned jointly by the Kautskys and their son Benedikt had been opened on May 16, 1924. One was a custody account, which contained Swiss Confederation gold bonds expiring in 1940, and worth $4,517.18 on May 28, 1924. The other three accounts were demand deposit accounts. On March 19, 1938, the Kautskys requested that the bank not send any correspondence to Vienna. On March 25, 1938, the custody account and one of the three demand deposit accounts were closed. Another demand deposit was closed a few days later on March 28, 1938. The third demand deposit account (which was not reported by the ICEP auditors. but was discovered by the CRT during its research) was closed on a date and at an amount unknown.

The CRT awarded all four accounts to the claimants (the grandchildren and children of the account owners). The CRT noted that the accounts were closed "after the Anschluss," at a time when the "Nazi-dominated regime had … begun a major effort to confiscate the assets of the Jewish population, including Swiss bank accounts." Karl and Luise Kautsky had fled Vienna, and Luise had died in Auschwitz, while their son Benedikt had been interned in several concentration camps. The CRT awarded all four accounts at their respective presumptive values, including the custody account containing gold bonds, finding that the recorded amount for that account "cannot be relied upon to determine the value of the account because the account was closed in 1938, almost 14 years after the deposit of the gold bonds, during which period the value of the account may have fluctuated." The account owners "could have accessed the account freely during this period."

With respect to the account owned by the Kautskys' daughter-in-law Charlotte Kautsky (the mother of one of the cousins represented by the lead claimant), the bank records showed that the owner had written "several letters to the Bank, dated 19 March 1938, 2 April 1938, and 30 January 1939, requesting it not to send correspondence to Vienna." Charlotte Kautsky's account, a custody account that had been opened on October 2, 1934, was closed on April 26, 1939. The CRT awarded this account to the claimant (at presumptive value), observing that although Charlotte Kautsky was "outside Nazi-dominated territory" when the account was closed, she "had relatives remaining in her country of origin" when she fled Vienna, and "may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over her account to ensure their safety."

In the Ronsperger award, the CRT determined that the accounts, jointly owned by Frau Marie Ronsperger, Frl. Luise Ronsperger, and Frau Marianne Hantsch, née Ronsperger, who lived in Vienna, owned two demand deposit accounts and one custody account. The custody account was closed on March 31, 1938, and the demand deposit accounts were closed no later than May 1938. The CRT awarded all three accounts, observing that the bank records indicated a residence of Vienna. One of the account owners (Luise Ronsperger, later Luise Kautsky) died in Auschwitz. Subsequently, upon receipt of valuation information from one of the banks through the "voluntary assistance" process, revealing the types and values of the securities held in the custody account, the CRT amended the award to reflect this new information, thus increasing the original presumptive value payment to reflect the actual value of the account.

In the Hantsch award, the CRT observed that the bank records indicated that a custody account owned by Bruno and Marianne Hantsch had been included on "a list of closed custody accounts owned by customers domiciled in Austria." Internal bank correspondence dated March 17, 1938 indicated that the bank had prepared a list "of over 1,000 custody accounts belonging to Austrian citizens pursuant to the Reich's legislation regarding foreign-held assets. The bank's records indicated that, pursuant to this legislation, [the account] was transferred to the Oesterreichische Industriekredit-A.G. in Vienna" on April 8, 1938, at which time it was reported to have held a balance of SF 10,500. The account subsequently was closed on November 30, 1938. Given that the account was repatriated to Austria after the Anschluss, the CRT awarded the account to the claimants at its presumptive value.

xx. In re Accounts of Liselotte Löhner and Eva Löhner (SF 2,516,187.50)

Liselotte Löhner was born in 1927 and her sister, Eva, was born in 1929, both in Vienna. They were the daughters of the renowned librettist Fritz (Friedrich/Bedrich or "Beda") Löhner and his wife Helene, the claimants' aunt.

According to research conducted by the CRT, Löhner, born in Czechoslovakia in 1883, by the 1920s had become one of the most sought-after lyricists and writers in Vienna. He later teamed with the composer Franz (Fritz) Léhar, with whom he wrote several operettas, including "Das Land des Lächelns" ("The Country of Smiles") (1929). He also was the author of "Freunde, das Leben ist lebenswert" ("Friends, life is worth living"), which became one of the most popular songs in Germany in the 1940s. The copyright for these musical successes had made Löhner a millionaire before the Anschluss. [46]

[46] Fritz and Helene Löhner also owned an art collection, which was among 148 "significant collections" plundered by the Nazis. See Lillie, WAS EINMAL WAR: A HANDBOOK OF VIENNA'S PLUNDERED ART COLLECTIONS.

On March 13, 1938, immediately after the Anschluss, Löhner was arrested and interned in the prison on Elisabethpromenade in Vienna. Two weeks later, on April 1, 1938, he was deported to Dachau in the "Prominenten-Transport Nr. 1" (the first transport of prominent persons). In September 1938, Löhner was deported from Dachau to Buchenwald.

Even in Buchenwald, he continued to write music. With the composer Hermann Leopoldi, he created the "Buchenwald March." This piece was played every morning during the prisoners' roll-call and as they marched to perform slave labor.[47]

The CRT observed that Löhner continued to hope that his former friend and colleague, Fritz Léhar, would help secure his release. However, by then, Léhar had aligned himself, and had developed good contacts with, the Nazi party. Léhar celebrated his seventieth birthday at the Vienna Opera in 1940, conducting "Das Land des Lächelns" in the presence of Hitler himself (who considered Léhar one of his favorite composers). Löhner, the co-writer of the operetta, was not mentioned on the program.

Herman Leopoldi's release from the camp was reported in The New York Times: "Herman Leopoldi, Viennese song writer and comedian who spent nine months in Nazi concentration camps, arrived yesterday on the United States liner City of Baltimore… As he stepped off the gangplank Mr. Leopoldi lay down and kissed the ground. [He] spent four months in the concentration camp at Dachau and five months at Buchenwald. He declined to discuss the treatment he received because he still has relatives in Vienna, including a brother who he feared might suffer if he spoke against the Germans. 'It was not so bad for me … because I was singing all the time to entertain my comrades and keep up their spirits. The worst thing about the camps is that nobody knows what is going to happen to him. While I was in the camps I composed a work - 'March for Prisoners.' The words were written by another prisoner, Dr. Fritz Beda (Löhner), who was the librettist for Franz Lehar.' He said that he lost his home in Vienna and his wife lost her jewelry, but that his 'greatest pain' was the loss of his piano." Reich Refugee Hails U.S. Soil With Kiss; Vienna Comedian 9 Months in Nazi Camps, N.Y. Times, Mar. 21, 1939, at 8.

In 1942, Helene Löhner, her mother, and the Löhners' two young daughters (Liselotte and Eva) were deported to Minsk. They were killed at the Maly Trostinec concentration camp. That same year, Löhner was deported to Auschwitz-Monowitz, where he was forced to perform slave labor for IG Farben. As the CRT explained, five directors of the company saw Löhner working too slowly one day and complained that '"the Jew there could work faster.'" A Kapo leader beat Löhner to death on December 4, 1942.

The Swiss bank records and archival documents showed that several accounts existed in different Swiss banks held in the names of Löhner's daughters. Dr. Löhner's 1938 Census form reported that he owned Swiss bank accounts, containing securities worth SF 45,000 and £ 5,000, in the name of Liselotte Löhner. The Census form indicated that it was filled out by another individual at the authorization of Fritz Löhner, who at that time was imprisoned in Dachau. Census forms for Liselotte and Eva Löhner likewise were completed by the same individual. Liselotte Löhner's Census form indicated that she was a minor and the daughter of Fritz Löhner. She held a custody account at the bank containing two different bonds with market values of, respectively, SF 51,504.00 and SF 122,000.00, as well as cash or savings of SF 1,117.30.

At a second bank, for which records were, in fact, contained in the bank files reviewed by the ICEP auditors (in contrast to the accounts held at the first bank as described above, for which records were located only in the 1938 Census files), Frl. Liselotte Löhner owned a demand deposit account opened in 1931. The account held an initial balance of SF 2,071.10. Correspondence was to be sent to Fritz Löhner-Beda. The account was transferred to a suspense account on May 8, 1957, at which time a total of SF 50.10 in commissions and fees was charged to the account for the period 1938 to 1957. At the time of its transfer, the account held a balance of SF 2,021.

At a third bank, Frl. Eva Löhner held a demand deposit account opened on March 10, 1931, and a custody account opened on March 13, 1932. The accounts were closed, respectively, on October 18, 1938 and December 31, 1938. Although the bank records available to the ICEP auditors and the CRT did not indicate the amounts held in the accounts, the 1938 Census forms contained relevant information. From Dachau, Löhner authorized his representative to report in his Census form that securities worth SF 20,000 were on deposit at that bank in the name of his daughter Eva. Eva Löhner's own Census records indicated that she was a minor and the daughter of Fritz Löhner; that she held a custody account at that bank containing bonds with a market value of SF 20,900.00; and that she also owned cash or savings worth SF 384.00.

The Census form also contained various correspondence between Löhner's representative and Nazi authorities, describing the difficulties the representative was having in obtaining the necessary documentation about the Löhners' assets, including bank statements. The Nazi authorities responded by advising the representative to take all necessary steps to obtain the required information and granted an extension to complete the Census form until August 25, 1938. On August 24, 1938, the representative submitted a supplemental declaration describing bank records that had been obtained from two of the three banks, and also providing the Nazi authorities with a letter from the music publisher Glocken-Verlag detailing the profits Löhner was entitled to receive from his various compositions, including Giuditte; Friederike; Land des Lächelns and others. The 1938 Census further indicated that by January 13, 1939, Löhner had been deported to Buchenwald, and that he was assessed flight tax of RM 40,000, due on March 10, 1939.

The CRT awarded all of the accounts to the claimants, cousins of Liselotte and Eva Löhner. The CRT noted that "the facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which Jewish residents and/or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich…. [I]n this case, the records from the Austrian State Archive provide concrete evidence that the Nazis corresponded with" the representative of Fritz Löhner "in order to ensure that assets held by the Löhner family were turned over to the Nazis."

The CRT further pointed out that the two Swiss banks had taken the additional step of giving the Nazis account statements for the daughters of Dr. Löhner — "even though Fritz Löhner's letter granted … power of attorney only with regard to the completion of his [own] 1938 Census declaration and not to the accounts belonging to his daughters, and even though this power of attorney was expressed in a letter that clearly indicated that the writer was imprisoned in the Dachau concentration camp."

As to the account held by Liselotte Löhner at the remaining bank, that account likewise was awarded to her cousins, the claimants, given that Liselotte "perished in the concentration camp at Maly Trostinec in 1942; that the account was transferred to a suspense account on 8 May 1957, after her death;" and there was no record that the account had been repaid to her heirs.

The CRT awarded the three demand deposit accounts at their respective presumptive values, observing that although specific account values were recorded in the 1938 Census forms for two of the accounts, "as evidenced in a number of cases, the person who completed the 1938 Census on behalf of Fritz Löhner's minor children may not have declared all their assets, or may have understated their value, in the belief that this might help the family safeguard some of them." The third account, reported in the bank records at an amount lower than presumptive value, similarly was awarded at the higher presumptive value as provided under the CRT Rules. As to the two custody accounts, their respective values as reported in the 1938 Census forms exceeded the presumptive value then in effect, and thus the higher (reported) amount was awarded. The total historic value of the five accounts was SF 200,824, which upon application of the 12.5 multiplier resulted in a total award of SF 2,510,300.

In a December 30, 2004 letter, the award recipients, cousins living respectively in California and Australia, wrote to Special Master Junz. Their purpose was to "exten[d] [their] gratitude for your help in bringing this case to conclusion. Many thanks for the endless hours of research, necessary to access these dormant accounts of our dear little cousins who perished at the age of 11 and 13 yrs. due to the cruelty of monsters. Thank you for preserving, in spite of hitting many dead end roads, which resulted in this large award. With mixed emotions, we are so very grateful."

xxi. In re Assets of Gertrude Löw and Marianne Hamburger- Löw (SF 12,632,136.25)

Gertrude Löw was born in 1902 in Vienna. Her husband's sister, Marianne Hamburger-Löw, was born in 1901 in Vienna. They were part of the Löw family, major shareholders in an Austrian sugar refinery (Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG or ÖZAG), the subject of the largest award issued in the Swiss Banks Settlement Process (approximately $22 million). The ÖZAG award is discussed at length below. In addition to owning a portion of ÖZAG, members of the Löw family had extensive additional holdings throughout Europe. These assets, including gold bars and coins, securities and bank notes held in Swiss banks, were confiscated during the Holocaust, and some of these assets were the subject of a separate award to the heirs of Gertrude Löw and Marianne Hamburger-Löw.

The ICEP auditors did not report accounts belonging to Gertrude Löw or to Marianne Hamburger-Löw. Evidence of the accounts was located in archival sources, including 1938 Census and post-War restitution records.

Because of the unique circumstances of the Swiss banks' involvement with the Löw assets, it was necessary for the CRT first to determine whether the assets were in fact "Deposited Assets" under the terms of the Settlement Agreement; i.e., whether the assets "were deposited in Switzerland in a manner that engendered fiduciary responsibility by a Swiss institution or fiduciary to their owners," the Löw sisters-in-law.

With respect to the gold owned by the sisters-in-law, the CRT concluded that these assets, originally on deposit at the Midland Bank in the United Kingdom, ultimately became assets that were held in a Swiss bank for at least some period of time. In connection with 1963 restitution proceedings, however, the Swiss bank in question had disclaimed responsibility for the gold. The bank stated, first, that it no longer possessed records for the year 1938 (the year in which the gold was transferred), and second, even if "as posited by the Löws' lawyer" the bank "had received the gold assets for further shipment elsewhere [i.e. eventually to the Reichsbank] on the order of the authorized party, the receipt would not have been viewed as an actual, or effective deposit … and therefore not carried in [the bank's] books. In essence, [the bank] argued that the gold was not deposited with it, but merely transferred through it, and that it thus assumed no fiduciary duty" to Gertrude Löw and to Marianne Hamburger-Löw.

The CRT rejected the arguments the bank had made in 1963, noting that "notwithstanding [the bank's] assertions, [the documents] indicate that the Löws' gold assets were held at [the bank] for at least six weeks, from 22 April 1938 (when the Midland Bank received confirmation of its receipt from [the bank] to 1 June 1938 (when … [a second Swiss bank] would receive the gold in the name of the Reichsbank). During this time, the gold remained in the legal possession of the Löw Sisters-in-Law…." The CRT thus concluded that the gold assets were in fact "deposited" at one and possibly two Swiss banks. The CRT reached a similar determination as to SF 55,000 in bank notes that, like the gold, originally had been held at the Midland Bank.[48]

Some of the securities owned by the Löw sisters-in-law — specifically, 3½% War Loan bonds — were determined, however, not to have been "Deposited Assets." Although the War Loan bonds had been held in the Midland Bank account, when they were transferred for the purpose of ultimate delivery to the Nazis, they were deposited in an account in Switzerland that belonged to the Austrian Kathrein Bank. "Thus, while [the Swiss bank] had a fiduciary obligation to Kathrein Bank, it had no fiduciary obligation to any depositors, other than Kathrein Bank itself, of assets in Kathrein Bank's account."

As to the remaining securities owned by the Löw sisters-in-law and at issue in the decision, these assets were indeed deposited in a Swiss bank (a different one from the two banks involved in the transfer of the gold and bank notes), "in an account in which the Löw Sisters-in-Law had a beneficial interest, and therefore constitute Deposited Assets within the meaning of the Settlement Agreement." However, in contrast to the gold and bank notes, the bank had handed these securities over to an authorized party acting on behalf of the Löws. Therefore, the securities had been returned to the owners via their agent, and so the transfer was not compensable under the Settlement Agreement. The CRT recognized that the agent for the Löws later was obligated to turn the securities over to the Austrian Kathrein Bank and thus ultimately [48] By contrast, where the evidence demonstrated that the claimed account owner did not own a deposit at the Swiss bank but, rather, that the bank served merely as a conduit for a transfer, the claim was denied. See, e.g., In re Account of Salamon Kornbaum (denied on appeal) (letter provided to CRT by claimant showed only that the bank was a conduit for a payment from the claimant's father to a creditor; the letter stated that money was transferred "through" ["durch"] the bank, and not "from" ["von"] an account owned at the bank); In re Account of Eva Gabor (claimant submitted a receipt which showed only that a Swiss bank had received a payment order and, pursuant to that order, had paid an amount to the claimant that had been received from another banking institution*); In re Accounts of Walter Kary (*claimant's father's passport contained stamps showing that his father had bought currency for traveling, as well as notes from three Swiss banks at which his father had cashed travelers' checks).

to the Nazis. As to the Swiss bank, however, it had fulfilled its fiduciary duty in turning the assets over to someone acting on behalf of, and at the direction of, the account owners.

As to the awardable assets (the gold and bank notes), the CRT observed that there had been 9 gold bars as well as nearly 4,000 gold coins at issue (in denominations of U.S. $10.00 and U.S. $20.00). The 1938 Census as well as post-War restitution records valued the gold as having been worth approximately SF 983,645. The bank notes had been reported as worth SF 55,500. After deducting certain parts of post-War restitution the Löws had received for payment of flight taxes (paid in part from the aforementioned gold and bank notes), the awardable amount was determined to be SF 1,010,570.90, or SF 12,632,136.25 upon application of the 12.5 multiplier. The award was shared among the children and grandchildren of Gertrud Löw and Marianne Hamburger- Löw.

xxii. In re Accounts of Österreichische Zuckerindustrie AG Syndicate ("ÖZAG") (SF 26,450,993.36)

The ÖZAG award, totaling approximately $22 million based on the exchange rate at the time the decision was issued (2005), was the largest award authorized by the Court under the Settlement Agreement.[49] In addition to its size and its unique facts, the award also is noteworthy in that the claimant, Maria Altmann, born in Vienna in 1916, one year later went on to prevail in a well-publicized proceeding against the Austrian government for looted art. The art decision followed over seven years of litigation, including before the United States Supreme Court. In 2006, Ms. Altmann finally was able to reclaim her family's paintings, among them the celebrated "Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer" by Gustav Klimt.[50] The successful struggle to obtain the painting was portrayed in the 2015 film, "Woman in Gold."[51]

Decades later, determined to salvage some dignity from her past, Maria has taken on a mission to reclaim a painting the Nazis stole from her family: the famous Lady in Gold, a portrait of her beloved Aunt Adele. [The court] denied Austria's motion to dismiss, rejecting defense claims derived from the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The Ninth Circuit affirmed and the United States Supreme Court, in a landmark ruling affirmed the denial of Austria's motion to dismiss and held that the applicable federal statute could be applied retroactively. On remand, the district court again denied defendant's motion to dismiss and set a trial date. The parties then agreed to arbitration in Vienna. In January, 2006, the arbitration panel ruled that the Nazis improperly seized the painting and awarded the painting to the Bloch-Bauer heirs").

Ms. Altmann's success both in her Swiss bank account and looted art claims may be due to the fact that she sought the return of property, and "[l]awsuits to recover identifiable assets or tangible property sometimes succeeded" — in contrast to other types of claims — "most prominently in Austria v. Altmann." The Altmann case, however, "was the exception, not the rule." Most of these programs have confined their compensation to the original victim or, if deceased, sometimes to a very narrow class of relatives, such as spouses and children. In contrast, programs aimed at returning specific items of identifiable property, or compensating individuals for the wrongful taking thereof, typically include a broad category of heirs as eligible claimants").

ÖZAG's shareholders included, among others, Ms. Altmann's uncle, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer, born in 1864 in Austro-Hungary (now the Czech Republic). Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer was the brother of Ms. Altmann's father, and the husband of the subject of Klimt's painting, Adele Bloch-Bauer. Adele Bloch-Bauer, who at age 26 died of meningitis, was the sister of Ms. Altmann's mother.

As described by the CRT, after the Anschluss, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer "found refuge first at his summer home in Czechoslovakia, a large castle and estate outside Prague. When the Nazis annexed the Sudetenland in September 1938, Ferdinand fled to Zurich, Switzerland, and his estate outside Prague was later used as the principal residence for Reinhard Heydrich, the Nazi commander of the so-called Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. By early 1943, Ferdinand's entire art collection, including all the Klimt paintings, had been liquidated and expropriated. Ferdinand died on 13 November 1945 in Zurich, never having recovered any of his property."

Otto Pick, father of Ms. Altmann's sister-in-law and another ÖZAG shareholder, had "owned a large collection of silver objects and gold boxes from Augsburg, Germany, which was kept in his residence at Reisnerstrasse 40 in Vienna." The home was owned by his daughter Antoinette Bloch-Bauer. It was occupied by the SS immediately after the Anschluss. In July 1938, the house was confiscated by the Nazi Party for use by the Reich's Propaganda Office. The Nazis also seized, "among other assets belonging to Antoinette Bloch-Bauer, a Stinson S R-9 recreational airplane."

On the night of the Anschluss, Antoinette Bloch-Bauer, with her husband Leopold, their son and other family members, escaped to Czechoslovakia. As described by the CRT, "Leopold Bloch-Bauer accompanied his family as far as the border to ensure that they had reached safety, and then returned to Austria…. [but he] was later arrested and imprisoned by the Nazis. [Two reports] prepared after the Second World War by the Property Control Branch of the United States Allied Commission for Austria [the "Perry" and "Industry" Reports] confirm that Leopold Bloch-Bauer was arrested by the Gestapo shortly after the Anschluss. According to these reports, his release was negotiated by the Vienna Merkurbank (later Länderbank) in return for Mrs. Leopold Bloch-Bauer and the Pick family putting their assets in Austria under 'trust administration' of the bank and contingent upon Leopold's promise to procure the transfer of a packet of his relatives' ÖZAG shares that were held, in main part, in Switzerland." The post-War Industry Report prepared by the U.S. government specifically categorized this as a transfer made under "duress."

ÖZAG was Austria's most important pre-War sugar refiner, with approximately one-fifth of the market. According to the Industry Report, the shares occasionally were traded on the Vienna stock exchange, and were quoted at about 300 to 350 Austrian Schilling, or 200 to 230 Reichsmark per share, before the Anschluss. On March 5, 1938, one week before the Anschluss, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer, together with other major shareholders, moved to keep the Nazis from gaining control of their company. Accordingly, they set up a syndicate representing 89% of the company's shares.[52] This agreement restricted the sale of shares and the manner of shareholder voting. Under the agreement, slightly over 50% of the share capital was held, on behalf of the shareholders, by the bank in the bank's name. Further shareholders were to block any shares held outside the bank at the place of their deposit, and the institutions where they were deposited were to be informed that they could be disposed only with the consent of the bank. The Syndicate participants owned 71,246 shares. Of these, 40,195 were held at the bank in Zurich in the bank's name on behalf of the members of the Syndicate.[53]

As the CRT explained in an Executive Summary of Opinion, the owners "instructed the Bank, which physically held these shares, as well as other depositories holding the remainder of their shares, that the shares subject to the Syndicate Agreement could not be sold or transferred without the consent of the Bank. Moreover, it was also explicitly provided in the Syndicate Agreement that the Bank could not give its consent to such sales or transfers without the unanimous agreement of the beneficial owners. The clear objective was to set up a barrier to [52] In 1938, of the 80,000 shares, 94.5% were held as follows: 21,665 by Loew group (Austrian, Jewish); 16,480 by the Graetz Group (part Jewish, held through a family foundation in Switzerland); 13,687 by Otto Pick (Czech, Jewish); 6,500 by Davies Lloyd group (British agents acting for Otto Pick); 12,580 by Bloch Bauer Group (Czech and Austrian, Jewish); 4,480 by Patzenhofer Group (Austrian, non-Jewish); with a remainder of 4,370 shares, of which 1,093 was widely dispersed.

[53] The ownership of these 40,195 shares was as follows: 16,480 Graetz Family Foundation, St. Gallen, Switzerland; 16,500 Sapafin AG, Chur Switzerland (Otto Pick); 7,215 Ferdinand Bloch Bauer and family members, of which 200 shares were owned by Maria Altmann. The remaining 31,051 shares owned by Syndicate members were deposited outside Switzerland; of these Ferdinand B-B owned 3,300, Gustav B-B owned 2,335 and Otto Pick owned 3,687.

enforced sale or confiscation that depended almost entirely on the mutual expectation, embodied in their Syndicate Agreement with the Bank, that the Bank could not cooperate with, or give in to, the Nazis." As the lawyer acting on behalf of the heirs of ÖZAG's major shareholders explained in a 1956 restitution proceeding, the deposit of the shares in the bank was taken as a protective measure, which later proved to be ineffective.

Immediately after the Anschluss, most of the Syndicate members fled Austria, "often after surrendering or abandoning all their possessions." The nephew of Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer and the son-in-law of Otto Pick, Leopold Bloch-Bauer, was arrested. He was held captive by the Nazis until he agreed to abandon all of his property and to help procure a transfer of ÖZAG shares to a so-called purchaser. As the CRT observed, "[c]riminal tax proceedings, supported by an audit report drafted by a self-proclaimed anti-Semite and Nazi party member, were commenced within days against the company by Nazi functionaries in an avowed effort to drive down the price of ÖZAG shares in order to enable a distress sale at a fraction of true value to a hand-picked Nazi 'purchaser,' Clemens Auer — a Cologne businessman with close ties to the Nazi party."

Thus, "[i]n a letter dated 3 December 1938, the Nazi authorities, apparently concluding that the tax proceedings would induce ÖZAG's shareholders to accept an offer at a fraction of the shares' true value, instructed the Länderbank Wien to purchase all available shares of the company and nominated Clemens Auer … and Martin Brinkmann A.G. of Hamburg as ultimate purchasers." By letter of December 20, 1938, Auer "instructed the Länderbank to acquire the shares for his account. He authorized the Länderbank to offer RM 70.00 per share or, in the event that more than 20,000 shares (25% of the total) could be obtained, RM 75.00 per share" (which of course was but a fraction of the RM 200 to 230 per share value before the Anschluss).

The bank conveyed this offer to the Syndicate members by letter dated December 22, 1938. The bank wrote: "'[W]e were unable to achieve the [required] unanimous agreement of the syndicate during the conferences on the sale, while some members of the syndicate did not find the Vienna offer worthy of discussion, other members appeared not averse [sic] to a sale in the event of an improvement of the offer.' The letter continued: 'Not only in case of these difficulties is the continuation of the syndicate hard, but also because the addresses of several members of the syndicate are no longer known. Because of these difficulties and also because the situation has changed since the foundation of the syndicate we should like to propose the syndicate be dissolved according to the decision made at the beginning of March 1938 [the date the Syndicate Agreement was concluded]. If we have not received information to the contrary by 15 January 1939 we shall assume your approval.'"

As the CRT observed, "the Bank disingenuously characterized the discussions as lacking consensus and cited this alleged lack of consensus as a basis for the dissolution of the Syndicate. In fact, there had been consensus among Syndicate members about the offer." The consensus was that the members were opposed to this offer. "More fundamentally, even if there had been no consensus, the Syndicate Agreement was designed specifically to govern those circumstances in which unanimous consent regarding the sale of shares was lacking and therefore could not be the basis for its proposed dissolution."

Nevertheless, the bank did not wait even until January 15, 1939 "before permitting the sale of Syndicate shares to Auer." Instead, the bank apparently commenced the sale on December 30, 1938. According to the Industry Report, the Nazi appointee "Clemens Auer acquired, from December 1938 to October 1939, 78,968 shares of ÖZAG (98.7 percent of the total) for RM 6.5 million, or at an average price per share of about RM 82.00." After his purchase, "Auer transformed the corporation into a sole proprietorship and renamed it Brucker Zuckerfabrik Clemens Auer ('Brucker Zucker')." The tax proceedings "were terminated once the Nazis gained control of the company."

The CRT observed that "[s]adly, the Bank did not live up to the expectations of the ÖZAG shareholders or to its legal and fiduciary commitments." The bank had "actively cooperated with the forced sale of their ÖZAG shares by unlawfully transferring those shares that were held by the Bank to a designated Nazi 'purchaser' at a small fraction of the shares' value, without obtaining the unanimous consent of the Syndicate Agreement participants."

The CRT further pointed out:

> The Bank's unilateral attempt to dissolve the Syndicate Agreement in the context of its sale of 32,980 shares without the unanimous consent of the other members > of the Syndicate clearly violated the fiduciary duties it owed to other members of the Syndicate. Moreover, by violating its contractual commitments as contained in the Syndicate Agreement, the Bank clearly violated the legal obligations it had not only as a party to the agreement, but also as a member of the Syndicate itself.

>
>
> The CRT notes that, with the Syndicate Agreement in place, the Nazis were forced to obtain the consent of the Bank in order to acquire the majority of the ÖZAG shares (which were in the Bank's name), and that the Bank could not legally grant such consent because it did not have the unanimous consent of the Syndicate members for the sales. The Nazis, typically anxious to conform to the form, if not the substance, of law in their efforts to obtain the property they desired, apparently did not want to expropriate shares in an Austrian company if the Bank would not give its consent to the transfer of the shares, as required by the Syndicate Agreement. The Bank, unilaterally and in violation of its legal and fiduciary obligations, gave its consent, or obviated the need of the Nazis to obtain its consent, thus exposing the Syndicate members to Nazi coercion that forced them to sell their shares at confiscation level prices.
> By permitting the sale of the shares absent unanimous consent of Syndicate members while the Syndicate Agreement was in force, by attempting to dissolve the Syndicate without authorization, in the context of its unauthorized and illegal sale of shares that it held in its own name on 30 December 1938, thus breaking the Syndicate, the Bank facilitated the confiscation and/or sale of the remaining ÖZAG shares, and by violating its contractual commitments as contained in the Syndicate Agreement, the Bank clearly placed its business interests with Nazi Germany ahead of the interests of the Syndicate members and clearly violated the fiduciary duties and legal obligations it owed to the ÖZAG shareholders.

The CRT awarded the value of the 33,037 ÖZAG shares owned by the Bloch-Bauer and Otto Pick groups that were lost, due to the bank's breach of the agreement. These shares were calculated at their market value on the date that the bank had violated the terms of the Syndicate Agreement, "less any sums received by the Claimant [and other heirs] in connection with the shares."[54]

In assessing the amount of the award, the CRT explained that it had considered "two measures of liability, both of which reach the same result. One measure of liability views the Bank as an aider and abettor of the Nazis' unlawful activities in forcing a distress sale of the [54] In a subsequent decision, the CRT awarded the value of the Graetz family shares to the heirs of those account owners.

ÖZAG shares to a hand-picked 'aryan' purchaser at a fraction of their true value. Under such a measure of liability, the Bank, as an aider and abettor, is jointly and severally liable to the sellers for the unjust enrichment obtained by the Nazi 'purchaser' in being able to acquire the shares at a fraction of their value. The measure of damages under such a theory is the difference between the true value of the shares and the compensation actually received by the sellers. The shares' true value is appropriately measured by an average of the most recent pre-Anschluss sales." The "second measure of liability is based on the Bank's actions in making unauthorized sales of shares and in otherwise unlawfully undermining the Syndicate Agreement as a breach of contract and fiduciary duty owed to the members of the Syndicate. Under such a theory, the Bank is liable to the sellers for damages caused by the breach of contract, measured by the difference between the price actually received and the true price that should have been received if the Syndicate Agreement had not been breached by the Bank (the true market value, calculated without regard to the discriminatory tax proceedings)."

Under either theory of liability, the CRT would have reached the same result: "the true value of the ÖZAG shares, measured by the most recent pre-Anschluss sale price of ÖZAG shares as certified by the Vienna stock exchange without regard to the discriminatory post-Anschluss Nazi market manipulations, less any amounts received by the sellers in connection with the post-war Austrian restitution proceedings."

The CRT observed more generally that the award, although "unique in its size," was "unfortunately, representative of several general findings by the CRT":

> First, this Award is merely a striking example of the widespread betrayal of Jewish clients by Swiss banks. Having marketed themselves to the Jews of Europe as a safe haven for their property, Swiss banks repeatedly turned Jewish-owned property over to Nazis in order to curry favor with them. Second, this Award is striking in that no record of the rise and fall of the ÖZAG Syndicate was found in the Bank's records. Rather, the documents upon which this Award is based were submitted by the Claimant and/or obtained by the CRT from archival sources. We will never know how many other examples of betrayal were buried in the records of the 2,757,950 accounts (of the 6,858,116 opened in Swiss Banks between 1933-45) the Banks concede they have destroyed completely or would have been found in the remaining accounts for which only fragmentary records survive. Third, this case reflects the strategies used by Nazis to seize control of Jewish property, ranging from outright theft to sophisticated distress sales orchestrated by compliant tax officials and faithless banks and disguised by the veneer of "law." Finally, the Award reflects the special difficulties faced by Austrian Jews in seeking restitution. It is enough to note that the representative of Austria overseeing the restitution proceedings regarding ÖZAG in 1956 was himself a member of the Nazi party and had worked in the office responsible for the confiscation of Jewish assets beginning in 1938.

xxiii. In re Accounts of Dr. Heinrich Oppenheimer (SF 507,750.00)

Dr. Heinrich Oppenheimer was born in 1896 in Germany. He was an attorney who lived in Hamburg from 1921 through 1936. He was arrested in November 1936 and imprisoned until September 1939. The claimant, Heinrich Oppenheimer's son, advised the CRT that his father was forced to turn over his property to Nazi officials in 1939 or 1940. Dr. Oppenheimer's wife fled to the U.S. in 1939, and upon his release from prison, Dr. Oppenheimer joined her.

The bank records showed that Dr. Heinrich Oppenheimer owned two custody accounts, both of which were closed by an unknown entity in April 1937. The CRT awarded the two accounts at presumptive value, since the accounts were closed during the period when the account owner was imprisoned by the Nazis. Even if he had "agreed" to the release his funds, he would have been acting under duress.

xxiv. In re Accounts of Josef and Hilda Palugyay (SF 289,087.50)

Josef Palugyay was born in 1890 in Presburg, Czechoslovakia, and his wife Hilda was born in 1892. They resided in Vienna, where Josef Palugyay was a medical doctor. Josef Palugyay was not Jewish but his wife Hilda was, and the claimant (their nephew) advised the CRT that the Palugyays were persecuted because of his aunt's religion.

The bank records consisted of a March 17, 1938 letter from the Zurich branch of the bank to the bank's executive board in Basel. As described by the CRT, the bank "indicat[ed] that it would soon complete a list of over 1,000 custody accounts belonging to Austrian clients, as well as a copy of the Swiss federal legislation relating to foreign exchange transactions with Austria as of 23 March 1938. Also included in the Bank's records is a list of accounts transferred to German or Austrian banks in 1938." The records showed that the account owners were Prof. Dr. Josef Palugyay and Frau Hilda Palugyay of Vienna, and that they owned a custody account and a demand deposit account. The bank records indicated that the accounts were transferred on April 1, 1938 to the Österreichische Creditanstalt-Wiener Bankverein in Vienna. The custody account held SF 5,325 on the date of transfer, while the demand deposit account held SF 1,332.50.

The CRT awarded both accounts to the owners' nephew. The accounts had been paid to a Nazi-controlled bank, and the proceeds would not have been at the free disposition of the account owners. Both accounts evidenced recorded values below presumptive values and so the accounts were paid at higher amounts; i.e., at their respective presumptive values.

xxv. In re Accounts of Rudolf Pollak (SF 353,302.75)

Rudolf Pollak was born in 1864 to the prominent Borkenau-Pollak family of Vienna. The CRT's research indicated that one member of the family, Moriz Pollak, Ritter von Borkenau, was an Austrian financier. He was sent by the city of Vienna as a delegate to the coronation of the King of Hungary in 1867. He was made chairman of the executive committee of the Vienna Exposition in 1873, for which he received from the Austrian emperor the title "Von Borkenau." He served as a bank examiner and director-general from 1885 to 1889, and as an examiner of the Austro-Hungarian bank. He "took a very active part in the affairs of the Jewish community." He was also a lawyer and university professor in Vienna. In 1896, according to the claimant (Rudolf Pollak's grandson), Rudolf Pollak converted to Roman Catholicism, but under the Nuremberg laws, the Nazi authorities considered him to be Jewish. He died in Vienna in February 1939. His wife was deported to Theresienstadt in July 1942 and died there in July 1944.

The bank records showed that Prof. Dr. Rudolf Pollak of Vienna held one demand deposit account, which was closed on March 30, 1938, and one custody account, which was closed on December 22, 1938. Following the CRT's receipt of additional records through the "voluntary assistance" process, the CRT determined that Rudolf Pollak's custody account held ten different securities.

The CRT also examined 1938 Census, which revealed that Rudolf Pollak held securities (a total of sixteen), which the CRT observed "very closely approximate, but do not exactly mirror, the securities listed in the Bank's records." The Census file also contained letters from the Office in the Ministry for Economics and Labor charged with registering and administering Jewish-owned property. These letters informed Dr. Rudolf Pollak that all foreign assets, including securities, needed to be transferred to the Reichsbank (August 1938), and demanded the proceeds from the required sale of securities (November 27, 1938). A letter from Dr. Rudolf Pollak confirmed that the securities were sold as of October 27, 1938 and the proceeds turned over to the Reichsbank. In an undated letter, as well as a November 28, 1938 letter, Dr. Pollak listed the securities he had sold.

The assets listed in the 1938 Census (but not expressly indicated in the Census as having been deposited in a Swiss account) approximated the assets set forth in the bank records that the CRT obtained through the "voluntary assistance" process. In light of the fact that these assets were seized by the Nazis, and given that Dr. Pollak lived under Nazi rule, and his wife was killed in Theresienstadt, the CRT awarded the accounts to the grandson of Dr. Pollak. Upon application of Dr. Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT determined that the custody account held assets worth SF 25,967.22. With the demand deposit account (awarded at presumptive value since the actual value was unknown), and upon application of the 12.5 multiplier, the claimant was awarded a total of SF 351,340.25.[55]

xxvi. In re Account of Jules Roos N.V. (SF 49,375.00)

Jules Roos N.V. was an Amsterdam bank wholly owned by Jules Roos, who was born in 1882 or 1883 in Chemnitz, Saxony, Germany, and who lived in Amsterdam. The claimants were, respectively, the daughter of Jules Roos, and her nephew, Jules Roos' grandson (who had filed an Initial Questionnaire but not a claim form). They advised that in August 1939, anticipating Nazi persecution, Jules Roos abandoned his business and home and emigrated to Montreal. He died in 1968 in Lima, Peru.

The bank records showed that the Amsterdam bank Jules Roos N.V. held a custody account which was closed on April 30, 1940, as well as a second account of unknown type, which was closed as of July 28, 1942.

After the company was aryanized, the accounts became a subject of some discussion within the bank. As described by the CRT, "[a]ccording to a letter from the Account Owner to the Bank, dated 4 May 1942, Jules Roos N.V. was placed under a Nazi administrator, Herr (Mr.) Heinrich G. Fousek, by order of the Reichskommissar … for the occupied Dutch territories. The firm's letter advised the Bank of this fact and notified it that the administrator's signature was being added to the set of joint signatures required for account dispositions on file at the Bank. In an internal Bank memorandum, dated 5 May 1942, the Bank noted that Jules Roos had left for America before the War and that the firm no longer was listed as a member of the Dutch Stock Exchange."

The bank memorandum also observed that the account owner had advised the bank that the Nazi-appointed administrator Heinrich F. Fousek "now supposedly was authorized to sign on the company's behalf" together with another individual, a Miss Bierlee. "The memorandum concludes that the Bank could not recognize Mr. Fousek's authority, not only because of the general principle that Dutch war-time regulations were not applicable in Switzerland, but also because the 4 May 1942 letter contained only the signature" of one of two individuals supposedly authorized to sign on the company's behalf, based on a July 31, 1939 letter sent to the bank by the company, and so "therefore Mr. Fousek's signature was irrelevant in Switzerland."

On May 11, 1942 (a week after the company's May 4, 1942 letter to the bank), the bank wrote to its main office in Basel that it had "received notice from Jules Roos N.V. that it had been placed under the authority of an administrator. Before responding in the 'usual manner' …, the Bank requested the main office to inform it whether liabilities existed in other branches of the Bank against the SF 15.00 credit balance in the account." The following day, the main office responded that there were no liabilities against Jules Roos N.V.

On May 15, 1942, the bank wrote to the company "requesting a copy of the commercial register reflecting the changes in signatory power." At the same time, the bank froze existing deposits, ordered that no further deposits from the firm be accepted, and asked that communication be directed to the bank's legal department. On June 24, 1942, the company sent the bank the requested information from the commercial register, "reflecting the addition of the names of three Germans," including Fousek. A July 28, 1942 bank memorandum indicated that the signatures in the commercial register were not in order, but that the bank would not pursue the matter because the account's value was only SF 15.00.

The CRT awarded the account of unknown type at presumptive value to the daughter and grandson of Jules Roos, observing that "the account remained open after the closure of the custody account and was still open as of 3 June 1942. The CRT notes that at this time, Jules Roos N.V. was under the authority of a Nazi-appointed administrator and that, although the Bank did not fully recognize the right of this administrator to dispose over the account, it had agreed internally to honor the requests of the administrator to dispose of the account since the account had a low balance of SF 15.00."

xxvii. In re Accounts of Walter Rosenbaum (SF 381,572.75)

Dr. Walter Rosenbaum was born in 1889 in Poland. He lived in Vienna, where he was a lawyer. He fled Vienna for Holland with his family. He returned to Vienna in 1946, where he died in 2002. His birth was recorded in a registry of Jewish births. His marriage and death certificates indicated that he was Protestant and he and his wife declared that they were Protestant. However, Walter Rosenbaum was forced to file a 1938 Census form, and to pay flight and atonement taxes. The 1938 Census further reflected that he was forced to sell securities in 1938. In 1939, Nazi authorities wrote to him at a hotel in Holland to order him to "offer" to sell his remaining foreign currency to the Vienna branch of the Reichsbank.

The bank records showed that Dr. Walter Rosenbaum held a custody account closed on March 22, 1939, and a demand deposit account closed on March 31, 1939. The CRT awarded the accounts at presumptive value to the claimant, Dr. Rosenbaum's daughter-in-law. The CRT noted that "the accounts were closed … after the Account Owner fled Austria for Holland" and when he was "outside Nazi-dominated territory." However, "given that the Bank's record does not indicate to whom the accounts were closed, that the Account Owner fled his country of origin due to Nazi persecution; that his 1938 Census file demonstrate[s] that the Account Owner was required to register his assets to Nazi authorities, and that these authorities were aware of his address in Holland; that the Account Owner may have had relatives remaining in his country of origin and that he may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts to ensure their safety," it was "plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to the Account Owner or his heirs."

After the award had been issued, following the CRT's ongoing request for "voluntary assistance," the bank provided the CRT with other documents demonstrating that the custody account had held six different securities at the time it was closed. Several of the securities were transferred into account number 2269. The CRT observed that the "Bank's records do not indicate who owned account 2269… and that this account appears as the transfer destination for other, unrelated accounts. Even if account 2269 was held in part or in whole by the Account Owner, the records do not indicate when the account was closed, or the disposition of the securities contained within it. Accordingly, the CRT concludes that the Account Owner did not receive these securities or their proceeds."[56]

Based upon Dr. Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT determined that the market value of the assets held in the account was SF 190,360.25 greater than the amount originally awarded utilizing presumptive values. The CRT therefore recommended, and the Court approved, an additional payment to Dr. Rosenbaum's daughter-in-law.

xxviii. In re Account of Simon Rosenstein (SF 260,375.00)

Simon Rosenstein was born in 1872 and lived in Vienna. He was an employee of the Kuffner company.[57] Simon Rosenstein and his wife Elfriede were killed in concentration camps. The claimant, the Rosensteins' grandson, fled Vienna in 1938 with his sister as part of a Kindertransport.

The bank's records indicated that Simon Rosenstein owned a custody account opened in 1937. The records also "consist of an extract from a list of custody accounts belonging to clients domiciled in Austria that were closed; a letter dated 17 March 1938 from the Zurich branch of the Bank to the Bank's Head Office in Basel concerning a request to the branch to provide both a list of its liabilities to Austrian clients and the value of … securities it held on their behalf as well as a copy of an extract of the Austrian law gazette dated 23 March 1938 containing the … Austrian foreign currency law." The records showed that the account was closed on October 18, 1938 and the balance was transferred on October 20, 1938 to the Nazi-controlled Länderbank Wien A.G. in Vienna.

Based on the fact that the account was transferred to a Nazi bank, the CRT awarded the presumptive value of a custody account to Simon Rosenstein's grandson, and to other grandchildren whom the claimant represented.

xxix. In re Accounts of Julian Schachian and Siegfried Schachian (SF 841,550.00)

Julian Schachian was born in 1880 in Berlin, Germany. He was an attorney with the title of Doctor of Law. He was deported to Riga, and he perished in 1942.

Siegfried Schachian, the brother of Julian Schachian, was born in 1876 in Berlin, Germany. Siegfried Schachian was deported to Theresienstadt in 1942. He subsequently was sent further east, where he perished in 1944. Their niece claimed their accounts.

The bank records showed that Dr. Julian Schachian was a lawyer and notary, and that he held a custody account opened on January 19, 1930, as well as a demand deposit account. The claimant, who at the time of the award was 91 years old, apparently did not remember (because she did not mention in her claim form) that in 1933, at the age of 26, she herself personally had visited the bank on behalf of her uncles. The bank records, however, did record the fact of this visit. These files included, among other documentation, the claimant's calling card. On July 4, 1933, the claimant met with a bank representative, and instructed the bank no longer to send account statements and correspondence to her uncle, Julian Schachian. She told the bank that her uncle also would destroy any account information that he held at his home.

Nevertheless, despite the entreaties of the claimant, Dr. Schachian's niece, on December 22, 1936, the Swiss bank transferred the assets in Dr. Julian Schachian's custody account (with a market value of SF 41,900) to an account belonging to the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft in Berlin. That transfer was made following an order issued by the Reich in November 1936, requiring that the German owners of foreign securities held abroad deposit those securities in a custody account belonging to a German bank. The account was closed on December 19, 1938.

With respect to the claimant's other uncle, Siegfried Schachian, the bank records showed that he held the title of Dipl. Ing. (Engineer) and owned custody and demand deposit accounts. As with his brother, the Swiss bank transferred the securities in his custody account (with a December 22, 1936 market value of SF 6,300.00) to an account belonging to the Deutsche Bank und Disconto-Gesellschaft in Berlin. The account was closed on September 30, 1938.

Given that the bank transferred the accounts to the Nazis, and that there either was no information about the values of the accounts (or, in the case of Siegfried Schachian's custody account, its known value was lower than presumptive value), the CRT awarded the accounts to the brothers' 91-year-old niece at the accounts' respective presumptive values.

xxx. In re Account of Robert Schwarzkopf (SF 47,400.00)

Robert Schwarzkopf was born in 1889 in Iglau, Czechoslovakia. He lived in Vienna with his wife Selma, and their daughter and son (the claimant). Robert Schwarzkopf was a banker. He fled to England in 1940, and later immigrated to the United States with his family. He and his wife died in New York, respectively, in 1981 and 1998.

The bank records indicated that Robert Schwarzkopf held an account of unknown type, which was transferred and closed on March 30, 1938 to an unknown entity. Records from the 1938 Census included a report filed by the Vienna police regarding a search of the office and apartment of Robert and Selma Schwarzkopf, which as described by the CRT "was carried out by the police on 12 March 1938, for assets to be reported. Among the items discovered in the search were … Swiss Franc-denominated City of Vienna bonds with a par value of 18,000.00 Swiss Francs, which were confiscated by the police."

The CRT awarded Robert Schwarzkopf's son an account of unknown type at presumptive value, observing that "coincident with the Anschluss on March 12, 1938, the Nazis initiated a concerted plan to seize and confiscate the wealth of Austrian Jews. In pursuance of this plan, the search of the Account Owner's office and apartment took place on 12 March 1938, together with the seizure of his financial assets. His Swiss account was closed 18 days later on 30 March 1938." Based on these facts, it was plausible that the Swiss account was closed improperly.

xxxi. In re Accounts of Bruno Spiro (SF 289,087.50)

Bruno Spiro was born in 1875. He lived in Hamburg with his family, where he was a weapons dealer. He died in a concentration camp.

The ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Bruno Spiro. However, the CRT located documents relating to the account in the archives of the City of Hamburg. Thereafter, the CRT requested "voluntary assistance" from the banks, and subsequently received records confirming that Bruno Spiro did, in fact, hold accounts with a Swiss bank: a custody account (closed on September 25, 1937) and a demand deposit account (closed on October 23, [58] Bruno Spiro supplied weapons to the Ulster Unionist Council, which sought to form an army to oppose British rule over Ireland. See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Larne_gun-running. "The Council approached Major Frederick H. Crawford to act as its agent to purchase the guns needed to equip such an organisation...Crawford secured the services of the SS Fanny to transport 216 tons of guns and ammunition which he had purchased from Benny Spiro, an arms dealer in Hamburg." Id.

1937). The account was noted on an unknown date as being owned by "Bruno Spiro's heirs," thus indicating that the bank had been notified that the account owner had died. The account thereafter was published on the 2005 List[59] and claimed by Bruno Spiro's heirs.

As to the archival records the CRT had located from the City of Hamburg, these documents showed that Bruno Spiro had been prosecuted for tax fraud, "treason to the German people," and "impermissible possession and sale of securities." The records indicated that Mr. Spiro was an arms dealer and a member of a "'society of international Jewish arms dealers'" who sold machine guns, rifles, and other weapons to groups in Palestine and in Czechoslovakia. He was arrested by the Gestapo in July 1936 for arms smuggling. During its investigation, the Gestapo learned that Bruno Spiro had owned securities held in a bank in Lucerne. He had sold these securities between 1933 and 1934 for his own business in Switzerland, rather than repatriating the proceeds to Germany.

The archival records showed that Bruno Spiro committed suicide on September 29, 1936, while imprisoned in the concentration camp at Fuhlsbüttel near Hamburg. The records also contained a decision from the Hamburg District Court denying the request of the state solicitor's office to seize funds from Bruno Spiro's German bank account to offset the value of the foreign-held securities. The court ruled that the seizure would negatively impact Mrs. Spiro, who did not appear implicated in her husband's business affairs.

The CRT concluded that although Bruno Spiro or his heirs did receive the proceeds of the securities held in the bank in Lucerne, "the archival records do not indicate that all securities in the custody account were sold by 1934. In fact, … the custody account and demand deposit account were not closed until 25 September 1937 and 23 October 1937," approximately one year after Bruno Spiro had died in the Fuhlsbüttel concentration camp (in September 1936). Based on [59] Of the approximately 36,000 accounts that the Volcker Committee determined had "probably" or "possibly" belonged to Holocaust victims, Swiss banking authorities authorized publication of approximately 21,000 names (i.e., the "probable" victim accounts). This list was published on the internet on February 5, 2001, as directed by the Court's Order of December 8, 2000, as amended (the "2001 List"). On January 13, 2005, following ongoing litigation with the Swiss bank defendants, the CRT published an additional list of names of approximately 2,700 account owners and 400 power of attorney holders of Swiss bank accounts whose owners were probably or possibly Victims of Nazi persecution. See http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents_New/Glossary.pdf ("2001 List" and "2005 List").

the fact that "Nazi authorities were aware that the Account Owner held assets at the Bank," the CRT awarded the claimants the presumptive value of these accounts.

xxxii. In re Accounts of Emil Taub (SF 271,125.00)

Emil (Michael) Taub was born in 1885 in Vienna, where he lived with his wife Hermine and their two children, the claimant and his twin brother, until the Anschluss. The family fled to Palestine (now Israel) in October 1938. Emil Taub died in Israel in 1975, and his wife died there in 1993. Their son, the claimant's twin, was killed in the Sinai during the Yom Kippur War, on October 19, 1973.

The bank records showed that Emil Taub, who held the honorary title Baurat (for distinguished engineers in Austria), owned a custody account and a savings/passbook account. Both accounts were opened on March 24, 1930, and both were closed on March 31, 1939. Hermine Taub held power of attorney over the accounts. As of March 30, 1938, all correspondence was to be withheld by the bank. The bank later was instructed to send all correspondence to an address in Tel Aviv, care of Leo Saphir, who resided in Gedera.

In addition to the bank files, the CRT also reviewed 1938 Census for Emil Taub and Hermine Taub. The Census records showed that the Taubs' house was valued by an "Aryan appraiser" and sold under the terms of a January 23, 1939 contract, by which time the family had fled to Palestine. The Office in the Ministry for Economics and Labor charged with administering Jewish-owned property, the Vermögensverkehrstelle (VVSt.), approved the sale, "but insisted that the proceeds of the sale of the house would be placed in a blocked account in Austria that could only be accessed with the permission of the VVSt. The records further include an internal VVSt. memorandum" dated March 7, 1939, in which the author asked for information "regarding all remaining assets belonging to Emil and Hermine Taub, who had emigrated to Gedera" in Palestine.

The CRT awarded the accounts to the Taubs' son at presumptive value. The CRT observed that although the accounts were closed when Emil Taub was outside Nazi territory, there was no indication in the bank records as to who had closed the accounts. The CRT noted that the Account Owner may have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over accounts to ensure the safety of relatives who remained behind. Further, the "Austrian Census records indicate that the Nazi authorities blocked the proceeds of the sale of the Account Owner's house," and "inquired regarding any remaining assets that he held following his flight to Palestine." The CRT concluded that it was plausible that the Swiss bank accounts were among these assets.

xxxiii. In re Accounts of Hermann Tietz & Co., Georg Tietz, Martin Tietz and Grundwert Aktiengesellschaft Kaiserdamm (SF 1,156,350.00); In re Account of Georg Tietz (SF 47,400.00)

Georg Tietz was born in 1889 in Gera, Germany. He lived with his wife and two children (the claimants) in Berlin. The Tietzes fled Germany in 1937, first to Liechtenstein; then to Luzern, Switzerland (1938); then to London (1939); then to Havana, Cuba (1940); and finally to New York. Georg Tietz died in Munich in 1953, and his wife died in New York in 1984. In its initial decision, In re Account of Georg Tietz, the CRT observed that Georg Tietz had co-owned a chain of German department stores. In a subsequent decision, the CRT further described the well-known Tietz chain of stores; the persecution its owners suffered at the hands of the Nazis; and the specific attention given to the company by Hitler himself.

With respect to the accounts owned by Georg Tietz personally, the bank records made available as a result of the ICEP audit indicated that the account owner resided in Berlin, and that he later moved to Havana. He owned an account of unknown type opened on September 9, 1931, which remained open and dormant. As of June 1998, the account held a balance of SF 1,260. Because the account had not been repaid to its owners but instead remained open, and since the recorded balance was lower than presumptive value, Georg Tietz's children were awarded the presumptive value for an account of unknown type.

Subsequently, the CRT located several additional accounts belonging to Georg Tietz, other relatives, and their businesses. Expanding upon the data that had been provided to the CRT by the children of Georg Tietz, the CRT observed that a "significant amount of available public information regarding the Hermann Tietz department store exists. The Hermann Tietz company was founded in 1882 by members of the Tietz family, who opened a small store in Gera, Germany. The company grew quickly in size, with further Herman Tietz stores opening with ten years in Weimar, Karlsruhe, Munich and Hamburg." As the CRT explained, in 1899, "the company opened its first department store (Warenhaus) in Berlin. The company continued to expand, and in 1927, it acquired rival department store Kaufhaus des Westens, also known as KaDeWe."[60]

Now the enterprises with the highest sales were Karstadt and Hermann Tietz (which had been founded by Oscar Tietz with the financial backing of his uncle Hermann Tietz), followed by Leonhard Tietz, Wertheim, and Schocken"). As described by the CRT, when the Nazis came to power in 1933, the company "was suffering financial losses caused by the recession and high unemployment in the country," and thus "required a substantial loan. The Nazi financial authorities seized their chance to assume some measure of control of the company. The consortium of banks (including Deutsche Bank and Dresdner Bank) to which the company applied for the credit consulted with Reich Economic Minister Kurt Schmitt for advice regarding the granting of the credit; Schmitt, in turn, felt that the decision whether to grant the credit to the Jewish-owned company, and thereby to prolong its existence, was too great for him to make alone. Hermann Tietz employed over ten thousand Germans in 1933, and consequently, in the Nazi regime's view, to allow the company to fall into bankruptcy was not a desirable solution from an economic perspective. Schmitt, new in his post, therefore sought Adolf Hitler's personal approval of the credit arrangements. Hitler ultimately gave his approval based on purely economic grounds."

However, the "credit guarantee was not granted without significant conditions… In July 1933, the creditor banks formed a second company, Hertie Waren und Kaufhaus GmbH, which would subsequently participate in the management of Hermann Tietz. The Nazi financial officials appointed Georg Karg, previously the director of textile purchasing for Hermann Tietz, and Helmut Friedel," neither of whom was Jewish, as Hertie's representatives. Georg and Martin Tietz initially were allowed to retain their management roles but were "forced to take personal liability." Their third partner, a brother-in-law, was forced to leave the company.

However, in mid-1934, after the company was audited, the two Tietz brothers were compelled to resign as well, although not before being forced to offer their shares in the company — valued at RM 24 million — for one-third of that value, RM 8 million. After additional charges were filed against them, Georg and Martin Tietz were supposed to receive a payment of RM 800,000. As the CRT noted, however, "the two brothers were not permitted to take any of this amount with them when both of them fled Germany in subsequent years."[61] They were left with nothing.

In its Final Report, the Bergier Commission pointed out that Swiss banks were well aware of the precarious position in which the Nazi regime had placed the Tietz company: "In view of the 'politicisation of the economy,' the directors of Credit Suisse were no longer entirely confident about the future prospects of Jewish companies. They tended more to concern themselves with loans already granted to such firms, in particular with some of the department-stores which were being badly harassed by the Nazis, such as Leonhard Tietz AG and Rudolph Karstadt AG."[62] [61] Ladwig-Winters (at 256-57) observed that "liquidation of Hermann Tietz was out of the question on account of the 14,000 jobs that would thus have been eliminated, but also in light of the further consequences for industrial and agricultural suppliers and — above all — for the creditor banks. Hitler had no alternative but to assent to the loan that assured the company's continued existence." However, as the CRT pointed out, salvaging the company as an ongoing concern did not benefit its owners at all; they were instead "forced out in 1934 after a lengthy audit …. From now on the stores were known under the name Hertie, which ingeniously kept the link to their founder's name while at the same time advertising to everyone that the business had been placed on a new footing; Leonard Tietz's stores were renamed with the neutral-sounding title of Kaufhof, or 'shopping court.'" The campaign against the Tietz family and their department stores was recounted contemporaneously in the New York Times. See, e.g., Nazi Raids Causing Financial Uneasiness, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 10, 1934 ("Three big Berlin department stores formerly belonging to the brothers Tietz, Jewish merchant princes, reopened after a reorganization today with only 'Christian' clerks. The stores were recently sold by the Tietz chain. Their new name is Union Limited, and, it was explained, the capital is 'purely Christian.' The dissolution of the Tietz chain, the largest in Germany, is continuing…. What remains of the chain is only nominally in the hands of the Tietz family").

With the exception of the account owned by Georg Tietz, bank records of the Tietz individual and corporate accounts were not included in the "Accounts History Database" (AHD) created as part of the ICEP audit. Rather, the accounts were located in the "Total Accounts Database" (TAD), to which the CRT had only limited access, on a case-by-case basis and under restricted terms. In the TAD, the CRT located accounts belonging to Hermann Tietz; Georg Tietz; Martin Tietz; and Grundwert and Hermann Tietz.

Hermann Tietz: The Hermann Tietz accounts consisted of a custody account numbered 4996 (to which assets from another custody account had been transferred after July 17, 1933); a foreign currency demand deposit account in Reichsmark; and a demand deposit account in Swiss Francs. The bank records indicated that although correspondence for the accounts had been directed to a Dr. Konrad Bloch in Zurich, as of November 6, 1933, the bank's legal department had ordered that correspondence instead be sent to an address in Berlin.[63] The bank records

[63] Dr. Bloch acted for a number of other Jewish account holders, as evidenced in several claims. See, e.g., In re Account of Dr. Paul Karplus; In re Assets of Gertrude Löw and Marianne Hamburger-Löw; In re Account of referenced a "blocked" account, and further indicated that any correspondence from the bank's securities department first needed to be reviewed by Dr. Erny of the bank's legal department.

Georg Tietz: The accounts owned by Georg Tietz consisted of a custody account numbered 33457, and a demand deposit account. A notation dated November 6, 1933 indicated that according to instructions from Dr. Erny, as described by the CRT, "all correspondence related to Georg Tietz's custody account and demand deposit account should indicate [his] personal address [in Berlin] but be sent to lawyer Dr. Konrad Bloch" in Zurich. The two accounts were closed on November 20, 1934.

Martin Tietz: Like his brother Georg, Martin Tietz also owned a custody account and a demand deposit account at the bank. The records contained instructions similar to Dr. Erny's direction that correspondence should reflect Martin Tietz's personal address in Berlin, but should be sent to Dr. Konrad Bloch in Zurich. The two accounts, as true for those owned by Georg Tietz, were closed on November 20, 1934.

Grundwert Aktiengesellschaft Kaiserdamm and Firma Herman Tietz & Co: The CRT located a custody account owned jointly by the businesses Grundwert Aktiengesellschaft Kaiserdamm and Firma Herman Tietz & Co., which were located at the same address in Berlin. The joint account was closed on December 21, 1934.

The CRT awarded all of the accounts, at their respective presumptive values, to the claimants, the children of Georg Tietz, and the niece and nephew of Martin Tietz. The CRT observed that all of the accounts had been "closed between November and December 1934…. According to research conducted by the CRT, the accounts were closed after Georg and Martin Tietz were forced to resign from Hermann Tietz in mid-1934 and after Georg Karg assumed the leadership of the company with the permission of the creditor banks." Georg Tietz had "remained in Germany until 1937, and would not have been able to repatriate his accounts to Germany without losing ultimate control over their proceeds." The Hermann Tietz store was aryanized by the Nazi regime in 1933 and 1934. Its Jewish owners were forced to resign in mid-1934 and to sell their shares "at a substantial loss." Thus, it was "plausible that the account proceeds were not paid" to the owners or their heirs.

xxxiv. In re Account of Elsa Turmann (SF 260,375.00)

Elsa Turmann was born in 1892. She lived in Vienna with her husband, Heinrich. They had no children. On May 15, 1942, the Turmanns were deported to Izbica, Poland. According to the claimant, their great-nephew, they were never heard from again.

The bank records, which were not included in the AHD but rather were contained in the TAD, showed that Elsa Turmann was married to Dr. Heinrich Turmann, and that she resided in Vienna, Austria and Walkerburn, Scotland. Elsa Turmann owned a custody account, which was opened in January, 1937 and closed on August 5, 1938.

The CRT also located records for Dr. Heinrich Turmann in the 1938 Census, which included an August 10, 1938 form letter from the Office in the Ministry for Economics and Labor charged with administering Jewish-owned property. The letter compelled Dr. Turmann to offer his foreign securities for sale to the Vienna branch of the Central Bank of the Reich ("Reichsbankstelle").

The CRT awarded the Turmann's great-nephew the presumptive value of the custody account, observing that Elsa Turmann had "resided in Nazi-controlled Austria and was subsequently deported to Izbica," and "there [was] no record of the payment of the … account to her."

xxxv. In re Account of Ernst Victor (SF 364,872.62)

Ernst Victor lived in the Altona district of Hamburg, Germany with his non-Jewish wife and their children. In 1936, the Nazis forced Ernst Victor (who held the designation Dipl. Ing.) to sell his family company, Regenhardt AG. He sought refuge in Zurich in 1938, but was denied entry. Hoping to save his family from further persecution, he committed suicide in December 1938.

The bank records showed that Ernst Victor of Altona, Dipl. Ing., owned a custody account and a demand deposit account, both opened in 1929. The demand deposit account was closed on June 20, 1935, and the custody account was closed on December 9, 1936. The CRT determined in an initial decision that it was plausible that Ernst Victor had not received the proceeds of the custody account. The CRT noted that when the account was closed in 1936, Nazi legislation would have compelled owners of foreign custody accounts to repatriate those accounts. In addition, Ernst Victor's company had been subject to forced sale that same year. The CRT awarded the account to Ernst Victor's grandchildren at the presumptive value then in effect. The CRT held in abeyance a decision on the demand deposit account.

Subsequently, in a separate decision, the CRT awarded the demand deposit account to the same claimants. The CRT relied upon its presumptions relating to the inability of an account owner to receive his account proceeds in Germany in the period prior to 1938, when Ernst Victor had committed suicide due to Nazi persecution.

Thereafter, in response to the CRT's ongoing request to the banks for "voluntary assistance," the CRT received information that revealed the actual values of the assets that Ernst Victor had held in his custody account. These documents indicated that some of the assets were transferred into an account with the number 21637. "[E]ven if this account were owned by"

Ernst Victor," the records did not indicate when the account was closed, or the disposition of the securities contained within it. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that the account owner did not receive these securities or their proceeds. Thus, the additional value of the securities, SF 185,455.12, was awarded to the grandchildren of Ernst Victor.

xxxvi. In re Accounts of Alfred Wolff (SF 64,597.50)

Alfred Wolff was born in 1875 in Berlin, where he lived with his wife and child (the claimant). Alfred Wolff was a medical doctor whose practice was boycotted after 1933. In 1934, the Nazis arrested him. He died in Berlin in 1935.

The bank records indicated that Alfred Wolff owned a safe deposit box opened in November 1931 and closed on May 26, 1934, and a demand deposit account opened in March 1922 and closed on May 31, 1934.

The CRT awarded the accounts at their respective presumptive values, observing that Alfred Wolff "was arrested in 1934, the same year in which his Swiss account was closed, exposing him to the coerced disclosure and confiscation of his assets including those located abroad."

xxxvii. In re Account of Fritz Wolff (SF 257,968.75)

Fritz Heinrich Wolff was born in 1891 in Berlin, where he lived with his wife and worked as an engineer. He was arrested and incarcerated four times between 1933 and 1943. In March 1943, he was deported to Auschwitz, and was killed shortly after his arrival.

The bank records showed that Fritz Wolff owned a custody account which was opened on March 22, 1933 and closed on February 23, 1934.

The CRT awarded the account to the nieces and nephews of Fritz Wolff at the presumptive value for a custody account. Fritz Wolff had been "arrested and incarcerated by the Nazis four times between 1933 and 1943," thus "exposing him to the coerced disclosure and confiscation of his assets including those located abroad." Further, Fritz Wolff had remained in Germany until his 1943 deportation to Auschwitz, and so "he would not have been able to repatriate his account to Germany during this period without its confiscation."

Subsequently, as a result of the CRT's request for "voluntary assistance," the bank made available to the CRT additional records indicating the type and value of the security that was held in Fritz Wolff's custody account. Based upon application of Special Master Junz' Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT awarded an additional sum representing the difference between the market value and the presumptive value originally awarded.

2. Accounts Transferred Under Duress With Evidence of Post-War Misinformation

i. In re Accounts of Hedwig Bendix (SF 183,780.00)

Hedwig Bendix was born in 1895 in Berlin. She moved to Qualisch B/Trutnov, Czechoslovakia, where she lived with her daughter and her husband, who owned a business (Julius Bendix & Söhne). The claimant, the Bendix' niece, advised the CRT that Hedwig Bendix and her family were deported to the Lodz Ghetto. They were killed either in Lodz or in Theresienstadt.

The bank records indicated that Hedwig Bendix owned a demand deposit account which held SF 7,415. It was closed on February 28, 1939 "and transferred, per request of a letter, dated 20 February 1939, via Berlin, to the Reichsbank." Hedwig Bendix also owned two accounts of unknown type, one closed on July 29, 1939, and the other in 1945.

According to the bank records, on November 23, 1945, Hedwig Bendix' son wrote to the bank to inquire about his parents' assets, emphasizing that both parents had been killed in a concentration camp during World War II. The bank replied on December 4, 1945, stating that the persons mentioned in the son's letter "have no relations with the Bank." In response to a November 29, 1945 letter from a Zurich attorney on behalf of the Bendix' son, the bank replied on December 7, 1945, "this time admitting the existence of clients" by the name of Hedwig Bendix and her husband, but stating that they "no longer had any business relations with the Bank." On October 21, 1947, The National City Bank in New York wrote to the Swiss bank, inquiring on behalf of the Bendix' son about the accounts of his parents, who were killed during World War II. The [Swiss] bank replied on November 5, 1947 that "'no assets are deposited with our head-office.'"

In light of the Swiss banks' denial of the accounts' existence — even when the bank still had records demonstrating that the Bendixes in fact had held accounts at the bank that now were closed, that one of these accounts had been reported in the bank files as having been transferred to the Reichsbank, and that the bank's customer had died in the Holocaust — the CRT awarded all three accounts to Hedwig Bendix's niece. The demand deposit account was paid at its actual value, while the two accounts of unknown type were paid at presumptive value.

ii. In re Account of Nelly Fleischmann (SF 287,500.00); In re Account of Nelly Fleischmann (SF 29,012.50)

Nelly Fleischmann was born in 1900 in Bayreuth, Germany, where she lived with her husband, Ludwig Fleischmann. The claimant, their son, advised the CRT that his mother was persecuted by the Nazis because she was Jewish. She died at the Jewish Hospital in Fuerth, Germany in 1938.

In 1997, Nelly Fleischmann's son filed a claim with the Swiss Banking Ombudsman at the Contact Office for the Search of Dormant Accounts Administered by Swiss Banks. He paid the requisite fee of SF 300. Subsequently, in connection with his CRT claim, he advised the CRT that he had discovered documents belonging to his father, including a September 20, 1956 letter to a Swiss bank, as well as the bank's October 3, 1956 response. As described by the CRT, in the letter to the bank, "the Claimant's father stated that, per the deposit receipt for custody account 43500, the Bank held bonds in the name of his late wife, Nelly Fleischmann, worth approximately 25,000.00 Swiss Francs. The letter then went on to state that, pursuant to German legislation at that time, the Bank was instructed by the Claimant's father in December 1938 to sell the bonds and to transfer their proceeds to the Deutsche Golddiskont Bank. The Claimant's father wrote that the Bank acted pursuant to these instructions. The Claimant's father requested confirmation of the transaction so that he could pursue the possibility of restitution in Germany. The Bank responded that it was not possible to confirm the transaction as it no longer possessed files from 1938."

The bank told Ludwig Fleischmann in 1956 that "it no longer possessed files from 1938." This statement was not correct. Bank records did still exist. The records showed that Nelly Fleischmann of Bayreuth held a custody account numbered 43500, which had been opened on May 31, 1931 and closed on January 10, 1939. As the CRT observed, "the bank files contain evidence that an account still existed in the Account Owner's name in 1956, at the time of the Claimant's father's inquiry," yet there is "no indication that the bank informed the Claimant's father that this account was still in existence." The bank had information about its relationship with the account owner that it did not disclose.

The CRT awarded Nelly Fleischmann's son the SF 25,000 Ludwig Fleischmann had described in his 1956 letter (applying the multiplier of 11.5 then in effect). The CRT observed that the 1956 letter was "a relatively contemporaneous statement of the account value by a person who was in a position to know the value of his wife's account. Further, he would have had no motive to undermine the credibility of his claim by exaggerating its value when writing to the Bank, which he knew held the account and had full information concerning its value."

Subsequently, the CRT was able to locate an additional account, an unpublished demand deposit account, and awarded that account at the presumptive value then in effect (SF 26,750). The CRT increased the award by an additional SF 300 (to SF 27,050) as reimbursement for the search fee the claimant had been forced to pay to the Swiss Bank Contact Office in 1997.

Several years after issuing the original award for the custody account, the CRT's ongoing effort to obtain additional documents from the banks through the "voluntary assistance" process yielded further information about Nelly Fleischmann's custody account. The new documents confirmed that Ludwig Fleischmann's 1956 recollection of the 1938 account value had been accurate. In 2008, the bank provided the CRT with records demonstrating that Nelly Fleischmann had held in her custody account almost precisely the amount described by her husband in his 1956 letter to the bank: SF 25,000.

iii. In re Accounts of Rudolf Goldmann and Hedy Hock (SF 478,525.00)

Rudolf Goldmann was born in 1876 in Teplitz, Austria (today the Czech Republic). His co-account owner, Hedy Hock, was the sister of Dr. Goldmann's first wife, who died of cancer in 1934. Dr. Goldmann remarried in 1940. Hedy Hock never married, and died in 1941. According to the claimant, Dr. Goldmann was an engineer in Vienna, and the deputy minister in the Finance Ministry. After his retirement from the Finance Ministry in 1936, he began to work for the Vienna Jewish Community. Dr. Goldmann and his second wife fled to Belgium in 1941. They were captured in July 1943 and deported to Auschwitz, where they perished.

The bank records showed that in 1946, Dr. Goldmann's son wrote to the bank requesting information about his father, as well as other relatives, including Hedy Hock. The CRT observed that the son "specifically asked whether any one of the three named individuals had an account at the Bank at the time the War broke out, and whether any account in their names still existed." He also had provided a form demonstrating that in 1939, while still in Vienna, Dr. Goldmann had granted his son power of attorney.

As described by the CRT, the bank stated in a December 1946 letter to its client's son that "due to Swiss legal requirements, it would only be able to respond to his request after he presented documents authenticated by the relevant Swiss consulate," since the son at that time resided in Haifa. These documents allegedly were needed to prove that the son was the rightful heir, or that he acted with power of attorney for the rightful heir. The bank sought payment of at least SF 40 in advance.

Subsequently, in 1948, the London office of the bank requested on behalf of Dr. Goldmann's cousin information about any accounts owned by Rudolf Goldmann or Hedy Hock. The Zurich branch of the bank advised the London office that it was not holding any assets belonging to either individual.

Notwithstanding the bank's denials in the 1940s, however, the bank records reviewed by the CRT showed that Hedy Hock of Vienna had indeed held a custody account, a demand deposit account, and a time deposit account. The custody account was closed on August 16, 1938, and the other two accounts were closed no later than that date. The records further showed that Dr. Rudolf Goldmann was given full power of attorney for Hedy Hock on November 29, 1934. In addition, the 1938 Census for Hedy Hock showed that she owned an account at the bank in Zurich with a balance of SF 11,205.

The CRT awarded to the claimant — the grandson of Dr. Goldmann and the great-nephew of Hedy Hock — the demand deposit account owned by Dr. Goldmann, and the custody and time accounts owned by Hedy Hock. These accounts were awarded at their presumptive values, since no actual values were available from the bank records. The CRT also awarded Hedy Hock's demand deposit account at the value recorded in the 1938 Census (as multiplied by 12.5).

In awarding the accounts, the CRT observed that the account owners' heirs "attempted to obtain information about the accounts, but were turned away by the Bank, even though the records clearly still existed and were ultimately identified during the ICEP investigation." The CRT referred to Judge Korman's 2004 opinion, in which he described the banks' stonewalling of Holocaust owners and heirs, "particularly those that were the subject of forced transfers or transfers ordered under duress." The CRT observed that this case "provides yet another example of the typical method Swiss banks used to deflect inquiries made by heirs of Jewish victims whose assets had been transferred, under duress, into the Reich."

The CRT further noted that Dr. Goldmann had perished in Auschwitz, while Hedy Hock had died in Austria in 1941. Thus, they "could not have repatriated the assets in her custody account, which was closed on 16 August 1938, without losing ultimate control over their proceeds."

iv. In re Accounts of Hanna Hartmann (SF 474,949.38)

Hanna Hartmann was born in 1876 in Germany. She lived in Berlin with her husband, a director of the well-known corporation, AEG. He died in or about 1926. The following year, Hanna Hartmann moved to Vienna. She was deported on April 27, 1942, and was believed by the claimant, her niece, to have died in a Nazi ghetto in Poland.

In the 1960s, the claimant began to try to locate her aunt's Swiss bank accounts. According to documents that the claimant provided to the CRT, she corresponded with the Swiss Ministry of Justice in Bern and the Trade Development Bank in Geneva between 1964 and 1967.

In a June 27, 1967 letter, Swiss authorities reported that they had found no evidence of an account in the name of Hanna Hartmann. Decades later, the claimant paid a fee of SF100 to the Swiss Banking Ombudsman in support of her request to Swiss authorities to continue to look for Hanna Hartmann's account. On November 8, 1996, the Ombudsman informed the claimant that its member banks had reported no records of any dormant account belonging to Hanna Hartmann. In 1997, the claimant filed a claim with the HCPO, which subsequently transferred the claim to the CRT.

Notwithstanding the bank's denials, however, the ICEP auditors did in fact locate bank records evidencing Hanna Hartmann's Holocaust-era Swiss bank account. These bank records showed that Hanna Hartmann was a widow and that she had owned three accounts. One was a demand deposit account held in United States Dollars, closed on March 20, 1938; one was a demand deposit account held in Swiss Francs, closed on August 10, 1938; and the third was a custody account, closed on May 23, 1938. The CRT also determined that Hanna Hartmann had been forced to report her assets in the 1938 Census.

The CRT awarded Hanna Hartmann's niece the three accounts at their respective presumptive values, observing that although Hanna Hartmann had not specifically disclosed her Swiss accounts in the 1938 Census, the "facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which, after the Anschluss, Jewish Austrian citizens are arrested, searched, or report their assets in the 1938 Census, and, beginning immediately thereafter, and in many cases within the same year, their accounts are transferred to Nazi-controlled banks or closed unknown to whom. In the present case, the Account Owner was deported from Vienna and killed, and the existence of any account in her name was denied by Swiss authorities in 1967 and as late as 1997."

Several years after the accounts were awarded, the bank "made available to the CRT additional information" about the custody account — the existence of which the bank repeatedly had denied for decades. This included "detailed documentation on the portfolios held in the account." Utilizing Special Master Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT determined that Hanna Hartmann had held bonds which were in default and trading at 55%, when they were surrendered ("ausgeliefert") on May 18, 1938. Because the bonds were in default, they were valued at their market value on the date of delivery, equivalent to SF 34,085.15. Although in default, the assets in the custody account still were worth more than the SF 13,000 presumptive value then in effect for custody accounts. After subtracting the presumptive value previously paid to the claimant from the actual value of the bonds, the claimant was owed, and was paid, another SF 21,085.15, increased to SF 263,564.38 upon application of the 12.5 multiplier.

v. In re Accounts of Emil E. Herz and Gabriele Herz (SF 920,300.00)

Emil Herz was born in Warburg, Germany in 1877, and his wife Gabriele was born in Vienna in 1886. The couple resided in Berlin, where Emil Herz was chief editor at the Ullstein Publishing House from its inception in 1903 until he was forced by the Nazis to relinquish his position in 1934. During Emil Herz' tenure, the company became the leading newspaper publisher in Germany, controlling many local periodicals. As the CRT discovered through its independent research, among the leading newspapers under the Ullstein banner were the Berliner Morgenpost and the Berliner Zeitung. The company also included several book publishers.

Emil and Gabriele Herz and their children, the claimants, fled Germany in 1937. They initially went to Lugano, Switzerland, then to Italy, and finally, in 1940, to the United States. Gabriele Herz died in New York in 1957, and Emil Herz died in New York in 1971.

The bank records provided to the CRT as part of the claims process indicated that Emil Herz unsuccessfully had tried for decades to obtain information about his accounts. Although these still-existing bank documents demonstrated that the bank understood that Emil Herz was forced to turn over some of his Swiss assets to the Nazis, the bank repeatedly stated after the War that it could not provide any records, and in any event, it was not obligated to keep documents beyond ten years.

However, records did still exist. These showed that Emil and Gabriele Herz had jointly owned two demand deposit accounts, one in Swiss Francs and one in United States dollars, as well as a custody account. Emil Herz separately held a custody account. On or before May 21, 1938, the account owners instructed the bank to transfer certain securities from one of the custody accounts to an account belonging to the New York branch of a bank in Stockholm, Sweden. The demand deposit account in dollars and the custody account were closed in December 1938, while the demand deposit account in Swiss Francs was closed on December 20, 1940.

In the early 1950s, Emil Herz sought restitution from Germany. He turned to the Swiss bank for assistance in obtaining the information necessary to file a German compensation claim. On December 3, 1951, his legal representative in Frankfurt wrote to the bank explaining that Emil Herz had fled Germany for Switzerland in the fall of 1937, and later fled to the U.S. The representative explained that Emil Herz had been able to transfer assets from Germany to Switzerland, but (presumably because of the confiscatory exchange rates applied by the Nazi authorities to such transfers) had sustained losses as a result. The bank was asked to provide yearly account statements. This December 3, 1951 letter contained "handwritten notations, apparently written by Bank employees, that reference the existence of two demand deposit accounts, which were closed in 1938, and a custody account, which was closed in 1940, that had been held in" Emil Herz's name. "Nevertheless, in its reply of 11 December 1951, the Bank explained that it could not provide" any information "without a power of attorney" from Emil Herz, "and that in any event, pursuant to Swiss law, the Bank was only obliged to maintain records for ten years."

Two months later, on February 2, 1952, Emil Herz himself wrote to the bank, explaining that he had been a long-time client and requesting "as a favor" that the bank provide him with information. He explained that he had left Germany due to Nazi persecution and that he had opened a custody account at the Swiss bank "about which he was required to provide information to the Berlin Foreign Currency Transactions Office (Devisenstelle Berlin) until he left Germany. He explained that the Devisenstelle had permitted him to dispose of two securities held in Switzerland but that the remaining assets "had to be transferred to the Deutsche Reichsbank." As a result, "the [Swiss] Bank had to deliver [the] remaining securities to the Reichsbank or to a bank designated by the Reichsbank between June 1937 and September 1937, and that in return [his] personal account at [the Swedish bank] was credited with an amount of approximately SF 47,000."

He further explained that many of his records had been lost "in the course of emigrating," and that he required specific account information to seek German restitution. He observed that the forcibly transferred securities were worth over U.S. $10,000. He appealed to the bank's loyalty to its "old client," and offered to pay the bank for its time and effort in recovering the data. Bank employees made notes on this letter, referring to an August 2, 1937 letter, "which was apparently available to the Bank at that time." However, on February 14, 1952, the bank responded to its client's February 3 letter by stating that it was "unable to provide him with the requested information as their records from 1937 and 1938 were incomplete, as they were legally not required to retain records after a period of ten years."

A few months later, on May 7, 1952, "the Bank's legal department" added a note to the Emil Herz file, which stated that "even though the Bank had delivered certain of [Emil Herz's] assets to the German state in 1937," Mr. Herz "had continued to deal with the Bank after he fled to Switzerland." The CRT observed that this note probably was motivated by the bank's "concern for double liability." The note also indicated that Mr. Herz had had an acquaintance who had contacted the bank on his behalf, and that a bank employee had recommended that Mr. Herz "should turn again to the Bank and 'insist' that he is only seeking information about the securities in his custody account in order to seek restitution from the German government."

Subsequently, at the end of December, 1953, and again at the beginning of January, 1954, "a director of the Schweizerische Volksbank" wrote on behalf of Emil Herz, appealing to the bank to check its records and reiterating that the information was being sought only to lodge a restitution claim with Germany. The bank responded as it had previously, stating that "the correspondence file from year 1937 was still missing, and thus it was not possible to provide a list of securities transferred to Germany…." The bank gave the same response to Emil Herz, who contacted the bank again in the early months of 1954. The bank replied on March 31, 1954 "that the only documents they had were internal receipts and a register, of which they were not permitted to provide copies." In response, Emil Herz wrote again, asking for the bank to provide documentation of the financial relationship between Germany and Switzerland during the War, reiterating that the bank had transferred to Germany securities belonging to him, and appealing for assistance because it was impossible to obtain information from the Reichsbank, which was located in the Soviet-occupied part of Berlin. On April 27, 1954, the bank replied in the negative.

Nearly a decade later, on December 8, 1963, Emil Herz again wrote to the bank, explaining that the German restitution court had requested information about the securities transferred to Germany. He asked whether the Reichsbank had had a custody account at the Swiss bank in 1937 to which his securities could have been transferred. The bank responded on December 19, 1963, advising that due to banking secrecy, it could not disclose the information to "unauthorized third parties," and recommending that Emil Herz "attempt to obtain such information from the Reichsbank" or its successor.

Based on this record, evidencing that the account owner had been forced to turn over his assets to the Nazis; that the bank was aware of this; but that the bank nevertheless had misinformed its clients for many years about the records still in its possession, the CRT awarded the claimants the presumptive value of the demand deposit accounts and custody accounts jointly owned by Emil and Gabriele Herz. As to the custody account owned solely by Emil Herz, the CRT deducted the value of the securities which Emil Herz had explained to the bank had been freely sold. The claimant was awarded the value of the securities that had been transferred to Germany or otherwise unaccounted for in the bank files.

vi. In re Account of Else Israel (SF 342,764.75)

Else Israel was born in Germany. In 1916, Else Israel and her husband adopted their daughter (the claimant's mother), who was five years old. In 1934, Else Israel's daughter fled to Palestine. Else Israel, who had resided in Berlin, died in Theresienstadt on August 17, 1942.

The bank records consisted of a letter to the bank dated October 8, 1949 from the claimant's father in Riverdale, New York. The claimant's father had been recognized in a Berlin inheritance certificate as the legal representative for the claimant, Else Israel's granddaughter and sole heir. The claimant also provided a copy of the October 14, 1949 reply from the bank.

As the CRT explained, "[i]n his letter, [claimant's father] referred to a bank statement, which appears to be copied onto the bottom of his letter, that references a custody account, numbered 45914, which [claimant's father] identified as belonging to Else Israel." The letter listed five different bonds and specified their nominal values. "In its reply, the Bank wrote that it usually did not respond to inquiries about accounts of clients who were deceased until the inquirer had demonstrated that he/she was the legitimate heir of the account owner." However, the bank said that it would make an exception to spare the claimant's father unnecessary expense. The bank advised that Else Israel had not had a relationship with the bank since 1936, and that, "because Swiss law required the retention of correspondence with account owners for only ten years, it had already destroyed all its files that were dated prior to 1939."

The CRT observed that the bank files made available pursuant to the ICEP audit in fact held the same copy of the letter to the bank that the claimant's father had written. The copy "contains handwritten notations, mostly illegible, that appear to have been made by Bank employees and that appear to address the various securities listed in the statement. One of the notations appears to refer to a demand deposit account belonging to Else Israel that was closed ('saldiert') on 16 December 1936."

The CRT pointed out that the bank's response to the claimant's father, in which it had stated that "it had destroyed all its correspondence with account owners that was dated prior to 1939," was "disingenuous at best." In this case, "internal Bank notations on [the claimant's father's] letter clearly indicate, despite their illegibility, that the Bank had information pertaining to the disposition of these securities, and chose not to reveal it…." The CRT noted that "the year cited by the Bank as the year during which its customer relationship with the Account Owner ended (1936) is the same year during which more stringent Nazi legislation requiring the repatriation of foreign-held securities became effective." The CRT observed that this is "readily explained by [the banks'] concern for double liability."

The CRT awarded the demand deposit account at presumptive value. It awarded the securities in the custody account at the higher of market or nominal value (in accordance with Special Master Junz' Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities), pointing out that the bank itself considered the claimant's father's copy of a bank statement listing the securities in the account to be "sufficiently reliable to allow it to respond to [the] inquiry without requiring him to prove himself to be the rightful heir of the Account Owner." Given that the Nazis in 1933 had "embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of the Jewish population," and that the demand deposit account was closed in 1936 while Else Israel was still in Germany (where she remained until she was deported to Theresienstadt), the CRT determined that Else Israel had not received the proceeds of her account.

Subsequently, in response to the CRT's ongoing requests for "voluntary assistance" from the banks, the CRT received additional documents from the bank relating to Else Israel's custody account. The bank provided documentation confirming that each of the five bonds that had been included in the list the claimant's father had sent to the bank in his 1949 letter had, in fact, been in Else Israel's custody account. The account also contained one additional bond. One of the five bonds that had been discussed in the letter had been sold in 1935, and the other four had been transferred on December 14, 1936 to another account at the bank, numbered 20184. The additional bond (revealed only when the bank records were produced) also had been transferred to the numbered account.

The CRT observed that the bank's records "do not indicate who owned the account numbered 20184, into which some of these securities were transferred. Even if this account were owned by the Account Owner, the records do not indicate when the account was closed, or the disposition of the securities contained therein." The CRT reiterated its original conclusion "that the Account Owner did not receive these securities or their proceeds."

vii. In re Account of Oskar Kraus (SF 796,700.22)

Oskar Kraus was born in 1881 in Vienna, where he was the director of a factory. In 1939, Nazi authorities forced him to move to another district of Vienna. The claimant, Oskar Kraus' son, informed the CRT that he recalled that his father had owned at least two accounts in Zurich, and that he had been able to retrieve one account by transferring it under his own name before he was forced to emigrate to the U.S. in 1938. The claimant believed that Nazi authorities had intercepted monthly bank statements for the other account, as his father had received them until the Anschluss. Oskar Kraus and his wife died in Vienna in 1939.

The bank records showed that Dir. Oskar Kraus owned one custody account opened in 1931 and closed by an unknown entity on August 5, 1938, as well as one demand deposit account. The records indicated that Swiss shares in the custody account were sold for the benefit of the account owner, but the proceeds of these shares (SF 26,444.85), along with the value of the demand deposit account, were transferred to the Deutsche Golddiskontbank. Other assets in the custody account (German bonds as well as various German shares) were transferred to the Öestereichische Credit-Anstalt in Vienna. The ICEP auditors determined that both the custody and demand deposit accounts had been paid to Nazi authorities. In addition to the bank records, the 1938 Census for Oskar Kraus also showed that Mr. Kraus owned assets in a Swiss bank which were transferred to the Deutsche Golddiskontbank.

In addition, Oskar Kraus owned accounts in a second bank. The records for this bank showed that on May 19, 1946, Oskar Kraus' son had written to ask for a list of assets held by his late father as of March 1938. A bank employee determined that the account at issue was closed in 1938. An internal bank memorandum dated May 24, 1946 indicated that the custody account was liquidated "'by the order of the Account Owner'" and transferred to Nazi-controlled banks.

On May 25, 1946, the bank advised Oskar Kraus' son (the claimant) "that for reasons of principle it could not disclose the information sought, and it requested official documentation establishing the death of the Claimant's father and the fact that the Claimant was his heir."

Based upon the fact that at least one account had been reported in the 1938 Census, and the other accounts had been paid to Nazi authorities, the CRT awarded the claimant two custody accounts and one demand deposit account.

Subsequently, the second bank provided the CRT with additional records which demonstrated that Oskar Kraus had held ten different securities in his custody account. The actual value of the assets in the custody account was somewhat lower than the amount that had been awarded, which had been based upon presumptive value. On the other hand, the award for the demand deposit account needed to be increased: the award had been made at the value of assets as reported in the bank records, whereas the Court subsequently authorized accounts to be increased to presumptive value if the reported values were lower than presumptive value. After these two adjustments, the CRT determined that the award had been overpaid by SF 1,757.68 (using 1945 values). The CRT observed that the initial award had been "based upon information available to the CRT at the time. Accordingly, the CRT does not seek outright repayment of the overpayment from the Claimant. However, because the original … Award was overpaid, no further amount is awarded in this Award Amendment. Moreover, the overpayment amount shall be deducted from any award amendment that may be forthcoming."[65]

viii. In re Accounts of Sara (Särle) Levi, Martha Baldauf and Ilse Lebrecht (SF 2,939,449.88); In re Accounts of Sara (Särle) Levi, Martha Baldauf and Ilse Lebrecht (SF 1,682,419.63)

Sara Levi was born in 1872 in Laupheim, Germany. After her marriage, she lived with her husband in Münsingen, Germany until 1942. She was deported to Theresienstadt, where she died in 1943. Her son, the claimant's late husband, was born in 1900 in Münsingen, and died in New York in 1972.

Sara Levi had four siblings, including Martha Baldauf, who was born in 1877 and was killed in a hospital in Mannheim on November 13, 1940. Sara Levi, her sister Martha Baldauf, and their two other sisters received an inheritance from their brother, who also was the uncle of account owner Ilse Lebrecht. The claimant informed the CRT that the four sisters agreed to open four separate accounts in a Swiss bank, where they deposited their inheritances.

The ICEP auditors did not locate documents relating to the accounts in the files of the Swiss banks. Rather, the Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), which was contacted by the claimant prior to the Settlement, obtained records from the bank and provided the records to the CRT.

[65] The latter statement referred to the Court's June 16, 2010 order authorizing an upward adjustment of presumptive values. The Court authorized the CRT to recoup any overpayments that might have been made by offsetting that amount from any presumptive value adjustment that might have been due to a claimant, whether in the same award or in a different award for another account or account owner. In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 731 F. Supp. 2d 279, 291 (E.D.N.Y. 2010).

In an April 7, 1998 letter to the HCPO, the bank stated that "[c]orrespondence during the 1950s and 1960s between [the bank] and a German lawyer who represented the heirs of Martha Baldauf [Berthold Wolf] shows that the lawyer sought and received assistance from [the bank] in his attempt to obtain compensation from the German government." The CRT observed that "[a] close examination of the documents, however, indicates that the 'assistance' provided to Mr. Wolf came about only after the Bank initially refused to provide him with information; only after Mr. Wolf visited the Bank in person with a document substantiating the existence of an account; only after Mr. Wolf called upon the Director of the Bank, whom he knew through mutual contacts, to intervene on his behalf; and that assistance then was provided only reluctantly and in qualified terms. Moreover, despite [a] statement in the Bank's letter of 7 April 1998, there is no evidence at hand that the heirs of Martha Baldauf were successful in obtaining compensation from the German government for the proceeds of the securities she held at the Bank which she was forced to repatriate. Nor is there evidence that the securities held by Ilse Lebrecht at the Bank that were forcibly repatriated were ever compensated."

Thus, as described by the CRT, Berthold Wolf first contacted the bank by letter of October 28, 1958, asking about accounts owned by Ilse Lebrecht and Martha Baldauf that probably had been forcibly repatriated to the Reich. Among the handwritten notations on the letter by bank employees was the question: "'Can information be given?'" On November 10, 1958, the bank responded by stating that "as a general principle, the Bank could not provide any information about account activities that took place over ten years ago, because its files are destroyed after this period of time."

On December 22, 1958, Berthold Wolf responded that the bank previously had provided information helpful to a different branch of the family, and suggested that "the Bank's research might also be made easier if he [Wolf] assured them that no claims against the Bank could be brought on the basis of its information." A handwritten note, evidently by a bank employee, refers to the existence of a custody account numbered 52260 and a different notation asks, "'Can we tell how the custody account was closed?'" On December 31, 1958, the bank advised Berthold Wolf that based on renewed research, it had no documents that would allow it to determine whether assets belonging to Martha Baldauf had been handed over to Nazi authorities.

On January 28, 1959, Berthold Wolf wrote to the bank to explain that he had learned that the securities in Martha Baldauf's custody account had not been repatriated to the Reich, but instead had been sold in Zurich in 1936. The proceeds, in U.S. dollars, had been transferred to another account at the bank (belonging to the Bankhaus L. Mainz sen. in Frankfurt). Mrs. Baldauf was forced to sell these dollars, and Reichsmark were credited to her account at the Bankhaus Mainz. The CRT observed that a notation on the letter asked, "'Can we confirm this?'" The bank responded by February 6, 1959 letter, stating that it confirmed the contents of its December 31, 1958 letter. The bank reiterated that it had no information about these accounts.

On June 17, 1959, Berthold Wolf personally visited the bank. He spoke with Dr. Pache, the director of the bank's legal department. The bank wrote to Mr. Wolf on June 18, 1959, stating that based on Mr. Wolf's visit and his presentation to Dr. Pache of a "'new document,'" the bank "took another look in its books and found, through this new document, entries, which although incomplete, allow the Bank to provide Mr. Wolf with at least partial confirmation of certain facts." The bank asked Mr. Wolf to provide the "'usual papers'" evidencing his authority to act on behalf of the account owners' heirs.

The following week, on June 24, 1959, Berthold Wolf responded and provided power of attorney forms and other documents. On June 26, 1959, the bank wrote to Mr. Wolf and stated that "it now could inform him that, according to entries in its books, a dollar account in the name of Martha Baldauf at the Bank showed a balance of US $25,376.50 on 26 October 1936" and that the bank "'cannot determine anything further.'" On July 3, 1959, Mr. Wolf asked if the bank could confirm that the account was debited US $26,276.50 on that same date, October 26, 1936, and so reduced to zero, or alternatively, to confirm that it was not possible to determine to whom the remaining balance was transferred. Mr. Wolf explained that this question was of central importance to the family's restitution claim in Germany. On July 6, 1959, the bank responded that "'we cannot determine anything further.'"

On July 9, 1959, Berthold Wolf wrote to the bank's director, Mr. Jenny, whom he knew from another matter. He said that he would be grateful if Mr. Jenny could provide him with evidence as requested in the July 3, 1959 letter. The bank responded on July 14, 1959, reminding Mr. Wolf that "'we are not obliged, according to Swiss law, to preserve our books and files for more than ten years." However, the bank stated that "from our books we can tell, as our legal department already informed you, that in October 1936 a dollar account existed in the name of Martha Baldauf and that it had a balance of US $25,376.50. This account was reduced to zero on 27 October 1936."

The records also contained a March 29, 1962 letter from Berthold Wolf in which he apprised the bank of the current status of the German restitution proceedings. He explained that "his clients' claim for compensation might be recognized if it could be proved that the dollars that were confiscated came from the sale of securities that had been deposited in a custody account at the Bank...Handwritten notations on the letter, apparently made by Bank employees, indicate the existence of a custody account numbered 52260. Another notation questions 'Possible?' ('Möglich?') Another notation refers to '$25,500.—3½ U.S.A. 1st Liberty loan bonds per 15.6.1947.'"

On April 3, 1962, the bank advised Mr. Wolf that the approximately $25,000 balance in the account "did indeed constitute the equivalent value of securities," but that the bank could not determine the origin of the securities "'because, according to Swiss law, we destroy correspondence that goes back over ten years...'"

In awarding Sara Levi's custody account to her daughter-in-law, the CRT observed that "in the course of its correspondence with Mr. Wolf, the Bank repeatedly asserted that it could provide no information about any activities that occurred more than ten years ago, in spite of the fact that the various notations on the letters clearly indicate that the bank did indeed have information about the accounts in question and in spite of the fact that the actual records still exist (and were forwarded to the HCPO and CRT). The presumption that the Bank was withholding or misstating account information in response to Mr. Wolf's inquiries because of its concerns regarding double liability was implicitly addressed in Mr. Wolf's letter of 22 December 1958, when he assured the Bank that no action against it could be brought on the basis of any information it might provide." The CRT noted that the Court had addressed precisely "this type of stonewalling behavior" in its 2004 opinion on the banks' conduct during and after the Holocaust.

After deducting restitution from the German government that Sara Levi's son (the claimant's husband) had received for the securities in 1961 — an amount equivalent to SF 29,047.42 — the CRT awarded the balance of the custody account, SF 206,108.57 (multiplied by 12.5, for a total of SF 2,939,449.88). The CRT observed that it was awaiting the results of inquiries with German restitution authorities and that it would thereafter address the accounts owned by Ilse Lebrecht and Martha Baldauf, to which the claimant also was entitled.

In a subsequent decision, the CRT explained that "with the generous assistance of the HCPO, [it had] approached various Restitution Offices in Germany… in an effort to ascertain the outcome of the restitution proceedings regarding Martha Baldauf's assets. Similar research regarding the potential restitution of Ilse Lebrecht's assets also yielded no information indicating that restitution had been made for these assets." The CRT observed that given the circumstances surrounding the Sara Levi accounts; the fact that Martha Baldauf had sold the securities in her custody account and was forced to sell the proceeds to the Reich in 1936, and had been killed in 1940; and that Ilse Lebrecht had transferred the securities in her own custody account to the Deutsche Bank in 1938, the account owners presumably had not received the proceeds of their accounts. Based on the value of the securities in the accounts, the CRT awarded the claimant an additional SF 1,663,119.88.

Following the adoption of Special Master Junz' Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT reviewed its earlier decisions, and determined that the claimant was entitled to an additional SF 19,299.75. This sum was based on the fact that the face value of the two bonds in Sara Levi's custody account had been, respectively, SF 18,000 and £ 1,750, whereas the market value had been somewhat higher: respectively SF 19,170 and £ 1,767.50. The CRT increased the award to reflect the higher market value at the time that Sara Levi was presumed to have lost control over her assets.

ix. In re Account of Victor Portheim (SF 1,077,587.50)

Victor Portheim was born in 1871 in Prague. He was one of seven children. He never married, and lived in Vienna. He committed suicide in 1939 following persecution by the Nazis.

Two of his brothers were deported to Theresienstadt, where they perished, and a sister committed suicide after learning of her own impending deportation. Of the seven siblings, only two survived the War.

The bank records initially made available to the CRT showed that Victor Portheim owned a custody account. On July 29, 1938, some of the account's assets (SF 2,000) were transferred from the account to the Öesterreichische Credit Anstalt - Wiener Bankverein in Vienna. The bank records showed that the account owner was deceased by November 29, 1939, and that the account had been blocked on November 28, 1939, with access to the account to be determined by the bank's legal department. The account was closed on September 9, 1941.

The CRT awarded the account at its presumptive value to several claimants: the niece, grand-nephew and grand-niece of (and thus descendants of the parents of) Victor Portheim. The CRT determined that other claimants, who were less closely related in that they were descendants of Victor Portheim's grandparents, were not entitled to share in the award. The CRT observed that the award was appropriate in light of the fact that some of Victor Portheim's assets had been transferred to the Öesterreichische Credit Anstalt - Wiener Bankverein; that he had committed suicide in Vienna in 1939; and that his account was closed two years after his death.

Several years after issuing this award, the CRT received extensive additional information from the bank in response to the CRT's ongoing request to the banks for "voluntary assistance." The additional information shed light not only on the value of the account, but the complex and suspicious circumstances of its closure. As described by the CRT:

> A review of the new documents received through Voluntary Assistance indicates that two parties claimed the estate of [Victor Portheim]: [an] unrelated third party couple identified as beneficiaries of [Portheim] in a will signed on 15 March 1939 (the "Beneficiaries")," and Victor Portheim's brother, his lawful heir, "who contacted the Bank about the custody account" in 1947. According to the Bank's records, in 1941 the Bank credited [Portheim's] assets … to the account of the Reichsbankdirectorium Berlin for the benefit of the Beneficiaries...
> The new documents indicate that the Bank transferred [Victor Portheim's assets under the terms of] a decision in a legal proceeding in Austria regarding Portheim's estate. The CRT notes however, that certain details evidenced in the correspondence regarding the development and execution of this proceeding cast a pall over the propriety of the eventual disposition of the assets of the Account Owner by the Bank. Most importantly is the fact that the legal proceedings regarding the Account Owner's estate were commenced more than three months after his death on 8 August 1939 [and that there had been a year of] correspondence between the Vienna District Court and its representatives and the Bank [without mention of these Beneficiaries] … [nor do the bank records mention] the Bank ever having reviewed a copy of the will before paying out the assets of the Account Owner.

At the outset, the CRT notes that the decision of the Vienna District Court of 31 October 1940 indicates that the Beneficiaries, who were especially identified by the court as "German citizens" (i.e., not Jewish), were appointed in a will signed on 15 March 1939. The CRT also notes that the Beneficiaries were of no ascertainable familial relationship to [Portheim], who at that time had other relatives living in Austria and abroad…

[The CRT's independent research indicated that according] to the law at that time, there were two procedures available to the Account Owner to create a will: he could have either signed the will in the presence of a judge or notary, whereupon it would have been deposited with the court and kept there until his death, or he could have chosen to hand-write his own will without witnesses, and then either deposit it with the court, hold onto it himself, or give it to a third party … [Portheim] died on 8 August 1939 and the first letter from [an individual named] Dr. Jussel to the Bank in his capacity as a representative of the Vienna District Court occurred in November 1939. The existence of this three month delay argues against the first procedure for the creation of the Account Owner's will, because if the will was in the possession of the court, presumably contact with the Bank would have been initiated by the court much earlier. Given that, then the only remaining procedure for [Portheim's] will to have come into existence was that he wrote his will by hand, and gave it to a third party, presumably the Beneficiaries. However, again, the existence of a three month delay between [Portheim's] death … and the first contact by the court with the Bank seems odd, as the appropriate action was for the third party to give the will to the court immediately upon learning of the death of the Account Owner. Indeed, this was required by the law. [Citation omitted] …

Additionally, upon the first contact made with the Bank regarding [Portheim's] assets … occasioned by Dr. Jussel on 23 November 1939, no mention of the Beneficiaries or the existence of a will is made, but rather he informed the Bank that he had been "appointed by the Court to compile an inventory of the assets of Victor Portheim." The Bank responded with a form letter indicating that no duty to share information was evidenced, thus no information could be given. A second request was sent four months later from the Vienna District Court directly to the Bank on 7 March 1940, asking for "an accounting of the depot numbered 31013" of the Account Owner, but again without making any reference to the Beneficiaries or the existence of a will.

...Supposing a will existed at the time Dr. Jussel first approached the Bank in November 1939, it is odd that he did not indicate to the Bank that he was acting on behalf of the heirs, or as the court-appointed executor. Instead, he indicated simply that he was appointed 'to compile an inventory of the assets of the account owner' and asks for statements of the depots and accounts of the Account Owner as of his date of death. The knowledge that [Victor Portheim] held an account at the Bank must have been obtained from somewhere, and indeed, the court's second request to the Bank on 7 March 1940 asks pointedly for "an accounting of the depot numbered 31013" of the Account Owner, but again without making any reference to the Beneficiaries, the existence of a will, or the appointment of Dr. Jussel as the executor.

After this second request, the Bank again replied that no duty to share information with the Vienna District Court existed, and no mention of the Beneficiaries is made by either party until [a] 9 September 1940 conversation between a representative of the Bank and [a Viennese attorney] Dr. Indra[66], regarding the formalities that would have to occur in order to settle the estate of the Account Owner…

Subsequently, the Bank received [a] decision of the Vienna District Court of 31 October 1940, which indicated the existence of the will and the Beneficiaries, and further indicated that [a] Dr. Egger was the representative of the heirs and had been appointed as the executor. Of interest is the fact that this decision indicated that the information relating to existence of the custody account, and the specific three securities held within it, was based on the report of the heirs (Nach dem Bericht der Erben). As mentioned above, the original contact of Dr. Jussel with the Bank in November 1939, and the subsequent contact by the Vienna District Court with the Bank in March 1940 which asked for an "accounting of the depot numbered 31013" were considered by the Bank to have occurred on behalf of the court, thus the Bank was unable to reply to their request; and it is only within the text of this decision, a year later, that any mention of the heirs is made...[T]he facts of the situation could easily be interpreted that the court was evidently approached by an agent of the Reich, who became aware of the existence of the accounts of the account owner through spurious means, and upon failing to convince the Bank to cooperate with its requests for information outright, quickly "found" a will and some heirs apparent in order to fulfill the procedural requirements presented to them by the representative of the Bank …

[66] Dr. Indra is referenced in a number of other CRT cases. Although his precise role is unclear, it appears that during the Holocaust era, he was trusted by Nazi authorities to act on their behalf. After the war, he appears to have acted on behalf of individuals who benefited from aryanization and then sought restitution for any losses in value. See, e.g., In re Accounts of Sigmund Freud; In re Accounts of Paul Wittgenstein, Hermine Wittgenstein, Helene Salzer, Wistag AG and Wistag Partnership.

> ...[On May 5, 1947], the Bank was contacted by a representative of the brother of the Account Owner … who had survived the Second World War in London, who informed the Bank that he was the legal heir of [Victor Portheim], and requested information about the custody account of the Account Owner, naming the specific securities held within it. Had a freeze of assets of Reich-resident Account Owners been in place during the Second World War, the proper resolution of the true heir of the Account Owner could have been reviewed at that time. Instead, the Bank, having already paid the account, replied to the request with a letter which indicated that the Bank would only examine the issue if they were presented with an authenticated document naming the legal representative of [Victor Portheim's brother] as the legal representative of the heirs, and directed his attention to an enclosed circular describing the documents needed to legitimize a claim. The fact that the Bank chose to reply in such a way, and not inform the brother of the Account Owner that the assets of the Account Owner had already been paid out to the Beneficiaries, is typical of the behavior of Swiss banks in dealing with requests for information about forced transfers effected during the Nazi-era, as detailed in the Court's 2004 Order [In re Holocaust Victim Assets Lit., 302 F.Supp.2d 59, amended and superseded on June 1, 2004, 319 F. Supp.2d 301 (E.D.N.Y. 2004)].

Victor Portheim's brother died shortly after contacting the bank in 1947.

The CRT observed that the foregoing facts confirmed its earlier conclusion that the account had not been properly paid to Victor Portheim's heirs. Furthermore, the information provided from the banks under the "voluntary assistance" process indicated that Victor Portheim's custody account had held three different securities, with a value of SF 83,910 (i.e., SF 70,910 more than the SF 13,000 that had been awarded — based on presumptive values — in the initial award). In addition, the new records also showed that Victor Portheim owned another account at the bank, a demand deposit account, which was awarded at presumptive value.

x. In re Accounts of Amalie Reiss, Friedrich Reiss and Felix Reiss (SF 648,212.50)

Felix Reiss lived in Vienna prior to the Anschluss. He fled with his daughter (the claimant) in 1938. His mother, Amalie Reiss, fled to the U.S. from Vienna in 1941. His brother, Friedrich Reiss, was imprisoned in Dachau and Buchenwald. Felix Reiss survived the Holocaust and emigrated to the U.S. The claimant advised the CRT that both her father and her uncle had held the title of Doctor and that her uncle had received a law degree in Vienna. "The Claimant also stated that she and her father traveled to Zurich after the Second World War in an attempt to recover the bank accounts, but were unable to receive any assistance as they had no documentation." Felix, Friedrich and Amalie Reiss all died in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The bank records showed that Dr. Felix Reiss of Vienna held one custody account and one account of unknown type. The records showed that the custody account was closed, but the closure date was illegible. The records further showed that the account of unknown type was transferred on October 15, 1938 to the Länderbank Wien in Austria, and then was closed.

The bank records contained a letter dated October 16, 1968 from an attorney acting on behalf of the Estate of Felix Reiss, requesting information concerning certain securities held at the bank by Felix, Amalie or Friedrich Reiss. As described by the CRT, the attorney "explained that he required the information in order to claim restitution for those securities. In its response on 13 November 1968, the Bank stated that 'according to our extensive investigations, the … securities … did not exist in any deposit under the name mentioned above or under the names mentioned in your letter.'" The bank also noted that it was not obligated to keep records longer than ten years.

However, the bank records available to the CRT contradicted the bank's 1968 statements. With respect to Amalie Reiss, the bank records contained, among other documents, information concerning the 1945 Freeze, as well as a list of closed custody accounts held by Austrian customers. The records indicated that Amalie Reiss had granted power of attorney over her accounts to Friedrich Reiss. The records showed that Amalie Reiss held one custody account and one demand deposit account. Some of the securities in the custody account (worth SF 1,700) were transferred to the Länderbank Wien on September 6, 1938. Amalie Reiss ordered the bank to hold all correspondence on August 10, 1939. The custody account was blocked during the 1945 Freeze, "at which time it contained bond certificates and coupons without any market value." The account was unblocked in April 1955, and closed in May 1957. The demand deposit account was closed prior to February 17, 1945, but the closure date is not recorded.

With respect to Friedrich Reiss, the bank records consisted of a closing register of numbered accounts. The CRT explained that the bank record "indicates that the account was paid out ('ausgeliefert') in October 1938 and subsequently closed."

The CRT observed that two of the three owners' accounts (or the assets therein) were transferred to the Länderbank Wien, while others were closed on dates unknown. As to Friedrich Reiss' account, although the records normally would indicate (by the term ausgeliefert) that the account was paid to an apparently authorized party, in this case, the claimant's information as well as data in the 1938 Census indicated that the account was closed at a time when Friedrich Reiss actually was interned in Dachau. As the CRT observed, "if the account was paid out to a party authorized by Account Owner Friedrich Reiss, then his authorization could have only been given under duress."

The CRT also took note of the bank's 1968 letter to an attorney acting for the Reiss family, stating that it was obligated to keep records only for ten years. The CRT observed that the Court had indicated in its 2004 opinion that this was a typical response to inquiries about accounts that had been the subject of forced transfers or closed under duress. "The Court noted that, in authorizing such sales or transfers to the German Reich, the policy of Swiss banks 'constituted a clear violation of the banks' fiduciary duty to their account holders — individuals who were being persecuted daily.'"

In view of the bank's behavior, and in light of the fact that the account owners had fled Austria, there was no record of Felix or Amalie Reiss' accounts having been paid to them, and Friedrich Reiss' account was closed under duress, the accounts were awarded to the claimant, each at its respective presumptive value.

xi. In re Account of Wilhelmine Schoenholz (SF 1,980,000.00)

Wilhelmine Schoenholz was born in 1862 in Neuss am Rhein, Germany. She was engaged to be married, but her fiancé died in 1889 en route to the U.S. Wilhelmine Schoenholz had one child, a daughter, who was born in Osnabruck, Germany in 1889, shortly after the death of her father (the fiancé of Wilhelmine Schoenholz). Wilhelmine Schoenholz' daughter had two children, the claimants, who filed claims with the HCPO and CRT-I, as well as Initial Questionnaires.

Wilhelmine Schoenholz lived in Germany for 35 years, where she owned a corset and lingerie shop. The claimants advised the CRT that their grandmother had been a purveyor to the court of the Queen of Wûrttemberg, the Grand Duchess of Hesse, and the last Russian Tsarina. She was considered wealthy and independent, and until 1932 traveled regularly to Switzerland. After the Nazis' rise to power, she was forced out of her residence and ordered to move to her shop. She was relocated several times, as was her shop. In 1942, she was deported to Theresienstadt and presumably died in the Holocaust, as she was never heard from again after World War II.

In 1929, according to the claimants, Wilhelmine Schoenholz had inherited $250,000 from the family of her late fiancé. In 1931, she used SF 165,000 of this inheritance to open a Swiss bank account. In 1958, her family visited the bank in person to inquire about this account, and they were asked to leave.

No records for the account of Wilhelmine Schoenholz were reported by the ICEP auditors. However, archival documents provided to the CRT by the claimants indicated that Wilhelmine Schoenholz owned a Swiss bank account valued at SF 165,000. Specifically, in the "Jewish file" (Judenkarte) created by Nazi authorities, numbered 9722, the cover page included the notation "ûber 165,000 Schweizerfranken" ("over 165,000 Swiss Francs"). The file also included an undated document wherein Wilhelmine Schoenholz applied for access to her "Sicherungskonto" (account frozen by the Security authorities), and stated that she was 77 years of age, very poor, and living on social welfare. The file indicated that the application was denied on the basis of her owning a Swiss bank account. The file also contained a notation that "measures" were being taken regarding the matter. A document dated October 2, 1942 indicated that Wilhelmine Schoenholz was "evacuated," and that the security order was completed and would be noted on her "Judenkarte."

In addition to the Nazi-era files, the claimants also provided the CRT with their grandmother's will, dated November 7, 1935, in which she designated her daughter (the claimants' mother) as her sole heir. Among the assets listed in the will were precious stones and metals, jewelry, and cash, including SF 165,000 in a Swiss bank account.

The CRT awarded the account to the claimants at the SF 165,000 described in the documentation (multiplied by 12.5, yielding an award of SF 1,980,000). The CRT observed that the account's existence had been disclosed in archival documents that had been obtained from the German government, as well as confirmed in the account owner's Holocaust-era last will and testament. The CRT noted that these submissions were entitled to "great weight" as to the account's existence as well as its value, "in the absence of any information on the value in the bank records and in light of the possibility that the account information might not have been retained because of the Bank's concern about the possibility of double liability due to the indications … that the account may have been paid to Nazi authorities."

xii. In re Account of Angelus Simon, Rosa Simon-Lang, Grete Koretz-Lang, Ernst Koretz, and Susan Koretz (SF 49,375.00)

The account owners (the claimant's great-uncle and his family) lived in Karlsbad, Czechoslovakia. Grete Koretz-Lang, born in 1899, was married to an attorney, Dr. Ernest Koretz, and they had a daughter, Susan Koretz, born in 1933. Angelus Simon died prior to World War II. His wife, Rosa Simon-Lang, their daughter Grete, and Grete's husband (Ernest) and daughter (Susan) all perished in the Holocaust.

The bank records showed that the ICEP auditors reported the existence of an account "based upon repeated inquiries to the Bank from a Mr. Frank Lang and his legal representative [Paul Weiden, a New York attorney] regarding assets that had potentially been held at the Bank by his relatives", the five account owners described above. The auditors referenced a handwritten note apparently made by a bank employee on June 14, 1946, which appeared to indicate that at least one owner held an account of unknown type in U.S. dollars ("$147.—").

In a letter dated December 30, 1946, the bank wrote to Mr. Weiden, then in Zurich, advising that in connection with Mr. Weiden's recent visit to the bank, "'we would inform you that, as far as our investigations show, no assets are deposited with the Zurich Office of our bank" in the names of the five account owners. Mr. Weiden responded on January 28, 1947, noting that at the time of his visit, "[y]ou [the bank] told me that a thorough investigation in the matter had resulted in only very little money being found. However, you were to confirm this in writing. May be that your letter was misplaced by the hotel, or by post." In response, on February 5, 1947, the bank forwarded Mr. Weiden another copy of its December 30, 1946 letter.

Mr. Weiden subsequently wrote to the bank on November 22, 1949, stating that he was again in Zurich and that "'I believe that a not-insubstantial account existed at your Bank [in the account owners'] names.'" A handwritten note at the bottom of the letter, apparently written by a bank employee, stated: "'the matter has already been investigated, and Mr. Weiden has been informed both verbally and in writing that no assets [currently] exist with us.'"

Subsequently, in an internal memorandum dated August 4, 1950, the bank noted that Angelus Simon of Prague had died and that if he held any assets, they should be blocked. No assets were reported. The following week, the bank's legal department wrote an internal memorandum (dated August 10, 1950) which stated: "'[O]n the occasion of any further visit from Mr. [REDACTED] of New York in relation to the assets of Angelus Simon, Rosa Simon, or Grete Simon, Ernst Koretz, please simply tell him verbally the following (do not confirm in writing): 'There are no assets in the names of the four mentioned individuals in our branch [of the Bank], as far as our investigations can tell.' Mr. Lang will not likely request further investigations regarding assets that may have existed earlier. If that does happen, we will have to deny his request on the basis of basic considerations.'" (Emphasis in original.)

Thus, by this memorandum, the bank's legal department was explicitly advising bank employees to deny the existence of current assets, and in the unlikely event that an inquiry was made about past assets, that request too should be deflected.

The next month, by letter dated September 14, 1950, the bank was contacted by a relative of the account owners. The relative, who lived in New York, explained that the account owners had lived in Karlsbad but had later moved to Prague, and that they all died "'as a result of the war.'" The relative advised that he had legal documents indicating that the individuals had died and that he was their legal heir. The bank responded a few days later, on September 19, 1950, advising that according to the bank's investigations following the heir's last visit, there were "'currently no assets in the names of the referenced individuals in our branch of the Bank.'"

Notwithstanding the bank's repeated denials of the existence of any accounts, the ICEP auditors concluded otherwise. As described by the CRT, "based upon the handwritten note made by a Bank employee on the letter from Mr. Weiden dated 14 June 1946, the auditors reported the existence of an account of unknown type, denominated in United States Dollars … held by at least one of the individuals from whom information had been sought in the repeated inquiries to the Bank."

Given the evidence in the bank documents, and in light of the fact that the account owners all had died in the Holocaust, the CRT awarded an account of unknown type at presumptive value. As the CRT observed:

> The Bank's records indicate that a Bank employee made a handwritten notation on the 14 June 1946 letter received from the representative of one of the Account Owners' heirs that indicates that assets totaling US $147.00 were held or had been held at the Bank under at least one of the Account Owners' names. According to the letter from Mr. Weiden dated 28 January 1947 contained in the Bank's records, this information was confirmed verbally by the Bank to Mr. Weiden during his visit to the Bank in Zurich in approximately December 1946. The records further indicate, however, that by 1950, the Bank refused to provide any further information to the heirs regarding these assets; that the Legal Department recommended that no information regarding this account be given in writing; that the Bank specify in all future correspondence with the heirs that there were no assets existing at the present time only and only at the main branch of the Bank; that the bank surmised that the heirs were unlikely to inquire about whether assets belonging to the Account Owners had previously existed at the Bank; and that if they did so inquire, such inquiries should be declined.

xiii. In re Accounts of Hermann Stark and Melanie Stark (SF 615,546.75)

Hermann and Melanie Stark lived in Vienna, Austria where Hermann owned the cinema Schönbrunner Schlosskino. According to the claimant, their cousin, in 1939 the Starks fled from Vienna to Brussels, Belgium to escape Nazi persecution. They were not successful. They were deported to concentration camps, where they perished.[67]

The Starks' 1938 Census indicated that by December 9, 1938, Hermann Stark's business interests had been aryanized. According to these records, Hermann and Melanie Stark's assets were assessed atonement and flight taxes.

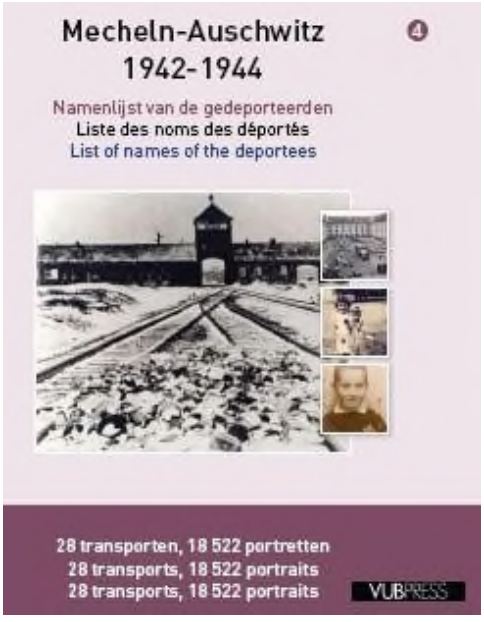
[67] At the time that the CRT was analyzing the claim, specific information about the Starks' deaths was not available. However, as a result of the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names (created, in part, through the Court's support under the Victim List Project), further details are now accessible. Thus, according to the Central Database: "Melanie Starck nee Buchwald was born in Wien, Austria in 1892. She was a housewife and married [to] Herman. During the war she was in Caserne Dossin (Malines-Mechelen), Belgium. [She was] [d]eported with Transport XXIV from Malines, Caserne Dossin, Camp, Belgium to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 04/04/1944. Melanie was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a Deportation list found in List of the Jews deported from Belgium - Jewish Museum of Deportation and Resistence at Mechelen / Malines."



See The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=7842312&language=en (last visited Aug. 3, 2015).

The bank's records indicated that Hermann Stark opened a safe deposit box at the Zurich branch on January 19, 1934. On February 18, 1939, the bank transferred four gold bars from the safe deposit box into a new custody account, per Hermann Stark's instructions from Belgium. The bank's records further indicated that the custody account was closed on March 22, 1939.

Hermann Stark also owned a demand deposit account at the bank, with a balance in French Francs ("FF"), at some date after January 1, 1933.

The bank records showed that between February 1953 and November 1953, Hermann Stark's sisters and their attorney wrote to the Zurich branch to inquire about their brother's accounts. Hermann Stark's sisters also tried to approach the bank through a long-standing private customer, who forwarded the sisters' letters to the bank. An internal memorandum dated March 9, 1953 indicates that one division of the bank wrote to the Estate Matters division in Zurich, noting that Hermann Stark's sister had contacted them, and that she stated that her brother held an account, which still contained assets, at "a Swiss bank." The bank noted that the account also could have been held under the name "Frau (Mrs.) Mela Stark." The bank indicated that it would be grateful if the Estate Matters division would conduct the appropriate research regarding these assets. The Estate Matters division replied with its own memorandum dated March 16, 1953, indicating that its research had not revealed any assets within its division in the names of the account owners.

The bank's records did not contain a response to any of Hermann Stark's sisters, or to their representatives. However, the bank's records did contain some handwritten notes on the letters that Hermann Stark's sisters and representatives had written to the bank in 1953. A February 10, 1953 letter from one of the sisters contained a handwritten notation indicating that there was neither a savings/passbook account nor a safe deposit box under the stated name. However, the same notation pointed out that there was, in fact, a custody account that was closed on March 22, 1939. A later letter (November 3, 1953) from the sisters' representative to the bank contained the handwritten notation: "Had (word illegible) No. 1297; closed on 18 February 1939!"

The CRT received "voluntary assistance" from the bank, including records of two accounts at the bank's London branch. These records indicated that the account owners held a joint custody account and a joint demand deposit account. The custody account was opened on April 7, 1939 using a Brussels address. On March 27, 1939, three gold bars were transferred from the bank's Zurich branch to the bank's London branch and deposited into the Starks' custody account.

Although the bank did not advise the Starks' family members and representative that Hermann Stark had held a custody account, the bank nevertheless continued to assess "safekeeping charges" on this undisclosed account. Aside from these charges, both accounts in London remained dormant, until they were suspended by the bank on April 21, 1980.

Regarding the London custody account, the bank's records indicated that from its opening to its suspension, it held three gold bars. As noted, the bank had assessed fees on the custody account, but did not advise the Stark relatives that the account existed. The value of the custody account was adjusted to reflect standardized bank fees and hold mail fees charged to the account between 1945 and 1980.

Regarding the Zurich custody account, the CRT could not determine from the available bank's records whether it contained further assets in addition to the four gold bars. Since there was no available balance, the CRT awarded that account at presumptive value.

As for the Zurich demand deposit account, it had a balance as of an unknown date after January 1, 1933. The bank's records did not reveal the date that this balance was recorded, the date that the account was closed, or the account's closing balance; therefore, the account was awarded at its presumptive value.

xiv. In re Account of Max Steinthal (SF 260,375.01)

Max (Maximillian) Steinthal was born in 1850 in Berlin. He was a member and director of the supervisory board of the Deutsche Bank, and chairman of Mannesman, a large metallurgical consortium. He held the title of Geheimer Kommerzienrat (Privy Counselor of Commerce), conferred on distinguished businessmen.

After the Nazis rose to power, Steinthal was forced to retire from the Deutsche Bank in 1933 and from Mannesman in 1935. He was forced to sell his house to the Luftwaffe and move to the Hotel Eden in Berlin in 1939. The remainder of his property was confiscated in 1939. He died on December 8, 1940 in Berlin, and his wife died there on October 5, 1941. One of their children was killed in Auschwitz in 1942, and their other children were forced to emigrate from Germany.

The CRT conducted independent research concerning Max Steinthal, which indicated that he was a man of diverse interests. He was "considered one of the most influential figures in the history of Deutsche Bank." He was a "well-known art collector and patron of the arts, and is credited with having initiated a corporate tradition of cultural philanthropy at Deutsche Bank." Steinthal also was considered a "'founding father'" of the Berlin subway system.

A history of the Deutsche Bank prepared by a panel of independent historians, examined by the CRT, stated that when Hitler acceded to power in January, 1933, Max Steinthal at the age of 82 still was chairman of the bank's supervisory board. By the end of that year, however, Steinthal no longer was listed in the bank's annual statements, and he was dropped from the board in May 1935. The historians observed that the "state authorities harassed Steinthal relentlessly … At the end of 1939 he was obliged to sell his house in Charlottenburg to the Luftgau-Kommando, moved with his family … to a smaller house, found that too requisitioned, and then stayed in a hotel room, where on 8 December 1940 he died."[68] The CRT obtained research from the Jewish Museum Berlin, which confirmed the confiscations, and also revealed that the "'whereabouts of the Steinthal [art] Collection was unknown for decades. But in summer 2003, the collection of paintings was found in the Pillnitz Palace, the depot of the Dresden State Art Collections, and restored to the heirs.'"

[68] In an interview, one of Max Steinthal's grandsons, Michael Max Montfort-Steinthal, remembered his grandfather as "'of that element among German Jewry who felt themselves totally assimilated. He had all his sons baptised. I was never brought up in the Jewish faith, but was baptised as a Lutheran...From the religious point of view, there was nothing tying us to Jewry which was why it came as such a terrific shock for people who belonged to that particular tranche of society that their German nationality was taken away from them.'" Louise Jury, Six decades after being plundered, the art the Nazis stole is set to make millions, INDEPENDENT, Nov. 12, 2004.

The records from the Swiss bank ("Bank 1") indicated that Geheimer Kommerzienrat Max Steinthal, chairman of the Deutsche Bank supervisory board, held a custody account opened on August 7, 1931 by a transfer of securities from a Deutsche Bank account in Berlin. Various trades of securities, including "CHADE" shares, were made during 1932 and 1933. The account was closed on November 15, 1933 by transfer of the remaining securities to a custody account at a second Swiss bank, "Bank II."

In August 1946, one of Max Steinthal's sons contacted Bank I, advising of his parents' deaths. He stated that he was acting on behalf of all heirs and inquired about accounts at the bank, which he believed held CHADE shares among other assets. The bank responded on August 15, 1946 by advising the family that "'[a]though it is not our practice to give such information to heirs without underlying documentary evidence, we can exceptionally inform you that we held no securities or cash amount on behalf of the above-named persons at the date of their death.' The letter bears the internal annotation: 'D.44897 Geheimrat M. Steinthal, Berlin, closed on 15/11/33 by transfer of 250 shares CHADE 'E' to [Bank II].'"

On December 3, 1946, a Swiss attorney contacted the bank inquiring about a significant amount of assets held there at least ten years before. The letter contained an internal annotation, "Note by the WK," which was dated December 5, 1946 in Zurich and referred to custody account 44897. Despite the internal reference to a custody account, however, the bank advised the attorney by letter dated December 10, 1946 that "in the last ten years, it had held no assets in the name of Max Steinthal or his wife …. However, Bank I's letter went on to state that it suspected that Bank I had held certain assets in the names of the cited persons before this time, but that it could provide no information about them, because it possessed virtually no documentation from this time." Bank I did not state that the account had been closed and the remaining assets transferred to Bank II.

The CRT observed that Max Steinthal had "resided in Nazi Germany until his death on 8 December 1940; that there is no record of the payment of the Account Owner's account to him, nor any record of the account at all at Bank II; that after the Second World War the Account Owner's heirs were not able to obtain information from Bank I regarding the transfer of the Account Owner's assets to Bank II and would not have been able to obtain information from Bank II due to the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries by account owners because of the banks' concern regarding double liability." The CRT awarded the custody account to the claimants (two great-grandchildren of Max Steinthal) at the market value of the securities held in the account.

xv. In re Account of Otto Strakosch (SF 1,020,995.46)

Otto Strakosch was born in 1884 and lived in Vienna with his wife Grete (née Hecht). They had no children.

Otto Strakosch. http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=11093244&language=en#!prettyPhoto. Photo courtesy of Yad Vashem and Yvonne Hassid.

Otto Strakosch was killed in Auschwitz in 1942.[69] The claimant, Otto Strakosch's niece, advised the CRT that she believed that her uncle had held accounts at the Zurich branches of the two defendant banks ("Bank I" and "Bank II"), valued at approximately SF 350,000.

The records for Bank I showed that Otto Strakosch held a custody account closed on February 6, 1937; a custody account closed on April 29, 1938; and a demand deposit account closed on April 30, 1938. The records for Bank II showed that Otto Strakosch owned a custody account closed on April 23, 1938. The bank had been instructed to hold mail to Mr. Strakosch as of March 23, 1938.

[69] Through the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, it is now known that "Otto Strakoch [sic] was born in Wien, Austria in 1884. During the war he was in France. Deported with Transport 30 from Drancy, Camp, France to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 09/09/1942. Otto was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from France found in Le Memorial de la deportation des juifs de france, Beate et Serge Klarsfeld, Paris 1978." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=3222166&language=en#!prettyPhoto (last visited Aug. 3, 2015).

In 1950, according to Bank I's records, an American lawyer representing the administrator of Mr. Strakosch's estate (who had been appointed by the New York Surrogate's Court) contacted the bank. As described in the CRT's decision, the bank responded by stating "that it did not recognize the rights of an appointed administrator to a customer's account as being legally valid, because the Account Owner was not an American resident. That same year," the administrator "replied to Bank I in a letter in which he claimed that he and his sister were the legal heirs of the Account Owner, according to the Account Owner's will. In response, Bank I stated that it could provide no information because it had no proof that they were the legal heirs, and it did not keep customer records for more than ten years. In addition, Bank I would require a death certificate of the Account Owner."[70]

The CRT conducted additional research, obtaining the 1938 Census for Otto Strakosch. These files included receipts from Bank I and Bank II, showing that Mr. Strakosch owned custody accounts at both banks. The 1938 Census also indicated that Otto Strakosch had placed his trust in someone who chose to betray him to the Nazis. As described by the CRT, the files contain "correspondence between Otto Strakosch and Sturmhauptführer Franz Neukirchner (an SS officer), between Neukirchner and his superior officer, and between Otto Strakosch and Dr. Alfred Redlich, a lawyer who was appointed by the Nazis to manage Otto Strakosch's estate." The CRT explained that in "a letter from Neukirchner to his superior officer, dated 5 December 1938, Neukirchner stated that … Strakosch asked him for a personal favor. According to Neukirchner, Otto Strakosch asked him to access the safe deposit box of his friend, Frau Grete Hecht, which was located in a bank in Vienna, and to take an envelope contained therein and destroy it. Instead of complying with Otto Strakosch's wishes, Neukirchner opened the envelope

[70] See also In re Account of Otto Strakosch (more fully described in the discussion of "CRT Denials" below, concluding that certain accounts owned by Otto Strakosch were closed prior to the Anschluss and thus were closed by the rightful owner. The decision notes that the administrator advised the bank that the account owner and his wife fled Vienna to Paris in 1938, and later to Cahors, France, where they remained until they were deported to Nazi Germany in 1942. "The Bank replied to this inquiry by demanding documentation proving that the Account Owner was deceased.") and made a list of the bank receipts that were in it that were for the accounts held by Otto Strakosch, which he attached to the letter to his superior officer." The receipts in Frau Hecht's safe included information about shares of U.S. railroads that Otto Strakosch was holding in his custody accounts at the Swiss banks (Bank I and Bank II), totaling SF 67,411.59.

Neukirchner also found a receipt from Bank I showing that on January 29, 1937, at the request of Mr. Strakosch, the Bank had sold English gold coins worth 1,800 Pound Sterling (valued at SF 64,260).

The CRT explained that Neukirchner told his superior officer "how he compared the census form Otto Strakosch submitted to the Nazi authorities and his flight tax receipt" to the list of securities in the safe "and noticed that Otto Strakosch had withheld" assets on the list "and had not reported them to the Nazis before he left for France. Neukirchner further reported that Otto Strakosch had more assets invested in gold at Bank I than what he had reported to the Nazis."

The CRT pointed out that Mr. Strakosch "must have been contacted about these discrepancies in some way, because, in November 1938, he responded to Neukirchner's allegations in a letter to Neukirchner and Redlich." He stated that "although these assets were invested in his name, they did not belong to him but rather to his cousin in the United States. He apologized and explained that he had paid all his taxes before he left Austria, that he did not list these assets because they were not his, that he sold the gold in order to buy shares and bonds in American railroad companies and that, in any case, these shares and bonds had lost two-thirds of their value. He offered, however, to turn over all the assets which he took with him when he left Austria, which he estimated to be worth 43,000.00 Reichsmark, if the Nazis would remove the warrant issued for his arrest for tax evasion. A Nazi document, dated 2 March 1941, indicates that Otto Strakosch's citizenship was removed and all his assets were confiscated." However, as noted previously, these confiscations did not save his life; he was transported to Auschwitz the following year, where he perished.

The CRT observed as to three of Mr. Strakosch's accounts that they were all closed in April 1938, after the Anschluss. Two of these accounts had been declared in the 1938 Census, and the banks apparently had complied with the Nazis' demand to turn over the accounts. As to the post-war behavior of the Swiss banks, the CRT observed that the records "contain evidence that the heirs of the Account Owner sought information related to the accounts held at Bank I" and that "Bank I deliberately withheld relevant information regarding these accounts."

In a subsequent decision, the CRT amended its decision by increasing the payment to Otto Strakosch's niece for one of the custody accounts by an additional SF 86,538.88. The account originally had been based upon the sum reported in the 1938 Census. Under the Court's order of October 12, 2004, such amounts were to be increased to presumptive value based on the determination that historically, Nazi victims tended to underreport their assets in these Census forms, in a usually unsuccessful attempt to shield some of their property from total confiscation.

3. Accounts Reported to the Nazis by Swiss Bank Employee Dörflinger

i. In re Account of Charlotte Amsterdam (SF 49,375.00)

Charlotte Amsterdam was born and resided in Warsaw, where her husband (whom she married before 1910) was a high-ranking executive at a large bank. The claimant, their nephew, advised the CRT that his aunt and uncle were believed to have died in the Warsaw Ghetto.

The bank records indicated that Charlotte Amsterdam's account was reported to the Nazis by a spy employed by a Swiss bank, August Dörflinger. August Dörflinger was suspected of having betrayed 85 account relationships to Nazi authorities, as set forth in a December 2, 1942 protocol contained in the bank files, entitled "Existing Accounts and Depots" (Bestehende Konti & Depots). The protocol, which was created during a meeting among a prosecutor, a bank representative, policemen, and Dörflinger, indicates that Dörflinger was accused of acting as a spy for the Nazis and violating bank secrecy laws by reporting 74 account holders to the authorities in Nazi Germany, a charge Dörflinger admitted. Nine additional relationships were suspected of having been betrayed, and an additional two also were suspected of being associated with Dörflinger. The total 1942 value of these 85 accounts was nearly SF 1.6 million, or nearly SF 20 million when adjusted to present-day values (at the multiplier of 12.5).

With respect to Charlotte Amsterdam, the December 2, 1942 protocol indicated that she held an account of unknown type with a balance of SF 884 as of that date. The CRT awarded her nephew the presumptive value of an account of unknown type, in view of the fact that his aunt was presumed to have perished in the Holocaust, and that her account was reported to Nazi authorities by a Swiss bank employee.[71]

ii. In re Accounts of Samuel Stiebel (SF 96,887.50)

Dr. Samuel Stiebel was born in 1879 in Langenschwarz, Germany. He was a physician and lived with his family in Hamburg until 1933. The claimant, his daughter, advised the CRT that in 1933, Dr. Stiebel was informed by the Nazis that he would be arrested if he continued to treat communists and Jews. The family shortly thereafter fled to Switzerland. Dr. Stiebel attempted to withdraw money from a bank account he owned in Switzerland, but was advised by a bank employee that the only way to withdraw anything from his account was from Germany. The family fled to Palestine later that year.

The bank records indicated that Dr. Stiebel owned three demand deposit accounts and one savings account. Dr. Stiebel's accounts were reported to the Nazis by August Dörflinger, the Swiss bank employee arrested for spying on behalf of Germany.

The bank files contain "excerpts from the transcript of the interrogation of a Bank employee, August Dörflinger, conducted by the State Prosecutor of Basel on 2 December 1942, and a letter dated 15 February 1950 to the Bank written by August Dörflinger while he was in [71] Other examples of awards of accounts reported by the spy Dörflinger include In re Account of Richard Emrich (SF 47,400.00) (account owner owned a jewelry manufacturing company in Pforzheim, Germany, and moved to the United Kingdom to open a branch there; in 1939, the German company was seized by the Nazis and most of the family fled, but several family members were murdered in Auschwitz; Richard Emrich's account of unknown type with a balance of SF 208.50 was on the list of 85 accounts reported by Dörflinger); In re Accounts of Marcus Manasse (SF 81,270.00) (account owner was a physician from Berlin who held a demand deposit account transferred in 1974 to a suspense account, and an account of unknown type which was included on the list of 85 accounts reported by Dörflinger); In re Account of Alfred M. Schwarzschild (SF 49,375.00) (Alfred Schwarzschild, an artist born in Frankfurt who later lived in Munich, had difficulty selling his art beginning in 1933 and fled to England in 1936, his wife and children following him in 1938. His account appeared on the Dörflinger list, which indicated that as of December 2, 1942, the account held a balance of SF 2,943.50).

prison." According to the transcript, as described by the CRT, "August Dörflinger, a convicted German spy, reported two of the Account Owner's accounts to the Nazi authorities. This document shows that as of 2 December 1942, the Account Owner held a demand deposit account, with a balance of 1,240.00 Swiss Francs, and a savings account, numbered 50352, with a balance of 734.00 Swiss Francs, and that the Account Owner's accounts were not closed after having been reported to the Nazis."

As the CRT explained, the transcript further indicated that "the Account Owner was among 85 account owners who were reported by August Dörflinger, a Nazi spy working at the Bank, to the Nazi authorities…. As noted in a Department of State Report [the May 1997 Eizenstat Report], 'as U.S. officials received reports that in the early 1930s the Germans had placed French-speaking Nazis in leading Swiss banks, they grew increasingly concerned that Nazi elements may have infiltrated the Swiss banking system.' The Nazi Germans were even so brazen as to take out newspaper ads offering rewards to those who came forward with information on Jewish depositors."

Swiss authorities did prosecute Dörflinger for his crimes. However, in connection with the claims process, while the CRT had obtained information about two additional account owners on the list of 85, "the banks did not provide the CRT with "the full text of the Dörflinger interrogation or the list of the other 82 Account Owners who apparently incurred the same deposit confiscations as suffered by the Account Owner in this case as a result of the information provided to Nazi authorities by Dörflinger. A full accounting by the banks of the role played by spies, the names of the persons who they identified, and their impact on the accounts of Nazi victims, would be of very substantial value to the CRT in fulfilling its mandate to return the deposits in Swiss banks to these victims or their heirs."

The CRT awarded all four accounts to Dr. Stiebel's daughter, observing that two were reported to the Nazis, and one was transferred to the bank's suspense account for dormant assets, where it remained open. Given the fate of these three accounts, the CRT presumed that the fourth account likewise was not returned to its owner.

The accounts were awarded at the values reflected in the bank records. One of the demand deposit accounts was held in Chilean Pesos. The CRT determined that the account held SF 5,508.88 (after application of the multiplier).

Subsequently, the CRT amended the decision to award an additional SF 33,694.12, adjusting three of the accounts upward to reflect their respective presumptive values rather than their recorded values, in accordance with the Court's May 31, 2002 order authorizing the CRT to presume absent evidence to the contrary that accounts reflecting values lower than presumptive values may have been underreported by their owners, or that fees and other charges may have been taken by the banks.

B. AWARDS BASED ON PRESUMPTIONS UNDER UNITED STATES LAW AS INCORPORATED INTO THE CRT RULES

1. Account Remained Open and Dormant

i. In re Account of Albert Brandt (SF 11,148.25)

Albert Abarbanel (alias Albert Brandt) was born in 1896 in Hamburg. He attended the University of Heidelberg with Joseph Goebbels, the Reich Minister of Propaganda and a close associate of Hitler. As such, Goebbels was familiar with Albert Abarbanel's early anti-fascist views. Albert Abarbanel fought for Germany in World War I and was wounded eight times, earning five medals, including the Iron Cross.[72] He became a philosophy professor in Hamburg and encouraged his students to resist the Nazis.

The claimant, his wife, advised the CRT that in approximately 1933, as Albert Abarbanel was preparing lecture materials, he received a frantic call from his mother. She warned him to leave home immediately because the "brownshirts" were looking for him. He escaped to the United States in 1933 and continued to speak out against the Nazis, writing books and magazine articles under the pseudonym "Albert A. Brandt" (to protect his family still in Europe), and appearing on a weekly radio program. He was attacked and beaten in New York by Nazi supporters.

The bank records indicated that Albert Brandt held a savings account, still open and dormant at the time of the Volcker Committee audit, with a last known recorded value of SF 0.06. As the account had not been returned to its owner, and given the banks' practice of deducting administrative charges from dormant accounts as well as evidence of account balances being plundered, the CRT awarded it at presumptive value.

ii. In re Account of Leo Davidsohn (SF 240,360.00)

Leo Davidsohn was born in 1866 and lived in Berlin. As a retired widower, he supported other family members, including the claimant's mother (Mr. Davidsohn's niece). Leo Davidsohn was transported to Theresienstadt in July 1942. He perished there a month later.[73]

The bank's records demonstrated that the Leo Davidsohn owned an account that was still open with a balance of SF 20,000 as of January 1946, over three years after Leo Davidsohn was killed.

The records further showed that Leo Davidsohn lived at Wielandstrasse 23 in Berlin. This street address appeared to conflict with the address the claimant had provided, Kurfurstendamm 1855 in Berlin, which would have suggested that the claimant's relative was not the same person as the account owner. However, the CRT conducted independent research and determined that the two seemingly conflicting addresses essentially were the same. The CRT observed that "Kurfurstendamm intersects Wielandstrasse at Wielandstrasse 23 and [73] The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names contains the following information: "Leo Davidsohn was born in Hohensalza, Poland in 1866. Prior to WWII he lived in Berlin, Germany. During the war he was in Berlin, Germany. Deported with Transport I/22 from Berlin, Germany to Theresienstadt, Ghetto, Czechoslovakia on 14/07/1942. Leo was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from Berlin found in Gedenkbuch Berlins der juedischen Opfer des Nazionalsozialismus, Freie Universitaet Berlin, Zentralinstitut fuer sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung, Edition Hentrich, Berlin 1995." http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4094484&language=en (last visited Aug. 3, 2015).

Kurfurstendamm 185." As a result of the CRT's investigation, the addresses were reconciled and the account was awarded.

The account was of unknown type, with a reported value of SF 20,000 as of January 31, 1946. The CRT increased that amount by SF 30 to reflect standardized bank fees charged to the account between 1945 and 1946, for a total of SF 240,360 upon application of the multiplier of 12 then in effect.[74]

iii. In re Account of Selma Loehnberg (SF 11,476.25)

Selma Loehnberg (Lohnberg) was born in 1874 and lived in Hamm (Westphalia), Germany, where her husband had a medical practice. Their daughter, the claimant, advised the CRT that Dr. Lohnberg died in 1926 after being thrown down a flight of stairs by two anti-Semitic patients.

His widow, Selma Lohnberg, moved to Waldeck, Germany, where she converted her large country house into a hotel. In 1935, after being threatened by local police, she was forced to sell the hotel with its contents, including valuable art works, and its surrounding meadows and forests. She received 30,000 Reichsmark from the sale. She deposited this sum with a German bank and directed it to transfer these funds to a bank in Ascona, Switzerland, where her sister lived. She fled Germany to join her sister, and learned that the Swiss bank had taken the position that it had not received the funds transferred from the bank in Germany.

Without money to support herself, Selma Lohnberg was not allowed to stay in Switzerland, and thus went to Brussels. After the Nazi invasion, Belgian officials arranged a pro forma marriage so that Selma Lohnberg could be protected, but she was arrested in early 1944

[74] The award was discussed in New York Times article, Settling Accounts, But Not Minds: "An 80-year-old retired scientist, who loathes the attention that a sudden cash award will bring and insisted on anonymity, said a young lawyer at the tribunal helped him prove family lore that a bachelor uncle named Leo had a Swiss account. Recently, he received $160,000 [based on the exchange rates in effect at the time of the award]…'I accepted it,' the retired scientist said, 'as a gift from the time of darkness.'" and imprisoned until Belgium was liberated in September 1944. She lived in the United Kingdom with her daughter (the claimant) until her death in 1967.

Although the Swiss bank had told Selma Loehnberg that it had never received the funds she had ordered to be transferred there from the bank in Germany, the bank records examined by the CRT were to the contrary. These records included an undated list of foreign account owners with whom the bank had had no contact since May 1945, as well as a printout from the bank's database of open accounts. The bank documents showed that Dr. Selma Lohnberg of Ascona, Switzerland held a savings/passbook account, from which SF 400 was withdrawn on April 15, 1935. The ICEP auditors concluded that the account had been dormant for at least ten years after 1945. As of September 1998, the account held a balance of SF 13.10, and it remained open and dormant. The CRT awarded the claimant the presumptive value of a savings account.

iv. In re Account of Charles Ulrich (SF 49,375.00)

Charles Ulrich was born in 1901 in Berlin-Charlottenburg, Germany. He was an engineer who traveled extensively for business, and lived in Chile between 1929 and 1939. He tried to return to Germany in 1939 to visit his mother. His wife and children later were to follow him. However, due to the outbreak of war, the ship upon which Charles Ulrich was traveling was redirected and returned to South America. Charles Ulrich's mother remained in Germany and died there, and her sister presumably died in Germany as well.

The bank records showed that Charles Ulrich owned a numbered account of unknown type. It was transferred to a suspense account in 1987, at which time it had a balance of SF 7.00.

The CRT awarded the account to the claimant, the daughter of Charles Ulrich, observing that the case was exceptional in that account owners who left Europe prior to the Relevant Period (1933-1945) were considered not to have been Nazi victims. However, in this case, Charles Ulrich's daughter had "provided documentary evidence, consisting of her mother's passport with a German entry visa valid from August to October 1939, to show that her father, who was Jewish, attempted to return to Germany in 1939…. Although the Claimant did not explicitly state that her father was attempting to return to Germany in an attempt to rescue his mother and aunt, the CRT finds that, given the historical circumstances, this is the only reasonable explanation why he would do so. The Claimant explained that her father's ship was turned away because of the outbreak of the War. The CRT notes that the Claimant's father admittedly could have attempted to enter Germany by other means, but that in any case he would have been targeted for persecution and perhaps deported if he had entered the German Reich. Despite these risks, he attempted to return, was turned away, and never saw his mother or aunt again…. Accordingly, the CRT concludes that the Claimant has made a plausible showing that the Account Owner was a Victim of Nazi Persecution," and awarded the claimants the presumptive value of an account of unknown type.

v. In re Account of André Weber (SF 10,750.00)

Andre Weber, the claimant and account owner, was born in 1930. Prior to the Nazi occupation, he lived in Papa, Hungary. Andre Weber's parents imported fruits and vegetables from Trieste, Italy, and distributed them throughout Hungary. They also acted as agents for various companies selling sweets. The family business and other property were looted after the Nazi invasion, and the Webers, with their son, were forced to perform slave labor in Mühldorf. They were thereafter deported to Auschwitz.

The bank records showed that Andre Weber owned a savings account, numbered 6944, which was considered dormant, and was transferred to a suspense account on or before April 6, 1954. At that time, it held SF 5.60.

Although there was little additional information about the account in the bank files, the CRT awarded the account to the claimant, observing that he had provided documentary evidence that he was Andre Weber. Among other records, the claimant had provided a document issued by the Camp of Feldafing, which confirmed that he (Andre Weber) had been imprisoned at Mühldorf and Auschwitz. Because the reported value of the account was lower than the presumptive value of a savings account, the claimant was awarded the higher sum; i.e., the presumptive value.

vi. In re Account of Rahel Zeisler (SF 10,750.00)

Rahel Zeisler, née Dzialoschinsky, was born in 1894 in Kempen/Posen, Germany. She lived with her husband and children in Gailingen, Germany on the Swiss border, between 1930 and 1939. Rahel Zeisler's husband worked in Switzerland as a sales representative for a Czech firm, Texwa A.G., and he maintained an address in Baden, Switzerland. When the War broke out, Rahel Zeisler and three of her children gained entry into Switzerland, but Mr. Zeisler was denied entry. The family thus returned to Germany. In 1942, Mr. Zeisler was sent to a concentration camp. He was killed in Auschwitz in 1943. Rahel Zeisler also perished in 1943.[75] Three of their children likewise were killed in concentration camps.

Rahel Zeisler's account was claimed not only by her surviving children but also by an individual who stated that Rahel Zeisler was "a friend of the family." This claimant stated that Mr. Zeisler, a commercial traveler for a Czech leather goods firm, "often took monies into Switzerland for others." He said it was his belief that Mr. Zeisler had deposited 50,000 Reichsmark in Switzerland for the benefit of his (the claimant's) grandfather.

The bank records showed that Rahel Zeisler, a Swiss resident, held a savings/passbook account which was transferred to a suspense account for dormant assets on or before July 16, 1949. The account held SF 92.35 at the time of its transfer.

The CRT awarded the account to the surviving children of Rahel Zeisler, at the presumptive value for a savings account (since the recorded value was below presumptive value). As to the other claimant, the CRT observed that "there is no information in the Bank's records to indicate that the account at issue was opened for the benefit of anyone other than" Rahel Zeisler, and thus that claimant was "not entitled to any share of the award amount."

vii. In re Account of Eugen Zimmermann (SF 48,536.40)

Eugen Zimmermann, the claimant, was born in 1926 in Gyor, Hungary. His father, a wine and liquor distributor in Gyor, was deported with his wife and child (the claimant) to Auschwitz. Both parents perished. Eugen Zimmermann advised the CRT that he remembered his parents discussing their significant Swiss bank accounts, and that he went to Zurich in the 1960s to inquire about the family's assets, but was told that he needed account numbers to investigate further.

The bank records showed that Eugen Zimmermann held a numbered account of unknown type, which was transferred to a suspense account on or before February 19, 1993, several decades after the claimant had visited the banks in Zurich. At the time of the transfer, the account held a balance of SF 89.70, and it remained open and dormant. The CRT awarded the account to the claimant at its presumptive value.

2. Account Closed or Presumed Closed, Unknown to Whom

i. In re Account of Rosel Ascher (SF 28,712.50)

Rosel Ascher was born in 1899 and lived in Bamberg, Germany, where she was a partner in the family company S. Hess.

She was confined to a psychiatric institution in December 1940, and later deported to a concentration camp. Although the claimant, Ms. Ascher's niece, did not know her aunt's fate, the CRT conducted its own research. It analyzed the victim database made available as part of the ICEP audit (including a Yad Vashem database) and determined that Rosel Ascher was gassed on June 14, 1942.

The bank records demonstrated that on June 20, 1942, six days after Rosel Ascher was killed, her demand deposit account of unknown value was closed. The account, which had not been returned to the account owner or her heirs, was awarded at presumptive value.

ii. In re Account of Adolf Bauer and Clara Bauer (SF 289,087.50)

Adolf and Clara Bauer resided in Frankfurt, where Adolf Bauer was a businessman. Adolf Bauer, who was born in 1864, died in January 1936. His wife, Clara, who was born in 1882, was deported to the Lodz ghetto in 1941, where she perished.[76]

The bank records indicated that upon Adolf Bauer's death, his wife assumed ownership of her husband's demand deposit account. The records did not indicate if she also assumed ownership of her husband's custody account at the same bank. The records did not show when the accounts were closed, nor did they show the value of the accounts. The ICEP auditors presumed that the accounts were in fact closed and that there was no evidence of activity after 1945.

The CRT awarded the accounts at their respective presumptive values to the claimant, the Bauers' granddaughter, based on the fact that Adolf Bauer had died in Germany and his wife had perished in the Lodz ghetto. The CRT also applied the adverse inference principle adopted under the CRT Rules (as elaborated by the Court in its 2004 opinion), noting that "there is no record of the payment of the Account Owners' accounts to them, nor any record of a date of closure of the accounts; … the Account Owners and their heirs would not have been able to obtain information about their accounts after the Second World War from the Bank due to the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries by account owners because of the banks' concern regarding double liability."

[76] "Clara Bauer nee Dessauer was born in 1882. Prior to WWII she lived in Frankfurt am Main, Germany. Clara was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from Germany found in Gedenkbuch - Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933-1945, Bundesarchiv (German National Archives), Koblenz 1986." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://db.yadvashem.org/names/nameDetails.html?itemId=3777755&language=en (last visited Aug. 3, 2015). The Central Database entry records Clara Bauer's place of death as the Lodz Ghetto.

iii. In re Account of I. Louis Breslauer (SF 28,712.50)

Louis Israel Breslauer was born in 1883 in Jarotschin, Posen, Germany (today Jarocin, Poland) and resided in Düsseldorf, where he had been a horse dealer and later an insurance agent. His children, the claimants, advised the CRT that Louis Breslauer was beaten during Kristallnacht. Although his Swiss-born wife and children were able to flee to the U.S. in 1939, Mr. Breslauer was unable to join them.

Louis Breslauer sought but was denied entry into Switzerland. His house and other assets were seized, and he was forced to perform slave labor in a construction battalion at a satellite concentration camp on the outskirts of Düsseldorf. He was able to flee to the United States in 1941 or 1942.[77]

[77] As described on the website of the USHMM: "Henni Breslauer (later Padawer) is the daughter of Louis Breslauer and Rosa (nee Herz) Breslauer. She was born in Duesseldorf on January 26, 1928. Her brother Paul was born two years earlier. Rosa Herz was born in Solothurn Switzerland where her father served as a cantor and kosher butcher. Louis Breslauer was born in Jarocin Poland near Posen. As a young man he worked as a horse trader, but he later became an insurance agent. Though her family was religiously observant, Henni attended Catholic elementary school since it was one of the only two elementary schools available; she was given free time during the religious instruction. However, after the Nazi regime prohibited Jewish children from attending non-Jewish schools, Henni went to a newly created Jewish school housed in the conservative synagogue. She also participated in the Maccabi sports club. In September 1938 Henni's aunt and uncle immigrated to the United States and prepared an affidavit for Henni's family. The Breslauers decided to learn new trades to facilitate their immigration status. Louis trained as a masseur and learned how to make chocolate candies. Though still children, Henni and Paul both learned how to make jewelry from wood and copper. On Kristallnacht night, November 9 1938, SA men barged into the Breslauer's house, hit Louis with a night stick and broke his arm. Soon afterwards the family went to the American consulate in Stuttgart to apply for visas. They learned that since Louis and Rosa had been born in separate countries, they fell under under separate quota restrictions. Swiss nationals enjoyed a relatively short wait, whereas immigrating from either Germany or Poland was much more difficult and time-consuming. On September 11, 1939 the American consulate granted Rosa and the two children permission to immigrate. A couple of months later, they left Germany and briefly stayed in The Netherlands with an aunt who had married a Dutch convert to Judaism. (He later was responsible for saving many Jews.) From there on December 5, 1939 they sailed to New York on board the Staatendam. However Henni's father had no choice but to remain in Duesseldorf. Shortly thereafter he was conscripted for slave labor to do road construction though he was already in his 60s. Louis Breslauer finally received permission to immigrate in March 1941, but only after Rosa had raised a $2000 guarantee that her husband would not become a ward of the state. She had earned what money she could by selling stockings and pastries door-to-door. Henni's brother Paul helped out by selling newspapers and shining shoes. After Louis joined his family, they moved to a chicken farm in Vineland, New Jersey. In 1949 Henni married another German-Jewish émigré. Sadly though, her father died shortly before the wedding." http://collections.ushmm.org/search/catalog/pa1161428 (last visited Aug. 19, 2015).

Based on information published by the USHMM, the Breslauers settled in New Jersey, where they became chicken farmers.

U.S. Trading with the Enemy Act.[78] Louis Breslauer held a demand deposit account with the bank in New York, the balance of which was $227.53 as of June 14, 1941. The auditors presumed the account was closed, and found no evidence of post-1945 activity.

The CRT observed in awarding the account that the account "was frozen in the 1941 Freeze…. The Account Owner emigrated to the United States in 1941 or 1942…. [T]he Account Owner's family arrived in the [U.S.] in 1939, but there is no indication that either the Account Owner or [his] family accessed or attempted to access the account. Furthermore, the Bank's record does not indicate when the account was closed, there is no record of the account being released to the Account Owner, and no evidence that the account was closed to any other authorized party…. [A]lthough persecutees who had arrived in the [U.S.] by 23 February 1943 could, under the provisions of the US Treasury's general licensing system, access their accounts, there is no documentation on the extent to which eligible persons availed themselves of these provisions. Furthermore, there is no indication in the Bank's records of such a release of funds."

The CRT further observed that according to the 2000 Report of the Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States,[79] "many Holocaust victims did not recover their frozen assets or the full value of their assets." Thus, "[a]bsent evidence in the Bank's records and, in this case, in the official records of the State of New York," the account was awarded at its presumptive value.

iv. In re Accounts of Sigmund Freud (SF 317,800.00)

The world-renowned psychiatrist and founder of psychoanalysis, Sigmund Freud, was born in 1886 in Wandsbek, Germany. He lived and practiced in Vienna until 1938, when he was forced to flee to London. He passed away in London in 1939.

As noted by the CRT in a related decision discussed elsewhere herein (In re Alexander Freud and Harry Freud, concerning accounts owned by Sigmund Freud's brother and nephew), extensive diplomatic efforts were made to ensure Dr. Freud's safety, even before the Anschluss. Dr. Freud's diary, edited by Michael Molnar, reflects that certain United States authorities, one of whom was a former Freud patient, notified President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull of the dangers facing Dr. Freud in Nazi Vienna.

The CRT observed that on the same day that telegrams about Freud's plight were sent to these U.S. leaders, March 15, 1938, "groups of S.A. men raided the premises of Freud's publishing house and his home at Bergasse 19. Among the items seized during those raids were the Freuds' passports, approximately 6,000.00 Austrian schillings, and a copy of Freud's will, which referred to assets he held outside Austria." This information may have been suppressed pending Freud's escape by the person whom the Nazis had assigned to supervise the liquidation of Freud's press and other assets, Dr. Anton Sauerwald, who had been a student of one Dr.

Freud's friends. Also on the same day, another friend, Ernest Jones, a pioneering psychoanalyst and Freud's official biographer, visited Freud and convinced him to leave Austria.

Freud's home was raided again on March 22, this time by the Gestapo. His daughter Anna was arrested and interrogated for several hours. As described by the CRT, Ernest Jones observed in his biography of Sigmund Freud that the Nazis learned that Freud's Collected Writings had been set aside for safekeeping in Switzerland. The Nazis demanded that the writings be returned to Vienna, and when they were, they were "'more or less ceremoniously burned…. Of course, Freud's bank account was confiscated.'"

Freud was able to enter the United Kingdom, but before emigration, he was required to report his assets and pay the flight tax (which was actually paid by his friend Marie Bonaparte, Princess George of Greece). The family left for London on June 4, 1938. The New York Times reported on June 5, 1938 that Dr. Freud's publishing house and "'all his money'" had been confiscated.

The CRT observed that the sources it had analyzed had revealed that "Freud was targeted by the Nazis even after his [June 6, 1938] arrival in London." Nazi officials learned of his Swiss accounts "within weeks." His Swiss demand deposit account held in Dutch guilders was closed on June 30, 1938, as the bank records indicated, although Freud did not know of the closure. He continued to write to his Viennese attorney, Dr. Alfred Indra, in July 1938 of his "'painful surprise'" when he learned that "the foreign exchange office demands the sale of "'the assets in the account 'on deposit in Zurich.'"

In addition to the demand deposit account in Dutch guilders, the bank records showed that Sigmund Freud held another demand deposit account (in Swiss francs), which was closed on July 31, 1938. His custody account was closed on September 19, 1938.

The CRT awarded to the claimant, Freud's grandson, all three accounts at their respective presumptive values. The CRT observed that "the Bank's record does not indicate to whom any of the accounts were closed; that the Account Owner fled his country of origin due to Nazi persecution; that the Account Owner believed that the demand deposit account denominated in Dutch guilders was still open over two weeks after it had been closed, and that he believed that he still had control over the account; that the Account Owner had four sisters remaining in Vienna, who were eventually deported to concentration camps, where they perished [see In re Accounts of Alexander Freud and Harry Freud]; that he may have had other relatives remaining in his country of origin and that he may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts to ensure their safety; [and] that biographical information about the Account Owner clearly demonstrates that the Nazi regime was aware of the Account Owner's assets in Switzerland, and demanded that the Account Owner surrender many of his assets in exchange for his personal belongings and for being allowed to emigrate."

v. In re Accounts of Max Friede (SF 1,385,000.00)[80]

Max Friede was born in 1880 in Bocholt, Germany, where he owned a blanket factory. He sent two of his children to Switzerland to continue their education when it was no longer possible to study in Germany, and opened a Swiss account to pay for his daughters' tuition and other expenses. Max Friede, his wife and two other children fled Germany in 1939, eventually reaching New York in 1940. His daughters studying in Switzerland also went to New York in 1940.

The bank records showed that Max Friede owned two custody accounts, one of which was closed in March 1937, and the other in September 1938 (held at "Bank I"). Max Friede also owned a custody account at a second Swiss bank ("Bank II").

The records contained correspondence from 1949 to 1950 regarding Mr. Friede's efforts to retrieve his assets at Bank II. He advised the bank that he had owned a custody account which, in the summer of 1931, was worth approximately SF 50,000. The CRT observed that in its initial response to Mr. Friede, the bank stated that he "must have confused the name of Bank II and that Max Friede's account must have been held at another bank. In another letter from Bank II, … Bank II explained that because it would take many hours to research whether Max [80] Another award to this account owner was issued as well as a presumptive value adjustment, but are not discussed here. The total amount awarded for this account owner was SF 1,413,712.50.

Friede held an account, Bank II required a payment of 25.00 Swiss Francs (presumably per hour) to carry out his request." The ICEP auditors observed that there was no evidence of account activity after 1945. As described by the CRT, "Bank II may have improperly responded to claims made on an account owned by a possible Victim of Nazi Persecution."

The CRT awarded three custody accounts to the claimants (two daughters of Max Friede and their children). Two of the custody accounts were awarded at presumptive value, while the third, which Mr. Friede had stated in 1949 had been worth SF 50,000, was awarded at actual value.

Subsequently, after Bank I provided the CRT with additional documents relating to the value of one of the custody accounts, the CRT determined that only one custody account, rather than two, had been held in that Bank. The account had been closed in 1937 and then reopened in 1938. However, the CRT also determined that the custody account that was opened in 1938 held bonds of considerably higher value than the presumptive value that previously had been awarded. Thus, after deducting the overpayment for one custody account (which, as noted, had been paid at presumptive value), and calculating the value of the bonds held in the other custody account, the CRT awarded an additional SF 473,000.

vi. In re Accounts of Lina Hahn (SF 289,087.50)

Lina Hahn was born in Kleinlangheim, Germany. She was a senior nurse who had served in the German army during World War I. She later worked and lived at the Jewish hospital in Munich. The Nazis deported Lina Hahn and her sisters Sophie and Jette to Theresienstadt. Because of her service during World War I, the Nazis gave Lina Hahn a choice: she could remain in Theresienstadt, or she could be deported with her sisters to Auschwitz. She chose to join her sisters. All three were gassed in Auschwitz.[81]

[81] The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names indicates that the murders of all three sisters were recorded in the "Yizkor book of the Kitzingen community with names and biographic data of Jews who perished during the Holocaust." See http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=10779525&language=en (Lina Hahn); http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=10779505&language=en (Jette Hahn) and

After the war, their brother (the claimant's grandfather) tried to locate his sisters. On January 11, 1946, he placed a missing person notice in a newspaper. The claimant provided a copy of this notice to the CRT. It stated that the three women, including Lina Hahn, head nurse in Munich hospital, probably had been deported to Auschwitz.

The bank records showed that Fräulein Lina Hahn had held a demand deposit account, closed October 26, 1935, and a custody account, closed November 5, 1935. Based on the fact that Lina Hahn had died in Auschwitz, and that the Nazi regime had begun to confiscate assets of its Jewish population beginning with the Nazi accession to power in 1933 (see CRT Rules, Appendix C),[82] the CRT awarded Lina Hahn's great-niece the respective presumptive values of the demand deposit and custody accounts.

vii. In re Accounts of Emmerich Kalman (SF 1,852,193.75)

Emmerich Kalman, born in 1882 in Siofok, Hungary, was a well-known composer who lived in Vienna. Because he had retained his Hungarian citizenship, he was able to flee Vienna with his family after the Anschluss. The family fled to Paris, then to Portugal, Mexico, and finally to the U.S. in 1940. Emmerich Kalman and his wife returned to Paris after the War. Emmerich Kalman died in Paris in 1953.

Emmerich Kalman's daughter, the claimant, submitted materials including a copy of a 1938 Census form as well as a monograph entitled A Survey of the Operettas of Emmerich Kalman. The CRT also conducted its own extensive research. It observed that Emmerich Kalman was known as a "founding composer of the 'Silver Age' of Viennese operetta." He [82] By Order of April 24, 2003, the Court amended the CRT Rules by adopting "Appendix C," authorizing the CRT to presume in the absence of evidence to the contrary that accounts belonging to German owners closed on or after January 30, 1933 were closed improperly. The presumption was based upon historical analysis of the confiscations that began for many Jewish victims in Germany shortly after Hitler's accession to power, as well as the application of the "adverse inference" available under United States legal principles concerning destruction of evidence ("spoliation").

"achieved international fame" with works such as "Autumn Maneuver," "The Gypsy Virtuoso," "The Gypsy Princess," "Countess Maritza" and "The Circus Princess."

The CRT observed that "[d]espite being Jewish, Emmerich Kalman was one of Hitler's favorite composers, and after the Anschluss, Hitler instructed a general to approach Emmerich Kalman with an offer for the composer to be allowed to remain in Vienna as an 'honorary Aryan.'" Doubting whether the offer could be guaranteed, Kalman did not accept and instead fled to Paris. His works were banned in Germany as Entartete Musik ("Degenerate Music"). Kalman learned that his two sisters had perished in the Holocaust, and he suffered a heart attack upon learning this news.

The bank records showed that Emmerich Kalman, a Komponist (composer), owned a demand deposit account closed on April 30, 1938, and a custody account closed on May 5, 1938. Subsequently, the CRT received "voluntary assistance" from the bank, including documents showing that the custody account had contained two different bonds.[83]

[83] The additional documents showed the type of securities; their face value; and date of transfer from the account.

Utilizing Special Master Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT awarded Emmerich Kalman's daughter the actual value of the assets in the custody account as of the date of their transfer out of the account (i.e. the date upon which the account owner was deemed to have lost control over the account). The demand deposit account was awarded at presumptive value. The CRT observed that it was plausible that neither Emmerich Kalman nor his heirs had received these assets, given that the accounts were closed after the Anschluss, and that Kalman had resided in Austria after that time, and could not have received the account proceeds without losing control of their disposition.

viii. In re Account of Arthur Lehmann (SF 161,088.13)

Arthur Abraham Lehmann was born in 1877 in München Gladbach, Germany. He lived with his wife Anna and their three children in Mannheim, where he was an architect and author. Anna Lehmann died in 1932. The Lehmanns' son, the claimant, lived in Milan, Italy. In 1939, Arthur Lehmann visited his son in Milan, who convinced him to stay there due to the outbreak of World War II and the increased persecution of Jews in Germany. In 1941, the Lehmanns moved to Rome. Arthur Lehmann was deported from Rome to an internment camp in Ferramonti, Italy.

Arthur Lehmann was liberated in 1944 and left for the United States. Once in the United States, he lived for two years in the Oswego refugee camp at Fort Ontario, New York.[84]

[84] In 1944, President Roosevelt "announced his plan to create a free port at Fort Ontario in Oswego, New York. Roosevelt circumvented the rigid immigration quotas by identifying these refugees as his 'guests,' but that status gave them no legal standing and required their return to Europe once conditions permitted their repatriation…. [T]he refugees were not permitted to leave Fort Ontario, even to work or to visit family members already settled in the United States…. Advocates for the refugees continually lobbied Congress and the President to allow them to stay in America. Finally, after eighteen months in the camp, President Truman permitted their legal entry into the country. The camp closed a short time later in February 1946." Arthur Lehmann died in Niagara Falls, New York in 1948; his two daughters (the claimant's sisters) died in Germany in 1989 and 1993, respectively.

The bank records showed that Arthur Lehmann of Milan held a demand deposit account in foreign currency, which held a balance equivalent to SF 12,887.05 as of the account's closing on September 1, 1936. The account was published as part of the 2005 List.

The CRT observed that it was "plausible that the Claimant resided in Milan at the time the account was open and that his father, who resided in Germany, may have opened the account [at some unknown time] using his address." The CRT awarded the account at its actual value (after application of the multiplier), noting that although the account was closed in 1936, Arthur Lehmann had "remained in Germany until 1939, and would not have been able to repatriate his account to Germany without losing ultimate control over its proceeds."

ix. In re Account of Irma Lustig-Lowenthal (SF 256,425.00)

Irma Lustig-Lowenthal was born in 1891 in Bad Kissingen, Germany. She lived with her husband, Seli Lustig, and their daughter (the claimant) in Wurzburg and Neustadt, Germany. She left Germany for Voorburg, Holland, in 1934, and later lived in Amsterdam until 1943. She was killed in the Ravensbruck concentration camp on September 12, 1944.[85]

The bank records showed that Irma Lustig-Lowenthal owned an account, but neither its type nor its value was reported. The CRT awarded the account at its presumptive value. The CRT observed that Irma Lustig-Lowenthal had left Germany in 1934. She had lived in Holland until 1943, and she perished in the Holocaust in 1943. "[T]here is no indication in the bank records that the Account Owner accessed the account or received the proceeds" during this period. Further, the "application of confiscatory laws in Holland by the Nazi Regime during the 1940s … makes it unlikely that the Account Owner received the proceeds herself." Since she had perished during the Holocaust, she "could not have received the assets herself following the Second World War."

Several years after the decision was issued and the claimant was paid, following the CRT's continuing request for supplementation of the available bank and ICEP records through the "voluntary assistance" process, the bank provided the CRT with additional documents concerning the assets of Irma Lustig-Lowenthal. These new documents demonstrated that the account had been a custody account. It had been jointly owned by Irma Lustig-Lowenthal and her husband, Seli Lustig, of Neustadt, and it had been reported in the 1962 Survey of Swiss banks. The CRT accordingly awarded Irma Lustig-Lowenthal's daughter an additional SF 113,125, representing the difference between the presumptive value of a custody account and the presumptive value of an account of unknown type (as multiplied by 12.5).

x. In re Accounts of Elisabeth Magnus (SF 488,828.63)

Elisabeth Magnus was born in 1888 and lived in Berlin. Her daughter (the claimant's mother) attended a Swiss boarding school. Elisabeth Magnus performed military service in Germany until the Nazi authorities learned that she was Jewish. She was killed in Lodz in 1941.[86]

The bank records showed that Elisabeth Magnus owned a demand deposit account, closed in April 1934, and a custody account, closed in December 1936. The CRT took note of the presumptions of Appendix C of the CRT Rules, recognizing that Nazi confiscations in Germany began in 1933. The CRT also observed that the account owner "would not have been able to repatriate her accounts to Germany without losing ultimate control over their proceeds," and that she had been killed in Lodz. Accordingly, the CRT awarded the accounts at presumptive value.

After the award was issued, the bank located and made available to the CRT new records relating to the contents of the custody account. The records demonstrated that Elisabeth Magnus had owned nine different securities. Certain of these securities had been transferred into accounts numbered, respectively, 15200 and 1211, which "appear as the transfer destination for other, unrelated accounts held by apparently unrelated account owners." The CRT further observed that "two of these securities" were held in London, and that it was "common practice for most British-issued securities to remain physically in England, deposited in an English bank," but that "the Bank in Switzerland was ultimately in control of the disposition of these assets."

After calculating the actual value of these securities in accordance with Special Master Junz's Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the claimant received an additional award of $297,616.13, representing the difference between the actual value of the account and the amount previously awarded based on presumptive values.

xi. In re Account of Albert Mendel (SF 45,425.00); In re Account of Albert Mendel (SF 37,575.00)

Albert Mendel was born in 1875 in Germany, and he lived in Cologne, where he was a silk and fabrics wholesaler with customers such as Bally in Switzerland. He was deported to Theresienstadt, where he perished.[87] His wife was deported to Auschwitz in 1944, where she too perished.

In 1956, the claimant, the Mendels' daughter, wrote to the Swiss bank seeking information about her father's account. The CRT observed that "[i]n its response to the Claimant's letter, the Bank disingenuously stated that due to Swiss law, which did not require banks to keep business records for more than 10 years, such information was not available. In fact, the Bank confirmed internally that the Account had existed but failed to provide the Claimant with that information." The bank records demonstrated that Albert Mendel actually had owned two accounts, one of unknown type opened in 1929 and closed on July 27, 1939, and the other a safe deposit box opened in 1930 and closed in 1936.[88]

The CRT determined in an initial decision that the account of unknown type should be awarded to Albert Mendel's daughter at presumptive value, as there was no evidence that the account owner had received the proceeds. In a subsequent decision, the CRT determined that the safe deposit box should be awarded as well, noting that "the Nazis embarked on a campaign in 1933 to seize the domestic and foreign assets of Jewish nationals in Germany through the enforcement of flight taxes and other confiscatory measures including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks;" that "the Account Owner remained in Germany until 1941 and would not have been able to repatriate his account to Germany without its confiscation;" and taking into consideration the "deportation in 1941 and death of the Account Owner in a concentration camp as a result of Nazi persecution."

xii. In re Account of Bankgeschäft E.J. Meyer (SF 260,375.00)

Bankgeschäft E. J. Meyer was a bank located in Berlin that was aryanized by the Nazis. One of the bank's owners, the father of the claimant, had been born in 1886 in Berlin. He was married to a woman who was a cousin of the renowned Warburg family, which owned Warburg & Co. in Amsterdam and M. M. Warburg in Hamburg. The claimant and her parents fled Nazi Germany via Amsterdam and Lisbon, arriving in the United States in June 1941.

The bank records, which were not part of the Account History Database (AHD) compiled as part of the ICEP audit but rather were located by the CRT in the Total Account Database (TAD), indicated that Bankgeschäft E.J. Meyer held a custody account. It was closed on August 2, 1934.

In awarding the account, the CRT observed that the Nazis had begun their campaign of confiscations after coming to power in 1933. The account had been closed thereafter, in 1934. The CRT further noted that one of the bank's owners had remained in Nazi Germany until he fled, and the bank was aryanized. The CRT awarded the account to the claimant at presumptive value. Although the bank (and thus its Swiss account) had been owned by two other individuals in addition to the claimant's father, based on CRT Rule 25(2), the claimant was entitled to the entire proceeds: "in cases where a joint account is claimed by relatives of only one or some of the joint account owners, it shall be presumed that the account was owned as a whole or in equal shares by the Account Owners whose shares of the account have been claimed."[89]

xiii. In re Accounts of Nachlass C. L. Netter (SF 306,812.50)

Dr. Carl Leopold Netter was born in 1864 in Bühl, Germany. He was a lawyer, and also owned a steel business in Berlin, Wolf Netter & Jacobi, in which his son-in-law, Julius Seligsohn-Netter, was a partner. According to the claimant, the great-great-grandson of Dr. Carl Leopold Netter, Dr. Netter was a board member of his synagogue. He was also a Kommerzienrat (councilor of commerce) and a Handelsrichter (commercial judge). He died in 1922 in Baden-Baden, Germany.

In addition to the data provided by the claimant, the CRT obtained through its independent research information indicating that "Carl Leopold Netter was a prominent industrialist as well as an active leader of the Jewish community in Germany. After taking over the management of his father's firm in Strasbourg, he moved its operations to Berlin and developed it into one of the most important companies in Germany's iron industry. After the Nazis came to power in 1933, the company was seized and turned over to the Mannesmann concern. Netter was also a founder of the metal exchange in Berlin, a member of the chamber of commerce and a trustee of the Commercial Academy of Berlin." In addition, the CRT noted, as reported in the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, Carl Leopold Netter was a founder of the Jewish Hospital of Berlin, the Academy of Jewish Science, and other Jewish organizations.

[89] The CRT Rules provided that in the event of a valid, later timely-filed claim (or a late claim deemed to have shown an excusable reason for lateness), family members were required to share their awards with relatives of equal entitlement, and to transfer the entire award to relatives better entitled to the account.

Julius Seligsohn-Netter (the claimant's great-grandfather and the son-in-law of Carl Leopold Netter) served as managing agent of the family steel firm. He died in London in 1964. Another family member, Julius L. Seligsohn, brought his relatives to safety in England in 1938 or 1939. He returned to Germany to help other Jewish families. However, near the end of the War, he was captured and deported to a concentration camp, where he died.

The bank records indicated that the Estate (Nachlass) of Kommerzienrat Dr. C. L. Netter (whose power of attorney holders included Dr. Julius Seligsohn-Netter and Dr. Julius L. Seligsohn) owned a custody account and a demand deposit account. Two of the three power of attorney holders needed to authorize any transactions involving the accounts. The accounts were opened no later than February 2, 1933, and were closed on January 26, 1934.

The CRT awarded the accounts to Dr. C. L. Netter's great-granddaughter (the claimant's mother, whom the claimant represented). The CRT noted that although Dr. C. L. Netter had died in 1922, and thus was not a Nazi victim, his Estate and its beneficiaries were victims. The CRT pointed out that the accounts were closed in 1934, and at least one power of attorney holder had remained in Germany through 1940, while another died in a concentration camp. The heirs would not have been able to repatriate the account proceeds to Germany without losing ultimate control over the assets. The CRT awarded the presumptive value of the demand deposit account. The custody account held bonds that were in default at the time the account owner lost control over the account, and thus in accordance with Special Master Junz' Guidelines for the Valuation of Securities, the CRT awarded the prevailing market value as opposed to the nominal value.

xiv. In re Account of Isaac Pardo (SF 28,712.50)

Isaac Pardo was born in 1898 in Plovdiv, Bulgaria. He owned a currency exchange company in Sofia with business connections in Switzerland and France. He had a business associate named Salomon Pappo, who also worked as a currency dealer in Paris. According to the claimant (the son of Isaac Pardo), Salomon Pappo had a daughter named Jacqueline, and a son who was a dentist. The claimant advised the CRT that in 1940, before the family fled from Bulgaria to Greece, Isaac Pardo talked to Salomon Pappo about accounts in Swiss banks. In opening his Swiss account, he may have provided a Paris address, because his acquaintance Pappo lived in Paris. The Pardo family subsequently emigrated to Palestine (now Israel). The claimant studied in Paris between 1957 and 1962, where he met with Salomon Pappo.

The bank records indicated that the account owner was Isaac Pardo, who lived in Paris. He held a demand deposit account which was opened in April 1940 and closed in September 1940.

To assist the claimant, the CRT conducted its own investigation of the possible ties between the Pardo and Pappo families. As described by the CRT, since "the Claimant stated that his father had close connections to Paris, France, but could not provide documents to confirm that his father may have used a French address, the CRT requested that the Claimant attempt to locate one of the children of his father's business associate, Salomon Pappo. The Claimant stated that since he had not had any contact with the Pappo family for the last 40 years it would be impossible for him to locate them. The CRT, therefore, conducted research in electronic databases and French telephone directories."

The CRT "provided the Claimant with contact information for persons named Jacqueline Pappo and male dentists named Pappo in Paris." Shortly thereafter, "the Claimant informed the CRT that he had located Jacqueline Pappo, the daughter of his father's former associate, based on the information provided to him by the CRT. On the same date, the CRT received a telephone call from Jacqueline Pappo of Paris. In this telephone call, after the caller confirmed her identity, Jacqueline Pappo stated that her father was Salomon Pappo, a stockbroker from Paris. She further stated that her father and the Claimant's father, Isaac Pardo, were business associates." She confirmed that her brother was a dentist and that her father and Isaac Pardo had had business relations during the 1950s. She could not provide information about their relations in the 1940s, as she was a young child at that time. She said that her father had lived in hiding in France during World War II. She confirmed her statements in a follow-up letter to the CRT.

Based on these biographical details, which showed that it was plausible that Isaac Pardo of Bulgaria had had a close associate in Paris, and thus may have given the bank a Paris address, and in light of the fact that he was "expelled from Bulgaria a few months after the account was opened; that the account was closed on 13 September 1940, after France was occupied by the Nazis", and that the account owner and his family had lived in hiding in Greece, "which was invaded by Italy in 1940 and was occupied by the Nazis in 1941," the CRT awarded the claimant the demand deposit account at its presumptive value.

xv. In re Account of Julius Rosenthal (SF 260,375.00)

Julius Rosenthal was born in 1875 in Hainau, Germany. He owned and managed a transportation and communications company, Rote Radler, in Königsberg, Germany (now Kaliningrad, Russia). Julius Rosenthal subsequently lived in Berlin, and then fled with his wife in 1939. After being denied entry to Switzerland, the Rosenthals fled to Amsterdam. The Rote Radler company was confiscated by the Nazis, and the Rosenthals were arrested in Amsterdam and deported to a concentration camp, where they died on an unknown date between 1943 and 1945.

The bank records indicated that Direktor (director or managing director) Julius Rosenthal resided in Amsterdam, and owned a custody account. The ICEP auditors presumed that the account had been closed, as there was no evidence of activity after 1945. The CRT awarded the account to Julius Rosenthal's daughter, the claimant, who had not submitted a claim form but in 1999 had filed two Initial Questionnaires. As Julius Rosenthal had been killed in a concentration camp and there was no evidence that the account had been returned to him or to his heirs, nor was there evidence of the account's value, the CRT awarded the custody account at its presumptive value.

xvi. In re Accounts of Amalie Roth and Leiser Roth (SF 366,750.00)

Amalie Roth was born in 1889 in Rudnick, Poland. She lived with her husband Leiser in Stuttgart, Germany. Leiser Roth was a partner in a feather business in Stuttgart, while Amalie Roth owned a bridal goods store in the same city. The claimant, their niece, informed the CRT that at age seven, she was sent by her parents from her home in Poland to live with her aunt Amalie Roth (her mother's sister) for three years in Stuttgart. She travelled with her aunt during the 1930s, including a visit to Switzerland. She stated that she was her aunt's favorite niece. Her aunt was able to flee to Switzerland in 1939, and she moved to New York in 1948. The claimant was forced to remain behind in Germany, where her parents had moved. Her parents were killed in concentration camps, as was her uncle, Leiser Roth.

The bank records indicated that Amalie Roth and Leiser Roth owned a custody account opened on June 8, 1936 and closed on December 10, 1936. They also owned an account of unknown type, of unknown opening and closing dates. The CRT awarded the custody account based on the presumption that Nazi confiscations of assets owned by Jewish nationals in Germany began in 1933 (see CRT Rules, Appendix C), and the Roths could not have repatriated their accounts to Germany without confiscation. The account of unknown type was awarded based upon its likely confiscation, along with the custody account.

After the award was issued, the CRT determined that another claimant also had filed a timely claim to the account, but the claim had been unavailable for matching when the CRT had reviewed the claim filed by the Roths' niece. The second claimant also was a niece of the Roths; Amalie Roth was her paternal aunt. The CRT awarded the second claimant the share to which she would have been entitled had her claim been available for review when the accounts were awarded originally. The CRT observed that over two years had passed since the award had been issued to the first niece and that there was no indication that that individual was aware that "another equally entitled relative had filed a claim." Thus, the original claimant was not asked to return the overpayment, while the second claimant was paid her share of the award.

xvii. In re Account of Josef Schmidt (SF 37,575.00)

Josef Schmidt was born in 1904 in Romania. As the CRT observed, he "began his career as a cantor and became an internationally known opera star and recording artist." He "died at the age of 38 in Switzerland, where he had fled as a refugee and had been interned in the Gyrenbad refugee camp."

The CRT conducted extensive research to supplement the information provided in claim forms and other documents filed by seven different claimants. The CRT traced Josef Schmidt's career from his '"first vocal training … as a classic Hebrew singer in the local synagogue in Cernowitz,'" through his studies of voice and piano in Berlin and his military service from 1926 to 1929, followed by "international acclaim," including performances in German films in the early 1930s, and at Carnegie Hall in 1937.

However, after touring the United States, Schmidt interrupted his career and returned to Cernowitz in 1939 "'for a final visit with his recently widowed mother. As war erupted he tried to make his way to America, but made it only as far as a Swiss refugee camp in Gyrenbad.'"

The CRT noted that Schmidt's experiences had been discussed in "a seminal work on Swiss refugee policies, 'The Lifeboat is Full' (Das Boot ist Voll)."[90] The CRT quoted the book:

> The fate of Joseph Schmidt, the singer, cannot be forgotten. The sudden death of this internationally known and loved artist, who starred in the film A Song Goes Round the World (Ein Lied Geht um die Welt), among many others, was reported at the end of November 1942 by Dr. Fritz Heberlein [in several Swiss newspapers]. Joseph Schmidt was removed on October 27, 1942 from the Gyrenbad camp to the cantonal hospital in Zurich, where his illness was diagnosed as a minor laryngitis and tracheitis. He was then discharged as cured, although he complained of chest pains. He was very fearful at the thought of returning to the camp, because he dreaded — and certainly not without reason — the serious damage to his most precious asset, his voice, that might result from the extremely bad hygienic conditions and the dust of the straw pallets in Gyrenbad. A private physician was prepared to accept him into his own clinic after his > release from the hospital, give him a thorough examination, and treat him. But the camp authorities, without any malevolence, refused permission — in fact, on the ground of democracy — because even refugees of means were supposed to be treated only in cantonal hospitals. So the thirty-eight-year-old singer finally went back, to the camp. As a concession, the camp commander billeted him in the inn that adjoined the camp.

>
> The next morning Schmidt died of a heart attack.
> Granted that his death cannot be simply ascribed to the functionaries. But if they had been somewhat less bureaucratic and thus avoided agitating the singer, at least they would not have been vulnerable to the charge of contributing to his death.

The "'story did not end with Schmidt's death.'" Dr. Heberlein, who reported on the death, asked that conditions at the refugee camp be investigated. Instead, Dr. Heberlein was informed that his writings "fell within the definition of possible rumor-mongering and it was possible that his eulogy of Josef Schmidt might be injurious to Switzerland's reputation in the United States!'"

The CRT observed that in the Bergier Final Report, Josef Schmidt's treatment in Switzerland likewise was given special attention. The Bergier Commission pointed out that although Schmidt's death "'shocked the public in 1942,'" the "'protest brought no changes in the mandatory assignment of work'" in Swiss refugee camps.

In addition to having been a refugee, Josef Schmidt also was a depositor in Switzerland. The bank records indicated that Josef Schmidt of Vienna had opened a safe deposit box on September 18, 1933. The closing date of the safe deposit box was illegible in the bank files. The CRT determined that an award for the presumptive value of a safe deposit box (as multiplied by 12.5) was appropriate, "[g]iven that [Josef Schmidt] resided in Nazi-occupied territory during parts of the period from 1938 to 1942, and that in 1942 he fled to Switzerland, where he died in a refugee camp."

The CRT was presented with multiple claims for the account, and considered extensive documentation in determining which, if any, of the seven groups of claimants were entitled to share in the award. The claimants submitted, variously, Initial Questionnaires, ATAG Ernst &

Young claims, and other documents, all indicating that they were related or otherwise connected to the famous opera singer. Among the claimants were:

- Claimant 1, who was born in Romania, who stated that Josef Schmidt was her grandfather's half-brother;
- Claimant 2, who was born in Tirgu-Mures, Romania, who stated that Joseph Schmidt was her grandfather's cousin (i.e., her great-grandfather and Joseph Schmidt's father were brothers);
- Claimant 3, who was born in Romania, who stated that Josef Schmidt was her uncle (her father's older brother);
- Claimant 4, who was born in Antwerp, Belgium, who stated that Josef Schmidt was a friend who had owed her family money for unpaid room and board; the claimant stated that Josef Schmidt had lived with her family rent-free in Antwerp in approximately 1939, and later became a famous opera singer;
- Claimant 5, who was born in 1955, who stated that Joseph Schmidt was his grandfather's cousin;
- Claimant 6, who was born in Frasin (Romania), who stated that Josef Schmidt was her mother's brother. Among the documents the claimant submitted were a photograph of her mother's gravestone, indicating that the mother of Claimant 6 was the sister of chamber singer Joseph Schmidt, as well as a photograph of Josef Schmidt with his niece (the claimant) at a piano; and
- Claimant 7, who was born in Glewitz, Germany, who stated that Joseph Schmidt was his cousin (the son of his father's sister).

The CRT concluded that under Article 23 (1)(d) of the CRT Rules, "if neither the Account Owner's spouse nor any descendants of the Account Owner have submitted a claim, the award shall be in favor of any descendants of the Account Owner's parents [emphasis added by CRT] who have submitted a claim, in equal shares by representation. In this case, [Claimant 6] and [Claimant 3] are the descendants of two of the Account Owner's siblings. Accordingly, [Claimant 6] and [Claimant 3] are each entitled to one-half of the total award amount…. [N]either [Claimant 2], [Claimant 5], nor [Claimant 7], who are the descendants of the Account Owner's grandparents, nor [Claimant 1], who is the descendant of only one of the Account Owner's parents, are entitled to a portion of the Award. Furthermore, [Claimant 4], who is not a relative of the Account Owner, also has no entitlement to the proceeds of his account."

xviii. In re Accounts of Lilli Schocken and Einkaufszentrale I. Schocken Söhne GmbH (SF 781,125.00)

Lilli Schocken was born in 1889 in Frankfurt. She lived in Zwickau, Germany with her husband Salman, with whom she owned a chain of department stores (Kaufhaus Schocken), which in turn was owned by the parent company Einkaufszentrale I. Schocken Söhne GmbH.[91]

In 1934, Lilli and Salman Schocken fled to Palestine. Their business was confiscated by the Nazis in 1938. In 1940, the Schockens emigrated to Scarsdale, New York, where Lilli Schocken died in 1958, and where Salman Schocken died in 1959. In their wills, they designated their five children as heirs. The wills made reference to restitution of the family's German business prior to January 1, 1954.[92]

[91] See also In re Accounts of Hermann Tietz & Co., et al., infra, awarding the Swiss accounts held by another major German department store, Georg Tietz (KaDeWe). As set forth in the Tietz award, department stores owned by Jewish individuals were an early target of Nazi confiscations.

[92] The Schocken family received certain restitution for the seizure of the business, an amount that was increased in 2014 following litigation in Germany. See Karin Matussek, Jewish Family Gets $68 Million for 1938 Nazi Store Seizures, BLOOMBERG, June 12, 2014, http://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2014-06-12/jewish-family-awarded-68-million-for-1938-nazi-store-seizures ("The heirs of a Jewish family that owned Schocken AG, a German department-store chain seized by the Nazis, were awarded an extra 50 million euros ($68 million) in compensation by a Berlin court. The German government, which has already paid about 15 million

The CRT's research indicated that in addition to owning the department store chain with branches throughout Germany, Salman Schocken also was a well-known publisher. In 1915, with Martin Buber,[93] he co-founded the Zionist journal Der Jude; in 1929, he established the Schocken Institute for Research on Jewish Poetry; and in 1931, he founded the publishing house Schocken Verlag. After fleeing from Nazi Germany, he built the Schocken Library in Jerusalem and bought the newspaper Haaretz. He founded the Schocken Publishing House Ltd. and later opened a New York branch, Schocken Books, which in 1987 became part of Random House, Inc. The CRT observed that according to the Random House website, Schocken's authors include Sholem Aleichem, Martin Buber, Franz Kafka, Harold S. Kushner, Elie Wiesel and Simon Wiesenthal.

Salman Schocken's collection of Jewish books was smuggled out of Germany. As described by the CRT, the books "have a permanent home at The Schocken Institute" in Jerusalem. The Institute's website explains that the "'Schocken Library is a rare book and research library serving scholars in Israel and throughout the world. The nucleus of the collection contains the private collection of the late Zalman Schocken, whose dedication to public affairs was immeasurable. Unlike other collectors, Zalman Schocken neither collected books for collection's sake alone nor for the sheer purpose of exhibiting them. He was guided by a deep sense of respect and awe towards the books in the 'Wandering Jew's' traveling sack. Those books became the portable homeland of the people in exile - setting it apart, as well as uniting it.'"

The CRT's research also revealed that, as described in a Publisher's Weekly review of Anthony David's biography of Salman Schocken: "'Like so many German Jews, his belief in German rectitude and culture blinded him to the seriousness of the Nazi threat, and only very late

93 "The work of the prolific essayist, translator, and editor Martin Buber (1878-1965) is predominantly dedicated to three areas: the philosophical articulation of the dialogic principle (das dialogische Prinzip), the revival of religious consciousness among the Jews (by means of the literary retelling of Hasidic tales and an innovative German translation of the Bible), and to the realization of this consciousness through the Zionist movement." and with a great deal of good fortune was he able to move his family and some of his wealth to Palestine.'"[94]

The bank records showed that Lilli Schocken owned an account over which her husband Salman Schocken and the business Einkaufszentrale held power of attorney. Lilli Schocken owned a custody account (No. 36684) which the ICEP auditors presumed had been closed, as there was no evidence of post-1945 account activity.

The bank records also contained documents relating to the 1993 reconstitution of Einkaufszentrale for the purpose of restitution. The company was represented at that time by two individuals living in Israel, both of whom subsequently were represented as claimants in the CRT proceeding.

Following the CRT's request to the bank for "voluntary assistance," the bank provided additional documents showing that Lilli Schocken held a custody account (No. 19899) which was opened on November 17, 1936 and closed on January 26, 1940. The records further showed that Einkaufszentrale owned a custody account (No. 10228), which was opened on October 21, 1930 and closed on December 8, 1936.

[94] https://www.publishersweekly.com/978-0-8050-6630-2.

The CRT determined that the claimants were entitled to all three custody accounts. As to Account No. 36684, the CRT noted that there was neither a record of a closing date nor of payment to the account owner, and thus the account was presumed not to have been paid to its owner.

As to Account No. 10228 (owned by Einkaufszentrale), the CRT observed that "even though records regarding the restitution of assets belonging to Einkaufszentrale appear in the Bank's records, it is not clear whether the Claimant and/or her other family members … received the proceeds of the account." Although the records included a restitution decision by a German court, "there is no evidence that the Bank provided information about this account, its contents, or the circumstances of its closure to the restitution court in Germany." The account thus was presumed not to have been returned to its owner.

Finally, as to Account No. 19899, although the account was closed in January 1940, "at which time … Account Owner Schocken was outside Nazi-dominated territory," the bank records "do not indicate to whom the account was closed." Since Lilli Schocken had fled due to Nazi persecution, she "may have had relatives remaining in their country of origin." She "may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over their accounts to ensure their safety."

The CRT awarded the accounts to the Schockens' 18 heirs, their children and grandchildren. The CRT determined that two heirs each were entitled to 1/10th of the award; seven heirs each were entitled to 1/15th of the award; four heirs each were entitled to 1/20th of the award; two heirs each were entitled to 1/30th of the award; and three heirs each were entitled to 1/45th of the award.

xix. In re Account of Emil Seidler (SF 28,712.50)

Emil Seidler was born in 1891 in Olomouc, Moravia, Czechoslovakia, where he lived with his wife. He was a coal distributor there until 1939. He fled to Nice in 1939, and then to Lisbon. He emigrated to the U.S. in 1942. He died in New York in 1981, and his wife died there in 1983.

The bank records showed that Emil Seidler owned a safe deposit box closed on August 11, 1934; a demand deposit account closed on July 31, 1939; a custody account closed on August 9, 1939; and a demand deposit account closed on November 18, 1974.

The CRT observed that the safe deposit box had been closed in 1934, prior to the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia, and when Emil Seidler still was living in that country. As to the accounts closed in 1939, while Emil Seidler was living in Nice, the CRT observed that those accounts similarly had been closed prior to the Nazi invasion of France. Thus, the CRT determined that Emil Seidler had closed all three of these accounts himself and that he had received their proceeds.[95]

However, as to the demand deposit account closed in 1974, the CRT awarded the account at presumptive value to the claimant, Emil Seidler's grand-nephew. The CRT observed that there was no record that the account had been paid to the owner or his heirs, and the auditors had found no evidence of post-1945 activity on the account.

xx. In re Accounts of Henry Seligmann (SF 289,087.50); In re Account of Milton Seligman (SF 260,375.00)

Henry Seligmann: Henry Seligmann was born in 1909 in Frankfurt, Germany, where he lived until 1928. He left Germany to study physics in Lausanne, Switzerland. After obtaining his doctorate in physics, he returned in 1937 to Frankfurt, and later that year fled with his parents to the United States. After the War, Henry Seligmann moved to the United Kingdom, where he headed the Isotopes section of the Atomic Energy Research Establishment near Harwell, Oxfordshire, "the main centre for atomic energy research and development in the United Kingdom from the 1940s to the 1990s."[96]

[95] See also Order of November 29, 2006, confirming that accounts closed prior to the date that the account owner's country of residence had been occupied by or allied with Nazi Germany were presumed to have been closed properly by the account owner, absent evidence to the contrary.

[96] See Wikipedia, Atomic Energy Research Establishment, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Atomic_Energy_Research_Establishment (last visited Aug. 26, 2008); see also Canadian Nuclear Society home page [https://www.cns-snc.ca] (describing the "long list of … chemistry

The bank records indicate that Henry Seligmann held a custody account closed on September 7, 1933, and a demand deposit account closed on October 31, 1933.

The CRT awarded the accounts to the claimants, Henry Seligmann's children, at presumptive value. The CRT observed that although the accounts were closed at a time when Henry Seligmann was living outside Nazi territory, he may have "yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his accounts" to ensure the safety of relatives still living in Germany, and "it is plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to the Account Owner or his heirs."

Milton Seligman: In a different decision, the CRT awarded the accounts of Henry Seligmann's father, Milton Seligman, to his daughter and grandson, the son of Henry Seligmann. Milton Seligman was born in 1866 in Frankfurt and was married to Marie Bernhardine Seligman (Seligmann), with whom he had five children. According to the claimant, Milton Seligman was a district court judge in Frankfurt, and fled Germany after the Nazis' rise to power. He died in Villars sur Ollon, Switzerland in 1948.

The bank records indicated that Dr. Milton Seligman owned a custody account that was closed on April 20, 1934. The CRT awarded the account at its presumptive value, observing that "the Account Owner remained in Nazi Germany until 1937, and would not have been able to repatriate his account to Germany without its confiscation."

xxi. In re Account of S. Steinlauf (SF 28,712.50)

Siegfried (Zobel) Steinlauf was born in 1902 in Frankfurt, and in the 1930s moved with his wife to Belgium to flee Nazi persecution. However, the Steinlaufs eventually were deported to concentration camps, where they both died; Siegfried on September 8, 1942 and his wife on October 24, 1942. The claimant, Siegfried Steinlauf's nephew, advised the CRT that just prior to his deportation, Siegfried had attempted to obtain the release of his brother (the claimant's father) from Nazi imprisonment, using money held in Switzerland.

The bank records showed that S. Steinlauf of Frankfurt and Basel held a demand deposit account that was opened on November 10, 1931 and closed on July 10, 1934. The CRT awarded the account at presumptive value to Siegfried Steinlauf's nephew. The account owner had been killed in a concentration camp, and "in 1933 the Nazis embarked on a campaign to seize the domestic and foreign assets of Jewish nationals in Germany through the enforcement of flight taxes and other confiscatory measures including confiscation of assets held in Swiss banks [see Appendix C]; … [and] the Account Owner, shortly before his own deportation, attempted to use what he believed to be his Swiss funds in 1942 to obtain the release of his brother, eight years after the closing of the account, plausibly indicating that the Account Owner was unaware of the 1934 account closure."

xxii. In re Account of Jenny Sterner-Masius (SF 285,137.50)

Jenny Sterner-Masius was born in 1878 in Mannheim, Germany. She was arrested in Mannheim in October 1940, and deported to the concentration camp in Gurs, France. She perished there two months later.[97]

The bank records indicated that Jenny Sterner-Masius owned an account of unknown type. Since there was no evidence of post-1945 activity on the account, the ICEP auditors presumed that the account was closed. The CRT awarded the account to the granddaughter of Jenny Sterner-Masius. The award was based on the presumptive value of an unknown account at the multiplier then in effect (11.5).

[97] "Jenny Sterner was born in Mannheim, Germany in 1878. During the war she was in France. Jenny was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from France found in Le Memorial de la deportation des juifs de france, Beate et Serge Klarsfeld, Paris 1978." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=3221903&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

Several years after issuing the first award, as a result of documents received from the bank in response to the CRT's ongoing requests to the banks for "voluntary assistance," the CRT was able to determine that the "unknown type" of account held by Jenny Sterner-Masius actually was a custody account. The CRT subsequently amended its earlier decision to award the owner's granddaughter an additional SF 113,125, the difference between the amount originally awarded and the presumptive value of a custody account (multiplied by the 12.5 multiplier in effect at the time of the amendment).

The bank records provided to the CRT through the "voluntary assistance" process also showed that Jenny Sterner-Masius had held a demand deposit account in addition to the custody account. The demand deposit account was awarded at its presumptive value as multiplied by 12.5 (i.e. SF 26,750). The CRT observed that Jenny Sterner-Masius had "perished in 1940 in France" and that there was "no record of the payment of the … account to her or to the Power of Attorney holders, nor any record of a date of closure of that account."

xxiii. In re Accounts of Aleksandar Weiss and Emanuel Weiss (SF 75,150.00)

Emanuel (Emil) Weiss was born in 1885 in Hungary and lived with his wife, Erna Weiss, in Kamienica (near Bielsko), Poland. They later lived in Bielsko. Emanuel Weiss owned a wood export business, which was confiscated along with other assets after the Nazis invaded Bielsko. Emanuel Weiss fled to eastern Poland and later was deported to the USSR. He returned to Bielsko after the War. His application to emigrate to Israel with his wife was rejected by the Polish government, and he died in Bielsko in 1951.

His son, Aleksandar Weiss, the claimant and joint account owner (who had submitted an Initial Questionnaire but not a claim form) was born in 1927 in Cieszyn, Poland. Aleksandar Weiss lived with his parents in Bielsko. He moved to his aunt's house in Krakow in 1939. He was interned in the Krakow ghetto and was a slave laborer, including at Plaszow. Aleksander Weiss escaped from Plaszow in January 1945. He emigrated to Israel in 1950.

The bank records showed that Emanuel Weiss and Aleksandar Weiss owned two safe deposit boxes, held under the numbered relationship "14047." The accounts, of unknown amounts, were closed on June 15, 1954. The accounts were not included in the AHD but rather were located in the TAD ("Total Accounts Database").

In awarding the accounts, the CRT noted that the Weisses had resided in Nazi-occupied Poland; they had respectively fled to the USSR (Emanuel) and had been imprisoned in slave labor camps (Aleksandar); and they had resided in a Communist country after the War. The CRT further pointed out that Emanuel Weiss had died in 1951, prior to the accounts' closure. Based on these facts, the CRT awarded the joint account owner and claimant, Aleksandar Weiss, the presumptive value of two safe deposit boxes.

xxiv. In re Account of Dr. Leonhard Winkler (SF 37,575.00)

Dr. Leonhard Anton Winkler was born in 1888 in Alzenau, Germany. He lived with his wife and five children in Speyer, Germany, where he was a doctor in the public medical service. He was dismissed from his post in 1933 because of his political opposition to the Nazis. In 1935, the Nazi regime impounded Dr. Winkler's passport. In 1938, the Gestapo declared Dr. Winkler to be mentally handicapped. He was confined to a psychiatric institution and then the nursing home Heil-Pflegeanstalt in Lohr am Main, Germany. He remained there after the fall of the Nazi Regime, and died in 1959 in Neustift/Stubaital, Austria.

The bank records indicated that Dr. Leonhard Winkler, a doctor in the public medical services residing in Speyer am Rhein, Germany, owned a safe deposit box that was closed on December 14, 1933.

The CRT awarded the presumptive value of the account to Dr. Winkler's son. The CRT observed that the Nazis had targeted Dr. Winkler in 1933 as a political opponent and had persecuted him thereafter, ultimately declaring him to be mentally incompetent and confining him to a psychiatric institution.

xxv. In re Account of Ida Wolf (SF 28,712.50)

Ida Wolf was born in 1905 in Grumbach, Germany and lived in Partenheim bei Mainz, Germany, where her husband Charles was a cattle dealer. The family intended to flee Germany in 1937, but had to "abandon these plans at the last minute." However, in 1938 they were able to secure the safety of their then 18-month-old daughter, the claimant. On a bridge connecting Kleinbliederstroff, Germany to Grosbliederstroff, France, the Wolfs handed their baby over to her aunt and uncle, who lived in France. Charles Wolf was arrested and deported in early 1938, and Ida Wolf was deported in early 1940. Both were killed in a concentration camp in 1944 or 1945. Their daughter survived in hiding. From 1941 to 1945, she lived in the convent of St. Juste at St. Etienne sur Loire. Her aunt and uncle were deported to Drancy, but survived the Holocaust, and later adopted her.

The bank records showed that Ida Wolf of Mainz, Germany owned a demand deposit account that was opened on January 10, 1940, and closed to an unknown party a few months later, on April 30, 1940. While the bank records do not show why an account was opened by Mrs. Wolf and then closed by an unknown party within a period of under four months, based on other CRT cases, it was plausible that by April, the bank itself was managing the account.

The CRT awarded the account to the claimant (who had submitted an Ernst & Young claim and an Initial Questionnaire, but had not filed a CRT claim), observing that Ida Wolf had lived in Germany until she was deported in 1940; had later died in a concentration camp; and that there was no evidence that she or her heirs closed the account.

xxvi. In re Accounts of Lucie Wolff (SF 289,087.50)

Lucie Wolff was born in 1868 in Germany. She lived in Berlin with her husband and two sons. Her husband died in Berlin in 1928, and she herself died there in February 1932. One of their sons fled from Germany to Palestine in 1933, where he died in 1974, and the other son was killed in Auschwitz in 1943. The claimants, the grandchildren of Lucie Wolff, advised the CRT that the Wolffs were wealthy. For tax purposes, they spent three or four months a year outside Germany, often in France and Switzerland.

The bank records, some of which were prepared as part of the 1962 Survey, indicated that Lucie Wolff of Villars s/Ollon, Switzerland owned a demand deposit account and a custody account. As described by the CRT, the "notation Erben (heirs) was later added to the customer card," and as of 1933, all correspondence was to be directed to Lucie Wolff's son in Tel Aviv. The bank records indicated that Lucie Wolff corresponded with the bank from Geneva at least once. Lucie Wolff's last known contact with the bank was in 1933. Her custody account, of unknown value, was closed on September 6, 1933. Her demand deposit account, which had a reported value of SF 109.50 when it was reviewed in connection with the 1962 Survey (but ultimately not registered in the Survey), was closed on January 28, 1975.

The CRT awarded the accounts to Lucie Wolff's grandchildren in accordance with the terms of a joint inheritance certificate for Lucie Wolff's estate that had been issued in 1994 by the Civil Court of Charlottenburg, Berlin. The CRT observed that although Lucie Wolff herself had died before Hitler's accession to power, her sons — her immediate heirs — both were Nazi victims. The CRT noted that although the custody account was closed when one of Lucie Wolff's heirs (her son) was outside Nazi-dominated territory, the bank records did not show to whom the account was closed. In addition, one son had fled "due to Nazi persecution" while the other had remained in Germany and was killed in Auschwitz, and "either heir may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over the accounts in an attempt to ensure their safety." The CRT also awarded the demand deposit account, given that it was closed in 1975 unknown to whom, one year after Lucie Wolff's surviving son and heir had died in Israel, and had been considered for inclusion in (but omitted from) the 1962 Survey.

3. Account Frozen in 1945[98]

i. In re Account of Käthi Labermeier (SF 10,750.00)

Käthi Labermeier was born in Munich in approximately 1890. She was physically handicapped, with a leg impairment. She traveled to Switzerland for health reasons. She died in Munich in 1979.

The bank records showed that Käthi Labermeier held a savings/passbook account, which was blocked in the 1945 Freeze. The account was released from the Freeze in May 1953, at which time it held a balance of SF 127.90. The bank wrote to Käthi Labermeier on February 7, 1957 to advise her that the account had been released from the 1945 Freeze and that it remained at the bank at the account owner's free disposal. The letter was returned to the bank on February 19, 1957. The balance was transferred to a suspense account for dormant assets on July 15, 1997, and the account remained suspended.

Based on the fact that the account remained suspended and that its owner was disabled, and thus a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution under the Settlement Agreement, the CRT awarded the claimant, the nephew of Käthi Labermeier, the presumptive value of a savings account.

ii. In re Accounts of Robert Stern (SF 228,865.00)

Robert Stern was born in 1891 in Brno, Czechoslovakia, where he was a dentist. He never married. He was deported to Izbica, Poland and died there on March 11, 1942.[99]

[98] See Glossary: In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, HOLOCAUST VICTIM ASSETS LITIG. (SWISS BANKS), at 1, http://www.swissbankclaims.com/Documents_New/Glossary.pdf ("1945 Freeze"): "In accordance with a "decree of the Swiss Federal Council, all assets in Switzerland belonging to citizens of Germany and the territories incorporated into the Third Reich were frozen on February 16, 1945. A Swiss government ruling of May 29, 1945 required that all German assets in Switzerland had to be reported to the Swiss Compensation Office. The freeze was lifted pursuant to the agreements concluded between Switzerland and Western Germany and between Switzerland, USA, France and the United Kingdom in August 1952. These agreements entered into forced on 19 March 1953."

[99] "Robert Stern was born in 1891. He was a physician. Prior to WWII he lived in Brno, Czechoslovakia. Robert was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of persecuted persons The Central Database of

The claimant, Robert Stern's nephew, filed a claim with the HCPO in 1999, stating that he had seen his uncle's name on a list of accounts published in connection with the 1962 Survey. In response to an inquiry by the HCPO, as described in the CRT decision, the bank's "Legal & Compliance Department" advised that "'to date, our searches have not yielded any information on a customer relationship …. with Mr. Stern's uncle, Mr. Robert Stern,' despite the fact that Robert Stern from Brno was included in the above mentioned list."

The bank records showed that Mr. Robert Stern of Brno held two accounts of unknown type, one of which held SF 2,292 as of February 17, 1945 and the other which held SF 5,407 as of the same date. The accounts were not part of the AHD but rather were located in the TAD at the bank. The account records were contained in a database listing accounts frozen in the 1945 Freeze.

The CRT awarded Robert Stern's nephew the value of the accounts recorded in the bank records (adjusting for fees taken by the bank and applying the multiplier of 12.5), observing that Robert Stern "perished in 1942 and the account continued to exist in 1945 [and his assets] were reported in the 1962 Survey."

Subsequently, the CRT amended the award, authorizing an additional payment of SF 20,537.50 to increase the payment to presumptive value, reflecting that fees and other charges often were imposed by Swiss banks upon Holocaust-era accounts.[100]

In a later award, the CRT determined that the accounts awarded in the original decision, which appeared to have been reported both in the 1945 Freeze and then in the 1962 Survey, actually were different accounts. Following continuing litigation with the defendant banks concerning access to Holocaust-era Swiss account records, the CRT was provided access to additional documents several years after the claims process had commenced. The CRT observed that in this case, after the original award had been issued, "the full records relating to the accounts reported in the 1962 Survey were made available to the CRT by the Swiss Federal Archive. Upon close examination of these documents and the documents relating to the accounts previously awarded, the CRT determines that the documents refer to separate accounts. In particular, the CRT notes that the accounts awarded [in the first decision] were held at a different bank than the account dealt with in the present award." Thus, more accounts were due to the claimant.

The records from the Swiss Federal Archive showed that Robert Stern of Krapfengasse 31, in Brünn (Brno) Czechoslovakia, held an account with a balance of SF 8,652.20 as of September 1, 1963. The records indicated that the owner's last known contact with the bank was October 30, 1937, and that the account had been dormant since Hitler's annexation of Czechoslovakia.

The claimant (Robert Stern's nephew) had provided the CRT with a seemingly conflicting address, stating that his uncle had worked in an office located on Koblizna ulice in Brno. However, the CRT determined that there was no conflict after all: "between 1918 and 1939, Krapfengasse was used as the German language version of the original Czech name, ulice Koblizna." Accordingly, the CRT awarded an additional SF 111,715, reflecting the value recorded in the account as of 1963, adjusted for fees and increased to present-day values.

4. Bank Management of Account After Account Owner's Death

1. Account activity by bank after the Holocaust era: accounts closed by banks; transferred to Swiss Custodian; transferred to suspense account; transferred to collective account; trading of assets.

i. In re Account of Rudolf Aronson (SF 274,491.88)

Rudolf Aronson was born in 1884 in Brasov, Romania, and resided in Bucharest, where he owned an international travel company. Rudolf Aronson, who was the second husband of the claimant's grandmother, died in April 1940. Rudolf Aronson's relatives' assets were confiscated by Nazi-allied authorities in Romania after 1940, and at least two of his relatives were killed in Auschwitz.

The bank records (including some produced through the "voluntary assistance" process) indicated that the bank actively managed Rudolf Aronson's account long after his death. The bank was advised that Mr. Aronson had died in approximately 1942. The account later was reported in the 1962 Survey. The records indicated that Mr. Aronson's demand deposit account had a balance of SF 21,674.35 as of September 1, 1963, and SF 21,570 on December 31, 1964. A savings account was opened on November 15, 1968; the demand deposit account was closed on November 21, 1968; and a custody account was opened on December 10, 1968.

The two accounts opened in 1968 continued to be held by the bank in Mr. Aronson's name, although he had died over two decades earlier. On June 30, 1969, the bank purchased bonds in the name of Mr. Aronson, deposited the bonds in the newly opened custody account, and arranged for income from the bonds to be transferred to the newly opened savings account. An internal bank memorandum indicated that accounts such as these were to be liquidated and transferred to a collective account for heirless assets held by the Swiss government. In July 1973, the savings account was closed and transferred to the Swiss Federal Accounting Office in Bern. The custody account similarly was closed in 1973 and the securities it held were transferred to the same office.

As the CRT observed, "[b]ased upon these records, it is clear that the Bank continued to manage the account after becoming aware of the Account Owner's death in 1942 and even after it was reported in the 1962 Survey so that the account would generate additional income, and that this additional income, together with the amount originally in the account, was transferred into the Swiss Heirless Assets Fund."

Mr. Aronson's heirs were awarded the actual value of the demand deposit account as recorded in 1963, increased by the 12.5 multiplier, and also increased by SF 250 in fees that the bank had taken against the account.

ii. In re Account of Anna Barth (SF 47,400.00)

Anna Barth was born in approximately 1895. She lived in Vienna and was widowed in 1928. In January 1939, she sent her son, the claimant, to England, intending to follow. Instead, she was deported to a concentration camp, where she was killed.

The bank records demonstrated that the assets in Anna Barth's account (which was of unknown type) were transferred in December 1957 to a suspense account, which remained open and dormant. At the time of the transfer, the value of the assets was SF 12.60, an amount lower than presumptive value. Accordingly, the claimant was awarded the higher presumptive value.

iii. In re Account of Günther Brann (SF 28,712.50)

Dr. Günther Brann was born in 1892 in Berlin, and practiced dermatology at the University of Rostock in Germany. His medical practice was suspended in 1933, and the family fled to Rome and then to Amsterdam, where they awaited passage to the United States. In 1939, the Branns were able to send their son (the claimant) to England, but the Branns stayed in Amsterdam and went into hiding. They were imprisoned in Westerbork until 1943 and then deported to Auschwitz, where Dr. Brann was killed in October 1944.[101] According to a book provided to the CRT by the Branns' son, "Between life and death in Auschwitz," Dr. Brann was beaten and then shot after he refused to give up a golden glass to a Nazi guard. Dr. Brann's wife Lili also perished in Auschwitz.

[101] "Dr. Guenther Braun was born in 1892. During the war he was deported with Transport XXIV/7 from Westerbork, Camp, The Netherlands to Theresienstadt, Ghetto, Czechoslovakia on 04/09/1944. Deported with transport Er from Theresienstadt, Ghetto, Czechoslovakia to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 16/10/1944. Dr. Braun was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of Theresienstadt camp inmates found in Terezinska Pametni Kniha/Theresienstaedter Gedenkbuch, Terezinska Iniciativa, vol. I-II Melantrich, Praha 1995, vol. III Academia Verlag, Prag 2000." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4840629&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

The account records were not obtained from the bank files, but rather from the 1962 Survey records maintained by the Swiss Federal Archive. The account was published in 2005 in connection with the post-settlement litigation in which access was sought to additional accounts for publication and for use in the CRT process. The archival files showed that Dr. Gunther Brann was living "care of" another individual in Amsterdam as of 1940. He held one demand deposit account at the bank, with a balance of SF 588 as of September 1963. Dr. Brann's assets were reported to the Registration Office for Assets of Missing Foreigners in February 1964, and in 1966, the Guardianship Authority of the City of Zurich appointed Dr. H. Haberlin as custodian (guardian) of the account.

The account was awarded at presumptive value (given that the recorded amount was lower than presumptive value), based upon the fact that it remained open as of 1966, although the account owner had been killed in Auschwitz over two decades earlier, in 1944.

iv. In re Accounts of Dr. Rafael Dallet (SF 289,087.50)

Dr. Rafael Dallet was born in approximately 1896 in Poland. He was Jewish and homosexual. He lived with his life partner (the claimant's great-uncle) in Bielsko, Poland, where both were attorneys. Dr. Dallet and his partner were deported to the Lwow Ghetto, where both perished in 1942.

In 1998, following the appearance of Dr. Dallet's name on the July 1997 list of dormant accounts published by the Swiss Bankers Association, the claimant filed a claim with CRT-I seeking return of the assets of Dr. Dallet, who was her godfather as well as her great-uncle's life partner. CRT-I concluded both in its initial determination and on appeal that there was no evidence that the assets in Dr. Dallet's account belonged to the claimant's great-uncle. CRT-I also determined that the claimant herself was not Dr. Dallet's heir. Thus, the claim was rejected.

However, "CRT-II" (i.e. the process operated under the Court's authority) reached a different conclusion. CRT-II reviewed bank records, including documents relating to the 1962 survey, which demonstrated that Dr. Dallet had owned a custody account and a demand deposit account. The bank's last contact with Dr. Dallet was in 1938. In 1942, the bank sold 30 of 175 bonds held in the custody account to cover a negative balance in the demand deposit account. Between 1964 and 1965, the bonds were recalled, and in 1966 the bank transferred SF 5,746 (the value of the bonds at that time) to Dr. Dallet's demand deposit account, which remained open and dormant. The bank then closed the custody account.

The CRT, in awarding the account, observed that CRT-I was obligated to apply the laws of Poland, which had prohibited same-sex marriages, and so the claimant thereby was not an heir under that nation's laws. By contrast, "the Settlement Agreement specifically provides for the inclusion of homosexuals as class members…. [T]he CRT has to assume that the parties to the Agreement recognized, especially because of the widespread death of whole families in the Holocaust, that considerable plausibility would be necessary in recognizing eligible claimants to the accounts of such class members. It is entirely consistent with this necessary grant of flexibility for the CRT to recognize in this case the close relationship of the Account Owner with the Claimant's great-uncle and her close relationship with both men…. The CRT notes that the Claimant has plausibly established that her great-uncle and the Account Owner were life partners."[102]

v. In re Account of Adolf Denes and Elisabeth Denes-Deutsch (SF 27,642.50)

Elisabeth (Erszebet) Denes-Deutsch and Adolf Denes, born respectively in 1896 and 1893, were married. They lived with their daughter Eva (born in 1926) in Oradea, Romania. Adolf Denes was a banker and manager of the English-Hungarian Bank in Oradea. The entire family was killed in Auschwitz.

Supp. 2d 407, 417 (E.D.N.Y 2004), aff'd, 424 F.3d 168 (2d Circ. 2005), in which the Court observed in connection with a challenge to the Looted Assets Class distribution mechanism by an organization representing homosexual and lesbian Holocaust survivors that "there is a clear record of awards being made based on accounts once held by homosexual victims of Nazi persecution" and that "I have taken the step of recognizing homosexual partners as heirs to insure that they would be fairly represented" even where CRT-I had rejected the same claim (citing In re Accounts of Dr. Rafael Dallet).

The bank records demonstrated that Adolf and Elisabeth Denes held a demand deposit account, and that they had used the fictive name "W. Aden" and the password "Silos." The account was transferred to a suspense account in September 1965 and closed to fees in 1966. The bank records also showed that the last contact with the account owners was before the end of World War II. The account was reported in the 1962 Survey and subsequently was reported in November 1965 to the Cantonal Guardianship Authority of Zurich.

The bank records further showed that two claims to the account had been submitted to the Swiss Justice Department, including one in August 1965 by a relative who lived in Tel Aviv, Josef Deutsch, who was the claimant's husband, and the brother of Elisabeth Denes-Deutsch. The Swiss Justice Department instructed Josef Deutsch to withhold any evidence and documentation relating to his claim until he was expressly requested to hand it in. However, correspondence from 1968 indicates that Mr. Deutsch never was told to present this evidence.

In 1966, the bank closed the account to fees, notwithstanding Mr. Deutsch's earlier attempt to claim his sister's account. Mr. Deutsch was advised of this closure in 1968. Over three decades later, the CRT awarded the account to Mr. Deutsch's widow, at the presumptive value for a demand deposit account.

vi. In re Accounts of Ernst Eisner (SF 289,087.50)

Ernst Eisner was born in Germany in the late 1800s and, with his wife Luise, had two sons, born respectively in 1909 and 1920. Mr. Eisner owned three cinemas, a film import/export and distribution business, and real estate in several German cities. He was killed by the Nazis shortly after the regime came to power in 1933.

The bank records showed that Ernst Eisner owned a demand deposit account and a custody account, one closed on March 20, 1935 and the other a few days later on March 25, 1935. The CRT awarded the accounts, in light of the fact that they were closed more than a year after the account owner had been killed, relying upon the adverse inference presumption as well as the presumption that confiscations in Germany began in 1933, after the Nazis came to power.

Subsequently, following the CRT's ongoing requests to the banks for "voluntary assistance," in 2008 the bank located additional information about the Eisner accounts, including records relating to Mr. Eisner's custody account. Based on this information, the CRT determined that the account had held five different securities, some of which had been transferred to another account at the bank, numbered 15200.[103] The CRT amended the earlier award to reflect the actual account value as revealed by documents that were not available in the original account records or ICEP files but, rather, were provided by the bank after the account had been awarded. Thus, the actual amount in the account was approximately one-third higher than the presumptive value that originally had been awarded.

[103] The CRT noted that Account No. 15200 "appears as the transfer destination for other, unrelated accounts, suggesting that it was not owned by the Account Owner." Other cases involving the transfer of Holocaust victim assets to Account No. 15200 include In re Account of Artur Zadek; In re Accounts of Elisabeth Magnus (Certified Award Amendment); and In re Accounts of Heinrich Strauss (Certified Award Amendment).

vii. In re Account of S.L. Epstein (SF 47,400.00); In re Account of S.L. Epstein (SF 28,712.50)

Simon Levi Chmaja Epstein was born in 1879 in Eichstetten, Germany, and after the death of his first wife, was married to Ester Epstein. Simon Epstein owned a metal products business in Freiburg, S.L. Epstein - Epstein Metall, with branches in Karlsruhe, Germany; Basel, Switzerland; and Strasbourg, France. As described by the claimant (Simon Epstein's grandson), despite entreaties, Simon Epstein refused to leave Germany for Israel after the Nazis' rise to power because "he was a proud German." Simon Epstein's business was destroyed after Kristallnacht, and his house was set on fire. He and his wife tried to escape to Switzerland, but were denied entry, despite having a business in Basel. They were able to flee to Milan but, according to their grandson, were shot in the street after escaping from a train on its way to Auschwitz.

The bank records for the unpublished account located by the CRT indicated that S.L. Epstein, who lived in Milan, held an account of unknown type closed in 1942. Simon Epstein's grandson, the claimant, was awarded the presumptive value for an account of unknown type (SF 47,400 at the time of the award).

Subsequently, in a separate decision, the CRT located an additional published account owned by S.L. Epstein that was held by the Swiss Custodian. The CRT observed that "the Custodian is not a bank and was not included" in the ICEP investigation but that under the Settlement Agreement, assets held at the Custodian constituted "Deposited Assets," and the Custodian was included among the Releasees under the Settlement Agreement.[104]

Moreover, the account was included in the 1962 Survey, and as described by the CRT, records obtained by the CRT from the Swiss Federal Archive showed that S.L. Epstein of Milan [104] See also, e.g., In re Account of Martin and Paula Wolff (SF 105,337.50) (awarding accounts deposited at the Swiss Custodian on the basis of documents provided by claimant, including a January 3, 1942 letter from a notary in Bern to Hans George Wolf in New York, explaining that his parents [Martin and Paula Wolff] were likely to be deported to Poland and that a shipment of the Wolffs' possessions had arrived at the Custodian in Basel on December 23, 1941. The notary stated that he had delivered the key to the Custodian. Independent research by the CRT revealed that an office building continued to exist at the location specified in the letter as the site of the Custodian, and also revealed that the individual named in the letter as a notary indeed was so registered as a Swiss notary between 1936 and 1978).

"held a post check account … with a value of 49.09 Swiss Francs … as of 27 November 1947. In addition, these documents indicate that an envelope containing an account statement, issued on 27 November 1947, was sent to the Account Owner; however, this envelope was returned to the Custodian with the notation of 'missing' ('Verschollen'). The records indicate that after the statement was returned, the Custodian held the funds in the account for five years for the benefit of the Account Owner, after which the amount in the account was incorporated by the Custodian for its own disposal, per the Swiss postal traffic law."

Since this account had not been returned to the account owner or his heirs, but rather had been taken by the Swiss Custodian, the CRT awarded this account (at the presumptive value for a demand deposit account, then SF 26,750) to Simon Epstein's grandson.

viii. In re Account of Fritz von Fischer-Ankern (SF 10,750.00)

Fritz von Fischer-Ankern was born in 1883 in Austria. He worked as a consul for the Austrian government in St. Gall, Switzerland, where he resided until 1926. He also owned and managed agricultural property in Eggendorf, Austria, where he lived after 1926, and in Kirchberg, Austria after 1929. Fritz von Fischer-Ankern was homosexual and unmarried. In 1941, Fritz von Fischer-Ankern adopted a child. The claimant was the son of that child, and the grandson of account owner Fritz von Fischer-Ankern.

In 1943, Fritz von Fischer-Ankern was imprisoned by the Nazis for alleged crimes against morality, and his agricultural property was placed under public administration. In 1944, his remaining assets were seized. He died on January 5, 1951 in Kirchberg. Fritz von Fischer-Ankern's grandson submitted, among other evidence, "a 1942 decision for the custodial seizure of his grandfather's property by the Nazi authorities in Austria due to incarceration for 'crimes against morality,'" as well as a 1944 legal notice announcing that the Nazis had seized Mr. Fischer-Ankern's property.

The bank records showed that Fritz von Fischer-Ankern owned a savings account, which was transferred to a suspense account on or before October 22, 1951, at which time the account held a balance of SF 250.90. The ICEP auditors presumed that the account subsequently was closed.

The CRT awarded the account to Mr. Fischer-Ankern's grandson, observing that Fritz von Fischer-Ankern had been persecuted by the Nazis as a homosexual; his account was transferred by the bank to a suspense account after the owner's death; and later it was closed. Because the reported value of the account was lower than the presumptive value of a savings account, the claimant was awarded the higher sum; i.e., the presumptive value.

ix. In re Accounts of Alexander Freud and Harry Freud (SF 28,712.50)

Alexander Freud was born in Vienna in 1866. He was the brother of the eminent psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud, the claimant's grandfather.[105] Alexander Freud's son, Dr. Harry Freud, was born in Vienna in 1909. Alexander and Harry Freud (the claimant's great-uncle and cousin, respectively) owned the publishing company Verlag Allgemeiner Tarif-Anzeiger A. Freud Zentralverkaufsstelle für Tarife in Vienna. As did Sigmund Freud, Alexander and Harry Freud fled Vienna in 1938 for London. Alexander Freud passed away in Toronto in 1943, and Harry Freud passed away in New York in 1968.

The CRT observed that "the life of Sigmund Freud, the brother of Alexander Freud, has been the subject of numerous volumes of scholarly and historical works. In considering the Claimant's claim, the CRT has reviewed materials available in the Freud Museum in London …, in contemporaneous newspaper articles written about Sigmund Freud's flight from Austria; as well as in books and articles cited in various reference guides, including numerous sites on the world-wide web."

[105] The accounts owned by Sigmund Freud himself were awarded in a separate decision discussed herein.

As described by the CRT, after "extensive interventions on his behalf, and after having most of his assets confiscated and paying flight tax (Reichsfluchtsteuer), … Sigmund Freud was able to escape Austria on 4 June 1938, eventually emigrating to England, but his four sisters who remained in Vienna were less fortunate." In a November 12, 1938 letter (two days after Kristallnacht), Freud wrote of his concerns to his patron Marie Bonaparte, Princess of Greece: "'The latest horrifying events in Germany aggravate the problem of what to do about the four old women between seventy-five and eighty. To maintain them in England is beyond our powers. The assets we left behind for them on our departure, some 160,000 Austrian schillings, may have been confiscated already, and are certain to be lost if they leave.'" However, Freud's sisters could not be saved: two were killed in Treblinka, one in Auschwitz, and one in Theresienstadt.[106]

The bank records, including records from the 1945 Freeze, indicated that Alexander Freud and Dr. Harry Freud held a joint demand deposit account, and that Harry Freud also held an account of unknown type. The demand deposit account was frozen in 1945 and its balance decreased successively to SF 115 as of January 1951, and to SF 95 as of June 1955, when it was unfrozen. In 1963, the account was transferred to a suspense account, where it remained. The account of unknown type was listed on a closing register for numbered accounts and was transferred to London on September 10, 1938. The CRT concluded that the latter account was retrieved by the account owners, who had fled to London by the time of the transfer. The demand deposit account, which remained suspended and thus had not been returned to the account owners, was awarded at presumptive value.

[106] The CRT, quoting the scholar Martin Gilbert, observed that an "'eye-witness has recorded how, at Treblinka, after the arrival of a train from Vienna, Sigmund Freud's sister approached [the SS Second Lieutenant Kurt Hubert Franz] …and 'asked to be given lighter work on account of her poor health.' Franz 'assured her that her arrival in Treblinka was a mistake, in view of her poor health, and that as soon as she had had her bath, she would be put on the first available train back to Vienna.'" MARTIN GILBERT, THE HOLOCAUST: A HISTORY OF THE JEWS OF EUROPE DURING THE SECOND WORLD WAR 475-476 (Holt, Rinehart & Winston 1985).

x. In re Account of Auguste Hirsch (SF 10,750.00); In re Account of August Hirch (SF 49,375.00)

Auguste Hirsch was born in 1897 in Frankfurt, and lived in Paris with his wife Hélène. He worked in the toy business in France and Switzerland. After Hélène Hirsch's death in 1941, Auguste Hirsch attempted to flee to Switzerland, but was denied entry. The claimant, the Hirschs' niece, advised the CRT that Auguste Hirsch was deported either to Majdanek or to Auschwitz, where he perished.[107]

The bank records originally made available to the CRT in connection with the ICEP audit indicated that Auguste Hirsch owned a savings account numbered 8769. That account was transferred on April 26, 1954 to a suspense account for dormant assets. At the time of the transfer, the balance of the account was SF 22.95. The account, which remained open and dormant, was awarded at the presumptive value then in effect for savings accounts.

Subsequently, following ongoing litigation with the banks stemming from the CRT's effort to obtain access to additional Holocaust-era documents and accounts, the CRT determined from files in the Swiss Federal Archive that Auguste Hirsch owned at least one additional account. In connection with the 1962 Survey, the bank reported that it had not had contact with the account owner since before 1945. On January 21, 1946, the bank had sent a letter to August Hirsch's last known address, which, as described by the CRT, "was returned to the bank with a note marked 'deported and missing' (deportiert & verschollen). The records indicate that Auguste Hirsch held an account numbered V 13080, which had a balance of SF 52 as of September 1, 1963."

The CRT awarded the account to the niece of Auguste Hirsch, at the presumptive value for an account of unknown type. Auguste Hirsch had died in a concentration camp, and the account subsequently had been registered in the 1962 Survey. In addition, the bank evidently August was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from France found in Le Memorial de la deportation des juifs de france, Beate et Serge Klarsfeld, Paris 1978." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=3185221&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

was aware as of 1946 that its customer had been deported and was missing, but there was no indication that the bank took any steps to locate its customer's heirs. After the account was reported in the 1962 Survey, it was reported in 1966 to the Municipal Guardianship Authority. In 1969, the Guardianship Authority of the City of Bern contacted the Justice Department about the custodianship (guardianship) of the account. The Swiss Federal Archive records do not indicate the ultimate disposition of the account but, as the CRT observed, there is "no evidence in these records that the Account Owner or his heirs closed the account and received the proceeds themselves."

xi. In re Account of Monika Hofmann (SF 49,375.00)

Monika Hofmann, the claimant and account owner, was born in 1933 in Swinemünde, Germany. The claimant, who filed an Initial Questionnaire (but not a claim form), stated that her father was Romani. He owned a five-stage puppet theater until 1934, when Nazis looted the theater. Monika Hofmann's father was a forced laborer for the German military between 1944 and 1945.

The bank records showed that Monika Hofmann owned an account of unknown type, which on November 10, 1976 held SF 65.05 and was transferred to a suspense account. The account remained in the bank's suspense account. The CRT awarded the account to the claimant, the account owner, at its presumptive value.

xii. In re Account of Erika Kickton (SF 10,750.00)

Dr. Erna Erika Christine Marie Kickton was born in 1896 in Berlin. She was a writer and university lecturer who lived in Switzerland during the 1920s and 1930s. She was a lesbian, and lived with her partner at Villa Paradisa in Locarno-Monti, Switzerland beginning in 1929. Erika Kickton returned to Germany, and in 1942 resided in Potsdam. She was detained by the Nazis for fourteen days for refusing the Hitler salute. She died in 1967 in Wiesbaden. Her sole heir, according to inheritance documents, was a cousin, the claimant's husband. The claimant, in turn, was her husband's sole heir.

The bank records showed that Erika Kickton had held a passbook-savings account. The bank had no contact with the account owner after 1941, and the account was transferred to a collective account for dormant assets. The last known date of the accounts was July 24, 1951, at which time the account held SF 53.65. Among the records evidencing this account was an "undated list of accounts that were transferred to a collective account for dormant assets because there had been no movement on these accounts from 9 May 1945 and the nationality of the owners of the accounts could not be established," and "a list, dated 24 July 1951, of savings accounts with low balances in which there had been no movement for the previous ten years and for which the Bank could not get any information about their owners."

Given that the account had been transferred to a collective account, and therefore had not been returned to its account owner, the savings account was awarded to Erika Kickton's heir at its presumptive value.

xiii. In re Accounts of Erwin and Babette Koblitz (SF 216,993.75)

Erwin Koblitz was born in 1892 in Vienna. His wife, Babette Koblitz (née Wulkan) was born in 1897 in Bielsko, Poland, where they resided with their daughter, the claimant. Erwin Koblitz was the Prokurist (authorized representative) of a company and Babette Koblitz was a housewife. They both perished in 1942.[108]

[108] According to Pages of Testimony submitted to Yad Vashem by their daughter: "Babette Koblitz nee Vulkan was born in Ostrava, Czechoslovakia in 1897 to Herman and Emilia. She was a housewife and married Ervin. Prior to WWII she lived in Bielsko, Poland. During the war she was in Uzbekistan (USSR). Babette was murdered in the Shoah." In addition, "Erwin Koblitz was born in Wien, Austria in 1892 to Zigmunt and Karolina. He was a jurist and married Babette. Prior to WWII he lived in Bielsko, Poland. During the war he was in Uzbekistan (USSR). Erwin was murdered in the Shoah." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=1783944&language=en, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=1248670&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

The Koblitz' daughter advised the CRT that she had made a claim to her parents' accounts after World War II and had received a quantity of British gold coins during the late 1990s.

The bank records showed that Erwin and Babette Koblitz held at least one account, opened in May 1934. Documents received following the CRT's request to the bank for "voluntary assistance" demonstrated that the Koblitzes owned more than one account at the bank. These were registered in May 1940, under the British Trading with the Enemy Act of 1939. Specifically, the Koblitzes owned a custody account containing 150 British gold sovereigns, and one demand deposit account. The latter account held a negative balance of 8.15.5 Pound Sterling as of May 1942. Over the decades, the demand deposit account was reduced by fees and charges, including maintenance fees for the custody account. As of April 1977, the account had reached a negative balance of 230.40 Pound Sterling. Both accounts (the demand deposit and custody accounts) were closed in March 1980, and transferred to a suspense account for dormant assets.

In determining that the account owners' daughter was entitled to an award, the CRT observed that although she had received from the bank British gold sovereigns during the 1990s, there were no records indicating whether the account had held any other assets, and thus it was "plausible that the full proceeds of the custody account were not paid to the Account Owner or their heirs."

The claimant was awarded the presumptive value of the custody account, minus the value of the gold coins previously returned (i.e. SF 5,767.50), resulting in an award of SF 7,232.50 (thereafter multiplied by 12.5). As to the demand deposit account, it had been suspended, at which time it had held a negative balance, due partly to the fact that the bank continued to charge fees against the account, including fees for the separate custody account.[109] The account was awarded at its presumptive value.

[109] See In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F.Supp.2d at 315-16 (describing one bank's decision to charge fees against an account, leading to a negative balance, which was "seemingly inexplicable" but actually "easily understood once one recognizes that the client also had a safe at the bank." The safe contained gold which was used to offset the fees on the other account).

xiv. In re Account of S. Lichtig (SF 28,712.50)

Simon Juan Lichtig was born in 1922 in Tarnow, Poland. He was interned in the Tarnow Ghetto, from which he escaped in July 1942 by using false documents. In December, 1942, he was forced into the Organisation Todt labor battalions. He performed slave labor in Schmerinka, in occupied Russia, and later Saarbruecken and Saargemuend, Germany, until his liberation in December 1944.

Simon Lichtig filed an Initial Questionnaire (although not a claim form), stating that he himself owned a Swiss account. The CRT located an unpublished account owned by S. Lichtig, and determined that the account in fact belonged to the claimant.

The bank records indicated that there had been extensive internal bank communication about the Lichtig account specifically, and also about overall bank policy as to dormant accounts in general, of a nature such that the Bergier Commission had referenced the Lichtig account in its study of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts.[110]

The CRT noted that the bank records showed that S. Lichtig owned a demand deposit account. The account was considered dormant by "Bank 1," and it was transferred to a suspense account on June 30, 1938, at which time it held SF 13.00. The account was closed to fees on July 12, 1946. As described by the CRT, "[i]nternal correspondence concerning the takeover of Bank 1, dated 26 June 1946 and addressed to the Basel directorate-general of Bank 2, explains that the Basel and Geneva branches of Bank 2 had followed a directive from Bank 1's headquarters, supported by an opinion of the Bank's legal department, that dealt with 'uncashed check withdrawals' … and 'creditors with unknown whereabouts' … whose accounts had been inactive for several years. Accordingly, these two branches had deleted such assets from the liability side of their balance sheets and had booked them to a suspense account … in their internal reserves."

[110] See 15 BARBARA BONHAGE, HANSPETER LUSSY, & MARC PERRENOUD, NACHRICHTENLOSE VERMÖGEN BEI SCHWIEZER BANKEN 404-405 (Unabhängige Expertenkommission Schweitz-Zweiter Weltkrieg, Chronos Verlag 2001) (cited by the CRT in the decision).

However, the "Zurich branch of Bank 1 did not follow the directive, taking the position that, as a matter of principle, 'a bank could not act in this way with impunity, because creditors, even after lengthy periods of non-communication, still had to be considered creditors, and their claims be considered genuine liabilities, though they could perhaps legally be written off pursuant to OR 127 [the statute of limitations]; morally, however, a bank seeking to maintain its impeccable standing was required to consider itself liable and to pay these liabilities on demand. It was therefore not proper to transfer these creditors' assets to internal reserves.'"

The CRT observed that after balancing credit and debit entries, the funds totaled SF 59,553.75 "and consisted of items that could be closed to expenses, items that according to [the statute of limitations] could be considered to have passed [the statute] and items that could still be claimed, with the latter accounting for SF 51,054.45 of the total. The letter continues that the entire entry should have been categorized as a potential liability, rather than as a reserve asset, since it represented actual accounts held by Bank 1 customers, and that this 'unfortunate error' was due to questionable accounting practices and an inability to differentiate between 'real' and 'unreal' liabilities on the part of Bank 1's accountant."

The CRT noted that the writer had "corrected this lapse by ordering that the amount in the suspense account be shown as a liability on Bank 1's balance sheet at the end of 1945, and it would be available to the account owners if they were to resurface, until their accounts lapsed under the applicable statute of limitations, after which Bank 1 could refuse to pay the accounts. The letter then posits that it appeared likely that repayment of these funds would never be demanded and that all of them would become subject to the statute of limitations, or could be prematurely canceled based on the imposition of expenses. However, the letter also notes that closing accounts based on these grounds 'conflicts with [Bank 2's] opinion, which I share, and practice, according to which banks seeking to maintain their good reputation cannot turn to the statute of limitations when dealing with their creditors.'"

The CRT awarded the account owner, Simon Lichtig, the presumptive value of a demand deposit account, observing that the account had been held at "Bank 1's" Geneva branch (which, with the Basel branch, had taken a position different from that recommended for the Zurich branch as described in the June 26, 1946 memorandum). The account was closed to fees shortly afterward, on July 12, 1946. "These records thus provide an example of certain banks' attempts to minimize the volume of assets in dormant accounts by both booking them to internal reserves and burdening them with a maximum of expenses."

xv. In re Account of Ursula Meyer (SF 49,375.00)

The account of Ursula Meyer was awarded as a "Multiple Plausible Match" ("MPM") to three different claimants.[111]

The first claimant was Roma. She identified herself as the account owner. She was born in February 1933 and lived in Germany. Her husband was killed in Auschwitz, and she herself was persecuted as well. She submitted documents demonstrating that she received compensation from Cologne, Germany.

The second claimant also identified herself as the account owner. She was Jewish, and was born in 1925 in Münster, Germany, where her father was a lawyer. She was sent to England in May 1939 on a Kindertransport. Her father was deported to Theresienstadt in July 1942 and died there in January 1944, while her mother was killed in Auschwitz in 1945. Her brother died in 1944 while serving in the British army.

The third claimant identified the account owner as his sister, born in 1922 in Hanover, Germany. The family was Jewish. Their father worked as a velvet and silk wholesaler and traveled throughout Europe. He was arrested by the Nazis and accused of selling his products in Switzerland. In 1938, he and his daughter (the account owner) were detained at a border crossing into Holland. The family fled Germany for the U.S. in October 1938.

The bank records showed that Ursula Meyer held account number 8830, which was considered dormant by the bank and transferred to a suspense account in May 1980. At the time of the transfer, it held SF 6.85. No other information about the account or the owner was available in the bank records or from any other sources.

[111] A "Multiple Plausible Match" refers to the CRT's determination that the relatives of two or more unrelated claimants plausibly matched the account owner. In such instances, if it was determined that an award of the account(s) was appropriate, the payment was divided pro rata among the claimants.

Based on the equally plausible claims submitted by all three claimants, the account (of unknown type and value) was awarded at presumptive value and was divided pro rata. Each claimant thus received one-third of the award.

xvi. In re Account of Edith Moser (SF 10,375.00); In re Accounts of Ernst Moser (SF 126,481.24); In re Accounts of Ernst Moser (amended by SF 62,750.00)

(a) Account of Edith Moser: The account of Edith Moser was claimed by the account owner herself, and her brother. Prior to her marriage, the claimant's name was Edith Moser, and she was born in 1921 in Vienna. Her father was a lawyer (Dr. Ernst Moser) and the family lived in Mödling, Austria. At age 17, she fled Austria to the United Kingdom after the Anschluss, and became a domestic servant. Within two years, she became a laboratory assistant, and then a researcher in chemical pathology and a scientific translator until her retirement in 1981.

The bank records showed that Edith Moser owned a savings/passbook account numbered 4424, which was transferred in November 1981 to a suspense account for dormant assets, where it remained open. At the time of the transfer, the account held SF 13.05. The account was awarded at presumptive value to Edith Moser, who, as the account owner herself, was better entitled than the co-claimant, her brother.

(b) Accounts of Ernst Moser: The brother and sister who claimed the account of Edith Moser also claimed the account of their father, attorney Dr. Ernst Moser.

Bank records showed that Ernst Moser held a demand deposit account, which in May 1965 held SF 24.50 and was transferred to a suspense account for dormant assets. The account remained open.

The records also showed that in a second Swiss bank, Ernst Moser held two additional accounts, both of unknown type. As to the first account, in June 1937, the account held SF 30.80 and was transferred to a suspense account for dormant assets. The bank transferred the account to its profit and loss account in 1942. As to the second account, which was held at the Biel branch, the bank records showed that the bank last had contact with Ernst Moser on January 18, 1936. The account was transferred in February 1977 to a suspense account for dormant assets, at which time it held SF 1.05.

All three accounts were awarded to the claimants (as noted, the children of Ernst Moser) at their respective presumptive values.

(c) Accounts of Ernst Moser (Certified Amendment): As a result of the CRT's transition to an updated database and claims processing system, Initial Questionnaires (IQs) that met certain criteria and contained information sufficient to be treated as CRT claim forms were incorporated into the CRT matching program. The updated system also enabled the CRT to adopt broader matching criteria to account for variations in spellings of names and geographic locations. Accordingly, when entered into the new database, Initial Questionnaires (as well as claim forms) that had not been previously available sometimes matched to accounts that already had been awarded. In most instances, the Court authorized the CRT to award the newly-matched claimant the amount to which he or she was entitled even where the account had been paid to one or more different claimants, to ensure that all timely claimants were treated equitably.

In the case of the Ernst Moser account, the updated database enabled the CRT to locate another potentially matching claim (which had not been submitted as an actual claim form but as an Initial Questionnaire, and thus was not able to be "matched" until the CRT undertook its review process for Initial Questionnaires). The "new" claimant was not related to the brother and sister who had received the previously described Moser awards, but this new claimant had provided information demonstrating that he, too, had a plausible claim to the account.

The "new" claimant stated that his father, Dr. med. (medical doctor) Ernst Moser, a dentist in Berlin, was born in 1889. He lived in hiding in Germany from 1943 to 1945, and was repeatedly refused permission to enter Switzerland, unsuccessfully requesting admission at the Swiss Consulate in Berlin. He later attempted to cross the border via Kostanz and then via Bregenz. The claimant eventually was able to review his father's files maintained by the Reich's

Main Security Office (files which had been confiscated by American authorities in 1945), which documented Dr. Moser's escape attempts.

The "new" claimant, whose claim was timely but had not been "matched" at the start of the claims process, plausibly identified an individual named Dr. Ernst Moser as his father, as had the other claimants. As noted, the bank records demonstrated that the accounts had been transferred to suspense accounts, or closed to the bank's profit and loss account, and so the "new" claimant received an award. The original claimants were not asked to return the portion of the original award that otherwise would have been distributed to the "new" claimant had the Initial Questionnaire been available for matching: "over two years [had] passed since [the original award] and that there is no indication that [the original recipients] were aware that another equally entitled person had filed a claim." The new claimant was awarded what would have been his share of the original award (i.e. one-half of SF 125,500, or SF 62,750).

xvii. In re Accounts of David Noskes, Charla Noskes and Louis Noskes (SF 410,349.38)

David Noskes, who was married to Charla Noskes, lived in Zagreb, Croatia, where he owned a shipping company called Schenker & Company. David and Charla Noskes (the claimant's great-uncle and great-aunt) had a son, Louis Noskes, who held the title of doctor of law. All three died in a concentration camp in Croatia.[112]

The bank records showed that Generaldirektor David Noskes, Frau Charla Noskes, and Dr. Louis Noskes lived in Croatia and owned a joint savings account, as well as a joint custody account. In May 1940, they ordered the bank to withhold correspondence. The bank records showed that the last contact with the owners was on May 6, 1941, when the bank received a transfer order via Manufacturers Trust Bank in New York.

[112] "David Noskes was born in Zagreb, Yugoslavia in 1872 to Simon. He was an employee. Prior to WWII he lived in Poland. During the war he was in Zagreb, Yugoslavia. David was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from Yugoslavia found in Zrtve Rata 1941-1945: Jevreji, Savezni zavod za statistiku, Beograd 1992 (courtesy of the Museum of Genocide Victims in Belgrad)." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4383841&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

In 1963, the savings account held SF 6,327.95. According to handwritten notations on an account statement dated September 6, 1963, the custody account held securities of SF 24,600, including Yugoslav bonds. A second account statement dated March 23, 1969 showed additional securities, including other Yugoslav bonds. The CRT observed that the "Bank's records indicate that although the accounts were considered for inclusion in the 1962 Survey, they ultimately were not reported. The reasons the Bank gave for not reporting the accounts were 'no indication of persecutions' [sic] and '[t]he name is certainly not Jewish.'" The savings account was closed on January 6, 1978; there was no information about the closing of the custody account.

The CRT awarded the accounts based upon their actual values (as multiplied by 12.5). The CRT observed that the bank records showed that the bank sought to profit from the account many years after the last contact with the account owners. "[T]he Bank's records indicate that between 1963 and 1969 the Bank exchanged the Yugoslav bonds that were in the custody account for a new series of Yugoslav bonds and also that by 1963 the Bank had acquired bonds issued by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, showing that, at least in the 1960s the Bank, in this case, was managing the account actively."

xviii. In re Accounts of Alexandre Rado, Helene Rado and Geopress S.A. (SF 536,602.13)

Alexandre (Sandor) Rado was born in 1899 in Ujpest, Hungary. His first wife, Helene, was born in approximately 1906 in Germany. They had two children who died in France in 1965 and 1980, respectively. As described by the CRT, the claimant, their nephew, stated that Alexandre Rado conducted a clandestine intelligence operation on behalf of the Russians during World War II, while living in Geneva, Switzerland. His company, Geopress S.A., which he established in France before 1934, produced maps.[113]

[113] See also Louis Thomas, Alexander Rado: the head of a famous Soviet wartime spy net now collects geographic intelligence in Budapest, CIA.GOV, https://www.cia.gov/library/center-for-the-study-of-intelligence/kent-csi/vol12i3/html/v12i3a05p_0001.htm (last visited June 22, 2011). Thomas described how Rado was a "brilliant" student in Budapest who "became one of the first members of the Hungarian Communist Party when

The claimant stated that "Alexandre Rado's intelligence operation was exposed in 1943 and all the property in his apartment in Geneva was seized by the Swiss military police," by which time Alexandre Rado had fled to France. He was "tried by a Swiss court in 1947 in absentia, sentenced to three years in prison and banned from entering Switzerland for fifteen years, and was therefore unable to return to retrieve his assets in Switzerland." He was "handed over to the Soviet authorities in 1945 by the British authorities in Egypt," where he had sought asylum, "and was imprisoned by the Russian authorities until 1955 in [the] Gulag for it was formed in November 1918." He was forced to leave Hungary "when the short-lived Communist government was ousted in 1919," and went to Austria and then to Germany. He married Helene Rado (nèe Jansen), "an avid German Communist then working as [a] secretary to Lenin," who "participated extensively in his intelligence activities." The Rados moved to Paris in 1933, "where he founded, with Soviet financial backing, a press agency known as Inpress, specializing in maps and geographic data related to current events." In 1936, "German officials of Nazi persuasion …. sought out Rado for [an] Italian assignment [relating to mapping]" — the results of which Rado transmitted to Germany, Italy, and secretly "to the Russians" — an assignment which "remains a mystery."

In 1936 or 1937, again with Soviet funding and with a Swiss citizen as a silent partner, "Rado organized Geopress," which like Inpress specialized in maps and geography. "As cover for an intelligence operation it proved ideal." In secret, while in Switzerland, Rado held the Red Army rank of "Major General" and was awarded the Order of Lenin in 1943. With his network, he "accomplished much with the knowledge and tacit approval of officially neutral Switzerland. German pressure on the Swiss rather than independent Swiss initiative brought about the breakup of the net." After their discovery, the Rados sought refuge in Paris, and in 1944 "contacted friends in the French Resistance and spent five or six months working with the Maquis in southern France, for which they were later awarded the Legion of Honor by the French Government. They did not attempt to report to the Soviets until Paris was liberated in 1944," after which Alexander Rado was "ordered to report to Moscow for consultation."

With doubts about the fate that awaited him in the U.S.S.R., Rado attempted to leave when his plane landed in Cairo, but was "picked up by the British-directed Egyptian police, who were puzzled and uncertain as to how he should be handled." He attempted to present himself "as a victim of persecution and devoted to the Allied cause while holding on to a minimum of revelations that might increase the ire of Moscow." He sought to defect to the British but was turned down. He was handed over to Soviet authorities and flown to Moscow, where he was confined for more than a year to the Lubyanka prison, and may have performed forced labor in the Siberian coal mines. He was released in 1945 and returned to Budapest, where his family joined him and where his first wife died in 1958. He married a university librarian in 1959.

As author Louis Thomas concluded, "there seem to have been few times from the early 1920's through World War II when Alexander Rado was not engaged in some phase of intelligence collection. Whether his work upon returning to Hungary in 1955 was intended from the beginning to include such collection is moot. The fact remains that an emphasis on procurement became noticeable in the Hungarian mapping milieu shortly after he appeared on the scene and has increased steadily to the present. At some stage Moscow seems to have given him a green light to make Hungary a special instrument for the collection of geographic intelligence on the West." See also Alexander Rado (KV 2/1647-1649), THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES UK, available at http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+/https://nationalarchives.gov.uk/releases/2004/may21/rado.htm (visited on June 22, 2011) ("Rado was [an] intelligence officer living under cover in Switzerland who from 1936-1943 controlled the Rote Drei spy ring, with the aid of his wife Helene"); collaborating with the United States and Great Britain." According to the claimant, Helene Rado died in Budapest in 1959, and Alexandre Rado died there in approximately 1980.

Alexander Rado at age 60. https://www.cia.gov/library/center- for-the-study-of-intelligence/kent csi/vol12i3/html/v12i3a05p_0001.htm.

The claimant submitted a copy of his uncle's will, dated April 23, 1945, signed while Alexandre was in Egypt. This will listed among his assets an account held "at the Cornavin branch of the Bank in Geneva, an account at the Bank at Nassau Street in New York, New York, and an account at the Geneva Post Office Bank."

The bank records indicated that Alexandre and Helene Rado of Vienna owned a numbered custody account, and with the company Geopress S.A. also owned an account of unknown type, which was frozen at the Basel branch of the Swiss bank on January 3, 1944. The freeze evidently was in response to a letter of that same date from the state prosecutor in Bern to the bank, requesting that the bank block all accounts belonging to Alexander Rado, Helene Rado, and Geopress S.A. The bank records also contained a memorandum to the file prepared by the ICEP auditors, identifying Alexandre Rado "as a Jewish Russian spy in Switzerland during the Second World War who was expelled from Switzerland around the time that his accounts were frozen and stating that he resurfaced behind the Iron Curtain in Hungary in 1955." The memorandum also indicated that he owned an account of unknown type at the bank's New York branch, which was frozen in 1941.

The CRT awarded the Rados' nephew their custody account as well as their two accounts of unknown type (all at presumptive value), observing that "[t]he CRT is unaware of any legal process in Switzerland that deprived the Account Owner of his accounts," and relying upon the presumptions of the CRT Rules. As for Alexandre Rado's unique activities, the CRT observed: "Alexandre Rado was Jewish and … he was a Russian spy operating in Europe during the Second World War. As a Jewish person who was actively involved working for the defeat of the Nazis during World War II, the Account Owner clearly qualifies as a Victim or Target of Nazi persecution."

Subsequently, as a result of improvements in the CRT database and "matching" program, the CRT was able to locate the Initial Questionnaire that had been filed by Alexandre Rado's stepson, the son of Alexandre Rado's second wife. The CRT determined that the stepson was entitled to an award. The stepson expanded upon some of the information that had been provided by the original claimant. The newly-added claimant explained that the Rado family had lived in Paris from 1934 to 1936, where Alexandre Rado was "the head of the anti-Nazi press office," and that he was a "renowned geographer" who also led "an undercover anti-fascist organization that worked for the Red Army," and who went into hiding and later escaped to Paris when the organization was discovered. One of the Rados' sons was "beaten and interrogated by the Nazis; the family lost their wartime food rations, and the family's property and accounts were left behind in their haste to flee." According to the stepson, Alexandre Rado died on August 20, 1981; his mother (Rado's second wife) died in November 1974.

The claimant submitted a copy of Alexandre Rado's will, dated October 12, 1973, bequeathing his estate to his second wife, and if she predeceased him, then to his stepson (i.e. the claimant). The will specified that Alexandre Rado's sons with his first wife "were not to receive any portion of the estate." Based upon the will, the CRT determined that this claimant had a better entitlement to the shares owned by Alexandre Rado than did the account owner's nephew (the recipient of the original award), as well as a better entitlement to the share of the accounts held by Alexandre Rado's company, Geopress S.A. After determining the stepson's appropriate share of the three accounts awarded in the prior decision, the CRT recommended and the Court approved an amendment of SF 212,295.88. The CRT observed that "almost three years have passed" since the original award and "there is no indication that the [Rados' nephew] was aware that another equally entitled relative had filed a claim," and thus did not seek return of the original award.

xix. In re Account of Bertha Siegal (SF 47,400.00)

Bertha Siegal was born in 1906 in Volochisk, Ukraine. She lived in Ukraine, where she was a school professor until 1941. She briefly lived in Switzerland in the 1920s. When the Nazis invaded Ukraine in the summer of 1941, Bertha Siegal and her two children (one of whom was the claimant) tried to escape, but were seized and detained in the Stanislavchik Ghetto. Bertha Siegal died in Vinitsa, Ukraine in 1957.

The bank records showed that Bertha Siegal, who resided in Acquarossa Terme, Switzerland, held an account of unknown type, which had been transferred to a suspense account on or before December 20, 1948. The bank records included a February 19, 1964 memorandum addressed to the bank's Legal Department, referring to the 1962 Survey. As described by the CRT, the memorandum "references a telephone conversation held that day" and "encloses a list of accounts held at the Bank which had balances under 100.00 Swiss Francs. The memorandum 'requests [the Legal Department] to inform them which of the persons listed could be considered to be a Jew, so that we, in such cases, can close those accounts off the books.'" The account was closed by fees and charges on that same day, February 19, 1964.

Because the account had not been returned to its owner, the CRT awarded Bertha Siegal's son the presumptive value of an account of unknown type (as increased by the multiplier of 12 then in effect).

xx. In re Account of Hermine Szabo, Eugen Szabo, Gabriella Kasztner, Ernest Kasztner, Ana Feder Glanz, and Richard Feder (SF 49,375.00)

Eugen Szabo was born in 1879 in Czegled, Hungary, and his wife Hermine was born in 1876 in Romania. They had three daughters, including Gabriella (born in Cluj in 1910), who married Ernest Kasztner in 1933, and Ana (born in Cluj in 1911), who married Richard Feder in 1934. The family owned a department store in Cluj, S.A. Eugen Szabo Jeno R.T. Casa De Moda Si Textile, and according to the claimants had business relationships with textile companies elsewhere in Europe, including Switzerland.

Eugen Szabo, the claimants' grandfather, died in Cluj in 1940. Hermine Szabo, her daughters and their husbands were expelled from their homes in Cluj in 1944, and forced into the Jewish ghetto there. They were imprisoned for six months in Bergen-Belsen, and in December 1944 were taken to Switzerland as part of the "Kasztner" transport.[114] Three of the account owners are included in a database of 1,350 names of individuals who were in Bergen-Belsen from July 1944 until December 1944. Hermine Szabo died in a Swiss hospital in 1945; Richard Feder died in Cluj in 1956; and the other family members reached Israel in June 1949.

The bank records showed that six account owners together held a numbered account, and correspondence on the account was directed to an individual in Budapest. The bank was contacted in 1945 by an unidentified person who advised that account owner Richard Feder had divorced his wife, Ana Feder, and Richard Feder's name was crossed out from the bank record. The account was "controlled" (reviewed) in November 1949, and was indicated to be closed. The account was reviewed again in 1956 during Switzerland's internal survey to identify dormant accounts, and again on July 9, 1986. There is no indication to whom the account was paid, or its value.

[114] The "Kazstner" transport refers to a trainload of approximately 1,684 Jews who fled in 1944 from Nazi-allied Hungary. The train was named after Rudolf Kazstner, a Hungarian Jewish leader who was a principal player in the negotiations that led to the rescue of these Jews for a ransom of cash, jewels, gold and shares of stock. Despite the agreement that the train would go directly to a neutral country, it went instead to the concentration camp at Bergen-Belsen. Several hundred of the prisoners in that train later were sent on to Switzerland. See In re Account of Max Grünfeld, citing https://www.scrapbookpages.com/BergenBelsen/BergenBelsen06.html.

The CRT awarded the account on the basis that it still existed in November 1949. "The CRT notes that the Bank's records show a closing in November 1949, after some of the Account Owners had left Switzerland and arrived in Israel in June 1949; but this apparent closing does not appear to be a final closing …. because of the further reviews of the account in 1956 and 1986." The account was awarded at the presumptive value for an account of unknown type.

xxi. In re Account of Karl Weinberg (SF 37,665.75)

Karl Weinberg was born in 1897 in Herne, Germany. He lived in Dusseldorf, where he was a manufacturer. He fled with his family to Amsterdam. He was deported to Auschwitz, where he perished.[115] His sister (the grandmother of some of the claimants) and other relatives likewise were killed during the Holocaust.

Although the ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Karl Weinberg, the Swiss Federal Archive contained records relating to Karl Weinberg's account. The records indicated that Karl Weinberg was the Director of the N.V. Dassenfabriek "Derby" in Amsterdam. Karl Weinberg's assets were registered in the 1962 Survey, and the registration form indicated that he held a 25-year term life insurance policy at the Winterthur branch of the Custodian with a face value of SF 25,000, which matured on March 1, 1954. Karl Weinberg was both the policy holder and the insured. In the event of his death, his beneficiary was his wife. The records showed that the premium was last paid on March 1, 1935. As of September 1, 1963, the policy had a value of SF 4,055.

In January 1966, the Registration Office for Assets of Missing Foreigners asked the Guardianship Office of the city of Winterthur to appoint a guardian as authorized under the Federal Decree, and a guardian was in fact appointed. In 1970, the Guardian informed the [115] "Carl Weinberg was born in Herne, Germany in 1897. During the war he was in The Netherlands. Carl was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from the Netherlands found in In Memoriam - Nederlandse oorlogsslachtoffers, Nederlandse Oorlogsgravenstichting (Dutch War Victims Authority), `s-Gravenhage (courtesy of the Association of Yad Vashem Friends in Netherlands, Amsterdam)." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://db.yadvashem.org/names/nameDetails.html?itemId=4308601&language=en (last visited Aug. 4, 2015).

Guardianship Office that he had contacted an attorney in Germany and was attempting to locate Karl Weinberg's heirs, and therefore a "Missing Persons Proceeding" ("Verschollenheitsverfahren") should be postponed. In a January 12, 1971 letter, as described by the CRT, "the Guardianship Office inquired as to the status of the Guardian's search and informed him that if the heirs could not be located, the Missing Persons Proceeding should be rescheduled, as the time period allotted according to the Federal Decree relating to the 1962 Survey was expiring and would not be extended."

An extract of proceedings of the Guardianship Office, dated October 28, 1973, "indicates that although the Guardian had contacted the lawyer representing the family of the Account Owner, because the assets of the Account Owner had yet to be claimed and the Federal Decree regarding the 1962 Survey had expired, the Guardian was released from his responsibility and directed to transfer" Karl Weinberg's assets to the Heirless Assets account at the Federal Accounting Office. The Guardianship Office directed the Guardian to inform the Weinberg family's attorney that the "assets would be deposited in the Heirless Assets account" and could be claimed within the next five years.

The CRT noted that in 1999, Swiss authorities published certain names that had been reported in the 1962 Survey and that "[a]ccording to confidential information the CRT received from Swiss authorities," a claim "was received for the above account." After "research by those authorities, an amount of SF 11,980.00, representing the 1 September 1963 value of the account adjusted for interest, was paid out to the persons who filed the claim." The CRT concluded that the claim had been filed by and paid to the children and grandchildren of Karl Weinberg.

The CRT awarded the claim based upon the difference between the amount that had been paid in 1999, and the amount that would have been awarded had the claim been processed by the CRT, applying the 11.5 multiplier then in effect. The CRT observed that the assets "stem from an insurance policy, rather than a bank account" and that the Settlement Agreement does include "provisions to address restitution for insurance policies…." However, here, "the insurance carrier who issued the policy for the Account Owner is not among the Participating Insurance Carriers that participate in the Settlement Agreement. Further, the name of the Account Owner was not included in any list of policies published in connection with the Insurance Claims Process associated with" the Settlement Agreement.

The CRT concluded that this insurance policy was treated differently from those analyzed under the Insurance Claims Process, in that the assets remained with the carrier upon maturity in 1954, and the carrier registered the assets pursuant to the 1962 Survey. The policy was authorized for publication by Swiss banking authorities in 2005 under the name "Karl Weinberg," and it was listed as a bank account, rather than an insurance policy. Accordingly, the CRT determined that it was appropriate to treat the policy as an account of "other" type, and the award was calculated on the basis of the value of such account (minus the assets previously restituted in 1999).

xxii. In re Account of Fritz Zucker (SF 260,375.00)

Fritz Zucker was born in 1894 in Bukovina, Romania. He worked in engineering, textiles, and real estate, according to the claimant, his great-grandson. He and his son (the claimant's grandfather) were attacked during the Holocaust. Fritz Zucker died, but his son was able to escape into the forest. His son moved to Palestine after the War.

The bank records, which were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were obtained by the CRT from the Swiss Federal Archive in connection with documents compiled as part of the 1962 Survey, indicated that Fritz Zucker owned a custody account. In a January 27, 1941 letter to Fritz Zucker from the bank in Zurich, the bank confirmed that the account held various items of jewelry: a gold bracelet; a gold pocket watch with the monogram "AW;" a broach with diamonds and pearls; a gold broach with a figure of a small owl; a small rectangular broach with four small diamonds; a small broach "in a simple rod shape" with four small diamonds; two ladies' rings, "one with a green stone and gold setting, the other with a blue stone and white metal setting;" and one pair of gold cufflinks. The archival records did not contain values for these objects.

Records from the Swiss Federal Archive indicated that the last contact with Fritz Zucker had been before the end of the War. On January 7, 1964, Fritz Zucker's assets were reported to the Registration Office for Assets of Missing Foreigners. A note on the registration form stated, "'right of retention reserved.'" The bank indicated that "there was no possibility to value the objects." The bank also included a note stating that Fritz Zucker owed the bank SF 250.00 for outstanding custody fees. As described by the CRT, a "stamp on the registration form notes that the account had [not] yet been charged with the costs and fees associated with the investigation and registration of these assets, and that these costs and fees were a minimum of SF 100.00…" A custodian (guardian) over the assets was appointed on December 2, 1966.

On May 12, 1970 and again on January 5, 1971, the Registration Office wrote to the custodian to request that the assets be examined so that it could be determined whether the assets could be considered to be of minimal value, thus warranting their exclusion from further processing. On March 8, 1971, the custodian stated that he was waiting further instructions from the Federal Justice Department.

The CRT awarded the account to Fritz Zucker's great-grandson at the presumptive value for a custody account, observing that the account had been registered in the 1962 Survey, and "as of that date, it was open and dormant", and further noting that Fritz Zucker had perished during the Holocaust.

5. Safes Forced Open After the Death of the Account Owner or After the Holocaust

i. In re Accounts of Frl. Lilli Adler (SF 36,955.00)

Lilli Adler was born in Berlin in 1926. She was killed in the Holocaust with her parents. The claimant, her cousin, was born in Germany, and later resided in Haifa, Israel.

The bank records demonstrated that Lilli Adler owned a safe deposit box opened in 1939, frozen in 1946 under the 1945 Swiss freeze of German assets, and released in 1951. The bank records showed that the safe deposit box was forced upon by bank officials at the time it was frozen. As described by the CRT, the bank listed the safe as containing a golden powder compact; a golden cigarette case; a precious stone (probably a diamond); two diamond (possibly platinum) brooches; and SF 280. The money was transferred into a blocked demand deposit account in the name of Lilli Adler. The remaining assets in the safe were not accounted for.

Since the account owner perished in the Holocaust, was German with a German address as recorded in the bank file, and owned a safe forced open after the Holocaust and released several years later, the CRT presumed that neither the account owner nor her heirs had received the proceeds of her account. The award was paid at average value for a safe deposit box because, although the safe was known to contain jewelry, its value was unknown. Further, the CRT had no information as to the other assets that may or may not have been in the safe.

ii. In re Accounts of Ignaz Berger and Fanny Berger (SF 86,950.00)

Ignaz Berger was born in 1869 in Przemysl, Austria-Hungary (today Poland). His wife, Fanny, was born in 1872 in Katowice, Prussia (today Poland). Ignaz Berger owned a chemical factory in Vienna. He died on March 26, 1938, while his house was being searched for weapons by Austrian Nazis. Shortly thereafter, Fanny Berger fled to Milan, where two of their sons lived. She died in Milan in 1943.

The bank records indicated that Ignaz Berger's safe deposit box, rented in January 1932, was forced open in March 1946 in the presence of bank authorities and representatives of the Swiss Clearing Office. The opening protocol indicated that the safe held business contracts relating to the chemical factory, which were deemed valueless, and deposited with the bank for safekeeping.

The 1938 Census indicated that Fanny Berger owned an account of unknown type at a second Swiss bank, and reflected her Austrian address, as well as the fact that she had emigrated to Milan.

The CRT awarded the presumptive value of the safe deposit box to the claimant, the grandchild of the account owners (who had submitted a Deposited Assets claim through the Holocaust Claims Processing Office). The CRT found unreliable the bank's assessment that the assets in the safe were of no value. It was not likely that someone would have opened a safe deposit box in Switzerland only to deposit valueless assets. The CRT also awarded the presumptive value of the unknown type account disclosed in the 1938 Census, noting that "the facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which, after the Anschluss, Austrian citizens who were Jewish report their assets in the 1938 Census, and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to Nazi-controlled banks."

iii. In re Account of Malvine Fischl and Martha Reichmann (SF 37,575.00)

Malvine Fischl was born in 1886 in Prague, where her husband owned a pharmaceutical company. She perished in the Lodz ghetto.[116] The two claimants were both nieces of Malvine Fischl, and one also was the daughter of co-account owner Martha Reichmann. The latter claimant stated that she had been given a key to a safe deposit box owned by her aunt, Malvine Fischl.

The bank records indicated that Malvine Fischl and Martha Reichmann owned a safe deposit box. The box was forced open in February 1973. It contained a platinum watch; a pearl necklace; a diamond broach; diamond rings; and a gold bracelet. There had been no customer contact since 1940, according to the bank, and so the bank sold the broach in 1973 for SF 2,500 to cover outstanding and future costs for renting the safe. The safe was reopened in October [116] "Malvina Fischlova was born in 1886. During the war she was deported with Transport D, Train Da 17 from Praha, Praha Hlavni Mesto, Bohemia, Czechoslovakia to Lodz, Ghetto, Poland on 31/10/1941. Malvina was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a Deportation list found in Terezinska Pametni Kniha/Theresienstaedter Gedenkbuch, Terezinska Iniciativa, vol. I-II Melantrich, Praha 1995, vol. III Academia Verlag, Prag 2000." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4900852&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015).

1996. The contents were placed in a sealed envelope in a closed custody account in Lausanne. A jeweler appraised the contents at SF 5,000 at that time.

The CRT awarded the value of a safe deposit account at average value, noting that the 1973 sale of the broach was unreliable, since it could not be determined whether the sale had been conducted at arm's length. The CRT also observed that "although the Bank's financial obligations to the Claimants were fulfilled through payment of the Settlement amount, in this case, the Bank … expressed its desire to return the contents of the safe deposit box to the Claimants in a gesture of good will. The CRT is prepared to facilitate arrangements between representatives of the Claimants' estates and the Bank, should the representatives so desire." In addition, the CRT noted that although "in other cases, restitution previously received by the Account Owner or his or her heirs has been deducted from the award amount," in this case, the claimants had not yet received restitution. Thus, "it is not appropriate to deduct any amount from the award based upon any possible return of the safe's contents in the future." The award was issued to both claimants, each receiving one-half of the value of their aunt Malvine Fischl's share, and the second claimant receiving the full value of her mother Martha Reichmann's share.

Subsequently, family members from England and the Czech Republic personally visited Switzerland to collect the items from the bank. In the presence of CRT and bank personnel, the items were returned to the owners' heirs.

iv. In re Accounts of Otto and Maria Fuchs (SF 7,141,273.50); In re Account of Otto Fuchs (SF 10,750.00)

Otto Fuchs was born in 1881 in Prague, Czechoslovakia. He lived at 4 Cernovicka Street in Brünn, where he was a patent attorney. He had one child, the claimant. Otto Fuchs' sister Maria, the claimant's aunt, lived in Berlin, where she was a concert singer. Otto Fuchs was arrested by the Nazis and deported to a concentration camp. He survived the War and died in Brünn in 1957. His sister, Maria, who was unmarried and had no children, fled from Berlin to Brünn. There, she was captured by the Nazis, deported to a concentration camp in Poland, and perished in 1942.

The bank records showed that Otto Fuchs held an account at a Swiss bank ("Bank I") that was closed in 1941, unknown to whom. His sister Maria owned several additional accounts, none of which her niece (the claimant) had claimed, but all of which nevertheless were located by the CRT and awarded to the claimant as Maria Fuchs' heir.

Specifically, Maria Fuchs held seven accounts at the Zurich, Basel and Lausanne branches of a second Swiss bank ("Bank II"). The ICEP auditors determined that all seven of Maria Fuchs' accounts were frozen under the 1945 Swiss Freeze of German assets, which by that point already was some years after the account owner had been deported to Poland and killed in a concentration camp.

The first of Maria Fuchs' seven accounts was a safe deposit box which, as described by the CRT, "was forced open on 21 March 1946, and was found to contain 1,000.00 Swiss Francs in an envelope marked 'for Dr. Ing. Otto Fuchs, Brunn 17, Cernowitzerstr.4'" — the same street address separately reported in the bank records in connection with Otto Fuchs' account — "as well as two separate sealed bags containing gold coins valued at 20,000 Swiss Francs and 5,000 Swiss Francs." The last known date of the account's existence was October 18, 1952. The ICEP auditors presumed the account was closed.

Maria Fuchs also owned a custody account which, on May 13, 1946, had been frozen pursuant to the 1945 Freeze. As of June 20, 1946, the account held a balance of SF 39,125. The account was released from the freeze on January 12, 1951. "The account was reported by the Zurich branch [of the Bank], and on 13 January 1951, the Bank inserted a comment on the record stating that the Account Owner died in 1942 and that either the Bank could not locate the Account Owner's heirs or that the bank was restricted from contacting the Account Owner's heirs. It is not clear whether the account was closed by the Bank at some stage or remained open and dormant."

The other five accounts owned by Maria Fuchs likewise were frozen on various dates in 1945 and 1946: (1) a safe deposit box with an unknown balance as of February 16, 1945, frozen on March 23, 1946 and released on an unknown date; (2) an account of unknown type with a balance on February 16, 1945 of SF 15,973, frozen on September 25, 1945 and released prior to 1952; (3) an account of unknown type with a balance of SF 10,193 as of February 16, 1945, frozen on August 14, 1945 and released on February 11, 1949; (4) an account of unknown type with a balance of SF 11,281 as of February 16, 1945, frozen on August 14, 1945 and released on February 11, 1949; and (5) an account of unknown type with a balance of SF 486,941 as of February 16, 1945, frozen on August 14, 1945 and released on February 11, 1949.

With respect to the account owned by Otto Fuchs, the CRT observed that the account "was closed in March 1941 and the Account Owner was a Czech national." Given that Otto Fuchs had been sent to a concentration camp, and the account had been closed two years after the Nazi invasion of Czechoslovakia, the CRT concluded that Otto Fuchs had not received the proceeds of the account.

As to Maria Fuchs, given that she was "murdered by the Nazis during the War and that each of her seven accounts was frozen pursuant to Swiss law in 1945, and most of them were not released for several years after the War, the CRT [found] it plausible that Account Owner Maria Fuchs did not receive the proceeds of her accounts." After adjusting for interest and fees, the CRT awarded a total of USD $4,828,808.96 to the claimant for the accounts that had been owned by her father, Otto Fuchs, and her aunt, Maria Fuchs.[117]

[117] The Fuchs accounts were described in the 2002 New York Times article, Settling Accounts, But Not Minds; Holocaust Survivors Relive Past in Case Against Swiss Banks. As the newspaper reported: "The investigations uncovered lost family stories. A Czech woman submitted a claim for the account of her father, a Prague patent lawyer. Using databases of Holocaust victims and matching them to Swiss bank records, investigators at the tribunal showed that the woman's aunt also had accounts, seven in Lausanne, Basel and Zurich. The aunt, a concert singer, was killed in a concentration camp in Poland. The tribunal concluded it was unlikely that any relatives had obtained the money because of Swiss banks' practice of "withholding or misstating account information in their responses to inquiries." The banks have argued that such misleading actions were aberrations, not policy. The award to the Czech woman, approved last week, was $4.8 million."

v. In re Account of Joseph Goldberg (SF 66,287.50)

The account of Joseph Goldberg was claimed by two equally plausible claimants or groups of claimants. The account records relating to Joseph Goldberg's assets contained data sufficient for the CRT to determine that each claimant plausibly had demonstrated that he or she was related to a Holocaust victim named Joseph Goldberg. However, the records did not contain information sufficient for the CRT to determine whether the actual account owner was the relative of one claimant, as opposed to the other.

The first claimant identified the account owner as his grandfather, who had been born in 1875 and lived in Radomsko, Poland. He was deported to Treblinka in 1942, where he perished. The second claimant, who was not related to the first claimant, identified Joseph Goldberg as her father, who had lived in Lithuania. With his family, he was sent in 1941 to the Kaunas ghetto. The family was deported in 1945 to concentration camps including Stutthof, where all but the claimant perished.[118]

The 1962 Survey records obtained by the CRT from the Swiss Federal Archive showed that an individual named Joseph Goldberg had owned a safe deposit box at the bank. The records did not show the domicile of Joseph Goldberg. The records did show, however, that the bank's last contact with Mr. Goldberg had been in 1938, when he had visited the bank in person. The records showed that the bank had learned from correspondence from an unnamed private party that Joseph Goldberg had been deported to a concentration camp.

Following the 1962 Survey, the bank forcibly opened the safe, found a camera and a diamond ring, and sold the ring for SF 1,000. The bank deducted fees and costs from these [118] Other less plausible claims also were filed to the account of Joseph Goldberg. The CRT observed that there was "very little information" about the account owner and that usually, "the CRT considers such factors as an account owner's city or country of residence, his profession, nationality, and/or names of family members. Since such information about the account owner is not available in this case, the CRT considers other, more detailed and nuanced factors. Such factors include, but are not limited to, whether a claimant identified an exact spelling of the account owner's name; whether the claimant was able to provide documentation linking his or her surname to that of the account owner, thereby demonstrating a familial relationship to a person with the same name as the account owner; whether a claimant identified the account owner's name prior to its publication, or despite the fact that the name was never published; and/or whether the fate of the claimant's relative is consistent with the disposition of the claimed account. Based upon these considerations, matches between this account and less plausible claims were disconfirmed, and those claims were excluded from this decision."

proceeds, and transferred the balance of SF 647 to a demand deposit account that it opened in the account owner's name. A guardian was appointed over these assets in 1967, and in 1970, the SF 571.80 remaining in the account was transferred to the Swiss federal government's fund for dormant accounts.

The account had not been returned to the account owner, whom the bank knew had been sent to a concentration camp. The CRT thus awarded the presumptive value of a safe deposit box and a demand account, dividing the amount equally between the two claimant groups.

vi. In re Account of Rosa Jacobson-Granaat (SF 37,575.00)

Rosa Jacobson, née Granaat, was born in 1888 in Amsterdam, where she lived with her husband, a medical specialist, and their adopted daughter, who died in 1990. Rosa Granaat and her husband tried to hide on a farm to escape the Nazis, but they were discovered and deported to Westerbork. On September 3, 1944, they were sent to Auschwitz. They perished in Auschwitz three days later, on September 6, 1944.

In 2006, the Dutch Advisory Committee for the Assessment of Restitution Applications for Items of Cultural Value and the Second World War returned a painting from her great-aunt's collection to the claimant (Rosa Granaat's great-niece).

The bank's records showed that Rosa Jacobson-Granaat owned a demand deposit account, a custody account, and a safe deposit box. According to these records, the last known contact with the account owner was in February 1939, and the account owner perished in Auschwitz on September 6, 1944. The accounts were reported in the 1962 Survey.

The bank records indicated that the demand deposit and custody accounts were paid to the heirs of Rosa Jacobson-Granaat after these individuals (including her adopted daughter, then living in Malta) were located in 1970. However, the ICEP auditors reported that the contents of the safe deposit box had not been remitted to the heirs. It was unclear why this was so. The records showed that the safe deposit box had been forced open by the bank on December 23, 1963. It contained a case and a purse in ivory; a jewelry box containing a broach, a diamond bracelet, and an identification tag with the name "Rosa;" a case containing a knife and fork, with mauve stone handles; a comb with a tiara; a golden business card case and a rectangular golden case; a case containing a diamond ring; a diamond broach with a small pendent in a jewel case; and a small handkerchief. The ICEP auditors reported that these items remained in the custody of the bank.

Since the assets held in the safe deposit box had not been returned to the heirs, the CRT awarded the claimants the presumptive value of a safe deposit box. The CRT observed that, as in the case of In re Account of Malvine Fischl and Martha Reichmann (supra), "although the Bank's financial obligations to the claimants were fulfilled through payment of the Settlement amount, in the past, the Bank, upon learning that the CRT had received claim forms from claimants who definitely identified the Account Owners as their relatives, expressed its desire to return the contents of the safe deposit box to the claimants as a gesture of good will. Should the Bank and the Claimant desire in this case to pursue this course of action in the same manner, the CRT is prepared to facilitate arrangement between the Claimant and the Bank." Since it was unclear if the assets would be returned, no deduction was made from the award.

vii. In re Account of Ernst Menko (SF 36,955.00)

Ernst Menko was born in 1908 in Enschede, The Netherlands, where he worked at a textile factory owned by his father. He was deported to Auschwitz in 1942. He perished there in October 1944.[119] The claimant, Ernst Menko's niece, submitted a November 29, 1940 government certificate indicating that the family factory had been confiscated by the Nazis on September 14, 1940. The document listed the names and addresses of family members, including Ernst Menko.

[119] In the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, Ernst Meno's year of birth is listed as 1898. "Ernst Menko was born in Enschede, The Netherlands in 1898. During the war was in The Netherlands. Ernst was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from the Netherlands found in In Memoriam - Nederlandse oorlogsslachtoffers, Nederlandse Oorlogsgravenstichting, `s-Gravenhage (Dutch War Victims Authority) (courtesy of the Association of Yad Vashem Friends in Netherlands, Amsterdam)." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4271034&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015).

The bank records showed that Ernst Menko owned a safe deposit box that was forced open on May 27, 1941. The account was awarded to Ernst Menko's niece, given that his "property was confiscated by Nazi authorities in September 1940, he was deported in 1942, murdered in 1944" and his safe deposit box was forced open in 1941. Because the contents and value of the safe deposit box were unknown, the account was awarded at presumptive value.

viii. In re Accounts of Henriette Roos (SF 260,375.00)

Henriette Roos lived with her husband in Mainz, Germany. Their son Fritz, who was born in Mainz in 1878, owned vineyards, malt factories and an import/export hops business. Fritz Mainz perished in Theresienstadt; his mother Henriette also died in a concentration camp.

The bank records showed that Henriette Roos owned a safe deposit box as well as a custody account. Henriette Roos requested that the bank not forward any but the most urgent correspondence to her. The safe deposit box was forced open by the bank on November 18, 1938, in the presence of the Basel Public Notary, at which time the account held five different bonds. A bank employee removed the bonds from the safe deposit box.

The CRT awarded the market value of the bonds to the claimant, the granddaughter of Henriette Mainz and the daughter of Fritz Mainz.

ix. In re Account of Bedrich Spielmann (SF 37,575.00)

Bedrich Spielmann was born in Prostejov, Czechoslovakia, and lived there as well as in Germany and Austro-Hungary. The claimant, his great-nephew, believed that Bedrich Spielmann was an attorney or a businessman. He was killed in a concentration camp.

The bank records showed that Bedrich Spielmann held a safe deposit box rented on August 13, 1938. The account was considered for the 1962 Survey, but was not reported because, according to the bank, the account owner was "not persecuted." The safe deposit box was emptied on May 19, 1964 and its contents deemed valueless.

Based upon the fact that Bedrich Spielmann was killed in the Holocaust, and in the absence of any evidence indicating that the account was closed properly, the CRT awarded the owner's great-nephew the presumptive value of a safe deposit box. The CRT observed that notwithstanding the bank's indication in May 1964 that the contents of the safe were without value, "the CRT considers it implausible that an account owner would hold a safe deposit box for the purpose of depositing valueless objects. In this regard, the CRT notes that an account owner would have been charged SF 500.00 in fees from 1 January 1945 to 19 May 1964. The CRT considers it implausible that an account owner would pay fees to rent a safe deposit box to hold valueless objects."

6. Swiss Agreements with Poland, Hungary and Romania[120]

i. In re Account of Ascher Bank (SF 83,943.75)

Ascher Bank lived in Tarnow, Poland, and subsequently in Berlin, where he manufactured garments. He was married to the claimant's sister, who last heard from her sister and her husband in approximately 1940. The account owners presumably died in the Holocaust.[121]

The bank records demonstrated that Ascher Bank, of Polish nationality and residing in Berlin, owned an account of unknown type valued at £ 219.15.10 as of December 2, 1942. The account was reported by a bank employee, the Nazi spy August Dörflinger, who disclosed the names of Swiss bank account holders to the authorities in Nazi Germany.

In addition to the account reported by Dörflinger, the CRT also located an additional account held by Ascher Bank at the same Swiss bank, a demand deposit account. This account [120] The Court described these agreements as involving "money … taken from dormant accounts of murdered Polish and Hungarian citizens and transferred to Swiss citizens to ameliorate the claims these citizens were raising against the Polish and Hungarian governments after their assets had been nationalized," In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litig., 319 F. Supp. 2d at 313-314. There was also a similar agreement with Romania.

[121] The account was reported on the 2001 List as having been owned by an "institution" (i.e., a bank), but the CRT subsequently determined upon analysis of the bank files and claimant documents that the account actually was owned by an individual.

was reported in the 1962 Survey. As of September 1, 1963, it had a value of £ 205.00.00, or approximately SF 2,460. As described by the CRT, the "records indicate that the assets were reported by the Bank as a 'doubtful case' … in the course of the 1962 Survey. Furthermore, according to the bank records, the account at issue was reported by the Bank to the registration office for assets of missing foreigners at the Swiss Justice Department" on February 28, 1964, and was reported in 1965 to the Cantonal Guardianship Authority of Basel-City.

The bank files also showed that Ascher Bank's sister-in-law (the claimant) had written to the Cantonal Guardianship several times. Correspondence dated January 12, 1966, August 30, 1966 and October 24, 1967 indicated that the Cantonal Guardianship had asked for additional documentation, including a death certificate and a last will and testament. As the CRT observed, despite the fact that "the Account Owner's heir contacted the Registration Office and claimed the account" in 1966, ten years later, in 1975, the Swiss authorities nevertheless transferred the account to the Polish National Bank on August 15, 1975. This was part of a June 25, 1949 Polish-Swiss Compensation Agreement, which had called for "the payment of dormant assets held in Swiss banks by Polish nationals to the government of Poland in return for compensation to Swiss banks and Swiss life insurance companies that had suffered financial loss as a result of nationalizations in Poland."

As the CRT observed, the Court had discussed this specific agreement in the context of its 2004 opinion on the behavior of the Swiss banks toward its Jewish depositors. In this decision, the Court noted that the Swiss-Polish agreement was an example of the banks' "devotion to secrecy and … repeated acts of stonewalling," which "were not based on principles – they were profit driven."[122]

The CRT awarded the claimant the adjusted value of the demand deposit account that had been turned over to Poland (SF 2,765.50) as well as the presumptive value of the account that Dörflinger had reported to the Nazis, for a total award of SF 83,943.75.

ii. In re Account of Oswei Epstein (SF 28,712.50)

Oswei Epstein was born in 1877 in Motol, Belarus. He was a wood exporter who lived in Danzig (today Gdansk, Poland) and in Warsaw. He died in Danzig in November 1937, and his wife died in the Pinsk ghetto.

Oswei Epstein's account was reported in the 1962 Survey. In December 1965, a custodian (guardian) was appointed for the account. The proceeds were transferred in May 1970 to the Heirless Assets Fund in Bern. On August 15, 1975 the proceeds were transferred to the Polish National Bank.

Records for the account also were available from the Polish Ministry of Finance. As the CRT observed, "[i]n the publication entitled Nasze finance, published by the Press Office of the Polish Ministry of Finance, number 25, dated February 1998, there is information concerning the assets of Oswei Epstein." The records showed that Oswei Epstein was Jewish and "resided at Sienna 43 A, in Warsaw, Poland, and was a wood exporter. These records indicate that the Account Owner held an account with a balance of SF 794.00, of which SF 134.00 was taken as bank fees. The records further indicate that the account had a balance of SF 660.00 on 15 August 1975, when it was transferred to the Polish National Bank." The CRT observed that although Oswei Epstein himself was not a Nazi victim, as he had died prior to the Nazi occupation of Poland, his wife and heir, who died in a ghetto, had been a victim. Thus, the CRT awarded the account proceeds to the Epsteins' grandsons, at the presumptive value for a demand deposit account.

iii. In re Account of Sigmund Fichmann (SF 49,375.00)

Sigmund Fischmann was born in 1884 in Kalush, Poland (now Ukraine). He lived in Budapest during World War II. He worked as a sales representative for a Swiss textile wholesaler. He died in Budapest in 1951.

Sigmund Fischmann's account was reported in the 1962 Survey and, following litigation seeking to obtain access to bank records and accounts beyond those provided at the outset of the claims process, the account was published as part of the 2005 List. The bank records indicated that Mr. Fischmann, a Hungarian national and textiles salesman, had not been heard from since the 1944 occupation of Budapest.

In January 1964, a businessman in Zurich, Gottfried Schaerer, registered assets totaling SF 1,992.65 with the Swiss Federal Department of Justice. Mr. Schaerer stated that these assets represented a balance that he owed to Mr. Fischmann. He asked where he could deposit the assets. As described by the CRT, the Swiss Federal Department of Justice advised in February 1964 that the assets should be transferred to an account administered by Swiss authorities, and Mr. Schaerer did so. In December 1966, the city of Zurich's custodial authorities named a custodian (guardian) for the assets. The records did not indicate the ultimate disposition of the assets.

Documents provided by the claimants, Sigmund Fichmann's niece and great-nephew, indicated that the account had been published at least once prior to the 2005 List. It also had been published in connection with the 1997 "list that was given to the Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs." At that time, Sigmund Fischmann's niece was "disputing the validity of the inter-state agreement of 1972 on both the Hungarian and Swiss sides, and requested details about the account and payment of the assets to the Hungarian state."

The claimants also provided documents showing that several years later, Sigmund Fischmann's great-nephew had written to the Contact Office for the Search of Dormant Accounts Administered by Swiss Banks. The Contact Office responded: "'Unfortunately, we are not in possession of the information concerning the account of Mr. Fichmann. As far as the possibility of a claim for compensation is concerned, you should consult with a lawyer specializing in international law.'" Assessing this response, the CRT observed: "It is not clear why the Contact Office did not have access to the files of the assets registered pursuant to the 1962 Survey …, why it was not aware of (or did not draw attention to) the account's apparent inclusion in the 1972 transfer of assets from Switzerland to Hungary, or why it simply did not refer [the claimant] to the CRT."

The account owner had died in Budapest in 1951. He was behind the Iron Curtain and could not have had his funds repatriated to him. Therefore, the CRT awarded Sigmund Fischmann's heirs the presumptive value of an account of unknown type.

iv. In re Account of Eugen Halasz (SF 47,400.00)

Eugen Halasz was born in 1887 or 1894 in Vadafalva, Transylvania (today Odesti, Romania). He lived in Budapest with his family, where he was forced to hide from the Nazis during World War II. Eugen Halasz died in Budapest in June 1949.

In 1997, Eugen Halasz' grandson (the claimant) discovered the name "Eugen Halasz" on a published list of "heirless" Hungarian accounts that had been held in Swiss banks and transferred to the Hungarian government. Eugen Halasz' name also was included in a report created by the Swiss Task Force for the Assets of Nazi Victims.

The bank records showed that Eugen Halasz' name was indeed included on a January 27, 1997 list of 33 unclaimed accounts of Hungarian nationals who had vanished. He had owned an account of unknown type, which had a balance of SF 842.30 in September 1963, when it was reported as part of the 1962 Survey. The bank transferred the assets to the Swiss government, which then transferred the money to the Hungarian government on February 19, 1975 as part of a general settlement of claims with Hungary.

As described by the CRT, under this settlement, the Swiss-Hungarian Compensation Agreement of March 26, 1973, "Switzerland gave assurances in a confidential side protocol [that] it would compensate Hungary with 325,000 Swiss Francs for the transfer to the Unclaimed Assets Fund of unclaimed assets belonging to Hungarian nationals presumed to be deceased, in disregard of the claim of the Hungarian state to the reversion. Hungarian counterclaims amounting to 400,000 Swiss Francs were offset directly against the sum compensating dispossessed Swiss property owners, which amounted to Swiss Francs 1.8 million. The two governments made public only the net compensation of 1.4 million Swiss Francs. On 19 February 1975, on instructions from the Federal Justice Department, the Federal Financial Administration transferred 325,000.00 Swiss Francs from the Unclaimed Assets Fund to the account kept by the Political Department to the Hungarian government."

Since the account had been turned over to the Hungarian government rather than repaid to its owner, the CRT awarded the account (of unknown type) at its presumptive value.

v. In re Account of Walter Loevy (SF 49,375.00)

Walter Loevy was born in the 1890s in Danzig, Germany (today Gdansk, Poland). He lived there with his wife and two children, where he was a timber merchant. He moved with his family to Warsaw in 1938. The entire family perished in the Warsaw Ghetto in approximately 1942.

The documents relating to Walter Loevy's account were contained within the records of the Swiss Federal Archive, as well as the information published by the Polish Ministry of Finance. The archival records showed that Walter Loevy held one account containing 12 golden Double Eagle coins, worth SF 2,160 as of September 1, 1963. The account was reported in the 1962 Survey, and a custodian (guardian) for the account was appointed in 1966. In addition, the account was reported in the Polish Ministry of Finance Press Office publication "Nasze finance," which indicated that the account of Walter Loevy (SF 3,378) was transferred on August 15, 1975 to the Polish National Bank, pursuant to the Swiss-Polish agreement. The CRT awarded the account at presumptive value to the claimants, the nieces of Walter Loevy.

vi. In re Account of Adalbert Löw-Beer and Nelly Haimann (SF 300,664.32); In re Account of Adalbert Löw-Beer, Frau Löw-Beer and Frau Nelly Haimann (SF 235,724.00)

Adalbert Löw-Beer was born in approximately 1894 in Bekecs, Zemplén-megye, Austria-Hungary. Nelly Haimann, his co-account owner, was one of his two sisters. Adalbert Löw-Beer lived in Budapest from 1919 until 1924, when he moved to Timisoara, Romania. In Timisoara, he owned a successful electrical appliances factory. In the late 1930s, he was forced to sell his share of the factory to his business partner. He returned to Budapest, where his home was ransacked by Nazi troops. He was deported to Auschwitz in 1944, where he died. Account owner Nelly Haimann was interned in the Budapest Ghetto. She died shortly after the war.

The claimant, the nephew of the account owners, submitted an October 1, 1946 letter addressed to him from the Swiss bank at which the accounts were held, relating to accounts owned by other relatives. The bank advised the claimant that his relatives' accounts, which together were worth $10,176, had been frozen. The claimant advised the CRT that in 1957, he had traveled to Zurich to visit the bank. At that time, he "was informed that he could not make a successful claim to the account because of a limitation period imposed by the Bank regarding older accounts."

The CRT observed that "the HCPO [which had assisted the claimant in pursuing his relatives' accounts] learned through contacts with the Bank that the Bank had transferred funds from the account on 21 June 1950. The Bank stated that it does not know who received the assets." The CRT awarded the account, in light of the fact that in 1950, at the time the bank allegedly had transferred the funds in the account, "it would have been difficult and dangerous for the Claimant or the other members of his family to access the account from Communist Eastern Europe."

In a subsequent decision involving an account owned by Adalbert Löw-Beer and Nelly Haimann, along with an additional account owner, Frau Löw-Beer (the wife of Adalbert Löw-Beer), the CRT described additional documentation relating to the account owners. These documents included "a letter from the bank to the HCPO, dated 10 June 1998, confirming the existence of the two accounts and their inclusion in the freeze of Hungarian assets, and stating that, 'following the unblocking [in 1947], [the Bank] transferred the proceeds of Mr. Löw-Beer's accounts in accordance with customary bank procedures and applicable legal requirements.'" The bank asked the claimant for "'any additional information concerning who might have received the account proceeds upon account closure.'" The HCPO advised the bank that the claimant and his family "lived in Hungary from 1949 to 1954, and … that 'any contact with the West resulted in extremely harsh repressive measures, including imprisonment." On March 18, 1999, the bank reiterated that it could not locate further documentation and also observed that "it 'did not mean to imply that [Claimant] or his family received the assets.'"

The CRT awarded the account, of unknown type, to the claimant and another relative, determining that the claimant was entitled to two-thirds and his relative was entitled to one-third. The CRT observed that the Löw-Beers had died during the Holocaust. As to the surviving account owner, Nelly Haimann, she would not have been able to obtain information about the account after the War, nor would she or other heirs have been able to receive the proceeds, since they were living in Communist Hungary and Romania. In addition, the account had been included in the freeze of Hungarian assets, and by the time of its transfer in 1950, all three account owners were deceased.

vii. In re Account of Samuel Rabinow (SF 39,893.75)

Samuel Rabinow was born in 1907 in Pinsk, Poland. He lived in Lodz and studied engineering in Belgium and France. He was an agent for a Swiss company producing silk nets for flour mills. The claimants, respectively the cousin and second cousin of Samuel Rabinow (representing several other cousins), believed that he perished either in the Warsaw Ghetto, the Lodz Ghetto, or Auschwitz.

The account was published on the 2005 List. In connection with the records relating to the 1962 Survey, filed with the Swiss Federal Archive in Bern, the CRT had located documents relating to the registration of assets belonging to the engineer Samuel Rabinow. The records included a February 1964 letter from a Mme. Finkelstein, named as a contact person for the account. Mme. Finkelstein stated that Samuel Rabinow of Lodz was believed to have perished in 1942 or 1943 in the Warsaw Ghetto (thus confirming the claimants' belief that their cousin might have perished there). The records indicated that Samuel Rabinow held a demand deposit account which, as of February 1964, held a balance of SF 2,906.50.

In addition to the 1962 Survey records, the CRT observed that in a "publication entitled Nasze Finanse, published by the Press Office of the Polish Ministry of Finance, number 25, dated 1998, there is information concerning the assets of Samuel Rabinow. According to these records, the Account Owner was Ing. Samuel Rabinow, who perished in 1942 or 1943 in the Warsaw Ghetto, Poland." These records indicated that the account held a balance of SF 2,906.50 as of August 15, 1975. On that date, the proceeds of the account were transferred to the Polish National Bank. Since the account was not paid to the owner or his heirs, but rather to the Polish National Bank, the CRT awarded the account to Samuel Rabinow's cousins (increasing the recorded amount of SF 2,906.50 by SF 285 to reflect standardized bank fees taken between 1945 and 1963, and multiplying that amount by 12.5). The award was divided among nine different individuals, two of whom the CRT determined each were entitled to 1/6 of the account. The remaining seven each were entitled to 1/9 of the account.

viii. In re Account of Klara Ramer, Salomon Ramer and Samuel Herzig (SF 47,400.00)

Klara Ramer was born in 1878 in Krakow. She died in Auschwitz between 1943 and 1945. Her husband, Dr. Salomon Mandel Ramer, was born in 1873 in Sanok, Poland. He died in Dolina, Poland on November 7, 1939 while fleeing after the September 1, 1939 invasion. The Ramers had two children, one of whom perished with his mother in Auschwitz, and the other who survived and died in New York in 1992. The children of the latter individual (i.e. the grandchildren of the Ramers) claimed the account.

The bank records showed that Frau Klara Ramer, Dr. Salomon Ramer and Dr. Samuel Herzig owned an account, and used the code name Waisenhaus, Sanok, Polen. Their last known contact with the bank was in 1935. The account, of unknown type, was registered in connection with the 1962 Survey. On September 1, 1963, it had a balance of SF 917. The CRT explained that the account on that date "was paid to the Polish Government in accordance with the Agreement between Switzerland and Poland of 1949. This Agreement effectively provided for use of victim depositors' funds to assist in the compensation of Swiss nationals whose property was expropriated by the Polish Government." The CRT awarded the account at presumptive value to the owners' grandchildren.

ix. In re Accounts of Henryk Ruziewicz and Zofja Ruziewicz (SF 28,712.50)

Henryk Ruziewicz was born in approximately 1888 in Warsaw, Poland. He owned a large oilcloth factory located at the same address as his house, which, according to the claimant, was located at approximately 80 Czerniakowska Street. Henryk Ruziewicz perished in a death camp in 1942, and other family members also died in the Holocaust.

The CRT conducted additional research to assist the claimant, a cousin of Henryk Ruziewicz. The CRT located the Warsaw telephone directories for the years 1931-32 and 1939-40. These directories indicated that the oilcloth and artificial leather factory for the "Ruziewicz brothers & Krywicki M." was located at 84 Czerniakowska Street. The directories also identified other individuals with the last name Ruziewicz living at 82-84 Czerniakowska Street, including Maksymiljan Ruziewicz, Antonina Ruziewicz and Eugenia Ruziewicz.

Account of Henryk Ruziewicz: The bank records included a 1955 internal survey of accounts belonging to owners domiciled in Poland in 1939 who had not been in contact with the bank since 1945, as well as records relating to the 1959 and 1962 Surveys. The records showed that Henryk Ruziewicz owned a demand deposit account opened in 1931; that the last communication with him had taken place in 1936; and that on June 30, 1955, the account held a balance of $73.20.

The documents also included a July 13, 1955 letter from the Swiss Bankers' Association to its member banks. The letter referred "to an agreement reached between the Swiss and Polish delegations on 25 June 1949, according to which, after a period of five years, Swiss banks were to create a list of accounts owned by Polish citizens who were domiciled in Poland as of 1 September 1939 and from whom no information had been received since 9 May 1945. Pursuant to this agreement, assets in these accounts were to be transferred to the Swiss National Bank and to be credited to the Polish National Bank. In return, Poland was to indemnify Swiss interests in Poland that had been nationalized after the War. The letter notes that the five year waiting period had passed, and set forth guidelines for the reporting of relevant accounts." The CRT observed that the account "was considered for inclusion in the 1962 Survey" but "ultimately not registered," and also noted that the records "do not indicate why … fees were continued to be deducted from an account that had been identified by the Bank as dormant."

Accounts of Zofja Ruziewicz: Although the claimant had not claimed the account of Zofja Ruziewicz, the CRT, through its independent research, including its analysis of 1930s Warsaw telephone directories, discovered that Zofja Ruziewicz in fact was a relative of the claimant's. She, too, owned a Swiss account, to which the claimant was the potential heir.

The bank records showed that Zofja Ruziewicz was born in 1928, and owned a custody account as well as a demand deposit account. Until Zofja reached the age of majority in 1949, the depositor Maks Ruziewicz had the right to dispose of the assets in Zofja's accounts. Maks Ruziewicz granted power of attorney to several individuals living in Warsaw, including Henryk Ruziewicz, Eugenia Ruziewicz, Antonina Ruziewicz and Ada Ruziewicz. The correspondence address was 84 Czerniakowska Street. On March 17, 1937, the bank was instructed to hold mail. The accounts were closed on April 4, 1939.

Pursuant to the CRT's request to the bank for "voluntary assistance," the bank provided the CRT with other documents, including records indicating that Zofja Ruziewicz was the niece of Maks Ruziewicz. The documents confirmed that her accounts were closed in April 1939. The proceeds, including $8,350 in gold coins, were transferred to the Chase National Bank in London pursuant to transfer order by Henryk Ruziewicz and Ada Ruziewicz.

The CRT awarded the account of Henryk Ruziewicz based upon the fact that the account owner had died in the Holocaust; his account was included in three bank surveys, including the 1962 Survey; and the account may have been part of the Swiss-Polish agreement. The CRT determined that Zofja Ruziewicz's accounts were transferred to London in accordance with the directives of the powers of attorney holders. The account owner or other entitled parties had received the proceeds of the accounts, and so the CRT did not recommend that these accounts be awarded.

x. In re Accounts of Ionica Weiss (SF 744,720.00)

Ionica Weiss was born in 1888 in Hungary. She lived with her husband Geza, an optician, and their children in Oradea and later in Nagyvarad. On June 3, 1944, Ionica and Geza Weiss were deported to Auschwitz. They were gassed upon arrival. One of their children moved to France after the War; the other (the claimant) lived in Romania until 1960, when she emigrated to Israel.

The bank records indicated that Ionica Weiss of Romania held an account of unknown type, valued at SF 62,000 on August 20, 1948. The account was included on a list of Swiss bank accounts "that were registered by Romanian citizens who were compelled by the Romanian Communist Regime to report their foreign assets, or by the Regime itself when it determined that its citizens owned assets held in Swiss banks." The August 20, 1948 date upon which the account was valued was "recognized by the CRT as that of the Swiss Government's Freeze of Romanian Assets."

The CRT awarded the account to the daughter of Ionica Weiss (who had filed an Initial Questionnaire but not a CRT claim form), observing that "the account belonged to a Romanian citizen and was still open as of 1948, which was four years after the Account Owner died in Auschwitz, and therefore may have been subject to the Freeze of Romanian Assets in August 1948." The CRT noted that the Freeze was lifted in 1950 and that approximately "one year later, in August 1951, Switzerland and Romania entered into an agreement on compensation for Swiss property that had been nationalized by Romania's communist regime. As part of that arrangement, the Swiss Government agreed to assist the Romanian Government in finding the dormant account assets of deceased Romanian nationals and residents in Swiss banks."

Thus, the CRT concluded, "there is a possibility that, as in the case of expropriated property compensation agreements with Poland and Hungary, the Swiss Government, which is a Releasee under the Settlement, may have used the account of the Account Owner, and others similarly situated, as leverage to obtain compensation for the property of Swiss citizens expropriated by the Romanian government by agreeing to assist that Government in locating the dormant account of the deceased Account Owner. A direct agreement to transfer unclaimed assets was apparently not part of the Romanian agreement due to an international outcry against the Swiss Government agreement with Poland and Hungary in 1950, which did provide for such transfers." In any event, there was no evidence that Ionica Weiss or her heirs had received the proceeds of the account.

xi. In re Account of Erna Zimet-Achselrad (SF 289,087.50)

Erna Zimet-Achselrad (Axelrad) was born in approximately 1880 in Skala, Poland (now the Ukraine). She lived with her husband in Warsaw until their deportation in 1939.

Bank records relating to the accounts were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were located in the Swiss Federal Archive. The account subsequently was published in 2005.

In December, 1964, the account owner's niece, Zilla Hass-Axelrad (the claimant's mother), filed a claim with the Swiss Registration Office for Assets of Missing Foreigners, which was part of the Swiss Department of Justice. As described by the CRT, in an August 17, 1965 response to an attorney representing Zilla Hass-Axelrad (Dr. Weil), Dr. Weber of the Registration Office "stated that assets valued at a few thousand francs had been reported to the Registration Office, and that pursuant to 1962 Survey regulations, several legal measures must be completed. He explained that these measures would take considerable time, and that the Account Owner's legitimate heirs should therefore not expect payment any time soon. He noted that documents showing proof of identity should only be submitted upon the expressed written request of his office."

The bank records, however, indicated that as of January 23, 1964, eighteen months before the Swiss Registration Office wrote to the claimant's mother, Erna Zimet-Achselrad was known to have held a custody account containing bonds issued by the bank worth SF 2,000.00. She also owned a demand deposit account with a value of SF 493.82. These assets were reported by the bank in the course of the 1962 Survey. Although the account owner's niece had claimed the accounts by the end of 1964, over one year later, on February 1, 1966, Dr. Weber, the Swiss representative, nevertheless wrote to the Guardianship Authorities of the city of Basel to establish a guardianship over the account. While Dr. Weber did advise the authorities that Zilla Hass-Axelrad had claimed assets belonging to Erna Zimet-Achselrad, an April 3, 1967 resolution of the Guardianship Authorities still placed the assets under the legal care of Dr. Heinz Häberlin. "Dr. Häberlin was instructed to report to the Guardianship Authorities should a credible claim be made to these assets, so that the legal representation could be rescinded."

On December 23, 1967, Dr. Weber wrote to the family attorney, Dr. Weil, with reference to a visit Dr. Weil had made to the Registration Office on December 11, 1967. Dr. Weber stated that on August 17, 1965, his office had informed Zilla Hass-Axelrad that assets belonging to her aunt had been reported pursuant to the 1962 Survey. He explained that to prove her rights to the assets, Zilla Hass-Axelrad needed to submit certain documents to Dr. Häberlin, who was handling the matter.

Records from the Swiss Federal Archive contained an April 9, 1973 resolution of the Guardianship Authorities pertaining to the assets of Erna Zimet-Achselrad. As described by the CRT, "the resolution notes that names of owners of assets reported in the 1962 Survey shall not be published and that no missing person proceedings shall be conducted for such owners in those cases in which such actions may cause difficulties for the missing person." The resolution noted that a "presidential order of 8 March 1972 permitted the Registration Office to transfer funds affected by this provision to an 'Heirless Assets' fund" and that the assets could be "transferred to the Federal Department of Finance. A copy of the resolution was sent to Dr. Weil as the representative of Zilla Hass-Axelrad, who in 1966 was the last person to file a claim to the assets."

Over two decades later, in February 1998, the Polish Ministry of Finance issued a publication entitled Nasze finance. This pamphlet made clear that Erna Zimet-Achselrad of Warsaw had held a custody account containing bank bonds worth SF 2,000.00, and a demand deposit account with a value of SF 493.82. These records indicated that an amount equal to SF 2,849.00 was transferred on August 15, 1975 to the Polish National Bank. The records also indicated that Zilla Hass-Axelrad of Israel had made an application to this account.

In awarding the account, the CRT observed:

> The difficulties Zilla Hass-Axelrad and her legal representatives encountered in establishing her rights to her aunt's account seem to have been in line with the general circumstances referred to in Peter Hug and Marc Perrenoud, In der Schweiz liegende Vermögenswerte von Nazi-Opfern und Entschädigungsabkommen mit Oststaaten, Bundesarchiv Dossier 4, Bern, 13 December 1996/January 1997. The conditions laid down by the Swiss authorities represented a veritable Catch-22: with regard to account owners from behind the Iron Curtain, no search was undertaken, nor were account owner names publicized, in order to protect these persons from their own governments' pressure to then transfer these funds; for heirs of account owners, who in the meantime had moved to the West, the general procedure of first proving that the disappearance of the account owners was such that death could legally be assumed (Verschollenheitsverfahren) and then providing the necessary inheritance documentation was virtually impossible. All this helps to explain why the ultimate amount transferred to Poland by Swiss authorities, SF 463,954.55, was about equal to the approximately SF 500,000.00 that had been registered in 1962 as dormant accounts belonging to Polish account owners considered victims of Nazi persecution.

The CRT pointed out that the Polish – Swiss Compensation Agreement of June 25, 1949 "called for the payment of dormant assets held in Swiss banks by Polish nationals to the government of Poland in return for compensation to Swiss banks and Swiss life insurance companies that had suffered financial loss as a result of nationalizations in Poland." The Swiss Federal Archive records "indicate that the Guardianship Authorities were granted permission to transfer the funds to the Heirless Assets Fund administered by the Federal Department of Finance, though these records do not indicate the ultimate disposition of the assets." The Polish Ministry of Finance records "indicate that the amounts in the accounts were paid to the Polish National Bank on 15 August 1975. The CRT notes that these accounts were paid to the Polish National Bank in 1975 even though the Account Owner's heir contacted the Registration Office and claimed the account over ten years previously, in 1964."

As noted in the CRT's decision, the Court had cited the Polish-Swiss arrangement as an example of the "Swiss banks' devotion to secrecy and their repeated acts of stonewalling," which "were not based on principles – they were profit-driven."[123] The Court explained:

[123] 319 F. Supp. 2d 301, 313 (E.D.N.Y. 2004).

> A particularly telling example of profits being placed over "banking secrecy" is the secret post-war deals reached by the Swiss with Poland and Hungary to loot unclaimed accounts belonging to Holocaust Victims. "[T]he primary aim of [these deals] was to favour Swiss interests in the wake of nationalization of assets in Poland and Hungary." The Bergier Commission was conservative when it wrote that this was "the primary aim" of the deals. What actually happened was that money was taken from dormant accounts of murdered Polish and Hungarian citizens and transferred to Swiss citizens to ameliorate the claims these citizens were raising against the Polish and Hungarian governments after their assets had been nationalized…. What is most striking about these secret agreements is that, as the Bergier Commission pointed out, "[s]urprisingly, it was now apparently possible to conduct an internal investigation so that a list of dormant accounts relating to these countries could be drawn up." Indeed, "[n]either private property rights nor banking secrecy had been a barrier to the release of these assets."[124]

In the case of Erna Zimet-Achselrad, this took place even though Swiss authorities were aware that the account owner's niece had sought to recover these accounts as early as 1964.

Although the recorded amount of the custody account was SF 2,000, since that amount was lower than presumptive value, the great-niece of Erna Zimet-Achselrad was awarded the custody and demand deposit accounts at their respective presumptive values.

C. AWARDED ACCOUNTS LOCATED BY THE CRT FROM SOURCES OUTSIDE THE ACCOUNT HISTORY DATABASE (AHD), SUCH AS THROUGH ARCHIVAL AND 1938 CENSUS RECORDS OR TAD

1. Accounts Located Through 1938 Census Forms or Archives

i. In re Account of Leopold Liebes (SF 260,375.00)

Leopold Liebes was born in 1868 in Germany. He owned a business in Hamburg, Goldtree and Liebes. The business is included on a list of aryanized Hamburg companies compiled by the Holocaust economic historian, Frank Bajohr.[125] After the aryanization of his company, Leopold Liebes fled to El Salvador, where he died in 1945.

The ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Leopold Liebes; rather, the CRT located documents evidencing the account in the Oberfinanzdirektion Berlin archive. The account subsequently was published on the 2005 List. The archive contained a 1938 Census declaration from Leopold Liebes, which he signed in San Salvador on October 1, 1938. The Berlin archive also contained an October 24, 1938 letter from the bank to Leo Liebes at an address in Hamburg. The letter indicated that as of October 20, 1938, Leo Liebes owned a custody account containing a type of Chilean gold bond, with a market value of approximately RM 2,000, held in Switzerland. The records further indicated that Leopold Liebes was assessed an atonement tax of RM 37,400 on October 26, 1939, which he contested on the ground that he was a citizen of El Salvador.

The CRT awarded the account to Leo Liebes' granddaughter (who was represented by her son, the claimant), observing that the case was similar to others in which "Jewish residents or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich."

ii. In re Account of Josef Novak (SF 49,375.00)

Josef Novak was born in 1879. He was a gynecologist in Vienna. He fled to Prague, and then to the United Kingdom, later settling in New York. Two unrelated individuals claimed the account. One claimant identified Josef Novak as her father; another identified the same individual as her husband's uncle, Prof. Josef Novak of Vienna, who had fled from Austria to the U.S.

[125] See FRANK BAJOHR, 'ARYANISATION' IN HAMBURG: THE ECONOMIC EXCLUSION OF JEWS AND THE CONFISCATION OF THEIR PROPERTY IN NAZI GERMANY 297 (Berghahn Books 2002) ("Bajohr") (listing 625 "Aryanized Jewish Firms" based in Hamburg, including Goldtree & Liebes, described as a bulk export business located at Neue Burg 29).

No accounts in the name of Josef Novak were reported in the Accounts History Database (AHD), the database of Holocaust-era Swiss accounts made available by Swiss banking authorities to the CRT. Accordingly, the claimants initially received "No Match Letters" advising that the CRT had been unable to match the names of their relatives to the AHD database.[126]

Josef Novak's daughter, the first claimant, thereafter submitted records from the 1938 Census, which showed that Dr. Novak had owned an account of unknown type at a Swiss bank, and had reported an account value of SF 708 as of April 1938. On reconsideration, the CRT awarded the account to the first claimant (Dr. Novak's daughter, who had a stronger claim to the account than did the spouse of Dr. Novak's nephew, the second claimant). The CRT observed that the account was reported in the 1938 Census and that it was plausible that the account had been transferred to banks in the Reich, or closed unknown to whom. In addition, based on the principle that Nazi victims may have underreported the value of their assets in Census forms, the account was awarded at the higher presumptive value, as opposed to the SF 708 reported in the Census form.

iii. In re Account of Julius Philipp (SF 260,375.00)

Julius Philipp was born in 1878 in Wandsbek, near Hamburg, Germany. He was a metal merchant in Hamburg until 1934, when the family fled to Amsterdam. Julius Philipp again established a metal business in Amsterdam. According to the claimant (a daughter of Julius Philipp), in 1941 that business was seized by Nazi authorities. The family was deported to Westerbork in 1943, and then to Bergen-Belsen. Both Julius Philipp and his wife perished there: Julius Philipp, in 1944, and his wife, two weeks before the camp was liberated in 1945.

[126] The CRT used advanced name matching systems and computer programs in conducting its matching analysis. Further, the CRT matched not only the names of persons specifically claimed to have owned a Swiss bank account, but the names of other family members identified by the claimant. A "no match letter" or "no match decision" notified the claimant of the CRT's determination that the name of the relative claimed to have owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts, and the names of account owners made available to the CRT by the Swiss banks or located via other sources, did not match.

The CRT conducted research indicating that in "1901 Julius Philipp founded what eventually became a global commodity trading giant." Julius Philipp (age 23) "had hardly any capital," but the "family had important connections, two of whom helped provide seed capital. Together with a grant from a Jewish-owned facility in Hamburg established to help young men set up their own businesses, this capital sufficed to start the firm, which initially was run from the family home with Julius' sister" as the only employee. The firm thrived and expanded to London in 1909, later surviving the depression.

However, "[s]hortly after the Nazis' takeover in 1933, Hamburg, in a total reversal of its earlier liberalism, became notorious for its virulent and early aryanization activities, well before Berlin anchored them in legislation. This abrupt change from what had been an unusually easy environment must have been a yet greater shock to Hamburg's Jewish population and may have played a part in Julius' decision to leave for the Netherlands as early as 1934. Upon his arrival, he established Julius Philipp NV, which, after a rough start, had become a solid enterprise in the late 1930s." Julius Philipp did not leave Europe, because of his "confidence in Holland's ability to maintain neutrality, a confidence with deadly consequences." Storm troopers arrested the family in March 1943. Almost all of the family members were killed. Two of the Philipp children became part of a prisoner exchange from Bergen-Belsen in January 1945, and reached Switzerland.

The CRT noted that although "Julius Philipp NV had disappeared, the name Philipp returned to Amsterdam in 1950 when Philipp Brothers New York, Inc. opened an office there, which in 1951 became Philipp Brothers (Holland) NV." The company "continued to grow into a trading giant, later known as Phibro, with reported assets of US $1.35 billion, when in 1981, it acquired Salomon Brothers." Phibro subsequently became a wholly owned subsidiary of Citigroup Global Markets Holding, Inc. and later of Occidental Petroleum. In January 2016 Phibro was acquired by Energy Arbitrage Partners (EAP). Today, Phibro is an independent firm headed by Simon Greenshields (CEO).

In its examination of the 1938 Census files, the CRT determined that these records indicated that Julius Philipp had fled in 1936, whereas the claimant (Julius Philipp's daughter) had indicated that her family had fled in 1934. A history of the Philipp Brothers also indicated that the family had moved to Amsterdam in 1934. The CRT concluded that "the fiscal authorities may have put the date of his leaving Germany as 1936," coinciding with Julius Philipp's withdrawal from his firm in April 1936, and so the inconsistency in the dates was not significant.

The 1938 Census obtained by the CRT from archives in Berlin showed that Julius Philipp had an account at a Swiss bank which held securities worth 2,314 Reichsmark.

Based on the fact that the account held securities, the CRT determined that it was most likely a custody account, and awarded it at presumptive value. The CRT noted that the "facts of this case are similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which Jewish residents or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census, and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich." It is "plausible in such situations that the proceeds of the account ultimately were confiscated by the Nazi regime." The CRT further observed that although Julius Philipp, who ultimately perished in Bergen-Belsen, "resided outside the Reich" at the time of the Census report, "Nazi authorities had his address" and he "may have had relatives remaining in Germany and … may therefore have yielded to Nazi pressure to turn over his account to ensure their safety."

iv. In re Accounts of Oskar Silberknopf and Hans Silberknopf (SF 135,512.50)

Dr. Oskar Silberknopf was born in 1877 in Vienna. He lived there until his 1941 deportation to Yugoslavia, where he perished.[128] His co-account owner, Hans Silberknopf, was born in 1890, and also lived in Vienna.[129]

[128] "Oskar Silberknopf was born in 1877. During the war he was in Wien, Austria. Deported with Transport from [not specified] Yugoslavia to …Camp [not specified]. Oskar was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from Austria found in Namentliche Erfassung der oesterreichischen

The claimant (a cousin of the account owners) provided the CRT with a copy of the March 12, 1938 will of Hans Silberknopf. In his will, which was dated as of the Anschluss, Hans Silberknopf indicated that he had decided to commit suicide. He bequeathed the assets of his company to four employees, with instructions for them to keep operating the company as its shareholders, and if that was not possible, to sell the company and divide the proceeds. He listed the company's assets, including its account at a Swiss bank, as well as accounts in other European banks. The account was not reported by the ICEP auditors. No other records evidencing Hans Silberknopf's bank account were located by the CRT.

As to Dr. Oskar Silberknopf, the 1938 Census included a May 5, 1938 letter to the account owner from the bank, indicating that Oskar Silberknopf held three demand deposit accounts at the bank's subsidiary in Amsterdam. The records further showed that Dr. Silberknopf was assessed flight tax in September 1938 and that his Austrian bank assets were frozen in January 1939. By order of the Gestapo dated August 24, 1941, Dr. Oskar Silberknopf was stripped of his Austrian citizenship, and the rest of his assets were confiscated.

The CRT observed that Hans Silberknopf wrote his will "shortly before committing suicide," and that it was directed to his "family and friends, who were to become his heirs, and therefore he would not have had any interest in either adding spurious assets to his estate or exaggerating its size." Given the credibility of this document, the CRT awarded the claimant an account of unknown value at presumptive value. As to Oskar Silberknopf's accounts, the CRT observed that the account owner had been forced to report these accounts in the 1938 Census. Thus, it was plausible that the "proceeds of the accounts ultimately were confiscated by the Nazi regime," especially since the account owner had lived in Vienna until his 1941 deportation. He "could not have repatriated the accounts without losing ultimate control over [their] proceeds." The three demand deposit accounts were awarded at presumptive value, since the values provided in the 1938 Census were lower than their presumptive values.

v. In re Accounts of Simon Sonabend (SF 98,750.00)

Simon Sonabend was born in 1899 in Warsaw. He was a watch importer and wholesaler. He lived with his family in Brussels from 1940 to 1942. On August 9, 1942, the Sonabends fled to Switzerland and arrived in Biel. They stayed with a watch manufacturer, Ernst Schneeburger, who advised the authorities of the family's arrival. Simon Sonabend's two children (the claimants) stayed with a different watch manufacturer, Jacques Wollman. Simon Sonabend was apprehended and taken to the Porrentruy prison, and a few days later the Swiss police deported the Sonabend family to occupied France. They were immediately captured by the Nazis. Simon Sonabend and his wife, Lili, were detained in the Drancy concentration camp and then deported to Auschwitz, where they perished later that month.[130]

[130] Simon Sonabend's plight as a refugee is more fully described elsewhere in this Final Report (see chapter of this Final Report entitled "The Refugee Class Claims Process") as well as in the Plan of Allocation and Distribution of Settlement Proceeds ("Distribution Plan"). Simon Sonabend was interrogated by Swiss police and "despite intervention on the family's behalf by '[t]hree prominent Swiss watch manufacturers, and a member of the Swiss Parliament, who knew Simon Sonabend' and 'tried to prevent the family from being deported by stating that the Sonabends would not be a burden on the Swiss economy,'" the family "was deported by Swiss police who deposited Simon Sonabend, his wife, and two children at the French border in the night without a map." The family was "'immediately captured by Nazi Regime soldiers' and imprisoned in France, and the 'parents were put on a train to Drancy and then transported to Auschwitz where they were executed on August 24, 1942.'" See Distribution Plan, Vol. II, Annex J ("The Refugee Class"), at J-27, citing Sonabend et al. v. Union Bank of Switzerland et al., No. 96-5161, at Par. 11-14, one of four complaints consolidated as part of the class action lawsuits. The Sonabend children survived the war and later brought a lawsuit in Switzerland, which was settled out of court. The settlement was the "'first-of-its- kind,'" as "'Bern has never before voluntarily agreed to make payments to make up for the country's wartime deportations of thousands of Jews who were seeking to flee Nazi troops.'" Distribution Plan, Vol. II, at J-29 (citing Elizabeth Olson, Swiss Apologize To 2 Jews Denied Wartime Refuge, INT'L HERALD TRIBUNE, May 24, 2000).

In the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, Simon Sonabend's date of birth is listed as 1889: "Simon Sonnabend was born in Warszawa, Poland in 1889. During the war he was in France. Deported with Transport 23, Train 901-18 from Drancy, Camp, France to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 24/08/1942. Simon was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from France found in Le Memorial de la deportation des juifs de france, Beate et Serge Klarsfeld, Paris 1978." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=3220541&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015). See also The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=6798538&language=en (last visited Aug.

The ICEP auditors did not find any bank records evidencing Simon Sonabend's account. However, the claimant provided documents demonstrating the existence and amount of the assets his family had deposited in Switzerland. He submitted a statement dated August 16, 1942, which his father Simon Sonabend had given to the Swiss police, detailing the family's flight to Switzerland and his belief that he had enough funds to pay the costs of internment. Specifically, according to the police statement, Mr. Sonabend stated that he had brought $5,000 in bank notes, 65,000 French Francs, jewelry worth approximately SF 3,000, and a check for $7,000.

In addition, the claimant also provided the CRT with an August 22, 1942 report from local police authorities to the District Chief of the Cantonal Police in Porrentruy, "stating that the Claimants' family left a suitcase behind upon deportation and that the suitcase, supposedly containing clothes, was to be handed over to a local schoolteacher. This report bears a notation by the office the Cantonal office stating that the suitcase was locked and its contents unknown. According to the report, Mr. Sonabend stated that he also left a suitcase containing money and foreign currency with Mr. Jacques Wollmann."

The claimant also submitted a February 9, 1963 report from the Bern Cantonal Police, transmitted on February 11, 1963 to the Federal Department of Justice. The report stated that the Federal Department of Justice had requested on February 1, 1963 that the police investigate the fate of the goods that the Sonabends had left in Biel when they were expelled in 1942. The report referred to two suitcases, one given to Mr. Wollmann, and the other to Mr. Schneeburger. According to the report, Mr. Wollmann opened the suitcase on October 11, 1942 and found it to contain $1,400. Mr. Wollman withheld $1,200 to cover a loan owed to him by Mr. Sonabend, and deposited the $200 balance in the Biel branch of the bank, in the name of Sonabend. The report stated that the latter amount was believed to have been seized shortly thereafter by a watch manufacturer, Langendorf Watch company. A second company, Frey & Co., reported on September 2, 1942 that it was seeking to safeguard its customer's interests. It asked that Mr.

11, 2015) ("Simon Sonabend was born in 1899. During the war he was in Porrentruy, Switzerland. This information is based on a List of persecuted persons found in List of Jewish refugees in Switzerland who were returned by the Swiss authorities to the country from which they arrived").

Sonabend's suitcase and other items left by him be released to the company, which would deposit the items with a bank.

The CRT observed that Simon Sonabend had perished in Auschwitz, and the police reports indicated that he had had assets that he was forced to leave behind when he was expelled from Switzerland. The CRT awarded Mr. Sonabend's children the presumptive value of two accounts of unknown type (one based upon the $200 deposited by Mr. Wollmann; the other based upon the account that Frey & Co. stated it would open in Simon Sonabend's name).

vi. In re Account of Hedwig Ullman (SF 260,375.00)

Hedwig Ullman was born in 1872 in Frankfurt, Germany, where she was an art collector. Her husband died in 1912. The Ullmans had two sons. One son moved to Milan in 1929 to work as managing director of a local IG Farben subsidiary. The other son fled to Milan a few years later, in 1935. Hedwig Ullman likewise escaped from Germany and joined her sons in Milan in the mid-1930s. In 1939, the family fled to Melbourne, Australia, where Hedwig Ullman died in 1945.

The ICEP auditors did not report an account belonging to Hedwig Ullman. However, the CRT located the 1938 Census form filed by Hedwig Ullman. It indicated that, among other assets, she owned an account at the Basel branch of a Swiss bank. Specifically, the Census records included a July 15, 1938 statement from the bank to Hedwig Ulllmann, indicating that she owned a custody account containing various securities, including those of the U.S. company RCA. A December 28, 1938 memorandum from the Reich Finance Office in Frankfurt (Finanzamt) to the Berlin office stated that Hedwig Ullmann had emigrated to Milan on May 25, 1938, and discussed the amount of atonement tax that was to be paid.

The CRT awarded the account to the claimants — the children and grandchildren of Hedwig Ullman — at presumptive value, because the value of the securities recorded in the 1938 Census form was lower than presumptive value. The CRT observed that this case was "similar to other cases that have come before the CRT in which Jewish residents and/or nationals of the Reich reported their assets in the 1938 Census, and, subsequently, their accounts are closed unknown to whom or are transferred to banks in the Reich."

2. TAD Accounts

Examples of "TAD" cases are discussed elsewhere in this Report and include In re Account of I. Louis Breslauer; In re Account of Elsa Turmann; and In re Accounts of Aleksander Weiss and Emanuel Weiss.

3. Swiss Refugee Accounts

i. In re Accounts of Mario Calfon (SF 289,087.50)

Mario Calfon was born in 1896 in Florence, Italy. He was in the jewelry and weaving business in Milan. Mario Calfon, his wife and one daughter (the claimant, who filed an Initial Questionnaire but not a formal claim form) escaped to Switzerland in 1943. His two other daughters went into hiding in Italy. While in Switzerland, the jewelry Mario Calfon had brought with him was confiscated by the Swiss authorities. This action was taken pursuant to a March 12, 1943 decree of the Swiss Federal Council providing that assets of refugees who entered the country after August 1, 1942 were to be placed in a Swiss bank and managed by Swiss police authorities. Mario Calfon was forced to work in refugee camps near Lugano, and he and his wife were hospitalized while in Switzerland.

The bank records, which were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were provided to the CRT by the claimant, included a letter from the chief of the Police Division to the management of the refugee camp "Majestic," with a copy to the bank. The letter instructed the camp's managers to order Mario Calfon to sell assets in his custody account to cover the sum of SF 539.17 accrued in hospitalization costs in early 1944. Mario Calfon wrote to the bank requesting that the gold jewelry in his account not be sold. Based on a July 2, 1944 letter he wrote to the Police Division, the bank gave Mr. Calfon a credit of SF 600 to pay his hospital debt. The bank authorized only the amount of the hospital costs, as well as "stamping costs," but absent police authorization would not grant Mario Calfon's request to provide him with the remaining SF 70 credit, although he had sought that amount to buy supplies for his family.

Subsequently, the bank demanded that Mario Calfon sell his jewelry to pay off his debt. Instead, Mr. Calfon was able to reach an agreement on October 3, 1944, whereby another individual acted as his guarantor in the event that the debt was not repaid within one year. On October 4, 1944, the Police Division sent an invoice to Mario Calfon debiting his demand deposit account for his cost of living at the refugee camps (SF 1,289.50), as well as his wife's hospitalization costs (SF 202.20). On October 13, 1944, the Police Division informed Mario Calfon that another SF 50 was debited as a fee for searching for his children. Another SF 100 was blocked to cover additional costs that might arise.

As described by the CRT, Mario Calfon wrote several additional letters between 1945 and 1957, after he had returned to Florence. He repeatedly raised the matter of his deposited jewelry. Further, he objected to the fact that he had been charged for his cost of living at the refugee camps, while not being reimbursed for the work he had performed there. He also noted that the medical expenses he had incurred in Switzerland, for which he was now supposedly indebted, were caused by his forced labor in the refugee camps.

Although the bank informed the Police Division by letter of March 11, 1947 that it had returned Mario Calfon's assets to him and had closed his custody account, the bank records indicated that these assets actually were not returned. Rather, they were used to cover the hospital debt Mario Calfon supposedly owed, despite his express instructions to the bank not to dispose of the gold jewelry.[131] The records showed that the custody account was closed

[131] See also In re Account of Minia Nussenbaum (claimant submitted an ATAG Ernst & Young claim form as well as an Initial Questionnaire although no claim form, and identified herself as the account owner; she was interned in slave labor camps in France and subsequently in a camp in Charmilles, Switzerland; upon her arrival at the camp, her money (2,650 French Francs) was confiscated and deposited by Swiss authorities at the bank. Records from 1998 indicated that the bank responded to Minia Nussenbaum's request to search for her accounts by explaining that her French Francs had been converted to SF 41.05, from which SF 15.20 was deducted for "pocket money", SF 3.45 was deducted for bank fees, the remaining SF 22.50 was transferred to the refugee camp, and so the bank had no further obligations to the owner as of 1944*); In re Account of Fernando Vitale (SF 49,375.00)* (claimant's father, an engineer, fled with his family in 1943 from Italy to Switzerland, where their valuables were confiscated and deposited in a Swiss bank. Although no bank records were reported by the ICEP auditors, the claimant provided the CRT with a December 6, 1943 receipt from the Locarno, Switzerland police department, showing that Fernando Vitale had a Swiss account with a balance of 62,000 Lira. Since sometime before March 11, 1947 and did not show the fate of the jewelry deposited in this account. As to the demand deposit account, the bank records did not indicate when the account was closed.

The CRT awarded Mario Calfon's daughter the presumptive value of the custody and demand deposit accounts, observing that the bank's assessment of the value of the jewelry in the custody account was not reliable. The CRT noted that Mario Calfon "was not provided with an invoice for the alleged costs of living and that the work he performed was not credited towards any of the alleged costs. Significantly, the Account Owner was not consulted prior to the deduction of these costs from his demand deposit account, nor was his consent obtained by the bank before his account was debited." Therefore, Mario Calfon did not have "dominion" over this account. As to the custody account, despite the bank's assertions that the assets in the account had been returned to Mario Calfon, the evidence showed otherwise.

Citing the Bergier Commission's studies, which focused particularly upon the role played by the Swiss Volksbank in handling refugee accounts, the CRT observed that Mario Calfon, as true for other refugees in Switzerland "whose assets were placed in accounts at the Bank by the Swiss authorities generally could not freely dispose over their accounts." A "number of refugee accounts could not be retrieved by account owners" and "complaints of refugees mostly concerned the fact that their deposit assets were not returned."

ii. In re Accounts of Jenny Gans and Max (Moses) Gans (SF 28,712.50)

Jenny Gans was born in 1919, and her husband Max Gans was born in 1917. Max Gans, an antiques dealer, lived with his wife in Amsterdam until they fled to Switzerland in July 1942.

---

there was no evidence that this account was repaid and in light of the fact that "owners of refugee accounts generally could not freely dispose over their accounts," and "a significant number of refugee accounts could not be retrieved by account owners," the account was paid at presumptive value for an account of unknown type). For additional CRT awards involving refugee accounts, see, e.g., In re Accounts of Emma Kuckel-Pipersberg; In re Account of Franco di Alberto Levi; and In re Accounts of Gerson Goldschmidt and Cecile Goldschmidt.

They were detained in Swiss internment camps, where they performed forced labor. Upon their release, they resided as refugees in Geneva.

Since they were not permitted to work in Switzerland, they were dependent upon the financial assistance they received from an acquaintance in New York, who regularly transferred funds to Max and Jenny Gans from the Chase National Bank in New York. To receive these funds, in November 1942, Jenny and Max Gans opened a US dollar denominated account at the Geneva branch of "Bank I." By October 1943, all assets belonging to refugees living in Switzerland were to be managed by and held at a second bank, "Bank II." The Ganses requested that Bank I transfer all financial assistance payments received from New York to their new account at Bank II. In July 1944, Max Gans requested that Bank I open an account at the Bern branch in his and his wife's names.

The bank records, which were not located in the files made available to the CRT by the banks, were obtained by the claimants (Jenny Gans and her son) and were sent to the CRT. With respect to Bank I, the records demonstrated that an individual living on Riverside Drive in New York regularly transferred various dollar amounts to the accounts held by Jenny and Max Gans at Bank I. The records also showed that an account was opened in July 1944 at the Bern branch of Bank I, and that Bank I paid the entire balance of this account to Max Gans on December 14, 1944. With respect to Bank II, the records showed that Bank I had been requested to transfer all sums received for Max Gans to the account at Bank II, in accordance with the orders of the Police in Bern and the Swiss regulations regarding refugee assets.

The CRT determined that the Bern account at Bank I had been closed and the proceeds returned to the owners. As to the account at Bank II, however, "given that refugees in Switzerland whose assets were placed in accounts at Bank II by the Swiss authorities generally could not freely dispose over their accounts; that a number of account owners could not retrieve the value of those accounts following the Second World War; that complaints of refugees mostly concerned the fact that their deposited assets were not returned; that the last-dated bank record provided by the Claimants evidencing the Account Owners' contact with Bank II is dated 14 March 1944;" and based on the presumptions of the CRT Rules, the CRT awarded the demand deposit account at its presumptive value.

4. Other Documentary Evidence of Account

i. In re Account of Kleiderfabrik Josef Schneider (SF 49,375.00)

Josef Schneider lived in Munich, where he owned the coat factory Kleiderfabrik Josef Schneider. Josef Schneider was arrested on March 7, 1933. He died three days later, on March 10, 1933, from injuries sustained when he was severely beaten by the Nazis.

No records evidencing the account were located by the ICEP auditors, and thus the account presumably was among the 2.1 million accounts for which all documentation was destroyed by Swiss banks after the Holocaust. However, the claimant, Josef Schneider's great-nephew, submitted other documents that the CRT determined provided sufficient evidence demonstrating the existence of a Holocaust-era Swiss bank account. The documents consisted of letterhead from Kleiderfabrik Josef Schneider, showing that the entity was a business located at Aberlestrasse 1 in Munich. The letterhead also showed that the company had an account of unknown type at a specific Swiss bank.

The CRT observed that the documents provided by the claimant plausibly demonstrated that the account owner had held a Swiss account. The CRT noted that it "has previously awarded accounts to Claimants when the ICEP Investigation failed to locate an account belonging to their relative (an account not included in the Account History Database, the Account Dossiers, and the Total Accounts Database). The evidence submitted by these Claimants falls into very limited categories. Article 17 of the Rules lists certain categories of evidence that the CRT has used to justify an award when an account is not identified in the ICEP Investigation. These categories include Austrian State Archives Records and other government records, records of the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office, and any other historical and factual material available to the CRT. Examples of facially reliable evidence submitted by Claimants include actual bank documents, documents submitted to an official governmental agency, and official letterhead indicating a connection to a Swiss bank." [132]

Given that Josef Schneider, the owner of the factory that held the Swiss account, was killed in 1933 by the Nazis, the CRT awarded Josef Schneider's grand-nephew the presumptive value of an account of unknown type.

II. DENIALS

A. INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE OF SWISS ACCOUNT

i. In re Account of Ad Adler (AKA Adolphe Adler) and Account of Emil Zeisel and Adolf (or Alfred) Zeisel (or Adler)

Emil Zeisel was born in 1902 in Brünn (Brno), Austria-Hungary (later Czechoslovakia; today Brno, the Czech Republic). According to his cousin, the claimant, Emil Zeisel was a senior officer for the Union Bank in Brno. The claimant further advised the CRT that between Autumn 1938 and March 1939, Emil Zeisel transferred two small cases to one of the named defendant banks, by way of the Union Bank in Brno. The claimant stated that he possessed [132] See also In re Account of Selly Haase (Certified Award upon Request for Reconsideration) (award of SF 650,250.00 based upon claimant's presentation of "a copy of restitution claim against the German Reich, dated 8 November 1955, containing an extract of an affidavit by the Account Owner, dated 24 October 1951. Because this document (1) indicates that it was submitted to the German government by the Account Owner's widow approximately ten years after the end of the Second World War and (2) contains detailed indicia of an account in a claim submitted by the Account Owner himself to the German government approximately six years after the War," the CRT concluded that this was "facially reliable evidence" of an account); In re Account of Eugen Forgacs (SF 1,260,000.00) (although the ICEP auditors did not report an account, the claimant provided CRT with a copy of a December 29, 1938 letter from the bank to her father, Eugen Forgacs of Budapest, indicating the type and value of securities held in his custody account between July 24, 1937 and January 31, 1938); In re Account of Samu Spiegel (SF 49,375.00) (no account reported by ICEP auditors; however, claimant provided a copy of a certificate of deposit and a September 26, 1939 letter from a Swiss bank indicating a deposit of Pound Sterling made on behalf of the claimant's uncle); In re Account of Dr. Leopold Balint (Certified Award Upon Request for Reconsideration) (SF 377,062.50) (after receiving a "No Match Letter," claimant provided additional documentation to the CRT, including a December 26, 1955 estate asset report regarding the estate of Dr. Lipot Balint, which was submitted to the municipality of Mol, Yugoslavia [today Serbia]. The report included a passbook for a bank account at an unidentified Swiss bank. The CRT noted that the evidence of the account was especially reliable given that it was submitted in connection with estate proceedings in a Communist nation).

"what he believes to be a key to a safe deposit box at Bank II [i.e. one of the two defendant banks] with the inscriptions #63 on the grip and #321228 on the shaft."

The claimant stated that another cousin, Adolf (Alfred) Zeisel (Adler), born on 1874 in Brno, owned the company Firma Bauunternehmen Zeisel & Pokora in Brno, which was aryanized in 1939. Adolf Zeisel was deported to Auschwitz, where he perished. According to the claimant, Adolf Zeisel owned a Swiss bank account.

The CRT located an account owned by an Ad (Adolphe) Adler in the Account History Database (AHD), although the account was located not at "Bank II" (the bank named by the claimant) but at a second Swiss bank, "Bank I." However, the CRT determined that the account owner was not the same individual as the claimant's relative. While the claimant's relative lived in Austria-Hungary, the actual account owner lived in a different country not specified by the claimant.[133] Accordingly, the claimant was issued an "identity denial" for this account, meaning that the account owner and the claimant's relative might have had the same or similar name, but were not the same person.

With respect to the account that the claimant believed to have existed at Bank II, the CRT observed that the ICEP auditors had not reported an account owned by any of the individuals named by the claimant. The CRT concluded that the information the claimant had provided did not demonstrate that a Holocaust-era bank account had existed:

> Without addressing the authenticity of the information provided by the Claimant, the CRT has determined that the evidence submitted by the Claimant is insufficient to justify an award. According to Article 17 of the Rules, the CRT shall use the records and files available from the Account History Database, the Account Dossiers, and the Total Accounts Database, the information submitted by the Claimants, and to the extent that the CRT deems relevant, other sources of information to determine whether an award is justified. While the CRT has previously awarded accounts to Claimants when the ICEP Investigation failed to [133] In identity denials such as this one (of which a total of 6,046 were issued), identifying information contained in the bank files about the account owner was not publicly disclosed for two reasons. First, disclosure of such information was not permitted under the terms of the agreements authorizing the CRT to operate in Switzerland and to have access to bank files. Second, in the event that the account was later claimed by another individual, to confirm whether the account owner was that claimant's relative, the CRT needed to be able to review data in the new claim against information in the bank files that had not been publicly disclosed.

> locate an account belonging to their relative (an account not included in the Account History Database, the Account Dossiers, and the Total Accounts Database), the evidence submitted by these Claimants falls into very limited categories. Article 17 of the Rules lists certain categories of evidence that the CRT has used to justify an award when an account is not identified in the ICEP Investigation. These categories include Austrian State Archive Records and other government records, records of the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office, and any other historical and factual material available to the CRT. Examples of facially reliable evidence submitted by Claimants include actual bank documents, documents submitted to an official governmental agency, and official letterhead indicating a connection to a Swiss bank. While the CRT bears in mind the difficulties of proving the existence of an account after the destruction of the Second World War, it has determined in this case, because the information provided by the Claimant does not fall into any of the categories discussed above, nor does it indicate an official connection to Bank II or reference to the existence of an account open between 1933 and 1945, it is insufficient to support the existence of a bank account.

Thus, the CRT was unable to make an award to the claimant.[134]

ii. In re Account of Kux, Bloch & Co. (SF 162,500); Denial of Claim for Claimed Account Owner: Kux, Bloch & Co.

The part-owner of the bank Kux, Bloch & Co., was born in 1883 in Vienna. After the Anschluss, he lost his share in the business as well as real estate and art. He fled to London in 1939, and died there in 1968. The claimants provided a variety of documents demonstrating that [134] For additional examples of "insufficient evidence" denials, see, e.g., In re Account of Osias Rupp (the claimant, who initially filed her claim through the HCPO, provided the HCPO with a copy of a safe deposit box key containing the notation "Zurich." The HCPO contacted the manufacturer of the key, which forwarded this information to three major banks in Zurich. The banks found no evidence of an account belonging to Osias Rupp. For the same reasons set forth in the Adler decision, supra, the CRT determined that the evidence provided by the claimant was insufficient upon which to base an award); Certified Denial to Claimant [TK][REDACTED TO PRESERVE CLAIMANT CONFIDENTIALITY](claimant stated that he was the account owner and submitted copies of certificates pertaining to 300 shares issued in Zurich on December 3, 1932, each with a nominal value of SF 40, of the Swiss company Cementia Holding A.-G. Zurich. The CRT observed, first, that there was no evidence that the shares were deposited in a Swiss bank during the Holocaust era; second, since the claimant stated that he had the certificates in his possession, he himself had retained dominion over these assets); In re Accounts of Willy Glaser (travelers checks and letters of credit which were remitted to payment at Lausanne branches of the defendant banks, but which did not refer to accounts at Swiss banks or contain the name of the alleged account owner, were insufficient to support the existence of a bank account).

---

the part-owner was their father, and further demonstrating that he was a partner in the bank Kux, Bloch & Co., including his 1938 Census form.

The bank records indicated that the bank owned a custody account with a recorded balance of SF 500 as of September 27, 1938, when the account was closed and its assets transferred to a bank in Zurich for disposition by the Länderbank Wien. The CRT observed that the Länderbank Wien "cooperated closely with Nazi authorities to expropriate Jewish-owned assets." The part-owner had been forced to flee Austria. Because the recorded value was lower than presumptive value, the CRT awarded his children the presumptive value of a custody account.

However, a second claim by a different claimant was filed to this same Kux, Bloch & Co. published account. After extensive analysis of documents provided by the additional claimant, as well as independent research, the CRT denied the second claim.

The claimant in the second claim (Claimed Account Owner: Kux, Bloch & Co.) stated that his grandfather's cousin was born in 1886 in Paris, and that he was a "medic" involved with the sale of medical equipment and insurance. In 1931, according to the claimant, his grandfather's cousin moved to Vienna after he was invited by other owners to become a "founder," "investor" and "co-owner" of the bank Kux, Bloch & Co. The claimant stated that the bank "'was held both in Austria and Switzerland;'" that he was providing the CRT with the bank's Vienna street address, which was "'not openly published' anywhere;" and that after the Anschluss, the bank's financial activity "'moved completely from Austria to Switzerland.'" The claimant provided the CRT with copies of the entry for the bank in the Vienna corporate registry. He stated that his grandfather's cousin was ordered to remain in Switzerland, and later was returned to France. He eventually was deported to Drancy and then to Auschwitz, where he perished.

As the CRT explained, the claim by the second claimant was not credible for a variety of reasons:

- The Vienna corporate registry entry for the bank Kux, Bloch & Co. tracked the ownership of the bank beginning in 1922, when two individuals became the authorized signers for the bank. Over the years, the registry recorded a variety of new authorized signatories on behalf of the bank, and personally liable partners. In December 1938, the bank was placed under provisional administration; it was liquidated in January 1939; and dissolved in November 1939. Nowhere in any of these entries did the name of the claimant's relative appear, although the claimant stated that he held a significant role in the bank as a founder, investor and co-owner.

- The CRT analyzed a study of the bank Kux, Bloch & Co by the Austrian Historical Commission, which was based upon the Commission's archival research. The study contained no reference to the claimant's relative. Moreover, the study indicated that the bank was founded in 1922 (as confirmed by the fact that the first entry in the corporate registry provided by the claimant was dated 1922). The founding of the bank in 1922 contradicted the claimant's statement that his relative, who he stated joined the bank nine years later in 1931, was a "founder" of the bank.

- The claimant provided a copy of a letter dated March 28, 1938, which the claimant stated had been written by an individual who appeared in the corporate registry as an owner of the bank. The CRT determined that this letter was "not a reliable piece of evidence," because "the quality of the German language in which the letter is written is extremely poor; the letter is barely comprehensible. In contrast, the CRT received claims from the legitimate heirs of the part-owner of the bank, to whom the CRT awarded the account addressed in this decision. Those claimants included numerous samples of letters written by the part-owner of the bank, who, those claimants indicated, was a native of Vienna, Austria. All of those letters are written in excellent, fluent German. There is a vast difference in the quality of the language used in the letter submitted by the Claimant, versus the letters submitted by the claimants who are the legitimate heirs of [the part-owner of the bank]." Moreover, the CRT pointed out that in the letter submitted by the claimant, the name of the part-owner had been typed, using one spelling of his first name, yet the signature directly underneath used a different spelling. Further, all of the documents submitted by the heirs to the part-owner used one spelling.

- The claimant submitted a copy of a Kux, Bloch & Co. balance sheet, which contained two garbled headings that were evidently mistranslations into German of English financial terms, and did not use the proper German terms.

- The claimant's statement that the address he had provided for the bank had not been "'specified in any open official documents'" was contradicted by the Austrian Historians' Commission report, a publicly available document, which provided the same address "in the very first sentence of the entry regarding" Kux, Bloch & Co.

- Although the claimant stated that the bank "'moved completely from Austria to Switzerland'" after the Anschluss, neither the archival records, nor the corporate registry, nor the Austrian Historians' Commission report, made any mention of a move to Switzerland.

The claim accordingly was denied. The CRT left undisturbed its original determination awarding the Kux, Bloch & Co. account to the first group of claimants, whom the CRT had confirmed were the legitimate heirs of the part-owner of the bank.

B. DISPOSITION DENIALS (DETERMINATION THAT THE ACCOUNT OWNER RECEIVED THE PROCEEDS)

i. In re Accounts of August Löw Beer, Walter Löw Beer, Alice Bettina Löw Beer, Gusti Löw Beer, Georg Löw Beer, Herbert Löw Beer, Hugo Keller, Marie Keller, Leontine Pick, Camilla Silberstern, Royaltex and Supertex

August and Walter Löw Beer, a third brother, and Marie Keller, née Löw Beer, were siblings who were born in Brno, Czechoslovakia.

Walter Löw Beer was born in 1881. He was married to Alice Bettina Löw Beer, and they lived mainly in Brno with their three children. In 1939, they fled Brno and stayed briefly in Switzerland before arriving in Paris, which they fled after the Nazi invasion of France in 1940. They settled in England, where they died, respectively, in 1954 and 1991.

August Löw Beer was born in 1883. He was married to Alice Löw Beer. He lived with his wife and their two children in Brno, where he served as Austrian Consul General. They fled in 1938 and lived in Switzerland for several months in 1939. They then lived in Paris until the Nazi invasion, whereupon they fled for London, and then moved to Scotland. August Löw Beer died in Scotland in 1942, and his wife died in London in 1979.

The third brother lived in Brno with his wife Gusti and his three children. He died in Brno before 1933. Gusti Löw Beer fled to France, and in 1941 to Brazil, where she remained until the end of the War. She moved to New York after the War, and died in North Carolina in 1975.

Marie Keller lived in Brno with her husband, the banker Dr. Hugo Keller, and their son. Marie Keller and her son were killed in concentration camps. Hugo Keller fled to France, where he died in 1966.

The Löw Beer family owned the textile company Aaron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne, with factories in Czechoslovakia and divisions throughout Europe, including the Swiss division Supertex and a division named Royaltex in the Netherlands, France and Vienna.

View of the factory premises of Moses Löw-Beer in Svitavka, Czechoslovakia (around 1930). http://www.low-beerovy-vily.cz/album/firma-moses-low-beer-historicke-%20dokumenty-a-fotografie/a01-tovarni-areal-jpg/.

The CRT analyzed numerous records in connection with the claims, which were filed by the children and grandchildren of the Löw Beer siblings. In addition to examining bank records (including records obtained through the "voluntary assistance" process), the CRT also studied documents the HCPO had obtained from archives in the Czech Republic including the City Archive of Brno, the Moravsky Zemsky Archive in Brno, and the Czech National Archive. The latter contained files created by the Nazi authorities in Czechoslovakia, including "correspondence and reports by the Devisenschutz Sonderkommando (foreign exchange security special unit) and the Gestapo; a report on the aryanization of Aaron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne and its financial condition during the first half of 1940 prepared upon the order of the Oberlandrat (local authority) in Brno; and an application to appoint a non-Jewish trustee of Aaron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne pursuant to an ordinance on Jewish wealth in the Reich Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia."

The CRT concluded that "members of the Löw Beer family were able to take measures to protect the family's assets that were located outside of Nazi-controlled territory." The CRT observed that "a non-Jewish trustee was appointed to manage Aaron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne" but that "foreign corporations owned by the firm" in Amsterdam, Paris and Zurich were "'uncontrollable' (uncontrollierbar), and that most of the firm's foreign assets had been 'cashed out (einkassiert) to its owners after they fled Czechoslovakia.'" In addition, the "audit report prepared in 1940 for the Brno Oberlandrat" stated that after the Nazi "occupation of Holland and the resumption of postal traffic, it became apparent that [fictitious sales by August Löw Beer to a London firm] were nothing other than Jewish machinations …. We believe that things in the case of Zurich and Paris are no different, although demands were made from there, no settlement by post could be managed, because the Jew August Löw Beer hung around in Zurich and Paris after his flight to the West."

The CRT concluded that the Löw Beer siblings and the companies they owned held numerous accounts at four different Swiss banks. The evidence demonstrated that the owners had received the proceeds of all of these accounts.

Thus, at "Bank 1," the siblings held more than 40 different accounts under approximately 16 different account numbers. Several of these were constituted as custody accounts under "asset management" (Vermögensverwaltung) account relationships. "Under the terms of these asset management relationships, Bank 1 officials held broad authority to transact business on the accounts, including the power to buy and sell securities, gold, and foreign currency on behalf of the account owners."

In addition, "several of the Account Owners' accounts in Zurich included special dossiers, in which the assets were actually held on deposit at Bank 1 branches in London and New York, and at the bank Brown Brothers Harriman & Co. in New York" ("Brown Brothers"). These "dossiers were established under special conditions," with the Zurich branch remaining owner of record, and the individual Account Owners holding power of attorney. Each special dossier "contained a sealed envelope which was to be opened only under certain conditions: either upon receipt by the special dossier's custodian" (i.e., the New York or London branch of the bank, or Brown Brothers) of a letter from the Zurich branch bearing a "special code word," or in the event that the Swiss frontier was breached by military troops of any nation, serious rioting in Switzerland, or the like. "The sealed envelopes contained instructions to the respective custodian banks to withdraw all assets from the special dossiers and to open accounts at the custodian banks in the names of the respective power of attorney holder of the assets in the dossiers" — i.e., the Löw Beer siblings or their companies — "and to deposit all the assets from the special dossiers into those new accounts."

The CRT determined from the bank records and other documents that August and/or Walter Löw Beer activated a number of the special dossiers between June and September 1940, thereupon triggering the transfer of these accounts to the New York branch of the bank. Other accounts were closed during the same period. "Given the correspondence between the dates of activation of the special dossiers, the dates of transfer of other accounts to New York, and the dates of closure of other accounts, and the fact that Bank 1's records show that the special dossiers were activated upon the instructions of August and/or Walter Löw Beer, the CRT concludes that the transfer or closure of the other accounts in the same period also occurred upon the instructions of" the brothers.

For the same reason, the CRT concluded that the other accounts owned by the two brothers or their spouses that were closed before September 1940 likewise were closed properly. The CRT observed that in addition to the evidence that the brothers had actively managed specific accounts, and had kept the bank informed of their addresses, Walter Löw Beer also had maintained an active banking relationship with Bank 1. As late as January 1944, while he was living in London, he gave the bank instructions about certain of his accounts via the London firm S. Japhet & Co. "It is unlikely that Walter Löw Beer would have continued to entrust his assets to Bank 1 in January 1944 if any of the other accounts that he owned or co-owned at Bank 1 had been closed improperly before that date."

As to other accounts owned by August Löw Beer at Bank 1, the CRT observed that the bank was informed of his death, after which certain of these accounts were transferred to a former secretary at the Supertex affiliate of Aaron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne, a personal and professional associate of the family. Other accounts were transferred to the United Kingdom, where Walter Löw Beer and his wife were living.

In addition, the CRT determined that accounts owned by Hugo Keller at Bank 1 likewise were closed properly. These accounts had remained open until 1966, the same year that Hugo Keller died. "Given the evidence that these accounts remained open after the Second World War and that Hugo Keller was in contact with Bank 1 and transacted business on at least one of these accounts after [the War]," the CRT concluded that Hugo Keller or his heirs had closed the accounts themselves.

With respect to accounts owned by Gusti Löw Beer, the CRT noted that a new custody account had been created after the account owner, who by then had fled to Brazil, had applied to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to change the record ownership of the assets from the name of Bank 1 Zurich to her own name. Gusti Löw Beer wrote to the bank on December 1, 1945, advising that she was now residing in New York. After that, the assets were transferred to a custody account in her name, with power of attorney given to her daughter. Accordingly, her accounts were closed properly.

As to an account over which Gusti, Walter and August Löw Beer together held power of attorney, the CRT observed that on February 19, 1940, the assets in the account were transferred to a joint account at the bank in the names of the three individuals. In addition, "just one day after the opening of this account, on 20 February 1940, August Löw Beer signed an affidavit in Zurich regarding another account." Given this evidence, as well as the fact that Gusti, Walter and August Löw Beer "actively managed their other accounts at Bank 1 after this date," the CRT determined that they had access to and managed this account as well.

With respect to a custody account owned by Gusti Löw Beer at the Lausanne branch of Bank 1, the CRT noted that the account was closed on February 5, 1942 by transfer to a bank in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, where Gusti Löw Beer was living at the time, and therefore she had obtained the proceeds.

As to an account owned by August and Walter Löw Beer, the bank records showed that the account was paid after the War to the administrators of the estate of August Löw Beer, and to an account owned by Walter Löw Beer.

With respect to accounts owned by Georg Löw Beer, the accounts were frozen in the 1941 Freeze, at a time when Georg Löw Beer was living in Rio de Janeiro. "Given the evidence that Georg Löw Beer maintained contact with Bank 1 following his arrival in Rio de Janeiro, and given the evidence that he received the proceeds of his share of another account at Bank 1 two months after the closure of" a different account, the CRT determined that these accounts had been actively managed, and that the owner had received their proceeds.

As to accounts owned by Walter and Alice Bettina Löw Beer at Bank 1, the CRT observed that the owners and/or their heirs had actively managed other accounts held at the same bank. The CRT concluded that these accounts likewise had been so managed, and the account owners had obtained their proceeds.

In addition to their holdings at "Bank 1," the Löw Beer siblings also owned accounts at three other Swiss banks.

As to the account held at Bank 2, it was closed on September 29, 1938, "one day before the Nazi annexation of the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia under the Munich Agreement and six months before the annexation of the Czech territories of Bohemia and Moravia," where the account owners lived. Thus, the CRT concluded that the account owners had closed the accounts themselves.[135]

With respect to assets held at Bank 3, the CRT observed that August and Walter Löw Beer had deposited funds at the bank's Geneva branch in January 1940. As of November 12, 1946, "there was an account at Bank 3, possibly in the name of Royaltex, which was to be transferred to Bank 2; and Royaltex, which was reportedly owned by Walter Löw Beer, held two accounts at Bank 3 which were released from the 1945 Freeze pursuant to an application" on November 11, 1948. "Given that August and Walter Löw Beer deposited funds at the same Bank 3 branch where assets were held in the name of Royaltex, which were actively managed after the Second World War, and that Walter Löw Beer remained in contact with Bank 3 after reaching safety in England," the CRT concluded that "these accounts were closed properly."

[135] In addition, one of the claimants had submitted a memorandum to the CRT "indicating that there were 'no accounts' remaining at Bank 2 as of 12 November 1946."

Finally, as to Bank 4, the CRT observed that a variety of documents "together show securities and cash held at Bank 4 by members of the Löw Beer family. However, these records show that the securities were transferred to Brown Brothers Harriman & Co. in New York at the end of March or the beginning of April 1939." Additionally, two demand deposit accounts may have existed in the bank; if so, they were held in the name of affiliates of Aron & Jacob Löw Beer's Söhne. However, "the firm's Nazi-appointed administrator in Czechoslovakia was unable to exercise control over the firm's foreign affiliates … and most of the firm's foreign assets were believed to have been cashed out by the Löw Beers." Given these facts, as well as the siblings' active management of all of their other Swiss accounts, "the CRT determine[d] that they also received the proceeds of the two demand deposit accounts at Bank 4."

Accordingly, no award was made for these accounts, all of which had been actively managed and properly returned to the rightful owners or their heirs.

ii. In re Account of Lucian Brunner

Lucian Brunner was an Austrian bank founded by the claimants' paternal grandfather, Lucian Brunner, who was born in 1850 in Hohenems, Vorarlberg, Austria. Lucian Brunner, who had five children, died in Vienna in 1914. His son, an engineer, took over the bank's ownership.

Lucian and Malwine Brunner, approximately 1890. http://www.hohenemsgenealogie.at/en/genealogy/showmedia.php?mediaID=39&medialinkID=42.

The CRT's independent research, including analysis of the work of the Austrian Historical Commission, indicated that the bank had been founded in 1886 and operated chiefly in the field of asset management. Lucian Brunner's son emigrated to France in 1937. The bank was liquidated by the Austrian authorities after the Anschluss; its banking license was withdrawn; and it was struck from the corporate register on April 15, 1940.

The Austrian Historical Commission reported that Austrian archival records "indicate that an unnamed London bank refused to transfer a relatively small amount of British pound-denominated assets belonging to Lucian Brunner to the Nazi financial authorities. The Austrian archives … indicate that British banks refused to recognize the provisional, Nazi-backed management of formerly Jewish-owned companies such as Lucian Brunner, and refused to transfer requested assets belonging to such companies to the Nazi authorities."

The CRT also investigated the German archives (specifically, the Brandenburg Main Regional Archive) and confirmed the conclusion that had been reached by the Austrian Historical Commission: the British branch of the Swiss bank in which the Lucian Brunner accounts were held had refused to honor the Nazis' demand to turn over the assets. Thus, as described by the CRT, the archives contain "a list of foreign currency denominated securities … filed by Lucian Brunner in response to the decree under which holders of such securities were obligated to offer them for sale" to the Reichsbank. The form, dated April 11, 1939, indicated that Lucian Brunner owned a custody account at the London branch of a Swiss bank, as well as other custody accounts at different banks in New York and Vienna.

As the CRT observed, the Brandenburg archival record "contains a handwritten notation from a representative of the Reichsbank relating solely to the securities held by Lucian Brunner at the London branch of the Bank and at the New York bank. The notation reads: 'The Lucian Brunner company is under provisional administration. The banks at which these securities are held have refused to honor sell-orders relating to the accounts belonging to these types of companies. Request dropped.'" The CRT further noted that a "second notation relating to the securities held by Lucian Brunner at the London branch of the Bank and at the New York bank indicates that those banks had thus far refused the Reichsbank's request."

The CRT also located the 1938 Census relating to members of the Lucian Brunner family. These records "make no mention of assets held in a Swiss bank account."

Based on the archival records, as well as the conclusions of the Austrian Historical Commission concerning the Swiss accounts owned by the Lucian Brunner bank, which demonstrated that the London branch of the Swiss bank refused the request to transfer the account owner's assets to the Reichsbank, and which further demonstrated that the Reichsbank thereafter dropped its request for the transfer, the CRT concluded that the owner of the Lucian Brunner bank "retained dominion over the claimed account and received the proceeds himself."

iii. In re Account of Sigmund Samuel Feist and Toni Feist

Dr. Sigmund Feist was born in 1865 in Mainz, Germany. His wife Antonie (Toni) was born in 1880, in Schmieheim, Germany. The claimant, their grandchild, stated that Dr. Feist was a well-known German linguist. According to the claimant, beginning in 1906, Dr. Feist could not obtain a position as a university professor due to anti-Semitism. The family moved to Berlin, where Dr. Feist became a director of an orphanage for Jewish children, which he ran with his wife until his retirement in 1935. While living in Berlin, Dr. Feist published a Gothic German dictionary. In 1939, the family fled to Copenhagen, where Dr. Feist died in 1943. Toni Feist fled to Sweden and then in 1945 (via the United Kingdom) to the United States. She died in New York in 1952.

Elisabeth, Toni, and Sigmund Feist, late 1920s. http://www.bard.edu/archives/voices/Felix/felix.htm.Photo courtesy of the Bard College Archives and Special Collections.

The bank records, including documents provided by the claimant, demonstrated that the Feists were able to access their Swiss accounts. A July 10, 1941 letter from the Dresdner Bank to Dr. Feist or Frau Feist at an address in Copenhagen confirmed that SF 207.08 was being transferred to their account at a bank in Zurich. An August 6, 1941 letter to Dr. Feist, residing at the same Copenhagen address, referred to the opening of a joint demand deposit account in the names of Dr. Feist and his wife. As described by the CRT, "[t]his correspondence clearly shows that the Account Owners were able to access their assets in Germany, transfer them to their account at the Bank, and maintain contact with the Bank about their account while they were in Copenhagen."

In addition, the account was closed on February 27, 1946, at a time when Toni Feist already had left Europe and was living in the United States. Thus, "[g]iven that the Account Owners maintained contact with the Bank while in Copenhagen, that they were able to transfer money from the Dresdner Bank in Berlin to their account at the Bank in July 1941, [and] that the account at the Bank was closed after the War and while Account Owner T. Feist resided in the United States," the CRT concluded that Toni Feist "had access to the account and was able to receive the proceeds herself."[136]

iv. In re Account of Felix Israel

Felix Israel was born in 1881 in Poland. He lived in Berlin until 1934, when he fled to Spain. He lived in Barcelona, where he sold buttons and owned a business, Casa Feliz. He emigrated to Havana, Cuba in January 1941. His daughter, the claimant, lived in Zurich with her Swiss mother (Felix Israel's second wife) from 1936 until 1941, and then joined her father in Havana. They emigrated to New York on June 13, 1941. According to the claimant, Felix Israel held accounts at a bank in Zurich, and opened an account at the bank's New York branch while living in Barcelona.

The claimant advised the CRT that she had identified her father's name on a list published in 1997 by the World Jewish Congress. "This list contained names of owners of Swiss bank accounts that had been held in New York branches of Swiss banks and that had been frozen on 14 June 1941 pursuant to … the Trading With the Enemy Act (the '1941 Freeze'). The Claimant stated that this list provided the following information: 'Israel, Felix, Address Havana, Cuba, Nationality Unknown, Amount $3,408.43.'" Felix Israel moved to California in December 1941, where he became a chicken farmer, and he died on September 21, 1946.

The bank records (which were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were obtained by the claimant and forwarded to the CRT) indicated that Felix Israel of Barcelona owned an account of unknown type, which was closed on March 18, 1948. Further, the claimant provided the CRT with a September 22, 1997 letter from the bank, which indicated that the account was [136] See also In re Accounts of Fritz Levy (the account owner's demand deposit account was frozen in the 1945 Freeze; the bank records indicated that the bank "communicated with the Account Owner regarding this account on 24 December 1947, and that the account was subsequently closed on 10 January 1948…The Account Owner informed the Bank of his move to New York, "which occurred between 1947 and 1950." Accordingly, "the Account Owner had access to the demand deposit account once he arrived in New York and after it was released from the 1945 Freeze," and thus "he closed this account and received the proceeds himself") (see infra for discussion of additional accounts owned by Fritz Levy, closed while he was living in Luxembourg but prior to the Nazi invasion of that country).

frozen on June 14, 1941. As described by the CRT, the 1997 letter advised that "because the Account Owner resided in the United States, government regulations at the time would have allowed him to make periodic withdrawals from his account for living expenses. The letter also stated that the Bank concluded that the Account Owner may have utilized this provision of the law to withdraw the assets which had been deposited with the Bank, resulting in the closing of the account."

In its analysis of the claim, the CRT confirmed the bank's statement that the account owner would have been permitted to make periodic withdrawals from the account while living in the United States. "Moreover, because the Account Owner immigrated to the United States before the United States entered the War, somewhat more liberal rules applied. As Special Master Helen B. Junz noted in a paper for the United States Presidential Advisory Commission, > Having chosen the broad prohibition route in pre-war days, it [Federal Funds Control] came to rely on a far-flung licensing system to meet its objectives during the period of the war. In the process, the accounts of bona fide refugees who had been residing and were domiciled in the United States since June 17, 1940 had been freed with the issuance of General License 42 (GL 42) on June 14, 1941. Recognizing that this rationed out many refugees who had difficulties in obtaining immigration visas, Treasury liberalized the provisions of GL 42 by issuing a new license, General License 42A (GL 42A), which dropped the domicile requirement. On February 23, 1942 there was a further easing of controls for bona fide immigrants and refugees, as GL 42 was amended to include all who had arrived in the United States as of that date and to eliminate the domicile requirement.

The CRT further observed that "after the signing of the Washington Agreement on 25 May 1946, all Swiss assets deposited in the United States were unfrozen, contingent upon certification of non-enemy interest by Swiss authorities, and that this was more than three months prior to the Account Owner's death. Given these circumstances, the CRT concludes that the Account Owner received the proceeds of the claimed account."

v. In re Account of Imre Mayer and Berta Mayer

Imre Mayer was born in 1895 in Hungary. He was married to Berta Mayer in the late 1930s. According to the claimant, their nephew, they lived in Budapest, where Imre Mayer was a merchant and distributor of Swiss watches. The Mayers had one son, born in 1922, who died in the Holocaust. The Mayers survived in hiding and left Hungary for Biel (Bienne), Switzerland in 1946. They moved to the United States in 1956. Berta Mayer died in the United States in the mid-1970s, and Imre Mayer died in Los Angeles in 1980.

The bank records, which the HCPO obtained on behalf of the claimant and forwarded to the CRT, indicated that Imre Mayer and Berta Mayer received the account proceeds after the War. As described by the CRT, "in 1950 … the Bank was in communication with Account Owner Imre Mayer." In a letter dated October 27, 1950 addressed to Imre Meyer in Bienne, the bank acknowledged the existence of his account. The letter indicated that the Meyers owned a joint account that was frozen pursuant to the United States' Trading with the Enemy Act (1941 Freeze). The letter stated that the bank was willing to help Imre Mayer close the account if it received a response prior to November 5, 1950.

The bank records indicated that the account was closed on October 9, 1957, "at which time, according to information provided by the Claimant, the Account Owners were still alive and living in the United States, where the account was located."

Based on this information, the CRT determined that the account owners "were able to access this account and that they received the proceeds of the account themselves."

vi. In re Account of Alexander Politzer

Alexander Policzer (Politzer) was born in 1895 in Hungary. In addition to Hungary, he also lived in Vienna, Milan, and Buenos Aires, as well as Lugano, Switzerland (1945). According to the claimant, the nephew of Alexander Policzer, his uncle owned a textile factory in Vienna and conducted business with a company in Milan.

The bank records, as supplemented by documents obtained through the "voluntary assistance" process, indicated that the account owner was in communication with the bank throughout the 1940s, and after the War. As described by the CRT, "the Bank sent account statements to the Account Owner to Argentina in 1947, and … the Account Owner confirmed the statements." Further, the records indicated that Alexander Policzer visited the bank's branch in Zurich on November 21, 1949, at which time he informed the bank of the death of the power of attorney holder (Miklos Pontos) and signed a new power of attorney form for the benefit of Sofia M. de Politzer. "Therefore, the CRT concludes that the Account Owner had free access to his account and initiated activity on it after 1945."

vii. In re Account of Julius Schwartz

Julius Schwartz was born in Lessen bei Grudenz, Germany. He lived with his wife in Berlin, where he was a physician. With one of their children, the Schwartzes fled Germany for Shanghai in January 1939, while the other child was sent to England. Julius Schwartz' wife died in Shanghai in 1944. Julius Schwartz left Shanghai for Montreal in 1948, where he died in 1950.

The bank records were not reported by the ICEP auditors but were obtained by the claimants, the children of Julius Schwartz, and forwarded to the CRT. The records, consisting of two letters from the bank (respectively dated November 11, 1939 and January 25, 1940) indicated that Julius Schwartz had written to the bank on October 19, 1939, "requesting the Bank to forward the equivalent of his account with the Bank to the American Express Cy., Shanghai. The letter further stated that the account held a balance of [SF] 1,414.00 …, of which 1,400.00 had been remitted through the American Express Cy., Zurich, to the American Express Cy. in Shanghai, that the equivalent amount in Shanghai Dollars was to be paid to the Account Owner, and that the Account Owner would be debited with the cost." Based upon these documents indicating that the funds were sent to the owner in Shanghai, the CRT concluded that Julius Schwartz received the proceeds of his account.

C. DISPOSITION DENIALS BASED ON THE PRE-OCCUPATION / PRE-NAZI ALLIANCE CLOSING DATE OF THE ACCOUNT

1. Germany: January 30, 1933[137]

i. In re Accounts of Max Lindner

Max Lindner was born and lived in Germany. He was a manufacturer and owner of a business that produced and sold mustard and vinegar throughout Bavaria. He died of a heart attack in Stuttgart in 1940, and his widow perished in Auschwitz in 1944. Max Lindner owned two Swiss bank accounts, a custody account and a demand deposit account. The custody account, which was opened on November 30, 1934 and closed on December 16, 1938, was awarded at presumptive value. However, the demand deposit account, which was closed on December 20, 1932, was not awarded because it was closed before the Relevant Period (1933-1945). Moreover, "the demand deposit account was closed before the Nazi party came to power in Germany in 1933" and so the account owner "was able to access and close the account."

2. Italy: October 25, 1936

i. In re Account of Emilio Oblath and Maria Oblath

The account owners lived in Trieste, Italy from 1920 until 1938, where Emilio Oblath was a businessman and the one-time Italian consul to Finland. After he died in 1941, his widow, Maria Oblath, fled with her children from Italy to Switzerland. As the CRT observed, the bank's "records indicate that the proceeds of the accounts owned by Emilio Oblath and Maria Oblath were transferred to an account numbered 31023, which was held by a different, unrelated account owner, and were closed on 31 May 1935. The CRT notes that the accounts numbered 37093 [i.e. other accounts owned by the Oblaths] were closed before the conclusion of Italy's formal alliance with Nazi Germany on 25 October 1936. Accordingly, the CRT concludes that [137] See also CRT Rules, Appendix C (presumption that confiscation of property began in Germany upon Hitler's accession in January 1933).

the Account Owners were able to access and control their accounts, and that they received the proceeds of those accounts themselves."

3. Austria: March 12, 1938

i. In re Account of Otto Strakosch

The account owner lived with his wife in Vienna. They fled to Paris and later to Cahors, France, until 1942, when they were deported to Auschwitz, where they perished. Otto Strakosch's demand deposit account and custody account were awarded in a separate decision. However, another custody account was closed on February 6, 1937, one year before the Anschluss, and thus was not awarded.

ii. In re Accounts of Robert Weiss and Emil Weiss

The Weisses were brothers who owned a jewelry store in Graz, Austria. Robert Weiss was interned in Dachau. Upon his release, he emigrated with his brother to the United States. In a separate decision, their heirs received an award for six accounts. However, two additional accounts were not awarded, as the accounts were closed in February 1936, two years prior to the Anschluss.

iii. In re Account of Josef Maschler and Marie Maschler-Neumark

Josef Maschler was an ophthalmologist in Vienna, who left Austria for Palestine in 1938 after he was forced out of his employment. The bank records indicated that Josef Maschler and Frau Marie Maschler-Neumark, who resided in Brno, Czechoslovakia, owned a custody account that was closed on January 20, 1938. The CRT concluded that the account owners received the proceeds because the accounts were closed prior to the dates upon which the account owners' countries of residence, Austria and Czechoslovakia, fell under Nazi control.[138]

[138] For additional decisions involving accounts closed prior to the Anschluss in Austria, see, e.g., In re Account of Bertha Hirschmann (account owner lived in Austria, then in Prijedor, Yugoslavia [now Bosnia-Herzegovina], and others in the family lived in Prague, at which time the claimant stated they opened several Swiss accounts

4. Czechoslovakia/Sudetenland: September 30, 1938

i. In re Accounts of Rudolf Roubitschek and Gisa Roubitschek

The Roubitscheks lived in Prague and later in Karlsbad, the Sudetenland, where Rudolf Roubitschek was a physician. They fled to France in 1940 using Bolivian passports. Rudolf Roubitschek died in France in 1945, and his wife died in New York in 1964. The claimants (their grandchildren) were awarded their grandparents' custody and demand deposit accounts in a separate decision. However, the account owners also held a demand deposit account in foreign currency that was closed on January 20, 1935, over three years before the Nazis annexed the Sudetenland. The account therefore was not awarded.

ii. In re Account of Paul Edelstein

Paul Edelstein lived in Reichenberg, Czechoslovakia (today Liberec, the Czech Republic), where he owned a garment manufacturing business. He was deported to Theresienstadt and then to Lodz, where he perished. He owned a safe deposit box that was opened on July 8, 1938 and closed on July 21, 1938, more than two months before the Nazi occupation of the Sudetenland, where Reichenberg was located. The account therefore was not awarded.

under the names of various family members. Bertha Hirschmann's custody account, which was awarded in a separate decision, was closed on May 2, 1942. However, her demand deposit account was not awarded, as it was closed on March 10, 1938, prior to the Anschluss in Austria as well as the Nazi invasion of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia); In re Account of Firma Frau Gisela Huth (account owner, a clothing manufacturing business in Vienna owned by Nazi victims whose property was aryanized and who fled to Argentina and then the United States, held a demand deposit account that was closed more than one year before the Anschluss, on October 10, 1936, and so not awarded).

5. Czechoslovakia/ Remainder: March 15, 1939

i. In re Account of Oskar Huppert

The account owner was a businessman who lived in the former Czechoslovakia, although the claimant (the account owner's great-nephew) did not specify the city of residence. The bank records, however, indicated that Dr. Oscar Huppert resided in Brno, Czechoslovakia as well as in Zurich. He had a demand deposit account that was closed on January 31, 1939. The CRT "note[d] that the Nazis occupied Brno, which was located in Bohemia and Moravia, on 15 March 1939." The account was closed over a month before the Nazi occupation of Brno, and therefore was not awarded.

ii. In re Account of Edgar Perl

Edgar Perl lived with his wife in Prague. He also maintained a residence in Bielitz (Bielsko), Poland, where he was a director of an insurance company. The claimant stated that his wife, Irene, was the heir to her father's large department store and other assets in Troppau (Opava), Czechoslovakia (Czech Republic). The Perl family was killed in Auschwitz. The CRT concluded that the account was closed on June 30, 1938, over eight months prior to the Nazi invasion of the non-Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia, where the Perls lived, and more than a year before the invasion of Poland, where the Perls also maintained a residence.[139]

6. Poland: September 1, 1939

i. In re Account of Leon Steigler

The account owner was born in Tarnopol, Poland. He lived in Krakow, where he owned a shoe business named Delca. He remained in Poland after the War began to attend to the family's business, and was killed in Krakow in 1942. Leon Steigler owned a demand deposit [139] For additional decisions involving accounts closed prior to the invasion of the non-Sudetenland portion of Czechoslovakia, see, e.g., In re Accounts of Irma Arend (account owner lived in Prague and was deported to Lodz, where she perished; she owned a custody account closed on February 24, 1939 and a demand deposit account closed on February 28, 1939, weeks before the invasion*); In re Account of Helene Heller* (account owner lived in Prague and perished in the death camp in Maly Trostinec, Ukraine; her account [of unknown type] was closed on October 12, 1934, several years before the invasion).

account that was closed on March 31, 1939, five months prior to the Nazi invasion of Poland, and thus the account was not awarded.

ii. In re Accounts of Wolf Szapiro

The account owner was born in Poland, where he owned a lumber business and real estate. He owned two custody accounts that were closed, respectively, on January 23, 1939 and February 14, 1939, more than six months prior to the Nazi invasion. The accounts therefore were not awarded.

iii. In re Account of Anna Szpilfogel and Izraël Szpilfogel

The Szpilfogels were born in Poland. They lived near Warsaw, where Izraël Szpilfogel was an engineer. Both were killed in the Holocaust. The Szpilfogels owned a demand deposit account that was closed on June 23, 1939, more than two months before the Nazi invasion. The accounts accordingly were not awarded.[140]

7. Denmark: April 9, 1940

i. In re Accounts of R. Henriques Jr.

R. Henriques Jr. was a firm of stockbrokers with offices in Copenhagen. Its owners, described by the claimant as members of an ancient Jewish Portuguese family who emigrated to [140] For additional decisions involving accounts not awarded because they were closed prior to the invasion of Poland, see, e.g., In re Account of Karol Better (account owner lived in Bielsko, where he died in the 1930s; his family lived in Poland until fleeing on September 1, 1939; his safe deposit box was closed on July 1, 1939, three months before the invasion); In re Accounts of Willy Borger (account owner lived in Bielsko, and fled to Brazil in 1939; his two demand deposit accounts were closed, respectively, on February 10 and February 20, 1939, and his custody account was closed on February 11, 1939, over six months before the invasion); In re Accounts of Herman Chwat (account owner lived in Lodz and was killed in Treblinka; his custody account was closed on June 22, 1939, over two months before the invasion*); In re Accounts of Henryk Poznanski* (account owner lived in Warsaw, Poland and Paris France; his demand deposit account and custody account were closed on February 10, 1939, more than six months before the invasion of Poland and over one year before the invasion of France); In re Accounts of Isidor Rapaport (account owner lived in Krakow; his demand deposit account was closed on May 10, 1939, over three months before the invasion of Poland*); In re Account of Ella Rosenthal* (account owner lived in the Free City of Danzig; her custody account was closed on April 11, 1939, over four months before the invasion); and In re Accounts of Roman J. Schaff (account owner lived in Lwow, Poland; his custody, demand deposit and time deposit accounts were all closed on February 7, 1939, over six months prior to the invasion).

Denmark in the early nineteenth century, fled from Denmark to Sweden, where they managed the company using a trusted employee. They returned to Denmark to continue to run the company after the War, until they sold it in 1969. The firm's two custody accounts were closed, respectively, on September 21, 1939 (more than six months prior to the German invasion) and January 27, 1940 (over two months before the invasion), and so were not awarded.

8. Norway: April 9, 1940

There are no CRT decisions relevant to the date of the Nazi occupation of Norway.

9. Belgium: May 10, 1940

i. In re Accounts of Fernand Wolff and Marguerite-Ady Flore Wolff-Nyst

The Wolffs were born and lived in Belgium. Fernand Wolff was an engineer, and shareholder and administrator of a tennis racket factory. As a member of the Resistance, he was killed by the Nazis in Brussels on December 3, 1943. The Wolffs owned a custody account and a demand deposit account, both of which were closed on August 16, 1939, over eight months before the Nazi invasion of Belgium. The accounts thus were not awarded.

10. France: May 10, 1940

i. In re Account of Max Lazard

The account owner, Max Michel Lazard, was described by his son (the claimant) as a "merchant" who was born in Prussia (now Germany). He lived near Paris, and later in Moulins-lès-Metz and Pont-à-Mousson, France. In 1942, he was deported to Drancy and then to Auschwitz, where he perished. The bank records indicated that in 1936, "nearly four years prior to the occupation of France by Nazi Germany, the Bank purchased securities and gold from the Account Owner, and … the proceeds were sent to the Account Owner directly (in demand notes and by check) or transferred to the Account Owner's account at Lazard Brothers & Co., Ltd. in London." The accounts therefore were not awarded.

ii. In re Accounts of Marius Rosenbaum and Eugénie Rosenbaum

The Rosenbaums lived in Paris, where Marius Rosenbaum was a banker. His co-account owner, Eugénie Rosenbaum, was his nephew's wife. The Rosenbaums fled from Paris to Spain, and later to Biarritz and Arcachon, France. However, they returned to Paris when Marius Rosenbaum became ill, where Marius died in 1942 and Eugénie in 1957. The bank records indicated that the account owners' two demand deposit accounts were closed several days before the Nazi invasion of France, on May 3, 1940. The accounts therefore were not awarded.

iii. In re Accounts of Moïse Maurice Wolff and Ann Wolff

The Wolffs were born in Germany. They lived in Paris with their children, where Moïse Wolff was chairman and managing director of the Compagnie Géneréle des Papiers. The Wolffs died before the Nazi occupation of France, but their children were Nazi victims. The Wolffs' demand deposit account was closed on January 11, 1935 while their custody account was closed in August 1935, approximately four years prior to the Nazi invasion. The accounts therefore were not awarded.[141]

11. Luxembourg: May 10, 1940

i. In re Accounts of Nathan Hertz and Lenny Hertz

The claimant stated that Nathan and Lenny Hertz were his uncle and aunt (his aunt's name was "Jenny", rather than "Lenny" as reflected in the published account. They lived in Bertholet, Luxembourg, where Nathan Hertz owned a fur business, Fourreur Jenny. They left [141] See also In re Account of Ernest Gans and Eric Weil (account owner Weil was born in Germany and lived in Paris from 1930 until he fled to Portugal in 1940, and returned to Paris in 1950; the claimant, Eric Weil's son, identified co-owner Ernest Gans as his maternal uncle but could not provide information about him; the joint demand deposit account was closed on January 13, 1940, nearly four months before the Nazi invasion of France).

Luxembourg for New York in 1939, before the Nazi invasion, and returned to Luxembourg in 1945. The Hertzes owned three demand deposit accounts, two of which were closed on June 30, 1939, and the other closed no later than June 30, 1939. Because the accounts were closed nearly a year prior to the Nazi invasion, they were not awarded.

ii. In re Accounts of Fritz Levy

Fritz Levy lived in Germany with his wife and child. He managed and was the major shareholder in the family textile business, Ludwig Levy GmbH. In November 1938, he fled to Switzerland, and thereafter joined his mother in Luxembourg. After his mother's death, he fled to the Netherlands and lived in hiding. He moved to the United States after the War and died in New York in 1954. Fritz Levy owned several Swiss bank accounts, all of which the CRT determined had been accessed by the account owner, including a custody account that had been closed on April 19, 1940, some weeks before the Nazi occupation of Luxembourg.

12. Netherlands: May 10, 1940

i. In re Account of Paul Auerbach

The account owner lived in Amsterdam and perished in the Holocaust. He owned a custody account, which was closed on October 1, 1937, and a demand deposit account, which was closed on June 20, 1944. The CRT awarded the demand deposit account to the claimant, a cousin of Paul Auerbach's, in a separate decision. However, the custody account was closed over two years prior to the German invasion of the Netherlands, and was not awarded.

ii. In re Account of Benno Hess

Benno Hess lived in Germany until 1934, when he fled to Amsterdam. He was arrested in 1943 and deported to Theresienstadt, from which he was liberated in 1945. He died in Amsterdam in 1984. The CRT observed that "the account [of unknown type] was closed on 2 January 1939, and … the proceeds of the account were transferred to a bank in Amsterdam, the Netherlands. The CRT notes that the Bank's records indicate that the Account Owner resided in Amsterdam" and that "the account was closed over a year before the occupation by Nazi Germany of the Netherlands beginning on 10 May 1940." Accordingly, the accounts were not awarded.

13. Greece: October 28, 1940

i. In re Accounts of Peppo L. Cohen

The account owner, who was born in Thessaloniki, Greece. He owned a timber agency and also was a representative of a Yugoslavian-Serbian bank in Greece. He was killed in Auschwitz with his wife and daughter. He owned a demand deposit account and a custody account, both of which were closed on March 22, 1939, more than two years before the Nazi occupation of Greece. The accounts were not awarded.

ii. In re Account of Salomon A. Arditti

The account owner lived in Thessaloniki. He represented the French shipping company Messagerie Maritime and also was honorary consul of Portugal. Salomon Arditti and his wife were arrested by the Nazis in March 1943, and later perished in Auschwitz. His account, of unknown type, was closed on August 16, 1939, nearly two years prior to the Nazi invasion, and so was not awarded.

14. Hungary: November 20, 1940

i. In re Account of Dezsö Waldmann

The account was identified by two unrelated individuals, one stating that the account owner was a businessman who lived in Hungary and was killed in Auschwitz; the other stating that he had little information but knew the account owner had lived in Budapest. Since both claimants stated that the account owner had lived in Hungary, the account (a safe deposit box) was not awarded because the records showed that it was closed on March 2, 1940, over eight months prior to the November 20, 1940 alliance between Hungary and Germany.

ii. In re Account of Laszlo Rozsa

Two unrelated claimants sought the account. The first stated that the account owner was a businessman living in Budapest, who was a slave laborer who survived the Holocaust and died in Budapest in 1971. The other claimant stated that the account owner was a trader of agricultural goods and motor vehicles, who was a slave laborer who survived Mauthausen, among other camps, and who died in Budapest in 1986. However, neither claimant was entitled to the account (a safe deposit box), because it was closed on November 18, 1939, one year before the alliance between Hungary and Germany.[142]

15. Romania: November 20, 1940

i. In re Accounts of Leo Kapralik

The account owner lived in Bucharest with his wife. He was the General Director of the Dresdner Bank in Bucharest. Although most of the family fled Romania in 1939, Leo Kapralik stayed behind, and was killed in the Holocaust. He owned a custody account and two demand deposit accounts, all of which were closed on May 28, 1940, five months before Romania entered into the Tripartite Agreement allying it with Nazi Germany. The accounts were not awarded.

ii. In re Account of Moise Landau

The account owner resided in Rozavlea, Romania, and was deported to several concentration camps. He died in the Holocaust. He held an account of unknown type, which was closed on December 24, 1938, almost two years before the alliance. The account therefore was not awarded.

[142] For additional decisions involving accounts closed prior to the alliance between Germany and Hungary, see, e.g., In re Account of Miklos Fényes (account owner had a business related to journalism, according to the claimant (a cousin) and lived in Budapest, where he died in the 1980s or 1990s; his demand deposit account was closed on April 19, 1939, approximately 1½ years before the alliance); In re Accounts of Helene Grosz (account owner lived in Arad, Hungary [now Romania] and owned real estate and other property; she moved to Israel in the late 1940s, and died there in the 1950s. She owned a demand deposit account closed on August 26, 1938; a custody account closed on September 20, 1938; and two demand deposit accounts closed on September 30, 1939. The CRT concluded that the account owner had had access to her accounts, since all were closed between one and two years before the alliance).

iii. In re Account of Franz Joseph Popper

The account owner resided in Bucharest, Romania prior to the War; the claimant, his daughter, did not provide further information. The CRT concluded that Franz Joseph Popper had received the proceeds of his account (of unknown type), because it was closed on April 21, 1939, approximately 1½ years before the alliance.[143]

16. Bulgaria: March 1, 1941

i. In re Accounts of Rebekka Goldman

Rebecca Goldman lived with her family in Sofia. Her husband was an egg exporter who was decorated by the king of Bulgaria. Her husband died in Sofia in 1941, and Rebecca Goldman died there in 1945. Their son, the claimant's husband, was a slave laborer. Rebecca Goldman owned a custody account, which was closed on January 29, 1939, and a demand deposit account, which was closed on March 24, 1939, two years before the Nazi invasion of Bulgaria. The CRT also observed that the accounts were closed over one year before the enactment of the first Bulgarian anti-Semitic laws, on October 7, 1940. The accounts were not awarded.

---

[143] For additional decisions involving accounts closed prior to the Romanian alliance with Germany, *see, e.g., In re Accounts of Samuel and Adela (Adele) Breger (*account owners lived in Bucharest and then moved to France to avoid the fascist regime in Romania; Adela Breger and the couple's two sons were killed in Auschwitz, while Samuel Breger escaped and later founded an organization in Romania "dedicated to protecting the interests of Romania[n] Jews and others in Europe who were deported;" the CRT awarded five of Adela Breger's accounts in a separate decision, but determined that four additional demand deposit accounts owned by Adela Breger (who was reflected in the bank records as having addresses both in Vienna and in Romania) and Samuel Breger were closed, respectively, on August 24, 1934, June 10, 1935, August 31, 1935, April 10, 1936, several years prior to the Tripartite Agreement as well as two to three years prior to the Anschluss); In re Accounts of Josef Goldstein (account owner lived in Iasi, Romania, where his home and property were looted and where he was imprisoned; he lived in Romania until 1950 and died in Israel in 1960; his two demand deposit accounts were closed, respectively, on March 31, 1938 and April 30, 1939, approximately 1 ½ to 2 ½ years before the alliance); In re Account of Elemer Hirsch (account owner lived in Cluj, and fled for Palestine in 1944; he died in Cluj in 1953 and his wife died in Israel in 1992; his account [of unknown type] was closed on September 30, 1940, almost two months before the alliance); and In re Account of Mendel Katz (account owner lived in Cernauti, Romania and died in the Holocaust; his safe deposit box was closed on April 12, 1940, over six months before the alliance).

17. Yugoslavia: March 25, 1941

i. In re Account of Emmanuel Schotten

The account owner, who was born in Austria-Hungary, owned a wholesale china and glass business in Zagreb, Croatia. He fled with his family in 1944 to Rab, Yugoslavia (now Croatia), then under Italian occupation. The account owner and his wife were deported to and perished in Auschwitz in 1944. Emmanuel Schotten's children (the claimants) received an award for his custody account in a separate decision. However, no award was made for his account of unknown type, which was closed on March 4, 1939, two years before the Nazi invasion.

ii. In re Accounts of Lajos Schulhoff

The account owner was born in Szabadka, Hungary (later Yugoslavia, and now Subotica, Serbia). He managed real estate and vineyards in Hungary and Yugoslavia. He maintained dual residences in Padej, Yugoslavia (which was confiscated by the Nazis in 1941), and Budapest, where he was imprisoned by the Nazis. He moved to Montreal in the early 1950s, and died there in 1962. His account of unknown type at one bank was closed on April 5, 1939. His demand deposit account at a second bank was closed on April 10, 1939, at a time when he lived in Yugoslavia, and two years prior to the Nazi invasion.[144] The accounts thus were not awarded.

18. Switzerland:

In addition to the countries eventually occupied by or allied with Nazi Germany, the CRT also considered several cases involving account owners who were living in Switzerland, which never was occupied by or formally allied with Germany, but instead considered itself "neutral."

[144] For additional decisions involving accounts closed prior to the invasion of Yugoslavia, see, e.g., In re Accounts of Julius Gedalja (account owner lived in Belgrade, and he was killed in 1941; his two demand deposit accounts were closed respectively on January 31, 1940 and May 20, 1940, approximately one year before the invasion); In re Account of Hermine Loebl (account owner lived in Senta, Yugoslavia, and was killed with his family in Auschwitz in 1944; his demand deposit account was closed on June 20, 1940, more than ten months before the invasion); In re Accounts of Ilonka Rosenberg (account owner lived in Beocin, Yugoslavia, and died in a concentration camp; her demand deposit account was closed on April 20, 1939 and her custody account was closed on April 29, 1939, nearly two years before the invasion).

In the absence of specific evidence indicating that the account was confiscated or not returned, the CRT did not award these accounts to the claimants, concluding that the account owner was able to access the account and receive the proceeds while living freely in Switzerland.

i. In re Account of Hugo Grünfeld

The account owner was born in Vienna. He lived in Budapest, where he was a lawyer who also co-owned a liquor business. In 1944, he was deported with other family members on the Kasztner Transport to Bergen-Belsen, and then to a refugee camp in Switzerland. The family lived in a vacant hotel that was being used for a detention camp in Caux sur Montreux. According to the claimant, her mother (the account owner's sister-in-law) had deposited funds at a Swiss bank in Geneva in 1939, which made it possible for family members to leave the camp at Caux, for Geneva. The bank record indicated that Dr. Hugo Grünfeld of Budapest owned a safe deposit box that was opened on August 20, 1938 and closed on May 12, 1945, "which, the CRT notes, is just a few days after the cessation of hostilities in Europe." Given that the claimant's mother had deposited funds in Geneva, which the family used to leave the internment camp at Caux, and based on the fact that the account was closed after the War in Europe had ended, the CRT concluded that the account owner was able to access his account and receive its proceeds.

ii. In re Accounts of Martin Goldschmidt

The account owner was born in 1878 in Germany. He was a hotel and bank director in Berlin until 1933, when he fled with his family to Switzerland. His daughter-in-law, the claimant, stated that Martin Goldschmidt transferred his assets to Switzerland before leaving Germany. His children attended boarding school in Vevey, Switzerland, and the family lived in Switzerland until 1939, when they left for the United States (via Japan). Martin Goldschmidt died in New York in 1944 and his wife died in 1958. The bank records indicated that Martin Goldschmidt owned a custody account closed December 13, 1938. The records also indicated that the account owner lived in Hotel Verenahof in Baden, Switzerland. Further, the documents showed that Martin Goldschmidt had owned a custody and demand deposit account at a second bank (closed, respectively, on June 30, 1939 and July 11, 1939). The CRT concluded that Martin Goldschmidt accessed all of these accounts himself, because the records for the first bank "indicate that the Account Owner resided in Switzerland in December 1938" and that all of his accounts at both banks were closed between December 13, 1938 and July 11, 1939, when he was living in Switzerland.

D. ENTITLEMENT DENIALS (CLAIMANT DETERMINED NOT TO BE ENTITLED TO ACCOUNT, DUE TO LACK OF FAMILY RELATIONSHIP OR OTHER FACTORS)

i. In re Account of Dubied & Cie ED. S.A.

David Dynin and his wife, Franciska Dynin, lived in Lodz. He owned a company in Lodz named D. Dynin. In 1939, the Dynins fled in fear of Nazi occupation, and in 1946, they reached Palestine. According to the claimants, the children of the Dynins, their parents had business connections with Swiss companies. They stated that commissions due to the Dynins from Swiss metal industry manufacturers between 1933 and 1939 were left in a Swiss account managed by the Swiss company Edouard Dubied & Cie. in Neuchâtel. The claimants stated that their parents unsuccessfully tried to get their money back from this company. David Dynin died in Tel Aviv in 1985, and his wife died there in 1999.

The ICEP auditors did not locate an account belonging to the Dynins, or to the companies mentioned by the claimants. However, "the claimants submitted a list of accounts to the CRT which they stated were deposited in Swiss bank branches in New York" and were "frozen in 1941. According to this list, the Account Owner was Dubied & Cie. Ed. S.A., which had an address in Neuchâtel, Switzerland. This list also indicates that the Dubied & Cie. Ed. S.A. was a Swiss company. Furthermore, the list indicates that the balance of the account was 47,153.04 United States Dollars."

The CRT determined that the claimants were not entitled to the account because they had not shown that their parents had an ownership interest in the company that held this account. As described by the CRT:

> According to Article 23(3) of the Rules, if the Account Owner is a legal or other entity (such as a corporation, association, organization, etc.), the Award will be made in favor of those Claimants who establish a right of ownership to the assets of the entity. In this case, the Claimants stated that the Account Owner managed their parents' account. The Claimants did not provide documents demonstrating that their parents, or the company D. Dynin, were the actual beneficiaries of the claimed account, or had any rights to the account. The Claimants did not provide documents showing that their parents' account, managed by the Account Owner, was part of the claimed account. Therefore, as the Claimants did not establish a right of ownership to the Account, they are not entitled to the claimed account.

ii. In re Account of Jacques Levylier (Power of Attorney Holder Jean Pierre Bernheim)

Jean Pierre Bernheim was born in 1904. He lived in Paris with his wife. They moved to Basel, Switzerland, where they lived until 1939. They then returned to France, where they resided for the remainder of the War. Jean Pierre Bernheim was an industrialist in the textile business, with an office in Paris.

The bank records showed that the account owner was Jacques Levylier, who resided in Neuilly sur Seine, France. The power of attorney holder for this account was Jean Pierre Bernheim. The bank records showed street addresses for both individuals.

The CRT concluded that the claimant was not entitled to the account. Although the claimant identified the power of attorney holder, Jean Pierre Bernheim, as her father, she had not identified or demonstrated a relationship to the account owner, Jacques Levylier. The CRT explained that "under Swiss law, a power of attorney holder is not considered to be the owner of an account. After a power of attorney holder dies, his or her powers in an account no longer exist, and they do not pass to his or her heirs. Therefore, even if the Claimant had identified the Account Owner, the Claimant would not have been entitled to the account unless there was evidence in the Bank's records that the Power of Attorney Holder and the Account Owner were related." The CRT further noted that in the "absence of a family relationship between the Claimant and the Account Owner or the Account Owner and Power of Attorney Holder, or a will or testamentary documents indicating that the Claimant is a beneficiary of the Account Owner," the claimant was not entitled to the account owner's account.[145]

E. IDENTITY DENIALS (ACCOUNT OWNER AND CLAIMANT'S RELATIVE WERE DIFFERENT PERSONS)

i. Claimed Account Owner: Abraham Katz

Eleven different unrelated individuals claimed an account published in 2001 as that owned by Abraham Ber Katz (Vijnita, Romania). For purposes of the ICEP audit, the account was identified as number 5035022.

One of the eleven claimants, acting on behalf of her cousin and other family members, demonstrated that the account owner was her uncle. In her claim form, she identified her uncle as Abraham Bernhard Katz, who was born in Vijnita, Romania in 1905 and who moved to Berlin before the Nazis came to power. He fled Germany to Vichy, France in 1939, and then to New York in 1942. He died in Haifa, Israel in 1989. Prior to submitting her claim form, the claimant and her cousin each had submitted an Initial Questionnaire, identifying various members of the Katz family as having been born in and/or resided in Vijnita, Romania. Thus, the claimants had [145] See also, e.g., In re Account of Paul Prager (Power of Attorney Holder) (claimant identified account owner Paul Prager as her father's employer and advised the CRT that Paul Prager was not a relative; thus, she was not a proper heir of the account owner); Claimed Account Owner: Sara (Rosa) Guttmann (CRT located a match between the claimant's relative, Sara Guttmann, and an S. Guttmann and R. Guttman, each respectively a power of attorney holder to accounts appearing in the AHD. However, in addition to erroneously identifying each account owner as female when they both actually were male, the claimant also did not indicate that she was related to the actual account owner). In other instances, the CRT has been able to connect the claimant to the account owner and establish a family relationship, thus warranting awarding the account to the claimant as an heir, even where the claimant himself/herself had not identified the account owner as a relative. See, e.g., In re Account of Otto Löb (the claimant identified the published power of attorney holder as her grandfather, Ludwig Löb of Frankfurt, Germany, who died in the Holocaust. The CRT observed that although the claimant "did not identify the Account Owner," Otto Löb, he lived in Darmstadt, Germany (34 kilometers from Frankfurt) and thus lived in essentially the same city as the power of attorney holder, and he also shared the same surname as the claimant's grandfather. The CRT observed that the claimant "was born only in 1943" and that it was plausible that she "would not know the names of all of her father's European relatives;" accordingly, it was plausible that the claimant was related to the account owner and thus entitled to his account).

established a family relationship to the city of Vijnita before that city was publicly identified in 2001, when the first list of CRT accounts was disseminated.

The bank records indicated that the account, of unknown type, was opened on September 30, 1938. The bank records did not show when the account was closed, or the value of the account. Since the ICEP auditors did not find the account in the bank's system of open accounts, the auditors presumed it was closed. The claimants were awarded the presumptive value of an account of unknown type, which the CRT divided among the cousins and other represented parties (a total of seven persons). See In re Account of Abraham Ber Katz (Certified Award).

To complete the analysis of the Abraham Katz account, however, the CRT also was required to assess ten other claims that had been filed to the same account. In nine of these ten cases, the claimants failed to provide information about their relatives which matched basic data contained in the bank files, thus disqualifying their claims and warranting "Identity Denials." Whereas the actual account owner had lived in Romania, the claimants' relatives had lived in other countries:

- Claimant 1 stated that his relative, Abraham Katz, lived in Vilna, Poland (today Lithuania);
- Claimant 2 stated that his relative, Abraham Katz, lived in Poland;
- Claimant 3 stated that her father, Abraham Mayer Katz, lived in Austria in the 1930s through 1938, at which time he fled to Palestine (today Israel);
- Claimant 4 stated that her relative, Abraham Katz, lived in Poland;
- Claimant 5 stated that his relative, Abraham Katz, lived in Czechoslovakia and Hungary, and that Abraham Katz had deposited assets in a Swiss bank on behalf of the Roth family;
- Claimant 6 stated that her relative, Abraham Katz, lived in Hungary;
- Claimant 7 stated that his relative, Abraham Adolf Katz, lived in Munkacs, Hungary (now Munkachevo, Ukraine);
- Claimant 8 (a group of three siblings) stated that their uncle, Abraham Katz, lived in Kishinev, a major city approximately 350 kilometers from Vijnita; and

- Claimant 9 stated that his relative lived in Poland.

Another claimant, Claimant 10, stated that her great-uncle, Abraham Katz, was born in Vijnitz, Romania and that he had perished in the Holocaust. However, although the information about the claimant's great-uncle matched the name and town of the account owner as published, bank records provided to the CRT through "voluntary assistance" indicated that the actual account owner had used the full name of "Abraham Ber Katz." Claimant 10 did not indicate that her great-uncle had, or used, a middle name.

However, although these ten claimants were ineligible to receive an award based upon the documented account of Abraham Katz of Romania, their claims nevertheless were analyzed in accordance with the criteria for Plausible Undocumented Awards. Thus, the CRT took into consideration the fact that although the claimant may not have been related to the actual published account owner, the claimant nevertheless may have had a close relative (child, spouse, parent, grandparent or sibling)[146] named Abraham Katz who owned a Swiss bank account, and that the records relating to such account(s) might have been destroyed in the post-War era.

Two of the ten claimants were determined to have satisfied the PUA criteria, and each received payment of $7,250. The other eight claimants did not receive PUAs for a variety of reasons: one claimant already had received an award for a different, documented account (disqualifying the claimant for a PUA under the terms of the Court order authorizing PUAs, since PUAs were intended to compensate for the lack of any bank records relating to any accounts); for several claimants, their relative "Abraham Katz" was not a close family member as specified under the PUA criteria (child, spouse, parent, grandparent or sibling) but rather was more distantly related; in other cases, the claimants had not met the standard of plausibility as required for a PUA.

[146] Among the criteria for determining whether a PUA was warranted is whether the claimed account belonged to a family member within the "circle of heirs" (child, spouse, parent, grandparent or sibling). See Order of February 17, 2006.

ii. Claimed Account Owner: Berta Faeber

The claimant stated that his relative, Berta Faeber, resided in Breslau, Germany (now Wroclaw, Poland). He stated that "Faeber" was his relative's maiden name.

Although a "Frau Berta Faeber" was included in the AHD as an account owner, the bank records showed that her maiden name was not "Faeber" but, rather, another name. Accordingly, the CRT was unable to award the account, as it did not belong to the claimant's relative, but, rather, to another person.

iii. Claimed Account Owner: Rosa Opperman

The claimant stated that his relative, Rosa Opperman, lived in Vienna, Austria.

Although a "Rosa Opperman, Germany" was included in the AHD as an account owner, the bank records showed that she had lived in Germany, not Austria. Accordingly, the CRT was unable to award the account, as it did not belong to the claimant's relative, but rather to another person.

iv. Claimed Account Owner: Heinrich Wyss

The claimant stated that his father, Heinrich Wyss, lived in Lodz, Poland. The CRT matched the name "Heinrich Wyss," as well as several variations of each name ("Henryk" and "Emil", and "Weiss"), against the AHD, and identified several accounts that potentially matched to the claimant's father's name. However, upon further investigation, the CRT determined that these matches were not valid:

- The AHD contained an account for a "Heinrich Weiss." However, the claimant had stated that his father had lived in Poland, whereas Heinrich Weiss lived in a different country.
- The AHD contained two accounts for a different "Heinrich Weiss," of Bucharest, Romania. However, claimant's father had lived in Poland, not Romania.

- The AHD contained an account for a "Heinrich Weiss" of Romania. However, claimant's father had lived in Poland, not Romania.

- The AHD contained an account for a "Heinrich Weiss" of Pforzheim, Germany, with "Luise Weiss" designated as the power of attorney holder. However, claimant's father had lived in Poland, not Germany. Moreover, the claimant did not identify "Luise Weiss," who apparently was a close relative of the actual account owner (Heinrich Weiss of Pforzheim, Germany).

III. APPEALS

A. APPEALS FROM THE CONCLUSION THAT THE ACCOUNT OWNER RECEIVED THE PROCEEDS

i. In re Account of Fanny Hatvany

Baroness Fanny Hatvany was born on July 1, 1868 in Budapest. She was married to a leading industrialist.

This case concerned the claim of the great-grandson of Fanny Hatvany, née Latsko, for assets Fanny Hatvany held in an account at the Geneva branch of a French bank ("the French Bank"), numbered C.637/637. The claimant also represented his half-brother, born of their mother's second marriage. The claimants submitted in support of their claim a December 31, 1947 statement of assets, according to which the account held 13 gold bars as well as various securities. The claimants also provided a family tree. It showed Baroness Fanny Hatvany and her husband as having only two children, namely, their grandmother and her sister. The claimants further asserted that the account owner, Fanny Hatvany, her children, and their children, all had passed away before 1980.

The claimed account was not included in the "AHD," which identified accounts "probably" or "possibly" belonging to victims of Nazi persecution. This was so, because the rules specifically excluded subsidiaries and branches of non-Swiss banks from the Volcker Committee's audit. The claimants accordingly received a "No Match" decision (or "NML" - "No Match Letter"), indicating that the accounts they had sought did not match to any accounts in the database made available to the CRT. The claimants appealed this decision, explaining that they were seeking restitution of assets which, as later described by the CRT, allegedly were "held in an account numbered C. 637 or 637 for Fanny Hatvany in the name of [the Geneva branch of] a French bank in secondary depository institutions, including the Swiss Depository, in London, England." In support of their appeal, they provided their original submission, and two pieces of correspondence between the American and the British lawyers the Hatvany family had engaged to help restore control of the assets held by the family in the U.S. and the U.K.[147]

The claim thus was based on documentation provided by the claimants, which was somewhat augmented at the time of their appeal in 2006, and supplemented in 2009 and 2010 during the subsequent appeals process. The additional materials were not provided initially but, rather, in response to several requests from the CRT, and then a court order. This information was further augmented extensively by research undertaken by the CRT, including documentation that the CRT obtained from one Swiss bank under the "voluntary assistance" process. Ultimately, the case file contained more than one thousand pages of documentation.

According to the documentation, the content of the claimed account was held by the French Bank in its name, on behalf of Fanny Hatvany, at a number of financial institutions in New York and London, including at the London branch of a Swiss bank, together with two British institutions. In other words, the assets were held in the name of the French Bank in so-called omnibus accounts to preserve the anonymity of the actual owners. As a consequence, such assets were frozen during the war under the respective Trading with the Enemy Acts of the United States ("TEA") and the United Kingdom ("TWEA"), until such time as the bank could provide proof that the actual holder was not a national of an enemy or blocked country.

Fanny Hatvany was a Hungarian national who had spent the entire war in Hungary. Well before her arrival in the United States on November 9, 1946, she and the family had begun to consider what options they had to regain the free disposition of her (and the family's) assets that had been frozen, blocked or confiscated in the United States and the United Kingdom. Fanny's U.S. lawyers were poised to move quickly upon her arrival, so that on November 19, 1946, she was recognized as a "generally licensed individual." This meant that she was not considered to be a person in the United States who was a national of any blocked or enemy country.

[147] To avoid confusion, in what follows the immediate family of Fanny Hatvany is referred to as "the Hatvanys" and the broader family as "the family."

Henceforth, she would be treated as a national of the United States. Accordingly, the release of the contents of account 637 that was held in the United States was no longer at issue.

The claimants acknowledged in their appeal letter that after the war "some securities had been released" from the London accounts to their proper owners. However, they also stated that none of the gold held in London had ever been returned to either Fanny Hatvany, or to any of her relatives or her heirs. According to the documentation, the French Bank valued the account on November 13, 1946 at US$ 290,497.53, predominantly in gold (132 kg. with a value of US$ 201,105.03), the bulk of which (112 kg.) was held in a British safe deposit institution, and the remainder (50 kg.) at the London branch of the Swiss bank.

Fanny Hatvany's husband was a scion of the very wealthy Hatvany family. The family's prosperity originated with Ignacz Deutsch, an industrialist who in the 19th century founded the Bank Ig. Deutsch & Sohn in Budapest. The bank managed the family assets, which were largely held in an investment fund called the "Hatvany Family Management" (the "Family Fund"). The family members pooled their inherited assets into this fund. Upon a member's death, his/her assets were allocated to his/her descendants according to agreed-upon percentages. An important part of the Family Fund's assets consisted of major sugar refineries in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and other real and financial assets in Hungary and Yugoslavia, and a holding company, the British Sugar Corporation, in the UK. The Family Fund was shared in equal parts by the families of the three grandsons of Ignacz Deutsch: Joseph, Charles and Alexander Hatvany. Joseph died intestate in 1913, and Alexander also died in 1913. Charles died approximately in 1943.

The bulk of the Family Fund was held with, and managed through, a security firm called the Comptoir Financier in Geneva. The CRT obtained information about this aspect of the family's management of assets from its analysis of a proceeding in which the Hatvanys had sought restitution of certain assets in Yugoslavia. The Hatvanys had filed this claim in the early 1950s with the United States Foreign Claims Settlement Commission ("FCSC"), a quasi-judicial, independent agency within the Department of Justice which adjudicates claims of U.S. nationals against foreign governments. The FCSC decision on the Hatvany claim explained that the Comptoir Financier was a Swiss security management firm "which holds and manages securities and other property for clients, utilizing the Geneva branch of the Bank for the safekeeping of the assets." The bank was not informed of the client's name; records were kept in the name of the Comptoir Financier. A client wishing to transact his/her securities would notify the Comptoir Financier, which would then instruct the bank to take the requested action by reference to an account number.

As the CRT discovered from its analysis of the FCSC decision, the Comptoir Financier held Hatvany family assets both in the name of the Family Fund, as well as in the names of individual family members, including Fanny Hatvany and each of her four children.

Three family groups shared ownership and management of the Hatvany wealth in the post-war period:

1) Fanny Hatvany (the account owner in question) and four children, Antonia, Lili, Andrew and Bertalan.

At the relevant time, their son, Bertalan, who was an orientalist and art collector of fame, lived in France. He escaped to Geneva, Switzerland, and returned to France in 1947. He died in Paris on July 24, 1980. He had married the courier who had assisted in his escape (his second marriage). He had one son, József, from his first marriage, who thus was a grandson of Fanny Hatvany. József was born in 1926, and he was an internationally renowned computer scientist. He died on July 11, 1987 in Budapest. He may have had a daughter who was born in Budapest in 1947.

Lili and Antonia, the daughters of Fanny Hatvany and her husband, lived in the United States. Antonia, who had emigrated to the United States in 1926, had been a US citizen since 1935. Lili was in the process of gaining citizenship in 1947. Antonia remained unmarried, and died in 1974 without children. Lili married twice, and had children from each of these marriages. The original claimant was the son of Mariella, the daughter born of Lili's second marriage. In his claim, he also represented his half-brother (born of Mariella's second marriage).

Among the family members, only Fanny and Andrew had remained in Hungary throughout the war. Fanny went into hiding when the Germans entered Hungary on March 19, 1944. Andrew was imprisoned by the German occupation forces, but managed to escape and join his mother in her hiding place. After the war, Fanny Hatvany secured a Russian exit visa in June 1946. She emigrated to the United States via Switzerland, arriving in New York on November 9, 1946. Andrew resided in France from February 1947, and later in England. He eventually emigrated to the United States on an unspecified date. Though he used an address in New York in January 1948, this may have been a temporary address, but he resided in the United States by 1951. He died there, childless, in 1961.

2) Charles (Karoly) Hatvany died approximately in 1943, leaving his widow Regina and two children, Jean Hatvany and Marietta Kerekes née Hatvany, and a grandson, George Kerekes. Regina still remained in Hungary in 1946, but by March 1947 resided in France. Jean and Marietta resided in France and Switzerland from 1924 and 1937 respectively. George resided in France as of an unspecified date.

3) Alexander Hatvany had a son, Francis Hatvany, and two great-grandchildren, Pierre and Mary de Charmant. Francis had remained in Hungary during the war, but by March 1947, he resided in France. Pierre and Mary, nationals of Liechtenstein, and their father, Severin de Marchant, had resided in Switzerland since before the war.

These three branches of the family, located in the U.S., France and Switzerland, were involved in energetic post-war efforts to reclaim the family's, as well as their personal, assets. They were also involved in active post-war management of these assets. In particular, Andrew Hatvany in the United States, Jean Hatvany in France and Pierre de Marchant and his father, Severin, in Switzerland, were engaged in the family's wealth management, including through the Comptoir Financier. Further, as shown in the documentation eventually provided by the claimants, Bertalan also was involved in the management of account 637.

The documentation made available to the CRT tracked in detail the family's sophisticated maneuverings to recover control over their assets in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Following the release of the assets in the U.S., with the full cooperation of the French Bank, the Hatvanys concentrated their efforts on the de-blocking of Fanny's account. Prior approaches had focused on the assets of the family's British holding company (the British Sugar Corporation ("BSC")), which had been seized by the UK authorities, as the BSC was considered to be an enemy company. The petition for the release of the BSC assets was to be a test case for establishing the non-enemy status of family members, thus eliminating the need for family members to remain anonymous. However, the BSC matter turned out to be more complicated than first thought. It dragged on until 1952, when these assets were finally returned to the family. By that time, according to contemporaneous records of the Hatvanys' U.S. attorney,

Hans Frank, the Hatvanys had long retrieved all the other assets that had been held in the UK, including those in account 637 held at the Swiss bank. As the CRT noted: "Thus, Hans Frank wrote in a letter dated 12 March 1952, that now that the funds for the release of which they had applied (the British Sugar Corporation shares, the redemption proceeds of a British Sugar Corporation bond, and accumulated dividends and interest) were at the free disposal of the entitled persons, his and his colleague's services would no longer be needed." Hans Frank specifically stated:

> "…[S]ince the petition was filed at the time for the purpose of testing the attitude of the [British] Board of Trade with respect to the non-enemy status of some of the participants who had additional assets in the United Kingdom, and since apparently these applicants have succeeded by other methods to gain control over such assets, there is additional reason why our services can now be dispensed with. [Emphasis added by CRT.]" This statement by Hans Frank clearly shows that, by the date of his letter, the Hatvany family had gained control over their assets in the United Kingdom, including the assets claimed here.

This release, and the methods employed to gain it, were well documented. The attorneys' correspondence showed that Fanny and her four children decided in 1947 to have Antonia, who was a US citizen, petition for the release of the assets the French Bank held in London at the Swiss bank on behalf of Fanny. They had already in 1946, for that purpose, drawn up a draft trust agreement in which Antonia was the trustee, and the inheritance rights of her three siblings had been established. That document contained a Declaration signed by Lili, Andrew and Bertalan Hatvany certifying their agreement to the provisions of the Trust, and specifically citing that it concerned the assets in Fanny Hatvany's account 637. This Declaration reflected the fact that Fanny Hatvany's husband had died intestate. Under Hungarian law his widow, Fanny, had rights to the income from the estate during her lifetime, but the four siblings retained equal rights, i.e. one quarter each, to the capital. This understanding had been verified by the Hatvanys' lawyers. It underlay the various trust agreements drawn up by the Hatvany family regarding the release of the assets in London as well as elsewhere.

On May 5, 1948, the Hatvanys submitted Antonia's application, as owner of the assets in account 637 and as a U.S. national of pre-war standing, for the release of all these assets. The documentation the CRT obtained from the Swiss bank detailed each step to transfer the gold from the name of the French Bank into Antonia's own name, and finally to her account at Samuel Montagu & Co. in London. This process was paralleled by the release, and ultimate transfer, of the contents of account 636 (one bar of gold and French gold coins), which had initially belonged to Andrew Hatvany, to the claimants' grandmother, Lili Hatvany. This account was not part of the claim. The whole process was completed in just under a month, with the cooperation of the Swiss bank and the French Bank.

The documentation available to the CRT showed that the Hatvany family as a unit, and individually, continued to maintain their relationship with the French Bank in subsequent years.

The CRT's investigation revealed that at the same time that the claimants pursued their CRT claims, they also had advanced essentially the same claim along two additional avenues.

First, a few months after they transmitted their claim to the CRT, the Hatvany claimants filed a claim for the same assets with the UK's Enemy Property Claims Assessment Panel (EPCAP). EPCAP was established within the UK Department of Trade and Industry. It was part of the UK's Enemy Property Payments Scheme, a program set up to "'provide compensation to victims of Nazi persecution who had property in the United Kingdom which was confiscated by the British Government during the Second World War under UK legislation on trading with the enemy, and who have not had their property returned.'" The program was administered by the Secretariat of EPCAP. Claims were determined by a Panel, with two levels of appeal. In the Hatvanys' case, the Panel denied the claim in 2009, and it was then denied on appeal in 2010, and again thereafter. On March 31, 2011, the claimants acknowledged to the CRT that "'no more avenues of appeal are available [for the gold claim] via EPCAP.'"

The CRT eventually received much of the documentation relating to the EPCAP claim, but not all the underlying documentation referred to in the EPCAP assessments. For example, the claimants appeared to have provided EPCAP with the documentation they received from the Swiss bank regarding the release of the 4 bars of gold to Antonia (as discussed below). On the basis of this documentation, the claimants dropped their claim at the CRT to the 4 bars of gold held at the Swiss bank, but continued to seek the remaining 9 bars held at the UK institution.

Second, in November 2006, three months after the claimants filed their appeal of the CRT's "No Match Letter," they instituted litigation before Judge I. Leo Glasser in the Eastern District of New York against the French Bank, the Swiss bank, and others. This proceeding was wholly separate from the Swiss Banks Holocaust Settlement and the CRT process supervised in the Eastern District of New York by Judge Korman.

In the case before Judge Glasser, the claimants requested recovery of the gold bars allegedly unreturned from the Holocaust era, or in the alternative, the value of the bars. In response, the Swiss bank produced evidence demonstrating conclusively that the four gold bars had been returned to the Hatvanys: the documentation regarding the release to Antonia of the 4 bars of gold it held in account 637 in London. This included the June 7, 1948 letter from the French Bank to the Swiss bank, in which the French Bank started the procedure of releasing the gold to the free disposition of Antonia Hatvany. This letter included a copy of Antonia's non-enemy declaration, as certified by the British Consul in New York, which constituted her application for the de-blocking of all the account 637 assets held in London, including those held at the Swiss bank. On June 10, 1948, the Swiss bank responded to the French Bank. The Swiss bank confirmed that it had received and understood the instructions regarding the disposition of the 4 bars of gold, once they were released. On July 8, the Swiss bank confirmed that the gold had been put at Antonia's disposition, as instructed.

As a result of the documents produced during discovery, the claimants voluntarily dismissed with prejudice their lawsuit against the Swiss bank, and dropped their claims against the other banks. Judge Glasser entered an order of dismissal on November 15, 2007. The CRT, having become aware of this litigation, requested and obtained the documentation from the Swiss bank.

The claimants then amplified their original claim before the CRT, which was to the London-held assets in account 637, to include assets held in the account through 1980. This amplification was accompanied by an extensive set of bank account statements, requiring the CRT to substantially expand the scope of its inquiry. The securities placed in issue by the claimants had been contained in an account that was closed in December 1980.

After analyzing the extensive documentation, including the case files for the various proceedings before Judge Glasser and EPCAP, the CRT determined that the account appeared to have been closed by the heir of one of Fanny's four children: Bertalan's son, József. The claimants had ignored Bertalan's existence, and therefore did not acknowledge that there was another Hatvany heir, József. They queried in a May 4, 2009 letter to CRT Special Master

Bradfield: "Who withdrew these funds? Who withdrew all the funds so that the account was empty and closed on December 22, 1980? How these proceeds were removed is what puzzles us." In an August 20, 2009 letter to the CRT, the claimants reiterated: "We do not understand how it is possible that the Account was closed in 1981. All the potential inheritors of the account were long dead." In a June 23, 2010 letter to the CRT, the claimants added: "The problem with these statements from the banks [that eventually were provided after the CRT's repeated request for a complete set of records] is that the Account was closed after all the Hatvany family members that had access to the Account had died. Additionally and astoundingly, there was no record of who closed the account."[148]

In analyzing the available documentation, the CRT found that account 637 was actively managed during the war and throughout the post-war period, as demonstrated by voluminous portfolio statements. Specifically, Bertalan had access to the account, with periodic payments made to him during the war, while he resided in Switzerland. There was evidence that he was involved in its management (via the Comptoir Financier) after the war as well. For example, a January 17, 1963 order from the Comptoir Financier to the French bank instructed the latter to buy nine shares of a communal investment fund, with the notation that the shareholder was a foreign resident, and with the hand-written notation "H.B." — the initials of Bertalan Hatvany (in the European style of placing the last name first). Further, in 1971, there was a "significant capital injection," increasing the account's value, which would not have happened "without active management on the part of the actual owner." Finally, the account's closure came in December 1980, five months after Bertalan's death. The most plausible explanation was that Bertalan's heir, József, after selling the assets in the account, withdrew the cash proceeds in December 1980, and then closed the account. In its decision denying the claim, following the claimants' appeal, the CRT cited extensive precedent and noted that no awards had been issued in the face of such obvious post-war management of the account by an owner or heir.

On appeal, the CRT reaffirmed its denial of the claim on the basis of several factors.

First, with respect to the original claim for the assets in account 637 held in the name of the French Bank at the Swiss Bank and another institution in London, there was clear evidence from documentation provided by the successor of the parent bank of the Swiss bank that the gold held at the Swiss Bank had been released to Antonia Hatvany in July 1948. Although this documentation dealt with the gold at the Swiss bank only, the documentary evidence that the release of the assets at the Swiss bank was promptly effected by the French Bank and the Swiss bank following Antonia's application for their release, together with the fact that the application specified all the assets held for the account in London, indicated that all of these assets were released in the same way.

[148] Because of the claimants' submission of documents in piecemeal and sometimes incomplete fashion, on November 5, 2010, the Court ordered the claimants to affirmatively represent that they had provided the CRT with all documents in their possession related to the claimed assets.

This conclusion was further supported by the claimants' admission that the securities may have been released to Antonia, and by the fact that the assets held in London in account 637 were mentioned only once more after July 1948 in the subsequent voluminous correspondence about the release of assets, both in London and elsewhere. This was when the Hatvany's U.S. lawyer, Hans Frank, writing to Andrew Hatvany on March 12, 1952 about the finalization of the BSC matter, said with respect to those applicants in the BSC matter (the family's shares of the British Sugar Corporation that had been seized) who had other assets in the United Kingdom: "…[S]ince apparently these applicants succeeded by other methods to gain control over such assets there is additional reason why our services can be dispensed with."

Second, with respect to account C.2.637/052637 N at the French Bank, the claimants asserted that it was the continuation of account 637, and that the assets had never been returned to the family. The CRT concluded that the evidence did not support this assertion, based upon the true nature of the family relationships and heirs. The claimants had submitted a family tree with their initial claim, which indicated that Lili and Antonia Hatvany were Fanny Hatvany's and her husband's only children, that Antonia had no children, and that Lili had one daughter, Mariella, who in turn had two sons, the claimants, who were half -brothers. However, in July 2006, the claimants submitted additional documentation, including a document that indicated that Fanny Hatvany and her husband actually had four children: Lili, Antonia, Andrew and Bertalan Hatvany, all of whom were involved in the Hatvany's post-war efforts to regain control of the family's assets. The claimants thereafter did not provide consistent information about the Hatvany heirs, and never indicated that Bertalan had heirs. He did, however, have a son, József. The various trust documents and wills drawn up to facilitate the release of account 637 to the Hatvanys affirmed that while Fanny had the right to the income generated by these assets, the four siblings, or their heirs, retained the right to the capital in equal shares. Thus, Bertalan, and after his death József, shared in the ownership of account 637, and in the successor account, C.2.637/052637 N.

With regard to who controlled the account, the CRT found that it was managed by one or several Hatvany family members, who gave instructions to the Comptoir Financier. That entity, in turn, relayed these instructions to the French Bank. Bertalan had access to the account and probably had full control of it, as supported by the fact that account 637 was no longer mentioned after 1948.

With regard to the closing of the account, the CRT found that there was clear evidence of the Hatvanys' management of the account after the war. The assertion that the French Bank would have closed the account for its own benefit contradicted the relationship of trust that demonstrably existed between the Hatvanys, the family and the Bank in the post-war period. The CRT further noted that at the time the account was closed, Fanny, Andrew, Lili and Bertalan all had died, but Mariella (the claimants' mother) and József, Bertalan's son, were alive. With the closure of the account coming about five months after Bertalan's death, it most likely had been closed by József.

The claimants appealed again, arguing, among other things, that the CRT had relied too extensively upon EPCAP's rejection of the Hatvany heirs' claim, which the claimants contended had been wrongly decided. The Court rejected that argument, finding that the CRT's decision was "clearly correct and in accord with … CRT precedent," and that the claimants' argument relating to subsequent proceedings in the EPCAP case was "frivolous and disingenuous."

ii. In re Accounts of Siegfried Levy, Sigfried Levy, Paula Levi and Schuhkonzern Aktiengesellschaft Zürich

The Court approved a Certified Denial (the "denial") with regard to published accounts held by Siegfried Levy, Sigfried Levy, and Paula Levi, and unpublished Swiss bank accounts held by Schuhkonzern Aktiengesellschaft Zürich. With regard to accounts held by Siegfried Levy, Sigfried Levy and Paula Levi, the CRT concluded that although the claimants, who were related to each other, also were related to persons named Siegfried Levi and Paula Levi, they did not establish their relationship to the account owners, who had the same or substantially similar name as the claimants' relatives. The primary focus of the denial concerned two custody accounts and one demand deposit account held by claimants' relative, Siegfried Levi, at the Zurich branch of the Bank.

The CRT explained that Siegfried Levi was the sole owner of Schuhfabrik Luwal Aktiengesellschaft ("Luwal"), a shoe manufacturing company located in Luckenwalde, Germany. Luwal was capitalized at 600,000.00 Reichsmark ("RM"), consisting of RM 10,000 in preferred shares held by Siegfried Levi, and RM 590,000 in common shares held by Schuhkonzern, a Swiss joint stock company that was owned entirely by Siegfried Levi. The CRT explained that Schuhkonzern held three Swiss bank accounts, two custody accounts and one demand deposit account, all of which were opened in 1928. One custody account was closed on December 31, 1936 and the other custody account and related demand deposit account were closed on March 2, 1938.

As support for their claim, a legal representative of some of the claimants submitted a partial decision of the Brandenburg Regional Authority for Settlement of Unresolved Property Issues (Landesamt zur Regelung offener Vermögensfragen Brandenburg, the "Landesamt"), dated November 19, 1998 (the "1998 Partial Decision") concerning claims to assets that had belonged to Luwal. The 1998 Partial Decision was issued upon application by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (the "Claims Conference"). The Partial Decision explained that as of January 1, 1936, all of Luwal's 10,000 preferred shares, as well as the 590,000 common shares, were in the sole possession of Siegfried Levi. The common shares were held by a Swiss holding company, Schuh-Konzern AG-Zürich, which were acquired by Siegfried Levi, in exchange for his claim on the Schuhkonzern in the amount of SF 381,856.95.

As Siegfried Levi owned all of Luwal's outstanding shares, the Nazi regime considered Luwal to be a 100 percent Jewish-owned company. Luwal was aryanized in 1938, resulting in acquisition of the 10,000 preferred Luwal shares and 390,000 common shares by Theodor Loeben of Luckenwalde; and of the remaining 200,000 common shares by Dr. Albert Mülhaus of Hanover.

According to the Partial Decision, on June 12, 1946, Luwal, which was located in the former German Democratic Republic (East Germany), was nationalized without compensation. Subsequently, in 1953, as part of the West German post-war restitution program, settlements relating to the Luwal shares were reached between Siegfried Levi and the aryanizers of Luwal. As a result, Siegfried Levi received 20,000 Deutsche Mark ("DM") from Theodor Loeben and DM 10,000 from Dr. Albert Mülhaus. The total DM 30,000 received by Siegfried Levi represented RM 300,000. The Partial Decision noted that Siegfried Levi's heirs had brought an additional equalization proceeding in Germany, resulting in a November 16, 1976 decision holding that Siegfried had suffered damages in the amount of RM 1,290,000 (of which he had already received the equivalent of RM 300,000) through the forced sale of Luwal.

Following the Partial Decision, German restitution authorities rendered seven additional decisions for real estate and other assets of Luwal, resulting in payment to the Claims Conference, as legal successor to unclaimed Jewish assets in the former East Germany, of 2,578,117.22 Euros. Of that amount, the claimants received 2,039,234.03 Euros (after deduction of fees by the Claims Conference). According to archival records obtained by the CRT, Siegfried Levi also secured the return of additional real estate and compensation for or restitution of other assets after the Second World War. Siegfried's widow and sole heir obtained additional compensation for flight tax and atonement tax that had been assessed against her and her husband.

Schuhkonzern held three Swiss bank accounts: two custody accounts and one demand deposit account. With regard to the custody account closed in 1936, the bank's records showed that the account held a declaration of guarantee extended by Siegfried Levi for a line of credit in the amount of approximately SF 300.000 issued by the bank to Schuhkonzern. There was no evidence that the account contained any assets. According to a report dated August 23, 1937, the declaration of guarantee was returned to the company in a letter dated January 14, 1937, after the bank had recovered the credit. The CRT concluded that since the account contained only the declaration of guarantee, it was properly closed on December 31, 1936 after the outstanding credit was recovered, and the declaration of guarantee was returned shortly thereafter, the account was not eligible for an award.

With regard to the custody account and related demand deposit account closed in 1938, the CRT concluded that the custody account held the RM 590,000 (nominal value) in Luwal common shares, the dividend payments from which were received by the demand deposit account. The CRT explained that the Luwal shares had been pledged as security to the bank for a debt in the approximate amount of SF 42,000.00 owed to the bank by Schuhkonzern. Upon payment of the debt, Schuhkonzern agreed to transfer the shares to an account at a German bank in the name of Siegfried Levi. According to a report dated March 25, 1938 of the Luwal board, the shares had been delivered to an account at the Deutsche Bank und Diskonto-Gesellschaft in Stuttgart. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that the Luwal shares, which comprised the sole asset of value in the custody account, along with the related demand deposit account, were transferred to an account in Germany under Siegfried Levi's name, and subsequently closed.

With regard to the value of the Luwal shares and any dividends that may have accumulated in the demand deposit account, after the Second World War, Siegfried Levi and his heirs pursued various claims for which, as described in the 1998 Partial Decision, restitution of or compensation for the assets was received. The CRT determined that Siegfried Levi and/or his heirs were fully compensated for the value of the Luwal shares and any related dividends. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that no award was appropriate for the accounts at issue.

The claimants appealed with regard to the custody account that held common shares of Luwal worth RM 590,000, and the related demand deposit account. In an Order denying the appeal (the "Order"), the Court explained that the primary grounds for the appeal were that the CRT supposedly had not considered the findings of the Landesamt that the Schuhkonzern shares were transferred to a blocked account, and therefore confiscated by Nazi authorities; the CRT did not consider the dividends that accrued on the Schuhkonzern shares and were then deposited in the claimed demand deposit account; and the amount in Euros received by the claimants from Germany in connection with the seven payments did not represent the full amount to which they were entitled, as an additional 538,883.19 Euros was kept by the Claims Conference. In addition, the appeal included a claim that the CRT wrongfully stated that the Levi family had been fully compensated, and that the claim should not have been denied simply because restitution had been received for the family's losses in Germany.[149]

On appeal, the Court observed that the CRT had acknowledged the Nazis' confiscation of the Luwal shares contained in the custody account. However, the CRT did not recommend an award because the account owner and his heirs already had received restitution for the value of the assets in the custody account and related demand deposit account. The Court noted that the post-War restitution proceedings, described in the 1998 Partial Decision, indicated that the amount of restitution received based on the 1998 Partial Decision (RM 50,423,590) had exceeded the value of the Luwal shares (RM 1,290,000) that had not been previously restituted or paid to Siegfried Levi (RM 750,000). The Court further noted that, with regard to any dividends deposited in the demand deposit account, there was no evidence that any dividends that were distributed were ever repatriated to the Reich and confiscated by Nazi authorities.[150]

The Court then discussed the 538,883.19 Euros received by the Claims Conference in connection with compensation for the Luwal assets, to which the claimants asserted a claim of entitlement. The Court noted that under the Claims Conference's Goodwill Fund established in 1994, former Jewish owners (and their heirs) of property that had been nationalized in the former East Germany, and who had missed the German filing deadlines, could apply for payments that the German restitution authorities had awarded to the Claims Conference as legal successor to unclaimed Jewish assets in the former East Germany. Under the relevant payment program, eligible applicants (like the claimants) were able to receive approximately 80 percent of any amount awarded to the Claims Conference. The Court noted that without the services rendered by the Claims Conference, the claimants would not have had a restitution payment at all.[151]

Finally, the Court characterized as frivolous the claimants' assertion that their claim should not have been denied because they had received compensation for their family's losses in Germany. The Court noted that in all cases, the CRT evaluated the disposition of the accounts at issue to determine who had received the proceeds. If an account owner received account proceeds in full — either at the time of closing or later during restitution proceedings — then no award from the Settlement Fund was appropriate. If the account owner had received partial restitution, then that amount was deducted from the total amount awarded. Accordingly, as the claimants previously had received full restitution of Luwal shares and any dividends that may have accrued, the Court upheld the CRT's decision and concluded that no further award was appropriate.

B. APPEALS FROM THE CONCLUSION THAT NO DOCUMENTATION SUPPORTED THE EXISTENCE OF AN ACCOUNT

i. In re Account of Mihail Atias (SF 62,500.00)

The account owner was born in 1885 in Romania. He resided with his wife in Bucharest, where he was a banker with the Romanian Credit Bank. The claimant was the account owner's son. He stated that during World War II, a non-Jewish man named Mihail Stefanescu, a friend and banking client associated with the firm Grivita, helped his father hide assets from the Gestapo and Romanian authorities. The account owner and his wife emigrated to Israel in 1962.

In its initial decision, the CRT advised the claimant that no accounts in the name of the account owner had been located in the AHD. The claimant therefore received a "No Match Letter." On appeal to the CRT Special Master, the claimant "submitted an extract from the United States' Congressional Record, which contains 'a list of balances held by [the Custodian] for nationals who are also residents of Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Croatia, Moravia, Slovakia, France, Holland, and Denmark.' On this list, the name Mihail Arias of Bucharest, Romania, appears beside an account balance of 5,000.00 Swiss Francs." The new document constituted facially reliable evidence that a Swiss account had existed during the relevant period, and the CRT Special Master remanded the decision to the CRT for further review.

On remand, the CRT initially observed that the "custodian" with whom Mihail Atias' assets had been deposited was an international shipping inspection firm based in Geneva. The Custodian's founder, Jacques Salmanowitz, "who was Jewish, reportedly helped to secure the personal safety as well as the assets of many Victims of Nazi Persecution." The CRT explained that the "evidence of the account in this case is an extract from the Congressional Record containing a statement by former United States Senator Alfonse D'Amato and a report by the American Legation in Bern, Switzerland, originally filed on 12 July 1945 in the course of 'Operation Safe Haven,' which was an American investigation conducted immediately after the Second World War to locate and identify Nazi assets and looted assets in Europe (the 'Safe Haven report'). Senator D'Amato stated that his staff discovered the Safe Haven report among declassified US military intelligence documents in the course of 'an inquiry into the return, by Swiss banks, of assets deposited by European Jews and others in the years preceding the Holocaust.'" The Safe Haven report included a list of 182 account owners and balances held by the Custodian, including the SF 5,000 balance shown as held on behalf of Mihail Atias.

Conducting further research into the Safe Haven accounts, the CRT learned that, in response to a 1996 letter from Senator D'Amato, the Swiss Custodian had commissioned an audit. This audit concluded that "all but four of the accounts on the Safe Haven list had already been claimed by their owners or heirs, and all but two of the account owners had survived the War." Due to confidentiality requirements, the Custodian withheld the names of the four unclaimed account owners.

In awarding the account, the CRT observed that although all but four of the 182 accounts were said to have been returned to their owners, the audit "was compiled in 1996, many years after the death of the Claimant's father (1970) and mother (1987). Moreover, in the time between the deaths of the Claimant's parents and the compilation of the report, the account could not have been claimed, because the Claimant himself was not aware that the account existed with the Custodian until he saw it referenced in the Congressional Record in 1996. In support of this likelihood, the CRT notes that, as detailed above, the Claimant stated that his attempts to contact the Custodian regarding this account were unsuccessful, even though the assets were held in his name. Based on these factors, the CRT is unable to rule out the possibility that the Claimant's account is among the four unclaimed accounts discovered in 1996." In the absence of plausible evidence to the contrary, it was presumed that the heirs had not received the proceeds of the account. The CRT awarded the account based upon the SF 5,000 reported in the Safe Haven report, increased by the 12.5 multiplier.

ii. In re Accounts of Lazar Bujaker (award of SF 2,837,600.00 on appeal)

Lazar Bujaker was born in 1897 in Romania. He was a clock and jewelry dealer in Bucharest. According to his great-nephew, the claimant, he traveled to Zurich frequently on business. Lazar Bujaker was murdered on January 23, 1941 by the Romanian Iron Guard.[152]

After the end of World War II, the claimant's father, Igor Alexander Bujaker, unsuccessfully attempted to retrieve his uncle Lazar Bujaker's assets deposited in Switzerland. On August 16, 1947, the family was advised by its representative that he had inquired with Swiss banks. He was apprised by one bank ("Bank 1") that a numbered account had existed until the end of 1945, "at which time it was closed 'when all foreign and German accounts were seized.'" The representative further advised that there was another account at "Bank 2." This bank had acknowledged the account, but refused to open it or hand over its contents. The representative "encouraged Igor Alexander Bujaker to contact a Swiss attorney named Dr. M. Moll, and indicated that a journey to Zurich would be worth the effort since 'an amount of 220,000.00 Swiss Francs' was at issue."

In 1962, Igor Alexander Bujaker contacted a lawyer, Mr. Jacober. He stated in a September 1, 1962 letter that he had accompanied his uncle to Zurich in October and November 1940, when Lazar Bujaker had opened a safe deposit box at Bank 2 ending in the numbers "224." He described what he remembered to be the contents of the safe deposit box, as well as a visit to a second bank (Bank 1), which he stated was "close to the main railway station in Zurich." This 1962 letter explained that in 1959, the Romanian authorities had indicted Igor Alexander Bujaker for holding Swiss accounts.

The CRT determined, based upon the claimant's initial submission, that the AHD did not contain a record of any Swiss accounts belonging to any Bujaker family members, including Lazar Bujaker and Igor Alexander Bujaker. The claimant received a "No Match Letter" indicating that his claim had not matched to any accounts reported by the Swiss banks. The claimant subsequently supplemented his claim with additional documents. One such document, which the claimant stated he had obtained from the Romanian archives in July 2006 (during the time that his claim was pending with the CRT), was a copy of "an official indictment issued against his father by the Romanian government in 1959." As described by the CRT Special Master on appeal, the indictment "indicates that Igor Alexander Bujaker 'illegally' held at the Banks in Switzerland two accounts, one at Bank 1 numbered 43-5648 containing 10,000 United States Dollars and SFr 169,000.00, and a safe deposit box account, numbered 2249, held at Bank 2 containing watches and jewelry that were valued at SFr. 12,000.00. The indictment indicates that the Romanian government obtained the information pertaining to the accounts from 'banking documents in German' and 'other mail' as well as from an heir certificate used in December 1947, numbered 2457, with respect to the appellant's father, which indicated that Igor Alexander Bujaker was the holder and heir of the deposits at issue as a result of the death of the original owner. The indictment further states that by holding assets abroad, the appellant's father was 'undermining' the national economy." The claimant also provided the CRT with a document issued by the Romanian "State Security Council dated 4 March 1969, which confirms that Igor Bujaker was 'deprived of freedom through an administrative act' from 26 September 1959 until 16 January 1960."

Based upon the new evidence submitted on appeal, the claimant was awarded his great-uncle's accounts. The CRT Special Master's appellate decision observed that Lazar Bujaker was killed in 1941 and that for years after, the claimant's father, Igor Alexander Bujaker, had tried to recover the accounts. The Special Master noted that although in 1947, Bank 1 had made reference to the 1945 "seizure" of Lazar Bujaker's account, implying that the account might have been frozen rather than closed, "there is no evidence that the account at issue was frozen, and a statement by Bank 1 with respect to the disposition of the account cannot be given decisive weight considering that the Swiss banks adopted a policy of not providing information, or providing inaccurate and misleading information, to victims of Nazi persecution seeking to access accounts after the Second World War."

The CRT Special Master further observed that the "continued deposit recovery efforts of [Igor Alexander Bujaker] were the apparent cause of his indictment in 1959 on suspicion of holding accounts in a Swiss bank," when his "letter to the Swiss counsel in Bucharest concerning the recovery of his Swiss accounts" might have been "leaked to the Romanian authorities." The Special Master also observed that in her last will and testament of April 1, 1984, Igor Alexander Bujaker's wife (the claimant's mother) left to her son "two accounts held at Bank 1 and Bank 2 valued at SF 223,950.00 as of 1940 that her husband … inherited from his uncle, Lazar Bujaker," indicating that the heirs never had received the proceeds of these accounts.

As further evidence that the heirs had not received the proceeds, Special Master Bradfield also made note of the "agreement between Switzerland and Romania, whereby unclaimed assets in Swiss banks of Romanian citizens were to be transferred to the Romanian government as part of a deal in which compensation would be paid by the Romanian authorities for Swiss property that had been nationalized by Romania's communist regime. As noted previously, Swiss banks froze Romanian assets in 1948 pursuant to a Decree of the Swiss Federal Council.[153] Romanian accounts were unfrozen in October 1959. Approximately one year later, in August 1961, Switzerland and Romania entered into an informal agreement, modeled after the formal agreements between the Swiss government and the governments of Poland and Hungary."

Based on the fact that the value of the two accounts was set forth in "various contemporary and independent sources" dating from shortly after the account owner's death, the Special Master applied the 12.5 multiplier, awarding SF 2,837,600.00.

iii. In re Accounts of Mozes Fleischmann, Mirjam Fleischmann, Olga Fleischmann and Juliska Veber[154]

Mozes Fleischmann was born in 1895 in Budapest. He was married to Mirjam Fleischmann, née Veber (Weber), who was born in 1899 in Zalaegerszeg, Hungary. The Fleischmanns were the claimant's parents. Mozes Fleischmann had a sister, Olga Fleischmann, the claimant's aunt, who was born in 1888 in Vienna. Another aunt, Juliska Veber, was born in 1903 in Hungary. The claimant sought to recover Swiss bank accounts for all four relatives.

According to the claimant, his father, Mozes Fleischmann, was an important businessman in the Hungarian wine industry, owning several vineyards, wine cellars and a distribution company. In 1944, the family was moved to the International Ghetto, a group of 30 buildings rented by the Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, intended to protect Hungarian Jews from Nazi persecution. The family obtained Schutzpasses.[155] However, the claimant's parents nevertheless were captured and murdered in Budapest in November 1944. The claimant's aunts, Olga Fleischmann and Juliska Veber, both were killed in Auschwitz.

In support of his claim, the claimant submitted a photocopy of a small handwritten note which the claimant stated had been given to him by his father in 1944. The claimant stated that the note indicated the name of a Swiss bank, as well as information relating to three accounts of unknown type held in Zurich: one opened by his parents in 1938, containing $965,000; one opened by his father and his sister in 1940, containing $985,000; and one opened by his mother and her sister in 1940, containing $890,000, for a total of $2,840,000. The note also stated (in Hungarian): "One day all this will be yours! Daddy." The claimant stated that based upon the [155] "The Schutzpass was a document that bore the official stamp of the Swiss Legation and stated that the person possessing the Schutzpass had a valid passport and was part of a Swiss emigration collective. It did not grant its holder permission to enter Switzerland. It provided targets of Nazi persecution in Hungary a degree of protection from Hungarian government authorities who were allied with Nazi Germany. The Swiss Legation in Budapest issued several thousand Schutzpasses to individuals between 1942 and 1945." See, e.g., Report and Recommendations of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Inc. for the Twenty-first Group of Claims in In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation (Swiss Banks) - Refugee Class (January 6, 2004), at 3.

note, he attempted, but failed, to retrieve the proceeds of the accounts in Switzerland in 1955 and 1977.

Although the CRT searched both the Accounts History Database (AHD) and the Total Accounts Database (TAD), no accounts were located belonging to the claimant's relatives. The CRT further determined that the claimant's note was not facially reliable evidence upon which to base an award. It did not fall into any of the categories of documentation upon which the CRT relied in the absence of Swiss bank files; e.g., 1938 Census or other archival records; documents obtained by the HCPO; documents submitted to an official government agency; and official letterhead indicating a connection to a Swiss bank.

On appeal, the claimant contested the CRT's conclusion that there was no documentation to support the existence of a Swiss bank account. He provided additional information attesting to his family's wealth; his father's involvement in the Hungarian wine industry (offering an affidavit in which the attestor called the claimant's father a "wine king"); and his father's connection to the Hungarian Royal Court and to the Alliance of Jewish Communities of Hungary. With respect to the note, the claimant stated that he was present when his father wrote it shortly before he perished, and that thereafter, he carried the note around his neck in a miniature Tehilim (prayer book) until the end of his military service in Israel in 1955. The claimant also provided results of testing by persons who had been hired to authenticate the note.

Special Master Bradfield authorized additional testing to be performed to determine "whether it is possible to conclude that the Note is genuine and dates from the Relevant Period." As described in the decision on appeal:

> [T]he Note was subjected to date-testing by several leading experts in the field: Jane Klinger, Chief Conservator of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum; Joseph G. Barabe of McCrone Associates, who turned to Walter J. Rantanen of Integrated Paper Services, Inc. for additional analysis; and Greg Hodgins of the University of Arizona. None of these experts has been able to pinpoint a year of manufacture for the paper on which the text of the Note is written, with all acknowledging that it is possible and even likely, that the paper was manufactured after the conclusion of the Second World War.

Furthermore, the note had been written in pencil, "which cannot be date-tested." In addition, one of the experts, Mr. Rantanen, had "indicated in a report prepared for Appellant in June 2006 that the fibers in the Note were consistent with those present during the Relevant Period," but later concluded in an October 2007 report to the Special Master "that the Note was likely manufactured after the Second World War."

Special Master Bradfield also observed that although the claimant had provided "present-day" affidavits on appeal from individuals who corroborated the statement that the family had been wealthy and extensively involved in the Hungarian wine industry, the claimant had not provided contemporaneous (i.e. Holocaust-era) evidence to that effect, such as Hungarian property records or newspaper excerpts from the 1930s or 1940s. On the other hand, there was contemporaneous evidence demonstrating that in 1925, the claimant's relative, Mozes Fleischmann, had a very different profession: he was Deputy Chairman of the Komet Trading Company, a Hungarian distributor of German sewing machines. Other documents indicated that Mozes Fleischmann was an engineer and the owner of the firm Miklos Fleischmann Dipl. Mechanical Engineer, which had a license to import machines used in the sewing and textile industries.

Special Master Bradfield also obtained the results of research that he had requested of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Its chief Hungarian archivist, Ferenc Katona, provided information which "indicates that Appellant's father was a certified mechanical engineer, and a 'dealer of technical gadgets' and manufacturer of passementerie, an ornament worn with traditional Hungarian clothing." The decision on appeal observed that it is "important to note that Appellant did not identify his father's involvement in the distribution of sewing machines until prompted to submit information demonstrating his father's role in the Hungarian wine industry, which has not been provided. It is also important to note that while there was a Fleischmann family that figured prominently in the Hungarian wine industry, this family does not appear to have been related to Appellant."

The decision on appeal noted that the claimant had been offered "both substantial time and assistance in his effort to submit information demonstrating that his father was a Hungarian wine mogul, as claimed." However, the evidence did not support the claimant's assertion.

Rather, it demonstrated that his father was involved in a different field, and one which did not generate "a profit sufficient to provide for the level of wealth indicated on the Note." Based upon those facts, and given that the Note could not be traced to the Holocaust era, the appeal was denied.

The appellant then sought review by the Court, which confirmed that the appeal had been appropriately denied. The Court observed that Special Master Bradfield had undertaken "extensive and comprehensive efforts … to authenticate the note" the appellant had provided but that the results were inconclusive.[156] However, even if the CRT Special Master had determined the note to be authentic and the Appellant's father to have been involved with the Hungarian wine industry, "this note in itself is insufficient to justify an award." The note, "even if authentic, remains an assertion by the Appellant's father regarding the existence of Swiss bank accounts, for which no collaborating evidence has been found."[157] However, because the claim was "determined to contain sufficient information to warrant a Plausible Undocumented Award," the Appellant was "entitled to receive a total payment of U.S. $7,250 for this PUA."[158]

The claimants thereafter appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Thereafter, the appellants filed a stipulation of dismissal with prejudice, thus bringing the case to its final conclusion.

C. APPEALS CHALLENGING THE AMOUNT OF THE AWARD

i. In re Accounts of the Estate of Sophie Cohen, and Accounts of Alexander Oppler, Berthold Oppler, and Sigmund Oppler (SF 341,551.63)

The Court approved a CRT award with regard to unpublished accounts held by the Estate of Sophie Cohen (the "Estate") at certain Swiss Banks Bank I, Bank II, Bank III, and Bank IV.

The award also addressed unpublished accounts held by brothers Alexander Oppler, Berthold Oppler and Sigmund Oppler (the "Oppler Brothers") at Bank I. The Estate held one custody account and one demand deposit account at each of the Banks (for a total of eight accounts held by the Estate). Alexander, Berthold and Sigmund Oppler each held one custody account and one demand deposit account at Bank I. Thus, the Oppler brothers owned a total of six accounts.

The award was for SF 239,751.63, which represented accounts held by account owners Alexander Oppler and Sigmund Oppler at Bank 1. One of the claimants was a grandchild of Alexander Oppler and the other claimant was the grandchild of Sigmund Oppler. The award noted that the CRT previously had awarded the claimants the proceeds of Berthold Oppler's accounts, in a decision approved by the Court on June 3, 2003. The claimants appealed the conclusion that none of the accounts held by the Estate of Sophie Cohen at Bank 1, Bank 2, Bank 3 or Bank 4 were eligible for an award.

The award explained that Sophie Cohen, who was Jewish and resided in Germany, had inherited a large estate worth several million Reichsmark ("RM"). Upon her death on May 13, 1933, her will (the "Will") directed that her three cousins, the Oppler brothers, were to be the principal (residuary) beneficiaries of her Estate. Alexander Oppler died in 1937; Berthold Oppler committed suicide in 1943[159]; and Sigmund Oppler fled to Amsterdam in 1939, where he and his wife, Lilli, committed suicide in 1942. According to the Will, the three Oppler Brothers each were entitled to receive a minimum of RM 250,000.00.

Sophie Cohen was very wealthy. Upon the 1930 death of her mother, American-born Ida Kuhn (of the Kuhn banking family), Sophie Cohen's share in her mother's estate, which included residues of Sophie's father's and grandfather's estates, was valued at over RM 1 million. That inheritance still was not fully settled at the time of Sophie's death, due to disputes with the tax authorities over the amount of estate tax due on her father's and grandfather's estates.

[159] "Berthold Oppler was born in 1871. Prior to WWII he lived in Muenchen, Germany. Berthold was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from Germany found in Gedenkbuch - Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933-1945, Bundesarchiv (German National Archives), Koblenz 1986." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=3835421&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015).

Accordingly, Sophie Cohen's share of these still-undistributed assets, along with the associated estate tax liability, were rolled into her own Estate, valued at RM 3,457,749.84 at the time of her death. Of the total value of the Estate as of Sophie Cohen's death, RM 3,256,955.26 was in financial assets, the bulk of which (RM 2,902,891.46, augmented by distributions from the Ida Cohen estate and interest and stock dividends to RM 3,341,891.33) were foreign currency-denominated securities held outside the Reich in Swiss and Dutch banks. The Estate held a portion of the foreign currency denominated assets in Switzerland, the proceeds from the sale of which (following the sale of most of the foreign security portfolio by the Estate's Executors) totaled RM 856,121.66 (SF 1,054,726.70). The proceeds from the Swiss-held assets thus accounted for just over one-third of the proceeds of virtually all the foreign currency denominated securities held by the Estate.

The award explained that the Estate's Executors (Sophie Cohen's banker Robert Steger, her sister Emilie (Mimi) Borchardt and her cousin Sigmund Oppler) were concerned about preserving the Estate's value, particularly in light of the devaluation of the U.S. Dollar. Accordingly, the Executors decided to convert the Estate's Swiss-held U.S. Dollar assets into Swiss Francs. While such a decision also was consistent with foreign exchange regulations then in place ("Anbietungs"), the Anbietungs requirement — which at the time the assets were sold were not confiscatory — were not the reason the Executors sold the Swiss-held assets. Part of the Swiss Franc proceeds would be used to cover the estate tax liability of the Oppler Brothers (the three main heirs of the Estate), via transfer of the Swiss Francs to the Reichsbank and receipt by the Estate of the RM counter value. This process was in keeping with the then-prevailing Anbeitungs requirements for payment of the Estate liabilities. The award noted that at the time the Estate Executors sold the securities and transferred the proceeds to the Reichsbank (for receipt of the RM counter value), the prevailing regulation regarding the inability of residents to retain "newly" acquired foreign currency denominated securities (in this case, the "newly acquired" securities a result of inheritance of the estate) pre-dated the Nazi regime's rise to power. In other words, in this situation, the regulation applied to all residents of the Reich, whether or not they were Jewish, and was not the result of discriminatory Nazi policy.

According to the banks' records and documents obtained from the Heidelberg Archive by the CRT, with the exception of 30 units of 6% Argentinian Rentenbons Compania Hispano-Americana de Electricidad, Madrid 1920 (the "Chade bonds") and a £ 100 7% Deutsche Kali Syndicate bond (the "Kali bond"), the securities held in Sophie Cohen's Swiss custody accounts all were sold between July 1933 and September 1933, at the direction of the Executors. The foreign exchange proceeds were delivered to the Reichsbank. The Chade bonds were the subject of the award with regard to the accounts of Alexander Oppler and Sigmund Oppler (Berthold's account already having been previously awarded to the claimants). The Executors sold the Kali bond on January 12, 1934.

The award cited several examples of proof of receipt by the Estate of the RM counter of the Swiss-held sale proceeds. Documentation contained in the record included interim status statements provided by Robert Steger to the Executors between September 1933 and November 1934, and correspondence of the Executors following Sophie Cohen's death and at the time the securities contained in the Swiss-held portfolio were sold. The record showed that at the time of their meeting in Basel, Switzerland on July 6, 1933, the Executors were concerned with upholding their fiduciary duty to the Estate and legatees, rather than focusing upon discriminatory legislation leveled at the Estate by the Nazis.

The Executors were concerned about the declining value of the US Dollar, which comprised the majority of the Estate's Swiss holdings. The Executors therefore moved to sell off the Swiss-held portfolio to obtain the RM counter value for payment of Estate taxes. Although such a decision was consistent with the Anbeitungs requirements prohibiting retention of foreign-held securities, the Anbeitungs were not a motivating factor in the Executors' decision. The CRT decision noted that the Anbeitungs requirements pre-dated the Reich's ascension to power in 1933 and it prohibited all German residents, whether or not they were Jewish, from retaining foreign-denominated securities acquired after July 1931.

The award concluded that: 1) there was no evidence of discrimination or targeting of the Estate by the Nazi regime; 2) the foreign exchange regulations with which the Executors' decision to sell the Swiss-held assets were compliant were not, at the time of sale, applied in a discriminatory manner toward Jews; 3) the Executors' decision to sell the Swiss-held portfolio was made without regard toward such requirements, prior to any contact with the Reichsbank and with a focus on maximizing the value of the Estate; and 4) the record supported a conclusion that the Estate received the RM counter-value of the proceeds from the sale of the Swiss-held portfolio. Accordingly, the award determined that no payment was appropriate for any of the accounts held at the Banks by the Sophie Cohen Estate.

The claimants appealed, arguing that: 1) the Nazis ordered the transfer of the Estate's Swiss-held assets to the Reichsbank; 2) those assets were consequently delivered by the Estate to the Reichsbank under duress, and subsequently confiscated by the Reich in the period 1933-1934; 3) there were no records "specifically" showing a Sophie Cohen Reichsbank account distribution to the Oppler Brothers; and 4) the Estate's delivery of the assets held in the Swiss portfolio to the Reichsbank in 1933 and 1934 therefore triggered the presumption of Article 28(a) of the CRT Rules, as well as Appendix C, providing for a conclusion that the Estate did not receive the proceeds of the accounts at issue.

On appeal, the claimants did not challenge the award's conclusion that the Estate received from the Reichsbank the RM counter value following the sale of the Estate's foreign currency denominated assets. The claimants disagreed, however, that the Oppler Brothers received amounts to which they were entitled according to the distributions recorded by the Executors of the Estate. The claimants' representative asserted that Robert Steger's distribution reports showed - on paper only - how the Estate's residual liquid assets, after having been credited with the counter value in RM - also on paper only - and used to pay estate taxes and other bequests to foreign legatees, were divided and distributed among the Oppler heirs.

In a denial decision approved by the Court, (the "Appeal Denial"), Special Master Bradfield observed that Sophie Cohen had died on May 13, 1933, three and a half months after the date Hitler became Chancellor. The process of administering the Estate stretched out over the period 1933-1938, when the Nazi financial persecution of the Jews in Germany was in process of full implementation.

In reviewing the appeal, Special Master Bradfield's office (the "SMO") set out five primary issues: 1) did the Estate receive the proceeds of the sale of the Swiss assets; 2) what did the Estate do with the money it received; 3) did the Estate pay the Brothers their share of the Estate; 4) did the Oppler brothers receive the money, if any, disbursed to them by the Estate; and 5) was the tax paid confiscatory? Each of these questions is described in greater detail below.

1. Receipt of the Swiss-held sale proceeds by the Estate

Special Master Bradfield concluded that the available documentation provided at least a partial picture as to the amount that the Estate turned over to the Reichsbank, as well as the RM compensation the Estate received from the Reichsbank in return. As of November 1934, the Estate's Swiss portfolio had been completely liquidated, with the bulk of the portfolio sold in July 1933 immediately following the Executors' July 1933 meeting in Switzerland. It was not until several days after that meeting, by which time the Executors had sold the majority of securities held at Banks 1 and 2, that the Executors were formally informed by their counsel that assets held by the Estate were subject to the Anbietungs requirements. It was not possible to conclude that the Executors sold the securities under duress since those rules applied to all residents of the Reich.

Special Master Bradfield described several documents supporting a conclusion that the Estate received the proceeds of the sale of the Swiss assets. This documentation included correspondence dated August 10, 1933, from Robert Steger (Sophie Cohen's banker, an Executor of the Estate, and a partner in the Estate's bank, Moriz Stiebel Sohne) to the Reichsbank's Main Office in Frankfurt. In that document, Steger reported on behalf of the Executors that as of August 10, 1933, more than RM 1.7 million in foreign exchange had been delivered to the Reichsbank (of which approximately RM 700,000.00 represented the Swiss portfolio at that time). Steger also indicated that his bank, Moriz Stiebel Sohne, had undertaken the transfer to the Reichsbank of the proceeds generated from the sale of Estate assets held outside the Reich, and that his bank had, in turn, received the counter value in RM on behalf of the Estate.

In addition, a letter dated March 25, 1938 from Steger to Hans Eiseck (a legatee) indicated that payment of Eiseck's legacy had been made from the proceeds of foreign currency-denominated assets that had been held by the Estate, which had been offered for purchase by the Reichsbank.

2. Payments Issued by the Estate

Special Master Bradfield upheld the CRT's conclusion that the Estate was able to use all of the value of the foreign exchange assets of the Estate to make Estate-related payments, including payments to the Oppler brothers. Steger's first report in the record was from September 15, 1933, followed by additional reports as of December 11, 1933, April 13, 1934, and November 13, 1934. The record also contained a final report of November 1938. These reports illustrated that the Estate had paid the Oppler Brothers RM 901,468.93, of which Berthold Oppler and Sigmund Oppler received RM 300,489.64, and Alexander Oppler received RM 300,489.65. Of those amounts, each brother had received RM 175,456.68 in securities and the remainder in cash.

3. Payment by the Estate to the Oppler Brothers

Special Master Bradfield explained that correspondence between Steger and the Oppler Brothers supported the conclusion that the Estate issued payments to the Opplers. Steger's reports demonstrated that of the total amount paid to the Oppler brothers (RM 300,489.65 to each), 85% (RM 255,667) was paid in the 14 months from September 15, 1933 to November 13, 1934. The remaining 15% (RM 44,822) was paid in the four years to November 1938. In a letter from Sigmund Oppler to Steger dated September 1, 1933, Sigmund Oppler requested that, with respect to funds about to be distributed, Steger transfer RM 2,000.00 to the account of Ellen Oppler; RM 8,800.00 to the account of Alexander Oppler; and RM 1,200.00 to himself. Steger followed up with letters to Alexander, Berthold and Sigmund Oppler, dated September 4, 1933, informing them that Moritz Stiebel & Sohne had on that date transferred RM 12,000.00 to each brother (with the funds for Alexander distributed according to the instructions described above). The amounts and the timing of the payments match the amounts Steger reported the Brothers had received (i.e., RM 12,000.00 each) as of Steger's interim report of September 15, 1933.

Additional correspondence further supported the CRT's conclusion that the Estate issued payments to the Oppler Brothers, including: 1) a letter dated November 9, 1933, from Steger to Sigmund Oppler, in which Steger attached a letter to the Frankfurter Bank ordering that it transfer RM 50,000.00 6% tax free Reichsloan of 1929 to Sigmund's account at Gebr. Damman, and asked Sigmund to sign and forward the letter. Steger further advised Sigmund that RM 50,000.00 would be transferred from Moritz Stiebel Sohne to Sigmund's account the next day; 2) a letter from Steger to Alexander Oppler dated November 20, 1933, in which Steger informed Alexander that the Executors that day ordered the Frankfurter Bank to send the RM 50,000.00 tax-free Reichsloan of 1929 to Alexander's account at Bank Wassermann. Steger stated that he would inform Alexander as soon as further distribution of securities has been decided. Additional correspondence in the record indicated that further payments were issued to the Oppler brothers by the Estate.

Special Master Bradfield noted that the record did not contain account statements from the German banks involved in payments issued by the Estate to the Oppler Brothers as residual heirs. The absence of such formal documentation, however, did not justify a presumption that the Estate failed to issue payments to the Oppler Brothers, or that the Oppler Brothers in turn failed to receive payments from the Estate. The record of the five reports prepared by Steger in the ordinary course of fulfilling his role as an Executor of the Estate described in detail the payments made by the Estate to the Oppler Brothers, as did various correspondence recording the arrangements for payment by the Estate to the Oppler Brothers. These documents constituted a persuasive record verifying that the Estate had the funds to make the described payments to the Oppler Brothers, and that these payments actually resulted in funds being transferred to the Oppler Brothers.

4. Receipt by the Oppler Brothers of funds disbursed to them by the Estate

The appellants asserted that the Oppler Brothers did not receive the full value of their inheritance from the Estate, and that the cash and securities listed in Steger's reports as having been received by the Oppler Brothers originated from Sophie Cohen's German bank accounts. The appellants asserted that none of these payments represented proceeds generated by the sale of the Estate's Swiss portfolio.

Special Master Bradfield concluded that the funds in the Estate for payment to the Oppler Brothers were diminished as a result of losses on sales of the foreign currency denominated assets, amounts paid in expenses and taxes, and specific bequests for specific legatees as directed by Sophie Cohen's Will. Accordingly, the payment to the Oppler Brothers as residual heirs was necessarily smaller than had been anticipated. The record provided no evidence that the Estate-related payments were determined or influenced by interference of the Nazi authorities. There was nothing in the record, covering a period of eight years, reflecting pressure or duress on the Estate, its Executors, or its beneficiaries with respect to the administration of the Estate.

5. Analysis of the type of tax paid by the Estate on behalf of the Oppler Brothers

Having concluded that the Estate received the proceeds in RM equivalent of the Estate accounts in Swiss banks; that the Executors used these funds and other funds in the Estate to administer the Estate, pay its administrative costs and the estate taxes of the legatees and residual heirs, as well as fulfill the bequests specified in the Will; and that the Oppler brothers received the payments made by the Estate, Special Master Bradfield evaluated whether the taxes paid on behalf of the legatees and residual heirs were confiscatory.

The appellants asserted that the estate tax rate applied to the Oppler brothers' share of the Estate was confiscatory. That assertion was based on what the appellants believed was the prevailing inheritance tax rate of 24%, which was assessed on the before-tax legacy of RM 100,000 received by another beneficiary of the Estate. Special Master Bradfield explained that the estate tax was not a flat tax. According to the Estate Tax Law of September 1925 (the "Estate Tax Law"), which applied to the Sophie Cohen Estate, a gross of RM 100,000 to someone considered in "Category V" (not close family) was subject to the 24% tax rate. However, that same tax law provided that the before-tax share of each Oppler brother, which fell into the upper range of the RM 600,000 to 700,000 bracket, was subject to a 37.5% rate.

The Estate tax paid on behalf of the Oppler Brothers was consistent with a graduated inheritance tax scheme that pre-dated the Reich. Thus, it was not possible to conclude that the amount of tax levied on the Oppler Brothers was a result of Nazi confiscatory measures directed at the Oppler Brothers.

The Court agreed with Special Master Bradfield's conclusion that the presumptions of Article 28(a) and Appendix C of the CRT Rules did not apply in this case. Specifically, there was strong evidence that: 1) the Estate received the proceeds of the sale of Sophie Cohen's foreign currency denominated assets held in Swiss banks; 2) the Estate used the proceeds fully and responsibly to administer the Estate, pay its running expenses, pay the estate taxes on the beneficiaries as required by German law, and pay the bequests due to the legatees and residual heirs (including the Oppler Brothers) to the full extent they were authorized to do so under the will of Sophie Cohen; 3) the Oppler Brothers actually received the payments made to them by the Estate; and 4) the taxes paid by the Estate on behalf of the beneficiaries of the Estate were not confiscatory. Accordingly, the appeal as to the amount of the award was denied.

ii. In re Accounts of Alfred Benesch, Else Benesch and Josef Benes (SF 330,363.25)

The original award determined that the appellant and his cousin, ("Claimant A."), had identified the account owners as their relatives, Alfred and Else Benesch. Josef Benes was the appellant's paternal great-grandfather, and Claimant A.'s paternal grandfather. The appellant stated that his father, Josef Benesch, was Jewish. He was born in Vienna, Austria on November 24, 1910. He held a "doctor" title and managed the family's five leather goods stores after the death of Alfred Benesch, appellant's grandfather, whose father was also named Josef Benesch. Claimant A. indicated that her grandfather, Josef Benesch, lived in Czechoslovakia before moving to Vienna, where he died in approximately 1933.

The appellant and his sister each were awarded one-quarter of the accounts held by account owners Else Benesch and Alfred Benesch, while another party represented by the appellant was awarded the remaining one-half of those accounts. Claimant A. received one-half of the account held by Josef Benes, with one-quarter distributed to the represented party and one-eighth each to the appellant and his sister. Alfred Benesch's custody account was awarded at presumptive value, as was Josef Benes's demand deposit account. Else Benesch's account of unknown type was awarded at its recorded value of 603.20 Reichsmark (SF 1,058.50). The total award amount was for SF 194,382.00 (following application of the multiplier).

According to Else Benesch's Nazi-mandated Census of Jewish-owned assets of April 1938, she held an account of unknown type at Bank II with a balance of 603.20 Reichsmark as of April 27, 1938. The award presumed that this account was transferred to the Nazis. The 1938 Census showed that the account of unknown type was closed on April 20, 1943, but did not show when the account was opened, by whom it was closed, or the amount in the account on the date of its closure.

On appeal, the appellant asserted that Josef Benes was his father, rather than his great-grandfather, both of whom had the same name. The appellant stated that his great-grandfather died prior to the Second World War, and that he most likely owned a small business that would not have required a Swiss bank account, whereas his father, Josef Benesch, took over the large, multinational leather-goods company owned by Alfred Benesch. The appellant claimed that it was likely that his father, Josef Benesch, opened a Swiss bank account in connection with his business. Although the appellant's father resided in Vienna, his business was also located in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, where he may have listed a business address when opening a Swiss bank account. The appellant also asserted that the awarded value of account owner Else Benesch's account of unknown type was less than the actual value of that account.

Special Master Bradfield upheld the CRT's conclusion that Josef Benes was the appellant's great-grandfather. The Special Master noted that the bank's records indicated that several accounts held by Josef Benes were opened and closed prior to the Relevant Period. The appellant's father would have been too young to own such accounts at that time, and would not have held the title "General Director," as did Josef Benes. The Special Master also explained that Josef Benes's title, "General Director," was consistent with the title of the appellant's great-grandfather, as indicated in the birth record of Robert Benesch (Claimant A.'s father), whose father (Josef Benes) was identified as a businessman. In contrast, the appellant's father used a "Dr." title. Accordingly, the Special Master determined that the account held by account owner Josef Benesch had been correctly divided between the appellant (and represented parties), and Claimant A.

In support of his assertion that the amount of the award issued with regard to Else Benesch's account was less than the actual value of the account, the appellant submitted excerpts of 1938 Census forms pertaining to his father and aunt (Alfred and Else Benesch's children). These records, as compared with Else Benesch's asset registration, indicated that Else Benesch held a one-quarter interest in the account, which the award noted was valued at 603.20 Reichsmark (SF 1,058.50). Else Benesch's son also held a one-quarter interest in the account (SF 1,058.50), and her daughter held a one-half (1/2) interest in the account (SF 2,117.00), for a total account value of SF 4,234.00.

Special Master Bradfield noted that the CRT had previously revised the value of Else Benesch's account in an Award amendment (the "Amendment"). The Amendment reflected the difference between the amount allocated for the account in the Award, SF 1,058.50, and the average value of an unknown type of account as provided by Article 29 of the Rules, SF 3,950.00, for a difference of SF 2,891.50. That amount was multiplied by a factor of 12.5, in accordance with Article 31 of the Rules, for a total Amendment value of SF 36,143.75, which was awarded to Appellant and represented parties.

However, the Amendment did not address the information contained in the 1938 Census forms indicating that Else Benesch's son and daughter held ¼ and ½ of the account, respectively, amounting to a total account value, inclusive of Else Benesch's ¼ share of the account, of SF 4,234.00. As the actual value of the account was SF 284.00 more than the presumptive value of the account awarded in the Amendment (SF 3,950.00), the decision on appeal awarded the appellant and the represented parties SF 284.00, multiplied by a factor of 12.5, for a total of SF 3,550.00.

iii. In re Accounts of Fanny Margulies and Serafine Margulies (SF 520,750.00)

The original claimants received an award of SF 211,875.00 for the accounts of their relatives, Fanny Margulies and Serafine Margulies. The award determined that Serafine Margulies held one custody account, and Fanny Margulies held one account of unknown type. The award determined that the account owners' father, Friedrich Margulies, had opened the accounts on behalf of his daughters. The appellant was awarded Fanny Margulies's account of unknown type (SF 49,375.00, the average or presumptive value of an account of unknown type). The appellant's two cousins (who were siblings) were awarded the custody account held by Serafine Margulies (SF 81,250.00 each, for a total of SF 162,500.00, the presumptive value of a custody account).

The appellant asserted that since Serafine Margulies had held a custody account, Fanny Margulies also must have held a custody account, rather than an account of unknown type. The appellant claimed that it was unlikely that their grandfather, who held power of attorney over both of his daughters' accounts, would have treated his two daughters differently, going to the trouble of traveling to Switzerland with his two daughters of roughly the same age, only to open a different type of account for each. The appellant noted that the accounts of both Fanny and Serafine Margulies were opened on the same day in 1931, when both daughters were unmarried and living at home.

The award had concluded that Fanny Margulies held an account of unknown type, because the records for her account contained one additional document not present in the records for her sister Serafine's account. Each account contained a document signed by Friedrich Margulies that referenced a "Titeldepot," which was treated as a custody account, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. However, an additional printout was included in the records for Fanny Margulies's account indicating that the power of attorney form for that account was located in a source of bank documents related to accounts other than custody accounts ("Ex Konti Vollmachten"). In such cases, the CRT presumed that the Ex Konti Vollmachten form constituted evidence rebutting the presumption that a particular account was a custody account.

Special Master Bradfield determined on appeal that the account owners' father had opened the same type of account for each of his daughters, a conclusion supported by a "Titeldepot" reference in each of the power of attorney forms. The Special Master noted that there was evidence of the father's consistent and equal treatment of his two daughters, including that he held power of attorney over their accounts, and that he had opened the two accounts on the same date, using the same account opening form. Further, the account owners were very close in age and lived at home with their parents. The presence of an Ex Konti Vollmachten form for the account of Fanny Margulies did not detract from this conclusion, given the incomplete state of Holocaust-era Swiss bank records.

Accordingly, the decision on appeal awarded the appellant SF 113,125.00, the difference between the average value of a custody account, SF 162,500.00 adjusted to then-present day value, less the value of an account of unknown type, or SF 49,375.00, which the appellant had previously received.

iv. In re Accounts of Franziska Rosenstern (SF 1,535,444.00)

Franziska Rosenstern was born in 1867 in Berlin, where she lived with her husband. Franziska Rosenstern was a teacher. Her husband was a senior executive at a brokerage firm. They had two children, one of whom was the claimant's mother. Franziska Rosenstern's husband died in 1925. On June 18, 1942, Franziska Rosenstern was deported to Theresenstadt, where she perished on October 5, 1942.

In its initial award, the CRT determined that based upon the information on a bank registry card, Franziska Rosenstern, whose temporary address was reported as the "Pension Florhof" in Zurich, had owned two demand deposit accounts. These accounts respectively were closed on July 17, 1936 and February 9, 1938. The CRT awarded these two accounts to the claimant, Franziska Rosenstern's grandson, observing that Franziska Rosenstern had died in a concentration camp; the Nazis had begun to confiscate assets of the Jewish population in Germany beginning in 1933; and there was no evidence that the accounts had been returned to the account owner or her heirs.

The claimant appealed the award amount, submitting additional documents, including Swiss bank statements. The CRT determined that these newly submitted documents demonstrated that Franziska Rosenstern had owned a substantial amount of assets held in an account that had not been reported by the ICEP auditors. The claimant himself had obtained the documentation for this other account. Specifically, the claimant provided the CRT with documents demonstrating that his grandmother had owned a variety of securities. Some of the securities were sold, and the proceeds were used to purchase other securities. The CRT determined that Franziska Rosenstern had had control over the securities that she sold, and therefore did not award these assets. Additionally, the CRT determined that the proceeds of some of the securities that were sold had been deposited in the owner's demand deposit accounts, which had been awarded in the original decision. Other securities, however, had been transferred to the Deutsche Bank und Diskonto-Gesellschaft, some directly, and some by way of a bank in Amsterdam (Handel-Maatschappij H. Albert de Bary & Co. N.V.). In total, nine different securities were transferred to the Nazi-controlled Deutsche Bank over a period of several years, beginning in 1934, and continuing through 1938.

In addition to these documents, the claimant also provided the CRT with an excerpt from a file of the Office of the Chief Regional Finance Officer (Oberfinanzpräsident or "OFP"), which indicated that Franziska Rosenstern had been deported on June 18, 1942, and that her assets had been confiscated by Gestapo order dated May 1, 1942.

Franziska Rosenstern's daughter (the claimant's mother) had sought restitution for her mother's securities in 1964, decades before the CRT process began. Specifically, she had filed an application with the Restitution Tribunal of the Regional Court of Berlin. That Tribunal rejected the claim, finding that Franziska Rosenstern did not act under duress and did not lose control of her assets. As described by the CRT, the Berlin tribunal stated that "the person seeking restitution must prove that the assets were confiscated by the Reich." The Berlin tribunal concluded that although "'the claimant maintains that the securities made their way to Berlin, this is obviously only an assumption. But assumptions do not suffice to meet the burden of proof required according to § 5 of the Federal Law of Restitution.'"

The CRT reached a different conclusion. It noted that "the Berlin Restitution Tribunal ignored not only the historical reality of the systematic expropriation of Jewish-owned assets at the hands of the Nazi authorities, but also the concrete evidence in the form of the note from OFP, which confirmed that the Account Owner's assets were confiscated by Gestapo order dated 1 May 1942 and that the Account Owner was deported shortly thereafter. In denying her restitution claim because no records existed to support the assets' confiscation by Nazi authorities, the [Berlin] Tribunal punished the Account Owner's daughter for the Reich's – and by extension, the Bank's – spoliation of evidence. Given these circumstances," and given that the Nazis had embarked on a policy of confiscation, and that the account owner had perished in Theresienstadt, the CRT awarded the securities reported in the documents provided by the claimant.

In accordance with Special Master Junz' Guidelines, the CRT awarded the higher of the market or nominal value for the bonds that had been confiscated, all in good standing at the time of confiscation. The CRT determined that one of the bonds had been transferred to a demand deposit account (awarded in a previous decision) and deducted the amount awarded for that account, still leaving a substantial balance for the bond that had not been compensated in the earlier award. After calculating the value of the other bonds owned by Franziska Rosenstern, the CRT awarded her grandson an additional SF 1,479,981.50.

D. APPEALS CHALLENGING THE DIVISION OF THE AWARD

i. In re Accounts of Leopold Herzog, Zdenka Herzog and Margarete Tedesko (SF 764,500.00)

The appellants appealed the total amount of the SF 325,000.00 award in which they shared. That amount was based on the average value of one custody account jointly held by account owner Leopold Herzog, account owner Zdenka Herzog, and account owner Margarete Tedesko; and the average value of one custody account held by account owner Margarete Tedesko, over which Hugo Bunzl and Lotte Tedesko, Alice Tedesko, and Wilhelm Pokorny held power of attorney. The Court's presumptive value order of June 16, 2010[160] resulted in an additional SF 195,750.00 for the two custody accounts at issue, increasing the total value of the two accounts to SF 520,750.00.

The original award was divided between three individuals and their represented parties: Claimant B., who was related to the account owners by marriage via the first cousin relationship of Claimant B.'s grandparents to Margarete Tedesko's husband, Frederic Tedesko; Claimant T., who was related to the account owners through the first cousin relationship of Claimant T's grandfather to Margarete Tedesko's husband; and the appellants, a father and his son, whose daughter and sister, respectively, was the sole beneficiary of Margarete Tedesko's daughter, Lotte Tedesko, who held power of attorney over Margarete Tedesko's account. Lotte Tedesko had been designated the sole beneficiary of her sister, Alice Tedesko, who also held power of attorney over Margarete Tedesko's account.

The original award determined that Claimant B. and Claimant T. and their represented parties each were entitled to share one-half of Margarete Tedesko's custody account, based on their respective relationships to account owner Margarete Tedesko's husband. The award also determined that the appellants were entitled to the other one-half share of that account, based on the fact that their relative was the sole beneficiary of both of Margarete Tedesko's daughters, Alice Tedesko and Lotte Tedesko. As a power of attorney holder does not have any right of ownership in an account according to Swiss law, the award determined the appellants' entitlement to a portion of Margarete Tedesko's account to be based upon Article 23(2)(c) of the CRT Rules, which provided for the equitable assumption, in the absence of a Will, that Margarete Tedesko would have bequeathed her assets to her two daughters, Alice Tedesko and Lotte Tedesko. The appellants provided copies of two daughters' wills, which identified the appellant's respective daughter and sister as the ultimate beneficiary of the estates of Alice Tedesko and Lotte Tedesko.

The award further determined that Claimant B. and Claimant T. and their represented parties were entitled to one-half of the account jointly held by all three account owners, and that the appellants were not entitled to any share of that account.

Margarete Tedesko's Will had not been submitted to the CRT at the time of the initial decision. On appeal, Special Master Bradfield determined that a chain of inheritance pertaining to the estates of Alice Tedesko and Lotte Tedesko had been made available. In the absence of inheritance documents pertaining to account owners Herzog, who were the parents of Margarete Tedesko, it would have been consistent with the principle of fairness and equity provided in Article 23(2)(c) of the CRT Rules that Margarete Tedesko, the Herzogs' only child, would be entitled to her parents' respective shares of the jointly held account. Margarete Tedesko, in turn, would have bequeathed those assets to her own children, Alice and Lotte Tedesko, who in turn willed their assets to the appellants' relative.

Further, on appeal, the appellants submitted inheritance documents indicating that Leopold Herzog had bequeathed his estate in equal shares to his wife, Zdenka Herzog, and daughter, Margarete Tedesko; and that Margarete Tedesko was declared the sole beneficiary of account owner Zdenka Herzog's estate.

The CRT Special Master observed that had Lotte Tedesko submitted a claim, she would have been considered the child of Margarete Tedesko and grandchild of the Herzogs, and consequently would have been considered more entitled to her mother's and grandparents' accounts than Claimant B. and Claimant T., who were related to the account owners by marriage.

The award was therefore modified, to award the appellants the full award amount of SF 520,750.00, minus the amount they had already received pursuant to the award.

E. APPEALS CHALLENGING THE DETERMINATION THAT THE CLAIMANT WAS NOT ENTITLED TO THE ACCOUNTS

i. In re Accounts of Nettie Königstein

Nettie Königstein was born in 1874 in Rochester, New York. She was married in 1918. She lived with her husband in Vienna, where her husband, a doctor, died in 1924. In 1929, she remarried (again to a doctor) and continued to live in Vienna. Her second husband died in Vienna on June 20, 1937. Nettie Königstein committed suicide in Vienna on March 14, 1938, just after the Anschluss.

The CRT first became apprised of the possibility that Nettie Königstein owned Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts when Special Master Gribetz asked the CRT to conduct independent research. The request was prompted by a June 25, 1940 New York Times article, "Heirs and Fortune Vanish in Austria," indicating that Mrs. Nettie Königstein was a former American citizen who had lived in Austria, and who had committed suicide less than 48 hours after Austria had been incorporated into the Reich. As described by the CRT, the "article stated that Nettie Königstein made specific bequests in her will totaling over [$] 150,000 … and that she had further provided for the distribution of the balance remaining after payment of those legacies. According to this article, the appraiser's report disclosed that Mrs. Königstein's first choice as executor of her estate was unable to serve, since he was one of the early prisoners in the Nazi concentration camps in Austria, and that her second choice was likewise unable to serve, because he was Jewish. According to the report, as a result a German government official was representing the estate."

In response to the Special Masters' request, the HCPO conducted additional research, including in the Vienna City archive, and also reviewed the records from the Jewish Community of Vienna (Israelitische Kultusgemeinde Wien). Further, the HCPO located and submitted to the CRT a February 6, 1943 report to the Austrian court ("Testamentsausweisung"), submitted by the appointed executors of the estate. This document gave a status update of 41 bequests set forth in Nettie Königstein's will and codicil, respectively dated October 6, 1937 and October 9, 1937. The document described specific bequests of a rental house at Landstrasse-Hauptstrasse 75 in Vienna, and a portrait of Nettie Königstein's husband, which had been fulfilled. The report also described other specific bequests, including cash payments to various individuals, ranging from $100 up to $50,000. The report included the names of two Jewish charities in Vienna, the Stiftung Waisenhaus für Israelistische Mädchen Charlotte Merores Itzeles (a Jewish orphanage for girls), and the Israelitisches Blindeninsitut Hohe Warte (a Jewish institute for the blind), "and noted that neither of these institutions was in existence" as of June 28, 1941. The HCPO also provided a chain of wills relating to Nettie Königstein's estate. The CRT observed that "none of these persons" had "filed a claim to these accounts." However, ultimately, certain individuals did assert that they were the proper heirs to Nettie Königstein's estate, including her Swiss accounts, by virtue of being heirs to individuals named in the will.

In addition to the foregoing documents, the CRT also reviewed the 1938 Census files relating to the estate of Nettie Königstein. This file included correspondence from a Dr. Gustave Bauer to the VVSt. in Vienna, the office charged with registering and administering Jewish-owned property (Vermögensverkehrsstelle). In these letters, Dr. Bauer informed the VVSt. that Nettie Königstein had named several relatives and other individuals as legatees, and that she had named two individuals as her heirs. She had given the "specific instructions that they were to receive the house at Landstrasse-Hauptstrasse 75 but otherwise nothing else from the estate, and that after all other bequests were paid, they were obligated to pay the remainder of her estate to two charitable institutions." Dr. Bauer wrote "that these two heirs … thus had inherited the house but otherwise are only the executors of the estate."

Dr. Bauer further advised that Nettie Königstein's entire estate was estimated at RM 1,200,000, and that it included approximately SF 542,007 in assets on deposit at "Bank 1" in Zurich. He stated that the Foreign Exchange Office in Vienna ("Devisenstelle") had instructed the heirs to transfer the securities on deposit in Zurich to a bank in the Reich. The heirs, in turn, had requested the Swiss bank to make the transfers. The CRT noted that "Dr. Bauer wrote that these transfers were not completed, however, because several legatees had filed a suit at the district court in Zurich …, which had caused these assets to be frozen."

In addition to the records relating to the estate of Nettie Königstein, the Austrian State Archive also contained records relating to the two individuals named as legatees in Nettie Königstein's will. The documents quoted from her will of October 6, 1937, in which she bequeathed the two individuals the house in Vienna, and the portrait of her late husband. "The quoted section of her will also asks" the two individuals "to ensure that, after her various legacies have been paid, the remainder of her estate be paid to" the two Jewish charities noted above (the orphanage and the institute for the blind). The two individuals "further explained in this document that, pursuant to Mrs. Königstein's will in general and, specifically, these provisions, the house was the only object of value that they were to receive from Mrs. Königstein."

The bank records showed that Nettie Königstein held one numbered custody account, one demand deposit account denominated in U.S. dollars, one demand deposit account denominated in Swiss Francs, and one savings/passbook account. On April 22, 1938, the bank was informed of Nettie Königstein's death. As of June 2, 1938, "the Bank's legal department was to handle all correspondence." The custody account was frozen and subsequently closed on June 1, 1939. The three remaining accounts were closed on or before that date as well.

The CRT concluded that there were no existing parties or individuals entitled to receive the proceeds of Nettie Königstein's Swiss accounts. The CRT observed that Nettie Königstein "specifically identified two Jewish charitable organizations…that served needy members of her Jewish community as the beneficiaries of her residual estate, and that she drafted her will carefully in order to ensure that these two organizations would receive the residue of her estate after the specific bequests were fulfilled. Given that the Claimants are heirs of persons who were identified as receiving specific bequests, the CRT determines that they are not entitled to the assets of the claimed accounts, as these assets are part of Nettie Königstein's residual estate." The CRT further observed that "[t]o the extent that assets belonging to Nettie Königstein are not distributed to Deposited Assets Class members because no proper heirs exist under the terms of the Königstein will, and therefore such assets become 'residual funds' to be distributed via Looted Assets Class programs to the neediest Holocaust survivors, the CRT notes that such result would appear to comport with the original intent of the testator, Nettie Königstein, who likewise called for her residual estate to benefit needy persons (i.e., Jewish orphans and blind persons in Vienna)."

The Court, which as of July 27, 2011 had assumed direct authority for reviewing the few remaining appeals from CRT decisions[161], denied the claim on appeal.[162] The Court observed that it was appropriate for the CRT to recognize that the proceeds of Nettie Königstein's Swiss accounts would benefit charitable programs for the needy supported through Looted Assets Class programs under the Distribution Plan. The Court noted that "[i]n fact, the cy pres remedy which has been applied on behalf of members of the Looted Assets Class in this settlement is derived from circumstances in which a testator's intent to benefit a charity is in danger of failing."

The Court rejected the appellants' contention, based upon the analysis of an expert on Austrian inheritance principles, that they were entitled to the accounts under operation of [161] See Memorandum & Order, July 27, 2011.

[162] See Memorandum & Order Denying the Appeal to the Certified Award Denial In re Accounts of Nettie Königstein, June 14, 2011.

Austrian law. The Court pointed out that "the CRT, which operates under supervision of this Court in connection with oversight of a class action settlement, does not look at the will of the account owner with a view as to how it would be 'probated' under the applicable laws of the country of residence/nationality of the account owner…. Rather, the CRT looks at the will of an account owner, when available, in order to determine the account owner's clear intent for the distribution of their estate…." The Court noted that here, "it was the clear intent of Nettie Königstein that [the two specified individuals] receive only the specified bequests, but otherwise nothing else from the estate." The Court pointed out that Nettie Königstein had included a "no-contest" clause in her will, "which specifically mandated that should any persons named in the will contest the conditions set forth in it, they would forfeit all legacies granted to them in the will."

Finally, the Court rejected the appellants' contention that the CRT "'is not supposed to conduct research, and is not supposed to provide evidence, that third parties might have a better right,'" noting that "there is nothing in the Rules that prohibits the CRT from conducting research regarding a claimant's entitlement to an account. In fact, the entire claims process relies extensively upon the CRT's independent research in an effort to fill in the evidentiary gaps left by the banks' destruction of documents. And in fact, I have approved numerous decisions based in whole or in part upon the CRT's independent research."

F. APPEALS FROM IDENTITY DENIALS

i. In re Account of Milan Laus (SF 49,375.00)

Milan Laus lived in Zagreb, Yugoslavia (now Croatia). He owned a café, which he turned over to his brother, Vilim, when the business encountered financial difficulties. When the Nazis occupied Yugoslavia, they looted the café, as well as Vilim Laus' house. Vilim Laus (Lausch) and his family, including his daughter (the claimant and the niece of account owner Milan Laus), were imprisoned in the concentration camp Zbor, in Savska Cesta, Zagreb. The family later fled to Italy in an attempt to reach Switzerland. However, Vilim Laus, his wife and one daughter were captured and sent to Buchenwald, where they perished. Another daughter was killed in Auschwitz.

The bank records showed that Milan Laus owned an account of unknown type, which was transferred to a collective suspense account, where it remained.

In its initial decision, the CRT denied the claim of Milan Laus' niece (see In re Claimed Account Owners Vilim Lausch and Milan Laus), because of the discrepancy between the last name of the claimant's father (Vilim Lausch) and the individual who the claimant said was her uncle (Milan Laus). On appeal to the CRT Special Master, the claimant submitted new information, including sworn affidavits indicating that the two brothers in fact had spelled their last name differently. Upon review of these documents, the case was remanded to the CRT.

The CRT observed, on remand, that in 1955, the claimant's aunt had submitted a Page of Testimony to Yad Vashem, and had spelled the claimant's parents' name "Laus." "[U]pon careful review of the appellate decision and the facts contained in the records," the CRT "conclude[d] that the Claimant ha[d] plausibly identified the Account Owner" – Milan Laus – as her relative. The CRT thus awarded the account to the niece of Milan Laus, based upon the presumptive value for an account of unknown type.

ii. In re Accounts of Moritz Mayer (SF 326,662.50)

Moritz Mayer was born in 1884 in Alsheim, Germany. He was a wine merchant in Worms, Germany until 1942, when he was deported to Poland. He died in the Sobibor death camp.

In its initial decision, the CRT observed that the claimant, the son of Moritz Mayer, had stated that his father had resided in Germany, whereas the bank files showed that the account owner had resided in a different country not identified by the claimant. The claim accordingly was denied, on the basis that the claimant's father and the account owner, although sharing the same name, were two different individuals.

On appeal, the claimant advised that in July 1938, prior to deportation in 1942, his father Moritz Meyer had been imprisoned in the Osthofen concentration camp. Moritz Meyer also had been imprisoned in Buchenwald a few months later, in November 1938. In addition, the claimant advised that his father had a brother, Sally Mayer, who was born in Worms and lived in Milan, where he was a successful businessman. The claimant submitted new documents for review, including an excerpt from a book about Jewish Italians indicating that Sally Mayer, born in Worms, lived in Milan. The claimant stated that on behalf of his brother, Moritz, Sally Mayer opened a Swiss account using a Milan address to conceal these assets from the Nazis.

The bank records indicated that Moritz Mayer of Milan, Italy held three accounts at the Lugano branch of the bank: a demand deposit account opened on an unknown date and closed on September 30, 1937; a custody account opened on November 30, 1935 and closed on December 10, 1937; and a safe deposit box opened in 1935 and closed on January 20, 1939. Thus, the claimant identified the unpublished city of Milan as a place to which his father plausibly had a connection, through his brother.

The appellant established on appeal that it was plausible to conclude that his father's brother, Sally Mayer, a prominent businessman who was Jewish and resided in Milan, opened the accounts from Milan on behalf of Moritz Mayer in an effort to conceal these assets from the Reich. In support of his appeal, the appellant submitted several documents including an original postcard written from his father in Germany to Sally Mayer in Milan; appellant's birth certificate identifying Appellant's father as Moritz Mayer of Worms, Germany; and an excerpt from a book about Jewish Italians ("Scritti in Memoria di Sally Mayer") that indicated that Sally Mayer resided in Milan and was born in Worms to Marco Mayer and Maria Weil. In addition, as described by the CRT, the Yad Vashem database contained a record for Moritz Mayer of Worms, submitted to Yad Vashem by the appellant in 1975, identifying Moritz Mayer's father as Marx Mayer.

As the appellant identified Moritz Mayer's unpublished city and country of residence; established that both Moritz Mayer and Sally Mayer were from Worms, and were born to Marx (Marco) Mayer and Marie (Maria) Weil; and provided an original postcard written from Moses Mayer of Worms to Sally Mayer of Milan, Special Master Bradfield determined that it was plausible that the appellant had identified the account owner as his father.

iii. In re Account of Frau Erna Paul

The appellant received a denial decision informing him that his sister, Erna Pohl, née Atlas and the account owner, Erna Paul, who had a name similar to that of the appellant's sister, were two different people.

In his claim form, the appellant had stated that his father opened a Swiss bank account for his sister to provide for her studies in London, England. The appellant also stated that his family was from Lwow, Poland; that his parents and another sister were killed in a Nazi concentration camp in 1941; and that he and his sister Erna resided in London, and survived the Second World War. The appellant also indicated that Erna, who was born Erna Atlas in 1912, married a lawyer with the last name "Pohl," with whom she moved to Australia after the Second World War.

The claim concluded that the appellant's sister and the account owner were not the same person, for several reasons. The married name of the appellant's sister, Erna Pohl, differed from the account owner's name, Erna Paul; there was no indication in the bank's records that the account was opened by a person other than the account owner, in contrast with the appellant's statement that his father opened the account on behalf of the appellant's sister; and the appellant did not provide information establishing his relationship to a person named Erna Pohl or Erna Paul.

On appeal, the appellant provided an Australian Landing Permit from 1945, which indicated that the appellant had been admitted to Australia under the guarantee of his sister, Erna Pohl. Special Master Bradfield concluded that while that document established the appellant's relationship to a person named Erna Pohl, it did not establish that the appellant was related to a person named Erna Paul, the name of the account owner. There was no evidence that the appellant's sister had changed her name from Pohl to Paul. Further, the appellant's sister had passed away in Australia in 1994, but there was no record of any attempt by her or her children to reclaim assets deposited in a Swiss bank account either prior to or after her death. The CRT Special Master determined that to the extent the appellant's sister may have held assets in a Swiss bank that she had been prevented from accessing, she and/or her children and grandchildren would have undertaken some effort to obtain those assets, and for these reasons denied the appeal.

iv. In re Accounts of Marcel Marcovici (SF 104,825)

The appellant appealed the conclusion of a denial decision that her brother and the account owner were not the same person. The denial decision was issued with respect to the published accounts of Marcel Marcovici at the Lausanne branch of the Bank.

In her claim form, the appellant stated that her brother, Marcel Marcovici, was born in 1908 in Botosani, Romania. He studied in Berlin, Germany in the early 1930s until 1934, at which time he fled Germany and returned to Romania, where he resided in Bucharest and worked as an engineer. He remained in Romania until the 1970s when he moved to Israel, where he died in 1979 or 1980.

The CRT decision denying the claim noted that the ICEP auditors had reported three accounts whose owner's name matched the name of the appellant's brother, and the appellant previously had been awarded one of these accounts. The name of the appellant's brother matched the name of the account owner, and the appellant had identified the account owner's published city and country of residence, Bucharest, Romania. The decision noted that the appellant had submitted a passport and marriage certificate identifying her maiden name.

The bank records indicated that the owner of the remaining two accounts, both of which were demand deposit accounts, was Marcel Marcovici, who resided in Milan, Italy. The bank records also indicated that these accounts were opened at the Lausanne branch of the bank on September 6, 1941. Both were closed, unknown by whom, in what appeared to be the late 1940s, possibly 1948. The exact dates of their respective closures were illegible. The notation "It. reklammat. Konto saldiert" ("according to complaint. Account closed") appeared on the back of the account registry card after the closure date of the first account. The front of the account registry card included the stamp "Rev. 1948". The bank records did not contain information regarding the value of the accounts.

The CRT concluded that these accounts did not belong to the appellant's brother, but, rather, to a different person with the same name. Whereas the appellant's brother had returned from Germany to Romania in 1934, the account owner resided in Italy, a country to which the appellant had not demonstrated any connection. Consequently, the CRT concluded that the account owner and the appellant's brother were not the same person.

On appeal, the appellant submitted additional information about her brother, and his family's connections to countries in Europe. The appellant stated that her father, Menasche Marcovici, was a businessman from Botosani, Romania where he owned, together with his father-in-law, Meir Haimovici, a fabric and woodworking factory. In his capacity as a business owner, her father maintained numerous import and export relationships in many countries, including Italy, France and Switzerland. In addition, according to the appellant, one of Marcel Marcovici's brothers, Carol Marcovici, resided in Zurich, Switzerland between 1928 and 1933 or 1934, where he established relationships with those in a position to act as intermediaries on his family's behalf. The appellant stated that her father often rented an apartment in Milan, Italy where she and her siblings, including Marcel Marcovici, would visit on study breaks. She stated that her brother may have used the address of the apartment in Milan, Corso Vescelli no. 2 (possibly no. 20), when he opened the Swiss bank accounts. The appellant said that her father rented an apartment in Nancy, France, another address her brother may have used when opening his Swiss bank account.

Special Master Bradfield determined that the information on appeal plausibly established that the appellant's brother was the account owner. The appellant had identified the account owner's unpublished city of residence, Milan, Italy, by including in her appeal information regarding an apartment her father rented in that city. In addition, the appellant previously was awarded the account owned by Marcel Marcovici. In this case, although the accounts were not held at the same bank as the accounts in the award, and although the cities and countries of residence were different, the Special Master determined that the appellant had established a plausible connection to Marcel Marcovici and to Milan.

The Special Master determined that it was clear from the available information in the bank's records that the accounts were closed sometime in the late 1940s, possibly 1948. The appellant stated that the account owner remained in Romania until the 1970s, when he immigrated to Israel, where he died in 1979 or 1980. Given the persecution of Jews in Romania and the confiscation of Jewish assets during the War, the Communist dictatorial regime, and the Swiss banks' practice of withholding or misstating account information to account owners and heirs after the War, it was plausible that the account proceeds were not paid to Marcel Marcovici. It was also possible that the proceeds were paid by Switzerland to Romania as part of an arrangement between the two countries concluded in 1951. As previously discussed, Swiss banks froze Romanian assets in 1948 pursuant to a Decree of the Swiss Federal Council. Romanian accounts were unfrozen in October 1950. Approximately one year later, in August 1951, Switzerland and Romania entered into an agreement whereby unclaimed assets held by Romanian citizens in Swiss banks were to be transferred to the Romanian Government, in return for compensation for Swiss property that had been nationalized by Romania's communist regime. The CRT Special Master noted that the account owner's accounts, which were closed in the late 1940s, possibly 1948, could have been held for use in this arrangement.

The appellant was therefore awarded SF 47,400, which represented the average value of two demand deposit accounts adjusted for current value.

G. LATE CLAIMS: THIRD PARTY CHALLENGES TO AWARDS

i. In re Accounts of Braunsberg & Co., AG (SF 133,572.50)

The award in this case had been issued to a timely filed claimant ("Claimant J."), and was subsequently amended to address the omission from the award of another timely filed claimant ("Claimant W."). The award and amendment explained that the account owner was Braunsberg & Co. AG, a large textile firm with factories in Germany, which was owned in equal shares by Franz Hermann ("Hermann") Braunsberg, and his three brothers: Julius Braunsberg, Salo Braunsberg, and Max Braunsberg. Claimant J. was the nephew of the widow of one of the owners of the textile firm (the account owner), and Claimant W. was the daughter of another of the firm's owners.

The appellant, the daughter-in-law of another of the firm's owners, filed a late claim asserting that she was entitled to a share of the payment, which totaled SF 53,500.00. Special Master Bradfield determined that the appellant satisfied all criteria of the Court's December 30, 2004 "late claims order," which required a late claimant to establish that he or she was the account owner, the account owner's spouse, or the account owner's child; to provide an unusually compelling reason for failing to file a timely claim; and to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that the relevant accounts were awarded erroneously.

The appellant demonstrated that she was considered to be the child of one of the account owner's owners, as she was one of their daughters-in-law. She submitted her husband's birth certificate identifying his father, and her husband's death certificate, identifying his father as Julius Braunsberg, and identifying herself as his wife. She stated that she failed to submit a timely claim because she had suffered a stroke in June 1999, after which she developed Alzheimer's disease.[163]

The Special Master noted that the record in this case included a list of the heirs of the account owner's owners, which was submitted by Claimant W. That list, in fact, had identified the appellant as the widow of one of the firm owners' sons. Given that the appellant fulfilled all criteria of the Late Claims Order, and was explicitly identified as one of the account owner's heirs, the award amendment was modified on appeal to include her.

Article 23(3) of the CRT Rules provided that if the account owner were a legal or other entity, as here, the award would be made in favor of claimants who had established a right of ownership to the entity's assets. According to information provided by the textile company's liquidator, the company was owned by Hermann Braunsberg, Claimant W.'s father; the appellant's father-in-law; and their two brothers. The information provided by the liquidator listed Claimant W., her represented parties and the appellant as heirs of Hermann and another brother, respectively. As the company was owned equally by the four Braunsberg brothers, including Claimant W.'s father, Hermann, and the appellant's father-in-law, it was appropriate to consider the account as having been held jointly by Hermann and his three brothers. Article 25(2) of the CRT Rules provided that in cases where the joint account was claimed by relatives of only one or some of the joint account owners, it was presumed that the account was owned as a whole in equal shares by the account owners whose shares of the account had been claimed. The appellant and Claimant W. were the only family members, other than Claimant J. and his represented party, who were related to one brother by marriage, to have submitted a claim.

Accordingly, with regard to the appellant's father-in-law's share of the account, the Special Master determined that the appellant, who was considered to be her father-in-law's child, was entitled to the full amount of his share of the accounts, for a total of SF 13,375.00. With regard to the shares of the account received by the heirs of two of the firm owners, the Special Master determined that the appellant was entitled to one-half of the shares held by the previously-identified firm owners, for a total of SF 13,375.00. Accordingly, the appellant was entitled on appeal to receive a total of SF 26,750.00.

ii. In re Accounts of Dr. Simon Gutmann (SF 437,085.00)

The appellant, the account owner's son, appealed his exclusion from the original award, which totaled SF 165,960.00. The award was issued to a timely filed claimant and to his brother (the "awardees"), who plausibly identified the account owner as their uncle. The awardees stated that their uncle, Simon Gutmann, was a medical doctor who resided in Munich, Germany. He was married, and had two sons. He went into hiding during the Second World War, but was subsequently arrested and killed by the Nazis.[164] His wife, who was Catholic, survived the war

[164] "Simon Gutmann was born in 1889. Prior to WWII he lived in Muenchen, Germany. Simon was murdered in the Shoah [Riga]. This information is based on a List of murdered Jews from Germany found in Gedenkbuch - Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933-1945, in hiding with her two children, who also survived. Dr. Gutmann's wife and one son had passed away, while no information was provided about the other son (the appellant).

Following the Court's approval of the award, the appellant submitted a late claim. He demonstrated that his father was Dr. Simon Gutmann of Munich, by submitting a copy of his family register and Certificate of Baptism. He explained that his father, to mitigate oppression of his wife and children by the Nazis, had divorced his mother. He believed that by doing so, and in raising their children in the Catholic tradition, his wife and children would be safe in Germany. The appellant explained that he remained traumatized by the Second World War, and, because he was raised as a Catholic in a small German village, he did not have exposure to Jewish-related media, or a reason to consult such media, nor did he have access to the internet. Thus, he stated that he did not have sufficient information prior to the filing deadline to be aware that a claim for his father's accounts was possible.[165]

The record on appeal indicated that the awardees were aware of the appellant's existence and his superior claim to Dr. Gutmann's accounts, but they had made no effort to contact the appellant to try to include him in their claim. The appellant was the account owner's son, whereas the awardees were only his great-nephews. Accordingly, Special Master Bradfield awarded the appellant the full amount of the award, adjusted to SF 172,875.00 to reflect the increased adjustment factor (from 12 to 12.5) since the time the award originally had been issued.

Bundesarchiv (German National Archives), Koblenz 1986." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=140786&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015).

[165] A lack of knowledge of the CRT process was, as a general matter, not considered an "unusually compelling reason" for failing to file a timely claim. In this case, the Special Master concluded that an exception could be made given the facts and circumstances of the appellant's family history, his isolation, and the lack of knowledge of any of the appellant's close family members regarding their Jewish heritage.

iii. In re Accounts of Bernhard Goldstein and Lilien-Leinwand-Unternehmung (SF 75,619.31)

The appellant submitted a late claim to the accounts of Bernhard Goldstein and Lilien-Leinwand-Unternehmung. The appellant was the daughter-in-law of the account owner's founder, Bernhard Goldstein, Sr., and widow of Bernhard Goldstein's son who, along with Emmanuel Bernard Goldstein's mother and sister, inherited a majority share of the account owner (a business entity) following Bernhard Goldstein's death.

The information provided by the appellant on appeal, as well as records from the 1938 Census, demonstrated that the appellant's husband, mother-in-law and sister-in-law held a combined 68.51% majority ownership interest in the business. These records also showed that the original awardee's great-uncle, as well as another individual, Oskar Doktor, who was the father of a third claimant ("Claimant H."), each held minority interests of 15.51% and 15.98%, respectively, in the business. On appeal, it was noted that although two accounts had been identified as jointly held by Bernhard Goldstein and Lilien-Leinwand-Unternehmung, both accounts were held only in the name the company, which was called Lilien-Leinwand-Unternehmung Bernhard Goldstein. One of these accounts was closed in 1934, prior to the Anschluss, rather than in 1938, as indicated in the award, and therefore should not have been awarded.

The appellant demonstrated on appeal that her husband's family owned a majority share of the business, whereas the original awardee's family had held a minority share. As the widow of the son of the account owner's founder, who assumed ownership of the business after his father's death, as well as the daughter-in-law of Bernhard Goldstein Sr., who founded the business, Special Master Bradfield determined that the appellant satisfied the first criterion of the late claims order requiring a late claimant to be the account owner, spouse or child. Further, the appellant had provided an appropriate reason for filing a late claim; she suffered from multiple sclerosis, as verified by her physician. The Special Master further determined that the appellant had submitted persuasive information demonstrating that the awardee had knowingly concealed information regarding the true ownership structure of the business, and also had concealed information regarding Bernhard Goldstein Sr.'s wife and children.

The Special Master concluded that the appellant was entitled to receive 68.51% of the average value of one demand deposit account, or SF 1,466.11, and that Claimant H., the child of the other minority owner of the account owner, along with Awardee's great-uncle, was entitled to receive 15.98% of the average value of a demand deposit account, or SF 341.97. As the multiplier had increased from 12 to 12.5, the total amount awarded to the appellant was SF 18,326.38.

iv. In re Account of Leiba Kochas (SF 54,392.50)

Appellant submitted a late claim to the account of Leiba Kochas, which was previously awarded to a timely filed claimant. The award totaled SF 25,680.00, the average value of a demand deposit account. The appellant, who established her status as the Leiba Kochas' child, asserted that the awardee was not related to the account owner and had filed a fraudulent claim, and that the appellant alone was entitled to the award.

The appellant demonstrated that she was the child of the account owner by submitting her birth certificate identifying her parents as being born in Kowno (Kaunas), Lithuania; documents from the Lithuanian State Archives, including passport information containing the photographs and signatures of both of her parents, verifying that Leiba Kochas was born in 1894, had married his wife in 1930, and had a daughter with the same name as the appellant; the death certificate of the appellant's mother, identifying the appellant as the informant; and the Last Will and Testament of the appellant's mother, identifying the Testator and the appellant as her daughter. Appellant also submitted original photographs of her mother and father, which matched images contained on the passport documents obtained from the Lithuanian State Archives.

The appellant explained that she had been unable to submit a timely claim because she had been consumed with caring for her dying companion. She was unaware of the claims process until after her companion passed away. The appellant submitted a copy of her companion's obituary, which indicated that that individual had died after the filing deadline, after suffering a long illness, and that the appellant had been his longtime companion.

The bank records indicated that Leiba Kochas, who owned a company named Firma L. Koch, held a demand deposit account. There was no information regarding the closure date. The bank records further indicated that Leiba Kochas resided at Ozeskienes gatve 3 in Kaunas, Lithuania, and that a third party was authorized to access the account under certain circumstances. The account was included on a 1959 list of dormant accounts prepared by the Zurich branch of the bank pursuant to an internal bank survey, at which time the amount of the account was 86.50 Swiss Francs.

The original award determined that the awardee had identified Leiba Kochas as her maternal grandfather, whose name and city of residence were published on the 2001 List. The awardee had stated that her grandfather was first married to her maternal grandmother, and that they had had one child, the awardee's mother. After his first wife died, Leiba Kochas married another woman, whose name the awardee did not identify in her claim form. The awardee asserted that her grandfather's second wife did not wish to care for the awardee's mother, and so she was sent to live with an aunt. The awardee stated that she did not recall where her grandfather lived before 1940, but believed that he resided at ulica Gedimina 15 in Kaunas from 1940 to 1941. She also stated that her grandfather and his second wife disappeared in 1941 and were never heard from again.

Although the awardee originally indicated to the CRT that she could not remember the name of her grandfather's second wife, she later stated that she did remember this name. She also said that Leiba Kochas' date of birth in Naumiesty, Lithuania was May 23, 1894. She indicated at that time that she had been able to procure a photograph and signature sample of Leiba Kochas, which she subsequently sent to the CRT. Based on this new information, particularly the awardee's identification of the unpublished name of the third party authorized to access the account, as well as a copy of the account owner's signature, the CRT concluded that the awardee plausibly had identified Leiba Kochas as her grandfather.

On appeal, Special Master Bradfield determined that the copy of the signature sample submitted by the awardee, which also included a photocopy of Leiba Kochas' picture, was an exact copy of the signature sample and photograph contained on the passport document submitted by the appellant. This document was available to the public in the Lithuanian State Archive. In contrast to the complete passport document submitted by the appellant, however, the awardee had extracted only the photograph and signature sample, blocking out the rest of the document that contained other identifying information for Leiba Kochas, such as his date and place of birth. The awardee had provided such information to the CRT in a telephone call, having initially indicated she did not know those biographical details. There were similar records in the Lithuanian State Archive for Leiba Kochas' second wife, to which the awardee had access, which indicated that she was married to Leiba Kochas.

On appeal, the appellant explained that her father married her mother in 1930, and that they moved in 1935 with their two children (the appellant and her brother) to 16 Darius-Gireno Str. in Taurogen, Lithuania, following the 1934 death of the appellant's grandfather. Special Master Bradfield noted that that this address matched an additional unpublished address of Leiba Kochas in the bank records. The appellant stated that her family was taken to the Kovno Ghetto in 1941, where they were confined until July 1944. Her father thereafter was sent to Dachau, where he perished in December 1944. The appellant and her mother were sent to the Stutthof concentration camp, and from there to a labor camp, which was liberated by the Russians in 1945. After the Second World War, the appellant and her mother remained in a displaced persons camp in Germany, after which they emigrated to England in 1949, and from there to South Africa in 1952.

The Special Master requested that the awardee comment on the appellant's assertions, and provide information to support the awardee's claim of a relationship to Leiba Kochas. The Special Master also requested a copy of the awardee's mother's birth certificate to identify her mother's father as Leiba Kochas. The awardee explained that she did not have a copy of her mother's birth certificate, and that her mother had never told her many details regarding her relationship to her father. The awardee asserted that Leiba Kochas had left his daughter (the awardee's mother) in favor of a new wife, and that the awardee's mother was not aware that she had a half-sister (i.e., the appellant). In contrast, the Lithuanian State Archive indicated to the Special Master that it had been unable to find any information regarding the persons whom the awardee asserted were the account owner's first wife and daughter, respectively.

The awardee further explained, with respect to a query as to where she had obtained the photograph and signature sample of Leiba Kochas submitted to the CRT, that she assumed her grandfather and the aunt to whom the awardee's mother was sent to live stayed in contact. She said that the aunt must have given the awardee's mother the name and address of her grandfather's second wife. She claimed that her mother left all family records with a cousin, who had sent to her (the awardee) a copy of the signature sample and photograph for inclusion as part of her claim to the CRT. The Special Master noted that this information was not provided to the CRT at the time the awardee had submitted her claim form. She had not at that time provided Leiba Kochas' date and place of birth, nor had she provided the name of his wife. That information was not submitted by the awardee to the CRT until a telephone conversation and follow-up communication, by which time she would have had ample opportunity to obtain such information from the Lithuanian State Archive. In contrast to the appellant, who had established her relationship to the account owner, the awardee had not submitted information demonstrating her relationship to a person named Leiba Kochas.

Given that the appellant had demonstrated that Leiba Kochas was her father, the Special Master's Office concluded that the appellant was entitled to the full award of SF 26,750.00.

v. In re Account of Lotte Dobrin (SF 28,712.50)

The appellant submitted a late claim asserting that the account owner Lotte Dobrin, and power of attorney holder, Moritz Dobrin, were her mother-in-law and father-in-law, respectively. The account previously had been awarded to a timely claimant.

Special Master Bradfield informed the appellant that she had not established that she was the daughter-in-law of Lotte Dobrin. Further, although the appellant asserted that her claim was submitted on time, there was no record of a claim from her prior to the late claim, which was filed nearly four years after the deadline. Nor did appellant provide an unusually compelling reason for failing to file a timely claim, as required by the Court's late claims order. Thus, her late claim was not eligible for consideration in the claims process.

vi. In re Account of Alexander Conitzer (SF 623,330.00)

The appellant submitted a late claim to the accounts of Alexander Conitzer, which had been awarded to timely filed claimants. The award, which totaled SF 181,680.00, was for two accounts held at the Zurich branch of the bank. The appellant asserted that he was Alexander Conitzer's nephew, and that the awardees knowingly had excluded him from the award.

The original award had determined that the awardees plausibly had identified Alexander Conitzer as their uncle. The awardees stated that he was born on April in Goslerhaussen, Germany; that he was unmarried and did not have any children; and that he was deported from Berlin to Auschwitz, where he perished.[166] The award noted that the awardees had submitted a family tree in support of their claims, which identified the account owner as the brother of their father, Heinz Conitzer.

The award determined that Alexander Conitzer held two accounts of unknown value: a demand deposit account, and a custody account. Applying the then-prevailing presumptive values and the multiplier, the claimants were awarded SF 181,680.00.

On appeal, the appellant explained that his mother was Alexander Conitzer's sister, and the awardees' aunt. He submitted documents including his mother's birth certificate; a copy of his mother's passport; and a document issued by the state of New York naming the appellant as the Executor of his mother's estate. This information matched information about the account owner that had been provided by the awardees.

The appellant stated that he and the awardees had engaged in frequent contact, in large part due to a transaction between them regarding real estate in Berlin that was left to them by [166] "Alexander Conitzer was born in Gosslershausen, Poland in 1905. Prior to WWII he lived in Berlin, Germany. During the war he was in Berlin, Germany. Deported with Transport 17. Osttransport (Welle XX) from Berlin, Germany to Auschwitz Birkenau, Extermination Camp, Poland on 11/07/1942. Alexander was murdered in the Shoah. This information is based on a List of deportation from Berlin found in Gedenkbuch Berlins der juedischen Opfer des Nazionalsozialismus, Freie Universitaet Berlin, Zentralinstitut fuer sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung, Edition Hentrich, Berlin 1995." The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, YAD VASHEM, http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4093784&language=en (last visited Aug. 11, 2015).

their grandfather in his will. The appellant submitted documentation dated at various times between the 1990s through 2002, to support his assertion that the awardees were aware of his existence at the time they had filed their claim with the CRT.

Special Master Bradfield determined that the appellant had credibly established his relationship to Alexander Conitzer, and that he had shown that the awardees were aware of his existence and had failed to include him in their claim. The award therefore was modified on appeal. The Special Master increased the total award to SF 189,250.00, of which the appellant was entitled to one-half.

vii. In re Accounts of Heinrich Kalman, Aranka Kalman, Michael Kalman and Adalbert Heltai (SF 116,909.09)

The appellant was the child of account owner Michael Kalman. She appealed her exclusion from the award, which totaled SF 73,080.00. The award had been issued to two claimants who were siblings, and who plausibly identified Heinrich Kalman and Aranka Kalman as their grandparents, and Michael Kalman as their uncle. The awardees were the children of the Kalmans' adopted daughter, Gizela Kalman. The Kalmans and their son Michael were Jewish. They lived in Budapest, Hungary, where Heinrich Kalman was the general manager of the English-Hungarian Bank (Anglo-Magyar Bank). Heinrich Kalman was arrested by the Gestapo shortly after the occupation of Hungary by Nazi Germany, and was subsequently deported to a concentration camp. The awardees stated that Aranka Kalman died in Budapest in 1953; Michael Kalman died in England in 1948; and Gizela Kalman died in Budapest in 1992. The awardees did not identify any descendants of Michael Kalman.

The bank's records indicated that Heinrich, Aranka and Michael Kalman jointly held one demand deposit account, for which the last recorded balance was SF 1,146.00.00. Further, Heinrich Kalman jointly held an additional account (of unknown type) with Adalbert Heltai. Its value was not known. Special Master Bradfield noted that the appellant was identified in the award as the recipient of a wire transfer in the amount of SF 1,748.00 from Heinrich Kalman, which was sent from the demand deposit account via Barclays Bank to the appellant, in care of her father, in London, on April 23, 1942. The records pertaining to this transfer included information regarding the appellant's address in London.

Following approval of the award, the appellant submitted a late claim. The CRT Special Master gave decisive weight to the fact that she was the child of account owner Michael Kalman and that the original awardees were aware of her existence at the time they filed their claims with the CRT, but did not disclose her existence.

The appellant explained that she knew one of the awardees ("Claimant M.") very well. She stated that both she and Claimant M. resided in Hungary, and that a friend of the appellant's father became her guardian. The guardian, his wife, Claimant M. and Claimant M.'s husband all emigrated to Australia, where they lived close to each other, and were friendly until the death of the appellant's guardian in the late 1990s. The appellant stated that her guardian kept in touch with her until his death, and that Claimant M. sent the appellant letters indicating that the appellant's guardian had kept Claimant M. updated on the appellant's life. The appellant also stated that she and Claimant M. spoke on the telephone whenever Claimant M. visited the United States. The appellant indicated that at the time the awardees submitted their claim to the CRT, she resided at the same address to which Claimant M. had previously sent her letters. She also stated that Claimant M. had contacted her from New York, indicating that he had located her via the internet. She stated that at that time, Claimant M. did not mention the CRT process to her, and did not indicate that he had submitted a claim to an account held in the names of the appellant's father, and all of their grandparents. The awardees did not deny the appellant's existence or her relationship to the Kalmans once her claim was brought to their attention.

The Special Master concluded that if the appellant had submitted a timely claim, or had the awardees included her in their own claims, the appellant would have received the full amount of her father's share of the award and a portion of her grandparents' respective shares. Thus, the appellant was awarded SF 42,520.75 (as the adjustment factor had increased from 12 to 12.5 as of the date of the appeal).

viii. In re Account of Dr. Karl Herschmann (SF 253,875.00)

The original award totaled SF 156,000.00, and was for one custody account held by Dr. Karl Herschmann. The award determined that two claimants, who were cousins, each were entitled to $60,465.12.

Following payment of the award to the awardees, the appellant, who passed away during the evaluation of his appeal, informed the Special Master that he was Dr. Herschmann's nephew and was equally entitled to the account. Special Master Bradfield determined that the appellant's late claim did not satisfy the criteria of the Court's late claims order. The Special Master also determined, based upon a review of the record, that the awardees had indicated in correspondence with the CRT that their cousin, the appellant, also was entitled to the claimed account, and that they believed the appellant to have possibly filed his own claim.

Following their receipt of the award, the awardees submitted a letter to the CRT indicating that while they were both grateful for the award, they did not understand why the appellant had been excluded. Although the awardees had mentioned their cousin in their claims, neither awardee had formally represented the cousin in the claims process, nor had the appellant submitted a timely claim. Thus, the appellant had not been eligible for consideration in the award at the time it was issued.

The Special Master informed the awardees that had their cousin submitted a timely claim, he would have been entitled to share in the award. The Special Master therefore requested that the awardees consider the appellant's claim to Dr. Herschmann's account, particularly in light of their previous acknowledgment of his entitlement to a portion of the award, and in accordance with the principle of equity and fairness central to the claims process.

The awardees informed the Special Master that the appellant had passed away, and that they each were beneficiaries of the appellant's estate, along with another individual. The awardees submitted the appellant's death certificate and inheritance documentation showing that that the awardees each were entitled to one-fourth of the appellant's estate, and another individual was entitled to the remaining one-half. The Special Master determined that if the appellant had been included in the award, he would have been entitled to one-third of the total ($40,309.41). Pursuant to the provisions of the appellant's inheritance certificate, the third beneficiary was entitled to $20,154.71, which represented one-sixth of the total award amount (one-half of the appellant's one-third share). The awardees each were entitled to $10,077.36, which represented one-twelfth of the total (one-fourth of the appellant's one-third share).

The awardees each promptly returned $10,077.36 to the Special Master. That sum, in turn, was distributed to the appellant's third beneficiary.

H. APPEALS OF INADMISSIBILITY DECISIONS

i. Claimed Account Owner Angela Freifrau von Biel

The appellant had submitted a claim identifying the account owner as her late husband's stepmother, Angela Freifrau von Biel (also known as Freifrau Anna von Biel), née Jenöi (Szombati). The appellant stated that until July 1943, her husband's stepmother, who was Catholic, resided in Ortenburg, Germany. She was arrested and sentenced to death as an opponent of the Nazi regime. The appellant further stated that the sentence was commuted to imprisonment. Her husband's stepmother spent two years in concentration camps until her liberation by Russian forces in May 1945. Her husband's stepmother, who died in 1970 in Munich, Germany, became physically disabled as a result of the treatment she suffered in the concentration camps. Her husband's father, who was Protestant, also was imprisoned by the Nazi regime in 1943. He committed suicide while awaiting trial on charges of high treason against the Reich.

The appellant identified her husband's stepmother as Catholic, and her husband's father as Protestant. She stated that her relative's disability was a result of imprisonment in Nazi concentration camps, rather than the reason the Nazis imprisoned her (which was due to her stance against the Nazi regime). Accordingly, the Special Master agreed with the CRT's determination that the claim was inadmissible, as the account owner was not a "Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution" within the meaning of the Settlement Agreement.

I. SETTLEMENTS UPON APPEAL

i. In re Accounts of Bankhaus M. Thorsch & Söhne, Alfons and Marie Thorsch, and Alfons Thorsch ($3,757,657.19)

The Court approved the CRT's denial of claims (the "denial") submitted by grandchildren of Alfons and Marie Thorsch to 29 published and unpublished accounts held by the Thorsches, or Bankhaus M. Thorsch & Söhne ("Thorsch & Söhne"), which was owned by Alfons Thorsch. The denial concluded that the claimants, the grandchildren of the account owners, were not eligible for an award, because the Thorsches had retained control over their assets, and had received the proceeds of the claimed accounts.

The Thorsches, who were Jewish, resided in Vienna, Austria, where Alfons Thorsch was a banker who owned Thorsch & Söhne. According to the claimants, their grandparents, along with their daughter Dorothea, fled Austria for Italy in February 1938, and from Italy to Zurich, Switzerland on March 13, 1938 (following the Anschlüss). The family subsequently moved to England in the summer of 1939. As of 1941, they resided in Montreal, Quebec and, as of 1942, in Victoria, British Columbia. Marie Thorsch died in Montreal in September 1944. Alfons Thorsch died in Victoria in 1945.

The records submitted by the claimants, as well as those the CRT obtained through independent investigation, indicated that the Thorsches and their bank held 29 accounts at the Zurich, Basel, Bern and Geneva branches of the Schweizerische Bankverein ("Bank I"); the London agency of the Schweizerische Bankverein ("Bank II"); the Zurich and Geneva branches of the Schweizerische Kreditanstalt ("Bank III"); the Kantonalbank Bern ("Bank IV"); the Zürcher Kantonalbank ("Bank V"); the Zurich branch of the Schweizerische Bankgesellschaft ("Bank VI"); the Zurich branch of the Eidgenössiche Bank ("Bank VII"); the Basler Handelsbank ("Bank VIII"); and the Zurich branch of Darier & Cie. ("Bank IX").

Of the 29 total accounts, 21 were held by Thorsch & Söhne (12 demand deposit accounts, seven custody accounts and two accounts of unknown type). Five accounts jointly were held by Alfons and Marie Thorsch (three custody accounts and two demand deposit accounts). Three accounts were held individually by Alfons Thorsch (one custody account, one demand deposit account and one safe deposit box).

The denial concluded that of the 21 accounts held by Thorsch & Söhne ("TS"), one was closed prior to 1933. Accordingly, that account fell outside the jurisdiction of the CRT, which was authorized to resolve claims to accounts open or opened in Swiss banks during the Holocaust era (1933 - 1945). The denial determined that the account owners had closed 14 of the 21 accounts prior to the Anschlüss, at which point they retained control over their accounts and received the proceeds.

The denial further concluded that six of the 21 accounts held by TS remained open after the Anschlüss. The contents of two demand deposit accounts, one each at Bank IV and Bank V, were transferred to an existing demand deposit account held by TS at the Zurich branch of Bank III, per instruction of the account owners. The demand deposit account at Bank III received TS's deposit of the proceeds of the two demand deposit accounts held at Bank IV and Bank V, as well as a second demand deposit account held by TS at Bank I.

The assets in the accounts at Bank III and Bank I, totaling SF 27,502.00, were the subject of litigation in Switzerland between the Cassen-Verein, as kommissarischer Verwalter of TS, together with TS, and Alfons Thorsch, in 1938 and 1939. Alfons Thorsch petitioned the Zurich District Court for protection of assets, and the assets were then frozen temporarily. Subsequently, after the Zurich court found in favor of Alfons Thorsch, the accounts were transferred to the custody of the court. The litigation concluded in 1939, with a finding by the Superior Court in favor of Alfons Thorsch, resulting in the Cassen-Verein writing off the funds in the books of TS on December 31, 1939. Two additional demand deposit accounts, one each at Bank I and Bank II, also were written off by the Cassen-Verein in the books of TS on December 31, 1939.

With regard to the two demand deposit accounts held at Bank IV and Bank V, the CRT concluded that the accounts were closed pursuant to instructions of the Thorsches, in the context of transferring the contents of those accounts to a demand deposit account at Bank III. The two demand deposit accounts held at Bank III and Bank I, respectively, were the subject of the litigation described above, in which Alfons Thorsch prevailed. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that the funds were turned over exclusively to Alfons Thorsch. The CRT based its conclusion on documentation pertaining to the litigation; correspondence between Alfons Thorsch's lawyer and Alfons Thorsch's heirs in 1950s; and specific information provided to the CRT by the Zurich Superior Court. With regard to the two demand deposit accounts held at Bank II and Bank I, respectively, both accounts were written off in the books of TS on December 31, 1939, at a time when Alfons Thorsch resided outside of the Reich's control. Accordingly, the CRT concluded that Alfons Thorsch retained dominion over his assets, and received the proceeds himself.

In addition to the 21 accounts held by TS, Alfons and Marie Thorsch jointly held five accounts, and Alfons Thorsch individually held three accounts, for a total of 29 accounts. Two of the accounts jointly held by the account owners, a custody account and related demand deposit account at Bank III, were transferred to Thorsch accounts in Amsterdam at a time when the Thorsches resided in Switzerland. The CRT therefore concluded that the Thorsches, residing outside of the Reich's control, maintained dominion over the disposition of those accounts and received the proceeds themselves.

A third account jointly held by the Thorsches, a second demand deposit account held at Bank III, was closed on September 20, 1939, which was one day following the Swiss Superior Court's decision in favor of Alfons Thorsch (who resided in England at that time). As the Superior Court had issued explicit instructions with regard to release of the assets at issue to Alfons Thorsch, the CRT concluded that Alfons Thorsch had received the proceeds of that account. With regard to the two custody accounts jointly held at Bank IV and Bank V, the CRT concluded that, despite a lack of information regarding the precise circumstances under which the accounts were closed, it was unlikely Bank IV and Bank V would have turned the accounts over to the Reich, given the banks' knowledge of the litigation Alfons Thorsch had initiated with regard to his TS accounts. The CRT further noted that Alfons Thorsch had issued specific instructions to Bank IV not to grant access to anyone other than himself or his wife.

With regard to the custody account Alfons Thorsch held at Bank III, the CRT concluded that the securities contained in the account were transferred to other Thorsch accounts in Amsterdam in 1932 and 1938, and that as of 1939, those securities were held at Barclays Bank in Montreal, Canada. The CRT therefore concluded that the assets in that account remained under Alfons Thorsch's control, and that he received the proceeds himself.

With regard to Alfons Thorsch's safe deposit box account at Bank III, the account was closed in December 1938, at a time when he resided in Switzerland, and less than two weeks after the conclusion of the litigation in which the Superior Court found in his favor. The CRT therefore concluded that Alfons Thorsch accessed his safe deposit box, and received the proceeds himself.

With regard to the demand deposit account held by Alfons Thorsch at Bank III, the CRT concluded that although the relevant bank files did not indicate when the account was closed, the record contained evidence sufficient to rebut a presumption that Alfons Thorsch did not receive the proceeds of the account. Specifically, given that one of the two accounts at issue in the litigation Alfons Thorsch had initiated was held at Bank III, it was unlikely that Bank III would have handed over another account held by the same person while the litigation was pending.

Accordingly, the CRT concluded that all 28 accounts open during the Relevant Period (1933-1945) were properly closed, and that no award was appropriate.

The claimants appealed. They asserted that they were entitled to the proceeds of two of the 29 accounts at issue in the denial: the two custody accounts jointly held at Bank IV and Bank V, for which records indicating the exact disposition of the accounts were unavailable. The claimants agreed with the CRT's conclusion regarding the remaining 27 accounts.

Upon review, the Court issued an order terminating the appeal. The order explicitly rejected the claimants' assertion that it was appropriate to presume that the Thorsches did not receive the proceeds of the accounts. The order also noted that while "not persuasive," the claimants' assertions were "not frivolous," nor was claimants' alternative theory upon which a recovery of assets could be based. While it was unclear whether that theory would warrant recovery under the Settlement Agreement, the Court and claimants agreed that it was in the best interest of the Deposited Assets Class to terminate the proceedings in a manner equitable both to the Thorsch heirs, and other claimants to the Settlement Fund. Accordingly, the appeal was settled at a discount of 15 cents on the U.S. Dollar, providing for an award to claimants of US $3,757,657.19.

ii. In re Accounts of Paul Wittgenstein, Hermine Wittgenstein, Helene Salzer, Wistag AG and Wistag Partnership (SF 7,337,341.72)

The CRT issued a denial with regard to claims submitted by several claimants to the accounts of Paul Wittgenstein, Hermine Wittgenstein, Helene Salzer (née Wittgenstein), who were siblings, and Wistag A.G. and/or Wistag A.G. & Cie K.G. ("Wistag Partnership"). The CRT noted that the accounts of Paul and Hermine Wittgenstein, which were held at Bank I, were published. The account of Helene Salzer at Bank I was unpublished, as were accounts held by Wistag A.G. at Bank I, Bank II and Bank III, and accounts held by the Wistag Partnership at Bank I, Bank III and Bank IV.

The account owners were part of the famed Wittgenstein family, whose members included the philosopher, Ludwig Wittgenstein, as well as wealthy industrialists and patrons of the arts. Paul Wittgenstein, one of the account owners, was a concert pianist. After losing his right arm in the First World War, he taught himself to play one-handed, and commissioned works by eminent composers including Richard Strauss, Sergie Prokofiev and Maurice Ravel.

The claimants asserted that based upon an agreement between Paul Wittgenstein and the Reichsbank, his sisters Hermine and Helene Wittgenstein had lost their shares in the Wistag Partnership, and that Paul Wittgenstein had lost all but SF 1.8 million of his Wistag Partnership share. The claimants also asserted that based upon an entry in Wistag A.G.'s balance sheet dated July 13, 1940, Paul Wittgenstein lost an additional SF 90,386.00, and that Hermine and Helene Wittgenstein lost the assets in their personal accounts at a Swiss bank. The claimants, who were related, included the Trustee of a Trust established under the Will of Paul Wittgenstein for the benefit of his son, Paul Ludwig Wittgenstein (the "Trust").

The bank records showed that Wistag A.G. held a total of 12 Swiss bank accounts during the Relevant Period: ten accounts at Bank I (6 custody accounts and 4 demand deposit accounts), one account at Bank II (a demand deposit account), and one account at Bank III (a custody account). Wistag A.G. also held one account at Bank I for the benefit of Paul Wittgenstein. The record also showed that Wistag Partnership held a total of 11 Swiss bank accounts during the Relevant Period: five accounts at Bank I (three custody accounts and two demand deposit accounts), three accounts at Bank III (a custody account and two demand deposit accounts), and three accounts at Bank IV (a custody account and two demand deposit accounts).

Finally, the record showed that Paul Wittgenstein and Hermine Wittgenstein each held one custody account and associated demand deposit accounts at Bank I, and that Paul held one additional custody account.

Paul Wittgenstein was born on November 5, 1887 in Vienna, Austria. He resided in Vienna until he fled to Zurich, Switzerland in August 1938. Subsequently, he immigrated to the United States, where he arrived in New York by ship in December 1938. Hermine Wittgenstein was born on December 1, 1874 in Bohemia (today, the Czech Republic). She resided in Vienna from 1913 until her death in February 1950. Helene Salzer (née Wittgenstein) was born on August 23, 1879 in Vienna, where she died in 1956.

The claimants submitted numerous documents, including materials referring to negotiations held in the spring and summer of 1939 between the Wittgenstein family and the Reichsbank; documents regarding Wistag A.G. and Wistag Partnership that were obtained from the Commercial Register of Zug, Switzerland; and a Decision of the Arbitration Panel for Restitution in Kind (Schiedinstanz für Naturalrestitution), dated July 12, 2006 (the "Arbitration Panel Decision"), which was filed by the claimants' representative under the provisions of the Austrian General Settlement Fund for Victims of National Socialism to Paul Wittgenstein's one-third share of property in Neuwaldegg, Austria, which had been jointly owned by the Wittgenstein siblings.

The CRT noted that the three Wittgenstein siblings were the children of Karl and Leopoldine Wittgenstein (née Kallmus). Karl Wittgenstein's father, Hermann Wittgenstein, had cut himself off from the Jewish community, but in 1839 married Fanny Figdor, who came from a prominent Austrian Jewish family. Hermann and Fanny moved to Germany where, in 1839, they were baptized in the Lutheran Kreuzkirche, after which Hermann was recognized as a citizen of Leipzig. Hermann and Fanny returned to Vienna in 1851, where Hermann remained outside the Jewish community. All of Hermann's children, including the three account owners, were baptized as Protestants. They were forbidden by Hermann to marry Jews. Karl Wittgenstein was the only child to defy his father's instruction when he married Leopoldine, who was half-Jewish (but had been raised Catholic).

Karl Wittgenstein amassed an immense fortune in iron and steel. Upon his death in 1913, his assets were equally divided among his wife and six children: Kurt, Paul, Ludwig, Hermine, Helene and Gretl, who married an American citizen, Jerome Stonborough.

Kurt Wittgenstein committed suicide in 1918. Ludwig, desiring to rid himself of his inherited wealth, insisted upon turning his fortune over to Hermine, Helene and Paul. Gretl was excluded from Ludwig's irreversible transfer, as her inheritance was greater than that of her siblings, due to investment of her assets in U.S. securities, whereas Hermine's, Helene's and Paul's assets had been greatly devalued following the First World War, due to investment in Austrian war bonds. Despite transferring his assets to his siblings, Ludwig took an active role in protecting the family's wealth. In 1919, he invested nearly all of the family's wealth in a limited partnership in one of the biggest private banks in the Netherlands, with himself as trustee. Following Ludwig's death in 1925, Dr. Max Salzer (Helene's husband), took over as trustee.

In 1932, the Dutch bank abruptly terminated its relationship with the Wittgenstein family. They subsequently established two legal entities in Zug, Switzerland to hold their assets: Wistag A.G. and Wistag Partnership (of which Wistag A.G. was the guaranteeing partner), capitalized at SF 1 million and SF 8 million, respectively. At the time of its creation, Wistag A.G. was owned by American citizens (Gretl Stonborough and her son, Thomas), but was owned 100 percent by Paul Wittgenstein as of 1939. As of 1938, Paul, Hermine and Helene held 31.7 percent, 25.1 percent and 21.1 percent, respectively, of Wistag Partnership. The CRT noted that it was not clear how the remaining 22.1 percent of Wistag Partnership was divided. As of June 6, 1939, the Wistag Partnership's Statement of Accounts indicated that the value of the Wistag Partnership was SF 7,845,160.37, excluding the SF 1 million capital contribution of Wistag A.G. Nearly one-half of that amount was held in accounts at Bank I, Bank III and Bank IV, with the remainder held in non-Swiss banks in the United States and the Netherlands.

Although the Wittgensteins were aware of their Jewish origins, they believed their standing in upper-class Austrian society, together with their Christian upbringing, set them apart. However, as three of their four grandparents had been Jewish, the Nuremburg Laws (in which the Reich distinguished Jews from non-Jews) were fully applied to the Wittgensteins, whom the Reich considered at that time to be "full Jews." Accordingly, the Wittgensteins were subjected to the anti-Semitic decrees of the Reich, first enacted in Vienna on March 12, 1938 (the day of the Anschluss). The Wittgenstein siblings attempted to exempt themselves from the discriminatory laws, asserting that their paternal grandfather, Hermann Wittgenstein, actually had been the illegitimate child of the House of the Princes of Waldeck, and therefore was not Jewish by blood. Having two Jewish grandparents, rather than three or four, would have resulted in a designation of "Mischling" status (i.e., of Jewish and non-Jewish parentage), with some protection from the anti-Semitic laws.

On April 26, 1938, the Nazis required all Jews who resided within the Reich, and/or who were nationals of the Reich, including Austria, and who held assets above a specified level, to register their assets. The CRT obtained asset registration forms for Hermine Wittgenstein, Paul Wittgenstein, Helene Wittgenstein, and Jerome and Margaret (Gretl) Stonborough from the Austrian State Archive ("1938 Census"). These records had been registered with the Reich on July 15, 1938 and were updated in December 1938 (Hermine, Paul and Helene) and July 7, 1938 (Jerome and Margaret), respectively. Hermine, Paul and Helene indicated they had applied for a release from asset reporting, based on their belief that their paternal grandfather, Hermann Christian Wittgenstein, was "not a full Jew." The text of their declaration indicated that they based their belief on "his physical appearance and his way of life, as well as by the physical appearance of his direct descendants . . . [F]or the past 100 years all members of the Wittgenstein family without exception were born and brought up as Christians . . . "

In their 1938 Census, Hermine, Paul and Helene reported the nominal value of their shares in the Wistag Partnership's holdings: SF 2,008,086.40; SF 2,536,731.20 and SF 1,689,434.32, respectively (for a total of SF 6,234,251.92). Those holdings included SF 3,852,347.97 held in Swiss banks, or 61.79 percent of the total nominal value of the siblings' Wistag Partnership shares. In addition, Hermine reported securities in U.S. Dollars, with a market value of RM 325,950.35, which matched records related to Hermine's custody account held at Bank I. She also reported a demand deposit account at Bank I, with a balance of U.S. $63.00. Paul reported securities denominated in U.S. Dollars with a market value of RM 421,322.99, which matched records related to Paul's custody account held at Bank I. Paul also reported a demand deposit account at Bank I, with a value of U.S. $63.00. Helene's 1938 Census indicated that she held securities denominated in U.S. Dollars, with a market value of RM 427,566.67, which matched information about her custody account at Bank I. She also identified her demand deposit account at Bank I, for which she indicated a value of SF 814.10.

Hermine, Paul and Helene stated in their 1938 Census that as of November 12, 1938, they had transferred to the Reich Finance Office RM 242,850.00, RM 218,700.00 and RM 192,600.00, respectively. This was equal to five percent of their individual net assets. These funds represented payment of the first installment of the siblings' "atonement tax." Each filing included a clarification that a decision as to whether each sibling, was in fact, liable for the tax, was pending (i.e., a decision as to their racial status had not yet been established). The siblings also noted that they had sold a number of securities as of November 12, 1938, and that through the receipt of the counter value of the proceeds in RM, their cash assets had increased.

In Margaret Stonborough's 1938 Census, she: 1) declared herself to be an American citizen; 2) did not include the proviso regarding her racial status under the Nuremburg Laws; 3) stated that, as a foreign national resident in the Reich, she was only required to report assets held within the Reich; and 4) reported owning real estate worth RM 429,000, claims deriving from real estate sales of RM 26,294.00, and other valuables, including art objects, worth RM 20,235.00. As Jerome Stonborough predeceased the filing of his 1938 Census, his form was signed by his wife, Margaret Stonborough, who reported only assets that he held in the Reich, which consisted of art objects and collections worth RM 64,900.00.

While attempts to establish the siblings' status as Mischling rather than as fully Jewish continued, Paul was charged with "racial defilement." He was considered to be a Jewish man residing with a non-Jewish woman, with whom he had two children (unbeknownst to his family), which violated the discriminatory laws in effect. Paul subsequently fled to Switzerland in August 1938, after unsuccessful efforts to convince his sisters to leave Austria. In November 1938, the Reich's Genealogical Research Office rejected the family's claims regarding their Mischling status, and informed them they were considered to be fully Jewish. However, in 1939, the Reichsbank and the Wittgenstein family began negotiations, as the Reich was eager to obtain funds for the anticipated war effort.

According to the Implementation of the Ordinance on Foreign Exchange Control dated May 23, 1932, and the Law on the Management of Foreign Exchange dated December 12, 1938, shares in a foreign partnership fell outside the general requirement that all residents of the Reich had to offer their foreign currency denominated securities, foreign currency and gold for sale to the Reichsbank in exchange for RM. In this regard, the CRT also noted that the Wistag Partnership agreement specifically required that the partnership's capital remain intact until 1947. In addition, Wistag A.G., which was the Wistag Partnership's guaranteeing partner, was at the time of the Wistag Partnership's creation owned by Margaret Stonborough and her son, Thomas, both of whom were U.S. citizens, and therefore exempted from reporting assets held outside the Reich. By December 1938, Paul, who owned almost one-third of the Wistag Partnership's assets, resided in the United States. Ludwig, who was a director of the Wistag Partnership (even though he had ceded his share to his siblings), resided in England. In addition, the Wistag Partnership's assets were deposited in Swiss banks in Switzerland, and in non-Swiss banks in the U.S. and the Netherlands.

With these obstacles to a forced transfer in place, the Reich, to obtain access to the Wistag Partnership's foreign currency denominated assets, needed the agreement of the owners. Margaret therefore sought an agreement in which the restrictions preventing access to the Wistag Partnership's funds would be set aside, in exchange for Mischling status for Hermine and Helene, who wished to remain in Vienna. The siblings offered their vested, foreign exchange denominated assets for sale to the Reichsbank in exchange for RM. In return, the Reichsbank was required to: 1) grant Mischling status to Hermine and Helene of a type that would exempt them from the Nuremburg Laws, enabling them to remain in Austria; 2) allow retention of the RM counter value of the foreign currency denominated assets sold to the Reichsbank; and 3) allow Paul to retain a certain part of the foreign currency assets he held in the Wistag Partnership. The remainder of his share of the Wistag Partnership assets would be delivered, in the RM counter value, to Hermine and Helene.

The family began negotiations with the Reichsbank in the Spring of 1939, with a meeting of May 2, 1939, described in Hermine's memoirs as the beginning of "our friendship with the Reichsbank." For his part, Paul, who did not wish to return to the Reich, sought to preserve as much of his assets as possible, while ensuring the safety of his sisters, who wished to remain in the Reich. Negotiations therefore were tense, with Hermine complaining that Paul's advisors were "without exception Jews." Paul was purported to have agreed to turn over SF 2.5 million worth of gold to the Reich as a goodwill payment prior to conclusion of the agreement, and without any concessions from the Reich in return. The CRT did not consider the record to contain sufficient evidence that such payment actually was made.

The Wittgensteins reached an agreement with the Reichsbank on August 21, 1939 (the "Agreement"). The Agreement provided that Paul was to receive SF 1,800,000.00 from the Wistag Partnership's funds, plus advances he had made toward covering the SF 300,000.00 in expenses and legal fees owed to the Wittgenstein lawyers. According to correspondence from Margaret to Ludwig after the conclusion of the agreement with the Reichsbank, the Reichsbank ultimately agreed to pay the SF 300,000 itself. The remainder of the Wistag Partnership's funds, after provision for any taxes and other charges owed to Swiss entities, was to be transferred to the Reichsbank. Those funds were then to be credited, in the RM counter value, to Wittgenstein bank accounts. The Reichsbank agreed to issue a decree setting out the Mischling status of the Wittgenstein siblings "in the most favorable way as possible for them." That decree was issued on August 30, 1939. The Reichsbank also made arrangements for Paul to convey his RM assets and real estate located in the Reich to his sisters, Hermine and Helene.

The Agreement was accompanied by two Side Agreements, both dated August 21, 1939: one agreement between Paul and his nephew, John Stonborough ("Side Agreement 1"), and the other between Paul and his sisters ("Side Agreement 2"). Side Agreement 1 stipulated that Paul would confer all his rights in Wistag A.G. and its assets to John Stonborough. In turn, John agreed to transfer the equivalent of SF 500,000.00 from the Wistag A.G.'s funds to Paul, and would agree to support Hermine and Helene whenever the need arose. Side Agreement 1 would be null and void, if no ultimate agreement was reached between Paul and the Reichsbank. Side Agreement 2 stipulated that in view of Hermine's and Helene's determination to stay in Austria, Paul agreed to convey all his RM assets and his real estate in the Reich to his sisters, aside from certain payments related to the shipment of his personal property abroad, and any payments to discharge obligations that may have been asserted against him in the Reich, such as his flight tax obligation. The CRT noted that the record did not contain any evidence confirming payment by Paul of flight tax, and that in any case, there was no indication of any flight tax paid by Paul or on his behalf, via assets held in a Swiss bank. Side Agreement 2 was to be effective only if the agreements between Paul and the Reichsbank and Paul and John Stonborough were completed.
